Paſſe on yet a little further. Our queſtion is, whether the Hebrew and Greeke Orignalls be corrupted; and whether thoſe firſt Copies of Scriptures be not to be followed above all tranſlations. Heare firſt the ancient Church with us: But (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) howſoever it be taken, whether it be beleeved to be ſo done, or not beleeved, or laſtly, whether it were ſo, or not ſo; I hold it a right courſe, that when any thing is found different in either books (the Hebrew and Septuagint) ſince for the certainty of things done, there can be but one truth; that tongue ſhould rather be beleeved from whence the tranſlation was made into another language. Upon which words Ludovicus Vives (yet a Papiſt) ſaith thus: The ſame (ſaith he) doth Hierom proclaime every where; and reaſon it ſelfe teacheth it, and there is none of ſound judgement that will gainſay it: but in vain doth the conſent of all good wits teach this, for the ſtubborn blockiſhnes of men oppoſeth againſt it.

Let Hierom himſelfe then, a greater Linguiſt, be heard ſpeake: And if there be any man (ſaith he) that will ſay the Hebrew bookes were afterwards corrupted by the Jewes; let him heare Origen, what he anſwers in the eight volume of his explanations of Eſay, to this queſtion: that the Lord and his Apoſtles which reprove other faults in the Scribes & Phariſes, would never have been ſilent in this, which were the greateſt crime that could be. But if they ſay that the Hebrewes falſified them after the comming of Chriſt and preaching of the Apoſtles, I cannot hold from laughter, that our Saviour and the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles ſhould ſo cite teſtimonies of Scripture, as the Iewes would afterward deprave them: Thus Hierom. And the Canon Law it ſelfe hath this determination, that the truth and credit of the books of the old Teſtament ſhould be examined by the Hebrew Volumes; of the new, by the Greeke. And Pope Innocentius, as he is cited by Gratian, could ſay, Have recourſe to the divine Scriptures in their Originall Greeke. The ſame laſtly by Bellarmines owne confeſſion, the Fathers teach every where: As Jerome in his book againſt Helvidius, and in his Epiſtle to Marcella, that the Latine Edition of the Goſpell is to be called backe to the Greeke fountaines; and the Latine Edition of the old Teſtament is to be amended by the Hebrew; in his Comment upon Zachary 8. The very ſame hath Auſten in his ſecond booke of Chriſtian doctrine, Chap. 11. 12. 15. and Epiſt. 19. and elſewhere. This was the old Religion, and ours: now heare the new. The preſent Church of Rome hath thus: The holy Synod decreeth that the old vulgar Latine Edition in all Lectures, Diſputations, Sermons, Expoſitions, be held for Authenticall, ſaith the Councell of Trent: And her Champion Bellarmine hath theſe words: That the fountaine of the Originalls in many places run muddy and impure we have formerly ſhewed, and indeed it can ſcarce be doubted, but that as the Latine Church hath been more conſtãt in keeping the faith than the Greek, ſo it hath been more vigilãt in defending her bookes from corruption. Yea, ſome of the Popiſh Doctors maintain, that the Jewes in hatred of the Chriſtian faith, did on purpoſe corrupt many places of Scripture: ſo holds Gregery de Valentia, Jacobus Chriſtopolitanus in his Preface to the Pſalmes, Canus in the ſecond booke of his common places. But in ſtead of all, Bellarmine ſhall ſhut up all with theſe words: The Hereticks of this time, in hatred of the vulgar Edition, give too much to the Hebrew Edition, as Calvin, Chemnitius, Georgius Major: All which would have every thing examined and amended by the Hebrew text which they commonly call a moſt pure fountaine. See now whether that which Bellarmine confeſſes to have been the judgement of Hierome, Auſten, and all the ancient Fathers, be not here condemned by him, as the opinion of the Hereticks: Ours was theirs, and theirs is condemned under our names: Judge whether in this alſo Popery be not an upſtart.

Yet one ſtep more: Our queſtion is, Whether the Scripture be eaſie or moſt obſcure; and whether in all eſſentiall points it doe not interpret it ſelfe; ſo as what is hard in one place, is openly laid forth in another: Heare the judgement of the old Church and ours: All things are cleare and plaine, and nothing contrary in the Scriptures, ſaith Epiphanius. Thoſe things which ſeeme doubtfully and obſcurely ſpoken in ſome places of Scripture, are expounded by them, which in other places are open and plaine, ſaith Baſil: What could Calvine and Luther ſay more?

There is no ſo great hardneſſe in the Scriptures to come to thoſe things which are neceſſary to ſalvation, ſaith Auſten: In thoſe things which are openly laid downe in Scripture, are found all thoſe things which containe our faith and rules of our life, ſaith the ſame Father; who yet againe alſo ſaith thus: The Spirit of God hath royally and wholeſomely tempered the holy Scriptures ſo, as both by the plaine places he might prevent our hunger, and by the obſcure he might avoid our nice ſlothfulneſſe; for there is ſcarce any thing that can be fetcht out of thoſe obſcurities, which is not found moſt plainly ſpoken elſewhere.

And becauſe Bellarmine takes exception at this (Fere, ſcarce) compare this place with the former, and with that which he hath in his third Epiſtle, thus: The manner of ſpeech in whſch the Scripture is contrived, is eaſie to be come to of all; although it be throughly attained by few: Thoſe things which it containeth plaine and eaſie, it ſpeakes like a familiar friend, without guile, to the heart of the learned and unlearned, &c. But it invites all men with an humble manner of ſpeech, whom it doth not only feed with manifeſt truth, but exerciſe with ſecret, having the ſame in readineſſe which it hath in ſecrecy: thus Auſten. To omit Irenæus and Origen: Chryſoſtome (whom Bellarmine ſaith, we allege alone for us) beſides many other plain places, writeth thus: Who is there to whom all is not maniteſt, which is written in the Goſpell? who that ſhall heare, Bleſſed are the meeke, Bleſſed are the mercifull, Bleſſed are the pure in heart, and the reſt; would deſire a teacher to learne any of theſe things which are here ſpoken? As alſo the ſignes, miracles, hiſtories, are not they knowne and manifeſt to every man? This pretence and excuſe is but the cloake of our ſlothfulnneſſe: thou underſtandeſt not thoſe things which are written; how ſhouldſt thou underſtand them which wilt not ſo much as ſlightly looke into them? Take the booke into thy hand, read all the Hiſtory, and what thou knoweſt, remember; and what is obſcure, run often over it: So Chryſoſtome. Yea, he makes this difference betwixt the Philoſophers and Apoſtles: The Philoſophers ſpeake obſcurely, but the Apoſtles and Propehts (ſaith he) contrarily make all things delivered by them, cleare and manifeſt: and as the common teachers of the world have ſo expounded all things, that every man may of himſelfe by bare reading learn thoſe things which are ſpoken: yea, laſtly, he goes ſo farre in this point, as that he aſketh, Wherefore needs a Preacher? all things are cleare and plaine in the Divine Scriptures; but becauſe ye are delicate hearers, and ſeeke delight in hearing, therefore ye ſeek for Preachers.

You

A You have heard the old religion, now heare the new: Bellarmine hath these words; It must needs be confessed that the Scriptures are most obscure; Here therfore (saith he) Luther hath devised two evasions; One, that the Scripture, though it be obscure in one place, yet that it doth clearely propound the same thing in another: The second is, that though the Scripture be cleare of it selfe, yet to the proud and unbeleevers it is hard by reason of their blindnesse and evill affections: so the Lutherans (saith Eccius) contend that the Scriptures are cleare and plaine: so Durus against Whitakers: so the Rhemists in their annotations; and generally all Papists. Judge now if all these fore-named Fathers, and so the ancient Church, were not Lutherans in this point; or rather we theirs; and yeeld that this their old opinion by the new Church of Rome is condemned for hereticall: and in all these say upon your soule, whether is the Elder?

B Let me draw you on yet a little further: Our question is, whether it be necessary or fit that all men (even of the Laiety) should have liberty to heare and read the Scriptures in a language which they understand? Heare first the voice of the old Religion; To omit the direct charges of Gregory Nissen and Ambrose, thus hath Jerome upon the Psalmes, The Lord will declare; and how will he declare? Not by word, but by writing: In whose writing? in the writing of his people, &c. Our Lord and Saviour therefore tells us, and speaketh in the Scriptures of his Princes: Our Lord will declare it to us in the Scriptures of his people, in the holy Scriptures: which Scripture is read to all the people; that is, so read as that all may understand: not that a few may understand, but all.

C What faithfull man, saith Augustine (though he be but a Novice, before he be baptized, and have received the holy Ghost) doth not with an equall minde read and heare all things, which after the ascension of our Lord are written in Canonicall truth, and authority, although as yet he understands them not as he ought?

But of all other, Saint Chrysostome is every where most vehement and direct in this point: Amongst infinite places, hear what he saith in one of his Homilies of Lazarus: I doe alwayes exhort, and will never cease to exhort you (saith he) that you will not here only attend to those things which are spoken; but when you are at home, you continually busie your selves in reading of the holy Scriptures; which practise also I have not ceased to drive into them which come privately unto me: for let no man say, Tush, they are but idle words, and many of them such as should be contemned: Alas, I am taken up with Law-causes, I am imployed in publike affaires, I follow my trade, I maintaine a wife and children, and have a great charge to looke to: It is not for me to read the Scriptures, but for them which have cast off the world, which have taken up the solitary tops of Mountaines for their dwellings, which live this contemplative kinde of life continually.

D What saiest thou, O man? Is it not for thee to turne over the Scriptures, because thou art distracted with infinite cares? Nay, then it is for thee more than for them; for they doe not so much need the helpe of the Scriptures, as you that are tost in the midst of the waves of worldly businesse.

And soon after: Neither can it be possible that any man should without great fruit be perpetually conversant in this spirituall exercise of reading: and straight: Let us not neglect to buy our selves Bookes, lest we receive a wound in our vitall parts: And after he hath compared the Bookes of Scripture to Gold; he addeth, But what, say they, if we understand not those things which are contained in those Bookes? What gaine we then? Yes surely, though thou dost not understand those things which are there laid up, yet by the very reading much holinesse is got: Although it cannot be, that thou shouldst be alike ignorant of all thou readest; for therefore hath the Spirit of God so dispensed this Word, that Publicanes, Fishers, Tent-makers, Shepheards, and Goat-heards, plaine unlettred men may be saved by these Bookes; lest any of the simpler sort should pretend this excuse: That all things which are said, should be easie to discerne; and that the workman, the servant, the poore widdow, and the most unlearned of all other, by hearing of the word read, might get ſome gain and profit. A

And the ſame Father elſewhere: I beſeech you (ſaith he) that you come ſpeedily hither, and hearken diligently to the reading of the holy Scriptures; and not only when you come hither, but alſo at home take the Bible into your hands, and by your diligent care reap the profit contained in it. Laſtly, in his Homilies upon the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians, he cries out, Heare, I beſeech you, O all you ſecular men, provide you Bibles, which are the medicines for the ſoule; At leaſt get the New Teſtament.

Now on the contrary, let the new religion of Rome ſpeake, firſt by her Rhemiſh Jeſuits, thus: We may not thinke that the tranſlated Bibles into the vulgar tongues were in the hands of every huſbandman, artificer, prentice, boye, girle, Miſtreſſe, Maid, Man; that they were ſung, played, alleaged of every Tinker, Taverner, Rimer, Minſtrell. The like words of ſcorne and diſgrace are uſed by Hoſius, and by Eckius, and by Bellar. de verb. l.2 c.15. B

The wiſe will not here regard (ſay our Rhemiſts) what ſome wilfull people doe mutter, that the Scriptures are made for all men, &c. And ſoon after, they compare the Scriptures to Fire, Water, Candles, Knives, Swords, which are indeed needfull, &c. but would marre all, if they were at the guiding of other than wiſe men. All the Heretikes of this time, ſaith Bellarmine, agree that the Scriptures ſhould be permitted to all, and delivered in their owne Mother-tongue; but the Catholike Church forbids the reading of the Scriptures by all, without choice: or the publike reading or ſinging of them in vulgar tongues, as it is decreed in the Councell of Trent, Seſſ. 22. *c.*8. & Can. 9. If you thinke (ſaith Duræus) that Chriſt bade all Chriſtians to ſearch the Scriptures, you are in a groſſe error; For how ſhall rude and ignorant men ſearch the Scriptures? &c. And ſo he concludes, that the Scriptures were not given to the common multitude of Beleevers. C

Judge now what either we ſay, or theſe Papiſts condemn, beſides the ancient judgment of the Fathers: and if ever either Calvin or Luther have been more peremptory in this matter than S. Chryſoſt. I vow to be a papiſt. If ours be not in this the old religion, be not you ours.

Yet this one paſſage further, and then no more, leſt I weary you: Our queſtion is, whether the Scriptures depend upon the authority of the Church, or rather upon the authority of Scriptures?

Heare firſt the ancient Church, with and for us: The queſtion is (ſaith S. Auſten) betwixt us and the Donatiſts, where the Church is. What ſhall we doe then? ſhall we ſeek her in her owne words, or in the words of her Head the Lord Jeſus Chriſt? I ſuppoſe we ought to ſeeke her rather in his words, which is the Truth, and knowes beſt his own body, for the Lord knowes who are his; we will not have the Church ſought in our words. And in the ſame Booke, Whether the Donatiſts hold the Church (ſaith the ſame Father) let them not ſhew, but by the Canonicall Bookes of Divine Scriptures; for neither doe we therefore ſay they ſhould beleeve us, that we are in the Church of Chriſt, becauſe Optatus or Ambroſe hath commended this Church unto us which we now hold, or becauſe it is acknowledged by the Councels of our fellow Teachers, or becauſe ſo great miracles are done in it: it is not therefore manifeſted to be true & Catholike; But the Lord Jeſus himſelfe judged, that his Diſciples ſhould rather be confirmed by the Teſtimonies of the Law and the Prophets: Theſe are the rules of our cauſe, theſe are the foundations, theſe are the confirmations. D D E E

And upon the Pſalmes: Leſt thou ſhouldſt erre (ſaith the ſame Auguſtine) in thy judgement of the Church: leſt any man ſhould ſay to thee, This is Chriſt, which is not Chriſt; or this is the Church, which is not the Church: for many, &c. Heare the voyce of the Shepheard himſelfe which is cloathed in fleſh, &c. He ſhewes himſelfe to thee; handle him, and ſee. He ſhewes his Church, leſt any man ſhould deceive thee under the name of the Church, &c. Yet Chryſoſtome more directly, thus: He that would know which is the true Church of Chriſt, whence may he know it in the ſimilitude of ſo great confuſion, but onely by the Scriptures? Now the working of miracles is altogether ceaſed; yea, they are rather found to be fainedly wrought of them, which are but falſe Chriſtians; Whence then ſhall he know it, but only by the Scriptures?

tures? The Lord Jeſus therefore knowing what great confuſion of things would be in the laſt dayes, therefore commands that thoſe which are Chriſtians, and would receive confirmation of their true faith, ſhould flye to nothing but to the Scriptures; Otherwiſe, if they ſhould flye to any other helpe, they ſhall be offended and periſh; not underſtanding which is the true Church. This is the old faith; Now heare the new, contradicting it and us. The Scripture (ſaith Eckius a Popiſh Doctor) is not authenticall without the authority of the Church; for the Canonicall Writers are members of the Church; Whereupon, let it be objected to an Heritike, that will ſtrive againſt the decrees of the Church, by what weapons he will fight againſt the Church? he will ſay by the Canonicall Scriptures of the foure Goſpels, and Pauls Epiſtles. Let it be ſtraight objected to him, how he knowes theſe to be Canonicall, but by the Church? And a while after, the Scriptures (ſaith he) defined in a Councell, it ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt, and to us, that you abſtaine from things offered to Idols, and blood, and ſtrangled: the Church by her authority altered a thing ſo clearly defined and expreſſed: for it uſeth both ſtrangled and blood; Behold, the power of the Church is above the Scripture: thus Eckius. And beſides Cuſanus, Bellarmine ſaith thus: If we take away the authority of the preſent Church, and of the preſent Councell (of Trent) all the Decrees of all other Councels, and the whole Chriſtian faith may be called in doubt. And in the ſame place, a little after; The ſtrength of all ancient Councels, and the certainty of all opinions depends on the authority of the preſent Church. You have heard both ſpeake: ſay now, with whom is true antiquity; and on Gods name deteſt the newer of both. It were as eaſie to bring the ſame, if not greater evidence for the perfection and all-ſufficiency of Scripture; and ſo to deliver all the body of our religion by the tongues and pens of the Fathers, that either you muſt be forced to hold them Noveliſts with us, or your ſelves ſuch againſt them. How honeſt and ingenuous is that confeſſion of your Eraſmus? who in his Epiſtle to the Biſhop and Cardinall of Mentz, could ſay, It is plainly found, that many things in Luthers Books are condemned for Hereticall, which in the books of Bernard and Auſten are read for Holy and Orthodox.

This is too much for a taſte: If your appetite ſtand to it, I dare promiſe you full diſhes. Let me therefore appeale to you, if light and darkneſſe be more contrary than theſe points of your Religion to true antiquity: No, no, Let your Authors gloſe as they liſt; Popery is but a young faction, corruptly raiſed out of ancient grounds. And if it have (as we grant) ſome ancient errours, falſhood cannot be bettered with Age; there is no preſcription againſt God and Truth: What we can prove to be erronious, we need not prove new: ſome hundreds of yeares is an idle Plea againſt the Ancient of dayes.

What can you plead yet more for your change? Their numbers perhaps, and our handfulls: you heard all the world was theirs, ſcarce any corner ours: How could you but ſuſpect a few? Theſe are but idle brags; we dare and can ſhare equally with them in Chriſtendome: And if we could not, this rule will teach you to advance Turciſme above Chriſtianity, and Paganiſme above that: the world above the Church, Hell above Heaven: If any proofe can be drawne from numbers, He that knowes all, ſayes the beſt are feweſt.

What then could ſtirre you? Our diviſions and their unity. If this my following labour doe not make it good to all the World, that their peace is leſſe than ours, their diſſention more, by the confeſſion of their own mouthes, be you theirs ſtill, and let me follow you. I ſtand not upon the ſcoldings of Prieſts and Jeſuites, nor the late Venetian jarres, nor the pragmaticall differences now on foot, in the view of all Chriſtendome, betwixt their own Cardinalls in their Sacred conclave, and all their Clergie, concerning the Popes temporall power: Neither doe I call any friend to be our Advocate, none but Bellarmine and Navarrus ſhall be my Orators; and if theſe plead not this cauſe enough, let it fall: See here dangerous rifts and flawes, not in the outward barke only, but in the very heart and pith of your Religion; and if ſo many be confeſſed by one or two, what might be gathered out of all? and if ſo many be acknowledged, thinke how many there are that lurke in ſecret, and will not be confeſſed?

We want only their cunning ſecrecy in the carriage of our quarrels: Our few (and ſlight) differences are blazoned abroad with infamy and offence, their hundreds are craftily ſmothered in ſilence.

Let your owne eyes ſatisfie you in this, not my pen: See now what you would never beleeve.

What is it then that could thus bewitch you to forſake the comely and heavenly truth of God, and to dote upon this beaſtly Strumpet? to change your Religion for a ridiculous, ſenſuall, cruell, irreligious faction? A Religion (if we muſt call it ſo, that made ſport to our plaine fore-fathers, with the remembrance of her graveſt devotions: How oft have you ſeen them laugh at themſelves, whiles they have told of their creeping-crouch, kiſſing the Pax, offering their Candles, ſinging with aſhes, partiall Shrifts, merry Pilgrimages, ridiculous miracles, and a thouſand ſuch May-games, which now you begin (after this long hiſſing at) to looke upon ſoberly, and with admiration!

A Religion, whoſe fooleries very Boyes may ſhout and laugh at, if for no more but this; That it teaches men to put confidence in Beads, Medals, Roſes, hallowed Swords, Spels of the Goſpell, Agnus Dei, and ſuch like idle Bables; aſcribing unto them Divine vertue: yea, ſo much as is due to the Sonne of God himſelfe, and his pretious blood! I ſpeake not of ſome rude ignorants; your very Booke of holy-ceremonies ſhall teach you what your holy-fathers doe, and have done. That tels you firſt, with great allowance and applauſe, that Pope Urban the fift ſent three Agnus Dei, to the Greeke Emperor, with theſe verſes:

Balſam, pure wax, and Chriſomes liquor cleere
Make up this pretious Lambe, I ſend thee here;
All lightening it diſpells, and each ill ſpright,
Remedies ſinne, and makes the heart contrite,
Even as the blood that Chriſt for us did ſhed.
It helpes the child-beds paine, and gives good ſpeed
Unto the birth; Great gifts it ſtill doth win
To all that weare it, and that worthy bin:
It quels the rage of fire; and cleanly bore
It brings from ſhipwracke ſafely to the ſhore.

And leſt you ſhould plead this to be the conceit of ſome one Phantaſticall Pope, heare (and be aſhamed) out of the ſame Booke, what by preſcription every Pope uſeth to pray in the bleſſing of the water which ſerves for that Agnus Dei: If you know not, thus he prayes: that it would pleaſe thee, O God, to bleſſe thoſe things which we purpoſe to powre into this veſſell of water prepared to the glory of thy Name, ſo as by the worſhip and honour of them, we thy ſervants may have our heynous offences done away, the blemiſhes of our ſinnes wip't off, and thereby we may obtain pardon, and receive grace from thee; ſo that at the laſt with thy Saints and elect Children we may merit to obtaine everlaſting life, Amen. How could you chooſe, but be in love with this Superſtition, Magicke, Blaſphemy practiſed and maintained by the heads of your Church?

A Religion, that allowes jugling Equivoctaions, and reſerved ſenſes, even in very oathes. Beſides all that hath been ſhameleſly written by our Jeſuites to this purpoſe; Heare what Franciſcus Victoria, an ingenuous Papiſt, and a learned Reader of Divinity in Salmantica writes in the name of all.

But what ſhall a Confeſſor doe (ſaith he) if he be askt of a ſinne that he hath heard in Confeſſion? May he ſay that he knowes not of it? I anſwer, according to all our Doctors, that he may. But what if he be compelled to ſweare? I ſay, that he may and ought to ſwear that he knowes it not; for that it is underſtood that he knowes it not beſides confeſſion, and ſo he ſweares true. But ſay, that the Judge or Prelate ſhall maliciouſly require of him upon his oath, whether he know it in confeſſion, or no?

Balſamus & munda cera cum coriſmatis unda Conficiunt Agnum, quod munus do tibi magnum, &c. Fulgura de cælo &c. Peccatum frangit ut Chriſti ſanguis & agit, &c, Sacr. ceremſ. l. 1 Vt ea quæ is hoc aquarum vaſculo, præparato ad nominis tui gloriam, infundere decrevimus benedicas: quatenus ipſorum veneratione & honore nobis famulis tuis crimina diluantur, abſtergantur maculæ peccatorum, impetrentur veniæ, gratiæ conferantur ut tandem una cum ſanctis & electis tuis vitæ percipere mereamur æternam. Sed fac quod Judex aut prælatus ex malitia exigat à me juramentum, an ſciam in confeſſione? Reſpondeo, quod coactus juret ſe neſcire in confeſſione, quia intelligitur ſe neſcire ad revelandum, aut taliter quod poſſit dicere.

A I answer that a man thus urged, may sweare that he knowes it not in confession; for that it is understood, he knowes it not to reveale it, or so as he may tell: Who teach and doe thus in anothers case, judge what they would doe in their owne. O wise, cunning, and holy perjuries, unknowne to our fore-fathers!

A Religion that allowes the buying and selling of sins, of Pardons, of soules: so as now Purgatory can have no rich men in it, but fooles and friendlesse: Devils are tormentors there (as themselves hold from many Revelations of Bede, Bernard, Carthusian) yet Men can command Devils, and Money can command Men.

A Religion, that relies wholly upon the infallibility of those, whom yet they grant have been, and may be monstrous in their lives and dispositions. How many of those heires of Peter (by confession of their owne Records) by Bribes, by Whores, by Devils, have climed up into that chaire! Yet, to say that those men which are confessed to have given their soules to the Devill, that they might be Popes, can erre while they are Popes, is Heresie worthy of a stake, and of Hell.

A Religion, that hood-winkes the poore Laiety in forced ignorance, lest they should know Gods will, or any way to Heaven, but theirs; so as millions of soules live no lesse without Scripture, than as if there were none: that forbids spirituall food as poyson; and fetches Gods Book into the Inquisition.

A Religion that teaches men to worship stocks and stones, with the same honour that is due to their Creator; which practice lest it should appeare to her simple Clyents, how palpably opposite it is to the second Commandement; they have discreetly left out those words of Gods Law, as a needlesse illustration, in their Catechismes and Prayer-Books of the vulgar.

A Religion, that utterly overthrowes the true humanity of Christ, while they give unto it ten thousand places at once, and yet no place: flesh and no flesh, severall members without distinction: a substance without quantity, and other accidents; or substance and accidents that cannot be seen, felt, perceived. So they make either a monster of their Saviour, or nothing.

A Religion, that utterly overthrowes the perfection of Christs satisfaction: If all be not paid, how hath he satisfied? If temporall punishments in Purgatory be yet due, how is all paid? and if these must be paid by us, how are they satisfied by him?

A Religion, that makes more Scriptures than ever God and his ancient Church; and those which it doth make, so imperiously obtrudes upon the world, as if God himselfe should speake from Heaven: and while it thunders out curses against all that will not adde these books to Gods, regards not Gods curse, If any man shall adde unto these things, God shall adde unto him the plagues that are written in this Booke.

A Religion, whose Patrons disgrace the true Scriptures of God with reproachfull termes, odious comparisons, imputations of corruption and imperfection; and in fine, pin their whole authority upon the sleeves of men.

A Religion, that erects a throne in the Conscience to a meere man, and gives him absolute power to make a sinne, to dispense with it, to create new Articles of Faith, and to impose them upon necessity of Salvation.

A Religion, that baffoules all Temporall Princes, making them stand bare-foot at their great Bishops gate, lye at his foot, hold his stirrup, yea, their owne Crownes at his Courtesie, exempting all their Ecclesiasticall Subjects from their jurisdiction, and (when they list) all the rest from their allegiance.

Papa facit protestationem antè Canonizationem: se nihil intendre facere, quod sit contra fidem aut Ecclesiam Catholicam. Aliqui tamen clarissimi viri dicunt, &c. Quia Papa quodammodo cogebatur ad Canonizandum quendam contra suã voluntatem. lib. Sacr. Ceremon.

A Religion, that hath made wicked men Saints, and Saints Gods. Even by the confession of Papists, lewd and undeserving men have leapt into their Calendar. Whence it is, that the Pope before his Canonization of any Saint, makes solemne protestation, that he intends not in that businesse to doe ought prejudiciall to the glory of God, or to the Catholike Faith and Church: And once Sainted, they have the honor of Altars, Temples, Invocations; and some of them in a stile fit only for their Maker. I know not whether that blessed Virgin receive more indignity from her enemies that deny her, or these her flatterers that deifie her.

A Religion, that robs the Christian heart of all sound comfort, whiles it teacheth us, that we neither can nor ought to be assured of the remission of our sinnes, and of preſent grace, and future ſalvation; That we can never know whether we have received the true Sacraments of God, becauſe we cannot know the intention of the Miniſter, without which they are no Sacraments. A

A Religion, that rackes the conſcience with the needleſſe torture of a neceſſary ſhrift; wherein the vertue of abſolution depends on the fulneſſe of confeſſion: and that upon examination; and the ſufficiency of examination is ſo full of ſcruples (beſides thoſe infinite caſes of unreſolved doubts in this fained penance) that the poore ſoule never knowes when it is cleare.

A Religion, that profeſſes to be a Bawd of ſinne; whiles both (in practice) it tolerates open ſtewes, and prefers fornication in ſome caſes to honourable Matrimony, and gently blanches over the breaches of Gods Law, with the name of Venialls, and favorable titles of Diminution; daring to affirm that Veniall ſinnes are no hindrance to a mans cleanneſſe and perfection. B

A cruell Religion, that ſends poore Infants remedileſly into the eternall paines of Hell, for want of that which they could not live to deſire: and frights ſimple ſoules with expectation of fained torments in Purgatory; not inferiour (for the time) to the flames of the damned. How wretchedly and fearfully muſt their poore Layicks needs dye: for firſt, they are not ſure they ſhall not goe to Hell; and ſecondly, they are ſure to be ſcorched, if they ſhall goe to Heaven.

A Religion, that makes nature vainly proud, in being joyned by her, as copartner with God in our Juſtification, in our Salvation; and idlely puffed up in a conceit of her perfection, and ability to keepe more Lawes than God hath made.

A Religion, that requires no other faith to juſtification in Chriſtians, than may be found in the Devils themſelves: who, beſides a confuſed apprehenſion, can aſſent unto the Truth of Gods revealed will: Popery requires no more. C

A Religion, that in ſtead of the pure milk of the Goſpell, hath long fed her ſtarved ſoules with ſuch idle Legends, as the Reporter can hardly deliver without laughter, and their Abettors not heare without ſhame and diſclamation: the wiſer ſort of the World read thoſe Stories on winter Evenings for ſport, which the poore credulous multitude heares in their Churches with a devout aſtoniſhment.

A Religion, which (leſt ought ſhould be here wanting to the Doctrine of Devils) makes religious Prohibitions of meat, and difference of dyet; ſuperſtitiouſly preferring Gods workmanſhip to it ſelfe, and willingly polluting what he hath ſanctified. D

A Religion, that requires nothing but meere formality in our devotions; the worke wrought ſuffices alone in Sacraments, in Prayers: So the number be found in the Chappelet, there is no care of the affection; as if God regarded not the heart, but the tongue and hands; and while he underſtands us, cared little whether we underſtand our ſelves.

A Religion, that preſumptuouſly dares to alter and mangle Chriſts laſt Inſtitution; and ſacrilegiouſly rob Gods people of one half of that heavenly proviſion, which our Saviour left for his laſt and deareſt Legacy to his Church for ever; as if Chriſts Ordinance were ſuperfluous, or any Shaveling could be wiſer than his Redeemer.

A Religion, that depends wholly upon nice and poor uncertainties, and unproveable ſuppoſals: That Peter was Biſhop of Rome; that he left any heires of his graces and ſpirit; or if any, but one in a perpetuall and unfaileable ſucceſſion at Rome; that he ſo bequeathed his infallibility to his chaire, as that whoſoever ſits in it, cannot but ſpeake true: that all which ſit where he ſate, muſt by ſome ſecret inſtinct ſay as he taught; that what Chriſt ſaid to him abſolutely, ere ever Rome was thought of, muſt be referred, yea, tyed to that place alone, and fulfilled in it: That Linus, or Clemens or Cletus, the Schollers and ſuppoſed ſucceſſors of Peter, muſt be preferred (in the Headſhip of the Church) to John the beloved Apoſtle then living: That he whoſe life, whoſe pen, whoſe judgement, whoſe keyes may erre; yet in his Pontificiall chair cannot erre: That the Golden Line of this Apoſtolicall Succeſſion, in the confuſion of ſo many, long, deſperate Schiſmes, ſhamefully corrupt Uſurpations, and Intruſions, yeelded Hereſies; neither was, nor can be broken. Deny any of theſe, and Popery E perie is no Religion. Oh the lamentable hazard of so many millions of poore soules, that stand upon these slippery termes, whereof if any be probable, some are impossible! Oh miserable grounds of Popish faith, whereof the best can but have this praise, that perhaps it may be true!

A Religion, that hath been oft dyed in the blood of Princes: that in some cases, teaches and allowes Rebellion against Gods Anointed; and both suborneth Treasons, and excuses, pities, honors, rewards the actors.

A Religion, that over-loads mens consciences with heavy burdens of infinite unnecessary Traditions; far more than ever Moses commented upon by all the Jewish Masters; imposing them with no lesse authority, and exacting them with more rigor, than any of the royall lawes of their Maker.

A Religion that coozens the vulgar with nothing but shadowes of Holinesse, in Pilgrimages, Processions, Offerings, Holy-water, Latine Services, Images, Tapers, rich Vestures, garish Altars, Crosses, Censings, and a thousand such like (fit for children and fooles) robbing them in the meane time of the sound and plain helps of true piety and salvation.

A Religion that cares not by what wilfull falshoods it maintaines a part: as Wickliffes blasphemy, Luthers advice from the Devill, Tindals community, Calvins fained Miracle, and blasphemous death, Bucers neck broken, Bezaes revolt, the blasting of Huguenots, Englands want of Churches and Christendome, Queene Elizabeths unwomanlinesse, her Episcopall Jurisdiction, her secret fruitfulnesse; English Catholikes cast in Beares skins to Dogges, Plesses shamefull overthrow, Garnets Straw, the Lutherans obscene night-revels, Scories drunken ordination in a Taverne, the Edict of our gratious King James (anno 87.) for the establishment of Popery, our casting the crusts of our Sacrament to doggs; and ten thousand of this nature, maliciously raised and defended against knowledge and conscience, for the disgrace of those whom they would have hated, ere known.

A Religion, that in the conscience of her own untruth, goes about to falsifie and deprave all Authors that might give evidence against her, to outface all ancient truths, to foist in Gibeonitish witnesses of their own forging; and leaves nothing unattempted against Heaven or Earth, that might advantage her faction, and disable her innocent adversary: Loe, this is your choice. If the zeale of your losse hath made me sharpe, yet not malicious, not false; God is my Record, I have not (to knowledg) charged you with the least untruth: and if I have wronged, accuse me: and if I cleare not my selfe, and my challenge, let me be branded for a slanderer. In the mean time what spirituall phrensie hath overtaken you, that you can finde no beauty, but in this Monster of errors? It is to you and your fellowes, that God speakes by his Prophet: O ye Heavens be astonied at this, be afraid and utterly confounded, saith the Lord; for my people hath committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the Fountaine of living waters, to digge them pits, even broken pits, that can hold no water: what shall be the issue? Et tu Domine, deduces eos in puteum interitus: Thou O God, shalt bring them downe into the pit of destruction. If you will thus wilfully leave God, there I must leave you: But (if you had not rather dye) returne, and save one; returne to God, returne to his Truth, returne to his Church: your blood be upon my head, if you perish.

An Advertisement to the Reader.

THE Reader may please to take notice, that in the former Edition there was added unto this Discourse, a just Volume of above three hundred Contradictions and dissentions of the Romish Doctors, under the name of The Peace of Rome; which, because it was but a collection out of Bellarmine and Navar, and no otherwise mine, but as a Gatherer and Translator, I have here thought good to omit.

NO PEACE WITH ROME.

TO THE TRUE, SOUND AND HOLY CHURCH OF GOD,

whereſoever warfaring upon EARTH.

I Preſent unto thee (deare and holy Mother) this poore unworthy token of my love and loyalty; the not ſo pleaſing, as true report of thy future broiles. How much gladder ſhould I have been (if thy Spouſe had ſo thought good) to have been the meſſenger of thy Peace and ſecuritie! But ſince the great and wiſe Moderator of all things hath thought a Palme fitter for thee, than an Olive; it is for thee to thinke of victory, not of reſt: Thou ſhalt once triumph in Heaven, and reſt for all; but in the meane time, here is nothing to be lookt for but ambuſhes, skirmiſhes, tumults: And how cheerefully muſt thou needs both beare and overcome all oppoſitions, that art not more ſure of the neceſſity of thy warfare, than of the happineſſe of thy ſucceſſe; whileſt thou ſeeſt thy glorious Husband not onely the leader of this field, but a moſt juſt and mercifull Crowner of thy Conqueſt. Certainly, it is as impoſſible for thee to miſcarry, as to ſit ſtill, and not fight: Behold, all the forces of Heaven and Earth conſpire, and rejoyce to come voluntaries unto this holy warre of thine, and promiſe thee a moſt happy iſſue: addreſſe thy ſelfe therefore (as thou art wont) couragiouſly to this worke of God: But remember, firſt, to inquire (as thou thou art wont) couragiouſly to this worke of God: But remember, firſt, to inquire (as thou doeſt) of Abel: Spare no teares to thy deſperate Siſter, (now thine enemy) and calling heaven and earth to witneſſe, upon thy knees beſeech and intreat her, by her own ſoule, and by the deare bowels of Chriſt, by thoſe precious drops of his bloudy ſweat, by that common price of our eternall redemption, that ſhe would at the laſt returne to her ſelfe, and that good diſpoſition which ſhe hath now too long abandoned: that ſhe would forbeare, any more, as I fear ſhe hath hitherto wilfully done) to fight againſt God: But if ſhe ſhall ſtill perſiſt to ſtop her eares againſt thee, and to harden herſelfe in rebellion againſt her God; forget (if thou canſt) who ſhe once was, and flie mercileſly upon this daughter of Belial, that vaunts herſelfe proudly in the glory of her munition; Goe, ſmite, deſtroy, conquer, and reigne, as the worthy partner of thine Husbands Throne: For me, I ſhall in the meane time be as one of thy rude Trumpets, whoſe noiſe ſhall both awaken thy courage unto this ſpirituall battell, and whoſe joyfull gratulations ſhal after thy rich ſpoiles, applaud thine happy return in the day of thy victory.

THE OPINION OF George Cassander, A LEARNED PAPIST; AND GRAVE DIVINE:

That by two severall Emperors, FERDINAND, and MAXIMILIAN, was set on worke to compose these quarrels of the CHURCH.

In his consultation, pag. 56, & 57.

YET I cannot deny, but that in the beginning, many out of a godly zeale and care were driven to a sharp and severe reproofe of certaine manifest abuses; and that the principall cause of this calamity and distraction of the Church is to be laid upon those, which being puffed up with a vaine insolent conceit of their Ecclesiasticall power, proudly and scornfully contemned and rejected them which did rightly and modestly admonish their reformation: Wherefore my opinion is, that the Church can never hope for any firme peace, unlesse they make the beginning, which have given the cause of the distraction; that is, unlesse those which are in place of Ecclesiasticall Government, will be content to remit something of their too much rigor, and yeeld somewhat to the Peace of the Church; and hearkening unto the earnest Prayers and Admonitions of many godly men, will set themselves to correct manifest abuses according to the rule of Divine Scriptures, and of the ancient Church from which they have swerved.

NO PEACE WITH ROME.

SECTION I.

The state of the now Roman Church.

THERE is no one question doth so rack the mindes of men at this day, as this of the Church: The infancy of the Church was sore and long vexed with Heresies of an higher nature, concerning GOD, concerning CHRIST, which still strooke at the head: but her vigorous and hoary age is exercised with a slighter quarrell, concerning our selves; which yet raiseth up the greater broiles every where, by how much every man naturally loves himselfe more than God. Not to meddle with any forreign questions of this nature: Too many seeme unto me to misconceive the state of our Church, and the Romish, as if they had been alwaies two; as if from their first foundations they had been sensibly severed in time and place, like to Babilon and Hierusalem, or those two famous Cities opposed in S. Austins learned discourse. Hence are those idle demands of some smattering Questionists; Where our Church hath thus long hid it selfe? What yeere and day it came to light? In which age that other Church lost it selfe? Why we have withdrawne our selves no further from them? What is become of our forefathers? Which was the Religion of the former world? From hence have those sharpe and rigorous censures passed on both sides; whether of novelty, or of the desperate condition of those soules which have departed out of our own way. Alas! what monsters both of opinions and questions have risen hence; and have vexed not their own Authors only (for the Delphick Oracle said well, It is fit a man should have as he doth) but together with them, the whole Church of God? How many silly soules have splitted upon this rock, which had never needed any votive monument of their wrack, if they had but learned to hold no other difference betwixt us & Rome, than must needs be granted betwixt a Church miserably corrupted, and happily purged; betwixt a sickly, languished, and dying Church, and one that is healthfull, strong, and flourishing. Neither therefore did that Valdus of France, nor Wickliffe of England, nor Hierom of Prague, nor Luther of Germany, ever goe about to frame a new Church to themselves, which was not; but only endevored (not without happy successe) to cleanse, scoure, restore, reforme that Church which was, from that filthy soile, both of disorder and errors, wherewith it was shamefully blemished. All these rather desired to be accounted Physitians to heale, than Parents to beget a Church: And the same have we carefully done ever since, and doe seriously and ingeniously professe of our selves at this day; Rome is alike to us as it was of old to Hierome) with Eugubium, Rhegium, Alexandria; save that this City is both more famous, and more neer us: Places doe not vary either faith or title:

Hierom. Epist. ad Evagr.

tle: What Church ſoever God ſhall call daughter, we will call ſiſter; and ſo we ſafely may. How many honeſt & chaſte matrons have we known, that have been aſhamed of a lewd ſiſter, and have abhorred filthineſſe in one of their own blood? So it fareth now with us: Rome is overgone with Hereſie, with Idolatry; Let her practiſe her whoredome at home by her ſelfe; It was not for us with the ſafegard of our honeſty to dwell with ſuch a partner. Not only her wickedneſſe hath thruſt us out, but her violence: Wee yeeld therfore, and ſorrowfully complaine with the Prophet, How is the faithfull City become an Harlot! It was full of judgment, and Juſtice lodged therein; but now it is full of murderers: Thy ſilver is become droſſe, and thy wine is brewed with water. Away with the imperious name of a mother: We are all the ſame Church (by the vertue of our outward vocation) whoſoever all the world over worſhip Jeſus Chriſt the only Sonne of God, and Saviour of the world, and profeſſe the ſame common Creed: ſome of us doe this more purely, others more corruptly; in the mean time wee are all Chriſtians, but ſound Chriſtians wee are not: But how harſhly doth this ſound to a weake Reader, and more than ſeemes to need reconciliation with it ſelfe; that the Church ſhould be one, and yet cannot be reconciled? certainly yet ſo it is: The dignity of the outward forme (which comprehends this unity in it ſelfe) availes nothing to grace, nothing to ſalvation, nothing to the ſoundneſſe of doctrine: The net doth not ſtraight make all to be Fiſh, that it hath dragged together; ye ſhall finde in it vile weeds, and whatſoever elſe that devouring Element hath diſgorged.

Iren. l. c. 2. 3.

The Church is at once one in reſpect of the common principles of faith; and yet in reſpect of conſequences, and that rabble of Opinions which they have raked together, ſo oppoſed, that it cannot by any glew of concord (as Cyprian ſpeaketh) nor bond of unity, be conjoyned: That which Rome holds with us, makes it a Church; That which it obtrudes upon us, makes it hereticall; The truth of Principles makes it one, the error and impiety of additions makes it irreconciliable. Neither doth this late and ſpurious brood of traditions more oppoſe us, than it doth thoſe very Principles of Religion which the Authors themſelves deſire to eſtabliſh. Look on the face therfore of the Roman Church, ſhe is ours, and Gods; Looke on her backe, ſhe is quite contrary, Antichriſtian: More plainly, for it is no diſputing in Metaphors, as Clemens ſaid well: Rome doth both hold the foundation, and deſtroy it; ſhe holds it directly, deſtroyes it by conſequent: In that ſhe holds it, ſhe is a true Church, howſoever impured; In that ſhe deſtroyes it (what-ever ſemblance ſhe makes of piety and holineſſe) ſhe is a Church of malignants: If ſhe did altogether hold it, ſhe ſhould be ſound and Orthodox; If altogether ſhe deſtroyed it, ſhe ſhould be either no Church, or devilliſh; but now, that ſhe profeſſes to hold thoſe things directly, which by inference of her conſequences ſhe cloſely overthrowes, ſhe is a truly viſible Church, but an unſound. In what ſhe holds the principles, we embrace her; in what ſhe deſtroyes them, we pity her error, and hate her obſtinacy.

Pſal. 26. 5. ἐκκλησίαν πονηρευομένων.

The common bond of Chriſtianity never ties us to favour groſſe errors, ſo much as with ſilence; there is no ſuch ſlavery in the deare name of a Siſter, that it ſhould binde us to give either aid or countenance to lewdneſſe: Have no ſuch fellowſhip (ſaith Saint Paul) but rather reprove: So we have done, both modeſtly and earneſtly: The ſame is befalne us, which befell the bleſſed Apoſtle; we are become their enemies, for telling the truth.

Gal. 4. 16.

Behold, now we are thruſt out of doore, ſpet upon, railed at, and when opportunity ſerves, perſecuted with moſt curious torments; And (leſt any miſchife ſhould be wanting) obſtinacy is now at laſt added unto error; and a cruell rage ariſing from impatience: and now their wickedneſſe began to pleaſe them more, becauſe it diſpleaſed us. And what ſhould we now doe in ſuch a caſe, we the deſpiſed and rejected Patrons of this ſpirituall chaſtity? To let fall ſo juſt a cauſe, we might not; unleſſe we would caſt of that God, who challenges this plea for onely his. To yeeld, and give in, were no other, than to betray the truth of God, and damne our owne ſoules: No courſe remaines but this one (and here is our onely ſafety) with all our courage and ſkill, to oppoſe the wicked Paradoxes, and Idolatrous practiſes of the Romiſh Church, till either ſhe be aſhamed of her ſelfe, or repent that ever ſhe was.

Sect. II.

The Commodities and Conditions of Peace.

BEautifull is the name of Peace (as Hilary ſpeaketh) and truly ſacred; and ſuch as ſcarce ſavoureth of the Earth: Neither did the Hebrewes by any other term chooſe rather to expreſſe all happineſſe, and perfection of living: Neither is there any thing which the Angels did more gladly congratulate unto men, or which Chriſt did more carefully bequeath, or the Apoſtles more earneſtly enjoyne; How oft, and how vehemently doth the Spirit intreat and command us to have peace? But this (thou ſaieſt) is every mans wiſh, to have peace; but what if peace will not be had? Loe then, Saint James charges us to make peace, by our endeavours, by our patience. Once made, and had, what if it will not ſtay with us? Then Saint Paul bids, to follow thoſe things which concerne Peace: What if it will needs away, and hide it ſelfe? yet then Saint Peter commands to follow, and inquire after it: What if once found, it refuſe to come, as Abrahams ſervant preſuppoſed of Rebecca? Even then ſtudy to be quiet, ſaith Saint Paul; or as the word implyes, be ambitious of Peace: So let the Author of Peace love us, as we love Peace. Who is there that would not rather wiſh with Conſtantine quiet dayes, and nights free from care and vexation? It was a ſpeech worthy of an Emperor, and a Chriſtian, that fell from Jovianus about that quarelous libell of the Macedonians; I hate contention, and thoſe that are inclined to concord I love and reverence.

Our Adverſaries would make us beleeve they profeſſe and deſire no leſſe, with an equall zeale of charity and agreement. God be Judge betwixt us both; and whether-ſoever perſiſts to hate Peace, let him periſh from the face of God and his holy Angels: Yea (that this imprecation may be needleſſe) he is already periſhed: For (as Cyprian according to his wont, gravely) they cannot come to the reward of peace, which have broken the peace of God with the fury of diſcord. And ſurely what but the flames of Hell can determine the ambition of theſe fiery and boyling ſpirits? Baſil obſerves well, That Gods fire gave light, and burned not; contrarily, the fire of Hell burneth without light; and therefore is well worthy of thoſe, who deſpiſing the light of truth, delight themſelves in the flames of contentions. Thoſe are the true haters of Peace, which doe wilfully patronize errors contrary to the Chriſtian faith. So long as we muſt dwell by theſe Tents of Kedar, we ſhall too juſtly complaine with the Pſalmiſt, I love peace, but in the meane while they are bent to warre. And as for us, which profeſſe our ſelves the ingenions clients of Peace, ſince we muſt needs fight, it is not for us to doe nothing: For that bleſſed Quire of Angels, before their Peace upon Earth, well ſung, Glory to God in the higheſt Heavens; and Saint James deſcribes the wiſedome of God to be firſt pure, then peaceable: And that choſen Veſſell implies no leſſe, when to his charge of Peace, he addes, If it be poſſible. That is as impoſſible to every good man, which ought not to be done, as that which cannot be done; neither indeed (as the rule of Lawyers runnes) can we be ſaid to be able to doe that, which we cannot honeſtly doe. God (ſaith St. Paul) is not the Author of confuſion, but of Peace. It is a wicked peace, it is no peace, that neceſſarily breeds confuſion. That Peace is worthy of a defiance, which proclaimes warre with God: And I would to God, that Peace which Rome either can performe, or dare promiſe, were of any better, of any other nature.

Well then; Let it be our preſent taske, carefully to diſcuſſe Saint Pauls condition of Poſſibility; and teach how vaine it is, to hope that a true, holy, and ſafe Peace can be either had or maintained with our preſent Romaniſts; whether we regard the averſe and ſtubborne diſpoſition of the one ſide, or the nature of the matters controverted, or laſtly, the impoſſibility of thoſe meanes, whereby any reconciliation may be wrought: Theſe three ſhall be the limits, wherein this our, not unprofitable, nor yet unſeaſonable worke ſhall ſuffer it ſelfe to be bounded.

The obstinate and adverse disposition of the Romanists.

Esa. 11.6. AND as for the first, I suppose we need not labour much. Indeed, God can easily make the Wolfe to dwell with the Lambe, and the Leopard to lodge with the Kid. How easie is it for him, so to soften the adamantine hearts of men, by bathing them in the blood of that immaculate Lambe, that they should melt into pure love! But, as the times now are, it would be no lesse miraculous to finde a Popish heart truly charitable to us, than to see the Lyons fawning upon Daniel. Even where there is strife about indifferent things, there is necessarily required a conspiring of the minds of them which would be reconciled: neither is it enough, that one side is content, together with armes, to lay downe hatred; and how will our Romanists endure this? Socr. Cere. l. 1. Surely that hatred of Eteocles to his brother, or that of Vatinius, is but meere love to this of Papists. Alas! when, and where are we not spet upon, as the most desperately hereticall enemies of the Church? Rome admits Jewes into her bosome, from whose hands their Popes holinesse disdains not to receive the booke of the Law of God; but Protestants she may not endure: That which Socrates complaines, as injuriously done by Theodosius a Grecian Bishop, against the very Macedonian Heretikes, is daily done by them against us; No Arrians, nor Circumcellion heretikes, were ever more cruell: and these idle Fablers in the meane time slander us to the world, as guilty of the same outragious proceedings against them. Socr. l. 7. c. 3. What Heresie is there in all times, which that Romulean Wolfe, & her bawling Clients are not wont to cast upon us? One while we are the Schollers of Simon Magus, because we doe but once mention Grace and Salvation; for what have we else to doe with that wicked Sorcerer? Another while we are fetcht from the cursed Schoole of Eunomius, for that we attribute too much to Faith; and yet no more than that holy Heretike Saint Paul. One while we are Pepuzians, that ascribe too much to women; then we are Origenists, for holding the Image of God to be defaced in man: then contrarily Proclians, for holding the sinne of concupiscence not enough defaced. One while we are the followers of Sabellius, because I thinke we lived in the same age with Servetus; another while of Eutiches, because we lived in the time of Swinckfeldius; for what businesse have we ever had else with those branded Heretikes? We are Pelagians one while, for holding the wages of sinne to be death; then we are Donatists, for admitting none but the just into the Church of the Elect: sometimes we are Manichees, for denying Free-will; straight, we are Arrians, for refusing Traditions; then Novatians, for taking away penance; another while we are Ærians, for rejecting oblations for the dead, and fastings: then Jovinianists, for not allowing a slippery and vanishing Faith; the followers of Vigilantius, for disclaiming the adoration of reliques; of Nestorius, for disliking the asseveration of the Sacrament all bread: now we are Xenaites, for demolishing of Images; then we are Lampetians, for disallowing the servitude of idle vowes. It matters not, whether the foule mouth of that hired strumpet accuse Timotheus the Presbiter, or Athanasius the Bishop, so that somebody be smitten; It matters not what be spoken, so it be malicious: That is fully resolved of, which Nazianzen hath; No man shall hold in the reines of a riotous and lawlesse tongue: for (as Hierom saith well) it is the pastime of the wicked to slander the good: That therefore which was the solemn fashion of the Lindians, never to doe service to their Hercules without railing, the same is too ordinary with these publike Heralds of our patience: Our daily fornace (as Austin speaks wittily) is our adversaries tongue: How easily might I here unload whole carts of reproches, that have been heaped together by the scurrilous parasites of Rome? What rivers of blood, what bon-fires of worthy Saints might I here shew my Reader? All these the world knows & feeles too much: And as for those honest & good-natur'd men, which would needs undertake to be sticklers of these strifes, as Cassander, Fricius, the Interimists, and that nameless Apologist of the French, how ill have they sped on both parts? With whom it hath no otherwised fared, me thinkes, than with some sound shepherd, that thrusts himselfe betwixt two furious Rammes, running together in their full strength, and

And for us, ſince we muſt needs be put to it, we ſhall not here (as it often falls out in other quarrells) ſtrive to our loſſe. Abraham fared well by the diſſentions of Lot; all the milk and hony of whole Paleſtine hereupon befell to him; whereof he ſhould elſe have ſhared but the halfe: Doubtleſſe theſe contentions (through the goodneſſe of God) ſhall enrich us with a great increaſe both of Truth and Glory.

SECT. IV.

B That the Confeſſion of the ſame Creed is not with them ſufficient for Peace.

IT is not Caſſanders ſpeech only, but every wiſe and honeſt mans, that the Creed is the common cognizance of our faith; and we all doe with one voyce willingly profeſſe it. Surely Theodoret, when he would by a favorable report allay the bitter contentions of thoſe ancient Chriſtians of Antioch, writes thus: Both parts (ſaith he) made one and the ſame confeſſion of their faith; for both maintained the Creed of the Nicen Councell; And yet this poſition is ſpightfully handled by Cardinall Bellarmine, and can ſcarce draw breath ſince his laſt ſtripes: What care we (ſaith he) for the ſame Creed? Faith is not in words, but in the ſenſe: And indeed, I remember what Ruffinus reports done by Arrius: That worthy Conſtantine had charged him to write what faith he held; he delivered him a Creed, in words ours, in ſenſe his owne; and how right his wicked brood tooke after their father, in the enſuing times of the Church, let Hiſtories witneſſe: ſure I am, whoſoever ſhall read the Creeds of their ſeverall Sects, ſhall hardly fetch out any thing which an Orthodox Cenſurer would thinke worthy of reproofe: How oft doe they yeeld Chriſt to be God, yea, God of God; and yet perfidiouſly reſerve to themſelves, in the meane time, that abſurd conceit, That he was created ex non entibus! As therefore Severianus the Syrian in Theodoret, ſpake Greeke as a Grecian, but pronounced it like a Syrian: ſo there may be many, which may ſpeake truths, but pronounce them heretically: For all Hereſies (ſaith Irenæus) talke of one God, but marre him with their miſconceits; yea, for the moſt part, all Hereſies (ſaith Chryſologus) ſet a face of the Trinity; To little purpoſe; It was not ill ſaid of Gratian, That no man is to care for words, ſince that not the meaning ſhould ſerve the words, but the words rather the meaning; Let us grant all this, and more: Let it D be ſaid of the Creed, as Jerome ſaid of the Booke of Job, that every word abounds with ſenſes: There is no Divine Word (as Tertullian ſpeaketh wiſely) ſo diſſolute and deſuſed, that only the words may be defended, & not the true meaning of the words ſet downe. To put the Cardinall out of this needleſſe feare, The proper and native ſenſe of the Creed may be fetcht out; and I adde yet more (except but that one Article of Chriſts deſcenſion into Hell, which Ruffinus confeſſes he could not finde, either in the Roman or Eaſtern Creeds) is openly confeſſed on both parts: And yet for all this, we are never the neerer to peace: For from theſe common Principles of Faith, the ſubtle device of Hereticall pravity hath fetcht ſtrange and erroneous conſequences, which by their ſophiſticall and obſtinate handling, are now improved into Hereſies, and dare now threaten not onely oppoſition, but death unto thoſe very principles from which they are raiſed: Of this kinde are the moſt of thoſe Romiſh opinions which we undertake to cenſure in this Diſcourſe.

But, if by the univerſall conſent of all, it ſhould appeare that both word and ſenſe are intire; that both the principles, and neceſſary concluſions thence deduced, are undeniably ſound: yet (ſaith Bellarmine) there can be no peace with Lutherans. Let all the world know this, and wonder; Our King (be it ſpoken to the envy of thoſe which cannot emulate him, an incomparable Divine for a Prince, yea, a Prince of Divines, a King of men, and a wonder of Kings, mighty both with his Scepter and his Pen) going about in that learned & ponderous Diſcourſe to cleere himſelfe from the aſperſion of Hereſie, which that foul hand had unworthily caſt upon him, profeſſes ſolemnly & holily, that whatſoever is contained either in the ſacred Scriptures, or the three famous Creeds, Creeds, or the foure first generall Councels, that he imbraces with both armes, that Hee proclaimes for His Faith, that He will defend with His Tongue, with His Pen, with His Sword, in that he will both live and die.

Yea, but this is not enough, saith that Great Antagonist of Princes, For there are other points of faith wherewith Religion is now of late times inlarged; as Transubstantiation, Purgatory, the Popes primacy (a whole doozen of these goodly Articles hath the Tridentine Councell created, in this decayed age of the World, lest the Fathers of Italy should seeme to come short of the Apostles, and the Pope of Christ) any parcell whereof, whosoever shall presume to call in question, is an Heretike presently, and smels of the Faggot: and how ordinarily is that layd in every dish; That he cannot be a member of the Church, which withdrawes his obedience from their Pope, the Head of the Church. Neither is that any whit milder, which Gratian cites from Pope Nicholas the Second; Whosoever goes about to infringe the priviledge of the Roman Church, or derogates from her authority, is an Heritike.

But that is yet well worse, which the allowed Table of the Decree hath peremptorily broched, Whosoever obeyes not the Popes commandement, incurres the sin of Idolatry; or (as Gregory the Seventh, from whom Gratian would seem to borrow this, which yet is not to be found in his Epistles) of Paganisme. Whatsoever therefore Christ Jesus, whatsoever the Apostles, whatsoever the Counsels, and Fathers of the Primitive Church have commended to us to be beleeved, shall availe us little, neither can ever make us friends, unlesse we will be content to beslave our faith unto their Popeling: And can they thinke we will looke at Peace upon such a condition? That hope were bold and foolish, that could expect this. Neither doe they more scornfully cast us out of the bosome of their Church, for spetting at these Articles of Straw, which their vanity hath devised, than we can confidently condemne and execrate their presumption, which have so imperiously obtruded such trash as this upon the Church of God.

Sect. V.

The impuration or corruption of the Roman Church; and their impossibility of Reconciliation, arising from that wilfull fable of the Popes infallibility.

BUT, to leave this first head of our Adversaries indisposition to Peace: Say that the Papists could be content to hearken to an agreement (which I can never hope to see whiles Rome is it selfe) say they should seeke it, yet (as things now stand) whiles they will not, and we may not stirre one inch from our station of judgement, God forbids, the Truth debarrs our Reconciliation: we dare not (whatsoever some kind-hearted Mediators may perswade us) either divide Christ, or betray him with a kisse. The truth is on high: they may well ascend to us, as Leo said of old; but for us to descend to them, is neither safe nor honest: First of all, how too plain is it, that the Roman Church is palpably declined from that ancient purity of Religion, which she once professed? It is not more certaine and sensible, that the City of Rome is descended from her seven Hils to the Martian Plaines, that lye below them; or, that the spightfull Heathens of old (as Eusebius reports) turned the sacred Monument of the Tombe of Christ into the Temple of their Venus: what a cloud of witnesses have we of this noted decay of that Church? yea, witnesses of their owne. To begin with that other Sex: Hildegardis a Nunne, and a famous Propheteese of her time, accuses the Apostolicall Order of the utter extinguishing of Religion amongst them. Matilda or Maud, who lived in the same Age, censures them with common Apostacy from the Christian faith; and both of them, by some extraordinary Revelation, cleerly and directly propheseid of this Religious and Holy restauration of the Church, which our dayes see accomplished.

*Epist. ad Euph. Pell. cit. l. 3. de Laicis. Euseb. Hist. l. 3. c. 25. Ad. 1170. Ex loc. com Henr. Taken Illyric. Proph. rythmic. Vita S. Brig. Præfixa Revel. Anno 1370. Revel. l. 1. c. 41. cruciare, imo crucifigere electorum animas, &c. Revel. extr. c. 8. Grosse teste in Manusc.

Saint Brigit, the Foundresse of the Order of Saint Saviour, which was * canonized by Pope Urban, stickes not to teach openly in her writings, that the Pope doth torment, yea, crucifie the soules of the Elect; and boldly foretels, that all his followers & abettors, and whole Clergie shall be cut off, and that his Sea shall sinke down into the bottom of hell; and this she doth so tartly & vehemently, that the Romanists of those times

A times threatned, and indeavored to burne her alive: Robert (our Bishop of Lincolne, to whom the greatnesse of his Head gave an homely, but famous name, whom Illyricus mis-nameth Rupertus) a worthy & peerles man in his Age, durst before the Popes owne face, openly accuse the Pastors of his time to be the spoylers of the Earth, the Dispersers and Devourers of Gods flocke, the utter wasters of the Holy Vineyard of God. That Carthusian of Coleyne, which is said to have gathered that Booke of the Bundle of Times, complaines that truth was then perished from the sonnes of men. Petrus de Aliaco, a Cardinall, confesses that the ancient Divines built up the Church, but the then present Seducers destroyed it; And unto these agree John de Rupiscissa, a Monke; Picus Earle of Mirandula, Trithemius the Abbot, Laurence Valla, and those worthy Lights of the Councell of Basil, the Cardinall of Arles, & Thomas de Corsellis: B But Nicholas Clemangis the Arch-deacon of Bayeux, speakes nothing but stones and bullets; who in a whole Volumne hath freely painted out the corrupt estate of the Church: neither did Dominicus Bishop of Brixia speake any whit more sparingly, who even in those times durst set before his book this Title, The reformation of Rome: To say nothing of Joachim, of Peter of Ferrara the Lawyer, of the three Theodoricks, of Lyra, Petrarch, Gerson, Everard the Bishop of Salisburg, Erasmus, Cassander, Espencaus, the Jury of Cardinals selected by Paul the Third, (amongst which, Gasper Coteranus, James Sadolet, and our Cardinall Poole were (as they might) of eminent note) Alvarus Pelagius, * Savanarola of Florence, and whomsoever those times yeelded at once both learned & good. Even Pope Adrian himself, the Sixt of that name, whiles he instructs his Legate in his message, censures the Church, and ingeniously complaines, that all was gone to wrack and ruine: What shall we then say to this? Can C any man be so partiall, as to thinke that so many Saints of both Sexes, Prophets, Prophetesses, Monkes, Doctors, Cardinals, Popes, should (as Jerome speakes of the Luciferian Heretikes) meerely devise these slanders to the disgrace of their holy mother? If any man be so mad, he is well worthy to be ever deceived.

Indeed, Rome was once an holy City: but now (as no lesse famous the other way) she is become a City of blood; This Grape is growne a dry Raisin; Neither did that good Heremite, Antony, so justly say of his Alexandria, as we may now of Rome: Woe to thee, thou Strumpetly City, into which the Devils out of all the rest of the World have assemblev themselves.

Certainly therefore, so shamefull and generall a deformity could not but be discerned by our latter Papists; and (to avoid all shifts) we have gently and lovingD ly laid our finger upon these spors: But, in the meane time, how haynously have they taken it? and (as Russinus speakes of Apollinarius the Heretike) whiles they are transported with the vicious humour of contention, and will be crossing every thing that is spoken, out of the vaine ostentation of a strong wit, they have improved their idle brabbles to Heresies. Hierome said wittily, They use to winke and deny, which beleeve not that to be done, which they would not have done.

It is therefore a most lamentable and fearefull case, that a Church which of her owne favourites is justly accused of many and dangerous errors, should blocke up E against her selfe, the way whereby she should returne into the truth; and (as Francis à Victoria honestly complaines) should neither indure her owne evils, nor their remedies. For whiles she stands upon it, that she cannot erre, and stubbornly challenges unto her Chaire a certaine Impeccancy of Judgement (that we may borrow a word from Tertullian) what hope can now remain of recovering the Truth? How are we now too sawcy, that dare mutter ought against her? The first hope of health must needs be fetcht from the sense and acknowledgment of the disease: That of the Epicure is common and true: The beginning of recovery is the knowledge of the fault: Thou must finde thy selfe amisse, saith Seneca, ere thou canst amend thy selfe. Rome brags that she cannot be sicke; What doe we now talke of medicines for her? These Doctrinall Principles (as our Stapleton cals them) are they, from which a certain fatall necessity of erring must needs follow.

For to what purpose is all this we doe? If upon the sentence of this Romish Oracle, (for

(for in the closet, or prison rather, of his breſt (as Jerome objected to John of Jeruſalem) the Church is included:) all things doe ſo depend, that whatſoever he ſhall determine, muſt be received without all contradiction, and his decree can by no inferiour meanes be repealed, in vaine doe we wrangle for truth; in vaine have all thoſe former Synods both met and defined; in vaine doe we either teach, or learn ought of any other Maſter: Is it poſſible, ſhe ſhould ever be drawn to remorſe for her error, which eagerly defends that ſhe cannot erre? Either therefore let our Papiſts ſuffer this vain opinion of Infallibility to be pull'd up by the very rootes out of their breſts, or elſe there can be no hope, ſo much as of a conſultation of Peace; And doe we think that our Maſters beyond the Alpes will ever abide themſelves ſtripped of this darling, which they have made ſo dainty of all this while? Why doe we not aſwell demand St. Peters Throne, and his Revenues; and together with his Patrimony, all the body of Religion? For, what one title is there of the now-Roman faith, that hangs not on this ſtring? Let them give us this, and Rome falls alone, and lies ſhamefully in the duſt; Let them deny it us, and ſhe ſhall be ſtill that great Harlot, ſtill an enemy to Peace, ſtill hatefull to Heaven: But ſo farre are their modern Doctors from an ingenious rejection of Infallibility, that no Age ever knew ſo well how to flatter a Pope: For, not only have ſome yeelded this unto him, without a Councell, as Alber, Pighius, Gretſer, Bellarmine, and all Jeſuites whereſoever; but ſome others, (as Gregory of Valentia) have faſtned this upon him, without any care or ſtudy required on his part. Oh happy Chaire of Peter, firme, eternall, full of prodigious vertue! which if we might imagine a woodden one, I ſhould ſure thinke were made of Iriſh Oake; there is no Spider of error can touch it, but preſently dyes: Behold, the Tables written with Gods owne Hand, were ſoone broken and gone; but the barres of thy Frame can feele no Age, cannot incurre the danger of any miſcarriage.

Sure I thinke Vilius Rufus is alive againe; which, becauſe he ſate in the ſame ſeat wherein Julius Cæſar had ſate, and married Ciceroes wife, had wont to vaunt of both, as if he ſhould ſure be Cæſar, for his ſeate; or for his wife, Cicero. Belike all the vertue of it is from Peter: it is well that his other Succeſſors conferred nothing towards it; leſt perhaps Alexander the 6. ſhould have turn'd the ſucceeding Popes into Letchors, Clement into ſacrilegious Church-robbers, Julius into Swaggerers, Benedict, Gregory, Silveſter, into Symoniſts, Paſcalis into Perjurers, Pope Joane of Mentz into women, Martin and that other Silveſter into Magicians, the two Johns into Devils incarnate.

Now on the other part, can any man be ſo fooliſh to hope that our Church will ever be ſo mad, as thus baſely to bolſter up the great Bridg-maker of Tybur? as though we could be ignorant how Chriſt never either performed or promiſed them any ſuch priviledge? For, where is it written (as Luther jeſted well) unleſſe perhaps at Rome, in Saint Peters upon ſome Chimny with a coale? Chriſt ſaid indeed, Thou art Peter: but, Thou art Paul the Fift he never ſaid: He ſaid, I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not; ſo he ſaid too, Goe behind me Satan, thou ſavoureſt not the things of God. Now let this Oracle of the Chair teach us, how he can at once make himſelf full heire of the promiſe, & yet ſhift off the cenſure at pleaſure: Yet (to tread in the ſteps of the Times) as though we could not know that the following ages knew not of this; not Policrates and Irenæus, which reſiſted Victor the Pope; not Cyprian, which oppoſed Stephen; not the Fathers of Calcedon, which would not yeeld to Leo; nor the Eaſterne Biſhops, which would not yeeld to Julius; nor the fathers of Conſtantinople, which refuſed to yeeld to Vigilius & Honorius: yea, of the latter daies, thoſe which have had either ſenſe or ſhame, as John Gerſon Chancellor of Paris, Turrecremata, Almaine, Alphonſus de Caſtro, Pope Adrian the 6. Archbiſhop Catharinus, Cardinall Cajetane, Franciſcus à Victoria; and who not, of the beſt rank of their Doctors have not feared openly to deny & diſclaim this fancy; and Alphonſus ſhal give a reaſon thereof for all: There are many unlearned Popes (ſaith he) that know not ſo much as the rules of Grammar, how then ſhould they be able to interpret the holy Scriptures? As though we knew not which of their Popes favored Arrius, which Montanus, which Neſtorius, which Atacius, which the Monothelites, which the Sadduces, and which were in league with Devils; which of them have defined contrary to their fellowes, and which contrary to God;

Beſides, there are other Popiſh opinions of the ſame ſtamp, but more pragmaticall, which are not more pernicious to the Church, than to common-weales: as thoſe of the power of both Swords, of the depoſition of Princes, diſpoſing of Kingdomes, abſolving of Subjects, fruſtration of Oathes (ſufficiently canvaſed of late, both by the Venetian Divines, and French, and ours) which are ſo palpably oppoſite to the liberty of Chriſtian Government, that thoſe Princes and People which can ſtoope to ſuch a yoke, are well worthy of their ſervitude: and can they hope that the great Commanders of the World will come to this bent? (we all, as the Comick Poet ſaid truly, had rather be free, than ſerve; but much more Princes) or, on the contrary, can we hope, that the Tyrants of the Church will be content to leave this hold? What a foppery were this? For, both thoſe Princes are growne more wiſe, and theſe Tyrants more arrogant; and (as Ruffinus ſpeakes of George the Arrian Gallant) they inſolently govern an uſurped Biſhoprick, as if they thought they had the managing of a proud Empire, and not of a Religious Prieſthood.

That the other opinions of the Romiſh Church will not admit Reconciliation.

BUT let us be ſo liberall, as to grant this to our ſelves, which certainly they wil never grant us; for, this old Grandame of Cities thinkes her ſelfe borne to command; and will either fall, or rule: Neither doth that Mitred Moderator of the World affect any other Emblem, than that which Julian jeſtingly aſcribes to Julius Cæſar, (τὸ κρατεῖν) To rule all; or to Alexander the Great (παγκρατεῖν) to conquer all; it was a degenerating ſpirit of Adrian the Sixt, which cauſed to be written upon his Tombe, in the Church of S. Peter; That nothing in all his life fell out ſo unhappily to him, as that he governed: Let this, I ſay, be granted us; There want not (I know) ſome milder ſpirits (Theodoſians, that can play with both hands) which thinke, if theſe buſie points were by the moderation of both parts quietly compoſed, it might be ſafe for any man (ſo it be without noyſe) to thinke what he liſt concerning the other differences of Religion: Theſe are the Ghoſts of that Heretike Apelles, whoſe ſpeech it was, That it is ſufficient to beleeve in Chriſt crucified, and that there ſhould be no diſcuſſing of the particular warrants and reaſon of our faith: Or the brood of Leonas, one of the Courtiers of Conſtantius, and his Deputy in the Seleucian Councell, which when the Fathers hotly contended, as there was good cauſe, for the Conſubſtantiality of the Sonne; Get you home, ſaid he, and trouble not the Church ſtill with theſe trifles. Saint Baſil was of another minde, from theſe men; who (as Theodoret reports) when the Lieutenant of Valens the Emperor perſwaded him to remit but one letter for peace ſake, anſwered, Thoſe that are nurſed with the ſincere milk of Gods Word, may not abide one ſyllable of his ſacred truth to be corrupted; but rather than they will endure it, are ready to receive any kinde of torment, or death. Eleuſius & Silvanus which were Orthodox Biſhops, and thoſe other worthy Guardians, and (as Athanaſius his title was) Champions of the truth, were of another minde from theſe coole and indifferent Mediators. So farre as the ſacred truth will allow us, we will accompany them gladly: but if they urge us further, we ſtand ſtill, or ſtart back; and thoſe two courſes which Epiphanius adviſed, as the remedies of Hereſie (Heed and Avoydance) both

Let us therefore a little discusse the severall differences, and (as it uses to be done, when the house is too little for the stuffe) let us pile up all close together. It shall be enough in this large Harvest of matter, to gather some few Eares out of every Shock, and to make a compendious dispatch of so long a task: The grossest of the Popish Heresies, and (as Hierome objects to Origen) the most venemous opinions of Rome, which have bred so much trouble and danger at this day, to the Church of God, are either such as doe concerne our selves, not without some respect to God; or such as concerne God, not without some respect to us: Of the former sort are those which in acertaine order (such as it is) of discourse, are conversant about Justification, Free-will, the merit of our workes, humane satisfaction, Indulgences, Purgatory, and the differences of mortall and Veniall sinnes: These therefore first offer themselves to our examination.

The Romish Heresie concerning Justification.

Calvin. de vera Pacific. contrà Interim.

THat point of Justification (of all other) is exceeding important; insomuch as Calvin was faine to perswade, that if this one head might be yeelded safe and intire, it would not quit the cost to make any great quarrell for the rest. Would to GOD that word of Cassander might be made good, which doubted not to say, That which is affirmed, that men cannot be justified before God by their own strength, merits, or workes, but that they are freely justified by faith, was alwaies allowed and received in the Church of God, and is at this day approved by all Ecclesiasticall Writers: Yea, I would they would be ruled by their Thomas Aquinas in this, who attributes Justification to workes, not as justification is taken for an infusion of grace, but as it is taken for an exercise, or manifestation, or consummation of justice: If this were all, in this point all would be peace: But whilst the Tridentine Fathers take upon them to forge the formall cause of our Justification, to be our owne inherent Justice, & thrust Faith out of office; what good man can choose but presently addresse himself to an opposition? Who would not rather dye than suffer the ancient Faith of the Church to be depraved with these idle Dreames? Go now ye great Trent Divines, and bragge of your selves (as Ætius did of old by Theodorets report) that God hath now at last revealed to you those things which he would have hitherto concealed from all the world: In the meane time we cannot but scorne to see the soules of men so shamefully deluded; whiles we heare the Spirit of God so oft redoubling, Without workes, Not by workes, but by faith: By their workes no flesh shall be justified; Being justified freely by his grace: By the power whereof, Arrius Montanus, an ingenuous Author (and as Hierome said of Apollinarius, a man of approved labour, though in many things (as the times then were) faulty in opinion) being utterly convinced: It followes (saith he) that Faith is reputed for righteousnesse to him that workes not in the Law; and that according to the purpose of the grace of God.

If we cast our eyes backe to the ancient Fathers, they are all ours: Not according to the worth of our workes, saith Basil: Onely to beleeve (πίστις δικαιοῖ μόνον) saith Nazianzen: Faith alone is sufficient, saith Hierome: By beleeving are men justified, saith Augustine; and with these consort the rest, Epiphanius, Chrisostome, Athanasius, Primasius, and that whole sacred Quire of Antiquity: But to what purpose doe I instance in these, when as the Expurgatory Index of Spaine hath purposely wipt both out of the Table and Text of Chrisostome, Hierome Cyrill, most cleare Testimonies for the sole justification by Faith? The Booke is every where abroad, it is needlesse to recite the severalls: See now the Inquisitors guilty to themselves, both of error and fraud;

In Psal. 1. 14. Vid. Whitak. contra Dur. Ἐπιτομὴ ἐυπρ. Lib. 1. adversus Pelag. & in 3. ad Galat.

A fraud; To whom I must sing the same note, that Ambrose did of old, to the Arrians: Yee may blot out the Letters, but the Faith you can never abolish: Those blurres bewray you more: Those blots condemn you more than the writing.

But some perhaps may think this a meere strife of words, and not hard to bee reconciled: For, that which to the Papists is inherent Justice, is no other to the Protestants than sanctification; both sides hold this equally necessary, both call for it equally: True; but doe both require it in the same manner? doe both to the same end? I think not; yea, what can be more contrary than these opinions to each other? The papists make this inherent righteousnes the cause of our justification; the Protestants, the effect thereof: The Protestants require it as the companion or Page, the Papists as the Usher, yea, rather as the Parent of justification. But what matters it (say they) so
B both ascribe this whole worke to God? As though it comes not all to one, to pay a sum for me, and to give it me to pay for my selfe. I know not how these things seeme so little dissonant to these mens eares, which the Spirit of God hath made utterly incompatible: To him that worketh, the wages is not imputed of grace, but of debt; If by grace, now not of works, or else grace should be no more grace; for neither is it grace any way, if it be not free every way, saith Augustine: But these men say, Therefore of grace, because of works. Not of works, lest any man should boast (saith the Spirit:) But of works, and yet a man shall boast in the Lord, saith Bellarmine. And wherefore shall he boast? because he is just, because void of sinne; perhaps some Isodore may say thus of himselfe, which voluntarily protested that for forty yeeres space he found not in himselfe any sinne, not so much as in his thought, not so much
C as any consent to anger or inordinate desire: Or perhaps some Baronius or Bellarmine may report this of their late Saint, Gonzaga; or the offall of the Schooles may say so of Bonaventure; in whom, (if we beleeve them) Adam sinned not, or Manicheus may say it of his elect Masters; or perhaps Priscilian, Evagrius, Jovinian, the Messalians, may brag thus of themselves: But far otherwise is that speech of Ambrose, I will not boast because I am just, but because I am redeemed: I will boast, not because I am voyd of sinne, but because my sinnes are forgiven me: Otherwise, wee shall come to that point which Innocentius condemned in the Pelagians, What need have we now of God? But thou sayest GOD hath given me this whereby I am just: Indeed this seemes at the first a great and glorious praise of the grace of God: and at the first hearing sounds well to an ignorant eare; and yet (when it is better considered) under a pretence of piety, spoyles Christ of his glory: Why dost thou not as well say, He hath
D given me wherewith I may redeeme my selfe? for by the same wherewith we are justyfied, we are redeemed (Being justified by his blood) Behold the blood of him that is God and man, justifies us, and the same redeems us: But goe on a little: God hath given thee this: But hath he given it thee without thy selfe? Is this done without the intervention, without the operation of our Free-will? Let the Monks of Burdeaux speake, in their abjurations: let Andradius, let Bellarmine (the flowre of the Popish Schoole) let any Papist deny this if he dare: It is only Christs therefore which is imputed: that which is inherent is ours; for all (saith Austen) which are justified by Christ, are just not in themselves, but in him: That which is Christs, because it is his, is most perfect: that which is ours, because ours, is weake and imperfect. God hath made us men, not GODS: Our perfection is seasonable in Heaven: Justly doth Hierom deride Ctesiphon; wee the Papists: O blessed, O happy men, if that Justice which
E is not thought to be any where but in Heaven, may be found with you only upon earth: In the meane time, it is sufficient for us to mourne for our wants, to hate injustice: It is the very speech of Donatists, I have nothing for thee to pardon. Let Bernard now (to conclude) shut up this Stage: Not to sinne (saith hee) is God's justice; but the justice of man is the Pardon of God. To be imputed therfore, and to bee inherent, differ no lesse than God and man, Trent and Heaven: Wherfore let our Romanists confesse that, which both Scriptures and Fathers, and all their modester Doctors have both thought and reported to be the common voice of the former Church in all times; and wee are agreed: Otherwise, what fellowship hath God with Belial, light with darknesse?

SECT. VIII.

Concerning Free-will.

BOrdering upon this is the point of Free-will. To let passe all lighter quarrels of the nature of our Will; let us enquire of the power of it; and that not in naturall, humane, or morall things, (Here is all peace and silence, save that the words jangle with themselves: and when the matter is agreed upon, who would not contemn words, as Augustine saith well?) but in spirituall & divine matters, we doe will indeed; we will freely, neither can we otherwise will any thing: who denies it? Here is no Physicall determination, no violence; but to will that which is good, or to will well, we cannot. We doe freely beleeve, (for faith is an act of the will) yea, and we doe co-operate with grace; neither are we herein like to senseless stones, as Austen truly speakes: But whence is all this? Is it of our selves, or of God? Is it of grace, or (which the Councell of Arausica condemned) by the power of nature? This must be our question. Both sides like well that speech of Saint Augustine: To will freely, is the work of nature; to will well, of grace; to will ill, of corruption: but when we come to the point, the Doctors of Trent are not more subtile, than the Jesuites inconstant: It is yet good and safe which Bellarmine cites from his Ruardus; A good worke, as it is a work, is from Free-will; as it is good, from grace; as both a work and good, both from Free-will and grace: But that is exceeding ingenuous, and truly Evangelicall, which the same Bellarmine affirmes against some Semipelagian Catholikes. In those things which pertain to piety & salvation, that mans will can doe nothing without the help of Gods grace: It is the voice of Jacob; if the Cardinall would hold him there, curst be he that should oppose him. I goe on to hope and read, and see what stuffe I meet with soone after in the same Booke: That our conversion is in the power of Free-will, because it may be alwaies converted when it will: and yet further; That before all grace, we have Free-will even in the workes of piety and supernaturall things. Before all grace? what, before the grace of prevention? It were well the Cardinall would set forth some better recognitions. Now, then God doth not prevent us, (as Austen said of old) that we might will, but we prevent God, because we will: But lest this should seeme too grosse, this liberty is tyed up; and is altogether in the same state as the faculty of seeing, when a sensible species is absent; we can freely see, while the object is absent: we can freely will in the absense of grace. Let Bellarmine now tell me: are we any whit more free to evill, than he faines us to good? Did ever Pelagius dote thus much? We can will evill; but yet, unlesse it is determined (under some false semblance) by the verdict of our practicall judgement, we will it not: But if we should yeeld him thus much; what helpe is this that God gives us? To prevent, inspire, excite, and helpe, is of God; to incline the will, is of our selves: How are we not now more beholding to our selves than to God? What is this but that Pelagian conceit, so oft condemned by Augustine, So to separate Free-will from grace, as if without it we could doe or think any thing answerable to the will of God? That we are able by the power of our will to avoid sins; that we can overcome the sleighter motions of temptation, as Bellarmine speaks; that we can keepe Gods commandements, as Scotus and Durandus; that we can reject or receive the inspiration of the Spirit, as the Tridentine Fathers; that we can dispose our selves to the receiving of grace, as Thomas and Suarez; that we doe naturally co-operate with grace, and make our conversion effectuall, as Tapperus; what is it else, but to steale glory from God, that we may pranke up this carion-nature of ours? Yet it was modestly done of Tyberius, who of those many buildings which he repayred and perfected, challenged not one to himselfe, but gave them still the names of those men by whom they were begun to be built: But these men challenge the whole house when as they have not laid so much as one Tyle upon the roofe. Farre be this shamefull sacriledge from us, when that truly jealous God challenges to himselfe, to worke in us both the will and the deed; yea, that we can will to beleeve, is his worke, as Austen rightly speakes: See then, he doth not excite, but worke in us; (ἐνεργεῖ) He works in us, both that which is first, to will; and that which is last, to worke. Hierome sayes worthily worthily, To will and to run is mine: but without Gods continuall helpe it will not be mine: Without me you can doe nothing, ſaith Chriſt; no, not thinke any thing, ſaith Paul: Alas, what can we doe, who are not lame, but dead in ſinnes? By the influence of Gods Spirit therfore, a new life muſt be created in us, that was not; and not the former life excited, which was according to that of the Pſalmiſt, Create in me a cleane heart, and not ſtirre up that clean one I have: neither indeed is there as yet any place for this: The firſt heart muſt be taken out, another muſt be put in. I will take away their ſtony heart, and give them a heart of fleſh, ſaith God by the mouth of Ezekiell: Hee will give it, but (thou ſaiſt perhaps) into their breſts which have prediſpoſed and prepared themſelves for the gift: yea contrarily, to thoſe that doe not a litle reſiſt him: The wiſedome of the fleſh is enmity. But there are ſome enmities more ſecret; and which doe not outwardly bewray themſelves: but behold, here is publike reſiſtance, (ἐκ ὑποτάσσεται) It is not ſubject: But perhaps it will once yeeld of it ſelfe (οὐδ' ὑποτάσσεται) It cannot, ſaith the Spirit of God. See in how rebellious an eſtate we are to God: What proneneſſe is here to will good, what ability to performe it? Let the Papiſts (if they will) ſacrifice to themſelves, as Sejanus had wont of old; or to their nets, as the Prophet ſpeaketh: As for us, come what can come upon our oppoſition, we neither can nor dare arrogate unto our ſelves thoſe things, which by an holy reſervation and incommunicableneſſe are proper onely to the Higheſt. It is ſafe indeed for the Papiſts when they will to come up to us, but we cannot goe downe to them without a feareſull precipitation of our ſoules: Let Caſſander witneſſe this for us: Let Bonaventure himſelfe witneſſe it for him; This is the property of holy minds, to attribute nothing to themſelves, but all to the grace of God: So that how much ſoever a man aſcribe to the grace of God, he ſwarveth not from true piety; though by giving much to grace, he withdraw ſomething from the power of nature, or Free-will: but when any thing is withdrawne from the grace of God, and ought attributed to nature, which is due to grace, there may be great danger to the ſoule: Thus farre thoſe two ingenuous Papiſts. But (to inferre) we give all to grace, the Papiſts ſomething to nature; and what they give to nature, we give to God: Therefore we doe and ſay that which is fit for holy minds; they (if Bonaventure may be witneſſe) that which ſwerves from piety, and is joyned with much danger of their ſoule.

Concerning Merits.

THE foundation of Popiſh Juſtification is the freedome of our will; and upon the walls of Juſtification is merit raiſed; we will have no quarrell about the word. The holy Fathers of old (as we all grant) tooke the word in a good ſenſe, which the latter Divines have miſerably corrupted: About the thing it ſelf, we muſt ſtrive eternally; we promiſe a reward to good workes, yea an everlaſting one: It is a true word of the Jewes, He that labours on the Even, ſhall eat on the Sabbath: for God hath promiſed it, and will performe; who yet crowneth us in mercy and compaſſion, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeakes, not (as the Papiſts) in the rigor of juſtice, not (as Andradius) according to the due deſert of our worke: By the free gift of God, and not our merits, as Cajetan wiſely and worthily: Or (if any man like that word better) God doth it in juſtice, but in reſpect of his owne promiſe; not the very dignity of our workes. That a juſt mans worke in the truth of the thing it ſelfe, is of a value worthy of the reward of heaven (which induſtrious and learned Morton cites out of the Engliſh Profeſſor of Doway) and hath a meet proportion both of equality and dignity, to the recompence of eternall life, as Pererius; and that in it ſelfe without any reſpect of the merits and death of Chriſt, which Suarez and Bovus ſhamed not to write, ſeems juſtly to us little leſſe than blaſphemy.

But (ſay our moderate Papiſts) Chriſt hath merited this merit of ours; neither can any other workes challenge this to themſelves, but thoſe which are done in God, as Andradius ſpeakes, but thoſe which are dipped and dyed in the blood of Chriſt, as our latter Papiſts elegantly and emphatically ſpeake. But what is this but to coozen the World, and to caſt a miſt before the eyes of the unſkilfull? Our ſinnes are dyed in the Blood of Chriſt, not our merits: Or, if they alſo; Hath Chriſt then deſerved that our workes ſhould be perfect? How comes it about, that the workes of the beſt men are ſo lame, and defective? Hath he deſerved, that though they be imperfect, yet they might merit? What injury is this to God, what contradiction of termes? Behold now, ſo many Saviours, as good men: what I doe, is mine; what I merit, is mine; whoſoever gives me either to doe or to merit. Whoſoever rides on a lame horſe, cannot but move un-evenly, uneaſily, uncertainly: What inſolent over-weeners of their own works are theſe Papiſts, which proclaime the actions which proceed from themſelves, worthy of no leſſe than heaven? To whom we may juſtly ſay, as Conſtantine ſaid to Aceſius the Novatian, Set up ladders, O ye Papiſts, and clime up to heaven alone. Who can abide that noted ſpeech of Bellarmine, A juſt man hath by a double title, right to the ſame glory; one by the merits of Chriſt imparted to him by grace, another by his own merits; contrary to that of the Spirit of God, The wages of ſinne is death, but, The gift of God is eternall life: upon which words, another Cardinall, Cajetan, ſpeakes in a holier faſhion, thus; He doth not ſay, that the wages of our righteouſneſſe is eternall life; but, The gift of God is eternall life; that we may underſtand and learne, that we attaine eternall life, not by our owne merits, but by the free gift of God; for which cauſe alſo he addes, By Jeſus Chriſt our Lord: Behold the merit, behold the righteouſeeſſe whoſe wages is eternall life; but to us, in reſpect of Jeſus Chriſt, it is a free gift: Thus Cajetan. What could either Luther or Calvin, or any Proteſtant ſay more plainly? How imperfect doth the Scripture every where proclaime both Gods graces in us, and our workes to him? and though the graces of God were abſolutely perfect, yet they are not ours; if our workes were ſo, yet they are formerly due: And if they be due to God, what recompence of tranſcendent glory is due to us? Behold, we are both ſervants, and unprofitable: Not worthy, ſaith God; worthy, and more, ſay the Papiſts: By grace you are ſaved through faith, and not of your ſelves, ſaith God; by grace indeed, but yet of our ſelves, ſay the Papiſts. What inſolency is this? Let our Monkes now goe, and profeſſe wilfull poverty; whiles Ezekiah did never ſo boaſt of his heaps of treaſure, as theſe of their ſpirituall wealth.

Hierome ſaid truly; It was more hard to be ſtripped of our pride, than of our Gold and Jewels; for even when thoſe outward ornaments are gone, many times theſe inward rags ſwell up the ſoule. Gregory Ariminenſis their old Schoole-man, was aſhamed of this wicked arrogance, and ſo was Durandus and Pighius, and other their Divines of a more modeſt temper. I would the Jeſuites could have had the grace to have been no leſſe aſhamed; and the Tridentine Doctors, together with their executioners, the Inquiſitors: But, what other men have holily and truly ſpoken, that they have perfidiouſly wip't out: witneſſe their Index of Madrill, in theſe words: Out of the booke which intituled, The Order of Baptizing, together with the manner of viſiting the ſicke, Printed at Venice, in the yeere 1575. let theſe words be blotted out; Doeſt thou beleeve, that not by thine own merits, but by the vertue and merit of the paſſion of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, thou ſhalt come to glory? And ſoon after, Doeſt thou beleeve, that our Lord Jeſus Chriſt dyed for our ſalvation, and that no man can be ſaved by his owne merits, or any other meanes, but onely by the merit of his paſſion? Ywis, theſe are the Scorpions and Snakes of the ancient Divines (as Hierome termed the errors of Origen) amongſt which the Reader muſt needs have walked, had not the grave Senate of the Inquiſition wiſely provided for our ſafety. What hope is there now of peace? unleſſe they could be content (which Bellarmine grants to be the ſafeſt way) renouncing the merits of their workes, not ſo much for their uncertainty, as the imperfection of their Juſtice, and danger of vain-glory; both to reſolve and teach men to repoſe their confidence in the mercy and bounty of God: which we can at ouce both wiſh, and not hope for.

Concerning Satisfaction.

SAtisfaction hath neere affinity with merit; and indeed, is but as another twig arising from the same root: Than which, no opinion could be devised more injurious, and reproachfull to the merits of Christ. The word was not displeasing to the ancient Fathers; nor in their sense, to us: Onely this let me touch in passing by; That the heedlesse abuses of words, to the great wrong of the Church, hath bred confusion of things; as contrarily that of Tertullian is approved, The assured sense of words is the safety of proprieties: We have nothing to doe here with Civill Satisfaction, nothing with Ecclesiasticall: whereof Luther not unfitly said, (even in Cassanders owne judgement) Our mother the Church, out of her good affection, desiring to prevent the hand of God, chastises her children with certaine Satisfactions, lest they should fall under the scourges of God. This Canonicall Satisfaction, as many call it, hath been too long out of use, on both sides: Yea, more than this, in all our Sermons to our people, we beat importunately upon the necessity of penitence, and all the wholesome exercises thereof, as fruits worthy of repentance. Not (as Cassander well interprets it) as if we desired they should offer unto God a ransome worthy and sufficient for the cleering of the score of their sins; but that we teach them, those offices must be performed by them, which God requires of those sinners on whom he will bestow the satisfaction of his Sonne: Let them call these satisfactions, if they will, we give them leave: But, that after the most absolute passion of Christ, there should be yet behind certaine remainders of punishment to be discharged by us, either here, or in Purgatory, with a purpose thereby to satisfie the divine Justice, whether they be imposed by God, or by the Priest, or by our selves (as the Tridentine distinction runs) we neither may, nor can endure.

Tert. de præscri. Fides nominum salus proprietatum Consult. c. de satisfact.

Satisfactio penitentialis, nihil aliud est quam conatus infectum reddendi quod factum est. Alphons. Virvesius adv. Luth.

For (how nicely soever these men distinguish) it cannot be, but this sacrilegious opinion must needs accuse the truly popitiatory sacrifice of Christ, of some imperfection. I know, they say, that both satisfactions may well stand together; that, of the Mediator; and this, of man: whereof Bonaventure calls the one Perfect, the other Semi-perfect: But these are words. Let the Sophisters tell me; Doth not the full vessell containe in it selfe the halfe? or what need the one halfe apart, when we have the whole? And lastly, can any thing be added to that which is perfect? But some of their heed-fuller Divines will neither have these two opposite, nor subordinate to each other. For it is a shame to speak, what Suarez, what Durand, and other grosser Papists have discoursed of this point: Let them rather, if they will, hold (which opinion yet hath been controlled, not by the Cardinall only, but by three Popes before him) that mens satisfactions serve onely to apply unto us that which the satisfactions of Christ have promerited for us. Yet even this shift will not serve: For Christs satisfaction (as they teach) respects eternall punishment, and not temporall: How then can it once be imagined, that we by our satisfaction should procure, that his suffering which was destinated to the expiation of an eternall punishment should serve to the discharge of a temporall? And why should we doe this, rather than Christ himselfe? Besides, how absurdly doth this sound, That Hee whose bounty hath paid our pounds for us, hath yet left us, out of our poore stocke, to pay some few farthings for our selves? Let me demand then, Whether could not Christ undertake these temporall punishments for us, or would he not? That he could not, is impious; that he would not, is bold to say, and illiberall to doe: For where is there any restraint? or what are the limits of his mercy? The fault is remitted (saith the Conventicle of Trent) the punishment is not pardoned: The Eastern Churches would never have said so, which alwayes stoutly opposed her selfe to this error: And indeed, what a shamefull reproach is this to the infinite mercy of the forgiver? what a wrong to his justice? whereto is the punishment due, but to the fault? Did ever God inflict punishments that were not due? Many a time hath he forgiven to sinners those plagues which both they had deserved, and he threatned; but never did he call back for those arerages which he had forgiven: God punishes punishes us indeed (or chastens us rather) and that sometimes well and sharply, after the remission of our offence. Not that he may give himselfe satisfaction of us (for how can it be so pleasing to him, that it should be ill with us?) but that he may confirme us to himselfe, that he may amend us: He layes no stroke upon us with a revenging hand, but with a fatherly. We suffer therefore now, but we satisfie not; This is proper onely to that eternall Priest, and to his eternall Priesthood, and is no more communicable to Saints and Angels, than his own person; And certainly that which was his part, he hath performed; he hath redeemed us from the curse of the Law; and part of the Legall punishment is this temporall revenge: For us therefore to give hands to them in this, it were no better than perfidious, and shamefully traiterous. And if it be more than manifest, that this cannot be done, either by our owne torments inflicted, or good workes performed (how penall soever) how much lesse shall it be effected by others? There is none of the Saints which will not justly take up that answer of the wiser Virgins, There will not be enough for you and for us. But as Hierome said well; There is no need of any great conviction, where the opinion carries blasphemy in the face.

Sect. XI.

Concerning Purgatory.

UPon this conceit of Satisfactions, depend those other fables of Purgatory and Indulgences; pleasant ones both, and not unworthy of a Satyre: whereof so oft as I thinke, I cannot but remember the scornfull frumpe of Luther, alluding to that of the Prophet, Domine non possum vesci stercore humano: yet if they had only doubtfully & problematically commended their Purgatory to the Church, we might easily have favoured them with a connivence; although you cannot say, whether it would have been more worthy to set the spleen on work for laughter, or the bowels for commiseration: But now when Bellar. teaches us, that it pertains to the Catholike faith, and our Fisher of Rochester will have it altogether necessary to be knowne and beleeved; we cannot entertaine his presumptuous folly, without indignation. How miserably the Scriptures are wrested to this purpose, if any School-boy could not easily see, he were worthy of whipping. As Hierome said of the Heretikes of his time, They frame some unfitting testimonies to their owne sense; as if it were a worthy, and not rather an abominable kinde of teaching, to deprave sentences, and to dragge the Scriptures perforce to their own bent: Neither are the ancient Fathers better used in their citation; of which, Origen, Ambrose, Hilary, Lactantius, Nisse, Jerome, gave intimation of a quite other Purgatory, from the Romish. Augustine speaks of it, at peradventure, waveringly, uncertainly; The rest never dreamed of any at all: But yet I mistake it; Now I remember, S. Plato is cited by Austen and Eusebius, for the Patron of this opinion: and who knowes not, that S. Homer and S. Virgil are flat for it: Yet this fire never began to burne out, but in Gregories time; and since that, the authority of the Alcoran hath not a little mended it: This is it that their Rochester ingenuously confessed of old, that this Purgatory flame came but lately to the knowledge of the Church: but for us, that of S. Paul shall never be wrung from our hands, (ἐκδύσασθαι &c.) If, or when this earthly house shall be dissolved, we have a building, not made with hands, eternall, in the Heavens: And when is this Saint Pauls (id est) S. John shall interpret it: (ἀπὸ ἄρτι ὄντως ἀποθνήσκουσι) Those that dye A modo, from henceforth; and when is this A modo? To day thou shalt be with me, saith Christ; even instantly upon the egresse of the soule. Let them commend their soules to God, saith S. Peter: But what of that? that which doth utterly quench out this fabulous fire, the counterfeit Salomon, (though true to the Papists) addes, The soules of the righteous are in the hand of God, and no torment shal touch them: Behold then, either the souls without a Purgatory, or a Purgatory without pain: But what stick we at this? Let the Popish Doctors together agree among themselves, of the fire of their Purgatory, the torments of the Subject, or the duration; of the executioners, of the condition of the souls there detained; & then afterwards let them look for our assent: In the mean time, why is it not as free for

Concerning Indulgences and Pardons.

Purgatory is guilty of Indulgences, as their Rochester confesses; Both of them were bred by superstition, and nursed by covetousnes, I touch these with a light hand only; it is long since all ingenious Clients of Rome were ashamed of this holy fraud; I cannot but commend Cassander, which writes thus modestly and truly: The abatement or relaxation of Canonicall punishments, was of old called Indulgence; which at this day is drawn to all private satisfactions, and the full right of bestowing them withdrawn from all other Bishops, to the Bishop of Rome alone. About the use and practise whereof, all good men have desired a correction and moderation; as of things, which being hitherto ill handled, have given the chiefe occasion of this breach in the Church: Here therfore it were to be wished, that the Popes would yeeld somthing to the publique peace. Thus far Cassander: With whom agrees Polydore Virgil; both of them more worthy of a black cole, than their honest Rochester whom Gregory of Valence hath so fouly branded. Neither hath there wanted some of their own, (as Bellarmine witnesseth) which have called both the treasure of the Church, and Pardons into question: neither have there wanted those which have boldly and flatly denied them either to be of use, or to bee at all: And indeed who, that is not too much intoxicate with the potions of that Harlot, can endure, that whilest the imputation of Christs merits to the justifying of a sinner, applyed by God to us, is every where a common scoffing-stock to these men; yet that the merits and sufferings of holy men, out of a certain common treasure, should by a man bee imputed to men, for the deliverance of their soules from torment? Who can abide that any mortall man should over-satisfie God for his sinnes? Who can abide the prodigall grants, and shamefull Marts of their Pardons? Who can endure to heare, that to the careless mumbling over of some short prayers (for if we beleeve their Casuists, there is no great need of any intention of minde, of any speciall devotion) there should be granted by John 22. a Pardon for no lesse than a million of yeeres? Who can endure (since by their own confession, this fire must last but till the conflagration of the world) that yet in one little Book there should be tendred unto credulous poore soules, Pardon of but eleven thousand thousand of yeers? What should we make many words of this? There is now lying by me a worm-eaten manu-script, with faire Rubricks, in which, beside other absurd and blasphemous promises, there is power given to one litle prayer to change the paines of hell (due perhaps to him that sayes it) into Purgatory; and after that againe, the paines of Purgatory into the joyes of Heaven: Bellarmine had wisely respected his owne credit, if he had given his voyce according to that which he confesseth to have been the judgement of some others; That these like Bulls were not given by the Popes, but lewdly devised by some of his base Questuaries, for an advantage: But that which he should excuse, he defends. What ingenuity or shame is to be expected of Jesuites? and how cleane hath an old Parrot (as he said of old) forgotten the wand? Who may abide this unjust and inhumane acceptation of persons? that the wealthier sort may by their purses redeeme this holy treasure of the Church, and by mony deliver the soules of themselves and their friends from this horrible Prison, while the needy Soule must be still frying in that flame, without all hope of pardon, or mature relaxation, untill the very last Judgement day? Lastly, who can endure; that whiles it is in the power of Christs Vicar to call miserable soules out of this tormenting fire (which Hell it selfe is said to exceed only in the continuance) yet that he should suffer them to lye howling there, and most cruelly broiling still, and not mercifully bestow on them all the heaps of his treasure, as the spirituall ransome of so many distressed spirits? A wretched man is he (as Ambrose said of the rich man) which hath the power to deliver so many soules from death, and wants the will: Why hath God

Concerning the distinction of Veniall and Mortall sinnes.

PArdons doe both imply and presuppose that known distinction of Mortall and Veniall sinne, which neither hath God ever allowed, neither (whiles he gainsayes it) will ever the Protestants. That there are certaine degrees of evill, we both acknowledge and teach; so as we may here justly tax the dishonesty and shamelesnesse of Campion, Durens, Coccius, and the Monkes of Burdeaux, who have upbraided us with the opinion of a certaine Stoicall and Jovinianish parity of sinnes; yea, Bellarmine himselfe hath already done this kinde office for us. Some offences are more hainous than other; yet all in the malignity of their nature, deadly: As of poysons, some kill more gently and lingringly, others more violently and speedily, yet both kill. Moreover, if we have respect unto the infinite mercy of God, and to the object of this mercy, the penitent and faithfull heart, there is no sinne, which (to borrow the word of Prudentius) is not veniall; but in respect of the Anomy or disorder, there is no sinne which is not worthy of eternall death. Every sinne is a Viper; there is no Viper (if we regard the nature of the beast) but kils whom she bites; but if one of them shall haply light upon the hand of Paul, she is shaked into the fire, without harme done: Let no man feare that harmefull creature ever the lesse, because he sees the Apostle safe from that poyson. So is sinne to a faithfull man; Saint Johns word is, All sinne is (ἀνομία) Transgression of the Law; Saint Pauls word is, The wages of sinne is death; Put these two together, and this conceit of the naturall pardonablenesse of sin, vanishes alone.

1 Joh. 3. 4.
Rom. 6.

Our Rhemists (subtill men) can no more abide this proposition converted, than themselves: All sinne indeed (say they) is ἀνομία, a transgression of the Law, but every transgression of the Law is not sinne: The Apostle therefore himself turnes it for us: All unrighteousnesse (saith he) is sinne; But every (ἀδικία) is unrighteousnesse, saith Austen upon the place, for the Law is the rule of righteousnesse, therefore the prevarication of the Law is unrighteousnes: Yea, their very own word shall stop their own mouth: for how is sinne univocally distinguished into Veniall and Mortall, if the Veniall be no sinne? and the wages of every sinne is death. That therefore which the Papists presume to say, that this kind of sinne deserves pardon, in it selfe (unlesse they will take the word merit, catachrestically, with Stapleton:) And that which Bellarmine and Navarus add, that veniall sinnes are not against, but beside the Law: and lastly, That which Franciscus a victoria writes, that a Bishops blessing, or a Lords Prayer, or a knock on the brest, or a little holy-water, or any such like light receipt, without any other good motion of the heart, is sufficient to remit Veniall sinne, is so shamefully abhorring from all piety and justice, that these open bands, both of nature and sinne, must be eternally defied of us. It is an old, and as true a rule, easines of pardon gives incouragement to sinne: And beside, what manner of sinnes doe they put in the ranke of Venials? Drunkennesse, adultery, angry curses, or blasphemies; covetousnes: yea, stealing, lying, curling of parents (horrible offences) shroud themselves (with them) under this plausible title of venial; He must needs be shamelesly wicked that abhors not this licentiousnes. Surely Socrates the Historian prophesied (I think) of these men: There are some (saith he) that let goe whoredom as an indifferent matter, which yet strive for an holy day, as for their life. The ordinary and not slight controversy (as Cassander thinketh) of the name, nature, condition, punishment of the first sin, as Chrysost. calls it, I willingly omit; Neither doe I meddle with their Evangelical perfection of vows, nor the dangerous servitude of their rash and impotent Votaries, nor the inconveniencies of their Monkerie: which yet are so great and many, that the elect Cardinals of Paul the third, doubted not with joynt consent to affirme, All the Orders

SECT. XIIII.

Concerning the Canon of the Scripture.

NOW (leſt I be too tedious) it is time for me, from theſe points which doe directly concern our ſelves, to haſten unto thoſe which do more cloſely touch the Majeſty of God, and doe, as it were, ſend plaine challenges into heaven. And thoſe doe, either reſpect the Scripture, which is his expreſſed word; or Chriſt, which is his naturall and ſubſtantiall word; or laſtly, the worſhip due unto his Name.

And firſt, the Scripture complaines juſtly of three main wrongs offered to it: The firſt, of addition to the Canon; The ſecond, of detraction from the ſufficiency of it;
C The third, of hanging all the authority thereof upon the ſleeve of the Church; For of that corrupt Tranſlation of Scripture, which the Trent Divines have made onely and fully authenticall, I forbeare purpoſely to ſpeake; although it were eaſie to ſhew, (that which Reuchline, following the ſteps of Hierome, hath averred) That the Hebrewes drink of the Well-head, the Greekes of the ſtreame, and the Latines of the puddle: neither will I ſo much as touch the injurious inhibition of thoſe holy bookes to the Laiety. Who can endure a peece of new cloth to be patched unto an old garment? Or what can follow hence, but that the rent ſhould be worſe? Who can abide, that againſt the faithfull information of the Hebrewes, againſt the cleere Teſtimonies of Melito, Cyril, Athanaſius, Origen, Hilary, Hierome, Ruffinus, Nazianzen, againſt their owne Doctors, both of the middle and lateſt age, ſix whole bookes ſhould, by their
D Fatherhoods of Trent, be under pain of a curſe imperiouſly obtruded upon God and his Church? Whereof yet, ſome propoſe to their Readers no better than magical jugglings, others bloody ſelfe-murders, others lying fables, and others heatheniſh rites, not without a publike applauſe in the relation: Theſe indeed, Cajetan, ingenuouſly, as his faſhion is, (according to that he had learned of Hierome) would perſwade us to have been admitted onely by the Ancients, into the Canon of Manners, not of Faith. And ſurely there be many precepts in Syracides, the counterfeit Solomon, and Eſdras, which ſavour of excellent wiſedome; but I wonder what kinde of good manners can be learned from ſuch like hiſtories, even by thoſe Novices to whom Athanaſius bequeaths theſe bookes! Well may I ſay of theſe, as that Chian ſervant of his Maſter,
E (which ſold his wine, and drank his lees) while they have good, they ſeek for naught: But let theſe bookes (how queſtionable ſoever to Epiphanius) be all ſacred, let them be (according to the meaning of the Councell of Carthage, and of Auſten, ſo oft cited to this purpoſe) after Canonicall; yet what man or Angell dare preſume to undertake to make them divine? We know full well, how great impiety it is, to father upon the God of Heaven the weake conceptions of an humane wit; neither can we be any whit moved with the idle cracke of the Tridentine curſe, whiles we heare God thundring in our eares, If any man adde unto theſe words, God ſhall adde unto him the plagues written in this Booke.

Of the insufficiency of Scripture.

NEither know I, whether it be more wickedly audacious, to faſten on God thoſe things which he never wrote, or to weaken the authority, and deny the ſufficiency of what he hath written: The Papiſts doe both. We affirm (ſaith Bellarmine) that there is not expreſſely contained in Scriptures all neceſſary doctrine, either concerning faith or manners: And the Tridentine Fathers gave charge, that Traditions be received with no leſſe piety & veneration, than the books of Scripture.

Lib. 4. de verbo non ſcripto c. 30 ſect. 1. Pari ventratione, pari pietatis affectu.

Unwritten Truths (ſaith our witty Chancellor, More) are equivalent to the word of God: What place is there for peace? There are, we confeſſe certaine things of a middle nature, indifferent rites, wherein much muſt be yeelded to the Church, much to Traditions: but that thoſe things which are ſimply neceſſary to ſalvation (whether to be known or to be done) ſhould not be found in the holy Scriptures, either in their words, or in their ſenſe, as Aquinas diſtinguiſhes, we juſtly hold abſurd, and with Eraſmus, contrary to all true divinity. Some conſtitutions for publike order are from the Church; but all neceſſary determinations of faith, are to be fetcht from the voyce of God; This is, as Niſſen truly commends it, the right and even rule of life: The law of God is perfect, ſaith David; yea, and makes perfect, ſaith Paul: And what can be added to that which is already perfect? or what perfection can there be, where ſome neceſſary points are wanting; yea, (if we may beleeve Oſius) the greateſt part?

How much is the Spirit of God miſ-taken? He wrote theſe things that we might beleeve, and in beleeving be ſaved; But now (if Trent may be Judge) although we beleeve what he hath written, yet we cannot be ſaved, unleſſe we doe alſo receive and beleeve what he hath not written: How ill was Conſtantine taught of old? how ill adviſed, in that publike ſpeech? for which yet we doe not finde that any of thoſe Worthies of Nice did ſo much as jogge him on the elbow, in a milde reproofe, whiles he ſaid, The bookes of the Evangeliſts and Apoſtles, as alſo the Oracles of the Ancient Prophets doe plainly inſtruct us in the meſſage and meaning of God? How miſerably were every one of the learned Fathers of the Church blinded, that they could never either ſee or acknowledge any other rule of faith? And what ſhall we ſay? Did God envy unto mankinde the full revelation of his Will, in the perpetuall monuments of his written word? Or did he not thinke it expedient to lay up all neceſſary doctrines in the common ſtore-houſe of Truths (as Rocheſter calls it?) Or, is that perhaps more uncertaine which is faithfully committed to writing, than that which is carried about by the flying rumors of men, and by this ayrie conveyance derived unto Poſterity? What a thing is it (as Irenæus wiſely ſaid) that we ſhould leave the voyce of the Lord and his Apoſtles, and attend to theſe idle tatlers, that talke never a true word? Or if this be ſitting, how vainly have you ſpent your labors, O all ye Regiſters of God, Prophets, Apoſtles, Evangeliſts? And as he ſaid of the ointment, To what purpoſe was all this waſte? Theſe Paradoxes are pernicious to the Church, and ſhamefully derogatory from the glory, both of the wiſedome and goodneſſe of God: Hold theſe who dare. Surely we can never abide that thoſe two markes of Heretikes which Irenæus long ſince ſet downe, (namely, not to reſt in the bare authority of Scripture, and to vaunt of other Traditions) ſhould both of them be juſtly branded on our ſides.

Of the authority of Scripture.

BUT this is yet moſt ſhamefully injurious, to deny unto the word of God credit of it ſelfe; and ſo to hang the Scriptures upon the Church, that they muſt needs beg all their authority from the voices of men. Honeſt Eckius, in his reviſed & corrected Enchiridion; The Scripture (ſaith he) is not authenticall without the authority of the Church: to which, as ſome golden and oracular ſentence, there is added in the margin, a glorious & inſulting applauſe, An Achilles for the Catholiks. A passe the blasphemies of Hermannus and Hosius, perhaps (as Junius construes it) in the name of Swinkfeldius: I passe over the horrible impiety of that shamelesse glosse, which teaches, that Salomons Text borrowes his credit from the Popes canonization: Bellarmine alone shall speak for all; who going about to support the number of seven Sacraments by the authority of the Tridentine Councell (for this ever is their last hold) The strength (saith he) of all the ancient Councels, and of all opinions, depends upon the authority of the present Church; And a little before, If we take away the authority of the present Church, and of the present Councell (of Trent) the decrees of all other Councels, and the whole Christian faith may be called into doubt and question. O miserable, and miserably staggaring soules of the Papists! How many, not persons only, but whole kingdomes, and those (as the Romanists themselves confesse and bewail)
B mighty and flourishing, amongst themselves, doe yet still resolutely reject all the authority of that Tridentine Councell? The whole Christian faith? All doctrines and opinions? What, even those which are written by the finger of God? Those that are indited by the holy Ghost? What is this else, but to make God a slave to men; and to arraigne the Maker of Heaven and Earth at the bar of humane judgement? God will be God; the Scripture of God will be it selfe in spight of Rome, Trent, Hell: And unlesse we hold this, we can have no peace with God; unlesse we deny it, no peace with the Romanists.

SECT. XVII.

Concerning Transubstantivtion.

C THese errors concerne the Scriptures; those which follow, concerne either Christs person, or his offices: I let passe that idle brabble (as Bellarmine himself judges it) which the Popish Censors have unjustly raised about the Sons Godhead of himselfe; and insist upon waightier quarrells; I would that exploded opinion of Transubstantion, and (which is the root of it) the Multi-presence of Christs body, did not utterly overthrow the truth of his humanity. Good God! Is it possible (as Averroes jested of old) that Christians should make themselves a God of Bread? That any reasonable man can beleeve, that Christ carried his owne body in one of his hands, that he raught it forth to be eaten by those holy Ghests of his which saw him present with them, and heard him speaking to them, both whiles they were eating him, and when they had eaten the sacred morsell? That the selfe same Son of man should at once both devoure his whole selfe, and yet should sit whole and entire at the Table with
D them? That the glorious body of Christ should be carried through the unclean passages of our mawes; and either be there turned into the substance of our body; or (contrary to that the Spirit said of old, Thou shalt not suffer thine holy one to see corruption) should be subject to putrifaction, or vanish to nothing, or return into that Heaven wherein it was, ere it returned, while it returned: or lastly, should be eaten with mice (devout & holy Vermine) or perhaps mixed with poison, to the Receiver? What monsters of follies are these? How mad, yea, how impious is this obstinacy of foolish men, that they will over-turne the very principles of nature, the order of things, the Humanity of their Saviour, the truth of the Sacrament, the constant judgement of Scripture, and lastly, the very foundations of all Divinity; and confusedly jumble heaven and earth together, rather than they will (where necessity requires) admit but of a tropicall kind of speech in our Saviours consecration; whiles in the meane time, the whole reverend E Senate of the Fathers cries out, and redoubles the name of Symboles, Types, Signes, Representation, Similitude, Figures, & what-ever word may import a borrowed sense; notwithstanding all the indignation of Heaven, all the scorn of Pagans, all the Reluctation of the Church? This letter killeth, as Origen truly speakes: Now what likelyhood is there, here, of agreement? That the true body of Christ is truly offered, & truly received in the Sacrament, which of us hath not ever constantly taught & defended? But how is this? not by any bodily touch, as Cyril & Ambrose say well, but by our faith. That it should be corporally Carnally, Orally present, & torn in pieces with our teeth (as good Pope Nicholas caused Berengarius to say, & our Allen hath followed him unbidden) hath ever seemed impious to us, and (as Austen judges) no lesse than flagitious.

SECT. XVIII.

Concerning the Multi-preſence of Chriſts Body.

BUt this ſleeveleſſe tale of Tranſubſtantiation, was ſurely brought both into the world, and upon the ſtage, by that other fable of the Multi-preſence of Chriſts body: neither know I, whether I ſhould prefer for madnes, and ſophiſticall coozenage. That the ſame body of Chriſt ſhould be in a thouſād places at once of this ſublunary World, whiles yet it is in the mean time intire in Heaven; That the whol body of Chriſt ſhould lie hid in a little thin Wafer, yet ſo, that the parts and members thereof ſhould not one run into another, but continue diſtinct, and ſeverally diſpoſed among themſelves, and have a ſhape and order agreeable to a mans body (which are Bellarmines own words) it doth not only exceed reaſon, but faith: Neither do they ſay now (as of old) behold, here is Chriſt, or there; but (which is much worſe) Behold, Chriſt is both here, and there; That received Axiom of the Schools is of an eternall Truth; The numericall unity of a finite thing cannot ſtand without continuity. Who can chooſe but be aſhamed of the Jeſuits here? The very places in which Chriſts body is, (ſaith Bellarmine) are diſcontinued; yea, and the body of Chriſt it ſelfe is divided from it ſelfe, in reſpect of place, but not in reſpect of his proper ſubſtance, or quantity; As if there could be any diviſion of a materiall ſubſtance, but by bounds of place? As if quantity were not both bounded, and meaſured by place alone? As if there were not an undoubted relation of the place to the thing placed. But now, this doth not belong to Chriſt only. S. Xavier, in our age (one of Loyalaes brood) was ſeen at once, both in the Ship and in the Boat: Turſellian reports it; unto this fabulous Saint, and his fellow-fabuler, the Reporter, I cannot deviſe to ſet a better match, than that Plautine Amphitrio: Dareſt thou ſay, thou fond Slave, that which never man yet ſaw (nor indeed can be done) that one man ſhould at the ſame time, be in two places?

How far wide is Aquinas (the honor of the Schools) which ſaith, By the ſame ground or reaſon that an Angell might be in two places, he might be in as many as you will? See now either Xavier is every where, or elſe the carcaſſe of a Frier is more ſubtill than the nature of an Angell. To conclude, either Aquinas is falſe, or the Papiſts Ubiquitaries. How over bold are the Jeſuits, the Patrons of this Multi-preſence? Bellarmine, ſcorning the modeſty of Thomas, Egidius, Carthuſian, Capreolus; Becauſe (ſaith he) we think that the body of Chriſt may be in many places at once, locally, and viſibly, therfore we ſay, and hold, that the ſame body may be circumſcriptively and definitively in more places at once: For, that a body may be circumſcriptively in any place, nothing is required, but that it be fitly meaſured unto that place: So as the bounds of the place and the thing placed, be both together; but, it is not required, that it ſhould not be elſe-where, as in another place: Thus he: What an abſurd oppoſition is this? To be circumſcribed in one place, and yet to be other-where; That the bounds of the place, and the thing placed ſhould be but one, and yet be in almoſt infinite; That another remote place ſhould leſſe hinder circumſcription, than a part of the next place; What is to be mad, if this be to be wiſe? Who cannot but laugh at the wiſe folly of theſe men, as Ireneus ſaid of the Valentinians?

Sapientem ſtultitiam, Iren. l. 1 cap. 9.

But I willingly heare that of Chryſoſtome; To conceive of divine things by Philoſophy, is no other, than to take out a red-hot Iron with our fingers, and not with tongs.

And

A And that of Auguſtine, Yeeld God able to doe ſomething which thou art not able to underſtand: It is reported, that Ariſtotle miſled Ætius the Heretike, into that filthy error of Arrius; and Tertullian hath taught us, that all Hereſies are ſuborned by Philoſophy. What hath Athens to doe with Hieruſalem; the Academy with the Church? Away with Arguments where Faith is in queſtion, as Thomas ingenuouſly ſaies out of Ambroſe: But what is all this to us? It is well yet, and I doe heartily congratula te it to our men, that the idle tale of Surius, concerning Melanction and Caroloſtadius, and other Proteſtants, abandoning of all Philoſophy (wherewith yet Binius pleaſed himſelfe of late) is thus hiſſed out of countenance, and vaniſhed; Belike now, the reformed Doctors are Philoſophers, but too much: For us, we doe eaſily grant, that many things are done, which we cannot underſtand; but theſe things we grant not, be-
B cauſe we underſtand they cannot be done: God hath abſolute power (as Thomas ſpeaks truly) over the whole nature of the creature; but not ſo, as that he ſhould cauſe it to be, and not to be, at once; This (as Sadeel ſaies wittily) Deus potenter non poteſt: The object of Gods power (as the Jeſuites Schoole willingly confeſſes) is, what ſoever implies not a contradiction in it ſelfe: Now, that the ſelfe ſame body ſhould ſit down and yet not ſit down; ſhould be viſible and inviſible; diviſible and continued, and yet diſcontinued and indiviſible; To be all here, to be all elſewhere; to be here greater, there leſſe; to be one, and many; the ſame, and divers; to depart, and not to depart; to be contained in Heaven, and not to be contained; to be a quantity without ſpace; to be meaſured by, and fitted to a place, and not to take up any place; to be accidents, and yet not to be inherent; to be formerly, yet to be made; to be otherwiſe in places than in a place; to be a true body, and yet to be ſpiritually; That Boy were well worthy of whipping, that cannot diſcern and confeſſe manifeſt contradictions. But what
C doe I ſpend time in this thorny Diſcourſe? This one word ſhall ſhut and ſumme up all; That this wicked paire of opinions offers plaine violence to the true humanity of Chriſt; neither can ever, Salva fide, be reconciled with the Evangelicall Truth.

SECT. XIX.

Concerning the ſacrifice of the Maſſe.

D THE Prieſtly Office of Chriſt is not a little impeached by the daily Oblation of the Miſſall Sacrifice, and number of mediators. For the firſt; That in this Sacred Supper there is a Sacrifice (in that ſenſe wherein the Fathers ſpake) none of us ever doubted: but that is then, either Latreuticall (as Bellarmine diſtinguiſhes it not ill) or Euchariſticall: That is here (as Chryſoſtome ſpeakes) a remembrance of a Sacrifice, that is, as Auguſtine interprets it, a memoriall of Chriſts Paſſion, celebrated in the Church; and from this ſweet commemoration of our Redemption there ariſes another Sacrifice, the Sacrifice of praiſe; and from thence a true Peace-offering of the Chriſtian ſoule: Theſe three Sacrifices offer themſelves to us here; but, for any propitiatory Sacrifice, unleſſe it be (as the Gloſſe interprets it) repreſentively, I finde
E none, none Eſſentiall; none (as the Tridentines labour to perſwade) true and proper; neither indeed can there be. For, what? Doth the Prieſt offer the ſame that Chriſt hath offered, or another? If another, then not propitiatory; for onely Chriſt is our Propitiation: If the ſame, then not an unbloody Sacrifice; for Chriſts Sacrifice was a bloody one; Then, the naturall Being of Chriſt ſhould againe be deſtroyed; Then, the blood of the Mediator (which I abhorre to imagine) muſt be of a finite value and power: yea, Chriſt himſelfe did not ſacrifice on the Table, but on the Croſſe; For, if the Sacrifice which he offered in his Supper, were perfect and fully propitiatory, what needed he to die afterward? wherefore was his blood ſhed upon the Croſſe, which by his Tranſubſtantiated blood (not yet ſhed) had formerly redeemed the World? But if it be unbloody, then it is not propitiatory: for without ſhedding of blood (ſaith the Apoſtle) is no remiſſion. Or what oppoſition is there betwixt the order of Melchiſedec and Aaron, betwixt Chriſt and the Prieſts of the old Law, if this Office do equally paſſe and deſcend in a long Pedigree of mortall Succeſſors? Or why were the legall ſacrifices of the Jewiſh Synagogue ſo oft repeated, but becauſe they were not perfect?

Heb. 9. 22.

and how can, or why ſhould that which is moſt abſolutely perfect, be reiterated? A

To conclude; What can either be ſpoken or conceived more plaine, than thoſe words of God, Once Offered, One Sacrifice, One Oblation? And yet theſe Popiſh Shavelings (devout men) take upon them to crucifie, and ſacrifice Chriſt againe; and whiles they ſolemnly offer the Son of God up unto his Father, they humbly beſeech him (in a religious blaſphemy) that he would be pleaſed to bleſſe, and accept that Oblation. It is not for us, I confeſſe, to be ſo devout: We will remember this holy Sacrifice of Chriſt (as Caſſander well adviſes) and celebrate it with a thankfull heart, we will not repeate it; we will gladly receive our Saviour, offered by himſelfe to his Father, and offered to us by his Father, we will not offer him to his Father: which one point whiles we ſtick at (as we needs muſt) we are ſtraight ſtricken with the Thunderbolt of the Anathema of Trent: Here can be therefore no poſſibility of Peace. SECT. XX.

Of the Number of Mediators, and the Invocation of Saints.

IT doth not more belong to the Prieſthood of Chriſt, that he offered himſelfe once for us (a ſpotleſſe Sacrifice) upon the Altar of his Croſſe, than that he daily offers to his Father the incenſe of our Prayers, on the Altar of Heaven. As therefore many Sacrifices, ſo many Mediators plainly ſeem to put Chriſt out of office. Neither indeed hath the number of Interceſſors more increaſed in this old Age of the World, than the impiety of imploring them: For the modeſter judgement of the former Schooles ſo framed to it ſelfe a diſtinction of Mediation, that it challenged one kinde thereof as proper onely to Chriſt, thinking the other might be imparted to Saints: But our late Doctors (wilfully breaking the bars both of Logick and Divinity) have raſhly incroched upon all the Offices of a Mediator; and whatſoever might by any right belong to an Agent for peace, all that (if not more) have they attributed to the Saints. Hereupon one ſayes to the bleſſed Virgin, O Savioreſſe, ſave me: Another, Obtaine thou pardon, apply grace, prepare glory for me: Others (if we may beleeve Caſſander) famous Divines have ſaid, That God hath tranſlated one halfe of his Kingdome, which conſiſts of mercy, to the bleſſed Virgin Mary; reſerving the other halfe of Juſtice, to himſelfe: Others, that we may appeale from the Bar of Gods Juſtice, to Maries Court of Mercy: Others have ſo compared their Francis with Chriſt, that (I tremble to ſpeake it) whether of theſe was the typicall Jeſus, might ſeeme queſtionable to the Reader: Heare the holy Muſe of Turſelline; C

O Tongue worthy to be cut out of that blaſphemous mouth (as Hierome ſaid of his Vigilantius, and made into gobbets! Neither hath this impious Paraſite, or his Sedulius done more for their Stigmaticall Francis, than the holy Archbiſhop Antonius hath done for his Dominick, in an emulation of blaſphemy: There wants nothing (that I can ſee) but that everlaſting Goſpell of the Friers: and it wanted not much (if Hiſtories ſay true) of prevailing; as their Poets ſaid of old. Martial.

Oh, what mad Gownes have ſway'd the Romane State!

Others have ſacrilegiouſly turned Litanies, Creeds, Pſalters, and what ever God meant to honour himſelfe by, unto the name of the holy Virgin: And I would to God this were onely the private miſ-devotion of ſome ſuperſtious old wife, or ſome idle and ſilly Cloyſterer: Faine would our charity conceive ſo, which is ſtill credulous, and (as the Apoſtle commands) thinks not evill; if Caſſander did not directly tell us, that they publikely ſing in their very Churches this devout Antheme, E

O felix puerpera, Noſtra pians ſcelera, Jure matris impera Redemptori.

If all theſe were not openly approved by the holy Cenſors of the Romane Church

A Church (levere controulers of manners) yea, by the voices of their own Popes: If at this day (witneſſe the Muſes of Bencius and Bonarcius) the Jeſuites did not both ſpeake and write thus. But let us leave theſe bold impieties (if you will) to their Bernardines, Antonines, Bartlemewes of Piſa, Turrellines; bring us forth their more ſober Divines, Polydores, Caſſanders, Vives; Even their opinions will not down with us, which teach that the Saints are in any wiſe to be prayed unto. Indeed the Proteſtants ſay (as Bellarmine grants) that the Saints pray for us; but, onely in a generality: Bucer ſaid truly, that the Saints have great love to their militant brethren, great deſire of their ſalvation; and ſo doubtleſſe have the Angels: But, muſt wee therefore ſingle out any one of thoſe bleſſed Spirits to ayd us, to ſue for us in the Court of Heaven? God forbid: for upon what faith muſt theſe prayers of ours bee B grounded? unleſſe perhaps (as Hoſius ſaith) wee muſt beleeve in the Saints alſo? yea, how ſure are we, that none of the Saints can either ſearch the heart, the fountaine of our Prayers, or at once heare ten thouſand of their Suppliants, diſtant in place from each other; yea further, if (as there ſhould be no limits ſet to Religion) all the world over, devout Clients ſhould at once joyntly commend and proſtrate themſelves humbly to ſome one Saint; it is not a ſwiftneſſe of nature (as Hierome contends) that would ſerve the turne; a true ubiquity (as Bellarmine confeſſes) muſt bee required to the hearing of all thoſe Prayers: What hinders now, but that they which of ſinfull men have made Saints, ſhould of their Saints make Gods alſo? Beſides, which of the Prophets, which of the Apoſtles ever commanded this? which of the Saints of the former world hath ever done it? Or what other (if credit may be given to Theodoret) did Saint Paul forbid under the worſhip of Angels, to his Coloſſians? Or what was C the Hereſie of the Collyridians, if this muſt goe for piety? That rule of Epiphanius ſhall bee ever a ſafe courſe for us; Let Mary be honoured, but the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghoſt worſhipped: Here is no feare of danger, but that we may goe ſafely to that God which calls us to him; and proſtrate our ſelves to his Chriſt, our Gracious Saviour: None of the Saints can envy God this honour; none of them ever did either arrogate it to himſelfe, or ſuffer it to bee given him: Neither is there any of them, whom God ever allowed either to take it to himſelfe, or to impart it to others, or to accept it quietly being imparted to him by others: The Papiſts therefore may come to us when they will, with ſafety and advantage; we may not yeeld to them, without manifeſt danger of Idolatrous dotage.

Sect. XXI.

Of the Superſtitious, Heatheniſh, and ridiculous worſhip of the Papiſts.

BUT if any good natured Reconciler ſhall be ſo indifferent, as to thinke theſe weighty points of difference not to be ſo hainous, but that every one might ſecretly maintaine what opinion he liſt; yet ſo, that (as Conſtantine ſaid to Alexander and Arrius) whiles the mindes differ, the outward peace may be preſerved; Let him further underſtand, that the continuall practice of the religious worſhip and ſervice of God, will ever both raiſe and proclaime no leſſe hoſtility than matter of judgement. In our devotions, and publike exerciſes of Piety, and places conſecrated to this uſe, there is nothing that can offend either the eye or the minde of a Papiſt, except the bareneſſe of our walls, and the Apoſtolicall ſimplicity of Ceremonies; An E eaſie fault; and ſuch, as it is no praiſe of their ingenuity to winke at: For, long ſince have thoſe clauſes of our publike Liturgy been purpoſely blotted out, which in our Grandfathers dayes did but lightly touch this galled ſore of Popery.

Socrat. l. 1. c. 4.

But contrariwiſe, in the Popiſh Churches there is ſcarce any thing either ſaid or done, whereof wee can with a cleere and unwounded conſcience, be either partakers or witneſſes: Their very walls kill us dead; but their ridiculous or demonicall ſervice who can endure? Wee honour (as wee ought) the deare and happy memory of the Saints; and chiefly, the Leader of that heavenly Quire, the bleſſed Virgin, the Mother of GOD; and whatſoever ſhe can thinke not too diſhonorable to her ſelfe, and her Lord and Saviour, we will moſt gladly give it her to the full: Neither will we only glorifie GOD in his Saints (as Auguſtine hath taught Durand to ſpeake) but wee will magnifie the Saints (as opportunity ſerves) for their excellent graces, and worthy acts, both in GOD and in themſelves; we will admire, extoll, and (what wee may) imitate their ſingular conſtancy, faith, ſanctity; as Sidonius ſaid of his Claudian, Sidon. in Epit. Cl. and. Mamert.

No Tombe can either Soule or Glory ſhroud.

But, to digge up their holy bones (that I may borrow Luthers word) out of their quiet graves, and to fall downe before theſe worme-eaten Monuments of the Saints; to expect from them a divine power, whether of cure, or of ſanctification; equally to reſpect Francis his Coule, Annaes Combe, Joſephs Breeches, Thomaſes Shooe (as Eraſmus complaines) with the Sonne of God himſelfe, can ſeeme no better to us than an horrible impiety: Neither can we abide, either to deifie men, or to canonize beaſts; It ſeemes, that Cardinall could abide it well, in whoſe Garden is yet to be ſeen this Epitaph, which he wrote upon his too-dearely-beloved bitch:

Poem. Illuſtr. Poet. Italorum.

This Tombe for thee (deare Bitch) I builded have,
That worthier wert of Heaven, than a Grave.

Wee (prophane Huguenots) cannot ſkill of worſhipping Martins Boots, or Georges Scabbard, or Criſpins Paring-knife; or (which they ſay is kept in a certain Town of Liguria) the tayle of that Aſſe which Chriſt rode upon: or Roches Dogge, or Antonies Swine; and ſurely, hee had need of a very thick Hide, that can doe this.

Mores in Scot. Orig. Pap.

But, in earneſt, ſay wee ſhould yeeld theſe adorations to bee lawfull, and godly: What Marcarius (amongſt ſo many woods of counterfeit trees) can ſhew us the true Croſſe? or what Helena amongſt ſuch heaps, yea, Hils of Iron, can ſhew us the true nayles? Aſſuredly, both theſe Juglers ſmile one upon another, while they ſhew theſe Reliques to their people; and now even the ſilly vulgar begins (not without indignation) to deſcry this coozenage. To omit therefore theſe ridiculous tricks, and knaviſh conveyances of their ſhavelings, let us in this caſe appeal evento Caſſanders own moderation; who (having firſt honeſtly acknowledged the ancient complaints of Baſil, Ambroſe, Auguſtine, about the buſineſſe of theſe abuſes) goes on thus: It appears (ſaith he) that in the later times there hath been too much given to the Reliques and Monuments of the Saints: So as even good men, and thoſe which were zealouſly devout, were growne to that paſſe, that they placed the ſumme of all Religion in gathering together the Reliques of the Saints, & in garniſhing them richly with gold and Pearles, and building ſumptuous Chappels and Temples to them: And again, thoſe that were lewd and godleſſe, put all their confidence (though vaine and falſe) in the fooliſh and ſuperſtitious worſhip of Reliques: wherefore in the Councel of Cabilon, thoſe are reproved, who in a pretence of devotion goe on Pilgrimage to Rome or Turon, or any other like places; as if they thought, that the frequenting of theſe holy Shrines could both purge them from ſinne, and licence them to ſinne with impunity. And unto this, yet another miſchiefe hath been added, That for covetouſneſſe ſake, to intice the ſimple people, falſe Reliques have been deviſed, and fained Miracles reported; and by thoſe Miracles, the Superſtition of the multitude was ſo fed, that they were rather taken up with an admirarion of the wonders, than drawne to an holy imitation of the Saints: and many times, by the ſubtlety and illuſion of the Devill (abuſing the ſuperſtition of men) new Reliquhs were, by Dreames & Viſions, revealed to the World, and by the operation of the ſame Devill, Miracles ſeemed to be wrought for the confirmation thereof: Thus ſaith Caſſander, like a true German, ſhall I ſay, or like a true Iſraelite? But wee that have been better taught, dare freely and confidently ſay of our ſelves, as Hierome profeſſed of old, in the name of all Chriſtians; So far are we from adoring the Reliques of Martyrs, that wee worſhip neither Sunne, nor Moone, nor Angels, nor Arch-Angels, Cherubin, nor Seraphin, nor any name that is named either in the preſent World, or in the future; leſt we ſhould ſerve the creature, rather than the Creator which is bleſſed for ever.

Then

Then, that from Reliques we may discend to Images: Is it possible that we should not be ever displeased with that franticke superstition of the Romish Church? That against the Tables of Gods Law, against the Institutions of the Apostles, against the practise of the ancient Church, against the manifest Decrees of Councels, against the cleere Testimonies of Fathers, in defiance of God and men, the Churches of Christians should bee no lesse pestered with Idols, than the Temples of the Heathen? That (as Hierome complained of old) the native beauty of the Church should be polluted with the filth of Paganisme? That (which Eusebius justly taxeth of madnesse) there should be a visible and bodily Image or representation made of the invisible and Spirituall God? That we should put our confidence in Agnis Dei, Graines, Tapers, Roses, Swords, Ensignes, Bels, ridiculously (after their manner) inchanted? That by certaine Magicall Exorcismes, the Devill should be driven out of those Creatures wherein he never was? Nay, let us even enter into league with Satan himselfe, if wee shall give either allowance or connivence to such Diabolicall practises of will-worship.

Hier. Magno Oratori Rom.

L. b. sacr. Cerem.

I doe purposely forbeare to speake of that prophane paradox of the sufficiency of the outward worke done, without good inward dispositions; the idle mumbling up of Prayers, in a forreign tongue; the number and vertue of Sacraments; the Sacrilegious mutilation of the Eucharist, and a thousand other Monsters, both Opinions, and Ceremonies: These that I have reckoned, are errors more than enow: And I would to God, those which we have here particularized, were not such, that there is no remedy, but that we must eternally fall out either with God, or with Rome. Since therefore neither Truth can ever yeeld, nor Obstinacy will yeeld; let us serve cheerefully under the colours of our Heavenly Leader, and both proclaime and maintain an unreconciliable warre with these Romish Heresies.

Sect. XXII.

Of the Impossibility of the meanes of Reconciliation.

AND now, since no wise man can suspect of us, that we will ever grow to that height of madnesse, as to runne perfidiously from the Standard of God to the Tents of that Roman Antichrist; Is there any hope, that the Papists will ever be drawne backe to the sound and pure judgement of the Primitive Antiquity? Oh that God would vouchsafe this grace to the Christian World, that we could but comfort our selves with the hope of so great happinesse!

What a sight were this, how pleasant, how worthy of God and his Angels, that (as it is said of the Novatian Faction, and the Orthodoxe of old) men, women, children of both parts, without all guile, and close harbours of discontentment, should mutually bring stones and matter to the building up of this Temple of another (yet true) Resurrection! We will gladly speak unto them, and (if need be) upon our knees, in Cyprians words; Sithence we may not come forth of the sound and true Church of God, and come unto you; let us beseech and intreat you, by whatsoever should bee most deare unto you, that you would returne to our fraternity, and into the bosome of that Mother Church whence yee are revolted; and as he said in Theocritus, yet at last bee perswaded: wee are both brothers of one blood; why will you needs fight more against your selves, than your brethren?

Theocr. Διοσκυ, &c. Αλλ' ιτε χειρας Πεισθητε, &c.

But alas, sooner may God create a new Rome, than reforme the old: Yea, needs must that Church put off it selfe, and cease to be what it is, ere it can begin to be once againe what it was: for, (as the Comicke Poet said in the like) both substance, credit, fame, vertue, honour, have at once forsaken her; and by long dis-use have left her worse than naught: neither doe I see how these houses can be repaired, but they must be pulled downe to the very foundations, and then built from the ground.

Plau. Mostellar Simul enim res, fides, fama, virtus, decusq; deseruerunt, atque ipsa in usu. Facta est nimio nequior, nec videor mihi, &c.

But if there be any likelihood of remedy yet to be hoped for; surely, it must needs come either from her selfe, or from others. Can it be first from her selfe, which obstinately defends her errors, not only with tongue and pen, but with fire & sword too? which will not yeeld so much as that shee can erre? which refused to amend those notorious torious abuſes, which by the moderate verdict of her elect Cardinals were condemned? And laſtly, which by the palpable flatteries of her laſt and worſt Paraſites, the Jeſuites, is growne not ſecure onely, but prouder than ever ſhe was? Can it be then from others? How oft hath this been endevoured in vaine? Rome may be ſacked and battered (as it hath often been) by military forces; but purged by admonitions, convictions, cenſures, it will never be. I remember on this occaſion, what Siſinnius the Lector adviſed Biſhop Nectarius in the like caſe; That he had ever found diſputations ſo far from reconciling of Schiſmes, that they are ſtill wont to inflame the minds of Heretikes to ſuffer contention. What then? can it be from her ſelf and others? Alas how ſhould it? unleſſe either others had power, or her ſelfe had will to be redreſſed. For certainly, if there be any one ſparke of good hope yet alive, it muſt be in the ayd and determination of a general Counſell; and ſuch a Synod is no leſſe impoſſible than reconciliation it ſelfe. For who ſhall call it? who ſhall ſit Preſident in it? who ſhall bee preſent, and give their voices? What ſhall be the rule of the deciſions? what the order of execution? Let them bring forth (if they will) the ſiſter, or the daughter of that their Tridentine aſſembly; who can hold from ſmiles and ſcorne? Forſooth, they would deale with us (as Luther wittily jeſted of the ſummoning of this Councell by Paul the Third) much like unto them that mock an hungry dogge with a cruſt and a knife; who in ſtead of giving him the bread, let him feele the haft: well may we reſolve with Nazianzen, to avoid all ſuch meetings of Biſhops; for that no ſuch Synod ever did good, but tended rather to the decay than advantage of the Church: I remember Iſidore derives the latine word Concilium, à ciliis oculorum; for that all direct the ſight of their mindes into one center. There can therefore bee no Councell held by thoſe which profeſſe a generall and publike diſagreement of judgement: In vaine ſhould wee indevour any ſuch courſe, unleſſe every one of them would reſolve to thinke of peace at home, and would perſwade his heart, laying aſide all prejudice, and wilfull reſpects of faction, ingenuouſly to ſubmit himſelfe to the Truth, when it once appeares, and more to regard their ſoules than their eſtates: For can we thinke it equall (as things now ſtand) that the ſame parties ſhould be allowed, witneſſes, plaintiffes, defendants, Judges in their owne cauſe? Or ſhall we perhaps hope, that thoſe priviledges which have hitherto been treacherouſly and tyrannically uſurped by Papiſts, will now upon better adviſement be ingenuouſly given up by them, and renounced? or that they will now at laſt thunder and lighten Anathemaes againſt their own heads? Some fooles may hope for this, which are unacquainted with that old verſe, ſo common in the mouth and pen of Lipſius, Moribus antiquis Res ſtat Romana, viriſque.

But for us, (unleſſe he that doth wonders alone, by his ſtretched-out arme from heaven, ſhould mightily beyond all hope effect this) we know too well that it cannot be done: Onely this one thing (which God hath promiſed) we doe verily expect, to ſee the day when the Lord Jeſus ſhall with the breath of his mouth deſtroy this lawleſſe man, long ſince revealed to his Church; and by the brightneſſe of his glorious comming, fully diſcover, and diſpatch him. Not onely in the meanes, and way, but in the end alſo, is Rome oppoſite to Heaven: The Heaven ſhall paſſe away by a change of quality, not an utter deſtruction of ſubſtance: Rome, by deſtruction, not by change: Of us therefore and them ſhall that old Bucolick Verſe be verified:

Out of each others breſt their ſwords they drew;
Nor would they reſt, till one the other ſlew.

Glory to God, Victory to the Truth, Warre with Hereſie, Peace to the Church.

AMEN.

Quo Vadis?

A JUST CENSURE OF TRAVELL,

AS IT IS COMMONLY UNDERtaken by the Gentlemen of our NATION.

By Jos. Hall.

LONDON:
Printed by Ric. Hodgkinsonne. 1641.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, EDWARD Lord DENNY, Baron of Waltham.

Right Honorable:

IF ever any man had reaſon to be in love with the face of a forraine entertainment, thoſe are they, which were admitted to the attendance of the truly Generous and Honorable, Lord HAY, your moſt noble Son, in his late Embaſſage to France; in which number my unworthineſſe was allowed to make one; who can therefore well witneſſe, that no man could either receive more honour from a ſtrange Country, or doe more honour to his owne. What wanted there that might make men confeſſe themſelves more welcome than ſtrangers? Neither doubt I, but that after many ages, France it ſelfe will wonder at the bountifull expreſſions of her owne favours. But whiles others were injoying the noble courteſies of the time, my thoughts entertained themſelves with ſearching into the proofe of that ordinary Travell, wherewith I ſaw men commonly affected; which I muſt needs confeſſe, the more I ſaw, the leſſe I liked. Neither is it in the power of any forraine munificence, to make me thinke ours any where ſo well as at home. Earthly commodities are no part of my thought: I looked (as I ought) at the ſoule; which I well ſaw, uſes not onely to gather no moſſe in this rolling, but ſuffers the beſt graces it hath to moulder away inſenſibly in ſuch unneceſſary agitation. I have now been twice abroad: both times (as thinking my ſelfe worthy of nothing but neglect) I bent my eyes upon others, to ſee what they did, what they got. my inquirie found our ſpirituall loſſe ſo palpable, that now at laſt my heart could could not chuse but breake forth at my hand, and tell my Countrymen of the dangerous issue of their curiosity. I meddle not with the common journeys to the minerall waters of the Spa; to which many sicke soules are beholden for a good excuse: who whiles they pretend the medicinall use of that spring, can freely quaffe of the puddle of popish superstition poysoning the better part, in stead of helping the worse. These I leaue to the best Phisitian, Authority; which, if it may please to undertake the cure, may perhaps saue as many English-Soules from infection, as that water cures Bodies of diseases. I deale only with those that professe to seeke the glory of a perfect breeding, and the perfection of that which we call Civility, in Travell: of which sort I haue (not without indignation) seene too many lose their hopes, and themselves in the way; returning as emptie of grace, and other vertues, as full of words, vanity, mis-dispositions. I dedicate this poore discourse to your Lo: as (besides my daily renued obligations) congratulating to you the sweet liberty and happy use of your home, who like a fixed starre may well overlooke these planets, and by your constant setledness, give that aime to inferiour eyes, which shall be in vaine expected from a wandring light. The God of heaven, to whose glory I haue intended this weake labour, give it favour in the sight of his Church, and returne it backe, but with this good newes, that any one of the sonnes of Japhet is hereby perswaded to dwell ever in the tents of Sem. Unto that divine protection, I humbly betake your Lo: justly vowing my selfe

Your Lo: humbly devoted in all faithfull and Christian obedience,

Jos: Hall.

QUO

Quo Vadis?

Sect. I.

IT is an over-rigorous conſtruction of the works of God, that in moting our Iland with the Ocean, he meant to ſhut us up from other Regions; For God himſelfe that made the Sea, was the Author of Navigation, and hath therein taught us to ſet up a wooden Bridge, that may reach to the very Antipodes themſelves: This were to ſeeke diſcontentment in the bounty of God, who hath placed us apart, for the ſingularity of our happineſſe, not for reſtraint.

There are two occaſions wherein Travell may paſſe, Matter of Traffique, and Matter of State. Some commodities God hath confined to ſome Countries, upon others he hath with a full hand powred thoſe benefits, which he hath but ſprinkled upon ſome. His wiſe providence hath made one Countrey the Granary, another the Celler, another the Orchard, another the Arſenall of their neighbours, yea of the remoteſt parts. The earth is the Lords, which he meant not to keep in his hands, but to give; and he which hath given no man his faculties and graces for himſelfe, nor put light into the Sunne, Moone, Stars, for their owne uſe, hath ſtored no parcell of earth with a purpoſe of private reſervation. Salomon would never have ſent his navie for Apes and Peacocks, but yet held gold and timber for the building of Gods houſe, and his owne, worthy of a whole three yeares voyage: The Sea and Earth are the great Cofers of God; the diſcoveries of Navigation are the keyes, which whoſoever hath received, may know that he is freely allowed to unlock theſe cheſts of Nature without any need to pick the wards. Wiſe Salomons compariſon is reciprocall: A ſhip of Merchants that fetches her wares from farre is the good Huſwife of the Common-wealth; and if ſhe were ſo in thoſe blind Voyages of Antiquity, which never ſaw Needle nor Card, how much more thrifty muſt ſhe needs be in ſo many helps both of Nature and Art? Either Indies may be ſearched for thoſe treaſures which God hath laid up in them for their farre-diſtant owners; Onely let our Merchants take heed, leſt they goe ſo farre, that they leave God behind them; that whiles they buy all other things good cheap, they make not an ill march for their ſoules, leſt they end their proſperous adventures in the ſhipwracke of a good conſcience.

Sect. II.

AND for matter of policy, nothing can be more plaine than that our correſpondence with other Nations cannot poſſibly be held up, without intelligence of their eſtate, of their proceedings; the neglect whereof were no other than to proſtrate our ſelves to the mercy of an hollow friendſhip, and to ſtand ſtill, and willingly lye open whiles we are plaid upon by the wit of untruſty neighbourhood. Theſe eyes and eares of State are neceſſary to the well-being of the head; in which number I doe not include thoſe private Inter-lopers intelligence, that lye abroad onely to feed ſome vaine Cameleons at home with the ayre of newes, for no other purpoſe ſave idle diſcourſe; but onely thoſe profitable Agents, whoſe induſtry either fitteth them abroad for publike imployment, or imployeth them after due maturity, in the fit ſervices of the Common-wealth: neither my cenſure nor my direction reaches to either of theſe occaſions. It is the travell of curioſity wherewith my quarrell ſhall be maintained: the inconveniencies whereof my owne Senſes have ſufficiently witneſſed, that if the wiſe Parents of our Gentry could have borrowed mine eyes for the time, they would ever learne to keepe their ſonnes at home, and not wilfully beat themſelves with the ſtaffe of their age: upon them let my pen turne a little, as thoſe that are more than acceſſaries to this both private and publike miſchiefe.

Sect. III.

IT is the affectation of too early ripeneſſe that makes them prodigall of their childrens ſafety and hopes: for, that they may be wiſe betimes, they ſend them forth to the world in the minority both of age and judgment: like as fond mothers uſe to ſend forth their daughters on froſting, early in cold mornings (though into the midſt of a vaporous and foggy ayre) and whiles they ſtrive for a colour, loſe their health. If they were not blinded with over-weening and deſire, they could not but ſee that their unſetledneſſe carries in it a manifeſt perill of miſcarriage: grant that no danger were threatned by the place, experience gives us, that a weake limbd child, if he be ſuffered to uſe his leggs too ſoone, too much, lames himſelfe for ever: but if he walke in uneven ground, he is no leſſe ſubject to maimes than crookedneſſe. Doe they not ſee how eaſily a young twig is bowed any way? Doe they not ſee that the Midwife and Nurſe are wont to frame the griſtly head of the Infant to any faſhion? May not any thing be written upon a blanke? And if they make choice of this age, becauſe it is moſt docible, and for that they would take the day before them, why doe they not conſider, that it is therefore more docible of evill, ſince wickedneſſe is both more inſinuative and more plauſible than vertue, eſpecially when it meets with an untutored Judge; and ſeeing there is ſo much inequality of the number of both, that it is not more hard to find vertue, than to miſſe vice: Heare this then, ye careleſſe Oſtriches, that leave your egges in the open ſand for the Sun to hatch, without the feare of any hoofe that may cruſh them in pieces; have your ſtomacks reſolved to digeſt the hard newes of the ruine of your children? Doe yee profeſſe enmity to your owne loynes? then turne them (as you doe) looſe to theſe dangers, ere they can reſiſt, ere they can diſcerne; but if ye had rather they ſhould live and grow, beſtow upon them the kindly heat of your beſt plumes, and ſhelter them with your owne breſt and wings, till nature have opened a ſeaſonable way to their owne abilities.

Sect. IV.

YEa, let it be my juſt complaint in this place, that in the very tranſplantation of our ſonnes to the ſafer ſoile of our owne Univerſities, and Innes of Court, nothing is more prejudiciall than ſpeed. Perfection is the child of Time; neither was there ever any thing excellent, that required not meet leaſure: but beſides, how commonly is it ſeene, that thoſe which had wont to ſwimme onely with bladders, ſinke when they come firſt to truſt to their own armes? Theſe Lap-wings that goe from under the wing of their damme with the ſhell on their heads, runne wilde. If Tutors be never ſo carefull of their early charge, which muſt be left to their owne diſpoſition; which if it lead them not to good, not onely the hopes of

A of their youth, but the proofe of their age lies bleeding. It is true, that as the French Lawyers ſay merrily of the Normans, which by a ſpeciall priviledge are reputed of full age at 21. yeares, whereas the other French ſtay for their five and twentieth, that Malitia ſupplet ætatem; ſo may I ſay of the yonglings of our time, that Precocity of underſtanding ſupplieth age and ſtature: but as it is commonly ſeene, that thoſe bloſſomes which over-runne the Spring, and will be looking forth upon a February-Sun, are nipped ſoone after with an Aprill-froſt when they ſhould come to the knitting: ſo is it no leſſe ordinary that theſe rathe-ripe wits prevent their owne perfection, and after a vaine wonder of their haſte, end either in ſhame or obſcurity. And as it thus falls out even in our Univerſities (the moſt abſolute and famous Seminaries of the World) where the Tutors eye ſupplies the Parents; ſo
B muſt it needs much more, in thoſe free and honourable Innes (as they are called, for their liberty, Colledges for their uſe) of our Engliſh Gentry, wherein each one is his owne maſter in reſpect of his private ſtudy and government. Where there are many pots boyling, there cannot but be much ſcumme, the concourſe of a populous City affords many brokers of villany, which live upon the ſpoiles of young hopes, whoſe very acquaintance is deſtruction. How can theſe novices that are turned looſe into the maine, ere they know either coaſt, or compaſſe, avoid theſe Rocks and ſhelves, upon which both their eſtates and ſoules are miſerably wracked? How commonly doe they learne to roare in ſtead of pleading; and in ſtead of knowing the lawes, learne how to contemne them? We ſee and rue this miſchiefe, and yet I know not how careleſſe we are in preventing it. How much more deſperate muſt it
C then needs be to ſend forth our children into thoſe places which are profeſſedly infectious, whoſe very goodneſſe is either impiety or ſuperſtition? If wee deſired to have ſons poiſoned with miſbeleefe, what could we doe otherwiſe? Or what elſe doe thoſe Parents, which have bequeathed their children to Antichriſtianiſme? Our late journey into France informed me of ſome ordinary Factors of Rome, whoſe trade is the tranſporting and placing of our Popiſh novices beyond the Seas; one whereof (whoſe name I noted) hath bin obſerved to carry over ſix ſeverall charges in one yeare. Are we ſo fooliſh to go their way, whiles we intend a contrary period? Doe we ſend our ſons to learne to be chaſte in the midſt of Sodome? The world is wide and open; but our ordinary travell is Southward, into the jawes of danger: for ſo farre hath Satans policy prevailed, that thoſe parts which are onely thought
D worth our viewing, are moſt contagious; and will not part with either pleaſure, or information, without ſome tang of wickedneſſe. What can we plead for our confidence, but that there is an houſhold of righteous Lot in the midſt of that impure City, that there are houſes in this Jericho, which have ſcarlet threds ſhining in their windowes, that in the moſt corrupted ayre of Popery, ſome well reformed Chriſtians draw their breath, and ſweeten it with their reſpiration? Bleſſed be God, that hath reared up the towers of Sion in the midſt of Babylon. We muſt acknowledge, not without much gratulation to the Goſpell of Chriſt, that in the very hotteſt climates of oppoſition, it finds many clients, but more friends; and in thoſe places, where authority hath pleaſed to give more ayre to the truth, would have had many more, if the reformed part had happily continued that correſpondence in ſome
E circumſtances with the Roman Church, which the Church of England hath hitherto maintained. God is my record how free my heart is both from partiality and prejudice. Mine eyes and eares can witneſſe with what approoſe and applauſe divers of the Catholiques Royall (as they are tearmed) entertained the new tranſlated Liturgy of our Church, as marvelling to ſee ſuch order and regular devotion in them, whom they were taught to condemne for hereticall. Whoſe allowances I well ſaw, might with a little helpe have beene raiſed higher, from the practice of our Church to ſome points of our judgment. But if true religion were in thoſe parts yet better attended, and our young Traveller could find more abetters and examples of pietie, on whom we might relie, yet how ſafe can it be to truſt young eyes with the view and cenſure of truth or falſehood in religion? eſpecially when truth brings nothing to this barre, but extreame ſimplicity; and contrarily, falſhood, a gawdy magnificence, and proud majeſty of pompous ceremonies, wherewith the hearts of children and fooles are eaſily taken. That Curtizan of Rome (according to the manner of that profeſſion) ſets out her ſelfe to ſale in the moſt tempting faſhion; here want no colours, no perfumes, no wanton dreſſes; whereas the poore Spouſe of CHRIST can onely ſay of her ſelfe, I am blacke, but comely. When on the one ſide they ſhall ſee ſuch rich ſhrines, gariſh Altars, ſtately Proceſſions, when they ſhall ſee a Pope adored of Emperours, Cardinalls preferr'd to Kings, Confeſſours made Saints, little children made Angels, in a word, nothing not outwardly glorious: on the other ſide, a ſervice without welt or gard, whoſe majeſty is in all the heart, none in the face, how eaſily may they incline to the conceit of that Pariſian Dame, who ſeeing the proceſſion of S. Genevifue goe by the ſtreets, could ſay, (O que belle, &c.) How fine a religion is ours in compariſon of the Huguenots? Whereto muſt be added, that (ſuppoſing they doe not carry with them, but rather goe to fetch the language of the place) ſome long time needs be ſpent, ere they can receive any help to their devotion; whiles in the meane ſeaſon, their unthriving intermiſſion is aſſayled with a thouſand ſuggeſtions: And who ſees not that this lucrum ceſſans (as the Civilians tearme it) offers an open advantage to a buſie adverſary?

SECT. VI.

IN a word, it hath beene the old praiſe of early riſing, that it makes a man healthfull, holy, and rich; whereof the firſt reſpects the body, the ſecond the ſoule, the third the eſtate: all falls out contrary in an early travell. For health: The wiſe providence of God hath ſo contrived his earth and us, that he hath fitted our bodies to our clime, and the native ſuſtenance of the place unto our bodies. The apparent difference of dyet (and of drinks eſpecially) falling into ſo tender age, muſt need cauſe a jarre in the conſtitution; which cannot in all likelihood but ſend forth diſtemper into the whole courſe of the enſuing life. The ſtreame runnes like the fountaine, and ſpeeds well, if at laſt, by many changes of ſoile it can leave an ill quality behind it: beſides that the miſ-governance of dyet, whereto their liberty layes them open in the weakneſſe of their pupillage, cannot but be extremely prejudiciall. In this point let experience be conſulted with; her unpartiall ſentence ſhall eaſily tell us, how few young travellers have brought home, ſound and ſtrong, and (in a word) Engliſh bodies. As for holineſſe, we loſe our labour, if this diſcourſe prove not that it hath none ſo great enemy as timely travell; at once doe wee hazard to abandon God and our home: ſet an empty pitcher to the fire, it cracks preſently, whereas the full will abide boyling. It was the younger ſonne in the Goſpell, who therefore turnes unthrift, becauſe he got his portion too ſoone into his hands, and wandred into a farre Countrey. The eye of the Parent, and the ferule of the maſter, is all too little to bring our ſonnes to good. Where then there is neither reſtraint of evill, nor helps to grace, how ſhould their condition be other than hopeleſſe? The ſoile doth much in many plants: the Perſian Hyoſcyamus, if it be tranſlated to Egypt, proves deadly; if to Jeruſalem, ſafe and wholeſome: neither is it otherwiſe with ſome diſpoſitions, which may juſtly curſe the place, as acceſſory in their undoing. Laſtly, for riches, not of the purſe, (which is not here thought of) but of the mind, what can be expected from that age, which is not capable of obſervation, careleſſe of repoſition? whereof the one gets, the other keeps the treaſure of our underſtanding. What is this age fit to looke after but Butterflies, or birds neſts, or perhaps the gay coat of a Courtier? And if remarkable conſiderations be put into it by others, they are as ſome looſe Pearles, which for want of filing upon a ſtring, ſhake out of our pockets; ſo as all the wealth of a young Traveller is onely in his tongue, wherein he exceeds his mothers Parat at home, both for that hee can ſpeake more, and knows that he ſpeaketh.

Sect. VII.

AND in truth, it is not onely in Travell, wherein we may juſtly complaine of the inconveniency of haſte, but (that we may looke a little aſide) in all the important buſineſſes of our life, eſpecially in mariage and profeſſions: The ordinary haſte in the one (before the face can deſcry the ſex) fills the world full of beggery and impotence; and no leſſe haſte in the other, fills it as full of ignorance and imperfection. For on the one ſide, where the vigour of nature wants, what can be propagated but infirmitie? or how can he skill to live, that wants experience? On the other, what plenty of water can there be, where the lead of the Ciſterne is put all into the pipes? where thoſe that ſhould be gathering knowledge for themſelves, ſpend it (like unthrifty heires) upon others, as faſt as they get it. I am deceived, if I have not touched one of the maine grounds of that univerſall decay of Arts and Men, wherewith the world is commonly checked: They muſt be mightier and wiſer, that know how to redreſſe it.

Sect. VIII.

BUt let us give our Traveller (that which Parents ſeldome care to give) maturity of age; let him be as ripe as time can make him; What is the beſt advantage which his abſence can promiſe us; Let us lay the benefits of Travell in the one ſcale, the inconveniences in the other; whetherſoever over-weighs ſhall ſway downe the beame of our judgment. The private contentment of a mans owne heart in the view of forrain things, is but a better name of an humorous curioſity. If a man yeeld to run after his appetite and his eye, he ſhall never know where to reſt, and after many idle excurſions, ſhould lie downe, weary, but unſatisfied. For, give me a man that hath ſeene Judaſſes Lanthorne at Saint Denniſes, the Epheſian Diana in the Louvre, the great veſſell at Heidelberg, the Amphitheatre at Niſmes, the ruines and halfe-lettered monuments of the ſeven hils, and a thouſand ſuch rarities; what peace hath his heart, above thoſe that ſit at home, and contemne theſe toyes? And what if that mans fancy ſhall call him to the ſtables of the great Mogol, or to the ſolemnities of Mecha, or to the Library of the Mountaine of the Moone, will he be ſo farre the drudge or Lacquay of his owne imagination, as to undertake this pilgrimage? Or where will he ſtay at laſt, upon his returne? If he have ſmelt the ill-ſented Cities of France, or have ſeene faire Florence, rich Venice, proud Genua, Luca the induſtrious: if then his thoughts ſhall tempt him to ſee the rich Gluttons houſe in Jeruſalem, or invite him to Aſmere, or Bengala, muſt he goe? And if he can deny and chide his owne unprofitable deſires at the laſt, why began he no ſooner? That could not be forborne too early, which at laſt we repent to have done: hee therefore that travells onely to pleaſe his fantaſie, is like ſome woman with childe, that longs for that peece which ſhe ſees upon anothers trencher, and ſwounds if ſhee miſſe it; or ſome Squire of Dames that doats upon every beauty, and is every day love-ſicke anew: Theſe humours are fitter for controlment than obſervation.

Sect. IX.

IT is an higher faculty that Travell profeſſeth to advance, the ſupreme power of our underſtanding, which if from hence it may be manifeſtly improved, he ſhould not be worthy to tread upon the earth that would not emulate Drake and Candiſh in compaſſing it: but ſet aſide the ſtudy of civill law, (which indeed finds better helps abroad) all Sciences (the word may ſeeme proud, but it is true) may be more both fitly wooed, and more ſurely won, within our foure Seas: for what learning is that, which the Seas, or Alps, or Pyrenees have ingroſſed from us? what profeſſion either liberall, or manuary, wherein the greateſt maſters have not beene at leaſt equalled by our home-bred Ilanders? What hath this or the former age knowne more eminent for Learning, than ſome of ours, which have never trod on any but their owne earth? And (as good market-men by one handfull judge of all the whole ſack) why may wee not finde cauſe to thinke ſo of the reſt, if they would not be wanting to themſelves? I am ſure the Univerſities of our Iland know no matches in all the world; unto whoſe perfection (that as they exceed other, ſo they may no leſſe exceed themſelves) nothing wanteth, but ſevere execution of the wiſe and carefull lawes of our Anceſtors, and reſtraint of that liberty, which is the common diſeaſe of the time. And why ſhould not the child thrive as well with the mothers milke, as with a ſtrangers? Whether it be the envy or the puſillanimity of us Engliſh, we are ſtill ready to under-value our owne, and admire forrainers; whiles other Nations have applauded no profeſſors more than thoſe which they have borrowed from us; neither have we beene ſo unwiſe as to lend forth our beſt: our neighbours (which ſhould be our corrivals in this praiſe) ſhall be our Judges; if thoſe few of our Writers, which could be drawne forth into the publique light, have not ſet Copies to the reſt of the world, not without juſt admiration And how many ſtarres have we of no leſſe magnitude, that will not be ſeene? Bleſſed be God (who hath made this Word as true, as it is great) no Nation under heaven ſo aboundeth with all variety of Learning as this Iland. From the head of Gods annointed doth this ſweet perfume diſtill to the utmoſt ſkirts of this our Region. Knowledge did never ſit crowned in the Throne of Majeſty, and wanted either reſpect, or attendance. The double praiſe which was of old given to two great Nations, That Italy could not be put downe for Armes, nor Greece for Learning, is happily met in one Iland. Thoſe therefore that croſſe the Seas to fill their braine, doe but travell Northward for heat, and ſeeke that Candle which they carry in their hand.

Sect. X.

YEa ſo farre is our ordinary Travell from perfecting the intellective powers of our Gentry, that it rather robs them of the very deſire of perfection. For what diſcouragements ſhall they finde from the love of ſtudies, in thoſe parts which are moſt ſought to for civility? Who knowes not that they are growne to that height of debauchment, as to hold learning a ſhame to Nobility, eſteeming it as a fit guard for the long robe onely, too baſe for their Tiſſues? An opinion ſo ſavoring of proud ignorance and ignorant looſeneſſe; that I cannot honour it with a confutation. Who would think that the reaſonable ſoule of men, not profeſſedly barbarous, ſhould be capable of ſuch a Monſter? What is Learning, but reaſon improved? And can reaſon ſo far degenerate, as to hate and contemne it ſelfe? Were theſe men made onely for a ſword, or a dogge, or an horſe? Onely for ſport or execution? I know not wherein Lewis the Eleventh ſhewed himſelfe unwitty, but in the charge which he gave to his Sonne, to learne no more Latine, but, Qui neſcit diſſimulare, neſcit vivere: and would this alone teach him to rule well? Doth the Art of Arts (ſuch is the government of men) require no grounds but diſſimulation, or ignorance? Even to the feeding of hogges, or ſheepe, there is more or better ſkill neceſſary. How unlike is this to a ſucceſſor of Charles the Great, whoſe word it had wont to be, that he had rather abound in knowledge, than wealth? In the Court of our King Henry the Eight, a certaine great Peere (of this diet) could ſay, it was enough for Noblemens ſonnes to winde their horne, and carry their Hawke faire; that ſtudy was for the children of a meaner ranke: To whom Pace juſtly replyed, that then Noblemen muſt be content that their children may winde their hornes, and carry their Hawkes while meaner mens ſonnes do weild the affaires of State. Certainly, it is a blind and lame government that lackes learning, whoſe ſubjects, what are they elſe, but as limbs of a body whoſe head wanteth ſenſes, which muſt needs therefore faile of either motion or ſafety? From hence it is, that ſo few of the forraine

A Forraine Nobles are ſtudious, in compariſon of ours; (in which regard I am not aſhamed to recant that which my un-experience hath (out of hearſay) written in praiſe of the French education, and thoſe few that have ſtolne the turning over of books, hide their ſkill, leſt they ſhould be made to bluſh at their vertue. What brave Trophees and rich Monuments hath the pen of our gracious Soveraigne raiſed of himſelfe unto all poſterities? When ignorance and malice have ſhot their bolt, the glory of his great wiſdome and knowledge ſhall more fill the mouths, and affect the hearts of all ſucceeding ages, than of his greatneſſe. Paul the Fift, and his greateſt Chaplaines, Bellarmine and Perron, have felt the weight of his hand; whereas the great King that ſtiles himſelfe Catholike, when he comes to paſſe his cenſorious Edict upon Cardinall Baronius (who in the eleventh Tome of his Hiſtory ſeemed too buſie in faſtening the Title of the Kingdome of Sicily upon the Pope) pro-
B feſſeth to ground his intelligence of his wrong onely upon others eyes; as if a booke (though of a Cardinall) were too meane an object for the view of Majeſty. And as all ſubordinate greatneſſe flowes from the head, ſo doe commonly alſo the diſpoſitions: Neither have the Doctors of the Romiſh Church (upon whom the implicite faith of the Layty is ſuſpended) found it any ill policy, to cheriſh this diſlike of bookiſhneſſe in the great: for whiles the candle is out, it is ſafe for them to play their tricks in the darke; and if the Aſſyrians be once blinded, how eaſily may they be led into the midſt of any Samaria? If the light of knowledge might freely ſhine to the world, Popery would ſoone be aſhamed of it ſelfe, and vaniſh amongſt the works of darkneſſe: Now how well theſe examples, and this converſation, ſhall
C whet the appetite unto good ſtudies, it cannot be hard to judge.

Edicto del Rey Don Phelippe d' Eſpana contra e Traſlado della Monarchia de Sicilia enxerido por Ceſar Baronio Cardinal en el Tomo undecimo de ſus Annales Eccleſiaſticos.

SECT. XI.

BUt perhaps it is not the learning of the Schoole, but of the State, wherein our Traveller hopes for a perfection: The ſite and forme of Cities, the faſhion of government, the manners of people, the raiſing and rate of forraine revenues, the deportment of Courts, the managing both of war and peace, is that wherein his owne eye ſhall be his beſt intelligencer; the knowledge whereof ſhall well requite his labour, whether for diſcourſe or for uſe. What if I ſay, (that ſave the ſoothing
D up of our fancy in all this) theſe leſſons may be as well taken out at home? I have knowne ſome that have travelled no further than their owne cloſet, which could both teach and correct the greateſt Traveller, after all his tedious and coſtly pererrations: what doe we but loſe the benefit of ſo many journalls, maps, hiſtoricall deſcriptions, relations, if we cannot with theſe helps, travell by our owne fire-ſide? He that travells into forraine Countries, talks perhaps with a Peaſant, or a Pilgrim, or a Citizen, or a Courtier, and muſt needs take ſuch information as partiall rumour, or weake conjecture can give him; but he that travells into learned and credible Authors, talks with them who have ſpent themſelves in bolting out the truth of all paſſages; and who having made their labours publike, would have beene like to heare of it, if they had miſ-reported. The ordinary traveller propounds ſome prime E Cities to himſelfe, and thither he walkes right forward; if he meet with ought that is memorable in the way, he takes it up; but how many thouſand matters of note fall beſide him on either hand, of the knowledge whereof hee is not guilty: Whereas ſome grave and painefull Author hath collected into one view, whatſoever his Countrey affords worthy of marke; having meaſured many a foule ſtep for that, which we may ſee dry-ſhod; and worne out many yeares in the ſearch of that, which one houre ſhall make no leſſe ours, than it was his owne. To which muſt be added, that our unperfect acquaintance may not hope to finde ſo perfect information on the ſudden as a naturall inhabitant may get, by the diſquiſition of his whole life. Let an Italian or French paſſenger walke thorow this our Iland, what can his Table-bookes carry home, in compariſon of the learned Britaine of our Camden, or the accurate Tables of Speed? Or if one of

of ours ſhould (as too many do) paſſe the Alpes, what pettances can his wild journey obſerve, in compariſon of the Itinerary of Fr. Schottus and Capugnanus? Or he that would diſcourſe of the Royalties of the French Lillies, how can he be ſo furniſhed by flying report, as by the elaborate gatherings of Caſſaneus, or of Degraſſalius? What ſhould I be infinite? This age is ſo full of light, that there is no one country of the habitable world, whoſe beames are not croſſed and interchanged with other; Knowledge of all affaires, is like muſick in the ſtreets, whereof thoſe may partake, which pay nothing. We doe not lie more open to one common ſinne, than to the eyes and pens of our neighbours; Even China it ſelfe, and Japonia, and thoſe other remoteſt Iſles and Continents (which have taken the ſtricteſt order for cloſeneſſe) have received ſuch diſcoveries, as would rather ſatisfie a Reader, than provoke him to amend them. A good booke is at once the beſt companion, and guide, and way, and end of our journey. Neceſſity drove our fore-fathers out of doores, which elſe in thoſe miſty times had ſeene no light: we may with more eaſe, and no leſſe profit, ſit ſtill, and inherit, and enjoy the labours of them, and our elder brethren, who have purchaſed our knowledge with much hazard, time, toyle, expence, and have beene liberall of their blood, (ſome of them) to leave us rich.

SECT. XII.

AS for that verball diſcourſe, wherein I ſee ſome place the felicity of their Travell (thinking it the onely grace to tell wonders to a ring of admiring ignorants) it is eaſie to anſwer; that Table-talke is the leaſt care of a wiſe man, who like a deepe ſtreame deſires rather to run ſilent; and as himſelfe is ſeldome tranſported with wonder, ſo doth he not affect it in others; reducing all to uſe, rather than admiration, and more deſiring to benefit, than aſtoniſh the hearer; withall, that the ſame meanes which enable us to know, doe at once furniſh us with matter of diſcourſe, and for the forme of our expreſſion, if it proceed not from that naturall dexterity which we carry with us, in vaine ſhall we hope to bring it home; the change of language is rather an hinderance to our former readineſſe: and if ſome have fetcht new noſes, and lips, and eares from Italy (by the helpe of Tagliacotius, and his Schollers) never any brought a new tongue from thence. To conclude, if a man would give himſelfe leave to be thus vaine and free, like a Mill without a ſcluſe, let him but travell through the world of books, and he ſhall eaſily be able to out-talke that tongue, whoſe feet have walkt the furtheſt: what hath any eye ſeene, or imagination deviſed, which the pen hath not dared to write? Out of our books we can tell the ſtories of the Monocelli, who lying upon their backs, ſhelter themſelves from the Sunne with the ſhadow of their one onely foot. Wee can tell of thoſe cheape-dieted men, that live about the head of Ganges, without meate, without mouths, feeding onely upon aire at their noſthrils: Or thoſe headleſſe Eaſterne people, that have their eyes in their breſts (a miſ-conceit ariſing from their faſhion of attire, which I have ſometimes ſeene:) Or of thoſe Coromandæ, of whom Pliny ſpeakes, that cover their whole body with their eares: Or of the perſecutors of Saint Thomas of Canterbury, whoſe poſterity (if we beleeve the confident writings of Degraſſalius) are borne with long and hairy tailes, ſouping after them; which (I imagine) gave occaſion to that proverbiall jeſt, wherewith our mirth uſes to upbraid the Kentiſh: Or of Amazons, or Pigmees, or Satyres, or the Samarcandean Lambe, which growing out of the earth by the navell, grazeth ſo farre as that naturall tether will reach: Or of the Bird Ruc, or ten thouſand ſuch miracles, whether of nature, or event. Little need we to ſtirre our feet to learne to tell either loud lies, or large truths. We have heard a bird in a cage ſing more change of notes, than others have done in the wilde liberty of the wood. And as for the preſent occurrences of the time, the world about us is ſo full of Preſſes, that it may, and is growne ſo good a fellow, that it will impart what it knows to all the neighbours: whoſe relations, if ſometimes they ſwarve from truth, we may well conſider, what variety of report every accident will yeeld;

A yeeld; and that therefore our eares abroad are no whit more credible, than our eyes at home. Yea rather, as Tully could say, that at Antium he could heare the newes of Rome, better than at Rome, so may we oft-times better heare and see the newes of France or Spaine, upon our Exchange, than in their Paris, or Madrill: Since (what liberty soever tongues may take to themselves) a discreet man will be ashamed to subscribe his name to that, whereof he may be afterwards convinced.

Sect XIII.

B Since therefore Travell cannot out-bid us in these highest commodities, which concerne the wealth of the minde; all the advantage it can afford us, must be in those mixt abilities, wherein our bodies are the greatest partners, as dancing, fencing, musicke, vaulting, horsemanship; the onely professions of the mis-named Academies of other Nations. Who can deny that such like exercises are fit for yong Gentlemen, not only for their present recreation, but much more for the preparing of them to more serious action? Yet must these learne to know their places: what are they else but the varnish of that picture of Gentry, whose substance consists in the lines and colours of true vertue? but the lace or facing of a rich garment? but the hang-bies of that Royall court which the soule keeps in a generous heart? He that holds Gentilitie accomplished with these (though laudable) qualities, partakes more of his horse, than his horse can possibly of him. This skill then is worthy of our purchase, yet may not be bought too deare; and perhaps need not to be fetcht C so far. Neither my profession, nor my experience will allow me to hold comparisons in this kind; but I have been heartned by no mean Masters of these Arts, to say that our Nation have yeelded some in all these faculties, which need not stoope unto the proudest forrainer: ours have no fault but one, that they are our owne; and what hath their Country offended, if their Art offend not? It is an humorous giddinesse to measure the goodnesse of any thing by the distance of miles, and where there is equality of worth, to neglect the neerest. I slander our Nation if it be not sicke of this disease, in the course of all Sciences; And if neerenesse and presence be the cause of our dislike, why doe we not hate our selves, which are ever in our owne bosome? Why doe we not hate this fastidious curiosity, which is too close to us? perhaps perfection in these qualities is thinner sowne amongst us, than some other-where; so as D our Iland for want of worke and incouragement, affords no such multitude of masters: but how can we complaine of rarenesse, since if our age yeeld us but one excellent in each kinde, it is more than we are willing to use; and if the fault were not in our selves, one candle might light a thousand. To instance in the best: The Horse is a noble creature, which as it is the strenght and pride of France, so wins the hearts and heeles of that Nation. The generality of their skill is nothing to a stranger; each private mans cunning rests in himselfe; it is onely the Teacher, whose ability may concerne us. And whereas there is a double kinde of menage (as I have heard) one for service, the other for pleasure; in the first, our Masters thinke they cannot yeeld unto the best; in the latter, if they grant themselves exceeded, how many men have E taught their dogge the same tricks, with no lesse contentment? In both, we have the written directions of their greatest Artists; who (for the perpetuity of their owne honour) failed not to say their best. And if these dead Masters suffice not, we have had, we may have the best of their living: The conscience of a mans excellency will abide no limits; but spurs him forth to winne admiration abroad, and if therewithall he can finde advancement of profit, how willingly doth he change his home? We have had experience of this in higher professions, much more of these under foot. One obscure towne of Holland in our memory, had by this meanes drawne together at once the greatest lights of Europe, and made it selfe then no lesse renowned for Professors', than it is now infamous for Schisme. Feare of envy forbids me to name those amongst us, which have honoured this Iland in the choice of their abode. Where Art is encouraged, it will soone rise high, and goe farre, farre, and not ſuffer a channell of the Sea to ſtay it from the preſence of a more bountifull patronage.

SECT. XIV.

BUt let us grant theſe faculties ſo fixed upon any Nation, that all our water muſt neceſſarily be fetcht at their Well; and adde unto theſe a few waſte complements, and mimicall courteſies, which muſt needs be put into the match of our ordinary travell: and now let us ſit downe, and ſee what we paid for this ſtock, and count our winnings: What muſt our compleat Traveller ſtake downe for this goodly furniture of his Gentry? If not loſſe, danger; danger of the beſt part, if not all: a double danger; of corruption of religion, and depravation of manners; both capitall: And can we thinke theſe endowments ſo pretious, that they ſhould be worth fetching upon ſuch an hazard? Will any man (not deſperate) run into an infected houſe, to rifle for a rich ſuit? Will any man put his finger into a fiery crucible, to pull out gold? It is wittily taken of Chryſoſtome, when our Saviour ſaid, Ne exeatis in eremum; that he ſayes not, Go forth into the deſart, and ſee, but beleeve not; but gives an abſolute prohibition of going forth at all, that they might be out of danger of miſbeleefe. Tuſh, idle and melancholicke feares, ſay ſome of our Gallants: Wherefore ſerves diſcretion, but to ſever good from ill? How eaſily may a wiſe man pull a Roſe, and not pricke his hand? How freely may he dip in this ſtreame, and not be drowned? Little doe theſe peremptory reſolvers know, either the inſinuative power of evill, or the treachery of their owne heart in receiving it, or the importunity of deceivers in obtruding it. They are the worſe for their travell, and perceive it not. An egge covered with ſalt, as our Philoſophers teach us, hath the meat of it conſumed whiles the ſhell is whole: many a one receives poiſon, and knowes not when he tooke it. No man proves extreamely evill on the ſudden. Through many inſenſible declinations doe we fall from vertue; and at the firſt are ſo gently ſeazed by vice, that we cannot beleeve our accuſers. It is miſchief enough, if they can be drawne to a leſſe diſlike of ill; which now by long acquaintance is growne ſo familiar to their eyes, that they cannot thinke it ſo loathſome, as at the firſt view. The ſociety of wilfull Idolaters will now downe with them, not without eaſe; and good meanings begin to be allowed for the cloakes of groſſe ſuperſtition. From thence they grow to a favorable conſtruction of the miſ-opinions of the adverſe part, and can complaine of the wrongfull aggravations of ſome contentious ſpirits: and from thence (yet lower) to an indifferent conceit of ſome more politike poſitions and practiſes of the Romaniſts. Neither is there their reſt. Hereupon enſues an allowance of ſome of their doctrines, that are more plauſible, and leſſe important; and withall a cenſure of us that are gone too farre from Rome. Now the marriage of Eccleſiaſticall perſons begins to diſlike them: the daily and frequent conſignation with the croſſe is not to no purpoſe: The retired life of the religious (abandoning the world forſooth) ſavours of much mortification; and Confeſſion gives no ſmall eaſe and contentment to the ſoule. And now by degrees, Popery begins to be no ill religion: If there cannot be a falſe fire of miſ-devotion kindled in them, it is enough, if they can be cooled in their love of truth; which how commonly it fals out amongſt us, I had rather experience ſhould ſpeake, than my ſelfe. Some there are that by a ſpirituall Antiperiſtaſis have growne hotter in their zeale, by being encompaſſed with the outward cold of irreligion and error, who as they owe not this grace to themſelves, ſo are they more for wonder than imitation. If Daniel found a guard in the Lions den, ſhal another put himſelfe thither for ſhelter? And if Peter walk'd upon the pavement of the water, did the reſt of the Diſciples ſtep forth and follow him? That valiant Champion of Chriſt (ſince we are fallen upon his name) who durſt draw his ſword upon a whole troupe, after all his proteſtations of his inſeparableneſſe from his Maſter, was yet infected with the ayre of the High Prieſts Hall: and whiles he but warmed himſelfe at that fire, cooled in his reſpect respect to his Saviour. Although perhaps this cogitation working (as it commonly doth) remissely, causeth not any sudden alteration in our Traveller, but (as we say of Comets and Eclipses) hath his effect when the cause is forgotten. Neither is there any one more apparent ground of that luke-warme indifferency, which is fallen upon our times, than the ill use of our wandrings: for our Travellers being the middle ranke of men, and therefore either followers of the great, or commanders of the meaner sort, cannot want convenience of diffusing this temper of ease unto both.

SECT. XV.

ALL this mischiefe is yet hid with a formall profession, so as every eye cannot finde it: in others it dares boldly breake forth to an open revolt. How many in our memory, whiles with Dinah they have gone forth to gaze, have lost their spirituall chastity, and therewith both the Church and themselves? How many (like unto the brooke Cedron) run from Hierusalem through the vale of Iehosaphat, and end their course in the dead sea? A Popish writer of our Nation (as himselfe thought) not unlearned, complaining of the obstinacy of us hereticks, despaites of prevailing, because he finds it to be long ago fore-prophesied of us in the Booke of the Chronicles, At illi protestantes audire noluerunt. It is well that Protestants were yet heard of in the old Testament, as well as Jesuites; whose name one of their owne by good hap hath found, Num. 26. 24. Like as Erasmus found Friers in St. Pauls time, inter falsos Fratres. But it were better, if this mans word were as true as it is idle. Some of ours have heard to their cost, whose losse joyned with the griefe of the Church, and dishonour of the Gospell, we have sufficiently lamented. How many have we knowne stricken with these Aspes, which have died sleeping? And in truth, whosoever shall consider this open freedome of the meanes of seducement, must needs wonder that we have lost no more; especially, if he be acquainted with those two maine helps of our Adversaries, importunity, and plausibility. Never any Pharisee was so eager to make a Proselyte, as our late factors of Rome: and if they be so hot set upon this service, as to compasse sea and land to winne one of us, shall we be so mad as to passe both their sea and land to cast our selves into the mouth of danger? No man setteth foot upon their coast, which may not presently sing with the Psalmist, They come about me like Bees. It fares with them as with those which are infected with the pestilence, who (they say) are carried with an itching desire of tainting others. When they have all done, this they have gained, that if Satan were not more busie and vehement than they, they could gaine nothing. But in the meane time, there is nothing wherein I wish we could emulate them, but in this heat of diligence and violent ambition of winning. Pyrrhus did not more envy the valour of those old Romane souldiers, which he read of, in their wounds and dead faces, than we doe the busie audacity of these new. The world could not stand before us, if our truth might be but as hotly followed as their falshood. Oh that our God, whose cause we maintaine, would enkindle our hearts with the fire of holy zeale, but so much as Sathan hath inflamed theirs with the fire of fury and faction. Oh that he would shake us out of this dull ease, and quicken our slacke spirits unto his owne worke. Arise O North, and come O South, and blow upon our garden, that the spices thereof may flow forth. These suters will take no deniall, but are ready (as the fashion was to doe with rich matches) to carry away mens soules whether they will or no. We see the proofe of their importunity at home: No bulwarke of lawes, nor barres of Justice (though made of three trees) can keepe our rebanished fugitives from returning, from intermedling. How have their actions said in the hearing of the world, that since heaven will not heare them, they will try what hell can doe? And if they dare be so busie in our owne homes, where they would seeme somewhat awed with the danger of Justice; what (thinke we) will they not dare to doe in their owne territories, where they have not free scope only, but assistance, but incouragement? Never generation was so forward as the Jesuiticall, for captation of wills amongst their owne, or of soules amongst strangers. What State is not haunted with these ill spirits? yea what house? yea what soule? Not a Princes Councell-Table, not a Ladies Chamber can be free from their shamelesse insinuations. It was not for nothing, that their great Patron Philip the second King of Spaine, called them Clericos negociadores; and that Marcus Antonius Columna, Generall of the Navy to Pius Quintus in the battell of Lepanto, and Vice-roy of Sicilie could say to Father Don Alonso, a famous Jesuite, affecting to be of the counsell of his conscience, Voi altri padri di Iheſu havete la mente al cielo, le mani ol mondo, l'anima al diavolo.

Rob. Pointz. in his preface to the testimonies for the reall presence.
2 Chron. 24. Socrates Josuæ lib. 1. c. 2. q. 19. Geiser contra Lernæum, cap. 1 & 2. Vere ait quidam hæreticus Jesuitas in sacris literis reperiri.

Sect. XVII.

YEt were there the lesse perill of their vehemence, if it were onely rude and boysterous (as in some other sects) that so (as it is in Canon shot) it might be more easily shund, then resisted: but here, the skill of doing mischiefe contends with the power; their mis-zealous passions hide themselves in a pleasing sweetnesse; and they are more beholden to policie, then strength. What Gentleman of any note can crosse our Seas, whose name is not landed in their bookes beforehand, in prevention of his person; whom now arrived, if they finde untractable through too much prejudice, they labour first to temper with the plausible conversation of some smooth Catholike of his owne Nation: the name of his Country is warrant enough for his insinuation. Not a word yet may be spoken of Religion; as if that were no part of the errand. So have we seene an hawke cast off at an Hernshaw, to looke and flie a quite other way, and after many careless and overley fetches; to towre up unto the prey intended. There is nothing wherein this faire companion shall not apply himselfe to his welcome Countryman. At last, when he hath possest himselfe of the heart of his new acquaintance, and got himselfe the reputation of a sweet ingenuity, and delightfull sociableness; he findes opportunities to bestow some witty scoffes upon those parts of our religion which lye most open to advantage. And now it is time to invite him (after their rarities) to see the Monastery of our English Benedictines, or (if elsewhere) those English Colledges which the devout beneficence of our well-meaning neighbors (with no other intention then some covetous Farmers lay salt-cats in their dove-coats) have bountifully erected. There, it is a wonder if our Traveller meet not with some one that shall claim kinred or Country of him in a more intire fashion. The Society welcomes him with more then ordinary courtesie: neither can he refuse (except he will be uncivill) to be their guest. He cannot mislike the love of his Country-men, he cannot fault their carriage. And now that they have mollified the stiffenesse of his prejudice, and with much tempring fitted him for their mold, he is a taske meet for one of their best workemen; who willingly undertaking it, hath learned to handle him so sweetly, as if he would have him think it a pleasure to be seduced. Doe we think his Doctor will begin first with the infallibility of their great Master, and perswade him that a Necromancer, an Heretick, an Atheist, cannot erre in Peters Chaire? or tell him that he may buy off his sinnes as familiarly as he may buy wares in the market? or teach him that a man may and must both make and eat his God to his breakefast? This hard meat is for stronger mawes. He knowes how first to begin with the spoone, and to offer nothing to a weake stomacke, but discourse of easie digestion: As first, that a Catholike, so living and dying (by our confession) may be saved: That there is but one Church, as but one Christ; and that out of this Arke, there is no way but drowning: That this one Church is more likely to be found in all the world, then in a corner; in all ages, then in the last Century of yeares; in unity, then in division. And now comes in the glorious brag of the Roman Universality, their inviolate Antiquity, their recorded successions, their harmonious unity, their confessed magnificence: That there is the mother Church, as to the rest of Christendome, so especially to the the Engliſh: How well a Monarchy (the beſt forme of government) beſeemes the Church: How unlikely it is that Chriſt would leave his Spouſe in the confuſion of many heads, or of none. And how that we are but a rag torne from their coat; and where was our religion before Luther lay with Bora? And what miſerable ſubdiviſions are there in our Proteſtancie? and what a gleaning are we to the harveſt of Chriſtendome? with infinite ſuggeſtions of this nature; able (as they are plauſibly urged) to ſhake an ungrounded judgment: which if they have ſo far prevailed, as that the hearer will abide himſelfe hood-winkt with this vaile of the Church, how eaſily ſhall time lead him into thoſe hatefuller abſurdities?

SECT. XVII.

IN all which proceeding, theſe impoſtors have a double advantage: Firſt, that they deliver the opinion of their Church with ſuch mitigation and favour, as thoſe that care to pleaſe, not to informe: forming the voice of the Church to the liking the hearer, not the judgment of the hearer to the voice of the Church: wherein it is not hard to obſerve that Popery ſpoken and written are two things; in diſcourſe, nothing is more ordinary then to diſclaime ſome of their received poſitions, and to blanch others. It is the malice of an adverſary that miſ-reports them, they doe not hold that Images ſhould be adored; that the wood of the Croſſe ſhould be worſhipped with the very ſame devotion that is due to Chriſt himſelfe; that the Church is the Judge of Gods writings; that Paul the Fift cannot erre; that a man may merit of his maker, much leſſe ſupererrogate; that a mouſe can run away with that which either is or was God Almighty; that it is lawfull to kill an hereticall King; and all other thoſe monſters of opinion, which their moſt claſſicke Authors have both hatcht and ſhameleſly thruſt into the light of the world. They deſie thoſe ridiculous Legends which we father upon their Church; and how much doe they ſcorne S. Francis his Bird, or his Wolfe, or his wounds, or his Apoſtles of Aſſiſe. Pope Joane was but a fancy: Never Pope was an Hereticke. If now we cry out of impudence, and call their allowed Writers to witnes; Loe, even they alſo are forged by us, and are taught to play booty on our ſide. Thus reſolved to outface all evidence, they make faire weather of their foulеſt opinions, and inveigh againſt nothing ſo much as the ſpightfulneſſe of our ſlanders. It is not poſſible that any wiſe ſtranger ſhould be in love with the face of their Church, if he might ſee her in her owne likenes; and therefore they have cunningly maſked one part of it, and painted another; ſo as thoſe features of hers which are ugly and offenſive, ſhall not appeare to any but her owne eyes. And becauſe bookes are dangerous blabs, and will be telling the generations to come, how ſtrangely that face is altered with Age and Art, therefore their tongues are clipped alſo, and made to ſpeake none but her owne words. Out of this licence, and hope to winne, they can fit their diſhes to every palate, and are ſo fawcy, as to make the Church belie it ſelfe. Hence it was that a Spaniſh Father could teach, that it is not of the neceſſity of faith, to beleeve that the preſent Pope is the Vicar of Chriſt, and the ſucceſſor of Peter. That Hoſtius the Jeſuite could ſay, that the Pope abuſed his keyes, and the authority of the Church, in receiving Henry the Fourth. That another of his fellows in a diſcourſe with a French Biſhop, could diſparage a deciſion of his Holineſſe in comparиſon of a Generall Councell. That Menos the Reader of Divinity at Valedolid, following Salas the Jeſuite, could affirme the lawfulneſſe of the marriage of religious perſons upon a doubtfull revelation. That more then one of that Order have dared to broach Confeſſion by letters, againſt the Bull of Clement the Eight. And if theſe men be not ſparing of their contradictions to that Vice-God of theirs, whoſe vaſſals they are by peculiar profeſſion, how much more boldly will they ſwim againſt the ſtreame of any common opinion, that may concerne the body of that head?

Sect. XVIII.

THeir ſecond advantage is, that they regard not with what untruths they make good their owne aſſertions: It is all one with what morter or rubbiſh they build up a ſide. From hence flow the confident reports, both of their miracles to convince us, and their ſlanders to diſgrace us. Father Haynius, a Jeſuite of 33. yeares ſtanding, amongſt 52. complaints which (out of an honeſt remorſe) he put up againſt his owne Society, to their Generall Aquaviva, finds this not the leaſt, that his fellowes ſhamed not to ſeeke the honour of their Order by cogging of miracles. What packets fly about dayly of their Indian wonders? Even Cardinall Bellarmine can abide to come in as an advoucher of theſe coozenages; who dares averre that his fellow Xavier had not only healed the deafe, dumbe, and blinde, but raiſed the dead; whiles his brother Acoſta, after many yeares ſpent in thoſe parts, can pull him by the ſleeve, and tell him in his eare, ſo loud that all the world may heare him, Prodigia nulla producimus, neque vero eſt opus. Of the ſame ſtampe are the daily-renewed miracles, revelations, viſions, wherewith any mans eares muſt needs be beaten amongſt them. Africke was at the beſt but barren of novelties in compariſon of Rome; and yet the world is incredulous if it will not ſuffer it ſelfe to be gulled with theſe holy frauds. And no fewer are thoſe lewd calumniations (the ſtuffe of all their invectives) whereby they labour to make us loathſome to the world: our perſons, our doctrines are loaded with reproaches; neither matters it how juſt they are, but how ſpightfull. What other meaſure can be expected of us, when their beſt friends have thus (upon ſome private diſlikes) ſmarted from them? Their owne holy Fathers, Clement the Eight, and Sixtus Quintus, and with them (the honour of the Jeſuiticall Order) Cardinall Tollet, can all ſhew bloody wales in their backes, from their laſhes. Their late Patron of famous memory, whoſe heart they well merited, and keepe it (as their deare relique) enſhrined in their la Fleſche, was after his death in their pulpits Proclaimed Tyran and worſe: no marvell then if after the virulent declamations of our Gifford (their Gabriel) and the malicious ſuggeſtions of others of that viperous brood, we have much adoe to perſwade our neighbours, that we have any Churches, Baptiſme, Liturgie, Religion. I appeal then to all eyes and eares, how eaſie it is for a man that will take leave to himſelfe of making what truths he liſts, and defending them by what untruths he pleaſeth, to lead a credulous heart whither he pleaſeth.

Sect. XIX.

BUt if the power of falſified reaſon prevaile not, thoſe deſperate factors of Rome (as I have been informed) have learned out of their acquaintance in the Court of the Prince of darkneſſe, to imploy ſtronger aid. On ſome of their hands, I feare, Magicall deluſions, and deviliſh incantations ſhall not want, rather than they will want a client. Neither can this ſeeem ſtrange to any that knowes how familiarly the Roman Church profeſſes the ſolemn practiſe of conjuration; in ſuch a faſhion, as it doth more than trouble the beſt Caſuiſts, to ſet down a perfect difference betwixt their ſacred Magick and the Diabolicall. From hence perhaps have proceeded thoſe miraculous apparitions (if at the leaſt they were any other but fancy or fraud) wherewith ſome of our death-ſicke Gentlemen amongſt them have been frighted into Catholikes. A famous Divine of France, ſecond to none for learning or fidelity, told me this one amongſt other inſtances, of his owne experience, which he yet lives to juſtifie: A Gentleman of the religion, whoſe wife was Popiſhly devoted, lying upon the bed of his ſickneſſe; in expectation of death, ſends for this Divine, his Paſtor; the ſicke mans wife ſends for a Jeſuite; both meet at the beds ſide; each perſwades him to his owne part; both plead for their religion at this barre, before theſe Judges: after two houres diſputation, not onely the Gentleman was cheerefully confirmed in in that Judgment, which he had embraced, but his wife alſo, out of the evidence of truth, began to incline to him, and it. The Jeſuite departed diſcontent; yet within ſome few houres after, returning (when the coaſt was clearer) intreats ſome private conference with the Gentlewoman; with whom walking in her garden, he did vehemently expoſtulate, mixing therewithall his ſtrongeſt perſwaſions; at laſt, to ſhut up his diſcourſe, he importun'd her with many obſecrations, that ſhe would vouchſafe to receive from his hands a little Boxe which he there offered her, and for his ſake weare about her continually: ſhe condeſcended. No ſooner had ſhe taken it, than ſhe fell to ſo great a deteſtation of her huſband, that ſhee could by no meanes be drawne into his preſence, and within two dayes after in this eſtate ſhee dyed. An act more worthy the Sword of Juſtice, than the pen of an Adverſary. Theſe courſes are as ſecret as wicked. Not daring therefore peremptorily to accuſe, I had rather leave theſe practices to further inquiry. Sure I am, that by their tongues Satan labours to inchant the world, and hath ſtrongly deluded too many ſoules. And are we weary of ours, that we dare tempt God, and offer our ſelves as challengers to this ſpirituall danger? The Jeſuites, amongſt much change of houſes, have two famous for the accordance of their names; one called The Bow, at Nola; the other, The Arrow, (la Fleſche) in France: though this latter were more worthy of the name of a whole Quiver, containing not fewer than eight hundred ſhafts of all ſizes. Their Apoſtate Fryer (if I ſhall not honour him too much) playd upon them in this Diſtich:

Arcum Nola dedit, dedit illis alma Sagittam
Gallia; quis funem, quem meruere, dabit?
Nola the bow, and France the ſhaft did bring:
But who ſhall helpe them to an hempen ſtring?

This proviſion is for the care of Chriſtian Princes: but in the meane time, what madneſſe is it in us, not onely to give aime to theſe roving Flights, but to offer our ſelves to be their ſtanding Butt, that they may take their full aime and hit us levell at pleaſure? Doe wee not heare ſome of their owne fellow-Catholicks in the middeſt of their awfulleſt Senate, the Parliament of Paris, pleading vehemently againſt thoſe factious ſpirits, and crying out paſſionately of that danger (which will follow upon their admiſſion) both of lewd manners, and falſe doctrine; and doe we in greater oppoſition feare neither, and eſpecially from Engliſh Jeſuites? Some Countries yeeld more venomous vipers than others; ours the worſt. I would it were not too eaſie to obſerve, that as our Engliſh Papiſts are commonly moſt Jeſuitiſh, ſo our Engliſh Jeſuites are more furious than their fellows. Even thoſe of the hotteſt Climates cannot match them in fiery diſpoſitions. And doe we put our ſelves out of our comfortable Sunne-ſhine, into the midſt of the flame of theſe noted Incendiaries? Doe wee take pleaſure to make them rich with the ſpoyle of our ſoules? and becauſe they will not come faſt enough to fetch theſe booties, doe we goe to carry them unto their pillage?

Sect XX.

THE danger is in the men more than in their cauſe; and if this great Curtizan of the world had not ſo cunning Panders, I ſhould wonder how ſhe ſhould get any but fooliſh cuſtomers. The ſearcher of all hearts (before whoſe Tribunall I ſhall once come to give an account of this Cenſure) knows that I ſpeak it not maliciouſly; Him call I to witneſſe, that I could not finde any true life of Religion amongſt thoſe that would be Catholikes: I meddle not with the errors of Speculations, or Schoole points; wherein their judgment palpably offendeth: I ſpeake of the lively practice of piety. What have they amongſt them but a very out-ſide of Christianity, a meere formality of devotion? Looke into their Churches, there their poore ignorant Laity hope to present their best services to God; and yet alas, they say they know not what, they heare they know not what, they doe they know not what, returning empty of all hearty edification, and onely full of confused intentions; and are taught to thinke this sacrifice of fooles meritorious. Looke their Chemarims upon the sacred actors in this religious Scene; what shall you see but idle Apishnesse in their solemnest worke, and either mockery or slumbering? Looke into their religious houses; what shall you see but a trade of careleſſe and lazie holinesse? houres observed, because they must, not because they would. What doe they but lull piety asleepe with their heartlesse and sleepy Vespers? Looke into the private closets of their devout Ignorants; what difference shall you see betwixt the Image and Suppliant? If they can heare their beads knack upon each other, they are not bid to care for hearing their prayers reflect upon Heaven: Shortly, in all that belongs to God, the worke done sufficeth, yea meriteth; and what need the heart be wrought upon for a taske of the hand? Looke into the melancholike Cels of some austere Recluses; there you may finde perhaps an haire-cloth, or a whip, or an heardle; but shew me true mortification, the power of spirituall renovation of the soule. How should that be found there, when as that saving faith (which is the onely purger of the heart) is barred out as presumptuous? and no guest of that kind allowed, but the same which is common to Devills? what Papist in all Christendome hath ever beene heard to pray daily with his family, or to sing but a Psalme at home? Look into the universall course of the Catholike life, there shall you finde the Decalogue professedly broken, besides the ordinary practice of Idolatry, and frequence of oaths. Who ever saw Gods day duly kept in any City, Village, household under the jurisdiction of Rome? Every obscure holy-day takes the wall of it, and thrusts it into the channell. Who sees not obedience to authority so slighted, that it stands only to the mercy of humane dispensation? and in the rest of Gods Lawes, who sees not how foule sinnes passe for venjall? and how easily veniall sinnes passe their satisfaction: for which a crosse, or a drop of holy-water is sufficient amends? Who sees not how no place can be left for truth, where there is full roome given to equivocation? All this, though it be harsh to the conscionable man, yet is no lesse pleasing to the carnall. The way of outward fashionablenesse in religion, and inward liberty of heart, cannot but seeme faire to nature; and especially when it hath so powerfull angariation. It is a wonder if but one halfe of Christendome be thus wonne to walke in it. Those which are either ungrounded in the principles of religion, or the unconscionable in the practice, are fit to travell into these miserable errors: But though Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah sinne. Come ye not to Gilgal, neither goe ye up to Bethaven.

Sect. XXI.

From the danger of corruption in judgment, let us turne our eyes to the depravation of manners, which not seldome goes before: Apples therefore fall from the tree, because they be worme-eaten; they are not worm-eaten because they fall: and, as usually follows, Satan like the Raven, first seizes upon the eye of understanding, & then preyes freely upon the other carkase. We may be bad enough at home, certainly we are the worse for our neighbours. Old Rome was not more jealous of the Grecian and African manners, than we have reason to be of the Romane. It were well if we knew our owne fashions, better if we could keepe them.

What mischiefe have we amongst us that we have not borrowed? To begin at our skin: who knows not whence we had the variety of our vaine disguises? As if we had not wit enough to be foolish, unlesse we were taught it. These dresses being constant in their mutability, shew us our Masters. What is it that we have not learned of our neighbours, save onely to be proud good cheape? Whom would it not vex to see how that other sexe hath learned to make Antiks and monsters of themselves? Whence came their hips to the shoulders, and their brests to the navill; but but the one from ſome ill-ſhap't Dames of France, and the other from the worſe-minded Curtizans of Italy? Whence elſe learned they to dawbe theſe mudde-walls with Apothecaries morter; and thoſe high waſhes, which are ſo cunningly lickt on, that the wet napkin of Phryne ſhould be deceived? Whence the friſled and poudred buſhes of their borrowed excrement? as if they were aſhamed of the head of Gods making, and proud of the Tire-womans? Where learned we that devilliſh Art and practice of Duell, wherein men ſeek honour in blood, and are taught the ambition of being glorious butchers of men? VVhere had we that luxurious delicacy in our feaſts, in which the noſe is no leſſe pleaſed, than the palate; and the eye no leſſe than either? wherein the piles of diſhes make barricadoes againſt the appetite, and with a pleaſing encombrance trouble an hungry gheſt? VVhere, thoſe formes of ceremonious quaffing, in which men have learned to make Gods of others, and beaſts of themſelves; and loſe their reaſon, whiles they pretend to doe reaſon? where, the lawleſneſſe (miſ-called freedome) of a wilde tongue, that runnes with reynes in the necke, thorow the bed-chamber of Princes, their Cloſets, their Councell-tables, and ſpares not the very Cabinet of their breſts, much leſſe can be barr'd out of the moſt retired ſecrecy of inferiour greatneſſe? Where, the change of noble attendance and hoſpitality, into foure wheeles, and ſome few butterflies? Where, the Art of diſhoneſty in practicall Machiaveliſme, in falſe equivocations? Where, the ſlight account of that filthineſſe, which is but condemned as veniall, and tolerated as not unneceſſary? Where, the ſkill of civil and honourable hypocriſie, in thoſe formall complements, which doe neither expect beleefe from others, nor carry any from our ſelves? Where, that unnaturall villany, which though it were burnt with fire and brimſtone from heaven, and the aſhes of it drowned in the dead ſea, yet hath made ſhift to revive, and calls for new vengeance upon the actors? Where, that cloſe Atheiſme, which ſecretly laughs God in the face, and thinkes it weakneſſe to beleeve, wiſdome to profeſſe any religion? Where, the bloody and tragicall ſcience of King-killing; the new divinity of diſobedience and rebellion; with too many other evils, wherewith forraine converſation hath indangered the infection of our peace? Lo here, deare Country-men, the fruit of your idle gaddings: Better perhaps might be had; but he was never acquainted at home, that knows not our nature to be like unto fire, which if there be any infection in the roome, drawes it ſtraight to it ſelfe: Or like unto Jet, which omitting all precious objects, gathers up ſtrawes and duſt. Ilanders have beene ever in an ill name. VVherefore? ſave onely for the confluence of forainers, which never come without the fraight of their nationall wickedneſſe. The experience whereof hath moved ſome witty Nations, both ancient and preſent, to ſhut themſelves up within their owne bounds, and to barre the intercourſe of ſtrangers, as thoſe that thought beſt to content themſelves with their owne faults. A corrupt diſpoſition, out of a naturall fertility, can both get and conceive evill alone; but if it be ſeconded by examples, by precepts, by encouragements, the Ocean it ſelfe hath not ſo much ſpawne as it: in all which regards, he hath eſcaped well, that returnes but what he carried; but he is worthy of memory, that returnes either more good, or leſſe evill. Some have come home perhaps more ſparing, others more ſubtile, others more outwardly courteous; others more capricious, ſome more tongue-free few ever better. And if themſelves be not ſenſible of their alterations, yet their Countrey and the Church of God feeles and rues them.

SECT. XXII.

LEt me therefore have leave to ſhut up this Diſcourſe with a double Sute, one to our Gentry, the other to ſupreme authority; both which ſhall come from the bottome of an heart unfainedly ſacrificed to the common good: neither ſpeake I words, but my very ſoule unto both. To the former my ſuite is, that they would be happy at home: God hath given us a world of our owne, wherein there is nothing wanting to earthly contentment. VVhither go ye then, worthy Countrymen, or what ſeeke yee? Here growes that wealth, which yee goe but to ſpend abroad: Here is that ſweet peace which the reſt of the world admires and envies: Here is that gracious and well-tempered government, which no Nation under Heaven may dare once offer to parallel: Here all liberall Arts raigne and triumph: And for pleaſure, either our earth, or our ſea yeelds us all thoſe dainties, which their native Regions enjoy but ſingle. Laſtly, here Heaven ſtands open, which to many other parts is barred on the out-ſide with ignorance or miſbeleefe. And ſhall our wantonneſſe contemne all this bounty of God, and carry us to ſeeke that which we ſhall finde no where but behinde us, but within us? Shall the affection of ſome frivolous toyes draw us away from the fruition of thoſe ſolid comforts, which are offered us within our owne doores? How many of ours, whom their juſt offence hath caſt out of the boſome of their Countrey, compare their exile with death, and can ſcarce abide to bid that breath welcome, which they are forced to draw in a foraine aire; and though freedome of conſcience entertaine them never ſo liberally abroad, yet reſolve either to live or dye at home; and doe we ſuffer our folly to baniſh us from thoſe contentments, which they are glad to redeeme with the hazard of their blood? are wee ſo little in our owne bookes, that wee can be content to purchaſe outlandiſh ſuperfluities, with the miſcarriage of our ſoules, with the danger of miſcarriage, with the likelihood of danger? Are we ſo fooliſh, that whiles we may ſweetly enjoy the ſetled eſtate of our Primogeniture, wee will needs bring upon our ſelves the curſe of Ruben, to runne abroad like water; whoſe quality it is, not eaſily to be kept within the proper bounds; yea, the curſe of Cain, to put our ſelves from the ſide of Eden, into the land of Nod, that is, of demigration? None of the leaſt imprecations, which David makes againſt Gods enemies, is, Make them like unto a wheele, O Lord. Motion is ever accompanied with unquietneſſe, and both argues, & cauſes imperfection, whereas the happy eſtate of heaven is deſcribed by reſt; whoſe glorious ſpheres in the meane time, doe ſo perpetually move, that they are never removed from their places. It is not the leaſt part either of wiſdome or happineſſe, to know when we are well. Shall we not be ſhameleſſely unthankfull, if we cannot ſing the note of that great Choriſter of God, My lot is falne to me in a good ground? Hath not the munificence of God made this Iland as it were an abridgment of this whole earth, in which he hath contrived (though in a leſſe letter) all the maine and materiall commodities of the greater world; and doe we make a priſon where God meant a Paradiſe? Enjoy therefore (happy Countrey-men) enjoy freely God and your ſelves; enrich your ſelves with your owne Mines, improve thoſe bleſſed opportunities which God hath given you, to your mutuall advantage; and care not to be like any but your ſelves.

Sect XXIII.

And if at any time theſe unworthy papers may fall betwixt the hands of my Soveraigne Maſter, or any of his grave and honourable Miniſters of State, let the meanneſſe of ſo weake and obſcure ſolicitors preſume to commend this matter to their deepeſt conſideration, and out of an honeſt zeale of the common ſafety, ſue to them for a more ſtrict reſtraint of that dangerous liberty, whereof too many are bold to carve to themſelves. Who can be ignorant of thoſe wiſe and wholeſome lawes, which are enacted already to this purpoſe? or of thoſe carefull and juſt cautions, wherewith the licences of Travell are ever limited? But what are we the better for Gods owne lawes, without execution? Or what are limits unto the lawleſſe? Good lawes are the hedges of the Common-wealth: juſt diſpenſations are as gates, or ſtiles in the hedge. If every ſtragler may at pleaſure caſt open a gap in this fence of the State, what are we the better for this quick-ſet, then if we lay open to the common? Who ſees not how familiarly our yong Recuſants immediatly upon their diſcloſing, are ſent over for their full hatching and making? Italy, Spaine, Artois, and now of late France it ſelfe provides neſts, and perches, and mewes for theſe birds birds, with the ſame confidence, wherewith we breed our owne at home; which when they are once well acquainted with the Romane lure, are ſent backe again fit for the prey. And as for thoſe of our owne feather: whereas the liberty of their travell is bounded chiefly with this double charge: one, that they have no converſation or conference with Jeſuites, or other dangerous perſons; the other, that they paſſe not into the dominions of the Kings enemies: both theſe are ſo commonly neglected, as if they were intended only for a verball formality; yea, as if the Prohibition meant to teach men what they ſhould doe. Every of our Novices hath learned to make no difference of men; and dare breathe in the poyſonous ayre of Italy it ſelfe, and touch the very pommell of the chaire of peſtilence. It is this licentious freedome (which we miſ-call Open hearted ingenuity) that undoes us. Doe we not ſee the wary cloſenes of our Adverſaries, which will not ſo much as abide one of our books (a mute ſollicitor) to harbour in any of their coaſts? How many of the Italian or Spaniſh Nobleſſe have we knowne allowed to venture their education in our Courts or Univerſities? Doe they lie thus at the locke, and doe we open our breſt, and diſplay our armes, and bid an enemy ſtrike where he liſt? Since then we have no more wit or care, then to be willingly guilty of our owne ſhame; oh that the hands of ſupreame Authority would be pleaſed to lock us within our owne doores, and to keepe the keyes at their owne girdle! And (to ſpeake truth) to what purpoſe are thoſe ſtrait and capitall inhibitions of the returne of our factious fugitives into this kingdome, if whiles the wicket is ſhut upon them, that they ſhould not come to us, the Poſterne be open to us, that we may goe to them? As all intercourſe is perilous, ſo that is moſt which is by our owne provocation. Here yet they dare but lurke in ſecret, and take only ſome ſudden ſnatches at a weake prey, like unto evening wolves, that never walke forth but under the cloake of the night; but in their owne territories, they can ſhew the Sunne their ſpoiles, and thinke this act worthy of garlands and trophees. Here we have maſtives to ſecure our flocks: there the prey goes ſtragling alone to the mouth of their dennes, without protection, without aſſiſtance, and offers to be devoured. Yee whom the choice of God hath made the great Shepheards of his people, whoſe charge it is to feed them by government, ſuffer not their ſimplicity to betray their lives unto the fangs of theſe cruell beaſts; but chaſe them home rather, from the wilfull ſearch of their owne perdition, and ſhut them up together in your ſtrong and ſpacious folds, that they may be at once ſafe, and yee glorious.

SECT. XXIV.

LAſtly, for thoſe whom neceſſary occaſions draw forth of their owne coaſts, (that we may have done with thoſe which like fooliſh Papiſts goe on pilgrimage to ſee another blocke better dreſſed then at home) let me ſay to them, as Simeon that prophetical Monk ſaid to the pillars which he whipped before the earthquake; Stand faſt, for ye ſhall be ſhaken. And therefore, as the Crane, when ſhe is to fly againſt an high wind, doth ballace her ſelfe with ſtones in her bill, that ſhe may cut the ayre with more ſteddines; ſo let them carefully fore-inſtruct and poiſe themſelves with the ſound knowledge of the principles of Religion, that they may not be carried about with every wind of doctrine: Whereto if they adde but thoſe leſſons which they are taught by the State, in their letters of paſſage, there may be hope they ſhall bring backe the ſame ſoules they carried. It was at leaſt an inclination to a fall, that Eve tooke boldneſſe to hold chat with the Serpent. And as ſubtill Lawyers deſire no more advantage in the quarrell which they would picke at conveyances, then many words: ſo neither doe our adverſaries. Whiles our eares are open, and our tongues free, they will hope well of our very denials. Error is crafty, and out of the power of his Rhetoricall inſinuations, oft-times carries away probability from truth. I remember in that famous Embaſſie of three Philoſophers which Athens ſent to Rome, Critolaus, Diogenes, and Carneades, there falling out many occaſions of diſcourſe, wiſe Cato perſwaded the Senate to a ſpeedy diſmiſſion of thoſe (otherwiſe wiſe welcome) gheſts, Becauſe (ſaid he) whiles Carneades diſputes, ſcarce any man A can diſcernt which is the truth. There is more danger of theſe ſpirituall Sophiſters, by how much the buſineſſe is more important, and their ſubtilty greater. Let our paſ-ſenger therefore (as that wiſe Grecian ſerved his fellowes) ſtop up his eares with waxe againſt theſe Syrens. Our Saviour would not give Satan audience even whiles he ſpake true; becauſe he knew that truth was but to countenance error. There is ever true corne ſtrowed under a pitfall: thoſe eares are full and weighty, which we dreſſe with Lime to deceive the poore birds in a ſnow. No fiſher lets downe an empty hooke, but cloathed with a proper and pleaſing bait. Theſe Impoſtors have no other errand, but deceit. If he love himſelfe, let him be afraid of their favours, and thinke their frownes ſafer then their ſmiles. And if at any time (as no fly is more importunate) they thruſt themſelves into his converſation, let him (as thoſe which B muſt neceſſarily paſſe by a carrion in the way) hold his breath, and haſten to be out

THE RIGHTEOVS MAMMON.

AN

HOSPITALL SERMON PREACHED IN THE SOLEMNE ASSEMBLY OF THE CITY ON Munday in Easter weeke, 1618.

By Jos. Hall.

Imprinted at London by R. H. 1641.

TO MY MUCH HONOR'D FRIEND,

Sir HENRY BAKER Knight and Baronet.

SIR,

AMongſt many, to whom my poore labours owe much for their acceptation, I know none that can challenge ſo deepe a debt as your ſelfe: If others have taſted of my well-meant papers, you have fed heartily on them; and ſo made them your own, that your memory may compare with others eyes, and your practiſe with the ſpeculation of others: Neither have your hand or tongue been niggardly diſſemblers of your ſpirituall gaine. Unto you therefore (to whoſe name I had long ſince in my deſires devoted my next) doe I ſend this meane preſent: A Sermon importunately deſired of many: That which the preſent Auditors found uſefull, the Preſſe ſhall communicate to poſterity; The gaine of either, or both, is no leſſe mine: I doubt not but you have already ſo acted that part of this diſcourſe which concerneth you, that the direction I give to others is but an Hiſtory of what you have done. And goe on happily (worthy Sir) in thoſe your holy courſes which ſhall lead you to immortality; and ſo uſe your riches, that they may be made up into a Crowne for your head in a better world: My hearty well-wiſhes ſhall not be wanting to you and your vertuous Lady, as whom you have obliged to be juſtly

Worceſter, April 14.

Yours,

JOS: HALL.

THE RIGHTEOUS MAMMON.

1. TIM. 6. 17.

Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor truſt in uncertaine riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy, &c.

THoſe things which are excellent, and beneficiall in their uſe, are dangerous in their miſcariage: It were loſt labour for me to perſwade you how good riches are: your paines and your cares are ſufficient proofes of your eſtimation; and how deadly the abuſe of them is many a ſoule feeles that cannot returne to complaine; There is, nothing more neceſſary therefore for a Chriſtian heart, then to bee rectified in the menaging of a proſperous eſtate; and to learn ſo to be happy here, that it may be more happy hereafter; a taſke which this Text of ours undertakes, and (if ye be not wanting to it and your ſelves) will be ſure to performe: what ſhould I need to entreat your attention (Right Honourable, right Worſhipfull, and beloved) to a buſineſſe ſo neere concerning you? The errand is Gods; the uſe of it yours.

I never held it ſafe to pull Scripture in peeces: theſe words fall alone into their parts. Timothy is ſet upon the ſpirituall Bench, and muſt give the charge. A charge, to whom? Of what? To whom? To the rich. Of what? what they muſt avoid, what they muſt indevour. What muſt they avoid? High-mindednes and truſt in wealth: what are the duties they muſt labour unto? Confidence in God; Beneficence to men: And every one of theſe is backed with a reaſon to inforce it: Why ſhould they not be high-minded? Their wealth is but in this world; Why ſhould they not truſt in riches? They are uncertaine. Why ſhould they truſt in God? He is a living God, and a liberall God: why ſhould they extend their Beneficence to men? By this they lay up to themſelves a ſure foundation; Here is work enough, you ſee, for my diſcourſe, and your practice: The God of Heaven bleſſe it in both our hands.

The Charge hath (Janus like) a double aſpect; one that looks up to S. Paul, the other that lookes downe to Timothy, and from him to the rich: In the firſt there is Apoſtolicall ſuperioritie; for (παράγγελλε) Charge thou, refers to παράγγελλω σοι verſ. 13. I Charge thee; ſo Paul charges Timothy to charge the rich; He that gives the Charge, if he be not the chiefe of the Bench, yet he is greater then the Jury. The firſt foundation of the Church is laid in an inequality, and hath ever ſince ſo continued; There can be no harmony, where all the ſtrings or voices are of one tenor; In the latter, as it lookes on Timothy, it caries in it Epiſcopall power, Evangelicall ſufficiency. Epiſcopall power: for this Charge is by the vulgar turned, and the Tranſlation of the Syriac, Præcipe, command; and ſo doe we tranſlate it in the firſt of this Epiſtle, and and the third verſe; Timothy was left at Epheſus (ἵνα παραγγείλῃ) to command.

The rich are commonly great; Nobility in the account of God is joyned with wealth; Curſe not the King in thy thought, nor the rich in thy Bed-Chamber, ſaith Salomon; ſo Dives at whoſe gates Lazarus lay, is by ſome no meane ones gheſſed to bee Herod, or ſome other King; and ſo are Jobs friends termed by the ſeventy: yea, the rich is not onely a little King among his neighbours, but Dives, quaſi divus; as a petty god to his underlings: and yet even the rich man that (as Salomon notes) ſpeakes with command unto others, he muſt be ſpoken to with command. Command the rich. That fooliſh ſhaveling ſoared too high a pitch, when in his imperious Bull he commands the Angels; Francis of Aſſiſe and he were both of a Diet; But we may ſafely ſay, that all powers below the Angels, are lyable to our ſpirituall Charge; and this Command implyes obedience; Elſe to what purpoſe doe we command and go without? Chriſt gave us the keyes, (for that which the Romaniſts would plead out of Origen, of Claves cœli, The keyes of heaven to the reſt, and Claves cœlorum, The keyes of heavens to Peter, is a diſtinction without a difference;) What becomes of them? That I may not ſay, on ſome of our hands they are ſuffered to ruſt for want of uſe; on others (as the Pontificians) the wards are altered, ſo as they can neither open nor ſhut: ſure I am; that (if they be not loſt on their behalfe, whether in diſ-uſe, or abuſe) the power of them is loſt in the hearts of many: They have ſecret pick-locks of their owne making, Preſumption and Security, whereby they can open heaven-gates, though double-locked by our cenſures, and ſhut the gates of hell at pleaſure, which their owne ſinnes have opened wide to receive them. What uſe is there of us, but in our chaire? and there, but to be heard, and ſeene? Even in this ſenſe ſpectaculo facti ſumus; we are to gaze on, not to imploy. Now ye are full, now ye are rich, ye raigne as Kings without us; wee are weake, ye are ſtrong; yee are Honourable, but we are deſpiſed. It was well noted by one, that the good father of the prodigall, though he might himſelfe have brought forth the prime robe, or have led his ſonne into his wardrope to take it, yet hee commands his ſervants to bring it forth (Proferte ſtolam) becauſe he would bring meanes into credit, becauſe he would have his ſonne beholden to his ſervants, for their glory. It is a bold word, but a true one, Yee ſhall never weare the long white robe, unleſſe his ſervants your Miniſters bring it, and put it on. He that can ſave you without us, will not ſave you, but by us: He hath not tyed himſelfe to meanes, man he hath; He could create you immediately to himſelfe: but hee will have you begotten by the immortall ſeed of your ſpirituall Fathers. Woe be to you therefore, if our word have loſt the power of it in you: you have loſt your right in heaven: Let us never come there, if you can come thither ordinarily without us. The words of the wiſe (ſaith Salomon) are like goades, like nailes; But if theſe goads light upon the ſkin of a Leviathan, who eſteemes Iron as ſtraw, and braſſe as rotten wood; If theſe nailes meet with Iron, or marble in their driving, that they turne againe: What ſhall we ſay, but our Goſpell is hid to them that periſh; and woe unto your ſoules, for ye have rewarded evill to your ſelves.

Hitherto the power implied in this charge; the ſufficiency followeth: This Evangelicus muſt bee parangelicus; like as the fore-runner of Chriſt had a charge for all ſorts, ſo muſt his followers; So hath Timothy in this Epiſtle, A charge for wives, for Biſhops, for Deacons, for widows, for ſervants, and here for the rich. He muſt charge; and how ſhall he charge, if he have neither ſhot nor powder. It is no bragge to ſay that no nation under Heaven ſince the Goſpell look't forth into the world, ever had ſo many, ſo learned Teachers as this Iland hath at this day. Hierome ſaid of old to his Paulinus, De Hieroſolymis & de Britannia, æqualiter patet aula cæleſtis: Heaven is open in Britaine as in Hieruſalem. It holds well, if you take it for a propheticall compariſon betixt Jeruſalem as it had beene, and Britaine as it ſhould be. Jeruſalem the type of Gods Church upon earth, in the glory of all her legall magnificence, was never more bleſſed then this Church of ours: For the Northerne part of it beyond the Twede, we ſaw not, wee heard not of a Congregation (whereof indeed there is not ſo great frequence) without a preaching Miniſter; and though their maintenance hath beene generally but ſmall, yet their paines have beene great, and their Maldonat could incline to that: in locum.

Somewhat above eight hundred.

A succeſſe ſutable: And now lately, his Sacred Majeſtie in his laſt yeeres journey (as if the Sunne did out of compaſſion goe beyoud his Tropick Line, to give heat unto the Northerne Climate) hath ſo ordered it, that their meanes ſhall bee anſwerable to their labours; ſo as both Paſtors and People profeſſe themſelves mutually bleſſed in each other; and bleſſe God and their King for this bleſſedneſſe.

As for the learning and ſufficiency of thoſe Teachers (whether Prelats or Presbyters) our eares, were for ſome of them ſufficient witneſſes; and we are not worthy of our eares if our tongues doe not thankefully proclaime it to the world. As for this Southerne part, when I conſider the face of our Church in an univerſality, me thinkes I ſee the firmament in a cleare night, beſpangled with goodly ſtarres of all magnitudes, that yeeld a pleaſing diverſitie of light unto the earth; But withall through the incomparable multitude of Cures, and the incompetent proviſion of
B ſome, we cannot but ſee ſome of our people (eſpeciall in the utmoſt ſkirts) like to thoſe that live under the Southerne Pole, where the ſtarres are thinner ſet; and ſome ſtarres there are in our Hemiſphere, like thoſe little ſparkles in the Galaxy, or Milkie circle, wherein yee can ſcarce diſcern any light: The deſire of our hearts muſt be, that every Congregetion, every ſoule might have a Timothy to deliver the charge of God powerfully unto it, even with Saint Pauls charge of note: That every one which hath a charge, were (διδακτικὸς) able to give the charge; and every hearer (ὑποδεκτικὸς) ready to take it: Wherein I cannot but thankfully congratulate the happineſſe of this famous, City, which if in other riches it equalize the beſt, I am ſure in this it exceeds all. There is not a City under the cope of heaven ſo wealthy
C in the ſpirituall proviſion; yea, there are whole Countries in Chriſtendome, that have not ſo many learned Preachers, as are within theſe wals and liberties. Heare this yee Citizens, and be not proud, but thankfull; Others may exceede you in the glory of outward ſtructure, in the largeneſſe of extent, in the uniforme proportion of ſtreets, or ornaments of Temples, but your pulpits doe ſurpaſſe theirs; and if preaching can lift up Cities unto heaven, ye are not upon earth; Happy is it for you, if yee be well fed and taught; and woe be unto you, if you doe not think your ſelves happy.

Charge them, but whom? The rich. Man that came naked out of the wombe of the earth, was even then ſo rich, that all things were his; Heaven was his roofe or Canopie, earth his floore, the ſea his pond, the Sunne and Moone his Torches, all creatures his vaſſals; And if he loſt the fulneſſe of this Lordſhip, by being a ſlave to D ſinne, yet we have ſtill Dominium Gratificum, as Gerſon tearms it: every ſon of Abraham is heire of the world. But to make up the true reputation of wealth (for thus we may be as having all things, and poſſeſſing nothing) another right is required beſides ſpirituall, which is a civill and humane right; wherein I doubt not but our learned Wickleſ, and the famous Archbiſhop of Armach, and the more famous Chancellor of Paris (three renowned Divines of England, France, and Ireland) have had much wrong, whiles they are accuſed to teach, that men in theſe earthly things have no tenure but grace, no title but Charity: which queſtionleſſe they intended in foro interiori, in the Conſiſtory of God, not in the Common Pleas of men; in the Courts, not of Law, but of Conſcience, in which only it may fall out, that the Civill owner may be a ſpirituall uſurper, and the ſpirituall owner may bee a civill beggar. God
E frames his language to ours, and ſpeaking according to that Jus Gentium, whereon the diviſions of theſe earthly poſſeſſions are grounded, he cals ſome rich, others poor. Thoſe heretikes which called themſelves Apoſtolique (as ſome-body doth now at Rome) before the time of Epiphanius and Auguſtine, which taught the unlawfulneſſe of all earthly properties, ſeconded in Auſtins time, by our countryman Pelagius, and in our times by ſome of the illuminate Elders of Munſter, are not worth confutation; or if they were, our Apoſtle hath done it to our hands, in this one word, Rich; for there can bee neither rich nor poore in a communitie; Neither doth he ſay, Charge men that they be not rich, but, Charge the rich that they be not high-minded.

With theſe let us couple our ignorant Votaries, that place holineſſe in want; with whom, their very croſſes cannot deliver their coine from ſinne; which, to make good the rule, that it is better to give then to receive, give all they have away at once for but a licence to begge for ever. Did theſe men ever heare that the bleſſing of God maketh rich? That the wings of riches carry them up to heaven? That the crowne of the wiſe is their wealth? Do they not know, that if Lazarus were poore, yet Abraham was rich, and Pium Pauperem ſuſcepit ſinus divitis; It was the happineſſe of poore Lazarus, that he was lodged in the boſome of rich Abraham. I am no whit afraid, (O ye rich Citizens) leſt this paradox of our holy Mendicants ſhall make you out of love with your wealth; I feare, ſome of you would be rich, though yee might not; Now we tell you from him, whoſe title is Rich in Mercy, that ye may be at once rich and holy; In divitiis cupiditatem reprehendit, non facultatem, ſaith Auſtine: It is a true word of the ſonne of Sirach, which I would have you cary home with you, and write it as a fit Motto, in your Counting-houſe; Bona eſt ſubſtantia, ſi non ſit peccatum in conſcientia: Subſtance doth well in the hand, if there bee no evill in the heart, Eccleſiaſticus 13. 25.

The Rich.

Rom 4.31.

Titulum Charitatis Dom. à Soto de Juſtitia & Jure.

Charge the rich. Who are they? Thereis nothing wherein is greater miſpriſion. One man in Laodician conceitednes thinks himſelfe rich, when hee hath nothing; Another in a covetous humor thinks he hath nothing, when he is rich; and how eaſie is it for another man to miſtake us, if we may thus eaſily miſtake our ſelves? I feare, ſome of you are like the Pageants of your great ſolemnities, wherein there is the ſhew of a ſolid body, whether of a Lion, or Elephant, or Unicorn: but if they be curiouſly lookt into, there is nothing but cloth, and ſticks, and ayre. Others of you contrarily, are like a diſſembling Covent, that profeſſes poverty, and purchaſes Lordſhips. The very ſame did Salomon obſerve in his time, in the great Burgomaſters of Jeruſalem, Pro. 13.7. For the avoyding of both extremes, let us inquire who is rich. And though greatneſſe and riches bee in ranke of thoſe things which are held to have no abſolute determination, but conſiſt rather in reſpect and compariſon: (for a rich Farmer is yet poore to a rich Merchant, and a rich Merchant is but poore to a Prince, and he to ſome great Emperor: That great Mammoniſt would ſay, he is rich, that can maintaine an Armie: A poore man would ſay, according to that Italian inſcription, He is rich that wants not bread;) Yet certainely there are certain generall ſtakes and bounds, which divide betwixt poverty & competency, betwixt competency & wealth; As there were variety of ſhekels among the Jewes, yet there was one ſhekel of the Sanctuary that varied not; Who then is rich? I muſt give you a double anſwer, one will not ſerve. The one, according to true morality; the other, according to vulgar uſe: In the firſt he is rich that hath enough, whether the world think ſo or not; Even Eſau, though he were poore in grace, yet in eſtate he was rich: I have enough my brother. And he that ſaid Soul, thou haſt goods enow for many yeeres, was almoſt ſo; It was not his fault that he thought he had enough, but that he meant to lye down, and wallow in it. A mans wealth or poverty is moſtwhat in himſelfe; And though nature have profeſſed to read unto heathen men this leſſon of wiſe moderation, yet it hath beene ſeldome ſeene, that any thing but true piety, hath taught them to take it out; Godlineſſe is great gaine with contentment: Victus & veſtitus divitiæ Chriſtianorum, ſaith Hierom: Food and raiment are the Chriſtians wealth; Thoſe men therefore, which are ſtill in the horſe-leeches note, ſucking and craving; which, like Pharaohs leane kine, are ever feeding, and never the fatter, are as farre from true wealth, as they would be from poverty; and further I am ſure they cannot bee, and not further from wealth then godlineſſe. Having, is the meaſure of outward wealth: but it is thinking that muſt meaſure the inward thoughts, I ſay of contentment, cheerefulneſſe, and thankfulneſſe, which if ye want, it is not either of both the Indies that can make you rich.

In the latter, he is rich, that hath more then enough, whether he thinke ſo or no: He that hath the poſſeſſion (whether civill or naturall) of more then neceſſary. Now if neceſſary and ſuperfluous ſeeme as hard to define as rich; know, there are juſt limits for both theſe: Superfluous is defined by neceſſary; for what is above neceſſary, is ſuperfluous; There is then a double neceſſary; One, of nature, the other, of eſtate: That is neceſſary to nature, without which wee cannot live; that to eſtate, without which wee cannot live well: That is neceſſary to eſtate, which were ſuperfluous

A fluous to nature; and that which were ſuperfluous to nature, is not ſo much as neceſſary to eſtate; Nature goes ſingle, and beares little breadth; Eſtate goes ever with a traine; The neceſſitie of nature admits little difference, eſpecially for quantities, the neceſſity of eſtate requires as many diverſities, as there are ſeverall degrees of humane conditions, and ſeverall circumſtances in thoſe degrees. Juſtly therefore doe the Schoolemen and Caſuiſts teach, that this neceſſary to the decency of eſtate, doth not conſiſt in puncto individuo, but hath much latitude; That is neceſſary to ſcarlet, which to ruſſet were ſuperfluous; that is but neceſſary to a Nobleman, which to an Eſquire were ſuperfluous; That were ſuperfluous to a Peere, which to a Prince is but neceſſary: That is neceſſary to the father of a family, which to a ſingle man were ſuperfluous: Neither doth this neceſſity looke onely to the preſent, but to the future; not to what may be (which were an endleſſe proſpect)
B but to what muſt be, the marriage of a daughter, the education of a ſonne, the honeſt proviſion for poſterity: He that in juſt eſtimate can goe beyond the bounds of this neceſſary, enters into the ſuperfluous eſtate, and may well paſſe with the world for rich.

Such a one is rich; let him looke how he became ſo: That God which can allow you to be rich, will not allow you all waies to your wealth: He hath ſet up a golden Goale, to which he allowes you all to run, but yee muſt keepe the beaten rode of honeſty, juſtice, charity, and truth; if ye will leave this path, and will be croſſing over a ſhorter cut thorow by-wayes of your owne, yee may bee rich with a vengeance. The heathen Poet (one of them whom S. Paul cited) could obſerve (ὁ δολὸς
C πλούσιος ταχὺς ἀλλὰ οὐ δίκαιος) which Salomon tranſlates to us, He that makes haſte to be rich, ſhall not be innocent. If yee have filled your bags with fraud, uſury, extortion, this gaine may be hony in your mouth, but it will be gravell in your throat, and poiſon in your ſoule. There are ſome meanes of wealth in an ill name, as thoſe two truſty ſervants of Mammon, Uſe and Brocage; there are others as bad as they, little ſaid to. Since I ſpeake to Citizens, let me be bold to ſay, There is not ſo arrant uſury in letting of money, as in ſale of wares. This oppreſſion is both more, and more univerſall. There are two maximes that doe uſually miſ-lead men of Traffique, all the world over: The one is, Res valet quanti vendi poteſt, A thing is worth what it may be ſold for; The other Caveat emptor, At the buyers perill: The one is in regard of the price; the other, in regard of the qualitie of the wares. In the firſt, whereas
D our Caſuiſts have ſet three prices, low, meane, rigorous, they ſuper-adde a fourth, exceſſive, and think they may lawfully get what they can: Where they ſhall once finde, that as the rigorous priee is a ſtraine of charitie, ſo the exceſſive is a violation of juſtice, neither doth this gaine differ ought from theft, but that it is honeſted by a faire coozenage. In the ſecond; It matters not how defective the meaſure be, how vicious the ſubſtance, how falſe the kinde, let this be the buyers care, No man is bound to buy, no man can doe wrong to himſelf; Such wares muſt be put off, (perhaps not to cuſtomers) with concealment of faults, if not with proteſtations of faultleſneſſe. In Salomons time, It is naught, it is naught, ſaid the buyer, and when he was gone apart, he boaſted; But now, It is good, it is good, ſaith the ſeller, and when the buyer is gone, he boaſteth of his deceit. Let me appeale to your boſomes, if theſe
E two, Exceſſe of price, and deficiency of worth have not beene the moſt ſerviceable factors to bring in ſome of your wealth. And let me tell you, if theſe be guilty of your gaines, you may miſ-name your trades, Myſteries: but ſure theſe trickes are myſteries of iniquitie. It were envious and infinite to arraigne the ſeverall ſciences of their adulteration and fraud; let me rather ſhut them all up together in that feareſull ſentence of wiſe Salomon, The gathering of treaſure, by a deceitfull tongue, is a vanity toſſed to and fro of them that ſeeke death: and (if you pleaſe) read on the next verſe, The robbery of the wicked ſhall deſtroy them, Search your cheſt, ſearch your hearts (O all yee that heare me this day) and if any of you finde any of this adulterine gold amongſt your heapes, away with it, as ye love your ſelves away with it: Elſe know (that as Chryſoſtome wittily) ye have lockt up a theefe in your Counting-houſe, which will carrie away all, and if ye looke not to it the ſooner, your ſoules with it.

Menander. Prov. 28.20.

Prov. 21.6.

In this world.

Rich in this world, not of it. As S. John diſtinguiſheth of being in the Church, and being of it, ſo doth S. Paul of the world; Thoſe are the rich of the world, which are worldlings in heart, as well as in eſtate; Thoſe are rich in the world, whoſe eſtate is below, whoſe hearts are above: The rich of the world are in it, but the rich in the world are not of it: Marvell not there ſhould bee ſo much difference in little particles; The time was when this very difference of ἐκ and ἐν, ſet the world together by the eares in the controverſie of Eutyches, and Dioſcorus; and here, you ſee, there is no leſſe diſtance between them, then betwixt heaven and earth: If Timothy or S. Paul either ſhould have charged the rich of the world, he had charmed a deafe Adder; yea perhaps even with this charge (like a ruſty or ill wrought Peece) they had recoyled in his face with thoſe Athenians, What will this babbler ſay? The Prophet is a foole, the ſpirituall man is mad, as they ſay in the Prophet: There is no good to be done on a worldly heart, it is both hard and cold; Let the Smith ſtrike a barre new-come out of the fire (though it bee iron) it bowes; let him ſtrike on his anvile never ſo long, there is no impreſſion, but rather a rebound of the ſtroke. The Maker of all hearts tels us, that the unregenerate man hath Cor lapideum, an heart of ſtone: and to what purpoſe doe we with our venerable Countryman preach to an heape of ſtones? Will yee have the reaſon why wee preach our ſelves hoarſe and dead, and prevaile not? The world is in mens eares, the world is in their hearts; and they are not in the world, but of it; and there can be nothing in them that are of the world, but that which is enmity to God, and that which repaies with enmitie; ſo as there is no way for them but periſhing with the world: It is for thoſe onely whoſe hearts are not in their bags, to receive the charge from God for their wealth, and to returne glory to him by it: To theſe (whereof I hope here are many before me) muſt Timothies charge, and my ſpeech be directed: Let theſe heare their condition firſt, and then their duty: Their condition, They are rich, but In this world; For diſtinction, for limitation; one implies the eſtate of their riches, the other the time.

Their eſtate, as learned Beza, that they are but worldly riches. The very word imports that there are other riches, not of the world; as Auſtin diſtinguiſhes of Pauper in animo, and ſacculo; poore in minde, and in purſe; ſo may we of the rich: There is a ſpirituall wealth, as well as a ſecular; and ſo true and pretious is the ſpirituall, that the ſecular wealth is but ſtarke beggery to it: This outward wealth is in acres of earth, in the bowels of the earth, the fruits of the earth, beaſts of the earth; and all of it is valued by peeces of earth, and one mouthfull of earth makes an end of all. Who knows not that earth is the baſeſt peece of the world, and yet earth is at the end of all theſe riches, and all of them end in the earth? See what it is that the world dotes and dreams of; (for theſe earthly hopes, as the divine Philoſopher ſaid, are but dreames of the waking) even Nebuchadnezzars image, a compoſition of metals, and the foot of all is clay. Earthly men tread upon their felicity, and yet have not the wit to contei[illegible] it, and to ſeek a better, which is the ſpirituall wealth; the cabinet whereof is the ſo[illegible] the treaſure in it, God himſelfe. O happy reſolution of that bleſſed Father, Omnis mihi copia, quæ Deus meus non eſt, egeſtas eſt: All wealth beſides my God, is penury. Ambiant terrena, ſaith another: Let the Gentiles ſeeke after earthly things, which have not right to heavenly; let them deſire the preſent, which beleeve not the future; The Chriſtians wealth is his Saviour: and how can he complaine of meaſure, that hath the author of all? What ſhould I need to ſay more of the Chriſtian heart? He is rich in God: and therefore well may he ſing that contented ditty of the Pſalmiſt, Funes ceciderunt mihi in præclaris: My lot is falne in a good ground, and I have a goodly heritage. Oh that it could be our ambition that Nazianzen reports of his Philagrius, lutum contemnere, to ſcorne this baſe and (pardon an homly word) dirty god of the world, and to aſpire unto the true riches! And when Satan ſhall offer to greaze us in the fiſt, to remit but a little of the rigor of a good conſcience, we could caſt it in his face with S. Peters indignation, Thy gold and thy ſilver periſh with thee!

Auſtin.

The eſtate of wealth is not more deſcribed by this world, then the time. For (ⁿαἰὼν) when it is absolutely spoken, be, as the Philosopher (ᵇἀΐδιον) when it is restrained with a (ᶜνῦν) it is scarce a time, and at the most, is turned justly seculum, à sequendo, as Isidore. Like as the same word in the Hebrew, that signifies eternity, at other times signifies but fifty yeares, the compasse of a Jubilee; So as (νῦν αἰὼν) is but the space of humane life, which how short soever, is the utmost extent of the use of worldly riches. Wealth is like unto words, by imposition, not naturall; for commodities are as they are commonly valued; we know, bracelets of glasse, and copper chaines, and little bels, and such like trifles, are good merchandise some-where, though contemptible with us; and those things which the Indians regard not, Europe holds precious. What are coines where their use and valuation ceases? The Patars, and Souses, and Deniers, and Quart-d'escus, that are currant beyond the water, serve but for counters to us: Thus it is with all our wealth. Consider, I beseech you, that all our Crownes, and Soveraynes, and peeces and halfe-peeces, and Duckats, and double Duckats, are currant but to the brim of the grave, there they cease; and we justly laugh at the folly of those Easterne Pagans, which put coyne into the dead mans hand for his provision in another world: What should we doe therefore, if we will be provident Travellers, but make over our money here, to receive it by exchange in the world to come? It is our Saviours counsell, Make you friends of the unrighteous Mammon, that they may receive you into everlasting habitations. And as a Father saies sweetly, If yee will bee wise Merchants, thrifty and happy usurers, part with that which you cannot keepe, that you may gaine that you cannot lose: Which that ye may doe, both in preparation of mind, and (when need is) in a charitable abdication, hearken to the Duties which God layes upon you. The remove all of evill must make roome for good: First therefore our Apostle would have our hearts cleared of evill dispositions, then setled in good: The evill dispositions that doe commonly attend wealth, are Pride and Misconfidence: Against these our Apostle bendeth his charge, That they bee not hye-minded; that they trust not in uncertaine riches.

a World.
c Now.

That they be not hie minded.

For the first; It is strange to see how this earthly drosse, which is of it selfe heavy, and therefore naturally sincks downward, should raise up the heart of man; and yet it commonly caries a man up, even to a double pitch of pride, one above others, the other above himselfe: Above others in contempt, above himselfe in over-weening: The poore and proud is the Wisemans monster, but the proud and rich are no news: It is against all reason, that metals should make difference of reasonable men, of Christians; for as that wise Lawgiver said, A free man can be valued at no price: Yet Salomon noted in his time, The rich rules the poore; not the wise: and Siracides in his, The rich speakes proudly, and what fellow is this? and Saint James in his, The man with the gold ring looks to sit highest. And not to cast back our eyes, doe yee not see it thus in our times? If a man be but worth a foot-cloth, how big he lookes on the inferiour passengers? and if he have purchased a little more land, or title then his neighbours, you shall see it in his garbe; if he command, it is imperiously, with sirrah, and fellow; If he salute, it is overly, with a surly and silent nod; if he speake, it is oracles; if he walke, it is with grace; if he controll, it is in the killing accent; if he entertaine, it is with insolence; and what soever he doth, he is not as he was, not (as the Pharisee saies) like other men. He looks upon vulgar men, as if they were made to serve him, and should thinke themselves happy to be commanded: and if he be crossed a little, he swels like the sea in a storme: Let it bee by his equall, hee cares more for an affront, then for death, or hell; Let it be by his inferior, (although in a just cause) that man shall be sure to be crusht to death for his presumption: And alas, when all is done, after these hie termes, all this is but a man, and (God knowes) a foolish one too, whom a little earthly trash can affect so deeply.

Neither doth this pride raise a man more above others, then above himselfe: And what wonder is it if he will not know his poore neighbours, which hath forgotten himselfe? As Saul was changed to another man presently upon his anointing, so are men upon their advancement; and according to our ordinary Proverb, Their good and their blood rises together; Now it may not bee taken as it hath beene; Other cariage, carriage, other faſhions are fit for them; their attire, fare, retinue, houſes, furniture diſpleaſe them, new muſt be had; together with coaches, and lacquies, and all the equipage of greatneſſe: Theſe things (that no man miſtake me) I miſlike not: they are fit for thoſe that are fit for them. Charity is not ſtrait-laced, but yeelds much latitude to the lawfull uſe of indifferent things; although it is one of Salomons vanities, that ſervants ſhould ride on horſe-back; and he tels us it becomes not a ſwine to be ring'd with gold) but it is the heart that maketh all theſe evill: when that is puft up with theſe windy vanities, and hath learned to borrow that part of the devils ſpeech, All theſe things are mine; and can ſay with him that was turned into a beaſt, Is not this great Babel that I have built? or with that other patterne of pride, I ſit as a Queene, I am, and there is none beſides me. Now all theſe turne into ſinne.

The buſh that hangs out, ſhews what we may looke for within? Whither doth the conceit of a little inheritance tranſport the Gallants of our time? O God, what a world of vanity haſt thou ſerved us to? I am aſham'd to thinke that the Goſpell of Chriſt ſhould be diſgraced with ſuch diſguiſed clients. Are they Chriſtians, or Antikes in ſome Carnevale, or childrens puppets that are thus dreſſed? Pardon, I beſeech you, men brethren, and fathers, this my juſt and holy impatience, that could never expreſſe it ſelfe in a more ſolemne aſſemby (although I perceive, thoſe whom it moſt concernes, are not ſo devout as to be preſent.) Who can without indignation looke upon the prodigies which this miſ-imagination produces in that other ſex, to the ſhame of their huſbands, the ſcorne of Religion, the damnation of their owne ſoules? Imagine one of our fore-fathers were alive againe, and ſhould ſee one of theſe his gay daughters walke in Cheape-ſide before him; what doe you thinke hee would thinke it were? Here is nothing to be ſeene but a verdingale, a yellow ruffe, and a periwig, with perhaps ſome fethers waving in the top; three things for which he could not tell how to find a name: Sure, he could not but ſtand amazed, to think what new creature the times had yeelded ſince he was a man: and if then he ſhould run before her, to ſee if by the foreſide hee might gheſſe what it were, when his eyes ſhould meet with a poudred frizle, a painted hide ſhadowed with a fan not more painted, breſts diſplayd, and a looſe locke erring wantonly over her ſhoulders, betwixt a painted cloth and ſkinne; how would he yet more bleſſe himſelf to think, what mixture in nature could be guilty of ſuch a monſter? Is this (thinks he) the fleſh and blood? is this the haire? is this the ſhape of a woman? or hath nature repented of her worke ſince my daies, and begunne a new frame? It is no marvell if their forefathers could not know them, God himſelf that made them, will never acknowledge that face he never made, the hayre that he never made theirs, the body that is aſham'd of the Maker, the ſoule that thus diſguiſes the body.

Let me therefore ſay to theſe dames, as Benet ſaid to Totilaes ſervant; Depone filia, quod portas, quia non eſt tuum; Lay downe that ye weare, it is none of your owne. Let me perſwade them (for that can work moſt) that they doe all this in their owne wrong. All the world knows that no man will rough-caſt a marble wall, but mud, or unpoliſht ragge: that beauty is like truth, never ſo glorious as when it goes plaineſt; that falſe art, inſtead of mending nature, marres it. But if none of our perſwaſions can prevaile, Heare this, ye gariſh Popingayes of our time, if you will not bee aſhamed to cloath your ſelves in this ſhameleſſe faſhon, God ſhall cloath you with ſhame and confuſion: heare this ye plaiſter faced Jezabels, if you will not leave your dawbing, and your high waſhes, God will one day waſh them off with fire and brimſtone.

I grant, it is not wealth alone that is acceſſary to this pride; there are ſome that (with the Cynick, or that worſe dogge, the patcht Ciſtertian) are proud of raggs; there are others, that are rich of nothing but cloathes, ſomewhat like to Nazianzens country of Oziſala, that abounded in flowres, but was barren of corne, their cloathes are more worth then all the reſt; as we uſe to ſay of the Elder, that the flowre of it is more worth then all the tree beſides; but if there be any other cauſes of our hye-mindedneſſe, wealth is one, which doth ordinarily lift up our heads above our ſelves, above others; and if there be here any of theſe empty bladders, that are puft

A up with the wind of conceit, give me leave to prick them a little; and first, let me tell them they may have much, and be never the better: The chimney over-lookes all the reſt of the houſe, is it not (for all that) the very baſeſt peece of the building? The very heathen man could obſerve (πολλοῖς ὁ δαίμων, &c.) That God gives many a man wealth for their greater miſchiefe: As the Iſraelites were rich in Quailes, but their ſawce was ſuch, that famine had been better; little cauſe had they to be proud that they were fed with meate of Princes, with the bread of Angels, whiles that which they put into their mouthes, God fetcht out of their noſtrils. Haman was proud that he alone was called to the honor of Eſters feaſt: this advancement raiſed him fifty cubits higher, to a ſtately gibbet. If your wealth be to any of you an occaſion of falling; if your gold be turned into fetters, it had been better for you to have lived beggers. Let me tell them next, of the folly of this pride; They are B proud of that which is none of theirs, That which law and caſe-divinity ſpeak of life, that man is not dominus vitæ ſuæ, ſed cuſtos, is as true of wealth: Nature can tell him in the Philoſopher, that he is not Dominus, but Colonus, not the Lord, but the Farmer. It is a juſt obſervation of Philo, that God only by a propriety is ſtiled the Poſſeſſor of heaven and earth, by Melchiſedech in his ſpeech to Abraham; we are only the tenants, and that at the will of the Lord; At the moſt (if we will as Divines) we have jus ad rem, not dominium in rem, right to theſe earthly things, not Lordſhip over them; but right of favor from their proprietarie and Lord in heaven, and that liable to account. Doe we not laugh at the groome that is proud of his Maſters horſe, or ſome vaine whiffler, that is proud of a borrowed chaine? So ridiculous are C we to be puft up with that, whereof we muſt needs ſay, with the poore man of the hatchet, Alas Maſter, it is but borrowed; & whereof our account ſhall be ſo much more great and difficult, as our receipt is more. Hath God therfore laded you with theſe earthly riches? be ye like unto the full eare of corne, hang down your heads in true humility toward that earth from which you came: And if your ſtalke be ſo ſtiffe, that it beares up above the reſt of your ridge, looke up to heaven, not in the thoughts of pride, but in the humble vowes of thankfulneſſe, and be not high-minded but feare.

Hitherto of the high-mindedneſſe that followes wealth; Now where our pride is there will be our confidence: As the wealthy therefore may not be proud of their riches, ſo they may not truſt in them: What is this truſt, but the ſetting of our hearts D upon them, the placing of our joy and contentment in them; in a word, the making of them our beſt friend, our patron, our idoll, our god? This the true and jelous God cannot abide, and yet nothing is more ordinary; The rich mans wealth is his ſtrong City, ſaith Salomon: and where ſhould a man thinke himſelfe ſafe, but in his fort? He ſees Mammon can doe ſo much, and heares him talke of doing ſo much more, it is no marvell if he yeeld to truſt him: Mammon is ſo proud a boaſter, that his clients which beleeve in him cannot chuſe but be cõfidẽt of him; For what doth he not brag to doe? Silver anſwers all, ſaith Salomon. That we grant; although we would be loath it could anſwer to truth, to juſtice, to judgment: But yet more, he vaunts to procure all, to pacifie all, to conquer all; He ſayes, he can procure all ſecular offices, titles, dignities, yea (I would I might not lay in ſome ſacrilegious and perjured wret- E ches) the ſacred promotions of the Church: and ye know that old ſong of the Pope and his Romane trafficke, Claves, Altaria, Chriſtum: Yea, fooliſh Magus makes full account, the Holy Ghoſt himſelfe may be had for mony: He ſayes he can pacifie all; A gift in the boſome appeaſes wrath; yea, he ſayes (looke to it ye that ſit in the ſeats of judicature) he can ſometimes bribe off ſinnes, and pervert judgment: He ſayes he can overcome all, according to the old Greeke verſe, Fight with ſilver lances; and you cannot faile of victory; yea, he would make us beleeve he thought this a bait to catch the Sonne of God himſelfe withall, (All theſe will I give thee.) Briefly he ſayes according to the French Proverbe, Silver does all. And let me tell you indeed, what Mammon can doe; He can barre the gates of hell to the unconſcionable ſoule, and help his followers to damnation: This he can doe; but for other things, howſoever with us men, the fooliſh Silver-ſmiths may ſhout out, Great is Mammon of the worldlings yet if we weigh his power aright, we ſhall conclude of Mammon (as Paracelſus doth of the Divell) that he is a baſe and beggerly ſpirit: For what, I beſeech you, can he doe? Can he make a man honeſt? Can he make him wiſe? Can he make him healthfull? Can he give a man to live more merrily, to feed more heartily, to ſleepe more quietly? Can he buy off the gout, cares, death, much leſſe the paines of another world? nay, doth he not bring all theſe? Goe to then, thou rich man; God is offended with thee, and meanes to plague thee with diſeaſe and death; Now try what thy bagges can doe; Begin firſt with God, and ſee whether thou canſt bribe him with thy gifts, and buy off his diſpleaſure; Wherewith ſhalt thou come before the Lord, and bow thy ſelfe before the high God? Will the Lord be pleaſed with thouſands of Rams, or with ten thouſand rivers of oyle? The ſilver is mine, and the gold is mine, ſaith the Lord of Hoſtes, Haggai 2. If that ſpeed not, goe to the ſergeant of God, death; ſee if thou canſt fee him, not to arreſt thee; He lookes thee ſternely in the face, and tells thee with Ehud, he hath a meſſage to thee from God, and bids thee with the Prophet, Set thine houſe in order, for thou muſt die; Yet, if he heare thee not, goe to the under-bayliffe of Death, diſeaſe; ſee if he can be wrought to forbeare thee: he anſwers thee with Laban, This thing is proceeded of the Lord, I cannot therefore ſay to thee evill or good. In ſumme, Diſeaſe will ſummon thee unto death; death will arreſt thee to the Judgment ſeat of God, God will paſſe his doome upon thee; and in all theſe, Riches availe not in the day of wrath: And who would be ſo mad as to truſt a friend that he knoweswill be ſure never to faile him but when he hath moſt need? Take heed therefore, as ye love your ſoules, how ye beſtow your Truſt upon riches: Ye may uſe them, and ſerve your ſelves of them; yea, ye may enjoy them in a Chriſtian moderation; God will allow it you: That praiſe which the Jeſuites Colledge at Granado gives of their Sanchez, that (though he lived where they had a very ſweet garden) yet he was never ſeen to touch a flower, and that he would rather dye than eat Salt, or Pepper, or ought that might give relliſh to his meat; like as that of ſome other Monkes, that they would not ſee the Sun, nor ſhift their cloathes, nor cleanſe their teeth, carries in it more ſuperſtition and auſterity and ſlovenry, then wit or grace: Wherefore hath God made his creatures but for uſe? This niggardſineſſe is injurious to the bounty of their Maker; we may uſe them, we may not truſt to them, we may ſerve our ſelves of them, we may not ſerve them; we may injoy them, we may not over-joy in them; ſo muſt we be affected to our goods, as Theoderic the good King of Aquitaine was with his play; In bonis jactibus tacet, in malis ridet, in neutris iraſcitur, in utriſque Philoſophatur: In good caſts he was ſilent; in ill, merry; in neither angry, a Philoſopher in both. But if we will be making our wealth a rivall unto God, now the jealouſie of God ſhall burne like fire: this is the way to bring a curſe upon our riches and us; if we leane upon this reed, it ſhall breake, and runne into our hand; and he that truſteth in riches ſhall fall, Prov. 11. 28.

Now as the diſdainfull rivall will be ſure to caſt reproaches upon his baſe competitor; ſo doth God, that we may ſee how unworthy riches are of our truſt, he tells us, they are uncertaine, yea uncertaintie it ſelfe. Were our wealth tyed to our life, it were uncertaine enough; what is that but a flower, a vapor, a tale, a dreame, a ſhadow, a dreame of a ſhadow, a thought, a nothing? What are great men but like Haileſtones, that leape up on the Tiles, and ſtraight fall downe againe, and lye ſtill, and melt away? But now, as we are certaine that our riches determine with our uncertaine life (for goods and life are both in a bottome, both are caſt away at once) ſo we cannot be certaine they will hold ſo long: Our life flyes haſtily away, but many times our riches have longer wings, and out-fly it. It was a witty obſervation of Baſil, that wealth roles along by a man, like as an heady ſtreame glides by the bankes: Time will molder away the very banke it waſheth, but the current ſtayes not for that, but ſpeeds forward from one elbow of earth unto another: ſo doth our wealth, even while we ſtay, it is gone. In our penall lawes there are more wayes to forfeit our goods then our lives; On our high-wayes, how many favorable theeves take the purſe, and ſave the life? And generally, our life is the tree, our wealth is the leaves or fruit; the tree ſtands ſtill, when the leaves are falne, the fruit beaten down:

In uncertaine riches.

Yea

A Yea many a one is like the Pine-tree, which (they say) if his barke be pulled off, lasts long, else it rots: so doth many a man live the longer for his losses: if therefore life and wealth strive whether is more uncertaine, wealth will sure carie it away. Job was yesterday the richest man in the East; to day he is so needy, that he is gone into a proverbe, As poore as Job: Belisarius the great and famous Commander, to whom Rome owed her life twice at least, came to Date obolum Belisario, one halfe-penny to Belisarius. What doe I instance? This is a point wherein many of you Citizens that are my Auditors this day, might rather read a lecture unto me; You could tell me how many you have knowne, reputed in your phrase, good men, which all on the sudden have shut up the shop-windowes, and broken for thousands: You could reckon up to me a Catalogue of them, whom either casuality of fire, or inundation
B of waters, or robbery of theeves, or negligence of servants, or suretiship for friends, or oversight of reckonings, or trusting of customers, or unfaithfulnesse of Factors, or inexpected falls of markets, or Piracy by Sea, or unskilfulnesse of a Pilot, or violence of tempests have brought to an hasty poverty; and could tell me that it is in the power of one gale of winde to make many of you either rich Merchants or beggers. Oh miserable uncertainty of this earthly pelfe, that stands upon so many hazards, yea that falls under them! who would trust it? who can dote upon it? what madnesse is it in those men, which (as Menot sayes) like unto hunters, that kill an horse of price, in the pursuit of an Hare worth nothing; endanger, yea cast away their soules upon this worthlesse and fickle trash? Glasses are pleasing vessels, yet because of their brittlenesse, who esteemes them pre-
C tious. All Salomons state was not comparable to one Tulip: his royall Crowne was not like the Crowne Imperiall of our Gardens; and yet because these are but flowers whose destiny is fading and burning, we regard them thereafter: No wise man bestowes much cost in painting mud-wals. What meane we (my beloved) to spend our lives and hearts upon these perishing treasures? It was a wise meditation of Nazianzen to his Asterius; that good is to no purpose, if it continue not; yea, there is no pleasant thing in the world, saith he, that hath so much joy in the welcome, as it hath sorrow in the farewell: Looke therefore upon these heapes, O ye wise-hearted Citizens, with careless eyes, as those things whose parting is certaine, whose stay is uncertaine; and say with that worthy Father; By all my wealth, and glory, and greatnesse, this alone have I gained, that I had some thing to which I D might prefer my Saviour. And know, that as Abraham whiles he was in his owne Countrey (it is Cyrils note) had never God appearing to him, save only to bid him goe forth: but after, when he was gone forth, had frequent visions of his Maker: So whiles in our affections we remain here below in our Cofers, we cannot have the comfortable assurances of the presence of God; but if we can abandon the love and trust of these earthly things, in the conscience of our obedience, now God shall appeare to us, and speake peace to our soules, and never shall we find cause to repent us of the change. Let me therefore conclude this point with that divine charge of our Saviour, Lay not up for your selves treasures on earth, where moth and rust doe corrupt, and theeves breake thorow and steale, but lay up for your selves treasures in E heaven.

Thus much of the Negative part of our charge: wherein we have dwelt so long, that we may scarce sojourne in the other: Trust not, but Trust: The heart of man is so conscious of his owne weaknesse, that it will not goe without a prop: and better a weake stay then none at all: Like as in matter of policy, the very state of Tyranny is preferred to the want of a King; the same breath therefore that withdrawes one refuge from us, substitutes a better; and in stead of Riches, which is the false god of the world, commends to us the true and living God of heaven and earth: Even as some good Carpenter raises up the studs, and in stead of a rotten groundsell, layes a sound; The same trust then must we give to God, which we may not give to riches, The object onely is changed, the act is not changed. Him must we esteeme above all things, to him must we looke up in all, on him must we depend for all, both protection and provision; from his goodnesse and mercy must we acknowledge all, and in him must we delight with contempt of all; and this is to Trust in God. It was a sweet ditty of the Psalmist, which we must all learne to sing, Bonum est confidere in Domino, It is good to trust in the Lord: Good, in respect of him, and good for us. For him, it is one of the best pieces of glory to be trusted-to: as, with us, Joseph holds, Potiphar cannot doe him a greater honor then in trusting him with all, And his glory is precious, that he cannot part with that to any creature; all other things he imparts willingly, and reserves nothing to himselfe but this: Beeing, life, knowledge, happinesse, are such blessings as are eminently, originally, essentially in God, and yet, Beeing he gives to all things, Life to many, Knowledge to some kinds of creatures, happinesse to some of these kinds: as for riches, he so gives them to his creature, that he keeps them not at all to himselfe; but as for his glory (whereof our trust is a part) he will not endure it communicated to Angell, or man; not to the best guest in heaven, much lesse to the drosse of earth. Whence is that curse not without an indignation, Cursed be the man that trusts in man; that maketh flesh his arm, yea or spirit either, besides the God of Spirits; Whom have I in heaven but thee? Herein therefore doe we justice to God, when we give him his owne, that is, his glory, our confidence.

But the greatest good is our owne; and God shewes much more mercy to us in allowing and inabling us to trust him, then we can doe justice in trusting him: For alas, he could in his just judgement glorifie himselfe in our not trusting him: in taking vengeance on us for not glorifying him: Our goodnesse reaches not to him, but his goodnesse reaches downe to us, in that our hearts are raised up to confidence in him. For, what safety, what inspeakable comfort is there in trusting to God? When our Saviour, in the last words of his Divine Farewell Sermon to his Disciples, would perswade them to confidence, he sayes θαρσειτε: and so doth the Angell to Paul in prison; a word that signifies boldnesse: implying that our confidence in God causeth boldnes and courage; and what is there in all the world that can worke the heart to so comfortable and unconquerable resolution, as our reposall upon God? The Lord is my trust, whom then can I feare? In the Lord put I my trust, how say ye then to my soule, Flee hence as a bird to the hills? Yea how oft doth David inferre upon this trust non confundar, I shall not be ashamed: And this case is generall, That they that put their trust in the Lord are as mount Sion that cannot be moved. Faith can remove mountaines, but the mountaines that are raised on faith are unremoveable. Here is a stay for you (O ye wealthy and great) worthy of your trust: If ye were Monarchs on earth, or Angels in heaven, ye could be no way safe but in this trust. How easie is it for him to enrich or impoverish you, to hoyse you up to the seats of honor, or to spurn you downe? What mynes, what Princes can raise you up to wealth, against him, without him? He can bid the winds and Seas favor your vessells, he can bid them sinke in a calme. The rich and the poore meet together, God is the maker of both. Prov. 22. Ye may trade, and toyle, and carke, and put up, and cast about, and at last sit you downe with a sigh of late repentance, and say, Except the Lord build the house they labour in vaine that build it: It is in vaine to rise early, and lye downe late, and eat the bread of sorrow. Unto how many of you may I say with the Prophet Haggai, Ye have sowne much, and bring in little; ye eat, and have not enough; ye drinke, but ye are not filled: ye cloath you, but ye be not warme, and he that earneth much puts his gayne in a broken bag. And whence is all this? Ye looked for much, and loe, it came to little: when ye brought it home, I did blow upon it, saith the Lord of Hosts. Behold how easie a thing it is for the God of heaven to blast all your substance; yea not only to diminish, but to curse it unto you, and to make you weary of it and of your selves. Oh cast your selves therefore into those Almighty hands: Seeke him in whom only you shall find true rest and happinesse: Honor him with your substance, that hath honored you with it: Trust not in riches, but trust in God.

Joh. 16. ult.

It is motive enough to your trust, that he is a God; all arguments are infolded in that one; yet this Text gives you certaine explicit inforcements of this confidence; Every one of these reasons (implying a secret kinde of disdainfull comparison betwixt the true God and the false) perswade you to trust in God: Riches are

but

A are but for this world, the true God is Lord of the other; and beginnes his glory, where the glory of the world ends: therefore trust in him. Riches are uncertaine, the true God is Amen, the first and the last, ever like himselfe, therefore trust in him. Riches are but a liveleſſe and ſenſeleſſe metall, the true God is a living God, therefore trust in him. Riches are but paſſives in gift, they cannot beſtow ſo much as themſelves, much leſſe ought beſides themſelves: the true God gives you all things to enjoy, therefore Trust in him: the two latter, becauſe they are more directly ſtood upon, and now fall into our way, require a further diſcourſe.

The living.

(El chai) the living God, is an ancient and uſuall title to the Almighty; eſpecially when he would diſgrace an unworthy rivall: As Saint Paul in his ſpeech to the Lyſtrians, oppoſes to their vaine Idols, the living God. Vivo ego, As I live, is the B oath of God for this purpoſe, as Hierom noteth; neither doe I remember any thing beſides his holineſſe, and his life that he ſweares by. When Moſes aſkt Gods name, he deſcribed himſelf by I AM. He is, he lives: and nothing is, nothing lives abſolutely, but he; all other things by participation from him. In all other things, their life and they are two; but God is his owne life, and the life of God is no other then the living God: and becauſe he is his owne life, he is eternall; for (as Thomas argues truely againſt the Gentiles) Nothing ceaſes to be, but by a ſeparation of life; and nothing can bee ſeparated from it ſelfe; for every ſeparation is a diviſion of one thing from another: Moſt juſtly therefore is he which is abſolute, ſimple, eternall in his being, called the living God: Although not only the life that he hath in himſelfe, but the life that hee gives to his creatures, challengeth a part in this title: A C glimpſe whereof perhaps the Heathen ſaw, when they called him Jupiter, (ζωυς) from (ζαω) which ſignifies to live, In him we live, (ſaith Saint Paul to his Athenians.) As light is from the Sunne, ſo is life from God, (which is the true ſoule of the world, and more; for without him it could not bee ſo much as a carcaſe; and ſpreads it ſelfe into all the animate creatures. Life (we ſay) is ſweet; and ſo it is indeed; the moſt excellent and precious thing that is derived from the common influence of God. There is nothing before life, but Being; and Being makes no diſtinction of things; for than can be nothing that hath no Being: Life makes the firſt and greateſt diviſion, Thoſe creatures therefore which have life, we eſteeme farre beyond thoſe that have it not, how noble ſoever otherwiſe: Thoſe things therefore which have the perfitteſt life, muſt needs be the beſt: Needs then muſt it D follow, that hee which is life it ſelfe, who is abſolute, ſimple, eternall, the fountaine of all that life which is in the world, is moſt worthy of all adoration, joy, love, and confidence of our hearts, and the beſt improvement of that life which hohath given us. Truſt therefore in the living God. Covetouſneſſe (the Spirit of God tels us) is Idolatry, or (as our old Tranſlation turnes it) worſhipping of Images. Every ſtampe or impreſſion in his coyne, is to the covetous man a very Idol: And what madneſſe is there in this Idolatry, to dote upon a baſe creature, and to beſtow that life which we have from God, upon a creature that hath no life in it ſelfe, and no price but from men? Let me then perſwade every ſoule that heares me this day, as Jacob did his houſhould, Put away the ſtrange gods that are among you and bee cleane; and as S. Paul did his Lyſtrians: Oh turne away from theſe vanities unto the E living God.

Gen. 35. 2.

The laſt attractive of our truſt to God, is his mercy, and liberality: Who gives us richly all things to enjoy. A theme, wherein ye will grant it eaſie to leeſe our ſelves. First, God not only hath all in himſelfe, but he gives to us. He gives, not ſomewhat (though a cruſt is more then we are worthy of) but all things. And not a little of all, but richly; and all this, not to looke on, but to enjoy. Every word would require not a ſeverall houre, but a life to meditate of it; and the tongue not of men, but of Angels to expreſſe it. It is here with us, as in a throng, we can get neither in nor out: But as we uſe to ſay of Cares, ſo it ſhall be with out diſcourſe, that the greatneſſe of it ſhall procure ſilence; and the more we may ſay of this head, the leſſe we will ſay: It will content us only to top theſe ſheaves, ſince we cannot ſtand to threſh them out.

Who gives us richly all things to enjoy.

Whither can yee turne you reyes to looke beside the bounty of God? If ye look upward; His mercy reacheth to the heavens. If downward: The earth is full of his goodnesse, and so is the broad sea. If ye looke about you; What is it that hee hath not given us? Ayre to breathe in, fire to warme us, water to coole us, clothes to cover us, food to nourish us, fruites to refresh us, yea delicates to please us; beasts to serve us, Angels to attend us, heaven to receive us; and which is above all, his owne Sonne to redeeme us. Lastly, if ye look into your selves: Hath he not given us a soule to informe us, senses to informe our soule, faculties to furnish that soule? Understanding, the great surveior of the secrets of Nature, and Grace: Fantasie and Invention, the master of the workes: Memory the great keeper or Maister of the rolles of the soule, a power that can make amends for the speed of Time, in causing him to leave behinde him those things, which else he would so carry away, as if they had not beene: Will, which is the Lord Paramount in the State of the Soule, the commander of our actions, the elector of our resolutions: Judgement, which is the great Counsellor of the will: Affections, which are the servants of them both: a body fit to execute the charge of the soule, so wondrously disposed, as that every part hath best opportunity in his owne functions; so qualified with health arising from proportion of humors, that like a watch kept in good tune, it goes right, and is fit to serve the soule and maintaine it selfe: an estate that yeelds all due conveniences for both soule, and body, seasonable times, raine, and sunshine; peace in our borders; competency, if not plenty of all commodities, good lawes, religious, wise, just Governours, happy and flourishing dayes: and above all, the liberty of the Gospell. Cast up your bookes, O yee Citizens, and summe up your receits, I am deceived, if he that hath least, shall not confesse his obligations infinit. There are three things especially wherein yee are beyond others, and must acknowledge your selves deeper in the Books of God, then the rest of the world: Let the first be the cleare deliverance from that wofull judgement of the pestilence. Oh remember those sorrowfull times, when every month swept away thousands from among you: When a man could not set forth his foot but into the jawes of death; when piles of carcasses were carried to their pits, as dung to the fields: when it was cruelty in the sick to admit visitation, and love was little better then murdrous: And by how much more sad and horrible the face of those evill times looked, so much greater proclaim you the mercy of God, in this happy freedome which you now enjoy: that you now throng together into Gods House without feare, and breathe into one anothers face without danger. The second is, the wonderfull plenty of all provisions both spirituall and bodily: You are the Sea, all the Rivers of the land run into you: Of the land? Yea of the whole world: Sea and Land conspire to inrich you. The third is, the priviledge of carefull government: Your Charters as they are large and strong, wherein the favor of Princes hath made exceptions from the generall rules of their municipall lawes; so your forme of administration is excellent, and the execution of Justice exemplary, and such as might become the mother City of the whole earth. For all these you have reason to aske, Quid retribuam, with David? What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? and to excite one another unto thankfulnesse, with that sweet Singer of Israel, O that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodnesse! And (as beneficence is a binder) these favors of God call for your confidence: What should you doe but ever trust that God, whom you have found so gracious? Let him bee your God, be yee his people for ever; and let him make this free and open challenge to you all: If there be any power in heaven, or in earth, that can doe more for you then he hath done, let him have your hearts and your selves.

About 30000. in one yeere.

And thus from that duty we owe to God in our confidence, and his beneficence to us, we descend to that beneficence which we owe to men, expressed in the variety of foure Epithets, Doing good; being rich in good workes, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; all to one sense; all is but beneficence. The Scriptures of God (lest any Atheist should quarrell at this waste) have not one word superfluous: Here is a redoubling of the same words without fault of Tautology; a redoubling of

That they doe good, and be rich in good works.

A of the ſame ſenſe in divers words, without Idleneſſe. There is favor in theſe repetitions, not looſeneſſe; as it was wont for this cauſe to bee obſerved both in Councels, and acclamations to Princes, how oft the ſame word is reiterated, that by the frequence they might judge of the vehemence of affection. It were eaſie to inſtance in many of this kinde, as eſpecially *Exod.*25,35. *Pſal.*89.30. John 1.20. and ſo many more, as that their mention could not be void of that ſuperfluity which we diſclame. This heape of words therefore ſhews the vehement intention of his deſire of good workes, and the important neceſſity of their performance; and the manner of this expreſſion inforces no leſſe; Charge the rich, that they doe good, and bee rich in doing good. Hearken then, yee rich men of the world; it is not left arbitrary to you, that you may doe good if you will, but it is layd upon you as your charge and duty: You muſt doe good works, and woe bee to you if you doe not. This is not a counſell, but a precept; Although I might ſay of God, as we uſe to ſay of Princes, his B will is his command: The ſame neceſſity that there is of truſting in God, the ſame is in Doing good to men. Let mee ſling this ſtone into the brazen foreheads of our adverſaries, which in their ſhameleſſe challenges of our Religion dare tell the world we are all for faith, nothing for workes, and that we hold workes to ſalvation, as a Parentheſis to a clauſe, that it may be perfit without them: Heaven and Earth ſhall witneſſe the injuſtice of this calumniation, and your conſciences ſhall be our compurgators this day, which ſhall teſtifie to you, both now, and on your death-beds, that we have taught you, there is no leſſe neceſſity of good workes, then if you C ſhould be ſaved by them; and that though you cannot be ſaved by them, as the meritorious cauſes of your glory, yet that you cannot be ſaved without them, as the neceſſary effects of that grace which brings glory.

It is an hard ſentence of ſome Caſuiſts (concerning their fellows) that but a few rich mens Confeſſors ſhall be ſaved; I imagine, for that they dawbe up their conſciences with untempered morter, and ſooth them up in their ſins. Let this be the care of them whom it concerneth: For us, we deſire to bee faithfull to God and you; and tell you roundly what you muſt truſt to: Doe good therefore, yee rich, if ever yee looke to receive good; if ever yee looke to be rich in heaven, be rich in good workes upon earth: It is a ſhame to heare of a rich man that dyes, and makes his Will of thouſands, and bequeathes nothing to pious & charitable uſes: God and the poor D are no part of his heire; We do not hover over your expiring ſoules on your death-beds as Ravens over a carkaſſe; wee doe not begge for a Covent, nor fright you with Purgatory, nor chaffer with you, for that inviſible treaſure of the Church, whereof there is but one Key-keeper at Rome; but we tell you, that the making of friends with this Mammon of unrighteouſneſſe, is the way to eternall habitations. They ſay of Cyrus, that he was wont to ſay he laid up treaſures for himſelfe, whiles he made his friends rich: but we ſay to you, that you lay up treaſures for your ſelves in heaven, whiles you make the poore your freinds upon earth: We tell you there muſt be a Date, ere there can be a Dabitur; that he which gives to the poore lends upon uſe to the Lord; which paies large increaſe for all he borrowes, and how ſhall he give you the Intereſt of glory, where hee hath not received the Principall of beneficence? How can that man ever looke to be Gods heire, in the E Kingdome of Heaven, that gives all away to his earthly heires, and lends nothing to the God of Heaven? As that witty Grecian ſaid of extreame tall men, that they were Cypreſſe-trees καλοι αλλ' ἀφελεις, &c. faire and tall, but fruitleſſe: ſo may I ſay of a ſtrait-handed rich man; And theſe Cypreſſes are not for the Garden of paradiſe; none ſhall ever be planted there but the fruitfull: And if the firſt Paradiſe had any trees in it onely for pleaſure, I am ſure the ſecond, which is the midſt of the new Jeruſalem, ſhall have no tree that beares not twelve fruits, yea whoſe very leaves Rev.22.2. are not beneficiall. Doe good therefore, O ye rich, and ſhew your wealth to be, not in having, but in doing good. And if God have put this holy reſolution into any of your hearts, take this with you alſo, from him; Doe not talke, and purpoſe, and project, but execute; Doe not ſo, doe good, that we may thank your death-bed for it, and not you: Late beneficence is better then none, but ſo much as early beneficence is better then late: He that gives not till he dyes, ſhews that he would not give, if he could keepe it: And God loves a cheerefull giver; That which you give thus, you give it by your Teſtament, I can ſcarce ſay you give it by your will: The good mans praiſe is Diſperſit, dedit: he diſperſes his goods, not, he left them behind him; and his diſtribution is ſeconded with the retribution of God, His righteouſneſſe endureth for ever, Pſalme 112. 9. Our Saviour tels us that our good works are our light, Let your light ſo ſhine, that men may ſee your good workes; which of you lets his light goe behinde him, and hath it not rather carried before him, that hee may ſee which way it goes, and which way himſelfe goes by it? Do good therefore in your life, that you may have comfort in your death, and a Crowne of life after death. A

Now all this have I ſpoken, not for that I have ought (as S. Paul ſaies) whereof to accuſe my Nation: Bleſſed be God, as good workes have abounded in this age, ſo this place hath ſuperabounded in good workes. Be it ſpoken to the glory of that God, whoſe all our good workes are, to the honor of the Goſpell, to the conviction of that lewd ſlander of Solifidianiſme; London ſhall vye good workes with any City upon earth: This day and your eares are abundant witneſſes; As thoſe therefore that by an handfull gheſſe at the whole ſacke, it may pleaſe you by this yeeres Brieſe to judge of the reſt: Wherein I doe not feare leſt Envy it ſelfe ſhall accuſe us of a vaine glorious oſtentation; Thoſe obſtreperous benefactors, that (like to Hens which cannot lay an egge, but they muſt cacle ſtraight) give no almes but with trumpets, loſe their thankes with God; Almes ſhould bee like oyle, which though it ſwimme aloft when it is ſalne, yet makes no noiſe in the falling; not like water, that ſtill ſounds where it lights: But howſoever private beneficence ſhould not bee acquainted with both the hands of the giver, but ſilently expect the reward of him that ſeeth in ſecret, yet God ſhould be a greater loſer, if the publike fruits of charity ſhould be ſmothered in a modeſt ſecrecy: To the praiſe therefore of that good God, which gives us to give, and rewards us for giving, to the example of poſterity, the honor of our Profeſſion, to the encouragement of the wel-deſerving, and to the ſhame af our malicious adverſaries, heare what this yeere hath brought forth. B C

Here followeth a brieſe memoriall of the charitable acts of the City this yeare laſt paſt, &c. And if the ſeaſon had not hindred, your eyes ſhould have ſeconded your eares in the comfortable teſtimony of this beneficence, Euge, &c. Well done, good and faithfull ſervants; Thus ſhould your Profeſſion be graced; thus ſhould the incenſe of your almes aſcend in Pillars of holy ſmoake into the noſtrils of God; thus ſhould your tallents bee turned into Cities: This colour is no other then celeſtiall, and ſo ſhall your reward be: Thus ſhould the foundation be laid of that building, whoſe wals reach up unto heaven, whoſe roofe is finiſhed and laid on, in the heaven of heavens, in that immortality of glory, which the God of all glory, peace, and comfort hath provided for all that love him; Unto the participation whereof, the ſame God of ours mercifully bring us through the Sonne of his love JESUS CHRIST the righteous: to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghoſt, one infinite and incomprehenſible God, be given all praiſe, honor and glory, now and for ever. Amen. D E

THE HONOR OF THE MARIED Clergie,

MAINTAINED AGAINST THE MALICIOUS CHALLENGES of C. E. Masse-Priest.

OR,

THE APOLOGIE WRITTEN SOME yeares since for the Mariage of persons Ecclesiasticall made good against the Cavils of C. E. Pseudo-Catholike-Priest.

In three Bookes.

By Jos. Hall, D. of Divinity, and Deane of Worcester.

Imprinted at London in the yeere 1641.

TO THE MOST REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, AND MY MOST HONORED Lord, GEORGE, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Primate of all England and Metropolitaine, one of his Majesties most Honorable Privy Councell.

MOST REVEREND FATHER, and no lesse honored Lord,

IT was my delire and hope, to spend the residue of my Time and thoughts in sweet and sacred Contemplation. Satan envying me this happinesse, interrupts me by the malice of an importunate Adversary. Twelve yeares agoe I wrote a little Apologeticall Letter for the Mariage of persons Ecclesiasticall; and now thus late, when I had almost forgot that I had written it, a moody Masse-priest drops out a tedious and virulent Refutation; thorow my sides striking at the most Honorable and flourishing Clergie of the whole Christian world, laboring not so much for my disgrace (what would that availe him?) as the dishonor and scorne of our holy Profession, in the eyes of our people. I could contemn it in silence; if the Quarrell were onely mine; Now my wrong cannot be distinguished from thousands: God and his Church are engaged in this cause, which in my foile could not but sustaine losse; neither may I be now silent with safety, without misconstruction. Let this hand and tongue bee no longer mine, then they may serve my Master in Heaven, and his Spouse on Earth. That which I wrote in some three houres, he hath answered in three quaternions of yeares; and what I wrote in three leaves, hee hath answered in no fewer Pages then 380. Should I follow him in this proportion, he might after some Centuries of yeeres expect an answer in Tostatus-hydes; whose first word should be, Quis legit hæc? Or if my patience would delay my reply to the just paces of his answer, this Volume of his would perhaps be vanished into Grocers shops for waste Paper in thuris piperisve cucullos, and would no more need answer then now now it deſerveth one. But hearing of the inſultation of ſome Popiſhly affected, who gloried not a little in this Work (Ars Catholicis, I addreſſed my ſelf to the Work, with no leſſe alacrity, and no leſſe ſpeed: That my ſelf-conceited Adverſary, and his ſeduced abettors, may ſee how little a wel-ordered Mariage is guilty of deading our ſpirits, or ſlacking our hands. At the beginning of this Summers Progreſſe, when it pleaſed his Sacred Majeſty to take notice of this ſory Libell, and to queſtion with me concerning it, I had not ſo much as read it over, ſo newly was it come to my hands; ere his happy returne, (be it ſpoken to the only glory of him that enabled me) I had not only finiſhed this Anſwer, but twice written it over with mine own hand; and yet made this but the recreation of the weightiest buſineſſe of my Calling, which now did more then ordinarily urge me.

It was my purpoſe to have anſwered (as beſeemeth the perſon à quo, not ad quem) mildely according to my knowne diſpoſition: but upon better deliberation, I found the inſolency of my refuter ſuch, that I could not favor him, and not be cruell to my cauſe. If therefore for many (it is his owne art and word) relative Pages, he receive from my unwilling and enforced Pen now and then, though not a Relative to ſuch an Antecedent, yet perhaps ſome drop of ſharper Vineger, then my Inke uſeth to be tempered withall, he may forgive me, and muſt thank himſelfe: What needed this cauſe ſo furious an Invective? As if the kingdom of heaven, & all Religion conſiſted in nothing but Maidenhead or Mariage? Cardinall Bellarmine, when he ſpeaks of the Greek Church, wherin a maried Clergie is both allowed and required, ſhuts up moderately; That if this were all the difference betwixt them, & the Romane Church, they ſhould ſoone be at peace. If my refuter had ſo thought, this had not been his firſt Controverſie: Both eſtates meet in Heaven. John the Virgin reſts in the boſome of maried Abraham; This inordinate heate therfore of proſecution riſes from faction, not from holy Zeale: Hence it was that my Adverſary cunningly fingled out this point from many others, ranged in my poor Diſcourſes, as that wherein (in Biſhop Jewels confeſſion) he might promiſe to himſelf the likelieſt advantage of Antiquity; and how glorioufly doth he vant himſelf in the oſtentation of Fathers and Councels! Which vain flouriſh how little it avails him, the proceſſe ſhall ſhew; where it ſhall appeare upon what grounds no ſmall piece of Antiquity was partiall to Virginity, and over harſh to Mariage, as Beatus Rhenanus, a learned and ingenious Papiſt confeſſeth. But this we may boldly ſay, that if thoſe holy men had out-lived the bloudy times, and ſeen the fearefull inconveniences which would (after a ſetled peace) enſue upon the ambition, or conſtraint of a denied Continency, they had doubtleſſe changed their note; and with the moderate and wiſeſt ſpirits of the latter times, pleaded for that liberty which the Reformed Church now enjoyeth. The univerſall conceſſion wherof (after the the private Suffrages of worthy Authors) came to a publike treaty in the Romane Church, amidst the throng of their late Tridentine Councell, and it is worth the while to observe on what grounds it received a repulse. If Priests should be allowed Mariage (say those wily Italians) it would follow that they would cast their affections on their Wives and Children, & consequently on their Families and Countries, whereupon would cease that strait dependance which the Clergy hath upon the See Apostolike; Insomuch as to grant their Mariages were as much as to destroy the Hierarchy of the Church, & to reduce the Pope within the meere bounds of the Romane Bishoprick. This was the plea of the Clergy; their thrifty Laitie (together with them) enemies to the blessing (or, as they construe it, the curse) of fruitfulnesse, are wont to plead, Troppo teste: our Gregory Martin of old computes the prejudiciall increase that might arise from these Mariages to the Commonwealth. It is not Religion but wit that now lies in our way. Fond men that dare offer thus to controll the wisedome of their Maker, and will be tying the God of Heaven to their rules of state. As it is, no Church in the whole world (except the Romane) stands upon this restraint, whereof the consequences have been so notoriously shamefull, that we might well hope, experience would have wrought, if not redresse of their owne courses, yet silence of ours; And surely, if this man had not presumed that (by reason of the long discontinuance of Popery) time had worne out of mens minds the memory of their odious filthinesse, he durst not thus boldly have pleaded for their abominable Celebate; The question whereof, after all busie discussions, and pretences of age, must be resolved into no other then this; How farre the Tradition of a particular Church is worthy to prevaile against Scripture: yea, and against other Churches. A point, which a very weake judgement will be able to determine.

In this return of my Defence, I doe neither answer every idle clause, nor omit any essentiall: this length of mine is no lesse forced then mine Adversaries continency: wherein yet my Reader shall not sigh under an irkesome loquacity. I presume to dedicate this unworthy labor to your Grace, whom this famous Church daily blesseth, as her wise, faithfull, and vigilant Overseer, as a renowned Patterne of holy Virginity, and Patron of holy Mariage. The God of Heaven (whose watch you carefully keep) preserve you long to his Church; and make us long happy in our Grace, and you ever happy in his plentifull blessings. Such shall ever be the Prayer of humbly devoted,

JOS: HALL.

THE ANSWER TO THE ADVERTISEMENT.

THE man begins with a threat, I may not but trewble. He frights me with an universall Detection of my errors. It is almost as easie to finde faults, as to make them. Perhaps the Time had been as well spent in tossing his Beads: How happy a man am I that shall see all my oversights? My comfort is, that if my Art were fruitlesse, there would be no stone throwne at it. In the meane while, how well doth the title of a Detector become him that hides himselfe? If he be not afraid or ashamed of his cause, let his name be knowne, that his victories may be recorded. It is an injurious and base advantage to strike and hide, and after a pitcht Duell to gall a fixed adversary out of loop-holes. If his person be upon some treasonable act obnoxious, it is hard if some of his names be not free; But if I must needs be matcht with the shadow of a Libeller, I will so take him as he deciphers himselfe: C. E. Cavillator Egregius; and under this true stile of his, am ready to encounter him, and doe here bid defiance to an insolent and unjust adversary. And first, let me tell my Caviller, this order is preposterous. If all my errors be at the mouth of the Presse, how is it that two or three of them are thus suffered to out-run their fellowes? Was his malice so bigge with these, that it could not stay the time of the common delivery? Needs must they be notorious falshoods that are thus singled out from the rest. Let them appeare in their owne shapes, ugly (doubtlesse) and prodigious. The first is, That most shameleſse assertion that Bellarmine under his owne hand acknowledges, 237. contrarieties of Doctrine amongst his Catholiks. Could the man but have patience he should find above three hundred: What sayes my Detector to this? He hath not seene the severals, yet (like a brave man at Armes) he professes to kill his enemy ere he can appeare, and tells us those 237. Contrarieties are nothing but 237. lyes in one assertion. That there are in them so many untruths I easily grant: for in contradictions one part must needs be false; and truth is but single: They are untruths then (lyes are too broad a word) but their owne. My assertion shall only justifie that they are told; let him take care for the rest: But they are not in points belonging to Faith and Religion, only in matters undecided, and disputable: The sequell shall try that shift; Why doe we fore-stall our Reader? Who knowes not that there cannot be so many points fundamentall? Let him take them as they are, I aggravate nothing, It is but only in such light chaffe as this; In the number and extent of Bookes Canonicall, wherein Driedo, Erasmus, Genebrard, Cajetan, Sixtus Senensis are acknowledged to oppose the rest; In the Popes infallibility of judgment, wherein Gerson, Almaine, Pope Adrian, Eckius, Hosius, Pichius, Waldensis are at quarrell; In the reach and originall of spirituall jurisdiction; wherein Abulensis, Turrecremata, Fran. à Victoria, Alphonsus de Castro, &c. proclaime to differ: what should I instance in more? It is but in the Popes power in Temporalities, in the inerrableneſse of Councells, whether particular, confirmed by the Pope, or Generall; in the authoritie of Councells above Popes, in the force of vowes, in the worship due to Images, and the like. These and such other are the sleight Trifles (since all cannot be weighty) impertinent to faith, wherein the Romish Doctors vary.

Ex Decad. Ep. 3. Epist. 34. Reckoned out of Pappus his Enumeration. My peace of Rome makes up 103.

Neither doth my assertion of their discord gall him more, then of our Unity: O the forehead of Heritikes! I said that we in our Church differ only in Ceremonies, they in substance. Let him give leave to the contra-division of these two, and I will take leave to maintaine the indivision of the Church of England in the dogmaticall points of Faith.

This boldneſse, together with my eminent ignorance, makes him admire the scarcity of learned men in our Country, that could find no better Doctors to send to Dort-Conference then Master HALL. To your griefe, Sir, it was a Synode, and that noble and celebrious; Neither was it out of want that your silly Adversary was sent thither. This happy Iland (which)

A which hath no blemish, but that it yeelds such Vipers as your selfe) abounds (as you too well know) with store of incomparable Divines, such as may set your Rome to school. So as the Messenger of Pyrrhus long since called your Italy a Country of Kings, and Egypt was wont to be called the Country of Physicians; so may this blessed Iland of ours justly merit the title of The Region of DIVINES. For me, I can be content to be base enough in mine owne eyes; but if my disparagement shall redound to my betters, I dare tell him it is my comfort, that I was sent thither by a judgement no lesse infallible, then of Paul the Fift. Let himselfe, or any of his Eaves-dropping companions (to whom that place stood open) say wherein I shamed those that sent me. It was my just griefe, that the necessity of my health yea of my life called me off immaturely: but since either death or departure must be yeelded to, others shall judge whether I went away more laden with infirmity, then (however unworthy) with approbation.

B But that second lye of mine is so loud, that all my Brethren of Dort must heare it, and they which were lately the witnesses of my sincerity (gracing me with the deare Testimony of their approose) are now made the Judges of my impudency. What monster of falshood will come forth? In my censure of Travell, glancing at the Jesuiticall bragge of their Indian Miracles (whereat their very friends make sport) I charge Cardinall Bellarmine for an avoucher of these Cozenages, who dares averre that his fellow Xavier not onely healed the Deafe, Dumbe, and Blinde, but raised the Dead; to which I add (whiles his Brother Acosta, after many yeares spent in those parts, can pull him by the sleeve, and tell him in his eare, so loud that all the World may heare, Prodigia nulla producimus.) This is my Indictment; Let me come to my Tryall: Cast me, if ye can, ye reverend heads, I crave no favour. Where lyes this so lewd lye, and malicious abuse? That Bellarmine sayes thus of the Jesuite Xavier, is not denyed; That Acosta sayes thus of himselfe, and his fellow Jesuites, is granted: The first lye yet is, Acosta was never in the East Indies, nor Xavier in the West; and how then could Acosta spend many years in those parts? A perilous plea! Who ever, I beseech you, mentioned either East or West? I speake of the Indies in common; so did his Bellarmine from whom I cited this, Claruit etiam in Indiis omni genere miraculorum, &c. Here is not one of the Indies mentioned, but both or either; If both lived in the Indies, though not in one Town, in one Country, in one Indie, wherein have I offended; whiles speaking of the Indies in generall, I said that Xavier and Acosta lived there? Yet this is one lye (he saith) and that so long a one, as that it reacheth as farre as it is from the East to the West, from the Artick to the Antarrick Pole; wherein I doubt not but your reverences will easily marke the skill of this learned Cosmographer.

D Some parts of those instanced Indies differ not so farre; not to speak of the small strait of Anian; the mentioned Region of Mexico is not above foure score degrees from Japan: Either your construction must favor him, or else this must goe into the Book of over sights.

The second lye is, that Acosta pulled Bellarmine by the sleeve in this assertion, as if he denied those Eastern Miracles, which he elsewhere confesseth. Indeed this sawcinesse were dangerous: The red Hat (you say) is fellow to a Crown. But shall I confesse where I erred? My dull head could not conceive that God should be the God of the Mountains, & not of the Valleys; Of the East Indies, and not of the West; and yet be the Jesuites God in both: Especially, since the reason that Joseph Acosta fetches from the persons (which should bee the subject of those wonders) holds as equally for both Indies, as an Almanack made for the Meridian of one Citty, serveth the Neighbours.

E Hitherto then the prologue of my infamous falshoods, such, as if all my Writings could have afforded any equally hainous, these had never been chosen out to grace the front of his Detection; There must needs be much terrour in the sequel.

The rest of this storm fals upon our learned Professor, D. Collins, one of the prime ornaments of our Cambridge; the partnership of whose unjust disgrace doth not a little hearten my unworthinesse. The world knows the eminency of that mans Learning, Wit, Judgement, Eloquence: His works praise him enough in the Gate: Yet this Malepert Corner-creeper doth so basely vilifie him for ignorance, sillinesse, pratling, rusticitie, lying, as if in these onely he were matchlesse. Indeed whom doth the aspersion of that foule hand forbeare? Vilium est hominum alios viles facere. I appeale to all the Tribunals of Learning thorow the World, whether all Doway have yeeld ought comparable to that mans Pen: whe-

SECT. I.

NEither my Charity, nor my Leisure, nor my Readers Patience, will allow me to follow my Detector, in all his Extravagancies, nor to change ilde words of Contumely with a Babbler. His twelve first Pages, are but the light froth of an impotent Anger; wherein he accuseth my bitternesse, and professeth his own. For me I appeale unto all eies; if my Pen have been sometimes zealous, it was never intemperate: Neither can he make me believe, that my passions need to appeare to my shame, in calling Rome Prostitute, or himselfe shameless; or in citing from the Quodlibet of his own Catholick Priests, the Art of his Jesuites, in * Drurying of young Heires. There is neither Slander, nor Shame in Truth. For himselfe, he confesseth to have sharpened his Pen, and to have dipt it (perhaps too deep) in Gall: But where his Inke is too thick, he shall give me leave to put a little Vineger to it, that it may flow the better. In the mean time he shall goe away with this glory; That a fouler Mouth hath seldome ever wiped it selfe upon cleane Paper.

Declamationes ambitiosorum opera, ac ioforum cibi sunt. Scal. Exer.

Prostituta illa civitas.

* The particulars of this History he shall receive in due place.

After those waste flourishes, his thirteenth Page begins to strike; wherein hee chargeth me with odious baseneſſe, and insufficiency, in borrowing all my proofes from Bellarmines Objections, dissembling their Solutions. The Man were had driven, that would go to borrow of an Enemy. If all my proofes be fore-alledged and fore-answered by his Bellarmine; to what purpose hath this Trifler blurred so much Paper? There (he saith) shall the Reader see all my Scriptures answered, the Doctrine of Devils explicated; there, that other, Let him be the Husband of one Wife; and Mariage is honourable, Answered indeed; but as he said (ἄλογα ἀνάλογα) answerlesly. Such clear Beames of Truth shine in the face of those Scriptures, that all the Cob-web vayles of a Jesuites subtilty cannot obscure them.

Refut. p. 13.

Their very Citation confutes their Answer. And where had we this Law; That if a Jesuit have once medled with a Scripture, all Pens, all Tongues are barred from ever alledging it? If Satan have miscited the Psalme (He shall give his Angels charge over thee) for Temptation, may not we make use of it, for the comfort of Protection? Briefely, let my Caviller know, that it is not the frivolous illusion of any shuffling Jesuit, that can drive us from the firme Bulwarke of the holy Scriptures. In this, they are clearely ours, after all pretences of Solution, (as he shall well feele in the Sequel) and shall secure us against all humane Opposition. Before the disquisition whereof, somewhat must of force be premised, concerning the state of our Question.

Refut p.12.

WHere, that all Readers may ſee how learnedly my wiſe Adverſarie hath miſtaken me, and himſelfe; I muſt tell my Detector, That all his tedious diſcourſe ſits beſide the Cuſhion: For thus he writes of my Epiſtle (ſo as his whole Scope is to diſprove the ſingle life of Catholike Prieſts; and thereby to oppugne our Doctrine in that behalf) upon which conceit, he runnes into a large proofe of the ſtrong Obligation of Vowes, the neceſſity of their Obſervation, the penalty and danger of their Violation, the praiſe of Virginity, the poſſibility of keeping it; and upon this very ground builds hee the tottering wall of his whole enſuing Confutation: in ſo much, as (pag. 130.) he ſayes, That Mariage all times, without contrary Injunction, was lawfull, is not denyed; nor will it be proved in haſte, That Prieſts, or ſuch as had vowed the contrary, might uſe that liberty: and we ſay not, that Virginity is violently to be impoſed on any, for it comm.th by free election; but where the Vow is free, the Tranſgreſſion is damnable. Thus he.

Now let all indifferent eyes ſee, whether the onely drift of mine Epiſtle bee not to juſtifie our Marriage, not to improve their Singleneſſe; to defend the lawfulnes of the Marriages of our Clergie, not to juſtifie the Marriage of the Romiſh; to plead for the marriage of our Eccleſiaſtiques not of Popiſh Votaries.

In expreſſe tearms, I diſ-avowed it. The intervention of a Vow makes a new ſtate, Let Baal plead for himſelf. What is it to me, if the Romiſh Clergie may not be Husbands? or if, according to the French Proverbe, they have a Law not to marry, and a Cuſtome not to live chaſte? Let it be their care whom it concernes; onely I will have leave to ſpeake for our owne. Neither did I ever derogate ought from ſacred Virginity, or lay it levell (whether abſolutely, or in all circumſtances) with holy Matrimony; neither did I ever conceive of an impoſſibility of Continence in ſome perſons: Take away theſe three Grounds, (which I utterly diſclaime before God and Men) together with his petulant Raylings, and idle Excurſions; and what is become of the Volume of my great Adverſary? Thoſe three vaſt Paragraphes are ſhrunke into ſo few ſheets of Paper, that a Mouſe may as ſoone runne away with his booke as with his god.

My Maſters of Doway, If ye be the Superiours, under whoſe permiſſion this worthy Worke ſees the light; for ſhame keep up your laviſh Unthrifts of good time, and ſend us ſuch Antagoniſts, as may not faine Occaſions to empty their Note-Bookes. One daſh of a Penne might thus juſtly anſwer the moſt part of his bloughty Volume; wherein, like a drunken Man, he makes a fray with his own ſhadow, and like an ilde Whelpe, runnes away after his own Stern. But, that he may not complaine to bee caſt off too contemptuouſly, he ſhall receive a faire account of Particulars.

Sect. III.

THE Theme of my Epiſtle is plainly no other, then our marriage cenſured, he anſwers, of Theirs. I would there were ſuch cauſe of familiarity and entireneſſe, that what is ſaid of one, might agree to both: But the world knowes we are two. If I ſay our Clergy is heartily loyall to their King; will he ſtraight take it of theirs? If, that our Clergy is willingly ſubject to more then the directive Power of their Soveraigne, will he challenge this to theirs? The very Point which I purpoſely declined, he followes in hot chaſe. Even moderate Papiſts (they are the words of my Epiſtle) will grant us free, becauſe not bound by Vow not ſo farre as thoſe old Germanes, pro poſſe & noſſe: And yet all my Detectors refutation ſtill drives at the ſuppoſition of a Vow. What have we to doe with Votaries? Our Clergie is free, whether as Clergie, or as ours: Firſt, as perſons Eccleſiaſticall (quà talles) For holy Orders, wherher as orders, or as holy, are no hinderances of Matrimony, as Cardinall Cajetan truly, and with him, the whole Schoole. That which may be pretended for Impediment, is either a Vow annexed, or an Eccleſiaſticall Statute.

[b] As for the Vow, it is so far from being essentiall to holy Orders, as that it is made by [c] some learned Papists a difference betwixt the Obligation of their Religious, and their Priests; That their Religious are bound by a solemn Vow to single life in the very intrinsecall nature of their Profession; their Priests onely by a Church Constitution, without Vow. And those that go further with their famous Cardinal, and teach That it is expresly forbidden to Bishops, to ordain any, without the promise of single life, ground this but upon an Epistle of Pope Gregory [d], a late and weake foundation; and besides hold, that their Vow is but semi-solemn, and accidentally incident into this Profession: for so much as here is neither a direct Exhibition of the body to this purpose in the Offerer, nor a direct Consecration to this end in the Admitter, both which make up the solemnity of the vow: upon which reason, according to them, a Religious Order, because it yeelds over the Body unto an estate repugnant to Matrimony, doth of it self in it's own nature, both hinder Mariage, and nullifie it; not so the Ecclesiasticall. To which we may adde, That according to their owne [e] Doctors, Solemnity and Simplicity make no difference of the Vow before God, though before the Church. A distinction too slight, too newly upstart, to overturn an ancient and well grounded Institution. Neither need we any better, or other proofe of the inconnexion of this Vow with holy Orders, then that of their own Dominicus à Soto, [f] Non est de essentia Sacerdotis, &c. It is not of the essence of a Priest (saith he) to keepe single; for that the Grecian Clergy are permitted even by the Roman Church to continue in the state of Mariage. What can be more cleare? If there were a necessary and inseparable connexion of a vowed Continency with holy Orders, then would not, neither could the Roman Church acknowledge a true Priesthood where it finds conjugall Society. Their act of allowance to the Greek Church implyes a faire independency of these two, which some of their clamorous Clients plead to have indivisibly coupled. So as now all the strength of this necessary Celibate is resolved into the power of a Church statute; and of what Church, but the Roman? All other Churches in the World, as of Armenia, Grecia, Syria, Æthiopia, the Georgians, &c. allow the conjunction of Ministery and Mariage; and are so farre from requiring a Vow of necessary Continency, that they rather erroniously prerequire a necessity of Mariage in the persons to be ordained.

It is onely the Church of Rome, the great and imperious Mistresse of the World, that imposes the yoke of this vow upon her Vassals: Imposes it, but ad libitum; so as her great Paramour (in whose vast Bosome that whole Church lyes) may dispense with it as he lists. Hear that irresutable discourse of Cardinal Cajetan: his words bear weight, and are not unworthy the eyes of my Reader. Therefore (saith he) since the Pope may at his pleasure loose the bond of that Statute, it follows necessarily, that if a Priest of the Westerne Church shall marry by the Popes leave, without any reasonable cause, that such Mariage of his is a true Mariage, and the parties married are true Husband and Wife, and their Issue truly legitimate; although in so marrying, both the parties should sinne mortally, in doing this act against the Vow of Chastity, without a reasonable, or at least a probable cause of their so licensing; and consequently, neither should the Pope himselfe be excused from mortall sinne: But if there be any reasonable cause of dispensing with this Vow of Chastity, then the party thus marrying, and dispensed with, may both safely marry, and live in Mariage. And hereupon it appeares, That since a reasonable cause of dispensing with this Vow of Chastity, may be not only the publike Utility, whether Civill or Ecclesiasticall, but any other greater good then the observing of that Chastity; it justly followes, that the Pope not onely may, but with a safe conscience may dispence with a Priest of the Western (or Roman) Church, that he may marry; even besides the cause of a publike benefit. And therefore the determination of some hath been too presumptuous, in affirming, That absolutely and without such cause the Pope cannot dispence: whereas (as we have shewed) the Pope may doe it without any cause, though in so doing he should sinne; and with any reasonable cause, without sinne: and in both, the Matrimony stands firme. Thus he.

Words that need neither Paraphraſe, nor Inforcement. And how uſuall[h] the practiſe of this Diſpenſation hath beene (that wee may not reſt onely in Speculation) appeares enough by the ingenuous complaint of their[i] ſelected Cardinalls, to Paul the Third: who cry downe the abuſe of thoſe over-frequent Grants, which they ſhould not have yeelded, but upon publicke and weighty cauſes; eſpecially (ſay they) in theſe times, wherein the Lutherans urge this matter with ſo much vehemence. Neither is it long ſince our kind Apoſtate M. Carier gave us here in England (from bigger men then himſelfe) an overture of the likelyhood of this liberall Diſpenſation, from his holy Father of Rome, upon the conditions of our re-ſubjection. Would we therefore but ſtoop to kiſſe the Carbuncle of that ſacred Toe, our Clergie might as well conſiſt with holy Wedlocke, as the Grecian. Oh, the groſſe mockery of Soules, not more ignorant, than credulous! Will his Holineſſe diſpenſe with us for our ſinne? Wee can be diſpenſed with at home for his diſpenſation. It is their Sorrow that the World is growne wiſer, and findes Heaven no leſſe neere to Dover-cliffe then to the Seven-hills.

And ere wee leave this point, it is very conſiderable, what may be a reaſonable cauſe of this Diſpenſation: For thoſe very[k] Jeſuites, which hold the power of this Vow ſuch, That the vehementeſt tentations and foiles of the fleſh may not be relieved with an arbitrary Matrimony, ſince the matter of this Vow is ſo important, & caries ſo much danger in the violation, as that it is not to be left to the power of a private Judgement (though morally certaine) whether Matrimonie (all things conſidered) be in this particular expedient; (for that may be fit for a man as a ſingular perſon, which is not fit for him as part of the community:) yet they grant, that this extreme perplexedneſſe and violence of carnall motions, is a juſt cauſe of diſpenſation. What need we more? Though ſome[l] Caſuiſts be more favourable, and grant that in ſuch caſes we may not onely allow, but perſwade Matrimony to the perplexed Votary: As Cardinall[m] Æneas Sylvius (who was never leſſe Pius, then when he was Pius) gives this hearty adviſe to his friend John Freünd, a Roman Prieſt, that he ſhould (notwithſtanding his Orders) helpe himſelfe by Marriage; yet the former will ſerve our turne. If therefore thoſe Superiours, which have all lawfull and ſpirituall authority over us, ſhall have thought good, upon this reaſonable cauſe, to give a generality of diſpenſation to all ſuch of our Clergy, as ſhall not, after all carefull and ſerious indeavours, finde themſelves able to containe; allowing them by theſe lawfull remedies to quench thoſe impure flames: what can any Jeſuit or Devill except againſt this? This is ſimply the cleare cauſe of them whoſe cauſe I maintaine.

And yet further: Put the caſe this had not been; if without the thought of any Romiſh Diſpenſation, the[n] Eaſtern Church never held it needfull to require the Vow of ſingle life in the Miniſters of the Altar, (they know the words of their own Gloſſe) why ſhould not our Church challenge the ſame immunity; for (that from the generall conſideration of Eccleſiaſtiques, as ſuch, we may turne our eyes to our Eccleſiaſtiques in ſpeciall) no Church under heaven kept it ſelfe more free from the bondage of thoſe tyrannous Impoſitions.

The[o] Clergie of this Iland, from the beginning, never offered any ſuch Vow, the Biſhops never required it, for more (if any credit be due to Hiſtories) then a thouſand yeeres after Chriſt. The great Champion of Rome, Maſter Harding, was driven to ſay, They did it by a beck, if not by a Dieu-guard; but could never prove it done by either. Neither is it more worth my Readers note, then my Adverſaries indignation, that the wiſe providence of God ſo pleaſed to contrive it of old, as that from the beginning of the firſt converſion of this happy Iland, it rather conſpired with the Greeke Church, then with the Roman: After the Grecian account we kept our Eaſter, inſomuch, as Beda tells us, that Pope John the Fourth (about the

A yeare 637.) was faine to require of the Engliſh, that they would keepe their Paſch after the Romane faſhion; a difference (as it was then taken) of no ſmall importance. The ſtory of S. Aidanus and Colmannus, may be herein an abundant witneſſe: And for the Britains, Beda left them in the cloze, both of his Life and Hiſtorie, faſt to Greece, looſe from Rome.

After the Grecian forme we celebrated the Sacrament of Baptiſme. After the Grecian Liberty we continued the Mariages of perſons Eccleſiaſticall (through ſo many Centuries of years) without ſcandall, without the contradiction of the Chriſtian World; ſo as now wee are but repoſſeſſed of the ancient right of our fore-Fathers, which the interpoſition of the Romiſh tyranny, for a while, injuriouſly debarred. Our adverſaries have wont to brand us for the uncharitable cenſures of our fore-Fathers, B and can they think the ſucceſſions of many Generations ſo faithleſſe, that they made ſolemn vowes, for no other purpoſe, but only to breake them? It was the queſtion of the rich and precious Jewell of England, to which his Hardie adverſarie had never the face to reply. My Refuters forehead is ſtronger with a weaker wit; Let him trie here the power of his audacity. And if the Church of this Iland, in the dayes of her forced ſervitude to the Roman See, maintained this liberty (as wee prove in the ſequell) and derived it to poſterity, how much more free ſhall it be for us to renue and injoy it, after the juſt excuſſion of that ſervile yoke?

Let now C. E. goe waſte good houres, and marre cleane Paper in diſproving the Mariage of Romiſh votaries, and in the mean time come as neere my queſtion, as Thames is to Tiber: What is this but to mock the Reader, and abuſe himſelfe? How C much wiſer is he grown in the proceſſe of his diſcourſe, where he grants our Mariage, and denies our Clergy? from which weak and witleſſe Hold, if we beat him not in the due place, we ſuffer not enough from that rude Hand.

SECT. IIII.

HAving then hitherto detected no error, no ignorance but his own; he now deſcends to untruths, and finds here ſo many miſtakings, lyes, falſifications, that a Reader would wonder by what art I could couch ſo many of them in ſo ſmall a room; D and might verily think that I could out-ly the Legends, and outjuggle a Jeſuit. But ere I have done, theſe ſhall appeare to be but the fictions of a paſſionate fugitive, the Man ſhall be cooler, I ſhall be innocent, and my Reader ſhall ſay, that if that forehead had not been ſo oft croſſed, it could not have had ſo little ſhame. Refut. p. 174.

My firſt untruth is, that I avouch S. Paul to call the ſingle life of Prieſts, A Doctrine of Devils. Reader, is my detector awake? I ſaid, that to maintaine the unlawfulneſſe of the Mariage of the Miniſter of God, is, according to Saint Paul, A Doctrine of Devils, and now he would perſwade the World, I ſaid thus of the ſingle life of his Prieſts. What can we make of this? That ſingle life is a Doctrine? If not truth, yet let him learn to ſpeake ſenſe. But that he may not alwayes refute what I never affirmed; I muſt gheſſe at what he meant: He would elude this charge, with E that ſtale ſhift, worn out with the Pens of his Predeceſſors, that Saint Paul is to bee underſtood according to Theodoret, of thoſe which call Mariage execrable: according to Saint Auſtin, that ſay, Mariage is evill, and of the Devils making: according to Clemens Alexandrinus, Of thoſe that abhorre Mariage: Of Manichees, and other Heretikes, as Ambroſe and Epiphanius, from which Catholikes are ſo farre that they approve it for a ſacrament. Nuptias execrabiles.

Firſt, the words of Saint Paul, are (κωλυοντων γαμειν) forbidding to Marry, not condemning Mariage. Then we know well, what the Tacians, Ebionites, Encratites, Montaniſts, Marcionites, Manichees, Adamites, and Apoſtoliques held of Matrimony. The Apoſtle brands them here: But what? Them only? Whiles he condemns them, doth he free thoſe that partake with them? The act is one, Forbiddance of Mariage; whether to ſome, or to more, or to all, S. Paul expreſſes not: the number doth not vary the quality. And if one be a part of all, then to condemn mariage in ſome one kinde of men, can it be other then the partaking of an universall condemnation of it? This then only he hath gained, that some others have been deeper in this evill then themselves.

Obiect. Answ. Be ye holy. All things are cleane to the cleane.

But our Apostle speakes of them which condemn Mariage as evill in it selfe.

We take what he gives: No mans mouth shall condemn my Refuter but his own. What was he that accused mariage of Unholinesse, out of Sancti estote; of uncleanesse, out of Omnia munda mundis; of Contamination with carnall concupiscence? Was it not his own Pope [r] Innocentius? Who was he that interpreteth of marriage, the Text Rom. 8.8. Those that are in the flesh cannot please God, that called the maried Man, no lesse then the Whoremonger, Sectatorem libidinum, Præceptorem vitiorum; A follower of Lust, a teacher of Vice; that said Mariage was a loosing the reynes to Luxury, an inhiation after obscene lusts? was it not his Pope [s] Siricius, the first Founder (if we may beleeve their now-defaced Glosse) of forced Continency?

Who was it that called mariage a defiling with unclean society, and execrable contagion? Was it not his Councell of [t] Toledo? Who was it that called mariage (Spurcitias immundas) filthy beastlinesse? was it not his [t] Saint Dunstan and Oswald? Let him construe this, and then tell me, what it is (if this be not) to condemn Mariage as [t] evill. Yet more, his own example shall convince him: He pleads out of Saint Austin, that this text, amongst others, intends to strike at the Manichees; now, the Manichees allowed mariage to their Auditors, that is (Analogically) their Laity; forbad it to their Electi, that is, their Clergy; So farre approving it in their laick-Clients, that no modest Pen may write [u] whence they fetched their Sacramentall Bread: Either then the Manichees must be excluded, or Papists must be taken in for company into this doctrine of Devils. It is true, they mis-call mariage a Sacrament; So as we may well wonder at these two extreams in one doctrine: and study in vain how the same thing should be Sacred in a Ceremonious inchoation, and in the reall consummation morally impure; how a Sacrament should bee incompatible with a sacred Person: These Sphyngian Riddles are for better Heads: with what Brow then can my Detector adde, * That with Saint Chrysostome and Saint Austin, they do but compare mariage, they doe not condemn it; Onely teaching mariage to be good, Virginity better; with Fulgentius not so comparing virginity to Corn, that they count Mariage Cockle? In this where should they finde any adversary? But if Luxury, Filthinesse, Uncleanesse, Contagion, Beastlinesse, Vice, Obscenity, be the stiles of good, we can well allow them to the honour of C. Es. virginity, and are content our Mariages should passe for evill.

Sect. V.

MY second untruth (he saith) is, That I make the single Life of Priests the brand of Antichristianisme. Shamelesse mouth! Where did I ever say so? My words are; Were it not for this opinion, the Church of Rome would want one evident brand of her Antichristianisme. The life is one thing, the opinion another. Single life is good; the opinion of the necessity of single life, and the unlawfulnesse of the Maried, is Antichristian. What can be more plain? yet this wilfull slanderer tels the world, that I make the profession of Continency, Antichristian: whereas we doe willingly professe, that true profession of true Continency is truly laudable; that the forcible imposition of it, as necessary to some state of men, savours strongly of that Man of sin: Now let my Reader judge, whose untruths my Adversary hath hitherto detected.

Neither can I eate that word of mine, unlesse I would renounce the Apostle; who seemes purposely to decipher our Romanists by these lines: For, having immediately before described the condition of Bishops, and Deacons, with their wives and children (allowing them indifferently with others, a maried estate) hee presently (as foreseeing that Point which would be most subject to contradiction) foretels, that the seducing spirits of Antichristianisme would forbid mariage; and this

A this he fore-propheſies ſhall be done in the latter, or (as their Vulgar and Rhemiſts turns it) in the laſt Times; and that by them, which ſhall ſpeake lyes in hypocriſie. Neither of which can ſo exactly agree to thoſe firſt Hereticks; who, as they were early in time, ſo alſo groſſe in their Doctrine; wherein there was more open impiety, then ſecret diſſimulation.

And if ὕστεροι χρόνοι may agree to all the ages of the Church after Chriſt, yet moſt to the laſt, and that other addition ſeems to ſtrengthen this ſenſe. Refut. p. 21.

Sect. VI.

B IN vaine therefore doth my Refuter bring in S. Paul, as an abetter of his forced Continency; whiles he ſaith of yonger Widowes, that When they have begun to wax wanton againſt Chriſt, they will marry, having damnation, becauſe they have forſaken their firſt Faith. In which place (boulted before to the Bran by many Controverſers) mine Adverſary hath learned of his Bellarmine, to triumph above meaſure. This firſt Faith (ſaith he) all the Fathers without exception, underſtand to bee a Vow, or Promiſe, made to God of Continence, in the ſtate of Widowhood. It is a wide word (All the Fathers) I had thought I had read in holy [x] Athanaſius, Væ vobis qui primam fidem baptiſmi cælitus inſtitutam irritam facitis; Woe to you that make void the firſt Faith of Baptiſme ordained from Heaven. I had thought [y] Hierome had ſomewhere ſaid, They are not worthy of beliefe, which have voyded their firſt beliefe, Marcion I mean and Baſilides; whom yet I never found condemned for the breach of any Vow of Continence. I had thought, the Author of the Interlineary Gloſſe would not have croſſed all the Fathers, in expounding it, Fidem Baptiſmi; The faith of Baptiſme, which is C indeed the firſt Faith, and the Apoſtle ſaith (the firſt) not (the former;) As for that other, which he imagines a Vow of continued Viduity, it was neither Faith nor Firſt; let him inſtance (if he can) where our Apoſtle takes Faith for a Vow. Rather, as if he meant to expound his own word in this very Scripture, and this occaſion, he cleers this doubt, whiles he ſpeakes of the wilfully improvident Man, that he hath denyed the Faith, and is worſe then an infidel; and now in the ſame Context, he ſpeakes of theſe perverted Widdowes that they have forſaken the Faith.

Much leſſe is it the Firſt, whether in Time, or Dignity: For, they could not have beene Church-widdowes, if not Chriſtians; and they could not be Chriſtians, if they ſhould have valued the Vow of their Widdowhood above the vow of their Chriſtendome; yea, ſo farre was this from the firſt Vow (if it had beene one) D as that it was the laſt of all; for according to them, their firſt Faith muſt bee to their Huſband, their ſecond to CHRIST, in their initiation to Religion; their laſt in the Vow of Widdowhood; So here is a fained vow made Faith, and laſt made firſt; and all to uphold a crazy conceit of our Romaniſts, which hath no other ground but this one ambiguity. Chryſoſtome indeed calls it (συνθήκην) pactum; a covenant; but what covenant, or with whom, he expreſſes not; whether of Chriſtianity, or of Widdowhood, or of Miniſtration; Some of the others that followed him, ſpake according to the Gloſſe which the corrupt conceit of the Times had ſet upon him. Refut. p. 20.

But what need my Refuter ſtand upon particular Authors (he ſaies) when he E may bring 214. Biſhops, all ſitting in Councell at Carthage, agreeing in this expoſition, pointing us to the fourth Councell of Carthage? (Canone ult.) His Gratian, had wont to tell us, (for the more Grace) that it was in the third Councell of Carthage Can. 4. Now he is taught to change this note; So doth C. E. with his Binius, tell us it was the 4. Councell and the laſt Canon. We have reaſon to ſuſpect it was in neither; The very ſtile and manner of diſcourſe ſo different from the reſt of thoſe briefe Canons, and the faſhions of thoſe Times, cary in it open likelihood of Baſtardy: It was an eaſie fraud to patch it to the end of thoſe Canons; neither (which learned Junius taught me firſt to obſerve) is it found among the Greeke; then which there cannot be a worſe ſigne. Refut. p. 21.

But that I may at once anſwer his vaunt of Antiquity, and ſtop the mouth of this Caviller: Let me aske him whether thoſe Fathers, whom hee cites for this ſenſe, doe doe not take those young Widowes for Votaries? If they doe (as he cannot deny) how can these two stand together; That they should have damnation, because against their vow, they would marry; and yet that the Apostle should wish them to marry, Can he imagine that Saint Paul would advise them to incurre wilfull damnation?

And if in this I should have dissented from the interpretation of much Antiquity? I should but take to my selfe the liberty of his Masters the Jesuits, with whom this is no novelty; for instance, his not unlearned, and bold [a] Maldonate, (as wee shall see afterwards) upon a Text of this very question, confessing the current of the streame of Antiquity, can come in, at last, with a Doctorly wipe of Adduci non possum ut sequar; I cannot goe with them: This priviledge is for none but the Fathers of the Society, to controll the Fathers of the Church.

The state then of these Widowes was shortly this: They being for their poverty sustained by Church-almes upon * condition of attendance on the Saints, whether sick or travelling, were to dedicate themselves to this service; but, some of the younger sort being inveigled by Infidell-Lovers, were drawn to leave, not their Station only of their ministration, but their profession of Christianity: These had damnation most justly, for casting off their first Faith. Their marriage was accidentally faulty, because it forced them from their holy imployment; Their apostasie was absolutely and damnably sinfull, in that they left Christ, and followed after Satan.

* De his agit quæ ad Ecclesiæ stipem, vel ministerium recipiebantur ejus sumptibus alendæ. Espenc. de Cont. lib. 4 cap. 1.

The inextricable Dilemma then in my detector is easily answered; (I demand now of Master Hall, whether these young Widows in breaking their Vowes, did sinne, or not? If they did not; why shall they have damnation? If they did sinne (as indeed they did) then how is the vow unlawfull? how the brand of Antichristianisme?) Nothing can be more base then to beg the Question; What doe wee dispute, but whether any vow were made? and if any, whether of Continence, or of Service? But why then shall they have damnation? For waxing wanton against Christ; not meerly for marrying. If to marry, were to waxe wanton against Christ, why should the Apostle have advised it them? In a word, for abandoning both their Office and Religion.

Refut. p. 21, 22.

Lastly, who can but wonder at the face of our Adversaries, that dare bring forth so plaine a witnesse against themselves. For, if the vow of Continence be the first faith here spoken of, then may not any woman by the Apostles charge make this vow, till shee bee threescore yeares old; which, how is it at this day practised in the Romish Church? since, and as the Cæsar Augustaine Councell, and the Agathense abated it to forty years, and the third Counecll of Carthage yet lower, to five and twenty; so Pope Gregory fell yet lower to eighteene; and some other Councells, yet lower to twelve; Although the Trent Conference very liberally rise up to whole sixteen: Either therefore let them grant that our Apostle speakes not of Votaries, or else let them follow his rule of the age of votaries, that the World may thinke they have honest Nunneries; and let them confesse their change presumptuous. Thus, I hope, This Gordian knot, that requires more strength then Master Halls learning, and a sharper edge then Alexanders sword to dissolve, or cut, is proved more easie then the knot of a Friers girdle, which a very dull Whittle may cut asunder; and C. E. appeale to all Schollers, proclaimes him ignorantly confident.

IF it had not been for two poore words of mine (both yet misse-understood) I wonder how C. E. could have discovered to the world his dexterity, in serving out his oft sodden Coleworts; the refuse of his Bellarmine and Coccius. [a] Threescore and foure Pages, or more, hath he bravely spent in the vindication of virginitie, which never honest and wise man opposeth. Let their shavelings (I said) speake for themselves upon whom their unlawfull vow hath forced a wilful & impossible necessity The man is angry that I meddled with his crowne; but if his haire had not beene longer longer then his wit, this deepe offence had never beene; For, if hee had taken my words, Cum grano salis, in the sense which they will onely well beare: (Let such of their shavelings, as upon whom an unlawfull Vow hath forced an impossible necessity, speak for themselves) (none other need speaking for) he had found the sentence so particular, that it might have spared him both much spleene and worke; since, neither was it in my heart ever to affirme the observation of this Vow impossible to any man, neither will he (I hope) hold that it is kept by all: It is not in the power of the Razor, together with the haires, to cut off inordinate affections; some vow, which cannot containe: Upon this supposition onely, I called this necessity impossible, and this Vow unlawfull; I cannot therefore but pity my passionate Detector, that he hath set himselfe all on a froth, in running this Wild-Goose chase alone, following nothing but his owne fancy, whiles he pursues a certaine Chimericall Monster, that holds Continence utterly and universally impossible. And that he may the better repent him of this witlesse waste, and prevent the spoile of good Paper hereafter, let him know at once (which perhaps hath not hitherto been allowed him) what we hold concerning this point. We doe therefore from our hearts honour true Virginity, as the most excellent estate of life, which is incident to fraile Humanity; Gerson hath taught us not to call it a vertue, but it is Cousin German to a vertue: Neither doe we thinke that the Earth affords any thing more glorious, then Eunochisme for the Kingdome of Heaven; which is therefore commended by our Saviour, not as a thing meerely arbitrary, by way of advice, but of charge to the able. Qui potest capere capiat; In this we can gladly subscribe to Saint Chrysostome, Bonum est Virginitas, &c. Virginity is good, I yeeld it; and better then Mariage, I confesse it. Secondly, every man therefore (not Ecclesiastiques onely) should labour, and strive to aspire unto this estate, as the better, using all holy meanes both to attaine, and to continue it: Neither doe we thinke it any other then blameable, that young Persons (not so much as advising with their owne abilities) without all indeavour and ambition of so worthy a condition, leape rashly into the bands of Wedlocke. Thirdly, though every man must reach for it, yet every man cannot catch it; since it hath pleased God to reserve this as a peculiar gift for some persons, not intending it as a common favour to all Suiters. Fourthly, those then, which are upon good triall conscious to themselves of Gods call to this estate, and his gift inabling them unto it, may lawfully make profession thereof to the glory of the Giver, and (if need be) may vow (God continuing the same grace unto them) an holy perpetuation thereof to their end; the observation whereof, if they through their own neglect shall let fall, they cannot be excused from * sinne, or freed from censure: But those which after all serious indevours finde nothing but weaknesse and uncertainties in this behalfe, shall sinne, if they absolutely vow; shall not sinne, if they marry, in what condition of life soever; nor sinne in marying, however their mariage may have faulty circumstances.

Now my Detector, by this time, in our assertions sees his owne folly; if against this he can except ought, he knowes where to finde an adversary: In the mean time he needed not to take it so highly, that in the Romish use of vowes I made mention of unlawfulnesse, of impossibility: unlawfulnesse in the making, impossibility in keeping, I am ready to maintaine both, in respect of the indisposition, yea, incapacity of the Votaries.

* Qui statuit firmus in corde suo non habens necessitatem, potestatem habens suæ voluntatis, & voverit continentiam Deo, debet eam, usque ad finem, totâ mentis solicitudine custodire. Aug. de fid. ad Petr.

Sect. VIII.

BUT in speaking of the impossibility of some mens continency, it was not possible for my Refuter to containe himselfe from a scurrill invective against Luther, Pellican, Bucer; and it becomes him well. His Fathers, like Sepulchrall dogges, tore up the graves of Gods Saints, and gnawed upon their dead bones; and now this whelpe of theirs commingit cineres, bedribbles their ashes.

Refut. p. 25, 26, 27.

The heroicall Spirit of Luther (for I cannot be flouted out of that word) hated the the brotherly of their Cloysters; and chose rather (which gals them to the heart) to be an honest Husband, then a fornicating Frier.

What did he other in this, then the holy Fathers have advised him, yea, then he learned in their owne Schoole? for casting, perhaps, his eye upon the Index of their Aquinas, he found there, Votum vergens, &c. A Vow tending to the danger of the person, may be securely broken, if a dispensation cannot be had: What other then all their more ingenuous Casuists would thinke fit to give way unto? If Luther would have still kept on his Cowle, and but have paid the fees of a Concubine, he had lived and dyed an holy Anguſtinian: but now all his crimes sinke downe out of sight, una uxor supernatat, (as that Father said) his wife only floteth: and poor honest Katherine Bore hath made more noyse in their papers, then ten thousand of their Curtizans. Neither needs this man any other inscription on his grave to make him odious, then this, Here lyes the man that held mariage better then fornication. If now Doctor Luther in a vehement detestation of the impurity of their holy Stewes, after the homely plainnesse of a blunt German liberty, used some over-broad speeches to expresse his owne freedome, and their abominations; what is this to us? If we honour the man, must we hold his pen impeccable? This is enough to maintaine in their Vice-god of the seven hils. For us, we have sworne unto the words of no Master, but that One in Heaven, the eternall word of his Father. But this we dare say, that this Adversaries truth is no more in fathering all these reports upon Luther, then in fathering Luther upon an Incubus.

One of them tells us, that a Devill begot him: Another tells us, that (by his own confession) a conference with the Devill begot his opposition to the Masse: Another, [d] that he was in league and favour with Solyman the great Turke, who by his instigation was drawne to war upon Christendome: Another, [e] that Luther would have been a King alone, and that from him sprang the rebellion of Muntzer: Another, [f] that Leonard Knoppen was his Baud: and that his Katherine, for two yeares together after her stealing away, was debauched by the Schollers of Wittenberge: And now lastly comes in that malicious [g] Apostate (which should rather have changed the false name of Justus, then the over-worthy name of Calvinus) and avouches forsooth, that Luther was yesterday a Monke, to day contracted, to morrow an Husband, the next day a Father. Goe on, ye brazen-faced Parasites of Rome. Lyes and Blood may bring you into the Kalender.

But this last, my Detector countenances by the testimony of Erasmus, who, in a Letter of his to his friend Daniel Mauchius of Ulmes, delivers the same Story in more words. Reader, be intreated to looke over that large Volume of Erasmus his Epistles, and if there be no such man found there (as there is not) no such Letter, judge what to thinke of these mens fidelity. Yea to the plain contrary, my Detector (having not memory enough for a true Lyer) in the Page 173. upon another occasion contemptuously citing Luthers brood out of his owne Workes, confutes this spightfull Fiction. Anno 1525. Junii 12. uxorem duxi, &c. In the yeere, saith he, 1525. on the 12. of June, I married; In the yeere 1526. my eldest Sonne JOHN was borne: In the yeere 27. my Daughter ELIZABETH, and so the rest. Either then my man hath a new Kalender of his owne, which contrary to the Gregorian, begins the yeare on June the 13. or else Luther was not a Father the next day after he was an husband. But what doe I trouble my Reader with this idle Scoganisme? Scolds or Jesters are onely fit for this combat.

As for those excessive speeches of comparison, whereby Luther points forth the necessity of carnall actions, they are spoken onely of such persons as have not the gift of continency; whom naturall inclination (by which they are led) caries (without an higher restraint) importunately unto these desires: wherein he sayes not much other then their owne Saint Aquinas, Omnibus animalibus, &c. In all perfect living creatures there is a naturall inclination to carnall conjunction.

But when Luther speakes of men blessed from above with this gift, C. E. might have heard him in another straine; pleading both the possibility and worthinesse of this condition. As in his Commentary upon the [h] Psalme 128. verse 3. (to give one for

Thus he, gravely and holily.

SECT. IX.

NOW to follow my Adverſary in particulars: Whereas all the world ſees that the unlawfulneſſe of their vow depends upon the inability of performance, he, like a true Artiſt, begins firſt with the unlawfulneſſe. It is well that all theſe ſheets of Paper which he hath ſpent in this point, may ſerve for ſome neceſſary uſe; this which he hath put them to, is fooliſhly ſuperfluous. Refut. p. 19.

If the vow of Chaſtity be unlawfull (ſaith he) it muſt be either in reſpect of the vow, or the matter vowed: Not the firſt, becauſe vowes in generall are lawfull; which he will prove out of Scriptures and Fathers. Idle head! Who ever denied it, but the exploded Lampetians? His own Cardinall could have taught him, that Luther and Calvin approve the vowing of things commanded, firſt, and then of things not commanded too, to the avoiding of Sinne, or other good purpoſes. Not the Second, which he will prove by many arguments; ſome of them from the Fathers, extolling virginity, and compairing it with the ſtate of Angels, and preferring it before mariage. And who ever thought otherwiſe, except Jovinians? and perhaps not he. And at laſt, after ſome ſevere examples of penance injoyned to fornicating vow-breakers, by Chryſoſtome and Baſil, to incontinency and rape, by the civill Lawes (as if thoſe concerned us ſo much as themſelves) he deſcends to this challenge; Let Mr Hall (if he be able) produce us ſome proofe, although but one claſſicall authority of any one ancient writer, where he hath ever perſwaded ſuch as have ſolemnly vowed Chaſtity, to uſe Mariage as a meanes to overcome temptations, and he ſhall have ſome excuſe for calling it a filthy vow; and his heroicall Luther for terming it a diabolicall thing; So he. I take him at his word: onely let him not fly forth upon the ſhift of Solemnity, which their Schoole lately hatched; That were to ſeeke gray haires in infancy. First, I bring forth that famous place of Saint Cyprian, in his Epiſtle written both in his own name, and his fellow Biſhops, to Pomponius, concerning ſome vowed Virgins which were found in bed with men, whereof one was a Deacon; of which Virgins he with his Brethren paſſe this ſentence, [k] Quod ſi ſe ex fide Chriſto dicaverunt, &c. If they (ſaith he) have faithfully dedicated themſelves unto Chriſt, let them without all deceit perſevere in the courſe of chaſtity, and ſo courageouſly and conſtantly expect the reward of their Virginity; Si autem perſeverare nolunt, vel non poſſunt, &c. But if either they will not, or cannot perſevere, it is better that they marry, than by their wantonneſſe fall into the fire; Let them give no ſcandall to their Brethren and Siſters. What could Luther or Calvin write more directly? So that Eraſmus notes in the Margine, Etiam virginibus ſacris permittit nubere: Here Cyprian permits even holy Virgins to marry. [l] Bellarmines ſhift hereof is ridiculous, That Cyprian by occaſion of ſome Virgins, which after their vow behaved themſelves diſhoneſtly, adviſed others, that if they had not a firme purpoſe of perſevering, they ſhould not vow, but marry; whom we remit to the check of his owne Pamelius, yea, of his conſcience: Indeed, what is this but to mocke both the Author, and the Reader? For doth Cyprian at all vary the perſons of whom he ſpeakes? Doth he not ſpeake plainly of Virgins devoted to Chriſt? And what perſevering could there be, but in that which they had undertaken? And what had they undertaken, but a dedication of themſelves to Chriſt? What is this, Reader, but willingly to try his Oares againſt the ſtream of truth?

To the ſame purpoſe is that noted ſentence of Hierome[m], (though otherwiſe none of the beſt friends to mariage) who ſpeaking of Virgins, aſcribed by their vow into the celeſtiall Family, addes, Quibus apertè dicendum, &c. Whom we muſt openly charge that either they would marry, if they cannot containe, or, that they would containe, if they will not marry. We know the eluſion of this place alſo; That Hierome ſpeakes of Virgins in purpoſe, not in vow: But whoſe name, I beſeech you, was defamed by their lewdnes? or, what was the heavenly and Angelicall Family, whoſe glory was blemiſhed herewith? Was it of any other then profeſſed Virgins? Or could the act of a purpoſed Virgin onely, ſhame Virgins profeſſed? To the ſame purpoſe is the advice of [n] Baſil, and [o] Epiphanius.

Adde to theſe an elder then they all, Tertullian, and with him all thoſe Fathers which interpret Saint Pauls [volo juniores nubere] of vowed Widowes; All which muſt needs hold, that our Apoſtle allowes mariage for the lawfull remedy of unable Votaries.

Let not this malicious Maſſe-Prieſt then turn us over to his Tyberianus or Jovinian, for the firſt founders of our opinion and practice, which we received from no other then that divine Arch-heretick that ſate at the feet of Gamaliel; from no other then the holily-hereticall Fathers and Martyrs of the Church: As for thoſe two miſalledged Authors, to whom he aſcribes us, his ſkill doth palpably faile him in both: For Tyberianus, he being ſuſpected of Priſcillianiſme, wrote affectedly againſt that hereſie, at laſt foulely fell to that which he diſclaimed; whereon it was that Hierome ſayes, Canis ad vomitum, not upon the mariage of his daughter. And for that particular fact, it is no leſſe miſtaken. Hierome ſaies onely, Filiam virginem Chriſto devotam, matrimonio copulavit; but Sophronius (who it ſeemes well knew the ſtory) turnes it (ῥ γαμηθῆναι ἀγαπάγκασεν,) compell'd his daughter (a conſecrated Virgin) to marry. A foule fact, which we deteſt no leſſe then the contrary practice of thoſe Romaniſts, who compell their daughters (which would marry) to be conſecrated Virgins. It is then no leſſe falſe that Tyberianus gave beginning to us, then it is true that Tyburn hath given a juſt end to ſome of them. For Jovinian, what is he to us? when neither our practice was his, nor his opinion ours. Not our practiſe, for he lived and dyed a ſingle Monke. Not his opinion; How can we be ſaid to admit mariage to an equall ſhare of merit with Virginity, when we deny merit in either? Againe, that Eunuchiſme (not in it ſelf, but) for the kingdome of Heaven, is better then it, we doubt not; But when [q] theſe two are reduced to their Subjects, their value is according to their uſe. Chryſoſtome could ſay, [r] μὴ συμμυγίαν, &c. Uſe mariage with meet moderation, and thou ſhalt be the firſt in the Kingdome; And Gregory Nazianzen (beſides that he ſaith of his Siſter Gorgonia) when he commends the children of Baſil the elder, [s] tels us, ſome of them ſo uſed their mariage, that it was no hinderance to them, quo minus ad parem virtutis gloriam aſpirarent; that they might not aſpire to an equall glory of vertue with the Virgins; and made theſe two rather different kinds of life, then manners of living. And if Jovinian were Formoſus Monachus, craſſus, nitidus, &c. A faire, fat, ſpruce Monke (as he ſaith;) Me thinkes he ſhould rather have hoped to match him in their Sybariticall Cloyſters, where they abound with meat, and drinke, and eaſe, then in our laborious Clergy. It is happy for us, and for that Reverend Archbiſhop Marcus Ant. de Dominis, that this Rayler can object nothing to him but an harmleſſe load of corpulency. It moves their ſpleene enough, that this learned Prelate hath honoured our Iland with a Dalmatian Pall: Their cauſe feeles that he can (notwithſtanding) paſſe into the Pulpit: What ſpeake they of this? when to their ſorrow they ſee he could paſſe over the Alpes to leave Rome. This Beagle, and his balling Beyerlinck, and the kennell of Sarbon, may bay at him, but not one of their Bandogs dare faſten. But why doe I ſuffer this Babbler to lead me out of my way? what is all this ſleeveleſſe diſcourſe to a man that never ſaid, never thought every vow of this kinde unlawfull, nor every breach of ſuch vow ſinleſſe? when he takes me with this Tenet, let him load me with authorities; Till then, his now-frivolous Papers may ſerve for any honeſt uſe.

SECT. X.

NO lesse wise and proper is that other discourse of Impossibility: For, to make short worke, That no man can contain (though it be given him) I never said; That any man may continue (though it be not given him) either he will not say, or if he doe, he hath Christ for his Adversary. Why doe we blot Paper? How the performance of this Vow is not possible onely for all, but facill also, (which he contendeth) the issue proves too well, and the World blushes to see it. Let it not be too much burden to his patience, that I said, Some of their shovelings cannot hold; He knowes what their Glosse upon Gratian said to hold, (though now they have pulled out that tongue for blabbing) Eo nomine alter dicitur &c. It is commonly said, that a Clerke ought not to be deposed for simple fornication, Cum paucissima illorum (ut reperiuntur) sint; Since there are but a few found in it bout that vice. This they have wiped out of the Booke, but the Margarita Decreti (as happily) holds it still: And their honest Cassander, yet more plainly, Vix centesimum invenias, you shall scarce find one of an hundred free: And if need were, I could tell him out of old Bromiard, what the voice of a Ghost said to a Priest of theirs, but I will not; only thus he sums up, That there came daily such flore of Priests to Hell for their Luxury, in plaine English, Lechery, that he had not thought there had been any left upon earth. And to these I could adde the jestes of their zealous Preacher, Frier Menot, who fetches the threefold shame of their Clergie out of the Ave Mary, The second word of (though the first in mischiefe) is In Mulieribus. But what should I fill Carts with such stuffe, and easily might, when the salacity of the Romish Clergie is growne to be the Proverb and foolme of the World? Let not my Refuter scare us with the threat of recriminations; we know that in all Professions there may be found lewdnesse enough: but, when all is done, we shall justifie that which worthy B. Jewell said long since, Nusquam apud nullos deos tantum vinit, quam apud vos Penelope. Our strumpet is their Penelope. What needed he therefore to upbraid us with that frumpe of Erasmus, (Quæ malum est ista tanta salacitas, &c.) when he knowes how easily we can over-pay him in this Coyne? Was it not Erasmus, whose word it was (which Master Doctor Collet Deane of Pauls, was wont to have familiarly in his mouth) Nunc is est rerum ac temporum status, ut nusquam reperias minus inquinatam morum integritatem, quàm inter conjugatos? Now such is the state of the times, that you shall never finde lesse corruption of manners and life, then amongst the married. Was it not Erasmus that said, Atque utinam verè castrati sint, quicunque suis vitiis magnificum castrationis pretexunt titulum, sub umbra castitatis turpius libidinantes, &c. Neque enim mei pudoris esse puto commemorare, in quæ dedecora sæpe prolabantur qui naturæ repugnant, &c. This is enough to let my Detector see, we need not die in his debt for Erasmus.

BUT it is no arguing from the Act to the possibility. These did not contain, but they might. What? whether it were given them or no? So seemes mine Adversary to hold, whiles he censures Luther, for saying, that this is Gods gift; and that here we can onely take, and not give. Yea, but if they had asked, it would have been given them. Aske, and it shall be given: so saies my Refuter, out of Origen, none of the best Interpreters; so his Masters the Jesuits; Sufficit promissio generalis, saith Bellar. By this Rule, if the Cardinall should but pray for the Popedome, the three Crownes must come tumbling upon his Head; and if C.E. should but pray for a red Hat, it would have Mercuriall wings, and come flying to Delvyn. I would he had but praid for Wit, he had then perhaps been silent: Not considering, that Virginity, and Honour, and degrees of Wit (though excellent in their kinds) yet are such things as without which we may injoy God, and goe to Heaven; and therefore that perhaps God sees it best for us to aske them, and goe without. What can be more plain then that of * Hierome, If all might be Virgins, Christ would never have said, Qui potest capere, capiat; Neither would the Apostle so vehemently have perswaded to Virginity. Could he ever suppose that Virginity might be had without prayers? and yet he sayes, If all might be Virgins, &c. A

Who would not have thought, that this one text of our Saviour should have stopt all mouths? His Disciples had said, If thus, it is good not to marry. He replyes, All men cannot receive this Word, save they to whom it is given, and concludes, He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. Yet here see the forehead of a Jesuite; Maldonate upon the place dares say thus: * That he saith, all men doe not receive this Word, all Interpreters (almost) doe so expound it, as if the sense were, All men cannot perform this which you say, that is, Want a wife, because all have not the gift of Virginity, but onely those to whom it is given; for which he cites onely Origen, Gregory Nyssen, Ambrose, concealing the rest of his Almost all; yet after the same Page (forgetting himselfe) solus D. Augustinus, &c. Onely Saint Austin uses (saith he) to teach, that this gift of Continency is not given to all, but to some onely. It is happy yet that here we are grafted to erre with Saint Austin, and yet ere long, we take in Origen, Nyssen, Ambrose, Hierome; and at last, overtake Fevardentius, so as we need not feare solitarinesse in this error. But what sayes the Jesuite to this good company? Aliud est posse, ut sequar; No marvell. Marke, how well the Jesuites follow Jesus himselfe: Jesus sayes, All men cannot receive this: The Jesuites say, * All men may receive it. Jesus sayes, It must be given from God. The Jesuits say, * It is so the gift of God, that it is in the power of Man. How can we looke to escape their Opposition, when they dare thus contradict our Saviour? For me, I shall be still in this Heresie, That all their Priests, and Moncks, and Nuns cannot containe: And his * Bonaventure shall beare me out, who teaches me, that to the third degree of Chastity (requiri privilegium singulare) there is a singular priviledge required; for that it seemes to be above the pitch of naturall possibility; to live in the Flesh, and not to feele the fruits of Flesh. C

SECT. XII.

AS for his holy Sisters at Bruxels, the touch of whom hath so much enfired his ghostly zeale, I intended no quarrell to them in particular; They may be as honest, as their Champion is malicious. What I said, was out of the supposition of the common frailty; And if he have been so much in their bosome, as to know they never repented them, it is well knowne that others have, whose Song hath been in the hearing of those I know: D

What shall I doe, shall I die, and never married be?

Like unto those Vestalls,

Felices nuptæ, moriar nisi nubere dulce est.

As for the mischiefe following hence, the visible monuments of so many murthered Infants (if not in Gregories Ponds) in the very place where I now live, and * elsewhere, convinces it too much. But my example (ywis) shall cleere his Vestals of Bruxels, and all other votaries. Master Hall was absent (some three months) in France. Flesh is frayle, Temptations frequent (adde to these his body sickly, and well neere to death) yet hath liken and before his mariage, he would take it in great scorne (as well he might) to be suspected for dishonest. True, and might defie Men and Devils in that challenge. What of this? It followes then: If Master Hall could for so long together live a chaste life, why no more? Why not always? Demonstratively concluded: As if a mad should say, C. Endoth speake some wise words, how can he at any time write thus foolishly? A Christian hath sometime grace to avoide a Temptation, why not alwaies? Why doth he not keepe himselfe ever from sinning? A good Swimmer may hold his breath under the water for some portion of a Minute, why not for an houre? why not for more? A devout Papist may fast after his Breake-fast, till his Dinner in the afternoone, therefore why not a Weeke? Why not a Moneth? why E why not so long as Eve the Maid of Meurs?

The Spirit of God (if at least he may be allowed for the Author of Continency) breatheth where and when he listeth, and that God which makes Mariages in Heaven, either averts the heart from these thoughts, or inclines it at his pleasure. Shortly, The great Doctor of the Gentiles had never learned this Divinity of Doway, whose charge is, [c] Defraud not one another, except with consent for a season, that ye may give your selves to Fasting and Prayer: And againe, Come together, that Satan tempt you not through your incontinency. He onely wanted my Monitor, to jogge him on the Elbow, as here: What needs all this fleshlinesse (if they can safely containe) whiles they give themselves to extraordinary devotion, Why not more? Why not alwaies? It is pity that no man would advise the Apostle, how great a gap this Doctrine of his opens to all lasciviousnesse. Let me have but leave to put S. Pauls Name instead of mine, into this challenge of my Refuter, and thus he argues.

[c] 1 Cor. 7. 5.

If S. Paul say that [illegible], for a while they are able to live chaste, but not for any long while; I aske againe, How long that while shall endure? and what warrant they have therein for not falling? seeing it may so fall out, that in the while appointed they may be more tempted then they shall be againe in all their lives after. How sawcy would this Sophistrie be? how shamelesse? The words are his; onely the Name is changed: what the Elect vessell would answer in such a case for himselfe, let C. E. suppose returned by mee.

Refut. p. 65.

SECT. XIII.

THE Refuter hath borrowed some weapons of his Master Bellarmine, and knowes not how to weare them. It would move any mans disdaine, to see how absurdly those poore Arguments are blundred together; We must distinguish them as we may.

First, S. Paul condemnes the young Widowes mentioned, therefore he overthrowes this impossibility of containing. I answer: S. Paul advises the young Widowes to marry, and admits none into the Church-booke under threescore yeares: therefore he establishes in some this impossibility.

Refut. p. 63.

Secondly, S. Paul advises Timothy to live chaste. Reader, tell him the word is (σώφρονα) which their own vulgar, 1 Tit. 8. turnes, Sober; and in 2 Tit. 5. Prudent: But to grant him his own Phrase; Can my Detector descry no difference betwixt Chaste and Single? Did he and his fellows never heare of a conjugall Chastity? So they have still wont to speake, as if Chastity were onely opposite to mariage, as if no single life could be unchaste. His Espencæus might have taught him that verse in Virgil, Casta pudicitiam servat domus: and he might have heard of that Roman law of Vestals, Casta ex castis, puræ ex puris sunto: yea his Erasmus might have taught him yet further, [f] E diverso nihil prohibet in conjugio Virginitati locum esse; that even in Mariage there may be Virginity.

Thirdly, the Fathers exhort to Virginity; especially S. Ambrose and S. Austin. Let him tell this to them that know it not, to them that dislike true chastity in Virgins, not to them that condemne unchastnesse in a pretended Virginity.

To what vertues do not the Fathers exhort? yet never supposing them to be within our Lure. Lastly, where is the shame of my Refuter, that cites Austin as the Man on whom he depends for his universall possibility of Continency; when his owne Maldonat professes, that S. Austin is the onely enemy to this Doctrine?

Fourthly, Where there is impossibility or necessity, there is no sinne, no counsell; as no man sinnes in not making new Starres, in not doing Miracles. A stale shift, that oft sounded in the eares of Austin and Prosper from their Pelagians; The naturall man in this depravednesse of estate cannot but offend God, therefore he sinnes not in sinning: Counsell given shewes what we should doe, not what we can. [g] Jubendo admonet, &c. saith Austin; In commanding he admonisheth us both to doe what we can, and to aske that which we cannot doe. In Continency then our inde-vour is required for the attaining of that which God will give us; God never imployed us in making of Starres; though my Refuter is every day set on greater worke, the making of him that made Starres. Lastly, it is true, there is no sinne in marying, there may be sinne (after a vow) in not using all lawfull meanes of Chastity: The Fathers therefore supposing a [h] pre-required assurance of the gift, and calling of God in those whom mature deliberation and long proofe had covered with the vaile of Virginity, doe justly both call for their continuance, and censure their lapses.

Refut. p. 65. Fiftly, upon this ground the Father cannot blame his Child for incontinence; To containe, implies impossibility. Aske him wherefore serves Mariage? Yea, but to provide an Husband or a Wife, is not a worke of an houres warning; in the meane time what shall they doe? Sure the man thinkes of those hot Regions of his Religion, where they are so sharpe set, that they must have Stewes allowed of one Sexe at least; Else what strange violence is this that he conceives? As our Junius answered his Bellarmine, in the like, Hic homo sibi videtur agere de equis admissariis ruentibus in venerem, & de hippomane, non de hominibus ratione præditis; he speaks as if he had to doe with Stallions, not with men, not with Christians, amongst whom there is to be supposed a decent order, and due regard of seasonablenes and expediency: A doughty argument, wherewith Master Hall is sore pressed, (They may contain till they marry, and therefore they may ever containe, and not marry.) How easie is it for me to take up this load, and lay it upon my Saviour, which saith, All men cannot receive it; and upon his great Apostle of the Gentiles, who hath taught us an (ἴδιον χάρισμα) a proper gift, which God hath bestowed on some, not on others, and supposes a necessity, that may be of giving a Virgin in Mariage.

1 Cor. 7. 7.

Refut. p. 65. Sixtly, The Husband and wife are separated upon discord, or disease: What shall they doe? To live continent with this man is impossible. I answer, If onely their will sunders them, that must yeeld to necessity; Dissention may not abridge them of the necessary remedy of sinne. If necessity, that findes reliefe in their prayers; if they call on him, who calls them to continency by this Hand of his, he will heare them, and inable them to persist. And why not then in the necessity of our Vowes? This is a necessity of our owne making, that is of his; He hath bound himselfe to keep his own promises, not ours.

Sect. XIV.

Refut. p. 66. WHiles his Fellow, or Master Maldonate, talkes of confuting Austin in this very point, by Austin himselfe, this man will confute us by him; whom he no otherwise cites for himselfe, then his Ancestor Pelagius cites Lactantius, Hilary, Ambrose, Hierome, and Austin in this case. The thing (saith he) is in our power, and though it requires the assistance of Gods grace, which still preventeth our will, yet that hinders not, but that we may (if we list) live chaste all the dayes of our life, as we may upon the same termes beleeve in God, and love him. What impudency is this, to make him the Patron of the power of our Free-will to God, whom all the world knowes to have been Malleus Pelagianorum? and who in so many Volumes damnes this conceit to the Pit of Hell; evermore so establishing the naturall faculty and use of the will against Stoicall necessity, as that he abandons any power of the act, or exercise of it unto good (without grace) against humane presumption. When he speaks of this, here is not a cold and feeble prevention, but an effectuall inoperation, yea, a powerfull creation.

Since my Refuter then will needs be paralleling our ability of containing, and of beleeving, let him heare that holy Father say, [i] Non solum Deus posse nostrum, &c. God doth not only give, and help our power to good, but workes in us both our will and working of good. And elsewhere [k] He is drawne to Christ, to whom it is given to beleeve in Christ: Power is therefore given unto them to be made the Sonnes of God, which beleeve in him, when this is given them to beleeve in him. And so farre is he from saying with my Detestor

A Detector and his Bellarmine, that who liſts may beleeve when he liſts, that he reaſons thus: Quid mihi oſtendis, &c. [1]what doſt thou tell me of thy Free-will, which can never be free to doe good, except thou be a ſheep of God? He therefore that makes men to be his ſheep, frees the wills of men to the obedience of Piety: But why doth he make theſe men ſheepe, and thoſe not, ſince with him is no reſpect of perſons? The Apoſtle anſwers, O homo! &c. Thus he. Either therefore let him never cite S. Auſtin againſt us in this point, or elſe wee muſt be forced to countercite him once more then wee meant. [m] Plane poſſumus dicere frontem hæreticorum non eſſe frontem: And if there could be any more on that holy Fathers ſcore, Father Maldonate hath paid it for us. To conclude therefore for him; Arbitrium humanæ voluntatis nequaquam deſtruimus: We know no man doth well againſt his will; God uſeth not to make Virgins by force; and B the ſame goodneſſe that gives Chaſtity to the maried, continues Virginity to the ſingle: What of all this? Therefore (ſaith he) it is as well in the power of all ſingle perſons to be alwayes continent, as of the maried to keep conjugall Chaſtity: An illation and concluſion worthy of my Refuters Logick and Divinity; as if he argued thus for himſelfe; The ſame God that diſpoſes of Orders, diſpoſes of the Popedome; therefore I may as well look to weare three Crownes, as one ſhaven. Or the ſame God gives both Life, and Grace, and Glory: therefore all thoſe that live the naturall life, may alſo live the ſpirituall and glorious. Who ſees not the reaſon of theſe unlike? Conjugall honeſty is abſolutely commanded of God to all maried perſons; perpetuation of Virginity (he grants) was never commanded: the breach of conjugall honeſty is of it ſelf a ſinne to all; Mariage is not ſo. Againſt the one therefore we may abſolutely pray in [n] faith, againſt the other but with condition; God hath promiſed to deliver us from C our ſins, not from our Mariage.

As for Saint Ambroſe, we eaſily grant him large in the praiſe of Virginity. But no one word of all his cited authorities toucheth our Aſſertion: The helps of the Church, the ſervice of Angels, the merit of the Prayers of our Saviour, we yeeld to be good meanes of continence, where it is intended; but that it is meant to all commers, we deny; Let the ſucceſſe ſpeake.

Neither doe we taxe the Vow for any improbity in it ſelfe, but for the incapacity of the perſons: The Vow were good, if the men were not either evill, or unfit. And here [o] by the way, whereas C. E. like a maſterly Monitor wiſhes Maſter Hall to read the divine workes of Ambroſe, concerning this ſubject; Maſter Hall is bold (in requitall) D to tell C. E. that he knowes not Ambroſe; and to teach him (ſince he hath not learned it of other Maſters) that the Book which he ſo oft, and ſo ſolemnly cites for Ambroſes, [p] Ad Virginem lapſam, is a noted Counterfeit, a true Novatian; which his grave ignorance might have heard from his Bellarmine and Poſſevine.

And how much better is that other Tract which he [q] cites from Ambroſe, Epiſt. 82. wherein mention is made of * Venice, which was not extant till Ambroſe was not? And the Commentary of Ambroſe upon 1 Tim. 3. whence he fetches his forceableſt [r] Teſtimony for forced Continency; ſlit in the Noſe, and bored in the Eare long ſince by [s] Salmeron, Baronius, Bellarmine, and Francis Lucas. Of the ſame ſtamp (that the Reader may here ſee once for all how he is gulled by this falſe Prieſt with foyſted Authorities) is his Auguſtine, De bono Viduitatis, [t] thrice by him here quoted, not E without great triumph; branded by Eraſmus, Moſius, Lindanus: as likewiſe [u] his Auguſtine de Eccleſ. dogmat. confeſſed counterfeit by Bellarmine, and his friends of Lovain: and [x] the Sermons de Tempore, caſhier'd by Eraſmus, Mart. Lipſius, the Lovanians: whereto let us adde the book of great Athanaſius, de Virginitate, [y] produced in great ſtate by C. E. not without great wrong and ſhame fathered upon that Saint, as (if Eraſmus and Nannius did not ſhew) the ridiculous precepts therein contained would ſpeake enough. To follow all were endleſſe: Of this kind, laſtly, is his Cyprian de Diſciplina & bono pudicitiæ, not more magnificently [z] brought forth by C. E. then fairely ejected by Eraſmus and Eſpencæus. Theſe are the glorious Teſtimonies which grace the ſwelling Pages of mine Adverſary; Theſe are the pious fraudes wherewith honeſt Readers are ſhamefully coozened. For Origen, we have already answered; My Detector could not have chosen a better man for the proofe of the facility of this Worke, then him, who (according to the broad Tralation of his rude Rhemists) gelded himselfe, and made himselfe no man for it. That all graces are derived to us from the Fountaine, or rather the full Ocean of Christs Merits and Mercies, (which he shewes from S. Hierom) we willingly teach against them; so farre are we from being iujurious to the Passion of our deare Redeemer; But if he will therefore inferre, that every man may be a perpetuall Virgin, he may as well hope that therefore every Scribler may write all true. Our Saviour himselfe, which said I will draw all men unto me, yet said, All men cannot receive this; not I cannot give it, but they cannot take it.

As for that practice which he cites from S. Austin, of forcing men both into Orders and Continency, it shewes rather the Fact then the Equity; what was done in a particular Church, rather then what should be; The Refuter himselfe renounceth it in the precedent Page; (For the Church forceth none thereunto) neither is it any other then a direct restraint of that, which the Councell of Nice determined to be left free.

Lastly, that there may appeare to be no lesse impossibility of honest Truth in some men, then true Chastity, he cites one place for all, out of S. Austin, * Let not the burden of Continency affright us, it will be light if it be of Christ, it will be of Christ if there be Faith, that obtaines of him which commands, the thing which he doth command. See Reader, with what fidelity, and by this esteeme the rest; S. Austin speakes there of persons divorced each from other, whom necessity (as he supposes the case) cals to Continency; The Detector cites him for the power of voluntary votaries; the very place confutes him. It will be Christs yoke (saith Austin) if there be faith that obtaines of him which commands, the thing which he doth command: There can be no Faith where is no command; Now C. E. will grant there is no ° command of single life to all; Therefore all cannot aske it in Faith, therefore all cannot thinke it the yoke of Christ, all cannot beare it.

SECT. XV.

NOW at last (like some sorie squib, that after a little hissing and sparkling ends in an unsavory crack) my Refuter after all these Flourishes of their possibility, shuts up in a scurrilous Declamation against our Ministery; granting it indeed impossible, amongst us, to live chaste; and telling his Reader that we blush not to blaze in Pulpits and printed Bookes, this brutish Paradox, that Chastity is a vertue impossible to all, because so it is to such lascivious ? Libertines, sensuall and sinfull people, as Heretikes are; and here are sordes, dedecora, scabies libidinum: the brutish spirit of Heresie fleshly and sensuall. Impure mouth! How well doth it become the sonne of that Babylonian Strumpet, to call the Spouse of Christ Harlot! How well doth is become lips drencht in the Cup of those Fornications, to utter blasphemous Slanders (Spumam Cerberi) against Innocence? By how much more brutish that Paradox is, so much more devillish is the unjust imputation of it to us: Which of us ever blazed it? which of us doth hate it lesse, then the lye that charges it upon us? How many Reverend Fathers have we in the highest Chaires of our Church, how many aged Divines in our Universities, how many grave Prebendaries in our Cathedrall Churches, how many worthy Ministers in their rurall stations, that shine with this vertue in the eyes of the World? If therefore the proper place of Chastity be the Church of God (as this Caviller pleads) it is ours in right, ? theirs in pretence: And so much more noble is this in ours, for that in ours it is ? free, in them ? forced, Infida custos castitatis necessitas, as that Father said; Neque opus passeri fugere ad montem: In them, as Chrysostome said long since, τὸ σεμνὸν τῆς Παρθενίας ἀπόλωλεν, The grace of Virginity is lost: γελᾶται ἡ κεφαλή, The world makes sport with such Maiden-head. For the rest; The God of Heaven judge betwixt us and our enemies: To him wee appeale, how wee desire to serve him in chaste Wedlocke, whom they dishonour with uncleane and false Virginity.

A Not to put my Detector in minde how honorably he now speaks of mariage, how dares he talke of our fleshlinesse, and their chastity? as if he had to doe with a world that were both deafe and blinde. Doe not their owne Records cry in their faces, and tell him there are but a few of them honest? Did not their owne select Cardinals complaine, that the most of their Nunneries were justly scandalized with sacrilegious incontinencies.

Doe not our Histories tell us, that in the raigne of Henry the third, Robert Grosthead the famous Bishop of Lincolne, in his Visitation, was faine to explore the virginity of their Nuns, by nipping of their dugs, indignum scribi, 25 *Matth. Can he deny the unnaturall beastlinesse that raignes in his Italy? But what doe I stirre this puddle? Let me heare no more brags of their chastity, no more exprobrations of our lasciviousnesse.

SECT. XVI.

AS if my Refuter had vowed to write no true word, he challenges me for translating Isidores Turpe votum, a filthy vow: I turn to my Epistle, and finde it not englished by me at all. His owne conscience, belike, so construes it, or if some former Impression of mine (which I beleeve not) had so turned it, here is neither ignorance nor unfaithfulnesse. Wheresoever is sin, there is filthinesse: And if a lawfull vow be properly de meliore bono, can there not therefore be an unlawfull vow? What was that of Jephthes, or that of S. Pauls forty Conspirators? But the word there (saith he) signifies a promise, As if every vow were not a promise: and if Isidore take votum for promissum, [z] Gregory takes (by his construction) promissum for votum, in this very case we have in hand.

[z] Dist. 28. Greg. Petro, Diac l. 1. Ep. 42.

This vow of theirs therefore is metonymically filthy, because it makes them such. In one word, (that he may rave no more of Epicures, Turkes, Pagans,) Their vow is in profession glorious, filthy in effect. And now for a conclusion of this point, I must out of all these grosse and ignorant passages of his (though unproperly, yet) truly vow to the world, that a truer Bayard did never stumble forth into the Presse.

SECT. XVII.

HEE hath done with their owne vowes, and now descends to us, whom he confesses vowlesse; His scorne cannot strip us of the benefit of that Truth which he confesseth: Thus then he writes: If freely with other Catholikes grant, that our English Ministers, according to their calling, make no vowes; I grant their mariage to be lawfull; I grant that every one of them may be the Husband of one Wife, &c. And why did not this liberality of my wise Detector tye up his Tongue in his purse all this while? No more we required, no lesse is yielded; whereto is all this jangling? But, that his grant may prove worse then a deniall, thus he proceeds: But we deny them to be truly Clergy-men, or to have any more authority in the Church, then their Wives or daughters have: and this because they want all true calling and Ordination; For, they entred not in at the doore, like true Pastors, but stole in at the Window like Theeves; Wee deny their Ministery (I say) to be lawfull, because they did runne before they were sent, tooke their places by intrusion. Let Master Hall disprove this, and I will say, Tu Phyllida solus habeto. Thus he.

A deep crimination, and such, as if it could be proved, would rob our question of the state, and us of our duly challenged honor. Reader, this vehemency shewes thee where where his shoo wrings him: It is the gall of Romish hearts that we prosper, and are not theirs; Where they have presumed upon credulity, they have not stuck to say, we are not men like others, but more frequently and boldly, that we are no Christian men; and here most peremptorily, that we are no Clergie-men: There is no Church, no Christianity, no Clergie not theirs; Neither can we be in Orders, whiles we are out of Babylon.

The man dreames of the Nags-head in Cheapside, where his lying Oracle Tradition hath not shamed to report, Jewel, Sands, Horne, Scory, Grindall, and others in the beginning of Q. Elizabeths time (being disappointed of the Catholike Bishop of Landaffe) to have laid hands mutually on each other; and that from hence have flowed our pretended Orders. This our shameles* Sacrobosco heard of some good old folkes, and they had it of one Neale, Professor Ebrew in Oxford; Kellison tooke it of Sacrobosco, and C. E. of him. Concordat cum Originali; Diabolus est mendax & pater ejus. And is not this a worthy engine to batter downe the wals of a whole Church, to blow up all our ordination? Is it possible that any Christian face should be so graceleſſe, as to beare out such an apparant and ridiculous falshood, against so many thousands of witnesses, against the evidence of authenticall Records, against reason and sense it selfe? For can they hope to perswade any living man, that these having at that time a lawful Archbishop of their own religion, legally established in the Metropoliticall chaire, by an acknowledged authority, the sway of the times openly favouring them, when all Churches, all Chappels gladly opened to them, that they would be so mad as to goe and ordaine themselves in a Taverne? He that would beleeve this, may be perswaded that their adored blocks can weepe, and speake, and move, that their Cake is God; Never truth could be cleared, if not this: No lesse then the whole Kingdome knew, that Q. Mary dyed in the year 1558. November 17. and her Cardinall (then Archb. of Canterbury) accompanied her soule in death the same day. The same day was Q. Elizabeths Initium Regni; her Coronation, January 15. following. That leasure enough might be taken in these great affaires, the See of Canterbury continued void above a yeare. At last, in the second yeare of Q. Elizabeth, 1559. December 17. was Matthew Parker legally consecrated Archb. of Canterbury, by foure Bishops, William Barlow formerly Bishop of Bathe, then elect of Chichester, John Scory before of Chichester, now elect of Hereford, Miles Coverdale Bishop of Exceter, John Hogeskins Suffragan of Bedford. Mathew Parker thus irrefragably setled in the Archiepiscopall See, with three other Bishops in the same Month of December, solemnly consecrated Edmund Grindall, and Edwin Sands; The publike Records are evident and particular, relating the time, Sunday morning after Prayers; The place, Lambeth-Chappell; The manner, Imposition of hands; The consecrators, Matthew Cant. William Chichester, John Hereford, John Bedford; The Preacher at the Consecration, Alexander Nowel, afterwards the worthy Deane of Pauls; The Text, Take heed to your selves, and to all the flock, &c. The Communion, lastly administred by the Archbishop.

For Bishop Jewel, he was consecrated the month following, in the same forme, by Mathew Cant. Edmund London, Richard Ely, John Bedford.

Lastly, for Bishop Horne, he was consecrated a whole yeare after this, by Mathew Cant. Thomas S. Davids, Edmund London, Thomas Coventry and Lichfield; The circumstances, Time, Place, Forme, Preacher, Text, severally recorded. The particulars whereof I refere to the faithfull and cleare relation of Master Francis Mason; whose learned and full discourse of this subject, might have satisfied all eyes, and stopped all mouths. What incredible impudency is this then, for those which pretend not Christianity only, but the Consecration of God, wilfully to raise such shamefull slanders from the pit of hell, to the disgrace of Truth, to the disparagement of our holy calling.

Let me therefore challenge my Detector in this so important a point, wherein his zeale hath so far out-run his wit, and with him all the Brats of that proud Harlot, that no Church under heaven can shew a more cleere, even, uncontrolable, untroubled line of the just succession of her sacred Orders, then this of ours; if his Rome, for her tyrannous Primacy, could bring forth but such Cards, the world would be too strai: for her. He shall (maugre) be forced to confesse, that either there were never true Orders in the Church of England (which he dares not say) or else that they are still Ours. The Bishops in the time of King Henry the eight, were undoubted; If they left Rome in some corrected opinions, their Character was yet, by confession, [a] indelible. They laid their hands according to Ecclesiasticall constitution, upon the Bishops in King Edwards dayes; and they both upon the Bishops in the beginning of Queene Elizabeth; They againe, upon the succeeding Inheritors of their holy Sees, and they lastly upon us; so as never man could shew a more certaine and exquisite pedegree from his great Grandfather, then wee can from the acknowledged Bishops of King Henries time, and thence upwards to hundreds of Generations. I confesse indeed, our Archbishops and Bishops have wanted some Aaronicall accoustrements, Gloves, Rings, Sandals, Miters, and Pall, and such other trash: and our inferiour Orders have wanted Greazing and Shaving, and some other pelting Ceremonies. But let C. E. prove these essentiall which wee want, or those Acts and Formes not essentiall which we have, Et Phyllida solus habeto. In the meane time, the Church of England is blessed with a true Clergie, and glorious; and such a one, as his Italian generation may impotently envy, and snarle at, shall never presume to compete with, in worthinesse and honour; And (as Doctor Taylor, that couragious Martyr, said at his parting) Blessed be God for holy Matrimony.

SECT. XVIII.

MY Caviller purposely mistakes my rule of Basil the Great, and my text of the Great Apostle, whiles from both I resolve thus: I passe not what I heare men or Angels say, while I heare God say, Let him be the Husband of one Wife: he will needs so construe it, as if I tooke this of S. Pauls for a command, not for an allowance: As if I meant to imply from hence, that every Bishop is bound to have a wife. Who is so blind as the wilfull? Their Leo [b] calls these words a Preception, I did not. If he knew any thing, he could not be ignorant that this sense is against the streame of our Church, and no lesse then a Grecian errour. Who knowes not the extreames of Greece and Rome, and the Track of Truth betwixt them both? The Greek Church saith, He cannot be in holy Orders, that is not married: The Romish Church saith, He cannot be in holy Orders, that is maried: The Church Reformed sayes, He may be in holy Orders, that is maried, and convertibly. Some good friends would needs fetch us into this idle Grecisme, and to the society of the old Frisons [c], and (if Saint Ierome take it aright of Vigilantius) Espencæus, & Bellarmine, & our Rhemists free us. There is no lesse difference betwixt them and us, then betwixt May and Must; Liberty and Necessity. If then (Let him be the Husband of one Wife) argue that a Bishop may be a maried man, I have what I would, and passe not for the contrary from Men and Angels. We willingly grant with Luther, that this charge is negative: Non velut sanciens dicit, saith Chrysostome. But this negative charge implies an affirmative allowance; we seeke for no more: As for the authorities which my Detector hath borrowed of his Uncles of Rhemes, they might have been well spared: He tells us, Saint Jerome sayes, Qui unam habuerit, non habeat; He who hath had one Wife, not he that hath one; I tell him Saint Paul saith, [d] (εἰ τις ἐστιν) if any man be the Husband of one Wife, not, If he have been. Let [e] Saint Chrysostome therein answer Hierome and Epiphanius, and all other pretended opposites: Obstruere prorsus intendit hæreticorũ ora, qui nuptias damnant, &c. He purpos'd in this to stop the mouths of Heretickes, that condemned marriage, shewing that that estate is faultles, yea, so precious, that with it a man might be advanced to the holy episcopall Chair. Thus he; whom their learned [f] Bishop Espencæus seconds, and by the true force of the Text cleareth this sense against all contradiction. Nec enim Paulini de Episcopis, &c. For (saith he) those places of S. Paul concerning Bishops, Priests, & Deacons, cannot be so eluded, as that they doe only belong to men that have been been ſometimes maried, and are now Widdowers and ſingle; but the Text doth plainly note out Husbands, and thoſe that are now found in the preſent eſtate of mariage; which is implyed, both by the word eſſe, and by unius uxoris vir, that is, having one Wife, not (as ſome have underſtood it) which hath had one; for (as Chryſoſtome hath noted) the Apoſtle would by the ſociety of Mariage and Prieſthood, ſtop the mouths of Hereticks that condemned mariage: whereto adde, That the Apoſtle among ſt the vertues of a Biſhop reckons up this, That he doth governe his owne houſe well, not that he did governe it. Thus he. Unto which let me yet adjoyne this other conſideration, that the Apoſtle deſcribes what manner of Wife a Biſhop ſhould have; which as in other profeſſions he hath not done, ſo in this would have been uſeleſſe, if he had only aimed at an eſtate paſt, and not preſent.

Where it is a cunning tricke of the Rhemiſts, and their Vulgar, in ſtead of Their Wives, to read The Women, quite beſides the Scope and Context of the Apoſtle: As to the ſame purpoſe, Whereas their Leo in the forecited Epiſtle ſayes, that this Precept of a Biſhop, to be the Huſband of one Wife, was alwaies ſo ſacred, ut etiam de muliere Sacerdotis eligenda, eadem intelligatur ſervanda conditio: Bellarmine and his Mates would needs face us out, that the Copies are corrupted, and contends to have it read, Sacerdotis Eligendi, of the Prieſt to be choſen, not, of the Wife: whom our induſtrious and worthy Doctor James hath refelled both by the Preſſe, and the Pen, by the Coleine Edition, and Manuſcript authority.

That the ſame condition is to be underſtood of her that is to be choſen for the wife of the Prieſt.

Refut. p. 92, 93.

As for that he cites from Hierome againſt Vigilantius, he might have found the ſalve together with the wound: Our Rhemiſts cleare us from the imputation of his opinion. For the reſt, Nothing is more plaine, than that our Apoſtle (according to the juſt interpretation of Chryſoſtome, Theodoret, Theophylact, and others) alludes to the looſe faſhion, as of the Greekes, ſo eſpecially of the Jewes, with whom Polygamy and re-mariages, after unjuſt divorces, were in ordinary uſe: Theſe the Apoſtolicall Spirit finds unfit for the Man of God, whom he therefore charges to be onely, The Husband of one Wife.

Refut. p. 94, 95.

Neither doth it argue too much wit in my Refuter, to bring two Fathers upon the Stage for his purpoſe, and then to ſet them together by the eares with each other, Ambroſe (I meane) and Hierome, who in this which he cites them for, confute one another; Hierome (though otherwiſe a back-friend to Wedlock) cenſuring the opinion of Ambroſe, as ſavouring too ſtrongly of Cainiſme, and ſuperſtition: However, even the more vehement of the two, out of this place, doth hold Mariage compatible with holy Orders, which is the only thing I required: So as ſtill, This our word ſhall confirme me againſt all impure mouths: Impure, Not for preferring Continency, as my Caviller will take it; but for depraving Mariage, by the foule titles of Fleſhlineſſe and Senſuality; ſuch as his owne; a worſe we need not: Neither doth Saint Ambroſe at all controll me herein, whiles he teacheth that the Apoſtle doth not here invite us to beget children in the Prieſthood. Habentem enim dixit filios, non facientem: we did not challenge hence any command, we challenge an allowance, which we have and proclaime: That I may not ſay, ſome Copies of Ambroſe runne (according as I have learned of our eminent Doctor Fulke) Habentem filios, aut facientem, Having children, or begetting them: The difference is not worth ſtanding for: Let it paſſe after his own reading. I could ſtop his mouth with the ingenuous anſwer of his Eſpencæus: Habentem enim, &c. For he ſaid, Having children, not begetting them: Debellatum hic eſſet. &c. This field were wonne, if either this were the Text, and not the Gloſſe, or they that thus interpret it, were Apoſtles, as they are not. Thus their own Biſhop. But I need not call for any ayde: The words of Ambroſe doe plainly drive againſt an invitation or command, which we doe willingly diſclaime.

SECT. XIX.

HOW unhappy is this man that ſtill ſhoots his Arrows quite beſide the But? He proves, forſooth, with great zeale, that the Fathers never underſtood a poſitive command in our Apoſtles words, which I never thought ſo much as in dreame: and then he bends his forces againſt Bygamie, which I no where avouched. The Man of valour loves to play his prizes alone. Refut. p. 96.

Here is no command then (ſaith he) but a permiſſion; How much are we bound to him for this favour? Permiſſion? Thus much he, with his holy Father, yeelds to their Stews. No, here is a direct allowance. Let him be the Husband of one Wife, Not, He may be ſo: But this was onely for a time, he ſaith, becauſe of the paucity of ſingle Clergy-men: let him ſhew me the Apoſtles limitation, and I am ſatisfied: otherwiſe, this misgrounded conceit (what countenance ſoever it may finde in a private humane authority) ſhall paſſe with us as a Gloſſe of Burdeaux, that marres the Text. But how ſhamelesly, how fraudulently, how like himſelfe, doth my Refuter cite Chryſoſtomes Caſtigat impudicos, &c. He checketh the incontinent (ſaith the Father) whiles he permitteth them not after their ſecond mariages, to be preferred to the government of the Church, and dignity of Paſtors; and there my Refuter ſtops, with, So he; whereas, if he had gone forward, the place had anſwered him, and it ſelfe: For (ſaith Chryſoſtome) he which is found not to have kept his benevolence towards his Wife, which is [a] gone from him, how ſhould he be a good Teacher to the Church? Plainly ſhewing us that he intends this to thoſe unchaſte Huſbands, which after an unjuſt divorſe of their former wives, have maried alſo a ſecond; not after the death of the firſt. Refut. p. 96. Chryſoſt. in Tit. Hom. 4.

The like Prieſtly fidelity he uſeth in the place of Chryſoſtome, Hom. 2. upon Job; the poore Man had taken up ſome ſcraps of quotations upon truſt, having never ſeen the Author. For, Chryſoſtome never wrote any Homilies upon the Book of Job; onely he hath five Homilies of the Patience of Job, whereof this cited is the ſecond; wherein his, eveni ignoſcebat, hath reference rather to ſine crimine, which he oppoſeth to irreprehenſibiles, than to ſine unius uxoris; as the ſequell plainly ſhews. As for Bigamy, it is out of our way, but ſince his loquacity will needs rove thither, let him ſhew that before Montanus infected the World with a prejudice againſt ſecond Mariages, after deceaſe, they were held unlawfull for any calling, or perſon, and we will grant him clamorous to ſome purpoſe. Refut. p. 97.

To prove this opinion and practice of the Church, like a wiſe Maſter, he brings in [a] Tertullians authority, in his Book which he wrote in the time of his Hereſie, whiles he was over the ears in Montaniſme; where he tels us, he hath known ſome ejected for ſecond Mariages. But if he had ever read the Book following, of Monogamie, he might have found his Tertullian (then Montanizing) to upbraid the true and Catholike Church, which he calls Pſychicos, with the uſuall practice and allowance of the ſecond Mariages of their Biſhops. [b] Quot enim & digami, &c. For how many Biſhops are there among ſt you twice maried? But who ever was marcht with ſo vain a Babler? I proved from Saint Paul, that a Biſhop might have one Wife: he proves by Councels and Fathers, that he may not have two. It is pity that his Maſters the Jeſuits have no more Trees for him to ſet with the roots upward: Any thing rather then to weary the World with his fooliſh clacking. Refut. p. 98.

Out of this indiſcreet and odious verboſity (leſt he ſhould want noiſe) he ſtumbles upon the Councell of Conſtantinople, before it come in his way, and ſpends a whole leafe onely to tell us that he will talke of it hereafter. Hereafter he ſhall receive anſwer enough. What needs this diſorderly anticipation? To conclude then, this place of our Apoſtle ſtands for us unſhaken, by any the impotent blaſts of his frivolous Eluſions, and ſhall warrant us againſt Earth and Hell, that a Biſhop may be the Huſband of one Wife. Refut. p. 100. 101.

MY next place, of the honourableneſſe of Mariage amongſt all, he ſmooths over with a pretended conceſſion; profeſſing with Fulgentius and Hierom, to give all high Titles to that ſtate, only preferring the rule of a better life, praiſing Mariage, but more extolling Virginity: But who ever made the compariſon? Theſe are faire Nets to catch Fooles; Whiles he heaps up all the reproachfull termes that ſpight can deviſe againſt the very ſtate of Mariage, in ſome callings, nor ſo much as prejudiced by Vow, how doth he grant Mariage honourable amongſt all? If the compariſon be the matter he ſtands upon, let him ſay, Mariage is good, and lawfull for all conditions; Virginity is better; he ſhall have no adverſary. And whereas (to call him to reckoning for arrerages) he turned off this place (when it was) with a ſcoffe out of Bellarmine, That Mariage is honourable amongſt all, yet not between Father and Daughter, &c. The man alluded ſure to their great and good Alexander the Sixt, and the chaſte Lucrece, of whom he knows the Riddle:

Refut. p. 13.

[d] Here lies Lucrece in name, Thais in life. The ſame Popes daughter, Lemman, and his own ſonnes wife.

For us, that it is honorable in all eſtates of men by Apoſtolicall warrant, is ſufficient aſſurance, that to no calling, or eſtate, it can be diſhonourable and unlawfull. But to untie Bellarmines trifling knot: I ſay, Mariage is honorable, in omni, but not inter omnes. in all, but not between all; That is, every man may marry with a woman, but not with any woman whatſoever, as with his Mother, or Siſter. So Father and Daughter may marry, but not one the other. See now what a worthy Meſſe of Sophiſtry is laid in S. Pauls diſh by theſe Carvers, and how eaſily over-turned: So I might very well proclaim to all the world (which I doe now confidently ſecond) that if God might be Judge of this Controverſie, it were ſoon at an end. If my Refuter make faces at this, their whole School ſhall beare me out in it. Et ſane communis eſt Scholæ reſolutio, &c. And in truth, it is (ſaith their Eſpencæus) the common reſolution of the Schoole, that if we inſiſt onely in thoſe things which were ſpoken by Chriſt, and written by the Apoſtles in the Canon of the New Teſtament (ſecluding the Lawes of the Church) holy Orders, neither as Orders, nor as holy, are any hindrances of Matrimony. Thus he. And ſaid any more? any other?

By their confeſſion then, God never impoſed this Law. My proofe was, that even in the time of that legall ſtrictneſſe he allowed Wedlock to the Miniſters of his Sanctuary. Herein how am I refuted? If he mean (ſaith my Detector) that for purity and perfection of life, the Law of Moſes was more ſtrict then the Goſpell, the untruth is notorious; To which he addes out of Hierome, that the greater perfection of the Evangelicall Sacrifice exacteth greater Holineſſe; and concludes, that the permiſſion of Wives in the Aaronicall Prieſthood, argues evidently the imperfection of that Law. So he. Surely God wanted this Counſellor upon Mount Sinai; he could have adviſed him better Rules of his miſ-contrived Prieſthood.

Ib. p. 102, 103.

Would my Refuter make himſelfe ſo ignorant, as not to know, that notwithſtanding the rather greater perfection of Morality required under the Goſpell, yet that Leviticall Law placed impurity in many of thoſe creatures and actions, wherein the Evangelicall findeth none? Did not the touch of ſome Veſſels or Garments make a man legally unclean? Did not the lawfull act of Conjugall Benevolence? Did not the accidents of the holieſt Childbed cary in them an expiable impurity? If he be not a Jew, he will not ſay it is ſtill thus under the Goſpell. How juſtly therefore might I inferre, that if our holy God, unto whoſe Wiſdome it ſeemed good to ſtand of old upon ſuch points of outward uncleanneſſes, did notwithſtanding allow wedlock to his Prieſthood, much more (at leaſt no leſſe) under the Goſpell doth he allow it, when as all thoſe imputations of impurity are vaniſhed.

Sect. XXI.

I Produced the Testimony of their Pope, their Cardinal, their Doctor. Basils Rule is a sure one, that the Witnesses of Enemies are most convictive. Their Cardinal was Panormitan, Their Pope, Pius the second, Their Doctor, Gratian. For Panormitan; Mr Refuter likes his words so well, that like a sawcy fellow he dare pull off his red Hat and trample it in the Floore, denying his Cardinallship, and charging him with participation of the Schisme. But first he cannot (I hope) deny him to have been their Abbot, then their Archbishop; As for his red Hat, it never came from Wittenberge nor Geneva; it was of their own dying; Felix the false Pope (he sayes) gave it him. Reader, the famous Councell of Basil, consisting of no lesse then foure hundred reverend Persons, Cardinalls, Archbishops, Bishops, Doctors, gathered and allowed at first by Pope Martin, then by his Successor Eugenius the fourth, afterwards was upon some Politick considerations called off by Eugenius; The Fathers of the Councell finding their owne strength, stood upon the right of their Superiority, and (as they well might) censured the Pope; he proceeded to obstinacy; those brave spirits (upon ripe consideration) justly deposed him. In the room of this Eugenius (otherwise called Gabriel Condulmarius) was by just number of voices elected Amadeus the devout Duke of Savoy, and named Felix the Fifth, a man too good for that See, neither had he ever any so great blemish in all his life, as the name of a Pope. Volaterran can tell us, what a kenell of hounds he showed to the Ambassadors, namely, whole tables of poore Soules daily fed by him; All Histories speake of his Devotion and Piety; This man called from his intended retirednesse, must carry the Keyes. He makes choice of Archbishop Panormitan for one of his Cardinalls: What offence is here? But he was a false Pope. If the Councell of Basil were a true Councell, then was Felix a true Pope. It is in my Readers choice whether he will beleeve foure hundred Divines representing the whole Church, or a Popes parasite. But Panormitan dyed in the Schisme against Eugenius. The World knows that the greatest blot Panormitan ever had, was his violent plea for Eugenius, against the Bishop of Argens, against eloquent Segovius, against the whole streame of that Councell; This is the thank he now carries away, Felix scelus virtus vocatur. If Eugenius had not dealt under-hand with the Dolphin of France and Frederick of Austria, (then ambitious of the Empire) and tryed all his wits, both to make new Cardinals, and to divert the Neutrals, Eugenius had not been Felix, and Felix had been still Eugenius, the true and undoubted Successor of Peter: However, if these points should be strictly stood upon, Rome would be at a losse, which many a time hath been to seek for her Head. But what though it were granted that Panormitan was Cardinalated by an intruding Pope? Can this call downe the authority of his Judgement and Writings? especially those which he wrote before he was Cardinall or Archbishop, being only Abbot: And yet may be cited by us under the name of Cardinall: as Bellarmines Dictates and Composures elder then his red Hat, yet are fathered upon that Title.

Once, this I am sure of, that [f] Cardinall Bellarmine doubts not to stile Panormitan a Catholike and learned Doctor. This is the man that stands with his Hat off to this worshipfull Clarke of Doway, and tells him that Continency is not of the substance of Order, nor by Divine Law annexed to it; whereto he shuffles out a miserable and desperate answer, as we shall see in the sequell.

But in the meane time, see the cunning of my Catholike Caviller, This is not the sentence I stood upon, of Panormitan, it was not this, wherein I proclaimed mine owne, but another, which he slily smothers, not daring so much as to repeate it, lest his Romanizing popular ignorant Readers should heare, and see, and smell, that the sacred Celibate of Priests did stinke an hundred years before Luthers time. I will therefore here supply for him, and, hoping he will in his next take notice of the sentence, will repeat it here againe.

The words are these; Mirum forsan, & profano & falsae animarum salutis, & ejus unius cujusq;

nunscujusq; voluntati relinqueretur, ita ut non valentes aut non volentes continere, possint contrahere; Quia experientia docente experimur contrarium effectu sequi ex illa lege continentiæ, cum hodie plerique non vivant spiritualiter, nec sint mundi, sed maculentur illicito coitu cum ipsorum gravissimo peccato, ubi cum propria uxore esset castitas. That is, It were better and more wholesome for the good, and salvation of soules, if it were left to every mans will; so as they which either cannot, or will not contain, might marry. For we finde by experience a contrary effect to follow upon that Law of Continency; since the greatest part (of our Priests) at this day live not spiritually, neither are chaste, but are defiled with unlawfull copulations, not without their most hainous sinne; whereas with their own Wives it should be Chastity. Thus he. A sentence worthy of that Epiphonema of mine. (Is this a Cardinall think you or an Huguenot?) With this my Detector deals, as their Inquisition doth with a miss-named Heretick; he chookes it up in secret, or, if he bring it forth, it is not without a gag in the mouth: All his answer is, We tye not our selves to every mans opinion, and, This sentence is censured by Bellarmine as erroneous; As if Panormitan were every body, and Bellarmine an Oracle. It is enough for us, that one of their own greatest, learnedst, zealousest Prelates justifieth our Mariages; and wisheth them in use rather then their Continency.

Refut. p. 105.

To that other Testimony of Panormitan, he answers by a grant, yeelding us fitely, That if we take divine Law for that which is expressely determined in Scripture, it must needs be said, that there is no evident proofe set down of continency in Ecclesiasticall men by the Apostles; yet, that it is so insinuated, and the observation of it hath been so ancient, as Bellarmine noteth, that it may be truly termed Apostolicall; Thus he. And even for this are we beholden to him; All his friends would not have been so liberall. His Joannes Major, his Cl. Clavius, his Torrensis, and all their rigorous Clients would not have said so: As, on the other side, the old glosse was not so wise, that could only say (which is now expunged) Apostoli docuerunt exemplo, The Apostles taught this by their example. But what are these so pregnant insinuations? Good wits have found them out; One was that of Innocentius the second, That these men are the vessels and Temples of God, therfore they may not Cubilibus & immunditiis servire, sed mensæ, thalamis & vestimentis. Ywis, no Lay-man is such; therefore he may be allowed to be filthy. Another was of Frater Torrensis, Take heed lest your hearts be oppressed with surfetting and drunkennesse, and cares of this life: Whereof Bishop Espencæus is so ashamed, that he answers it with an Absit, God forbid (saith he) that we should think that the Lord, which is the Author and sanctifier of Mariage, should hold it in the same rank with surfetting and drunkennesse. Another was of the same Author (teaching us to deny ungodlinesse and worldly lusts:) us, of the Clergy; belike the rest need not. And who knows not the witty and learned insinuations of their good Siricius, Those that are in the flesh cannot please God? These and such like are the forcible insinuations of this imposed continency, which even very boyes and Ideots can hisse out of the Schooles.

Sect. XXII.

From Panormitan, he descends to my alleadged Gratian, who because he speakes these words (by way of explication) in a continued tenor with a sentence of Austin, is (to my mortall sinne) cited by me as speaking from Austin. The position and the inference of the words is such as might deceive any such that would trust a Gratian; What might the price be (trow we) of such a crime in the Apostolike chamber? In my next Shrift, he shall heare, meâ culpâ; The words are Gratians, that Copula Sacerdotalis vel consanguineorum, The mariage or (as this Clerkly Grammarian translates it) the carnall copulation of priests, or kinsfolke, is not forbidden by any Legall Evangelicall or Apostolicall authority, but by Ecclesiasticall Law it is forbidden. We could not hyre a Proctor to say more. But herein C. E. hath detected two foule faults of the citation; The one, that I trusted his Gratian so far, as to make him speak out of Austin, which (I trust) a little Holy-water may wash off. The other, That I concealed the mariage of kinsfolke, within the prohibited degrees; which (saith he) although only for [illegible] by by Ecclesiasticall Law, yet dares not M. Hall (I think) transgresse it; so as this Law hath greater force then he supposeth it to have. So he. Plainly, my Refuter knows not what he saith, else he would never thus palpably plead against himself. For, what ever thing was there in all the constitutions of his Church, more subject to variation, than the legall supputation of the forbidden degrees? which was a long time confined to the third degree inclusively, another while extended to the fourth, and sometime to the seventh. Let him herein reconcile his Pope Nicholas & Gregory, with Pope Innocent, whereof the one left all free that were without the pale of the fourth degree, the other restrained all to the seventh; And when he finds an unalterablenes in the determination, of these degrees, let him plead for an equally-fatall necessity of his Ecclesiasticall continence; in the mean time, let him take it patiently to be beaten with his own Rod.

No divine Law then (he grants) hath injoyned this Celebate, but all Ecclesiasticall. What is this other than I said? God never imposed this Law of Continency; Who then? [1] The Church. And why may not I go on, to ask, Whether a good wife would gainsay what her husband willeth? Flourishing will not answer this. All the praises of beauty and fidelity which are given to the true Church, argue Rome to be the false. Whereas therefore the Priest shuts up thus bravely; And this Minister, who would make the one to gain-say the other, should bring some place or sentence to shew the same (which he may chance to doe the next morning after the Greek Calends) or else never avouch so unchristian a Paradox: He shall understand, that his Greek Calends are past. The Spirit of God saith, A Bishop may be the Husband of one Wife: The Church of Rome sayes, A Bishop may not be the Husband of any Wife at all: Whether is this a contradiction? The Spirit of God sayes, Marriage is honorable among st all men: The Church of Rome sayes, Marriage is dishonorable to some. The Spirit of God sayes, To avoid fornication, let every man have his Wife; The Church of Rome, like a quick huswife, sayes, Some Order of men shall not have a Wife, though to avoid Fornication. Let my Masse-Priest shew these to be no contradictions (which he may chance to doe at the Greek Calends) or else grant this to be neither Paradox nor unchristian.

SECT. XXIII.

FRom Cardinall Panormitan, I ascended to Pope Pius the Second, whom I ushered in with this Preface, Let a Pope himselfe speak out of Peters Chayre, Pius the second, a learned man hath sit in that room this thousand yeeres. Two things my Caviller snarles at in the Preface, two in the authority it selfe. Refut. p. 108.

My first manifest untruth is, that Pius the second spake this as out of the Chaire. A wildesse misprision: I hope he sate in Peters Chaire that spake it, if he spake it not as from the Chaire, I care for no more. Is not this sufficient to win respect from a Catholike Priest? Otherwise, whether it were Stool, or Chair; or if a chaire, whether the Consistoriall, or the Parphyry chaire, wherein he sits before his first triumph, [1] Sanguam in stercoraria, it is all one to me. Themselves must first agree what it is to speak as from the Chair, ere I can affirm that Pius the Second so spake this. Id populus curat, I referred the chaire to the man, not to the speech: In the mean time C. E. is not so good a groom to that Chaire, as Gregory of Valence, who attributes infallibility to a Popes sentence, though it be [m] sine cura & studio. My second wrong is the superlative lashing (so he calls it) of other Popes learning in comparison of this. I cry him mercy; I did not know what sin it was to commend a Popes learning; That is not it (I confesse) that caries away the Crown and the Keyes: But the comparison offended. Perhaps C. E. hath known the Chair more learnedly furnished: It may be he thinks of Boniface the Ninth, called before Peter de Thomacellis, a Neapolitan, [n] who could neither write, nor sing, hardly understanding the propositions of the Advocates in the Consistorie; insomuch as in his time, Anscitia fere venalis facta fuit in Curia, Ignorance was grown valuable. Or it may be he thinks of those ancient female-fingred Boy-Popes, one of the Benedicts, a grave father of tenne yeeres old, old; or John the thirteenth, an aged Stripling of nineteen. Or perhaps he alludes to those learned times (within my compasse) which were acknowledged in the Councell of Rhemes; where, when offer was made of requiring the Popes judgement, it was publikely replyed, that besides the exposednesse of the City to sale, Romæ jam nullum fere esse qui literas didicerit, There was scarce a man at Rome that could spell his Letters.

Heu quàm perfatuæ sunt sibi, Roma, togæ!

If I should here adde out of Alphonsus de Castro, that some Popes were such great Clerks, ° ut Grammaticam penitus ignorent, That they had no skill in Grammar, &c. would tell me that my book is not of a corrected edition, though it was printed at Coleine. Such bran hath been cast out in their later sifting and shifting of Authors.

SECT. XXIV.

* Mariage upon good reason was forbidden to Priests, but upon greater reason seems fit to be restored. Resol. p. 109.

IN the authority it self, his Cavils are childish; Where Pius said, * Sacerdotibus magnâ ratione sublatas nuptias, majore restituendas videri; my first fault is, that I turn Sacerdotes, The Clergie, in stead of Priests; which word is of a large extent, including also Bishops: The silly man sees not that I translated it to his advantage, against my own; For, every Sacerdos is Clericus, not every Clericus, Sacerdos. Very frequently are Bishops comprehended under the name of Sacerdotes, as well as of Clerus; and no lesse usuall under the name of Clerici the superior Orders are not comprehended. He is not worthy to write himselfe Priest, that understands his Orders no better.

My second error is, That I turned the last Clause of the Sentence, (Is to be restored) whereas the words are Restituendas videri. Here could be no fraud, while I set the Latin words in the Margine. The man thinks of his (Jesuit ad Te Jdi) or his Videtur quod sic, probatur quod non; but if his Grammer had not been ill learned, he had known that [Videri] doth not alwaies signifie a doubtfull probability, but sometimes a certain evidence, as, Visum est Spiritui sancto & nobis; and, Qui videbantur Columnæ: Or, if this Logick had fully taught him the distinctions of [Sunt and Videntur] this quarrell had been spared. This Seeming was Being; Or, if this lawless Lurker had ever had any taste of the Civill or Canon Law, he might have been able to construe that Maxime, Quod quis per alium facit, per se facere videtur: and that judged Case, Qui nomen debitoris legatum vivente exegerit, legatum ademisse videtur. In this stile spake this learned Pope, which my unlearned Adversary cannot reach unto. For, if Pius, or Sylvius may have leave to comment upon himselfe, when the question was of suffecting Amadeus Duke of Savoy, a maried man, in the room of Eugenius, Ex quo constat (saith he) &c. It is apparant that not onely he which hath been maried, but he that is maried may be assumed to the Popedome: and a little after, Fortassè pejus non esset, &c. And perhaps it were not worse, if more Priests had Wives, for many would be saved in a maried Priesthood, which now in a single Priesthood are damned: he saith directly, Damnantur, They are damned, not, They seem to be damned. And therefore to prevent this reall damnation, Mariage is really to be restored to them, not that it should only seem to be restored. To conclude, take Videri for bare seeming, surely it must be construed, Videtur mihi, I Pope Pius think, or judge that it were fit that Priests should have the liberty of Mariage restored again to them, which together with sublatas implyeth, that in former times Priests were maried, and as the case now standeth, ought again so to be. Which is the very state of this question, which we avouch.

And in his Epistle to John Freind, Credimus te non insulsè uti consilio; I think it is no ill Counsell for thee (since thou canst not contain) to seek for a wife, although that should have been thought of before thou didst enter into holy Orders; but we are not all Gods, that we can fore-see future things: since it is come to this, that thou canst not resist the Law of thy Flesh, it is better for thee to marry, then to burne. Thus he. For which advice, doubtlesse he found good cause in his own experience; who having been imployed formerly in this Land of ours, left two Bastards behind him, the one begotten of an English woman, the other of a Scottish; The one whom he commends to his Father Sylvius, a Citizen of Siena; the other he confesses to his friend P. de Noxeto: But this indeed was before his Priesthood; Afterwards, it is strange what he confesses of himselfe in his 92. Epistle, Mihi hercle parum meritiest in castitate; I cannot boast of any merit in my chastity; (for to tell the truth (Magis me Venus fugitat, quam ego illam horreo) Venus doth rather flie from me, then I abhorre it. It was not therefore out of speculation, but sense, not out of seeming, but certainty, that Sylvius passes his Retinendi videri.

So now to shut up this point, the blessed Apostle St. Paul, and (in his Attendance) Ambrosius, Gratian, and Pius (in their cleer suffrages for us) are fully acquitted from the vaine cavils of my Detector, and God is on my side, the Church of Rome on his. Let Sincerity judge which Scale of the Ballance is heavier.

While he was Cardinall, he had his Concubine, to whō at last he gave three score Florens for her Dowry. Epist. 361.

SECT. XXV.

FRom the lawfulnesse of our Mariages, I descended to the Antiquity; where my Refuter takes an ignorant exception. I said, Some things have nothing to plead for them but Times: Age hath been an old refuge for falshood: Then I lay for my foundation Tertullians rule; That which is first, is truest: My Detector finds here a flat contradiction, and cries out, Doe these men wake or sleep when they write? There are none of his wise friends which will not be ashamed of this grosse stupidity; For whether of these two Sentences can he dislike? and if both be allowable, how can they be contradictory? neither am I his Adversary herein, but Tertullian. What surer way could there be, then to controll the pretences of a secondary antiquity by the first? And what contradiction is in this? The first is true: all under the first is obnoxious to error; The puisne posthumous Antiquity hath been a refuge for falshood, the Primigenious Antiquity (which proceeded from the ancient of Daies) is certaine. Let this Trifler go learn to spell English, ere he presume to Divinity. This antiquity is the touch whereby we desire all truth to be tryed; which easily finds all the gilded coyns of Romish innovations, shamefully counterfeit.

Refut. p. 110.

* Rectum est quodcunque primum, adulterinum quodcunque posterius, Tert. de Præscr.

Not to go back so far as Paradise (though I well might) where God made the first wedding in perfect Innocence; I began with Moses and his Leviticall Brother-hood; to which my Refuter replies, That yet in eating their Paschall Lamb they had their loynes girt. Justly concluded! All the Jews did eat the Pschall Lamb with their loynes girt, for the expedition or moment of their flight, therefore their Priests and Levites did not converse with their Wives. If his Superiours of Doway doe not blush at this Logick, his wit and their shame are gone together.

Refut. p. 111.

But, They abstained (he saith) from their Wives, while they did minister in the Sanctuary: What if we yeeld this? Their Ministration was by courses, and had intermissions. There is an holy and decent modesty in all those which are worthy to serve at the Altar, which teacheth them to give God his due times, with respect even of outward purity; which is all that † Eusebius by them misse-translated, and misse-alleaged by him, requireth. But what will my Refuter say to the High Priest himselfe, which was bound every day to a morning and evening Sacrifice, who yet was not restrained from a conjugall society? That Bone hath troubled, blunted, and broken better Teeth than his.

But (saith he) The figure of the eternall Priesthood of Christ (to wit Melchisedeck) is not read to have had any wife at all. VVhat of this? He, whom he prefigured, was only a spirituall Husband to his Church. If this man be not read to have had a wife, no more is he read to have had Father or Mother: Nay, he is read to have had neither. VVhy do they not thence infer, that Priests ought to have neither, but to be begotten and borne of Angels, not of humane kinde? which is as good for an inference as that foppery is for a legendary fable, that Luther was begotten by an Incubus. Yet had the Israelites (not mysticall) Melchisedec both Father and Mother: and if Sem were Melchisedec (as wiser men then mine Adversarie have upon good probabilities thought) he may passe, I hope, for a maried man.

As for the perfection of the new Law above the old, it only bars those institutions which had in them an imperfection, not those which God thought fit for Paradise it selfe. So as the practise of the Jewish Church, founded by God himselfe, is an all-sufficient warrant for the mariage of his Evangelicall Ministers.

SECT. XXVI.

FRom Moses and the Prophets I descended to the Apostles, What did they? C.E. answers roundly, They did not marie; and they who were maried before, did leave their wives. I urge S. Pauls report of the rest of the Apostles, and the Brethren of the Lord and Cephas, that they not onely had Wives, but caried them along in their Travels. He answers, They were not Wives, but other devout women which followed them to administer maintenance to them. A likely tale, if they could all agree in it; That the Apostles would cast off their own Wives, and carry about strange Women with them, upon what-ever pretence; Credat Judæus Apella, Non ego. Yet my shameles Refuter cryes out of my pride and ignorance in not allowing this, which he dares proclaime for the received exposition of all the Fathers, and all that ever wrote in the Greek and Latine Church: when he knowes that his [f] Clement in his Recognitions, and his own Pope in the Canon Law, hath expounded contrarily, of Wives, not of strange Women: [g] Leo the ninth, against the Epistle of Nicetas the Abbot, where he directly affirmes that the Apostles did carry about their Wives, Ut de meritede prædicationis sustentarentur ab iis, That they might be maintained by the reward of their preaching; making the force of the word to lie in circumducendi, non amplectendi: Either therefore his Pope erres in a deliberate exposition of Scripture, or else I have not erred; And either his Popes are no Fathers, or C.E. hath no forehead.

Nothing can make the Abemista (ἀδελφὴ γυναῖκα, a Sister, a Woman) not ridiculous; not that Visor of Age which my Refuter pleases to fasten upon it, There wants an Article (he saith.) Our Apostle should have comne to Cardinall Bellarmine and him, to learne when and where to use it.

Refut. pag. 113.

That our last acurate translation of the English Bible hath Woman in the margin, is a poore advantage: who seeth not, that it is the manner of that exquisite Edition, to set all the Idiotismes of either Language, and divers readings in the Margin? Every School-Boy knowes that the word signifies both; but whether of them is fit to be received into the Text, our Text it selfe shewes. How wittily is Saint Pauls, A Woman, a Sister, parralleled with Saint Peters, Viri fratres? Ye Men which are Brethren, is a meet predication; but, Ye Sisters which are Women, is absurd; Neither doth Saint Peter say, (ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ) Brethren men, as Saint Paul sayes, ἀδελφὴ γυνὴ, A Sister woman. As for the authority of Hierome, well may we appeale from his judgment as incompetent, whom his own Doctors accuse as partiall, and censure as * μισογύνην, (if not μισόγαμον:) Yet even he against Helvidius translates it, Uxores circumducendi.

Men and Brethren.

*A Title given to Gregory, also in Apolog. Tumultuaria. Refut. p. 115.

For the rest, it is worth my Readers note, how the Plagiary Priest having stolne this whole passage (as most of the rest) verbatim out of Bellarmine, yet over-reaches his Master; for where Bellarmine sayes, Ita ferè omnes Græci & Latini, So almost all the Greek and Latine; this Bayard dares say, All (saving Clemens) as well Greek as Latine; and when he hath done, names some that say nothing of it at all, as Chrysostom Another that in Heresie speaks for him one where, another where against him, as Tertullian; who being also himselfe a maried Priest, could say in his exhortation, Licebat & Apostolis nubere, & uxores circumducere; Another that grounds upon an evident misreading, as Ambrose; and to make up the Bulk, puts in S. Bede and S. Thomas, parties to the cause, and then sings Io pæan. It is well yet that he grants Clemens of Alexandria, and Saint Ignatius to be on our side, for this interpretation; and when he hath done, he must be forced to yeeld to his Pope Clement, Pope Leo, seconded by Gratian, and Laurentius Valla, and others cited by Erasmus; in so much as Effrenatus himselfe himself grants herein, [a] Controuersia veterum, a difference amongst the Ancient; And if these had never been, the Text cleares it selfe; for, not to inforce the word (περιάγειν) which implyes a power over the party caried, The Apostle speaks of a matter of charge to the Church, by this circumduction; Now, that rich Matrons should follow the Apostles, and minister to them of their substance, was a matter of ease to the Church. Neither was this attendance for ministration, so much as an act of Cephas & the other Apostles, as a voluntary act of the women themselves. To conclude, in this the Apostles practice should have crossed their Doctrine: For if Saint Paul gave that charge (of being the Husband of one Wife) on purpose (as [b] Chrysostome saith) to stop the mouth of the Enemies to mariage; how must this needs open them againe, and breed a conceit of that impurity which Saint Paul meant to oppose, that the Apostles themselves as ashamed of their wives, forsooke them, and chose rather to be attended by Strangers. So as I must take leave to be ever in this Heresie, that the Apostles had wives, and caried them about.

SECT. XXVII.

BUT what Boyes-play is this, To give and take? Our doughty Champion hath granted us Clemens of Alexandria, and now he pulls him back againe; Clemens (saith he) grants the Apostles to have had wives, but he denyes that they used them as wives; cunningly dissembling that which Clement said in the beginning of the same period; For Peter and Philip (saith he) did beget children, &c. How did Peter beget them, if he were not Peter when he begot them? In the time of their painfull Evangelicall peregrination they forbore perhaps: doth it therefore follow that they did alwayes forget to be husbands? Whence, in all likelihood, had S. Peter his Petronella, if she were not borne after he was Peter? Whence was that inscription on Pilagiaes Tomb, (if we may beleeve [a] Perionius) Hic sita est sponsa Dionysii, Thomæ Apostoli filia? There is not (I grant) necessity in this proofe, there is probability. It is therefore too boldly affirmed by my Detector, that the Apostles, after that publike calling undertaken, used not their Wives. Is that of Saint Ignatius nothing against him? Opto Deo dignus, &c. I desire to be found worthy of God, as Peter and Paul, and the rest of the Apostles which were maried men, and not for lusts sake, but for propagation of posterity injoyd their Wives. Thus he. So much against C.E. that C.E. is no lesse against him. The testimony of S. Ignatius (saith he) is a meere forgery, easily answered. If Ignatius had either denyed or disliked these Mariages, no mans word had been more authentick; now, this clause hath made him falsified: He cannot (I hope) say, that the sentence came out of our Forge, we take him as we find him, neither doth B. Espencæus, or any other ingenuous writer, take such exception, but finds the authority weighty. That more unlikely Epistle which Ignatius wrote to S. John and the blessed Virgin (though palpably rejected by their own) is classicall enough, when it may serve a Coccius, or [b] a Bellarmine, or a Pierre Cotton. But here the Epistle it selfe is not questioned, only this clause is bored in the Eare. And why so? Forsooth the ancient Greek Copies have it not. Doubtlesse the man hath vexed the old Greek Manuscripts; but when he hath done, his own fellow shall give him the lye; who confesses it to be in all Copies both Greek and Latine, old and new, whiles he saith, those words ([b] Et alii Apostoli) ex textu abradenda. Or if that will not serve, there is yet to be seen in Baliol Colledge in Oxford, an old Copy of the age of seven hundred or eight hundred yeeres, wherein the words are found; onely the words [Saint Paul and the other Apostles] blurred, yet so, as they are still to be well discern'd: If the Greek should want the clause, what were this? The first edition of Ignatius in Greek was (1558.) as the Centuriists have noted, & how easy was it to leave out one sentence that seemed prejudiciall? Let him never cast this upon the Grecians: they never so excelled in this faculty of counterfeiting as the Romans: Greece in this must yeeld to Italy, however it pleases Pope Gregory and Cardinall Bellarmine herein only to give it superiority.

Amongst the rest, this very place puts me in minde of a memorable iugling Trick of his Fellowes. The old Platina printed at Paris by Frosart Reynbolt, Anno 1500. (which I have seene) and other old Copies, read thus of S. Luke, Hoc sit annon [illegible] rem

Now comes the Oxupheton Edition, set forth at Colein, an. 1600. from the shop of Maternus Colinius, and reads, Vxorem non habens in Bithinia; with which authority Espencæus himselfe was deceived, citing Hierome for it, as the Fountain, whence perhaps Platina might fetch it: but if my Reader please to turn to that [b] Catalogue of famous Writers, ascribed (not unjustly) to Hierome, there shall he finde the very same cozenage, the words run so indeed, in the Latine printed Copies, but not acknowledged, not mentioned by Sophronius in the Greek Translation, and Erasmus reading it either, Having, or not having, as last shuts up, Hæc verba videntur adjecta; quandoquidem nec adduntur apud Sophronium, nec in exemplaribus emendatioribus. These words (saith Erasmus) seem patched to the rest, since they neither are added in Sophronius, nor in the better Copies. Thus he. It was fit my Reader should have a taste of the Roman integritie. I alleaged the learned Cardinall Cajetan for the likelihood of S. Pauls Mariage; Can my Refuter deny this? The words are plain: Locus cogere videtur; The place seemes to inforce it, not by demonstrative reason, but in all reasonable sense, that Paul had a Wife. So he. Which is all I contended for. If now he shall think to choak me with a crosse Testimony of the same Author, concerning S. Pauls not conversing with his Wife after his Apostleship, he may understand, that I well remember Cajetan to have been a Roman Cardinall, and therefore in some points necessarily unsound, whose ingenuity yet in this businesse I have formerly shewed.

Sect. XXVIII.

FRom the practice of the Apostles (which is yet cleare for us) wee descended to their Canons. It troubles my Refuter, that I say, the Romish Church fathers these upon the Apostles, and that their Jesuit Turrian sweats to defend it; (insinuating my contrary opinion) and yet that I cite them for my self; whereas his wisdome might have considered, that their force is no whit lesse strong against them, notwithstanding our doubt or deny all. For example, The Trent Canons rore terribly to them: to us, or the French, they are but as the Pot-guns of Boyes: we may cite these to them as Gospell, they may cite them to us as Alcoran.

Refut. p. 118.

By this it appeares how farre not onely Schoole-learning, but even Logick transcends this poore Refuters capacity, who could not distinguish betweene disputing ad rem and ad hominem.

What I said in my Epistle to my reverend and worthy friend Master Doctor James, the incomparably industrious and learned Bibliothecary of Oxford (a man whom their Possevine thought so well of, that he hath handsomely stolne a book of his, and clapt it out for his own, a man whom so base a Tongue as my Detectors cannot disgrace) I professe still, that I hold those Canons of the Apostles uncanonicall; And do I hold this alone? Doth not his Pope Gelasius so? Doth not Isidore, Bishop of Hispalis so? Doth not Leo the Ninth so? Are not some of them at pleasure rejected by Possevine, Baronius, Bellarmine? Or, in a word, if they be the true issue of the Apostles, are they accordingly respected, and observed of the Roman Church? Doth not his [b] Medina grant to their shame, that the Latine Church scarce observes six or eight of them? These Canons then I doe not hold Apostolicall, I doe hold ancient, and not unworthy of respect; and such as I wonder they have escaped the Roman Purgations. As for those other nine or ten noted Counterfeits, which I joyned herewith for company, in that Epistle, his shame would serve him to justifie, if his leasure would, whereas there is scarce one of them whom his own Authors have not branded. My Refuter must have a fling; In an idle excursion therefore he unjustly railes on the Protestant practice, in rejecting those Fathers for bastardy one while, whom other whiles they cite for current; when his own eminent impudency in the very passage next going before, and in the next following (to goe no further) offends in the same kinde. The truth is the Protestants take liberty to refuse those Fathers, whom even ingenuous Papists have censured as base; The Papists take liberty, when they list, to reject the authority of those Fathers, whose truth they cannot deny? The instances hereof would be endlesse. But with what face can any Papist taxe us for this, when all the world may see above three hundred and twenty of their Authors, whom after the first allowance they have either suppressed, or censured? To their eternall and open conviction, Doctor Iames, (whom they may revile, but shall never answer) hath collected and published the names and pages.

SECT. XXIX.

NOT to follow therefore this babling vagary of my Adversary against Zuinglius, Luther, Musculus, Whitakers, (what Puppy cannot bark at a dead Lyon?) wee come close to the Canon: That no Bishop, Presbyter, or Deacon shall forsake or cast off his Wife in pretence of Religion, or Piety, upon paine of deposition. Wherewith how much my Refuter is pressed, appears, in that he is faine with Baronius to avoyde it, with, Apocryphorum non est tanta authoritas; There is no such great authority in Apocryphall Canons. Refut. p. 126, 127. Apost. Can. 5.

Where is the man that even now upbraided us with the lawlesse rejection of ancient Records, and by name would undertake to justify those whom my Epistle taxed for Adulterine, whereof these Canons of the Apostles were a part? Now he is fayne to change his note, Apocryphorum non est tanta authoritas. Hee hath cast off Ignatius already, anon you shall find him rejecting Socrates, Sozomen, Nicephorus, Gratian, Sigebert, H. Huntingdon, and whom not? upon every occasion shamelesly practizing that which he censures.

If I alleage the sixth generall Councell, that of Constantinople, proclaming this sense truly Apostolicall, even the sixth generall Councell is rejected, as neither sixth, nor generall, nor Councell; That this Apostolicall Canon is bent against the denyall of Matrimoniall conversation, is apparently expressed in those Canons of Constantinople how-ever the extent of it in regard of some persons is restrained. There is no way therfore to unty this knot, but by cutting it; and my cavilling Priest with his Jesuits may gnaw long enough upon this bone, ere they suck in any thing from hence, but the blood of their own jawes.

Any of those words single might be avoided, but so set together, will abide no illusion, Let him not upon pretence of Religion reject his Wife.

The shift that C. E. borrows from Bellarmine, is grosse, and such as his own heart cannot trust (ἀσυλλογίστως ἐλέγχεται, saith he) that is, [a] pretextu cautionis. Look over all the Copies, all interpretations of these Canons; that of Dionysius Exiguus, that of Gentianus Hervetus; that of Caranza, that which Gratian (whom my either graceless or ignorant adversary dares name against me) citeth from hence, all of them run pretextu religionis. How clear is that of their own [b] Law? Si quis docuerit Sacerdotem, &c. If any man shall teach that a Priest, under pretence of Religion, may contemn his own wife, let him be accursed. Refut. p. 128. [a] In presence of bestinesse. [b] Dist. 28. Sub obtentu religionis propriã uxorem contemnere.

And Zonaras, whom both our Junius, and their Espencæus cite out of Quintinus his Exposition, is most cleere; Hoc enim videtur in calumniam fieri nuptiarum, &c. For this ejection (saith he) would seem to be done in reproach of mariage, as if the Matrimoniall knowledge of Man and Wife caused any uncleannesse. Thus he. Where it is plain that he takes it not of maintenance, but (τοῦ μίξαι) of the Conjugall act. The necessity of which sense also is evicted by their own [a] Espencæus out of Saint Chrysostome, in his second Homily upon Titus. And [b] Balsamon no lesse directly; Because (saith hee) before that Law of Justinian, it was lawfull for a man upon any cause to divorce his Wife: therefore the present Canon gives charge, that it shall not be lawfull for a Bishop, Priest or Deacon upon pretence of piety, to put away his Wife. Thus he. [a] Espenc. l. 1. de Cont. c. 4. [b] In Canon. Apost. in Phot. in novo Can.

From all which it is not hard to see, that in those young dayes of the Church, the mystery of iniquity began in this point to work, so as Mariage, according to the Apostles prediction, began to be in an ill name, though the cleere light of that primitive Truth would not endure the disgrace.

So as in all this I have both by Moses, and the examples of that Leviticall Priesthood, by the testimonies of the Apostles, by their practice, by their anciently-reputed Canons, and by the testimony of the agedest Fathers, so made good the lawfulnes and antiquity of the Mariages of persons Ecclesiasticall, that I shall not need to fear a Divorce either from my Wife, or the Truth in that my confident and just Assertion.

AND now, since in this point we have happily won the day, lesse labour needs in the other. It is safe erring with Moses and the Prophets, with Christ and his Apostles: Soon after (according to Saint Pauls Propheeie) Spirits of Errors were abroad; and, whether out of the necessary exigence of those persecuted times, or out of an affectation to win favour and admiration in the eyes of Gentilisme, Virginity began to raise up it selfe in some private conceits, upon the ruines of honest Wedlock; neither is it hard to discern by what degrees; yet never with such absolute successe, as to proceed to any Law of restraint. I doe not therefore fain to my selfe (as mine idle Refuter) golden ages of mirth and [k] marying, under those tyrannous persecutions; but in those bloody ages, I doe avouch to him, and the world, an immunity from the tyrannous yoke of forced continency. This if he could have disproved by any just instances, he had not given us words.

If he be angry that I said, some of the pretended Epistles of his ancient Popes to this purpose are palpably foysted: Let him fasten where he lists, if he have not an answer, let me have the shame; in the mean time, it is enough to snarle where he dares not bite.

That which I cited from Origen, advising the sons of Clergie-men not to be proud of their parentage, he cannot deny, he can cavill at. The same perswasion (saith he) might be made to S. Peters daughter (as many are of opinion that he had one) yet will it not follow that he knew his wife after he was an Apostle. So he. But what needs this Parenthesis, if the man be true to his own Authors? Did we devise the Story of Petronilla? Did we invent her passage of her Sutor Flaccus; Of her Feaver, the cure whereof her Father denyed? Of the Epitaph ingraven in marble, by her Fathers own hand: Aureæ Petronillæ, dilectissimæ filiæ, To my dear and pretious Petronilla, my most beloved daughter, found by Paul the first? Are not these things reported by their own Volaterranus, Petr. Natalis, Beda, Ussuardus, Sigebertus, Platina? Still where is the man that cryes out of rejecting authorities in other cases allowed? either then let him give the lye to his Histories, or else let him compare the Time when Placcus, the Roman Count, was a Suter to her, and see if he be not forced to grant that she was begotten of S. Peter after his Apostleship: and so (for ought he knows) might those sonnes be, whom Origen thus dehorteth. This man was not their Midwife. The place of Origen which he cites to the contrary, he rooke up somewhat on trust: let him goe and enquire better of his Creditor, by the same token, that in the Homily of Origen, whither he sends us, he shall find nothing but Balaams Asse, an object fit for his mediation. As for that parcell of the testimony, which he saith my chin-cough caused me to suppresse (in ipsa Christianitate) it is a Herb-John in the Pot, to the purpose of my allegation. Origen speaks of that Text, Many that are first, shall be last, &c. Which he applies as a cooling-card to the children of Christian Parents, especially, Si fuerint ex patribus Sacerdotali sede dignificatis; If they be the Sons of them which are dignified with Sacerdotall honor: The change of the Preposition is remarkable. ex Patribus, arguing that he speaks not of their education, but their descent, and therefore implying no lesse then I affirmed, that their parentage gives them a supposed cause of exaltation.

Sect. II.

HOly [a] Athanasius was brought by me instead of a thousand Histories: who tells us that it was no rare thing to finde maried Bishops in his time. My wise Refuter, after he hath idly gone about the bush a little, comes out with this dry verdict, What will Master Hall hence infer? that Bishops and Priests may lawfully marie? Saint Athanasius saith it not, but onely recounteth the fact, that some maried of both sorts, but whether they did well or ill, or whether himselfe did approve or condemne the same, there is no word in this sentence. Thus he. We take what he gives, and seek for no more: We cited Athanasius instead of many Histories, not of many Arguments; Histories de facto, not discourses de jure: The lawfulnesse was discussed before; the practice and use is now inquired of; This Athanasius witnesses, and C.E. yeelds: Wherein yet I may not forget to put my Refuter in minde, how brittle his memory is; who in the same leafe contradicts himselfe: For when he had before confessed that Athanasius doth neither approve nor condemn the practice, either as good or evill, now he plainly tells us, that the words were not spoken by way of simple narration, but of dislike and reprehension. He would be a good lyer, if he could agree with himselfe. Why of dislike? For (saith he) it was never lawfull for Monkes and Bishops to beget children. Ipse dixit, we must beleeve him: Not to tell him that [b] Chrysostome teaches us (λανθάνει μετὰ γάμου τὰ τῶν μοναζόντων πολλὰ) It is possible with Mariage to doe the acts of Monkes: not to convince him with counter testimonies, let him tell me what fault it is, to doe or not to doe miracles. These in this sentence of [c] Athanasius goe in the same rank with Mariage. But, to cleare Athanasius, he brings Hierom against Vigilantius (impudently called by him, The father of the Protestants, who would have all Clergie-men to marry, when his very Rhemists have checkt him for this slander) pleading against that necessity from which we have oft washt our hands; when as the same Author against Jovinian affirms de facto, the same with Athanasius and us.

[c] Athanas. Ibid. We have known Bishops working miracles, and Monks working none; Many Bishops not to have married, &c. As likewise you may finde Bishops to have been fathers of Children, and Monks not to have sought for mariage.

To say then, that Athanasius spoke this only of lewd licentious Monks or Bishops, is but the lewd liberty of a licentious tongue that hath over-runne both truth and it selfe.

From hence this Orator, this parcell of wit, flies out into a pleasant frump, as he thinks, but indeed an ugly, inhumane, loathsom ribaldry, ill-beseeming the mouth of any that was born of a woman, I will not say whether ill or well beseeming the pen of a Virgin-Priest, forsooth so pure and Angelicall, that Mariage would un-saint him. His un-manly unnaturall Stile belcheth thus: Thus Luther, of Katherine Bore his Sow, had five pigs. Away nasty C.E. trabsformed by Circe! Hoy! back to her Sryes; yea thine, where thou mayst freely

Grunnire in spe si cum sue do hoc agmine thusci.

Then proceeds he, envying the matrimoniall fruitfulnes of Bucer: who surely, had he under the vaile of maydenly Priesthood been farre more fruitfull in a whole swarm of Bastards, should never have heard of it, unlesse perhaps he had denied to pay Taxas Camerę. As for Ochin's allowing Polygamy, and perhaps other worse obliquities in his opinions, what are they to us? For the mariage of P. Martyr, Oecolampadius, Pellican, &c. Let him take for an acquittance that which hath been paid them thus, Nobis nostra Junones, Vobis vestra Venores. And then I ask, Vivat uter nostrum cruce dignior. If this will not serve for repayment, I must ecke it out with a small, yet current commodity of two poor verses, which I learned of his Martiall at the Grammer Schoole.

Sordidus ager scurris, venerabile aras Cynedis

SECT. III.

HItherto my Refuters [p] Yron hath been as Straw, his Brasse as rotten wood, his Sling-stones as stubble, but now he hath found that will kill me dead, and sayes no lesse then Hoc habet. [q] Cyprian is by me alleadged for the History of Numidicus, whom I avouched a maried Presbyter, by the same token that he saw his wife burning (besides him) with the flames of Martyrdome. And Lord, what outcryes are here of fraud and corruption! and how could this Masse Priest wish himselfe neere me when I should be urged with this imposture, to see what face I would make thereon? Even such a one (good sir Shorne) as is framed by the confidence of honest innocence. God so deale with my soule, as it meanes nothing but ingenuous sincerity, neither hath my pen swarved one letter from the Text: My margine said, Numidicus Presbyter; so doth Cyprian himselfe, two or three lines before this report of his wife; so (besides the Text) doth the margin of Erasmus. And what treachery could it be to adde the word of Cyprians own explication? But Numidicus was not then Priest, when his wife was martyred, rather upon that constancy was honored with holy Orders. How appeares that, when Cyprian only sayes, Numidicus Presbyter ascribatur Presbyterorum Carthaginensium numero, & nobiscum sedeat in clero. He was before a Priest, for ought this Libeller, or any mortall man knows, and now was ascribed into the honored Clergie of Carthage, soon after to be promored to Episcopall dignity. Before the report therefore of his wives martyrdome, he is named a Priest. What have I offended in seconding S. Cyprian? Let this peremptory babler prove this ordinarion to be after that noble proofe of his faith, I shall confesse my selfe mistaken in the time, never false in mine intentions.

Till then, he shall give me leave to stile the man as I find him Numidicus Presbyter.

If Cyprian had said, Numidicus Presbyterorum numero ascribatur, the cause had been cleare, but now doubling the word, he implies him a Priest before, and how long before, and whether not before his Confession, it will trouble my learned Adversary to determine. How fain would this man crow, if he could but get the colour of an advantage?

In the mean while, this impotent insultation bewrayes nothing but malice and ignorance.

SECT. IV.

MY Refuter may transpose the History of Paphnutius, but he shall never answer it. After his old guise therefore he falls to his Hatchet, and when he hath tried to bow it a little, and finds it stiffe, he cuts it up by the roots. What one word can he controll controll in the relation of [r] Socrates, or mine illation? The Bishops went about to bring in a new law of Continency to be imposed upon their Clergie, saith Socrates and Sozomen; therefore before it was not. Paphnutius reclaimed and called that yoak heavy and unsupportable, the use of the Mariage-bed, Chastity. The issue was, Potestas permissa cuique, pro arbitratu: Every man left to his own libertie. The story is plain, there is no place for cavils. The only comfort that my Detector and his Tutors finde in the History, is, that Paphnutius is not all ours: He calls for the use of mariage to the wedded Clergie, not for wedlock of the unmaried. True, therein I must record the answer of Satur, that the good Martyr gave way to the corruption of the Times, wherein the wicked mystery had begun with St. Pauls (Iam tum &c.) But in the mean time, let him know, that if Paphnutius plead but by halves for us, he pleads against them altogether; yea, this he knowes already, else he would never be so audacious as to condemne the authors for unsincere and fabulous, yea, heretically, and to bring the clamours of his Bellarmine to discredit Socrates in three grosse untruths, & Sozomen with Multa mentitur. O impudency without measure, without example! Cassiodorus and Epiphanius, Socrates, Sozomen, Nicephorus, grave and approved Authors of our Ecclesiasticall Story, for but reporting one piece of an History, in favour of Clergie-mens mariages, are spit upon, & discarded with disgrace. This is no new song; my Refuter hath learned it of Copus, Torrensis, Bellarmine, Baronius & others. All whose mouths together with his, in these particular exceptions, let me stop with that ingenuous answer of B. Espencæus, there needs no other Advocate, Excipit Torrensis, &c. But Torrensis excepts against Socrates and Sozomen, as though they had lewdly and shamefully belyed this story of Pathnutius, and sayes, the one was a friend of the Novatians, the other an abettor of Theodorus the Heretick; that both their Histories are in this, void of credit, authority, probability. As if they could not at once be bad Men, and yet good Historians; or if they lye in any other place, they must needs lye in this: For Sozomen, Tritemius commends him for a worthy furtherer of secular learning, and well versed in the Scriptures. And for Socrates, he extols him for a learned and eloquent man, for a very excellent and greatly experienced Historian. Thus he, and much more; to which (for brevity) I referre my peremptory Refuter, who shall there finde satisfaction to his objections of the silence of other Authors, and the Canon alledged against the subintroduction of (Mulieres extraneæ) strange Women into the houses of Clergie-men: His Chilovæus telling him, uxores dici non posse extraneas; and the Law made afterwards by Honorius and Theodosius, plainly commenting upon this constitution.

AS for his testimony of Leo the Great, living in the time of Socrates, I answer it by the testimony of [t] Socrates, living in the time of Leo the Great, Multi enim, &c. For many (saith he) in this Episcopall dignity, in their Episcopall houses, in the time of their being Bishops, do beget children of their Wives, whom they had before lawfully maried. Thus he. A place that answers for itselfe, and many others. Wherein yet my Refuter finds some of my faulty concealments. First, that the more, and more famous Bishops and Priests did the contrary. True, they did so, but voluntarily, as with us some of the Heads of our Clergie, and others of the Body, doe contain, not forced; [u] Continent sponte ac pro arbitrio: This I think is not the Roman fashion. Secondly, They conversed with the Wives which they maried before their Ordination, they did not mary after. Let his wisdome shew me upon what reason the act of marying should be unlawfull, where the act of mariage is lawfull, and we will yeeld him justly to stick at this difference. And when he hath done, let him bite upon their old [d] Glosse, (though now by them defaced) Dicunt quod olim, ante Siricium, sacerdotes poterant contrahere.

IN the rest, he fals not upon me, but the received Historians, Socrates, and Nicephorus. They have done him a spight, and he will revenge it. These he will convince of a double lie. The one, that Heliodorus was the first Author of the Law of Continencie in Thessalia; the other, that this continencie was arbitrarie. His reason for the former is weighty; It is not likely (saith he) that Heliodorus which would rather lose his Bishoprick then recal his lascivious book, would be so eager above the rest for the continency of his Clergie. As if ever any man had been more luxurious then the greatest enemies to marriage; as if it were possible for Pope John the thirteenth (from whom Dunstan received his rigorous Commission) to be unnaturally incestuous; as if it were impossible for his great Prelate of Crema, when he came to oppose the Mariage of our English Clergie, to be found that night in bed with an Harlot.

* Vnlesse it be.

And here my childish Adversarie will needs make sport for boyes. I cited in my Margin Heliodorus, the Author of the Æthiopick History; As if (saith he) Heliodorus had written some Historie of Æthiopia, whereas he only intituled his work Æthiopia. Ridiculous head! what School-boy, what Apprentice knows not Heliodorus? Nosque manum ferulæ, &c. If this learned Critick had but ever opened the Book, he had found Αἰθιοπικῶν. Neither doth any English man know it by any other name, then, as it is translated (ere I was born) The Æthiopick History; yea, if a man were not resolute to shut his eyes, in the very place of Socrates, which he cites, the Book is called Æthiopica, wherero what construction can be given, but this of mine? Such folly is for the rod or ferule. This is (I confesse) a Trifle; yet such as may give my Reader a taste of the bold blindnesse of my impudent Detractor.

Sect. VII.

Refut. p. 151. Sect. 13. & 22.

THe other stings yet more, that this Episcopall and Priestly Continency was upon no other termes, then Modo ipsi voluerint, and, Nulla lege coacti, and consuetudo invaluit. And now all in a rage my Refuter will prove against Socrates that there was a Law for this; and to this purpose he brings in two Canons of the Constantinopolitan Councell in Trullo: Mark, Reader, with what judgement. The Trullan Councell was above two hundred years after: Socrates ended his History in the year 443. The Trullan Councell was held (as their Binius computes it) in the year 692. and yet the Canon of the Trullan Councell, in a matter of fact, disproves Socrates. The other Councels of Ancyra, Cæsaria, and Nice, are either Provinciall, or against him. As for the plea of Synesius, that he might not be Bishop, because he would not leave his wife, it is answered by the fact of Synesius, that he was made a Bishop, and left not his wife. But what an idle and insolent boldnesse is this, for an obscure Libeller, to go about now almost 1200. years after, to controll a grave approved Historian of the Church, in a matter of ordinary practice, which his own eyes and the Worlds did daily witnes; As if he durst have published such a report of the common use of his time, wherein all the Age he lived in, could have convinced him.

* If themselves will; Forced by no Law. The custome hath been.

Refut. p. 153.

The witlesse ly-malicious Prosopopey, wherein my Refuter brings in the Reverend and Peerlesse Bishop of London, pleading for his wife to his Metropolitan, becomes well the mouth of a scurrile Masse-Priest, and is worthy nothing but a scorne. Those two incomparable Prelates are the chiefe objects of these evill eyes, whom God hath raised happily above the reach of their envy. It galls this Romish Rabble, that these two Ring-leaders of the English Clergy (besides their busie imployments in their carefull, prudent, and zealous government) preach more Sermons in a yeare, then, perhaps, all the Bishops under the Papacie. Rumpantur & illa.

Sect. VIII.

IT pleaseth his discretion to marshall my Epistle as he lists, and then to complain of disorder, and my leaping over hundreds of yeares from the Nicen Councell to Gratian the Canonist: My Readers eyes can confute him, which cannot but witnesse that I name divers in all ages recorded for maried Bishops and Presbyters. This Bead-role (saith he) is idle, because I shew not that they then used their Wives when they were Bishops. A hard condition; That I must bring witnesses from their Bed-sides. It is not enough that we shew they had wives, that they had children? No (saith my Refuter) It must be proved that they had these children by these wives after ordination. We were neither their Midwives nor their Gossips, to keep so strict an account. But what meanes [x] Cum uxoribus dormiunt? and, Tempore Episcopatus filios gignunt ex propriis uxoribus. This we have shewed out of Socrates. What was that which Dyonisius the ancient B. of Corinth (before ever Paphnutius was) wrote to Pinytus, charging him, [x] Ne grave servandæ castitatis onus necessario fratribus imponat.

What was that for which Eustathius, B. of Sebastia, the unworthy son of Eulalius B. of Cæsaria was censured? was not this one of the Articles, [y] Benedictionem, &c. That he taught men to decline the blessing and communion of married Priests? Away then with this either ignorant, or impudent facing of so evident a falshood.

The testimony of Hierom, the example of Urbicus B. of Claramont, and of Genebaldus B. of Laudune, shew what was the conceit & practice of those particular places wherein they lived. And yet Hierom in the same book can say; [z] Quasi non hodie quoque plurimi sacerdotes habeant matrimonia. In the story of Urbicus related by Greg. Turonensis, I can but wonder how farre men may be transported by superstition; so as to make the Apostles charge give way to a humane opinion. The wife of [a] Urbicus coms to his dore, and alledges S. Pauls charge (Meet together again, lest Satan tempt you, &c.) Cur conjugem spernis, &c? he yeelds to do the duty of a husband, and now in remorse injoyns himself a perpetuall penance. What penance do we think S. Paul was worthy of, for giving this charge which she alledged? Let my Reader judge whether of the two was the better Divine. How insolent is tradition thus to trample upon Scripture? But since it pleased my Refuter to lend me this one example of Greg. Turonensis, I am ready to give him use for it. In the 2. book of Turonensis he shall finde [b] Sidonius a maried bishop and his wife, a noble Matron, in all likelihood living with him, for (nesciente conjuge) without his wives knowledge he gave silver plate to the poore. [c] In the fourth book he shall find Anastatius a maried Presbyter, feoffed in some temporalties, which he would rather die then not leave to his issue. [d] In the eight book he shal find Bridegisilus, the cruell Bishop of the Cenomans, matched with an ill wife, who yet lived with him (as it seems) all his time, and had altercations with Bertram Archdeacon of Paris, for his goods, deceased. In these three is strength of legall presumption, though no necessity of inference. But what do I instance in these, or any other, when Balsamon tels us cleerly that before the sixt Synod [e] it was lawfull for Bishops to have wives, Etiã post dignitatem Episcopalem? And his own Canon law can tell him that in the East Church, their Priests, Matrimonio copulantur; which his warlest Masters expounding, would interpret by copulato utuntur. Judge then Reader, what to think of the metall of this mans forehead, who would beare us down, that no one Bishop or Priest was allowed, after Orders, to have any Wife. Yea, even for the very contraction of mariage it selfe after Orders, [f] honest Espencæus can cite one [g] Joannes Marius, a Dutch-man by birth, but a French Historian, to whom he allowes the title of (non indiligeris) who writes, that he knows that in the times of Pope Formosus, and Ludovicus Balbus, Priests were maried, Et iis licuisse sponsam legitimam ducere modò Virginem, non verò Viduam; and that it was lawfull for them to mary a Wife, so she were a Virgin, not a Widow.

As for that base slander wherewith his venomous Pen besprinkles the now glorious face of our renowned Archbishop and Martyr Doctor Cranmer; whom hee most lewdly charges with lasciviousnesse and incontinent living with I know not what Dutch Frow, is worthy no other answer than Increpet te Dominus. It is true that the

But that he ever had any dishoneſt converſation with her or any other, it is no other then the accent of the mouth of Blaſphemy. And if any one of our Clergie, after a legall and juſt Divorce long ſince, have taken to himſelfe that liberty which other Reformed Churches publikely allow (as granting in ſome caſe a full releaſe, both à thoro, and à vinculo) what ground is this for an impure wretch to caſt dirt in the eyes of our Clergie, and in the teeth of our Church? C Nondum tot anni sunt tui, quotjam in sacris mihi sunt peracti victimis, &c. That is, The yeares of thy age are not so many as of my Priesthood.

Words that will convince the most importunate gain-sayer, that Greg. Nazianzen was borne to his worthy father, after the time of his holy Orders. And lest any man should suspect that this (τὸ nondum) may reach only to the birth, not to the begetting of Gregory Nazianzen; so as perhaps he might be borne after his Fathers Orders, begotten before them: Let him know (to make all sure and plain) that Gorgonia and Cæsarius the sister and brother of this Gregory, were by the same Father begotten afterwards; as is evident both by that Verse of Nazianzene, who speaking of his mother, as then childlesse when she begged him of God, sayes,

Cupiebat illa masculum fœtum domi
Spectare, magna ut pars cupit mortalium.

D And the cleare Testimony of Elias Cretensis, Quamvis enim si nativitatem spectes, &c. Although (saith he) if you regard his birth, he was not the onely child of his Parents, forasmuch as after him both Gorgonia and Cæsarius were borne. Thus he.

O infamous Gregories, the scum of the Clergie! O irregular Father, that durst defile his sacred function with so carnall an act! O shamelesse Son, that blushes not to proclaime his own sinfull generation! Go now, petulant Refuter, and see whether you can either yeeld, or answer.

And for that glorious shew of Antiquity, wherewith C. E. hopes to bleare his Readers eyes, gracing himself herein with the assipulation of our Reverend Jewel, I need not return any other answer then of his Beatus Rhenanus: Quanquã veteres omnes, &c. Although all the Ancient, and Hierom himselfe, were no whit equall or indifferent to Mariage; esteeming Virginity and Chastity very high, both because they thought the Last-day was E neere at hand, as remembring that sentence of St. Paul, Tempus in collecto est; and because they saw many impediments grow from Mariage, which marred the purity of Christianity, in those dayes, especially when Christians lived amongst Heathens, and matched in mariage with them: Surely it is evident, that for this cause Hierom was in an ill name at Rome, &c. Thus he. We durst not have said so much for our selves. The highest antiquity is ours, the later had been ours, if it had not been upon these grounds which were then their own, proper to the time, place, occasion.

SECT.

Sect. IX.

I Descend to the Testimony of Gratian; Champion E. calls this picking of Strawes. If picking of Strawes be boyes-play, and argue that they which use it are foiled, and have lost all, as our Refuter merrily pipeth, let him acknowledge how beggarly the proofes are growne of the martyrdome of their Saintly Jesuits and Priests amongst us; did they not stoop to pick straws, to thresh out a miracle (when it was) for translating Father Garnet from a Traitor to a Martyr? yea, and that Chaffe, the gullery whereof themselves smile at here, is devoutly transported beyond the Seas, and enshrined for a sacred reliqne, and proclaimed by their Koramannus for one of the great Wonders of the Dead; Ridet aruspex ubi aruspicem viderit.

It is well that the great Compiler of the Canon Law of Rome is grown so base with Catholique Priests. He witnesses plainly, that some Bishops of Rome were the sons of Priests, not spurious, but begot in lawfull wedlock; = Which was (according to Gratian) every where lawfull to the Clergie, before the prohibition. C.E. bites the lip at this authority, and first he tells us, it is the Palea, not Gratian. But if this be Chaffe, there is no Corne. Reader, try by this the egregious impudence of this fellow. Turn to the place, thou shalt finde the words to be none but Gratians: and the notes allowed by publique authority, openly to confirm it: Hic apertè ostendit Gratianus se in ea fuisse opinione, &c. Here Gratian openly shewes, that he was in that opinion, that heretofore Priests of the Latin Church might be maried.

Resut p. 161.

Secondly, my Parenthesis displeases him (As may adayes:) But what needs this quarrell? He must grant, if the Romish Priests have sons, they can be no other than spurious. It is his best not to presse this point too far. This idle jealousie of his can argue no good. I touched not the continency of his Paulus Quintus so much as in my thought, I onely wish that his Holinesse would bestow some of the offals of his Nephewes great Benefices upon this Masse-Priest, for the reward of his superfluous Oleum peccatorum.

Resut. p. 162.

My third untruth (and that a grosse one) is, that I say many Bishops of Rome followed their Fathers in the Pontificall Chaire: whereas in this Chaffe of Gratian, he findes but one Sylverius Pope, son of Sylverius Bishop of Rome. And what if in his Chaffe he find but one, whiles I in my Corn-heap can find more? Did I tie my selfe in this clause only to Gratian? Was not Pope John the Eleventh, or, in some accounts, the Tenth, son to Pope Sergius? And is there no Chaire Pontificall, but the Roman? Was not Theodorus Pope, son to Theodorus Bishop of Jerusalem? Felix the third, son to Bishop Valerius? Pope Adrian the Second, son to Bishop Taralus? His Platina can supply his Gratian in these.

Resut. p. 163, 164, 165.

What have I to doe with his quartels about Hosius, Felix, Agapetus, Steven? They are their own; Let him wring Gratian by the eare, till I feele: And surely, the poore Canonist bleeds on all hands. Bellarmine, Baronius, Possevine, and this stout Beagle have every one a snatch at him; and he must be content to go away with this gash; (We are not bound to follow him as an infallible Writer, but may with free liberty reject him.) Yea, how merry doth my Refuter make himselfe with his despised Gratian? Like a Philistim he hath pulled out the eyes of this Sampson, and now makes sport with him; If Doway like it well, it shall not be displeasing to us. The man (as ill as he loves mariage) will needs make a match betwixt his Gratians Pope Steven, and his Pope Joan: Iö Hymen! Was ever man so mad, to make himselfe pastime with his own shame? Was the History of that monstrous Papesse, of our making? Doe not the = whole streame of their Writers of Chronicles, their own Bishops, Monks, Recluses, Registers record it openly to all posterity, without the contradiction of the next ages, yea of any, till this last? Let them take to themselves therefore this fruitfull Successor in the infallible Chaire; she is their own, they may dispose of her where they list; and since my Refuter will finde out a match for her out of the Chaire of exploration, why should not we dance at the wedding? Why doe we not help him to a piece of an Epithalamium?

SECT. X.

I See, that whiles I follow this Wrangler by the foot, I am become insensibly tedious; the residue of his longsome Treatise is spent upon the Councell of Constantinople, Gregories charge, Isidores rule, Hulderick, Hildebran, Dunstan, and Anselme, and the estate of our fore-fathers in the English Clergie. The discussion of all which, as not being essentiall to our businesse, (except only the last) will admit more brevity of dispatch. The vitall parts of our cause being secured, there will be lesse danger in the remorer limbs, which yet if our Target guard not, our sword shall. In all these, it shall be best to reduce his Cavils unto heads, that we may crop them with more speed and ease; Only I must crave leave to dwell some while in the last.

Concerning the Councell of Constantinople (after some idle mis-taken discourse of the occasion thereof, he insists upon these foure points.

First, That it was not generall: Secondly, Not the sixt: Thirdly, Not peremptorily ours: Fourthly, Not by them defaced or torn out.

First, it is no trusting what a Roman Priest sayes in choller of a Grecian Councell. The Greek Church is equally in their Books with ours; and this Councell, with the Synod of Dort. It is an eternall quarrell, which all the vassals of Rome have against this Councell, that it equalled the Bishop of Constantinople, with the Romane: A crime that cannot be forgiven.

The invectives of our Popish Divines, especially Pighius, [r] Bellarmine, Baronius, have made good that note of [s] Balsamon, Occidentales Episcopi, &c. The Westerne Bishops (saith he) that is, the Italian or Latine (A hujus Synodi Canonibus opportune ita finding themselves galled with the Canons of this Synod, have given it out not to be Generall: Thus he. And why was it not Generall? It had no form of a Councell (saith my Refuter) No Legates of the Pope, no invitation of the Latin Bishops, neither were any of the other Patriarkes present or consenting. Every word a shamelesse untruth. Basilius Bishop of Gortyna the Metropolis of Creet, (which was then under the Archbishop of Rome) and the Bishop of Ravenna (saith Balsamon) were there to represent the Roman Church; The Bishop of Thessalonica, Sardinea, Heracles, Corinth, were there and then the Popes Legates. And for the Patriarks, Basilius (saith the same Balsamon) Bishop of Gortyna which was present in the name of the Roman Church, is found to have subscribed after the foure Patriarks; and certain other Metropolitans: what can be more plain? But S. Beda (saith C. E.) tels us, that Justinian the younger, commanded Sergius Bishop of Rome to be carried to Constantinople, because he would not subscribe, huic erraticæ Synodo. Still mistaking and ignorance. His Surius and Turrian could have taught him out of Theophanes, this was another, a Pseudo-Synod, which the same Justinian had in his first government called in favour of the Monothelites; which was some years after the true Synod under Constantine the Bearded. This mans wit wanders with his erraticall Synod.

SECT. XI.

FOR the number of Sixt, we need not be scrupulous; whether it were the fift, or sixt, or both (as Balsamon calls it συνοδικὴ) or neither. It is enough for me that Gratian, Carranza, Effenous, and other his own great Masters call it familiarly both Sixt and Generall; In this I cannot but be safe enough. I grant, that (to speak precisely) the first Synod under Constantine published no Canons, but afterwards many of the same Fathers which had formerly met in the first Synod, and others to the number of 227. being called together by the then penitent and restored Justinian, (συνῆλθον) gathered gathered up, and set forth with universall consent, the Canons formerly made, and by them re-enforced. But what need I trouble my selfe with any other answer to all these windie cavils of my Adversary, then that which Tharasius himselfe, the Patriarke of Constantinople, hath most fully given; [1] Quæ est hæc ignorantia, &c. What ignorance (saith he) is this, wherewith many men are tainted, about these Canons? For it is a scandall to doubt whether they were the Canons of the sixt Synod. Let these men therefore know, that the sixt Synod was gathered in the time of Constantine, against those which ascribe one only action and will to Christ; The Fathers then condemning those Heretickes, and confirming the Orthodox Faith about the 14. year of Constantine, returned home: After foure or five years, the same Fathers being met under Justinian the son of Constantine set forth the foresaid Canons; Neither let any man doubt of this; For those very same Fathers, which in the time of Constantine subscribed, did also under Justinian subsigne this present Paper, which thing is evident enough by the unchangeable likenes of their own hands. So he. Whether therefore the computation of Tharasius or Theophanes, be followed, we have what we desire; The same acts are set forth, if not by altogether the same persons, and [2] Gratians Judgment is herein ours.

SECT. XII.

Refut p. 175. usq; ad 182.

FOR the third point. To prove that this Synod is not peremptorily for us: He urgeth divers other Canons of it, which in other things sound against us. Then he shews the instanced thirteenth Canon, not to be so absolutely and fully ours, as is pretended.

First, where finds he this Law, that no man may alledge one testimony of a Father or a Councell, but he must be tied to justifie all the rest? Himselfe would be the first that would shrinke at this condition. This challenge is unreasonable, and might turn off all allegation. For example, If a man should alledge the Nicene Councell, Canon 1. against any superstitious Foole that hath made himself a corporall Eunuch; might he straight for his justification fly upon the last Canon of that Councell, unnecessarily injoyning us to stand at our Sundaies Prayers. Or if a man should cite the Synod of Laodicea against a Deacon (though a Cardinall) sitting before a Priest, or against the worshipping of Angels; were it meet to choke him with a return of the last Canon of that Councell, forbidding the Apocryphall books; or the 37. Canon forbidding his Holinesse to take so much as a bible in his solemnity, from the hands of Jewes: If a man shall alledge a Testimony of Cyprian, were it fit to upbraid him with the errour of re-baptization? Or if of Augustine, with the errour of the necessity of Infants communicating? This is clavum clavo. For me, I have undertaken no such taske, to warrant them that once said true, from ever erring: I doe therefore herein scorne my silly Refuters compassion, who is so farre from crushing me in this, that he hurts none but his own fists, in bearing them about his own hard head. For, if the pressing us with the authority of some of these Canons, be to justifie the rest; then the 96. Canon of that Councell bears him and his Rome downe before it, whiles it sets Constantinople cheeke by jole with it, maugre. A point, which rather then they will yeeld, they will be glad to abate us all the rest: This we are sure of, that the alledged Canon is peremptorily, fully, cautelously ours: For this my credit is at the stake; which my Refuter pleases himself with the hope to impaire, insulting in the idle fancy of a just advantage, whiles he shews the Canon to come short in some points of our requisition and practice; For there, Bishops are excepted, and the freedome of mariage after Ordination.

Refut. p. 182. usque ad 192.

Reader, compare the Canon with the words of my ingagement, I undertook thou shouldest finde no decree could be made more peremptory, more cautelous, more full and absolute, for the lawfulnesse of the Mariage of Ecclesiasticall persons.

For first; The Fathers professe herein to crosse the practice and Decree of the Roman Church. Secondly, they professe the conjugall cohabitations of sacred persons to stand by the Apostolike Canons, and to be a sincere, exquisite, and orderly consticonstitution. What could be said more? They (thirdly) ratifie this liberty for ever. They (fourthly) give charge that no man by the cohabitation with his lawfull wife, be hindred from ascending to the highest degree of holy Orders. (Fifthly) that in the time of their Ordination, it be not so much as required of them, to abstaine from the lawfull companying with their Wives; which were (say they) to offer injury to marriage ordained by God, and blessed by his presence; and to crosse him that said, Those whom God hath joyned together, let no man sepurate; and, Marriage is honourable amongst all, &c. (Sixtly) That if any man shall presume so far, as to offer to debar any Priest, Deacon, or Subdeacon, from the conjunction and society with his lawfull Wife, he shall be deposed. Or if any Priest, or Deacon shall voluntarily cast off his Wife, upon pretence of Religion, that he shall be suspended, and, (if he goe on) deposed. Judge now whether herein my protestation have erred; Not that there can be no circumstance devised, as of the extent of the persons, or time, or manner, wherein curiosity might inlarge the scope of this liberty (so I never meant:) but if this one point (That the marriage of persons Ecclesiasticall is lawfull) can be more fully and warily set down, let me ly open to censure; if not, hate the vanity of this idle Mountebanke, and confesse with Aristophanes, Adversus Illum Sychophantæ non inesse pharmacum.

There is no salve for the sting of a Sycophant. Resut. 193, 193, 194.

The Parliamentall law in the time of King Edward, was (I grant) more full in extending the liberty, could not be more full in avouching the lawfulnesse of our marriages. Where I must take leave to tell my Refuter, that the comparison he presumes to make of King Edwards Parliament, with the proceedings of Jacke Straw, Wat Tiler, &c. is, like himselfe, seditious and traiterous. And what marvell if such repiners blow out the foggie vaporous blast of seditious words, against our highest Court of Parliament, which some of their companions have attempted to blow up with a blast of fire? This Constitution was not civill onely, but Synodicall: And may not a lawfull Synod or Convocation, with the concurrence of the three States, and the sway of Royall authority, make or re-establish a Law agreeable to the Word of God, and the received practice of their Progenitors; but every Jack-sawce of Rome shall thus odiously dare to controll and disgrace it? One of his Capitoline gods of Rome called England his Asse; So it was, whiles it might beare nothing but his Trumperie, and goe but where his Grooms would either lead, or drive it: now that it hath taken heart, and (with Cardinall Campegius his Sumpter) cast off this base load, and hath happily over-run his servitude; they are ready, with the Keeper of metamorphosed Apulcius, to seek a desperate remedy from the next Tree.

Etiam Asinum meus recalcitrat?

SECT. XIII.

SUch then is the Canon of Constantinople, which therefore (I said) because they cannot blemish enough, they have indignely torne out of the Councels: and hence is much vehement and braving Rhetoricke, spent upon me as a shamelesse writer; and this passage as the grossest lye that ever was published by Protestant, and now I am conjured, How blemished? how torn? what? where? how? when? Because innocence is bold, the man will be bold, that he may seem innocent; but we shall well find that facing will not serve his turn. Is he so ignorant as not to know that all his great Masters discard this whole Councell as spurious? Doth he not know that it is (if not torn) yet left out in divers of their Editions of the Councels? Let him learn, if he know not, that their ancient collections of Canons, which was called Codex, or Corpus Canonum, which was in use in Leo the fourths time, mentioned by Gratian, dist. 16. c. de libellis, and printed An. 1526. at Mentz. and reprinted at Paris, in folio, An. 1609. omits it. The other Collection of Councels by Isidorus Mercator, which began to be received about Charles the Great his time, wherein besides the forged Decretical Epistles of divers Popes, are the Canons of many Provinciall Councels of Africke, France, Spaine, Merlin* at Colein 1530. and which hath been usually received in the Western Church, in the times of the Schoolmen, who usually (as doe also Ius and Richardus) acknowledge them, likewise omits it. The two Editions of the Councels by P. Crabbe, likewise omit it; and if it had not been for starke shame, so would the rest also. Doth he not know what his Augustinus and Nauclerus protest of some particular Canons; and this for one, Hæc capitula omnino refutamus, and, nullatenus recipiuntur. And for this very particular Canon, If he know not, There is first an attempt of a double blemish to be cast upon it: The one, in that they read it so, as if the Roman Clergie professed quod copulentur uxoribus non suis, as by way of scorne, whereas the words run, se decipere cum uxoribus suis non congressuros.

The other, in that some of their Authors would refer Sacrorum virorum to Constitutiones, not to Naptias; marring quite the sense of the Canon. This for the blemish. For the wiping out of this very Canon, and denying it place with the rest; let him heare his own Especenæus, telling him, that even they which allowed this Synod rejected by Pighius, and others, yet Canonem duriter tractant, &c. Vse this Canon somewhat hardly as altogether prophane, full of errour, insolence, immodesty, manifest falshood, Apocriphall, and most corrupted, and his ingenuity is faine to plead, in conclusion, Canonem hunc legitimum esse, non gratis, sed necessario donemus; That they must (not upon controversie, but of necessity) yeeld this Canon for legitimate, not suppositicious. And what is this in my Detectors construction, but a cashiering of this Canon out of the Councels against the authority of Gratian, and the Greek Copies? Lastly, the eyes of learned Chemnitius are undoubted witnesses to us, what credit soever they find with this Italianate generation, In Tomis Conciliorum plerisque expunxerunt, & omiserunt hunc Canonem: In the Tomes of the Councels they have altogether wip't out, and omitted this Canon. So as if we had those blurred Copies which he saw bleeding from the hand of the Inquisitors, there could be no fence for this charge, but that which serves for all, impudent denials.

Neither needed my Refuter to take it so highly, that I objected to them the tearing, blemishing, and defacing of this, and other Records against them; Ere long the world shall see, to the foule shame of these self-condemned Impostors, that in the writings both of ancient and later Authors, they have blotted out more than an hundred places (some of them containing above two sheets apiece) concerning this very point which we have in hand.

This is no news therefore, neither needed my Detector to make it so dainty.

SECT. XIV.

I Cited from Gratian the free confession of Pope Steven the second, acknowledging the open liberty of Mariage to the Clergie of the Eastern Church, Matrimonio copulantur. A place truly irrefragable; My refuter first excepts against the number, telling us that Steven the second lived but three or foure daies at the most, and therefore he could not be the man: what spirit of Cavillation possesses this Masse-Priest? He cannot but know that his own Sigebertus ascribes five years to this Steven, and Hermannus, six: But five is the least: And his Binius tels him that the Steven he speaks of (sitting but two dayes exclusively) * is by the most omitted in the Catalogue of the Romane Bishops: whence it is that the Chronicle names not two Stevens betwixt the first & the fourth. But this man (he saith) called no Councell, what is this to me? Gratian affirms it, I do not. Let him fall out, for this, with his friends. And now according to the old wont, (after he hath tried to shift off Matrimonio copulantur, with the sleeveles evasion of a false glosse (i. abuntur) which Cajetan hath sufficiently confuted for us) he sals to a flat rejection of Gratian, and tels us out of Bellarmine, That Canon to be perhaps of no authority, but an error of the Collectors. Good God! what face have these men? That none of their received Authors can be produced against them, but they are straight counterfeit, and yet the very same, where they speak for them, canonical? Their Clyents, if they might but know these tricks, would be ashamed of their Patrons.

That

That the Clergy not onely of the East might Matrimonio copulari, but of the West also might Matrimonium contrahere (which are the words they are unwilling to know in their own Canon Law,) shew sufficiently that they not only were maried of old, but might marry; But for the Easterne Clergy, it is freely granted by all ingenuous spirits; insomuch as Espencæus tels us, that never Author, either old or new, imputed this for a fault unto the Greeke Church, that their Clergy was maried. Refut. p.204.

What shall we say then to this bold Bayard, that compares this toleration of Mariage in the Greek Church, with Moses his permission of the Bill of Divorce unto the Jewes? As if Mariage had been onely tolerated, not allowed; as if unjust Divorce were a fit match for lawfull Wedlock; while he here talkes of Duritia cordis, well may we talk of his Duritia frontis. It is true, every Church, every Countrey, hath their Customes and Fashions; which Joannes Maior pleads against Beda's censure of the English and Scottish and Brittish observation of Easter, and may be as justly in this case pleaded for us. This was of old no lesse ours, than the Greekes; And if any Church will be prescribing against God, we have no such Custome, nor the Church of God: But what a ridiculous insinuation is it, that the Greeke Priests are dispensed with by supreame authority Ecclesiasticall? Forsooth, by the Pope of Rome. Faine would I learne when, upon what termes, at what rate the Græcians purchased in the Court of Rome Dispensation for their Mariages. Refut. p.206. 207.

I would my Refuter had the Office appointed him to shuffle over all the Records of the Apostolike Chamber, till he find such a grant made propter duritiem cordis; then should a great deale of good Paper escape the misery of being besmeared by his Pen.

What strange fantastike Dreames are put upon the world? Where the Papacy cannot prevaile, there forsooth his Holinesse dispenseth. The Greek Church admitteth maried Priests, the Pope dispenseth with them; They deny and defie the Popes Supremacy; I trow he dispenseth with them for that too: and why not with the Church of England? We pay no Peter-pence, we run not to Romes-market to buy trash, I hope his Holinesse dispenseth with us for these Peccadillo's; we take liberty here to marry rather then to burne, why should we not hope to receive that Dispensation, whereof we heard the news of late from a poor Bankrupt Carier? Ad populum phaleras. Refut. p.207, 208.

SECT. XV.

AS for the contradiction which his sagacity findes (not without much scorne) in the two Parliamentall Lawes of the Father and the Son, King Henry the eight, and King Edward the sixt; whereof the one forbids, the other allowes the Mariage of Ecclesiastiques, it needed not have been any wonder to a learned Priest, which might have known Councels enow diametrally opposite to each other: what fault was it in the recovered blinde man, that he first saw men walke like Trees, and after like men? Even the best man may correct himselfe. Neither was there here any contradiction. King Henry spake with the Romane Church, (whose one halfe of him then was) King Edward spake with the Scriptures, and purer antiquity: King Henry never said, God disallowed these Mariages; King Edward never said, they were allowed by the Romish Church. Refut. p.209. usq; ad 214.

And why may not we draw out the like absurdity out of Queene Maries Parliaments, wherein she reversed many things established by King Edward, as in this very case concerning Mariage of Priests? May we not hereupon aske, What will you say to such Parliaments wherein the Brother is thwarted by the Sister, and that with the consent of the most of the same Parliament-men, enacting in a few yeares contrarily?

Or as if it were any newes with Popes, rescindere acta prædecessorum, even of those which immediately preceded them. Who knows not the Story of Pope Formosus and Stephanus, and the many and strong contradictions of decrees in the frequent, long and desperate Schismes of the Romish Church.

This lash is indifferently fit for all backs; let him that hath no cause to smart, complaine.

Refut. p. 212. What needed this foule mouth then to breake forth into so palpable slanders of that holy Archbishop and Martyr Doctor Cranmer, charging him with deep dissimulation, in soothing up both these Kings in their contrary Decrees? when it is most manifest, that this worthy Metropolitan was the onely man, which durst for three dayes together openly in Parliament oppose those wickedly projected Articles of King Henry; and this, in speciall: Insomuch as he was willed out of the House till the Act might passe; which (notwithstanding he well knew King Henry) he stoutly refused. Would this man (thinke we) care to belie all the Saints in Heaven for an advantage? What will not he dare to say, that will object inconstancy to him who sealed Gods truth with his blood?

Refut. p. 216, 218. The contradictions and weaknesses that he findes in this Synod of Constantinople doe no whit move us; If he can allow and commend, and cite against us the seven and thirtieth Canon of the Councell, for the worship of the Crosse, or the fourscore and fifteenth for the holy Chrisme, and yet disallow the thirteenth, why may not we by the same Law cite and approve the thirteenth Canon against them, and yet disavow those others?

SECT. XVI.

Refut. p. 220. NEither was it for want that I mentioned onely this Councell of Constantinople, The more ancient constitutions of Ancyra and Gangra, and the first and fourth of Toledo, besides the Apostolicall and Nicene, might have been urged by me. It was not mine intent (with this babler) to say more then all; but onely to take an handfull out of the Sacks mouth for a taste to the buyer; That faire flourish therefore of Councels which he musters up against me herein, will be but Arma armis contraria: wherein since my Refuter will needs make himselfe so busie, let me intreat him, by the way, to compare the Councell of [a] Gangra with the Decree of his Pope Hildebrand: The Councell sayes flatly, Si quis discernit Presbyterum conjugatum, &c. If any man make difference of a maried Priest, so as that by occasion of his mariage he ought not to offer, and doth therefore abstaine from his oblation, let him be accursed. But his Hildebrand, uxoratos Sacerdotes à divino removit officio, & laicis missam eorum audire interdixt; novo exemplo, &c. That is, removed maried Priests from their Divine office, and forbad Lay men to heare their Masses, saith [b] Sigebert; Therefore by the sentence of the Councell, Pope Hildebrand is accursed; and accursed for that very point which made him a Romish Saint. When my Refuter hath gnawed a while upon this bone, he may hope to be rewarded with a crust.

And now for his Councels, to make up the number, he names for the fore-man of the Quest, the Councell of Ancyra (somewhat before the Nicene) one who hath passed a direct verdict against him, allowing Deacons, upon their profession, to marry. The miserable evasions of his [c] Binius, and Baronius, in this point, argue both a minde and a cause desperate; whiles (without all colour of warrant) they imperiously turne downe these maried Deacons to a lay-communion; and faine this liberty onely in a forced Ordination, not in a voluntary.

Refut. p. 225. usq; ad 234.

[c] Vid. Bin. ibid.

Refut. p. 226. As for that first Canon which he citeth of the Councell of Arles, That a man cannot be made Priest in the band of Wedlock, unlesse he promise conversion, It is a grosse counterfeit: And that the world may see we use not to passe these censures without evident reason; It mentions the Arrians which were not yet hatched; It mentions Bonosus, which lived long after in the time of Innocent 1. It mentions the Concilium Vasense, which was yet later, in the time of Leo the first. When his Authors can agree of the time, and make good the Synode, he shall receive an answer to it: In the meane time, it was either before the Councell of Nice, or after it; if before, it was corrected by the Nicene; a Provinciall must yeeld to a Generall; if after, it was presumptuous, in decreeing that peremptorily which the Generall determinately left free.

it

The Councell of Arausica is cited by him in direct terms opposite to the Ancyran. He must make them friends, ere he can bring it forth against an enemy. As for the maine stay of this cause of his, which is the two Councels of Africk, lent him by his Bellarmine, it is grounded (as our learned Junius hath probably answered) upon meer corruption, and mis-taking; the Latine Copies taking propria, for priora: The charge of the Councell being only, that Deacons, Priests, Bishops, (κατὰ τὰς ἰδίας ἀφορμὰς) according to their turns of ministration, should abstaine from their Wives, which no modest Divine will not willingly subscribe unto. However, I am sure, if the one word be not corrupted, the other is ambiguous, and may as well signifie Balsamons ὑπομνήματα. And if these Canons were first Latine, and after translated into the Greek; yet the Greeke shewes what was the first Latine, and may well correct the mistaken Originall. But to discusse the severall Councels, which he only thinks fit to name; and utter by whole-sale against us, were a work for a volume apart. The old word is Dolosus versatur in generalibus; There is deceit in generalities; It were easie to shew that some of these are impertinent; others plainly against them; others corrupted to speak against us, as that of Mentz and Worms, whereof in the sequell; others partiall to the faction of Rome. So then, here, Obruimur numero, He thinks to carry it by number, not by weight; where with us, one piece of Gold is worth a whole bagge of Counters. But, if after the Tyrannicall impositions of his Siricius and Innocentius took place in the Church, he could name for every one of his Provinciall Synods, an hundred, it were all one to us; we are not the worse, his cause no whit the better. This Tradition, after that in an emulation of the Montanisticall vaunt of virginitity, it had gotten head in the Church, ran like fire in a traine; Those Provinces that held correspondence at Rome, according to the charge of [d]Gregory, spake as she did prompt them: What should they doe but follow their Mistresse? The Greek Church, and those that either had dependance upon it, or which had continued in the succession of this custome of mariage, still maintaining the lawfulnesse and use of it inviolable. So then, in summe: This he hath gained, which I am ready ever to avow, The ancientest Councels are against him; The larter are against us; and God with us against them; of which we have learned [e] to say, Va vobis filii defertores, ut faceretis Concilium & non ex me. And if his Mistris of Rome have elsewhere found vassals, it follows not; that we may not be free. Yea, it is more than manifest, by those evidences we have already produced from their own records, that notwithstanding this cogged number of his provinciall Synods and Private decrees (as Volusian terms them) all the time of the first seven hundred years, the freedome of this practice continued in many parts of the Christian world; In so much as amongst the rest, the Church of Armenia, for the time of the years mentioned, upheld a Tradition, [f] not to admit of any Clergy-man, but those which descended ex genere Sacerdotali, descended from Priests; Witnesse the Fathers of Constantinople, in their three and thirtieth Canon. Where my Detector should doe well to enquire what Balsamons Clerici Chryso-bullati means; Sure I am, that this example sufficiently proves the practicall liberty of those Churches in the questioned limits of the seven first Centuries. To which we may adde the Church of Bulgaria, out of his [g] Gratian; The Church of Germany out of [h] Aventine: The Church of Ireland out of [i] Bernard, who confesses the Episcopall See of Armach to have been furnished with a lineall descent of Bishops, [k] for eight generations, before the time of his Malachias; which were still both uxorati & literati. How those men were Bishops, and yet sine ordinibus, is a Riddle which (I confesse) I cannot aread. Perhaps, they were without Romane Orders, but if they were not Clerks after the then Irish fashion, what needed they be Literati, that they might be Bishops? The Church of our Britain: (as we shall see in the Processe) and others. These are more than enough to let the World see this restaint, for all this pretence of Provinciall and partiall Councells never universally obtained.

SECT. XVII.

Refut. p. 235. YEt the man having unmercifully crusht me in peeces with this empty bladder of windy and worthles authority, crows over me, thus, in conclusion: And truly to me he seemeth not to be more mad, than blinde; for otherwise he would never have proclaimed this freedome of seven hundred years, seeing the very form of words used by his owne sacred Councell, doth so strongly withstand his fond collection; For there it is decreed, Qui sunt in sacris, &c. We will that the mariages of such as be in holy Orders, from this time forward be firme and valid: For in case this freedome had been common before, why did they say, Deinceps, from this time forward? Thus he. Wherein I would his superiours did but see how kindly he buffets himself. For if this be the force of Deinceps or Amodo, I thus argue against him; He hath pleaded before, that neither this nor any other Church ever allowed, nor ever practised the celebratiō of mariage after Ordination; Now, if he turn to the sixth Canon of this Councell of Constantinople, he shall find Decernimus ut nulli deinceps hypodiacono, &c. We decree that from hence forward no Sub-Deacon, Deacon, or Priest may marry after his Ordination; Therefore by the force of his inference before this time (for almost seven hundred yeares) this was commonly practised. And now to answer my Refuters Deinceps: If his wit had been any way matchable with his malice, he might have seene that this Deinceps had relation to the Romane Church, not to the Greek; For, (if he know not) this Synod meant to prescribe Lawes to his Mistresse, and to correct that their injurious Tradition of restraint, and to enlarge this liberty through all the Territories of the Universall Church; For this purpose is the Deinceps of the Constantinopolitane Fathers, who well knew, how much it needed in the Western Church, which had inthralled their Clergy in the bondage of that unlawfull prohibition. So as the Refuter, whiles he playes upon my want of Logick, in not descrying the dangerous necessity of this inference upon me, plainly bewrayes his owne want of braines, in not descrying the folly of his objection: and where he tels me (like a dull Jester) That all the Walls and Windowes, from the Hall to the Kitchin, may mourne to see an University-man have so little wit; I must tell him that all the Doores of Dewy may leap off their hinges, to see their Champion so childishly absurd.

Refut. p. 237. Now then to answer his idle Epilogue: If it appeare that his own Pope and Canonist, and the received Histories of the Church, and the examples of severall Nations and persons acknowledge this ancient liberty both in the Easterne and (some) Westerne Churches de facto; And Moses and the Prophets, Christ and his Apostles, the ancient Councels, with the sixt of Constantinople, approve it de jure; it followes, that the necessary imposition of professed Continency, is but a part of that sowre milke wherewith the Shee-wolfe of the Seven-hills feeds the faction of her Romulists and Rhemists, and none of that wholesome sustenance which God and his purer Church have provided for their Children.

THE HONOUR OF THE MARIED CLERGIE maintained, &c.

The third Booke.

SECT. I.

THE Mariage of Ecclesiastiques, which had the common allowance of the first Times, had in some parts but the connivence of the subsequent, and the prohibition of the last. Those Churches that were not parties to the faction of Rome, could not but be much moved with so peremptory a Decree of a famous Councell, reducing them, in this point, to the exactnesse of Apostolique institution, and professing to rectifie that Roman deviation; No marvell therefore, if not long after, there ensued a collision of opposite parts, and much scuffling betwixt the abettors of Antichristian servitude, and Evangelicall liberty; whom this Hedge-creeper dare terme incontinent Grecians, Schismatiques, Hereticks, his Pen is no slander: The multitude of his Synods, wherein was such reiteration of the same Law, shewes the opposition which it still found in the Church, and the prevailing use of the contrary practice. Refut. p. 241.

The Epistle of Pope Gregory the Third, to the Clergie of Bavaria, which gives that disjunct charge, Of either living chastely, or marying a Wife whom they may not divorce, is no where (forsooth) extant, because he findes it not in his Binius or Baronius; as if no water had gone beside their Mill; and here I am threatned with the Cornelian Law for forgery, no lesse crime: To avoid the perill whereof, let my faire seen Detector turn to the Bavarian Annals of Aventine, in the third Booke, there he shall finde it; An Epistle sent to Pirilus, and the other Clergie of Bavaria, by the hands of Martinian, George, Dorotheus, a Bishop, Priest, Deacon, with this expresse disjunction, Aut casti vivat, aut uxorem ducat, &c. That which he brings from the successor of this Gregory, Zacharias, shewes what his Pope wished, when he had gotten better footing in Germany, but the successe makes for us, for S. Boniface either never durst, or at least never did urge these rules to his Germans. So, I hope, his mouth is stopt for my forged Testimony of his Gregory, which could not in his conceit be other, because he never saw it peep forth before this in other mens books. Refut. p. 243. Refut. p. 244.

Twas nothing ever looke out of the Presse, that escaped that bookish eye: witnes the next passage, which if this Superiours could have had the leisure to have viewed, they had blushed at their Champion. This charge of Gregory (I said) was according to that rule of Clerks vowed frō Hadoire, & renued in the Councel of Mentz, but by our jugling adversaries clipped in the recital. Here the impu- Refut. p. 245.

cryes out, as before of forgery, so now of ignorance, telling his Readers, that I have onely taken this upon trust from anothers note-book. Reader, by this judge of the spirit of my Detractor. It is true, Isidore wrote no Booke of this title; but in the second Booke of his Ecclesiasticall Offices, he makes the title of his second Chapter, De Regulis Clericorum; Of the Rules of Clerkes. From this Chapter, I cite a confessed passage, and am thus censured; whereas the Councell of Mentz cites it by this very stile, Sicut in Regula Clericorum dictum est, As it is said in the Rule of Clerkes. Is it simplicity that he knowes not this title of Isidore? or maliciousnesse, that he conceales it? One of them is unavoidable. It is cleere then, to his shame (if he have any) that the testimony is aright cited; and is it lesse cleere that it is maimed, and cut off by the hams in their Moguntine Councell? Compare the places, the fraud shall be manifest. Conc. Mogunt. 3. That Councell in the tenth Chapter professes to transcribe (verbatim) the words of Isidore in the forecited Tract; and where Isidore saith, Castimoniam inviolati corporis perpetuo conservare studeant, aut certe unius matrimonii vinculo foederentur; Let them live chaste, or marry but one; Their good Clerks have utterly left out the latter clause, and make Isidore charge his Clerkes with perpetuall continency, Let them live chaste. He that denies this, let him deny that there is a Sun in the Heaven, or light in that Sun: what need I say more? Let the bookes speake.

Here my Refuter doth so shuffle and cut, that any man may see he speaks against his own heart; for (to omit his strained mis-interpretation of Isidore, since we now contend not of the sense, but of the citation) how poorely doth he salve up the credit of his Moguntine Fathers, whiles he saith, Isidore spake in generall, the Fathers in that Councell more strictly; when he that hath but one halfe of an eye may see, that both speake in one latitude of the same persons? Those Fathers giving the same title to that Chapter, and professing to follow the Letters and Syllables of Isidore, both name only Clericas in that rule, without distinction. Away then with this graceless facing of wilfull frands in your faithlesse Secretaries, which have also fetcht two Canons out of Carthage to Worms; and learne to be ashamed of your grosse falsifications, and injurious expurgations; else doubtlesse the World will be ashamed of you.

Sect. II.

I Did but name Huldericus his Epistle in mine, as a witnesse, not as the foundation of my cause; my Refuter spends but one and thirty whole Pages upon him: how else should he have made a Volume? In all this what sayes he? Little in many words; and the same words thrice over for failing.

Refut. p. 251. to 282.

And first he wonders at my extream prodigality of credit, and scarednesse of conscience, in citing an Epistle so convicted by Bellarmine, Baronius, Eckius, Faber, Fitz-Simons the Jesuit, and others. Why doth he not wonder that the Moone will keep her pace in the skie, whiles so many Dogs bark at her below. When these Proctors of Rome have said their worst, there is more true authority in the very face of this Letter, and better Arguments in the body of it, than in an hundred Decretall Epistles which he adoreth. Let the World wonder rather at his shamelessnesse, who relating the occasion of this fable (as he termes it) faines it to be only a Lutheran fiction to cover their incestuous mariages, whereas their own Cardinall Æneas Sylvius, almost two hundred yeares ago, mentions it, and reports the argument of it; whereas it is yet extant (as Illyricus) in the Libraries of Germany, whereas Hedio found an ancient copy of it in Holland; and our John Bale, Archbishop Parker, B. Jewel, John Fox had a copy of it remarkable for reverend antiquity, in aged Parchment, here in England; which, I hope to have the meanes to produce: whereas, lastly, the very stile imports truth. As well may he question all the Records of their Fancies, all report of Histories, all Histories of Times: He that would doubt whether such an Epistle were written, may as well doubt whether Pope Zachary wrote to B. Boniface in Germany a direction when to eat bacon: may doubt whether Paul the fifth wrote to his English Catholikes to perswade them not to sweare they would be good subjects: may doubt whether whether Spider-cather, corner-creeper C.E. Pseudo-Catholike Priest, wrote a scurrilous Letter of above two quire of paper, in a twelve-yeares answer to three leaves of J.H. It is not more sure that there is a Rome, or that Gregory and Nicolas sate there, than that such an Epistle was written thither above seven hundred yeares ago. It was extant of old, before ever those Lutheran quarrels were hatched. Let him therefore goe fish for Frogs in the Pond of his Gregory, whiles he derives thence the vain pleas of improbability. If there were differences in relating the circumstances of that story (as I know none) must it needs thereupon be false? Which of their Histories is not liable to variety of report? To begin with the first: The succession of Linus, and Cletus, and Clemens, is diversly reported; is there no truth in it? To end with the last: The title of Paul the fife to the chaire of Peter in the lawfulnesse of his Election, is diversly reported; hath he therefore no true claime to his seat? But who ever placed Gregories pond in Sicily? This is one of the fittens of his Fitz-Simons. If other authors have mentioned this narration, then all the strength of this history lyeth not on Hulderick; If none beside him, his words vary not: these are but tricks to outface truth.

The Epistle, in spight of contradiction, is so ancient; and what care we then for names? Whether it were Saint Udalrick, Or Hulderick, or Volusianus, we labour not much. Let it be the taske of idle Criticks to dispute who was Hecuba's mother, and what was her age; No lesse vain is my Refuter, that spends many waste words about his Saint Udalrick, in shewing the difference of time betwixt him and Pope Nicolas; the one dying, Anno 869. the other being borne, 890. and proving out of his obscure Sorbonist Monachacensis, that there were five Bishops of Ausspurge, betwixt the times of the one, and the other: whereby a simple Reader might easily be deluded, and drawn to think, there is nothing but impossibility and untruth in our report: whereas there is nothing in all this peremptory and colourable flourish of his, but meere cogging or misprision: For both Illiricus apart, and the Centuriists, and Chemnitius (all Germanes, that should be best acquainted with the state of their own) have long since told him, that his Saint Udalrick was not the man whom they held the Author of this Epistle, but Hulderick, another, not much different in name, but differing in time above twenty yeares; No nominis equivocatio lectorem turbet; and lest the equivocation of the name (saith Chemnitius) should trouble the Reader; There is another Udalrick of Augusta, whom Aventine writes to have dyed Anno 973. But this Hulderick, Æneas Sylvius writes to have dyed Anno 900. and in th: yeare of his age 82. Thus he, from the authority of two their famousest Historians: from whose account Onuphrius differs not much. But (that my Refuter may hereafter save the labour of scanning their discordant Computations) whether it were either, or neither of them, it is not worth to us one haire of his crown: since with our faithfull and learned Fox, we rather from the authority of ancient English Copies, ascribe it to Volusianus, whose second Epistle also in the same stile, to the same purpose, is extant from the same Records, not inferiour to the former: What matters it for the name, when it appears that the Epistle it selfe is truly ancient, ponderous, reverend, Theologicall, convictive; and such as the best Romans heads cannot after seven hundred yeares shape a just answer unto? Even in some Canonicall Books, though there be difference in the names of the Penmen, there is full assent to their divine authority: And why is it not so in humane? Thus then we have easily blown away these light bubbles of Discourse, which our Adversary hath raised out of the Nut-shell of his computation, from the Age, Person, Writings of his Saint Udalrick; and returne his impuram nescio cujus nebulonis Epistolam, with his ferrei oris, and plumbei cordis, back whence it came, to the Writer cited by my Adversary, not named: But by better due to the next hand, wherefore I am no whit beholding for leaving it un-englished, in that C.E. spared not me but himselfe: Who is nescio quis, but he that leapeth into the Presse without a name? who Nebulo, rather than he that maskes and marcheth sub nebula, hoping to passe in the conflict for a doughty Knight or Champion, Scio nescio, not daring to lift up his Beaver? who writes impuram Epistolam, but he that hath scribled a Voluminous Epistle; to cry down pure and Honorable Mariage, for the inhauncing of impure Celibate? not that; in Thesi, Celibate is impure, but in Hypothesi theirs, forced and hypocriticall.

SECT.

Sect. III.

AS for the difference that he findes in our number of Pope Nicolas, whether first, or second, or third, we may thanke his Gratian, whose fashion it is (as likewise Sigeberts) to name the Popes without the note of their number; we are sure it was not Nicholas Nemo, which wrote to Odo, Bishop of Vienna, reproving him for giving leave to Alvericus a Deacon to marry, thereupon sending his contrary Decree to the Germane Churches; which, it seemes, (or the like Imposition) gave occasion to this noble Epistle.

But can there be any Game amongst our English Popish Pamphleters, where the Fox is not in chase? Where is the shame of this Roman Priest, whiles he so manifestly belyes our holy, reverend, worthy Master Fox, whom this Seeganly Pen dare say playes the Goose in the inconstancy of his Relation of this Nicolas, first reporting him the first, then the second; when it is most manifest in the during Monuments of that industrious and excellent Author, that he still insists upon Nicolas the second, rejecting by many arguments the opinion of them which have referred it to the first? Such truth there is in shorne crownes.

John Husse was a Goose by name, and now John Fox is a Goose by reproach; Two such Geese are more worth than all the fawning Curres of the Roman Capitoll.

And how much more witthen fidelity is there in my Director, whiles he would prove that Pope Gregory had then no pond, because there are now no ponds at Rome? As if Rome were now in any thing as it was; as if twelve hundred yeares had made no alteration; As if the streets of Troy were not now Champaine; As if his Lipsius could now finde Rome in Rome; As if, lastly, that man were uncapable of a large pond, whose Sea is universall.

Nunc segetes est ubi Troja fuit.

As for the number of childrens heads, I can say no more for it, than he can against it; this History shall be more worth to us than his denyall; But this I dare say, that I know persons both of credit and honour, that saw betwixt fifty and threescore cast up out of the little Mote of an Abbey where I now live: Let who list cast up the proportion.

Vid. qua supra, l. 1. S. 12. Hist. Radulphi Bourn &c.

After the refusall of this worthy Epistle, according to his fashion he tryes to disgrace it with us, telling us, that therein the Bishop of Rome is stiled Supreme Head and Governour of the whole Church. If it were thus, so much more powerfull is the Testimony against them, by how much more the witnesse was theirs: There must needs be much cause, when he that so humbly over-titles the Person, resists the Doctrine so vehemently. But the truth is, that the Epistle stiles Pope Nicolas no otherwise in the superscription, than Sanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ provisorem, Over-seer of the holy Romane Church: And in the body of the letter, Summæ sedis Pontificem; Bishop of the chiefe See, to whom the examination of the common affaires of the Church doth appertaine; which is far other, than in the now Romane sense, the Supreme head of the Church. Secondly, he tels us that this Epistle both grants and allowes a Vow of Continency; Nullum excipit nisi professorem continentiæ: wherein we are no other than friends; we yeeld no lesse, where there is good evidence of the gift and calling of God. But whiles our Volusian grants the professor of Continency bound, and pleads the Clergy to be free, how plainly doth he shew us that there was no such Vow then required of, no such made by the Clergy?

He excepts none but a professor of Continence.

But what needs the man to be so furiously angry with the good old Epistler, for saying, that the Apostles charge (Let every one have his own Wife) is generall to all, reaching to the Clergy as well as the Laity? excepting none but those which have the gift of Continency. What Logick (the want whereof he sometimes causlesly objecteth to me) ever taught him that Unusquisque was any other then universall? Or what other sense can he put upon the words of the Apostle? Could I as truly upbraid Sir Refuter with reading the Logick Lesson, as he doth me with the Rhetorick, surely I should not now be put to paines to teach this Novice, that Unusquisque (unusquisque) quisque) is a terme of collective universality, and must be extended to all, where kinde is excepted tacitely, ex natura rei, as this case must needs be acknowledged to be; fore-prizing none but such as have the gift of Continency; which S. Paul toucheth upon, in that Chapter.

Every one.

Judge then, Reader, whether the Catholike Bishop that wrote this, or the Mis-Catholike Masse-Priest that reproves it, be more worthy of Bedlem.

SECT. IV.

LAstly, yet as if in the loose he would shake hands and be friends with him whom he had so long defied, he thus closes up: Then if Priests have this gift, and have prefixed this course to themselves in the Lord, they shall not need to marry. And this is the case of all Clergy-men who vow Chastity. Thus he. Beleeve him, Readers, if ye can; All the Romish Clergy, all Votaries have the gift of Continency; Witnesse our foresaid Volusianus in the same Period; Multos ejusdem consilii assentatores hominibus non Deo prosalsa specie continentiæ placere volentes, gravioraviderevomittere, patrum scilicet uxores subagitare, masculorum accubitum amplexus non abhorrere. I will not English it for shame: would God the World did not too well finde full these proofes of Romish Chastity.

Refut. p. 273.

Nunc etiam Romæ quidlibet audet Amor.

But as one that thinks no man can be his friend, except also he be our enemy; like a true Make-bate, he will tell us a tale in our eare, that shall set a perpetuall jarre betwixt us and our Hulderick. I wis, sayes my Refuter, your Udalrick is not the man you take him for; For thus he there writes to the Pope: Wherefore, O reverend Father, it shall be your part to cause and over-see, that whosoever either with hand or mouth hath made a Vow of Continency (as all Clergy-men in holy Orders have) and afterwards would forsake the same, should be either compelled to keep his Vow, or else by lawfull authority should be deposed from his Order. So he. But we are not so light of beleefe to lose a friend thus easily. Know then, Reader, that the Parenthesis (which is the harshest peece of this clause) is foisted into the text, and forged by this Caviller; the quite contrary whereof is affirmed in the former Period of our Udalrick, where thus he writes: Non parùm quippe, &c. From this holy discretion thou hast not a little swarved, when as thou wouldst have those Clergy men, whom thou oughtest only to advise to Abstinence from Mariage, compelled unto it by a certaine imperious violence; For is not this justly in the judgement of all wise men to be accounted violence, when as against the Evangelicall Institution, and the charge of the Holy Ghost, any man is constrained to the execution of private Decrees? The Lord in the old Law appointed Mariage to his Priest, which he is never read afterwards to have forbidden. So he. Let my Refuter then reconcile this false Parenthesis with the true Text (which he can never doe, since it directly crosseth the whole scope of Hulderick's Epistle) and then he shall see us easily reconcile Hulderick's proposition with ours.

Propert. Refut. p. 274.

* (As all Clergie men in holy orders have)

But, not so long to delay my Readers satisfaction; The truth is, the Author pleads for an indifferent immunity of Clergy-men from the necessity of this Vow, else the Epistle were contradictory to it selfe: for if he suppose that all the Clergy had vowed, and all that had vowed should be compelled to keep their Vow, how could he plead that the Clergy should not be compelled to Continence? The drift of Udalrick or Volusian then is, that it may be equally lawfull, equally free for Priests either to vow, or not to vow continency; which granted, if any one having liberty not to have vowed or observed it, shall notwithstanding prefixe this course to himselfe in the Lord, out of a long setled experience and assurance of this calling and gift of God, and now when he hath thus ingaged himselfe to the expectation of the Church, voluerit apostare, shall be froward wantonly to abandon this vow, willingly neglecting all good meanes for the continued observation thereof, such a one shall be liable either to compulsion or deposition; As now, if any one of ours should in the midst of freedome binde himselfe by a voluntary vow, it were pitty and shame that he should play fast and loose at pleasure with impunity.

Præfixit hoc sibi in Domino, ibid.

VVhat

What wooll then is here worthy of this cry? Or wherein hath our Author offended us? whiles we neither make this vow, nor can therefore ever breake it, nor ever allowed the breakers of so made vows guiltlesse? A Refut. p. 276. One quarrell yet he cannot remit to Master Fox and me; that for this fore-named Hulderick, we cite Æneas Silvius in his Germania; a book that never was.

This great bellua librorum hath wearied all Libraries, and consulted with his Trithimius & Possevine; neither of them mention any such work of Æneas Silvius; whereas, if he had but taken the book next the doore, Gesners Bibliotheca, he had found (if at least he could have seen the Wood for Trees) Silvius his Germania; which (for fayling) he might have heard of in a double Edition; The one larger, the other more contracted. The first, Gesner expresses thus, Extat ejusdem Germania, quæ continet gravamina nationis Germanicæ, & confutatio eorundem; cum replica. The latter is, Æneæ Sylvii Germania excerpta, &c. The Germania of Æneas Sylvius gathered out of that book, wherein the grievances of the German Nation is objected to the See of Rome, by Martine Mere a Lawyer of Mentz, are refelled. B

There is extant the same Authors Germania, wherein are contained the grievances of the German-nation, and a confutation of the same with a reply.

In sua Germ. Illyr. Catal. Test. lib. 19. Æneas.

See now, Reader, whether my Refuter can blush. In the one of these, which (after deniall) he confesseth to have seen, he findes somewhat that likes him not. Sylvius speaking of Ausspurge, Sanctus Udalricus huic præsidet (saith he) qui Papam arguit de Concubinis; Udalrick is the Saint of that City, who reproved the Pope concerning Concubines. The bone lyes before him, let him picke out the marrow as he can; which because he findes hard to breake, he casts it from him in a chafe, and tels us for the Last refuge; He hath seen a printed Copy and two manuscripts without these words. In verbo Sacerdotis. And so just have we found him of his word, all this while, that he were hard-hearted that would not believe him. C

Sect. V.

Refut. p. 280. BUt still I am taken tardy in my time, or rather doe over-take. I reckon this Liberty to have continued in Germany after Hulderick, for some two hundred years; Whereas betwixt S. Udalrick and Gregory the seventh, were but a hundred and twelve years.

But still his Saint deceives him, and (if I should have erred) his own Chronologers should have deceived me. For his Onuphrius in his Ecclesiasticall Chronicle, makes our Hulderick Bishop of Asspurge in the beginning of Pope Nicolas, anno, 859. And his Sigebert and other Chroniclers cast Gregory the seventh his opposition to Priests mariage, upon the year 1074. Where now is my errour? Where is my over-reaching? Count it, Reader, and see whether I cannot make my word good and give him fifteen years into the bargain: and now judge whether of us may say, Non sat commodè divisa sunt temporibus tibi, Dave, hæc; and whether of us it is, from whom nothing commeth, savouring of any learning or truth: and if thou thinkst it fit, blush for him. D

Refut. p. 281. The like (I feare) willing errour upon the same ground is the mis-calculation of the times of Leo the ninth, and Nicolas the second, betwixt whose times and Udalrick he makes but fifty years; abating one other halfe of the hundred, to expose me to the laughter of his Credulous Clients, which may now say, Loe the man which in a reckoning of 200. years did out-lash but 150. When as both their Sigebert and Hermannus Contractus, (and who not?) make Leo the ninth, Pope, an. 1049, and Nicholas the second some ten years after him; The very elder whereof, if we reckon to Hulderick, an. 859. will be in no lesse than 190. years distance. The man wanted either counters, or wit, or honesty; Truth I am sure he wants. E

Sect. VI.

Refut. p. 283. ANtichrist, which was conceived in the Primitive times, saw the light in Boniface the third, and was grown to his stature and ἄκμη in Gregory the seventh. So as I might might well say, that the body of Antichristianisme, together with the prohibition of mariage, began to be compleat in that Hildebrand. The times accord better than our Papists would have them. After a thousand yeares Satan was loosed: at that very time did this Hildebrand (otherwise Gregory) by the instigation of the Devill (as himselfe confessed at his death (witnesse Cardinall Benno and Sigebert) trouble the Church; belike with the violent obtrusion of this doctrine of Devils (prohibition of mariage) and insolent detrusion of Imperiall authority. It is then but a Sardonian laughter that my Refuter takes up at our compleat Antichrist; whose supparasitation may one day cost him teares and gnashing.

But (good God!) what Saints hath the Romane Church? Hildebrand is one of their Calender; the Legend of whose holinesse shall anon make any man save C. E. ashamed.

Since it will be no better, Perge mentiri; I am now charged with a faire contradiction, whiles I am accused to say, That the liberty of Priests mariages was universall for a thousand yeares, and yet had before granted, that in Steven the second his time (which was two hundred and forty yeares before) the Western Clergie was restrained. In all which he perswades his friends that I would faine lye grossely, if my memory would let me. Reader, doe but review my words: These they are: After him (that is, Hulderick) so strongly did he plead, and so happily, that for two hundred yeares more this freedome still blessed those parts. I speak of Germany, he of Italy: I speak of those parts, he of all. Is not this a Logicall and faithfull refutation? Yet more, this bold and false hand dares write, that Leo the ninth, and Nicolas the second, never medled with the prohibition of these mariages; Onely the one made a decree against Harlots, the other against Concubines: neither of which (he hopes) we will apply to our selves. We are so used to these impudent assertions, that now we cease to wonder at them. Let him tell me what was that Epistle which Leo the ninth wrote to Peter the Hermite? whose very title is Incontinentiam Clericorum detestatur, & puniendam describit. The Epistle is bitter, like my Libellers. And lest he should say, we guiltily take to our selves the imputation of Incontinency, it is bent against quadrimodam carnalis contagionis pollutionem, a foure-fold pollution of Clergie-men; Whereof one he will not sure deny to be mariage.

Let him tell me what was done under Leo in the Councell of Mentz (about the yeare 1049.) of which Adam Bremensis (who was there present) writes, Simoniaca hæresis & nefanda Sacerdotum conjugia holographa Synodi manu perpetuo damnata est. That is, [a] The heresie of Symony, and the wicked mariages of Priests, by the consent of the Synod was condemned. Is this Nothing done by his Leo, the Leo rugiens of that time.

As for for his Nicolas the second, good man, he did nothing neither: Onely he stained women as honest as himselfe, with the name of Concubines; and men more holy than himselfe, with the name of Nicolaitans, (whom he must needs love for the name sake) and an estate of life as holy as his own, with the name of Filthy copulation. Let his Popes shamefull decrees, and his shamelesse lyes, goe both together for company whence they came.

SECT. VII.

YEt still the further we go, the worse. My Refuter surpasses himself in the prizes that he playes for his Pope Gregory the seventh, who first (he saith) did not ruine this liberty of mariages: Let Vincentius, and Radulphus de Diceto, and Sigebert speak for us both; [b] Uxoratos Sacerdotes à divino, &c. He removed maried Priests from their function, and forbad the people to heare their Masses; a new example, and as many thought inconsiderately prejudiciall, against the judgement of the holy Fathers, &c. But he fully prevailed not (saith my Refuter.) What thanke is that to him? he did his best, and kindled those coales that could never yet be quenched. He led the way to his Urban the second, and Paschal the second: They followed him, and prevailed; The broyles were his, if not the victory. Gratũ opus scortatoribus (saith Aventine.) Aventine (saith my Refuter) a late Gospelling brother. For us, we are glad of the fraternity of so worthy an an Author whom Beatus Rhenanus gratulates to his Germany, and cals [c] Eruditissimum Aventinum, and [d] Variarum cognitione disciplinarum præstantem; and Erasmus, [e] Hominem studio indefatigabili, ac recondita lectionis. Lastly, whom his just Epitaph stiles [f] Rerum antiquarum indagatorem sagacissimum: But the truth is, no man by his History can tell his Religion: The Canons of Augusta praise him for the light he gives to the institutions of their Monasteries; And when he speakes of the Shrines of Berg, Valentia and Halli, I am sure he mentions them with too Popish devotion; and when of Jo. Husse and Jerome of Prage, he taxes them with crimen irreligiositatis; Yet this man (borne An. 1466.) when he but speakes a famous truth of Hildebrand and the German Clergie, he is become a late Gospelling brother. Still let us have Brethren that care more for their honesty, than their faction.

Neither yet (to give the Devill his due) doe we thinke so ill of those enemies of maried chastity, that they did purposely enact Lawes of unmaried loosenesse: but that all abominable filthines did follow upon the restraint of lawfull remedies, who sees not? [g] Sigebert himselfe (their own Monk) freely acknowledges it. John Haywood our old Epigrammatist told Queen Mary, her Clergy was saucy; if they had not Wives they would have Lemans. Where there is not the gift of holy continency, how could it be otherwise? Where the water is dammed up, and yet the stream runs full, how can it choose but rise over the banks? There is purity therefore out of VVedlock, but not out of Continence. And what needed my Detector to travell so farre as England, for an example of incontinencie in a King Henry, or any wife of his, whether falsely or truly objected, when he might have looked neerer the centre of their Church, and have found his own Pope John (in the very time now questioned for this prohibition) [h] killed by the Devill in the act of adultery with another mans wife? This end of the wallet hangs behinde him.

Sect. VIII.

The brand of Love.
Brand of Hell. Refut. p. 293.

Hildebrand (as I learned of Aventine) is as much as Titio amoris. But how little he differed in name or nature from Hellebrand, Titio infernalis (as Chemnitius cals him) his History shewes too well. And is it possible that any man should rise up after so many hundred yeares, to Canonize Saint Hildebrand, even in that for which he condemned himselfe? My Reader must know the man a little from the witnesse of his own Conclave, his Cardinall Benno, Arch-Priest of the Romane Church, then living: Others, besides, tell of his beginnings in wicked Necromancy, and murderous underminings, and tyrannicall swaying of the Keyes ere he had them: Benno tels how he got them, how he used them gotten; He got them by fraud, mony, violence, used them with tyranny. There was a knot, & a succession of Necromancers in those daies. Gerbertus, which was Sylvester the second, was the Master of the Schoole: His chiefe Schollers in the Black Art, were Theophilactus (afterwards changed into Pope Benedict) and Laurentius, and Gratianus. These were the Tutors of Hildebrands younger times, of whom he learned both Magick and Policie. It is a world to see what work these Magicians made (like the ill spirits they raised) in Church and Commonwealth, opposing Emperours, setting up what Popes they pleased, poisoning whom they disliked: at last it came to Hildebrands turn to take the Chaire: [i] To which purpose he seperated first the Bishops from the Cardinals averse from him: when he had done, he compelled them by terror and force to sweare unto him part; which done, he was elected in spight of the Canons, only by Lay-persons, by Soldiers; he expelled the Cardinals, rashly excommunicated the Emperor, of his own head, without any Canonical accusation, without subscription of any Cardinall, hired a bloody Villain to murder the Emperor; consulted with the Oracle of his brethren God, which because it answered not he cast it into the fire; he exercised most horrible cruelties upon many, hanging up men at his pleasure unaccused, in a word, quanta is heresibus mundum corruperit, &c. saith Benno in his conclusion, His heresies, his perjuries can scarce be described by many Pens; Clamat tamen altius, &c. But the Christian blood shed by his instigatio & cõmand (saith he) cries yet louder to God: yea, the blood of the Church, the sword of his tongue in a miserable proditio bathshed, cries out against him;

[i] Benno Cardin. vita Hildebr.

which things, the Church did most justly depart from all communion with him. Thus Benno; who yet (to make amends) [1] tells us that Hildebrand upon his death-bed repented of these lewd courses, and sent to the Emperour and the Church to cry them mercy: confessing (as Sigebert reports) that he had by the perswasion of the Devill raised these wicked tumults.

Yet this is the man whom Bellarmine will justifie by seven and twenty Authors, and C.E. can adde two more to the heap; yea, in those very things for which he condemned himselfe.

Reader, if one of his evill spirits should have stept into Peters chaire, doe ye think he could have wanted Proctors? But how good an account we were like to have of seven and twenty Authors, (if it would requite the cost to examine them) appeares, in that [1] Lambertus Schafnaburgensis (which is cited for the man that magnifies the miracles of this Gregory) sayes only this one word of him, that he wrought many prodigies. And what prodigies these were, Benno the Cardinall tells us, that he raised devils familiarly; that he shaked sparks of fire out of his sleeve by his Magick. A tricke that well beseemed an Hellebrand, who set all the world on fire by his wicked impetuosity. We will not envy Rome this Saint, let them enjoy him, let them celebrate him, and cry down Henry the Emperour, and all that opposed him. Still may such as these be the Tutelar gods of that holy Citie: For us, it is comfort enough to us, that our mariages had such a persecutor.

That the Churches did hereupon ring of him for Antichrist, Aventine is my Author: Pro concione, &c. In their Sermons (saith he) they did curse Hildebrand, they cryed out on him as a man transported with hatred and ambition, Antichristum esse prædicant, They declared him to be Antichrist; They said that under the colourable title of Christ, he did the service of Antichrist; That he sits in Babylon in the Temple of God, and is advanced above all that is called God. So he. And little better is that which his [m] Schafnaburgensis (so much extolled by C.E.) recordeth: Adversus hoc decretum infremuit tota fallio Clericorum, &c. Against this Decree (saith he) all the whole faction of Clergy-men fretted and mutined, accusing him as an Heretick, and a man of perverse opinion, who forgetting the word of Christ, which said, All men cannot receive this, did by a violent exaction compell men to live in the fashion of Angels.

To which if I should add the sentence of the Synod of Wormes, and that of Brixia, my Reader would easily see, that it is not the applause of some devoted Pen, that can free him from these foule imputations of deserved infamie.

That untruth then cleared, another belike hangs upon the score; My Refuter charges me with falshood, in saying, That Gregory the seventh was deposed by the French and German Bishops. Only the Germans (he saith) were Actors in that Tragedie. But if not at Wormes, yet let him tell me what was done at Brixia, and by whom: Quamobrem Italiæ, Germaniæ, Galliæ Pontifices, &c. Wherefore (saith Aventinus) the Bishops of Italy, Germany, and France, the seventh of the Kalends of July, met at Brixia in Bavaria, and sentenced Hildebrand to have spoken and done against Christian piety, &c. and condemned him of Heresie, Impietie, Sacriledge, &c. And that my Refuter may find himselfe answered at once to the last of his Cavils, wherein he pleads that this deposition was not so much as pretended for the inhibition of these mariages, but for other causes, let him see the Copy of the judgement passed against him in the said Councell; wherein, after the accusation of his Simoniacall climbing into the Chaire (the vice which he pretended most to persecute in others) his forcible possession, his heresie, his machinations against the Emperor, his perverting of the Laws both of God and Men, his false doctrines, sacriledges, perjuries, lyes, murders by him suborned and commended, his tyranny, his setting of discord betwixt Brethren, Friends, Cousins, It followes; Inter conjuges divortia facit, suavis homo sacerdotes qui uxores habent legitimos sacrificos esse pernegat, interim tamē scortatores, adulteros incestuosos aris admovet, &c. He causes divorces betwixt Man and Wife, The fine man denies those Priests which have lawful Wives, to be Priests at all, in the mean time he admits to the Altar whoremongers, adulterers, incestuous persons, &c. Nos ergo. We therefore by the authority of Almighty God pronounce him deposed from his Popedom. Thus Avētine specifies the decree; which alone without cōmentary, without inforcement,

FRom foraine parts, I returne at last to our owne; so I feare hath C.E. done long since, lurking some-where in England for no good: These Fugitives love not home more, than their home hath cause to hate them. His cavils of the wondrous contradiction betwixt my Margin and my Text, are too childish to be honored with an answer. My Text was, The bickerings of our English Clergie with their Dunstans, about this time, are memorable. My Margin cites Henry of Huntingdon, affirming Anselme to be the first that forbad Mariage: Betwixt these two, saith my Refuter, was an hundred yeares difference. I grant it: But (had my words been thus) if my Detector were not disposed to seek a knot in a Rush, he had easily noted, that in a generall survay of all ages, the phrase (About that time) admits much latitude, and will easily stretch, without any strain, to one whole Century of yeares. Had the Quotation been as he pleadeth, this answer were sufficient. But my words need no such reconciliation; I stand to the censure, and disclaime the mercy of any Reader: For that citation of Anselme hath plain reference to the following words, Our Histories testifie how late, how repiningly our Clergie stooped under this yoke: it is for this that my Margin points to Henry Huntingdon, and Fabian, reporting Anselme the first man that prohibited these mariages. What contradiction now can his acuteneese detect in these two? The English Clergie had bickerings with their Dunstans; and stooped late and repiningly to this yoke under Anselme. See, Reader, and admire the equall Truth and Logick of a Catholike Priest, and judge how well he bestoweth his Pages.

Sect. X.

Refut p. 318.

IT is true, Dunstan was the man who first with his other * two Cousins and partners in Canonization, opposed any appendance of the maried Clergy; He wrought it with good King Edgar, by dreames, and visions, and miracles. He, who when the Devill came to tempt him to lust, caught him by the nose with an hot pair of Tongs, and made him rore out for mercy, supposed that every Clergy-man had the same Irons in the fire; and therefore blew the coales to that good King of the dislike of these Clericall mariages; and with the same breath inkindled the zeale of Monkery. The Church wherein I am now interessed, and wherein I doe (by the providence of God, and the bounty of my gratious Master) succeed their Saint Oswalds Priors, yeelds me sufficient records hereof; which, because they are both worthy of publike light, and give no small light to the businesse in hand, I have thought good here to insert.

In the end dated thus, Facta sunt hæc An. Dominicæ Nativitatis, D.CCCC.LXIIII. Indictione VIII. Regni Eadgari Anglorum Regis, 6. in Regia urbe quæ ab incolis Gloucestre nominatur, in Natale Domini. In English thus.

C BY the bountifull mercy of Almighty God, which is King of Kings, and Lord of Lords, I Edgar King of England, and of all the Kings of the Ilands of the Ocean lying about Brittaine, and of all the Nations that are included within it, Emperor and Lord, doe give thankes to Almighty God my King, which hath inlarged my Empire, and exalted it above the Kingdome of my Fathers.——

Wherefore I also having devoted my selfe to exalt the glory and praise of Christ in my Kingdome, and to enlarge his service, have intended, and by my faithfull Wellwillers Dunstan Archbishop, Athelwold and Oswald Bishops, (whom I have chosen for my spirituall Fathers and Counsellors) I have for the greatest part already performed what I intended, &c.——

And by the diligent indevours of my fore-said Helpers, I have now constituted and made seven and forty Monasteries with Monkes and Nunnes; and if Christ shall D give mee to live so long, I have decreed to draw forth the Oblation of this my devout Munificence unto God, to the full number of fifty, which is the number of my *remission. Whereupon, now for the present, I do by my Royal authority confirm to persons of Monasticall Religion, and by the consent and astipulation of my Princes and Peeres, doe establish and consigne to them that Monastery which the fore-said reverend Bishop Oswald (to the honour of the blessed Mother of God) hath amplified in the Episcopall See of Wereceastre, and expelling the wanton and filthy lasciviousnesse of Clerkes, hath, by my consent and favour, bestowed it upon the religious servants of God, the Monkes; so as from henceforth it shall not be lawfull for the said Clerkes, to challenge any thing therein, as those which have rather chosen (with the danger of their Order, and the losse of their Ecclesiasticall * Benefice) to stick unto E their wives, then chastely and canonically to serve God. And therefore all that ever they possessed of the said Church, whether Ecclesiasticall or Secular, moveable or unmoveable, together with the Church it selfe, I doe from this day forward for ever give and consigne to the said Monkes, to be possessed of them in the right of my Royall Munificence; so firmly, that it shall not be lawfull for any Prince, or any Bishop succeeding, to substract ought from them, or to withdraw any of the Premises from their power, and to deliver it back againe to the right and possession of Clerks, so long as the Christian Faith shall remain in England, &c.——

* So as it appears, this number was set to King Edgar by Dunstan for his penance.

* That is their Prebend.

Facta sunt hæc, &c. These things were done in the yeare of Christs Nativity, DCCCC. LXIIII. Indiction VIII. In the sixt year of the Reigne of Edgar King of England, in the Royall City, which by the Inhabitants is named Gloucestre, in the Feast of the Nativity of our Lord, &c.——

That Dunstan did this, none ever doubted; but withall it is considerable, who himself was an Abbot, and therefore partiall to the Cloysters: and who put him into this Commission, Pope John the thirteenth, a Monster of men, yea, of Popes; one who (as was articled against him in a generall Councell) had committed Incest with two of his own sisters, who called to the Devill for his help at Dice, who defloured Virgins, who lay with Stephana his Fathers Concubine, who dranke to the Devill, besides many other horrible criminations; A man fit to set a Saint on work against lawfull Mariages. And thirdly, what the state of the Times were, wherein liberty was degenerate into strange licentiousnesse; Even change of Wives (if we may beleeve Histories) was then no wonder. For the correcting whereof, the Reformers (according to the Philosophers advice) laboured towards the other extreame; as those which to straighten a stick, bow it as much the contrary way. And lastly, how farre this act and endeavour extended: for Dunstan sought not to thrust maried men out of the Clergie, but to thrust * maried Clergy-men out of the Cathedrall Churches, which required a quotidian attendance, which is evident both by the sentence of Dunstan (Aut Canonice vivendum, aut ab Ecclesia exeundum) either that they must live Canonically, or get out of the Church; that is, Ex Ecclesiis majoribus, as Historians relate it; And by the sentence of the Rood for Dunstan: Mutaretis non bene: How much difference there was in these two, appeares in the Decree of Bishop Lanfranck, Anselm's Predecessor, which tolerating maried Seculars, drives directly against maried Canons. Little needed my Refuter then (but that he must have something to say) to fall upon our right Reverend and learned Bishop of Hereford (whose worthy labours have justly indeared him to all Posterity) for that true comparison he makes betwixt these three Saints of theirs, and Anselme: They by action, he by Synodicall Decree persecuted the Clergy: They bent their endeavours against Cathedrall Clerkes, he against Priests: Their project was particular, his universall.

That a peremptory sentence passed generally against the mariage of Ecclesiastiques in a publique Synod under Dunstan, he refers us to Binius, which at randome talkes of Concilium Anglicanum, without all particulars of place or persons, and refers us to Surius, as if he had bidden us aske his Fellow if he lye? Why did he not send us to Father Parsons, or his Gabriel Gifford? Sure, it was in some obscure hole of the Peak, or some blinde Dormitory of a Covent; neither can we say of it with the Apostle, These things were not done in a Corner; The Canons, whereto the fore-alledged Charter, and the sentence of Dunstan have reference, were no other than Romish, which these Monkish Prelates had perswaded King Edgar to receive, and in part to urge upon his maried Prebendaries. The successe of his Synod at Reading, or Winchester, he knowes well enough: And is he not ashamed of the miraculous sentence of his Holy-Rood (which Jornalensis reports) who there openly spake for the Monkes against the Clergy? Absit ut hoc fiat; that he passes over to that of Calne, where the falling of an over-charged floore, crushed the Mariage of Clergy-men. Idle Monks who for their own turne set such a superstitious glosse upon that accident, which (as * Henry Huntingdon more probably interprets it) was Signum excelsi Dei, quod proditionis & interfectione Regis sui, ab amore Dei cessuri essent, & à diversis gentibus digna contritione conterendi: A signe from the High God, that by their Treason and Murder of their King (who was slaine in the yeare after) they should fall from the favour of God, and be worthily crushed by other Nations. Thus he. Such was the event; For the construction of it, the Reader may chuse whether he will beleeve an Archdeacon of Huntingdon, or a Monk of Malmesbury. Ywis these rotten joysts are foundation enough whereon to build the prohibition of our Mariages.

VNder these late Romish Saints, Dunstan & Anselme, I might safely say, our English Clergy found the first machinations against their Mariage, and at last stooped perforce to this yoke of constrained Continency. Neither doth my wit or my Logick

A faile me in this collection. If these were the men that made the first opposition to the mariage of Clergy-men in England, then it formerly obtained here, without contradiction. The bare word of my Refuter is a hot-shot to batter this necessary illation; and to assure the Reader that the forced Celibate of the English Clergy is of greater Antiquity than these his Saints; To which he addes (in an ignorant begging of the question) a thing so filthy, after a solemn vow to God, to take a wife; as it never appeared without the brand of infamy. As if our predecessors in the English Clergy had been ever charged with a vow; As if the solemnity of this vow had never had beginning? Chimericall fancies fit for a shorn head. When as his Master Harding could not produce so much as a probability of any vow anciently required, or undertaken; whether by beck, or Dieu gard. When as the ancient Saxon Pontificall makes not the least mention of any such profession; yea, when Girardus (who was the second Bishop of York after the Conquest) writes flatly to Anselme concerning his own Canons, Professiones verò mihi penitus abnegant Canonici, &c. My Canons (saith he) utterly deny to give me profession of continency, which without this profession have been disorderly advanced to holy Orders; Cum verò ad ordines aliquos invito, dura servire renituntur, ne in ordinando castitatem profiteantur, And when I doe invite any to take Orders, they doe resist me very stubbornly, that they will make no profession of Chastity in their Ordination. Thus he. Shewing us plainly, that the Clergy in those times challenged no other than the liberty of their Predecessors. But well may he face us down in this more obscure (though certaine) truth, when he dares to say that Greece never tolerated this estate in their Clergy, til by life it fell to Schisme, and from Schisme to open Heresie; whiles their own Canon Law (besides all Histories) gives him the lye; and what [r] Espencæus hath ingenuously spoken concerning this point, we have formerly shewed. If he did not presume upon Readers that never saw Books, he durst not be thus impudent.

This argument therefore shall ever stand good, and shall scornfully trample upon all his vain cavils; Ethelwold was the first, which by the command of King Edgar expelled maried Priests out of [s] the old erection of Winchester, Anno 963. Dunstan and Oswald, together with him, were the men who (two yeares after) first expelled maried Clergie-men out of the greater houses of Merceland, 1177. In the dayes of King Henry the Second, the secular Prebendaries of Waltham were first turned out, to give way to their Irregulars; therefore untill these times, these places were interruptedly possessed by maried Clergie-men. If now he shall except, that this possession of theirs was not of long continuance, but upon usurpation; whereby the maried Incumbents had injuriously incroached upon the right of Monks; our Monks of Worcester shall herein fully convince him, who write under their Oswaldus Archiepiscopus, Per me fundatus fuit ex Clericis Monachatus, that is, By me were Monks first founded out of Clerks; which was also the fashion of all other erections of this nature; so as it is manifest, that originally these Churches were founded in maried Clergy-men; afterwards wrongfully translated from them to Monks: And if the first possessors had been [t] Monks, how could Monks have been there first founded by Oswald, when as Ethelred had long before both founded and furnished it? and how out of Clerks, if Monks had been there before? Let my Refuter shew me but a verse of equall antiquity in a contrary rime,

Per me fundatus fuit ex Monachis Clericatus.

But to strike it dead, my adversary will prove the English Clergy ever to have beene continent. Reader, look now for demonstrations: His first proofe is, That in all the pursuit of this busines, we never read of any that did stand upon the former custom of the Church. A proper argument ab authoritate negativè. And what other arguments doth my Detector find used by the then persecuted Clergy? Histories record them not, therefore doubtlesse they said nothing for themselves; and if they urged other proofs which are not now descended to us by any relation, why not this for one? Who can but hisse out so silly sophistry? But to stop that clamorous mouth in this poore cavill, doth not his own [a] Monke of Malmsbury tell him, that the Clergie urged this plea for themselves, Ingens esse & miserabile dedecus, ut novum advena veteres colonos migrare compelleret, &c. That it was a great and miserable shame, that these upstarts the Monks should thrust out the ancient possessors of those places; that this was neither pleasing to God, which had given them that long-continued habitation, nor yet to any good man, who might justly feare the same hard measure which was offered to them. Thus they: whose plea and complaint seemed so just, that Alfgina the Queen, Prince Alfere, and others of the Nobility overthrew many of those new-founded Monasteries, and re-installed the Priests in their former right.

His next proofe is from the Letters of Pope Gregory, which he wrote to Austin the Monk here in England. Risum teneatis? Did ever any man doubt, but that Pope Gregory was desirous to establish Romish Laws and Orders amongst the English? Where yet his Legate found many as good Christians as himselfe, under another rule, conforme to the Greek Church? But how follows this? This Pope was willing to inromanize the English; therefore the staffe stands in the Corner: And yet even Pope Gregory allowed mariage to those of the [x] English Clergie, which were not within the higher Orders, appointing them to receive their stipends apart; a favour which he saw necessarily to be yeelded to our Nation, whiles he abridged others.

Refut. p. 329. The noble state of Monkes.

From Gregory, he descends to Beda, a man doubtles venerable for his learning and vertue; but (as it is in his Epitaph) Monachorum nobile sydus. Whether a neighbour at least to Italy, by birth (as they contend) I am sure a Disciple of Abbot Benedict, and so great a fautor of the Roman faction, that he censures S. Aidanus and Colmannus, for adhering to those Greek forms, which the Churches of this Iland had anciently followed; whose part Johannes Major justly takes against him: This Beda in a general speculation speaks his conceit of the voluntary continency which he holds requisite in the Priesthood; sayes nothing of the particular custome of the English Clergy; rather in divers passages insinuating the contrary. Amongst the rest, he tells us that in the [y] Synod holden by Archbishop Theodorus, and other Bishops (at Hereford) in the third yeare of King Egfride, (which was about an. 673.) their tenth and last Canon was pro conjugiis; ut nulli liceat nisi legitimum habere connubium: For mariages; That no man should marry unlawfully, no man should commit incest, no man should leave his own Wife, unlesse (as the Gospell teacheth) for fornication only, &c. I know my Refuter will plead the universality of this Canon, and will contend, that a Law generally made for all Christians, is not without injury restrained to Ecclesiastiques; But let my Reader well consider both the Prologue & Epilogue of that Synod, he shall see, that they who are required to keep these Laws, are Consacerdotes omnes; and that whosoever shall violate them, Noverit se ab omni officio Sacerdotali & nostra societate separatum; Must know himself separate from all Sacerdotall office & society: so as it will necessarily follow, that this Law did (at least) concern the Clergie with others, though not apart; Neither is there any other of these Canons, which concernes not the Clergie onely, except the first, concerning the observation of Easter, which principally also belonged to them. Whereto it makes not a little, that in the Book of Saxon-Canons set out for the governing of the secular Priests, the rule is, Let them also do their indevour, that they hold with perpetuall diligence their chastity, in an unspotted body, or else let them be coupled with the bond of one Matrimony. Words, wherein our Clergie meant to regulate themselves (as it seems) by the holy prescript of Isidore, whereof we have spoken. Lastly, my Adversary cannot deny, that this Synod gives order for many accidentall matters, concerning the Clergie, for their fixed station, for their maintenance, &c. but except in this Canon, there is no one word of their state of life; neither is there in all those Canons one syllable of this pretended Celibate, as that, which the contrary received custome of our Church would never have endured: my Refuter dares not say that these mariages were so quite out of use, that it was needlesse to ordain ought against them; he knows that his Dunstan found here this course so inveterate, that the very age and deep rooting of it hindred his designes.

Sect. XIII.

FRom hence he comes down to his three premised Saints, Dunstan, Oswald, and Ethelwold; and, to make sure work, cites an obscure [a] Scholler of Ethelwold, for an authentique Witnesse against eight honest Priests, and the lawfulnesse of all Priests mariages. And lastly, he makes up the mouth of his discourse with the full decree of Archbishop Anselme Richard in the Synods of London: and why not King Henries six Articles? and why not the Councell of Trent? Sic concluſum eſt contra hæreticos; Now, because his heart told him how light these proofes were, he layes in the scales with them certain grave ponderations, which all put together, will prove almost as waighty as the Feather he wrote withall.

The first is, That there cannot be a greater nationall proofe, then to have the Bishops, and the King, and his Nobility to define, and deliver this point with joynt consent. Take this, Reader, of King Edward the sixt, and his Parliament, and Convocation, and all is well. King Edgars Utopicall decree was hatcht in a Monks Cowle; and to his two King Henries, he might have added Philip and Mary. And why might not we oppose K. Edmund to Edgar, & Oſulphus his Bishop to Dunstan? And the Clergie before Anselme to the Clergie after him? This match were made with some indifferency: But how idly hath my Refuter misplaid the comparison betwixt Henry of Huntingdon and Fabian on our part, and all the Clergy and Laity of theirs? Since those two Authors (if we had no more) report only de facto, that Priests mariages were not before forbidden; and the cited Clergy and Laity doe now thus late-ward discusse de jure; Neither have the Clergy and Laity by him alledged, ever contradicted that which Huntingdon and Fabian have out of the course of all Story affirmed; Unto which, let me adde [a] Polydore Virgil, seconding this their assertion, who plainly tels us, that for 970. yeares, the restraint of mariage was never in use amongst the English Clergie. Search not for this, Reader, in the later editions, lest thou complain of lost labour; Poore Polydore may cry out of his grave with that other Polydore in Virgil: Fas omne abrumpit, Polydorum obtruncat. Let him then (to answer this vain challenge) produce but any one author of equall authority to any of these, which doth avouch the contrary to that which these three have thus confidently delivered, and I shall confesse my self herein sufficiently answered; In the mean time time, let him, and the world know, that all the ancient Clergy, and Laity of this Iland, was for this liberty, altogether ours: Whereto if he yield not, let him name the man, before his Dunstan, that ever in this Ile opened his mouth against it; Till then, the Reader cannot but see, that whereas our proofe is, Ex ore duorum, aut trium, his side is mute, that for our Something, he can shew Nothing at all; and that our Huntingdon, Fabian, and Polydore, are better then C.E. and his man in the Moon.

Sect. XIV.

HIs second Ponderation of the ſanctity of the perſons, is no truer avoir-de-pois. That B. Dunstan was an holy man, we may easily grant; but taken from the Covent of Glastenbury. Neither would the Nobility of his time be so liberal as to yield this; who accused him to the King, de libidinibus & præſtigiis; for (two remarkable qualities in his Saintship) lechery & sorcery, whereupō he was cast out from the Court; and that he was received again, he might thank the Kings horse, whose sudden stop on the verge of a steep down-fall, restored Dunstan to the good opinion of the superstitious Prince; who yet was so far from being guilty of this deliverance, that he did not so much as know of the danger; an acquitall at least as causlesse as the accusation.

That Bishop Anselme was devout and learned, we willingly grant, but withall an Italian, & taken from a Norman* Covent; he was holy, but how impetuously addicted to his own will, and how refractary to authority, I had rather Histories should speak than my self. Neither is it any wonder if both these Prelates (how holy soever) savored red somewhat too strong of the Cloisters, and of Rome. Something must be yeelded to times and places; we will not think but a well-meant zeale caried them into these resolutions; but a zeal misguided with the sway of the times. The name of Saints, the truth of their sanctity, did not priviledge them from errors; we know how to sever their chaffe from their wheat, and to send one of them to the winds, the other to the granary. As for the maried Clergie, That they were ever accounted the scumme and refuse of their Order, it is but the scurrilous scumny blurre of an intemperate pen; what was Spiridion? what was Hilarye? what were both Gregories? what was Sidonius? what was Tertullian, Prosper, Simplicius, Eupsichius? In a word, what were all those whom his Damasus recounteth? what was the father of the Archdeacon of Huntingdon, who within two leaves he recordeth (from his Epitaph) for [t] the star of the Clergy. This scum is better than their broth, which though it send forth a fume, seemingly delicious, yet many times being neerer tasted, proveth but cock-crowne pottage: These Saints he ignorantly ballanceth againe with our Huntingdon and Fabian, as if their present Decree did contradict the history of things passed; as if we had no more histories on our side, because my margin cited them not. In the mean time he finds this testimony of Huntingdon so too much, that he would faine strip us of it; denying peremptorily that Huntingdon affirms Anselme to be the first that forbad mariage to the Clergy. Reader, in stead of all other ponderations, weigh the words; [u] Eodem anno ad festum S. Michaelis tenuit Anselmus Archiepiscopus Concilium, apud Londoniã, in quo prohibuit uxores Sacerdotibus Anglorum, antea non prohibitas, i. The same yeare, on the Feast of S. Michael, Archbishop Anselme held a Synod at London, wherein he forbad wives to the Priests of England, before not forbidden; and tel me whether my Detector be true.

Refut. p. 335. To King Athelſtan, who first brought him from his Cell.

* The Clergie of England did so wel approve these Monkish Archbishops, that after Anselm and Rodulph, the Bishops of the Land became Suiters to the King, that they might never have any Archbishop of Canterb. chosen from the Mōkish profession. Sax. Chron. An. 1123.

The words are too plain; he will yet wrangle with the sense, and tels us that the word, Before, may signifie, perhaps, Immediately before, in the raign of the Williams, and not all successions of times. It were well if he could escape so: But this starting hole will not hide him. For (not to send him to School to learn the difference betwixt Antea and Dudum, or Pridem, the same Author, in the following words, shews us the censures and conceits that passed upon this Act, as an absolute & unheard-of novelty, like as in Germany the Historians brand this same act in Hildebrand, with a novo exemplo and inconsiderato præjudicio. And for the times preceding, Polydore Virgil gives the very same witnesse. Neither let him fly for succour to his Dunstan, who never can be proved to have prohibited the mariage of Priests, though he disliked that Monasteries and Cathedrall Churches should be possessed by maried Clerks.

Lastly, where the testimony is displeasing, the witnesse himselfe must be disgraced. Curiosity led my Detector to search who this H. Huntingdon might be? with one inquiry he might find him to be a Canon Regular of Austins Order, and for dignity an Archdeacon, a person past exception: But for his parentage, he went no further then to the next Leafe, to find that he was the son of a noted, and, in those dayes, eminent Clergy-man: His Epitaph at Lincolne shews him to have been the star of the Clergy; no whit dimmed in his acknowledged light, or hindered in his influence, by his conjunction in lawfull wedlock: What better instance could my Refuter have given against himselfe? If he think to insinuate that his birth made him partiall, The Reader will easily consider, that if such Parentage had been then accounted shamefull, the Historian would have had the wit to have suppressed it; and withall, that he durst not, writing in the times when this thing was so familiarly and universally known, have offered such a Proposition to the light, out of a vain partiality, to incurre the controlment of all eyes.

Sect. XV.

Refut. p. 333.

As for our Fabian, if C.E. find him a Merchant, I find him to have been Sheriffe of the Honourable City of London; A man whose credit would scorn to be poised with an hundred nameless Fugitives, parasiticall petty-chapmen of the late small-wares of Rome. Neither can the name of a Citizen disparage him to any wise Judge.

How

How many have our times yeelded of that rank, whom both Academicall education, and experience, and travell, and ſtudy have wrought to an eminent perfection in all Arts, eſpecially in Mathematikes and Hiſtory? Such was Fabian, whoſe fidelity (beſides his other worths) was never (that I find) taxed, but by this inſolent Pen that hath learned to forbeare no man. He was too old for us to bribe, and too credible for C.E. to diſgrace. If he would have left Rome but this one lye, no man had been more authenticall; now his truth makes him fabulous Fabian. That one fault hath marred our Archdeacon of Huntingdon alſo.

The ſtory which he tells of the Cardinall of Crema the Popes Legate, taken in bed (after his buſie indeavours againſt the maried Clergie) the ſame day with an Harlot, hath undone his reputation. Why will C.E. ſtirre this ſinke? No man provoked him: If he did not long to blazon the ſhame of his friends, he had rather ſmothered this foule occurrence: but ſince he will be medling, Res apertiſſima, negari non potuit, celari non debuit, ſaith Huntingdon: The thing was moſt openly known, it could not be denied, it might not be concealed. Yet now comes an Upſtart-Novice, and dares tell us from Baronius, that this was a meere Fable, how publike and notorious ſoever Huntingdon makes it: with theſe men this rule is univerſall; whatſoever may tend to the diſhonour of the Church of Rome, is falſe and fabulous.

Indeed, I remember what their Gloſſe ſaid of old, [x] Clericus amplectens mulierem, preſumitur bene agere, ſi ergo Clericus amplectitur mulierem, interpretabitur quòd causa benedicendi eam, hoc faciat: That is, A Clergie-man imbracing a Woman, muſt be preſumed to doe well, If therefore a Clerke take a Woman by the middle, it muſt be interpreted that he doth it to give her his bleſſing. * Perhaps the good Legate was but beſtowing his ghoſtly bleſſing on ſo needfull a ſubject; but that he was found in bed with her, if C.E. were not as ſhameleſs as that Cardinall, or his bed-fellow, he durſt not deny; For what impudency is this, to caſt this relation only upon H. Huntingdon, when ſo many uncontrolable Pens have recorded it to the world? Men of their own ſtamp, for Religion, for Devotion. Matthew Paris, Ranulfus Ceſtrenſis, Roger Hoveden, Polydore Virgil, Fabian, Matthew Weſtmonaſterienſis, otherwiſe called Florilegus, Dictus Joannes qui in Concilio, &c. ſaith he; The ſaid John which in the open Councell had grievouſly condemned all the Concubinary Prieſts, was taken himſelfe in the ſame crime. Now let my Reader judge, whether this Prieſts truth, or that Cardinals honeſty were greater.

* So the Chronicle tels us of Adelme, Abbot of Malmesbury, who when he was ſtirred to the vice of the fleſh, had wont to dreſſe the Devil and torment himſelfe with holding a faire young Virgin in his bed, ſo long as he might ſay over the whole Pſalter. Vid. Pask. Def. Polyd. ſuppreſſing the name, telleth the Hiſtory.

SECT. XVI.

HIs third Ponderation is the ſame with the firſt; every thing eekes. His S. Dunſtan and Anſelme, Gregory and Beda, are againe laid in our diſh; we cannot feed on theſe over-oft-ſod Coleworts. I am challenged here to produce any Prieſt or Deacon that lived in Wedlocke before the times of Dunſtan? The man preſumes upon the ſuppreſſion of Records. For one, I name him hundreds. Who were they that Dunſtan and his fellow-Saints found ſeated in the Cathedrall Churches of this Land? whom did they eject? Were they not maried Prieſts? What did the ejected Clergy plead, but ancient poſſeſſion? After that, in the Synod which Archbiſhop [b] Lanfranck held at Winchester (which I wonder my Detector would over-ſee: This neglect is not for nothing:) was it not decreed that the Canons ſhould not have Wives, but that the Prieſts which dwelt in Townes and Villages ſhould not be compelled to put away their Wives, though caution is put in for the future?

What doth this imply, but that in thoſe ancient Times the Engliſh Clergy were inoffenſively maried? To which adde that old Record from an ancient Martyrologue of the Church of Canterbury: Lanfrancus Archiepiſcopus reddidit Eccleſiæ Sancti Andreæ, &c. Lanfranck Archbiſhop hath reſtored to Saint Andrewes Church the Monaſtery of S. Mary, with the Lands and Houſes which Livingus Prieſt, and his Wife had in London, &c. And before him, or Dunſtan either, in King Edmunds time, [b] Biſhop Oſulphus with Athelme and Ulrick, Laicks, thruſts out the Monks of Evesham, and placed Canons (maried Prieſts) in their roome.

[b] Fox Act. & Mon.

Laſtly,

If he be the Sonne of a Bishop, &c.

Lastly, Jornalensis records it as king Ina's Law, long before these times; si Episcopi filius sit, sit dimidium hoc, &c. as supposing this no other then ordinary in those times.

Now let my Refuter comfort himselfe and his Catholikes with the weak defence of Heresie, and the strong Bulwarks of Romish Truth: who in the meane time must be put in mind, that he puts on me the burden which should lye upon his own shoulders; I have produced Histories which affirme peremptorily, that the English Clergy were never forbidden to marry untill Anselmes time; it is now his taske to disprove this assertion of theirs by equall authority to the contrary, which till he have done, the day is ours.

Sect. XVII.

Refut. p. 347.

HIS fourth Ponderation, is the difficulty of this grant in King Edwards Parliament. And is it possible the man should not see the greater difficulty that was found in the inforcement of this glorious Celibate? How Alfere and the Nobles dispossessed the Monks of Dunstan; justly restoring the maried Priests to their ancient right? How Lanfranck durst not speak it out; Anselme did, but prevailed little: Let [c] Girardus then Archbishop of York witnesse. After whom Roger Archbishop of that See (as Neubrigensis records) thrust out [d] Anselmes Monks, and stood for the liberty of Mariage: in so much, as in the succession of Times, even by Royall leave also, Mariage of spirituall persons yet continued. Neither could Anselmes Successors, Radulphus, Gulielmus de Turbine and the rest, (notwithstanding all their Canons and practises) prevaile against it. How plain is that of the [a] Saxon Chronicle? Thus did the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops which were in England; and yet all these Decrees and biddings stood not; all held their Wives by the Kings leave, even as they did. In so much as Archbishop William referred it to the King. The King decreed that the Priests should continue with their Wives still. Neither were any thing more easie than to give store of instances in this kinde. What need I give more than that of Galfrid B. of Ely, who was avouched before the Pope himself to have maried a Wife? which [f] Evangelicall excuse (uxorem duxit) was made for his not appearing at Rome with the rest. Of Richard Bishop of Chichester, Robert Bishop of Lincolne, maried men, after these Decrees; yea, good Evidences of ancient Charts are ready in our hands, to shew the use and legall use of these Mariages for no lesse than two hundred yeares after.

[b] Pope Paschalis writing to Anselme, saith, that there was at this time so great a number of Priests lost in England, that the greater part of the Clergie consisted of them.
[c] Chron. Saxon. Anno 1129. Chron. Fornal.

And for those idle words which his sawcinesse throwes after our reverend Martyr Archbishop Cranmer, (whom he falsly affirmes to have been the first maried Archbishop of this kingdome, when as Archbishop Bonifacе sate maried in that See three hundred yeares before him) and King Edwards Parliament; we answer them with silence and scorne. Let losers have leave to talke.

Anno 1250.

The approbation, and better expedience of single life in capable subjects, we doe willingly subscribe unto; The lawfulnesse, yea, necessity of Mariage where the gift of Continency is denyed, our Saviour and his chosen Vessell justifie with us. So as I still conclude, He that made mariage, saith it is honorable; what care we for the dishonour of those that corrupt it.

Sect. XVIII.

Refut. p. 351.

HIs last Ponderation is leaden indeed; That from the bickerings of our English Clergie with their Dunstans, it will not follow, that Continency was not ancient, but was repiningly, latelely, nr justly imposed. By this reason he will prove there was never Thiefe nor Malefactor in our Country, before the time of King James; since all Judges have yearely bickerings with such people. Thus he. But did ever such loose Beesome sweep the Presse before?

C.E. writes in the margine, Mason Halls last manner of disputing.

Reader, vouchsafe yet once more to cast thine eye upon the close of my Epistle: Doth my argument runne thus wildly as he makes it? The English Clergie had bickerings

A rings with their Dunstans, therefore Continency was repiningly and unjustly imposed? Canst thou think I have met with a sober Adversary? My words are, That our Histories teach us, how late, how repiningly, how unjustly our English Clergie stooped under this yoke. And what can this sophister make of this? Are ye not ashamed (ye Superiors o. * way) are ye not ashamed of such a Champion; fitter for a troop of Pygmies to raise a reed in their bickerings with Cranes, than to be committed with any reasonable or Scholler-like Antagonist? In the bickerings with his Dunstans, the Patiens pleaded prescription (as we have shewed out of Malmesbury) and taxed his Saints with novelty: In my bickerings with him, I plead Antiquity, Scripture, Reason; and taxe him most justly with impudence and absurdity. How well is that man that is matcht but with an honest Adversary?

The Conclusion.

THe Conclusion follows, a fit cover for such a dish; The Reader was not weary enough, but he must be tyred with a tedious recapitulation; wherein my Refuter recollects all his dispersed folly, that it may shew the fairer: Telling his Protestant friend, what I have bragged, what I have undertaken, what I have not performed, how I have falsified, how I have mistaken; what himselfe hath in all passages performed against me, how he hath answered, how he hath conquered. The best is, the Conclusion can shew no more then the Premises: By them let me be judged: Those have made good to my Reader, that C.E. hath accused much, and proved nothing; vanted much, and done nothing; railed much, and hurt nothing; laboured much, and gained nothing; talked much, and said nothing. Ref. p. 353, &c.

C It is a large and bold word: but if any one clause of mine be unproved, if any one clause of mine be disproved, any one exception against my defence proved just, any one charge of his proved true, any one falshood of mine detected, any one argument of mine refelled, any one argument or proposition of his not refelled, Let me goe away convicted with shame. But if I have answered every challenge, vindicated every * authority, justified every proofe, wiped away every cavill, affirmed no proposition untruly, censured nothing unjustly, satisfied all his malicious objections, and warranted every sentence of my poore Epistle, Let my Apologie live and passe; and let my Refurer goe as he is, C.E. Cavillator Egregius: Let my cause be no more victorious than just; and let honest Mariages ever hold up their heads, in despight of Rome and Hell. With this Farewell, I leave my Refuter, either to the acting of his unbloudy executions of the Son of God, or the plotting of the bloudy executions of the Deputies of God, or (as it were his best) to the knocking of his Beads: but if he will needs be medling with his pen, and will have me, after some Jubilees, to expect an answer to my six weeks labour, I shall in the mean time pray, that God would give him the grace to give way to the known Truth, and sometimes to say true.

D * I only except that one slip of my pen, that I said Gratian cited a sentence out of Austin, which was indeed his own.

Yet to gratifie my Reader at the parting, I may not conceale from him an ancient and worthy Monument, which I had the favour and happines to see in the Inner Library of Corpus Christi Colledge in Cambridge; An excellent Treatise, written (amongst seventeen other) in a faire set hand, by an Author of great learning and antiquity; He would needs suppresse his name, but describes himselfe to be Rotomagensis: The time wherein it was written, appeares to be amids the heat of contention which was between the Archbishop of Canterbury and York for precedency; * which quarrell fell betwixt Radulph of Canterbury, and Thurstin of York, in the year (1114.) at which time Pope Paschalis wrote to King Henry concerning it; And was renued after about the yeare 1175. The Discourse shall speak enough for it selfe.

ROTO-

ROTOMAGENSIS ANONYMUS.

AN LICEAT SACERDOTIBUS INIRE MATRIMONIA.

Scire volui quis primus instituit ne Sacerdotes Christiani inire deberent Matrimonia. Deus an homo? Si enim Deus, ejus certe sententia & tenenda & observanda est cum omni veneratione & reverentia. Si verò homo & non Deus, de corde hominis, & non ex ore Dei talis egressa est traditio: Idcoq; nec per eam salus adquiritur si observetur, nec amittitur si non observetur. Non enim est hominis salvare vel perdere aliquem pro meritis, sed Dei proprium unius est: scilicet quod Deus hoc instituerit, nec in veteri Testamento nec in Evangelio, nec in Apostolorum Epistolis scriptum reperitur, in quibus quicquid Deus hominibus præcipit insertum describitur. Traditio ergo hominis est & non Dei, non Apostolorum institutio. Quemadmodum & Apostolus instituit, ut oportet Episcopum esse unius uxoris virum. Quod minime instituisset, si adulterium esset quod Episcopus haberet simul & uxorem, & Ecclesiam, quasi duas uxores, ut quidam asserunt. Quodq; de Scripturis sanctis non habet auctoritatem eadem facilitate contemnitur qua dicitur. Sancta enim Ecclesia non Sacerdotis uxor, non sponsa, sed Christi est, sicut Joannes dicit, Qui habet sponsam, sponsus est: hujus inquam sponsi Ecclesia sponsa est, & tamen huic sponsæ licet in parte inire matrimonia ex Apostolica traditione. Dicit enim Apostolus ad Cor. Propter fornicationes (inquit) unusquisque uxorem suam habeat, & caterausq; volo omnes homines esse sicut meipsum, sed unusquisq; proprium donum habet à Deo, alius quidem sic, alius verò sic. Non enim omnes habent unum donum virginitatis, scilicet, & continentiæ, sed quidam virgines sunt & continentes, quidam verò incontinentes, quibus concedit nuptias, ne tentet eos Satbanas propter incontinentiam suam, & in ruinam turpitudinis corruant. Sed & Sacerdotes quoque alii quidem continentes sunt, alii vero incontinentes, & qui continentes sunt, continentiæ suæ donum à Deo consecuti sunt: sine ejus dono & gratia continentes esse non possunt. Incontinentes verò hoc donum gratiæ minime percipiunt, qui cùm intemperantia suæ conspersionis, tùm etiam animi infirmitate per carnis desideria diffluunt. Quod nullo modo facerent, si continentiæ gratiam & virtutem à Deo percepissent. Sentiunt enim & ipsi aliam legem in membris suis repugnantem legi mentis suæ & captivantem eos in lege peccati, & quod nolunt agere cogentem, qui de corpore mortis hujus liberantur gratia Dei. Hac itaque eos lege captivante, & carnis concupiscentia stimulante, aut fornicari coguntur aut nubere. Quorum quid melius sit Apostolica docemur authoritate, qua dicitur, melius nubere quàm uri. Quod melius est id certè eligendum & tenendum est: Melius est inquam nubere, quia pejus est uri. Quia melius est nubere quàm uri, conveniens est incontinentibus ut nubant, non ut urantur. Bonæ etenim sunt nuptiæ, sicut Augustinus ait in libro super Genesin ad literam, in ipsis commendatur bonum naturæ quo incontinentia regitur pravitas, & naturæ decoratur fœcunditas. Nam utriusq; sexus infirmitas propendens in ruinam turpitudinis, rectè excipitur honestate nuptiarum, ut quod sanis posset esse officium, sit ægrotis remedium. Neque enim quia incontinentia malum est ideo connubium, vel quo incontinentes copulantur non est bonum. Imo vero non propter illud malum culpabile est bonum, sed propter hoc bonum veniale est illud malum: quoniam id quod bonum habent nuptiæ, & quod bona sunt nuptiæ, peccatum esse nunquam potest. Hoc autem tripartitum est, fides, proles, Sacramentũ. In fide attenditur, ne præter vinculũ conjugale, cũ altera vel cũ altero cõcubatur. In prole, ut amãter suscipiatur, benigne suscipiatur, religiose educetur.

A In Sacramento, ut conjugium non separetur, & demissus aut demissa ne causa prolis alteri conjugatur. Hæc est tanquam regula nuptiarum, qua vel naturæ decoratur fœcunditas, vel incontinentiæ regitur pravitas. Hanc autem regulam nuptiarum, & hoc tripartitum bonum instituit æterna veritas ordine decenti & lege æterna, contra quam quicquid fit, vel dicitur, vel concupiscitur, peccatum est. Quod in libro contra Faustum Manichæum Augustinus testatur, dicens, Peccatum est factum, vel dictum, vel concupitum contra æternam legem. Æterna lex est divina voluntas, sive ratio ordinem naturalem perturbari vetans, conservari jubens. Quicquid igitur ordinem naturalem perturbari jubet, conservari vetat, exercere nuptias & earum tripartitum bonum, fidem, scilicet, prolem & Sacramentum eos habere prohibet, & regulam illam æternæ veritatis qua naturæ decoratur fœcunditas, vel incontinentiæ regitur pravitas eis solvere præcipit, &c. quibus naturalis ordo
B peragitur, abhominari jubet. Hoc inquam mandatum naturalem ordinem conservari vetat, perturbari jubet, & ideo contra æternam legem fit, & peccatum est: peccant enim qui mandatum tale instituunt, quo naturalis ordo destruitur. Nam etiam ut videtur, minime credunt quod de Sacerdotum filiis assumat Deus ad ædificandam supernam Civitatem, & ad restaurandum Angelorum numerum. Si enim crederent, nunquam tale mandatum instituerent, quia scienter & nimia temeritate id efficere conarentur, ut superna Civitas nunquam proficiatur, & Angelorum numerus nunquam reparetur: si enim superna Civitas de filiis etiam Sacerdotum perficienda est, & si Angelorum numerus de ipsis etiam reparandus est, qui hoc efficere conatur ut nulli sint, quantum in ipso est, & supernam civitatem destruit, & Angelorum numerus ne perficiatur efficit. Quo quod perversius potest fieri? Hoc enim fit contra voluntatem & prædestinationem illius, qui quæ futura
C sunt fecit. Fecit enim prædestinatione quæ futura sunt in opere. Quicunque ergo id efficere conatur ut non faciat Deus in opere quæ fecit in prædestinatione, ipsam prædestinationem Dei conatur evacuare. Si ergo Deus fecit in prædestinatione, ut filii Sacerdotum futuri sint in opere, qui hoc efficere conatur ut non futuri sint, in opere destruere molitur facta Dei quod fecit prædestinatione, & ita prædestinationem Dei nititur evertere, & voluntatem Dei contraire quæ æterna est. Voluit enim Deus ab æterno, & ante sæculum omnes homines creare in sæculo certo quidem ordine quo præcogitavit & prædestinavit eos se creaturum. Nihil enim inordinate facit, nihil in sæculo creat, quod non ante in prædestinatione sua mentis procedente omnia sæculo disponendo præordinaverit. Quæcunque ergo in hoc sæculo ab ipso creantur, Prædestinationem mentis prædisponentem ac
D præordinantem omnia necessario sequuntur, quod impossibile est non fieri quod Deus ab æterno voluit & præordinavit fieri. Necesse est igitur omnes homines eo ordine creari, quo voluit ab æterno & præordinavit. Alioquin non sicut voluit Deus neque sicut præordinavit omnes homines sunt creati: sed quod hoc inconveniens est, necesse est illos creari sicut voluit ab æterno & præcogitavit atque præordinavit, quod omnia quæ voluit fecit, & nihil unquam fecit quæ non voluit ab æterno & præcogitavit decreto certo & incommutabili. Quia nec ejus voluntas irrita potest fieri, nec præcogitatio falli, nec præordinationes commutari. Quæ cùm ita sint, necesse est ut sicut Lxici, ita etiam Sacerdotes de quibus homines creantur, ad ipsos creandos ministerium exhibeant divinæ voluntati & præordinationi. Parentes non sunt authores creationis filiorum, sed ministri. Qui si ministerium non exhiberent, voluntatem Dei & præcogitationem si possibile esset irritam facerent, ordinationique resisterent. Quid si scienter facerent grauius utique delinquerent, si nesci-
E enter minus, non solum in Deum Patrem, sed & in cœlestem Jerusalem Sanctorum omnium matrem, quod quantum in ipsis esset illos creari non permitterent, ex quibus ea ædificanda & cœlestis patriæ dantia sunt præparanda. Sed ab hoc delicto defendit eos impotentia, quod non possunt voluntati Dei resistere & præordinationi contraire. Voluntas enim Dei & prædestinatio lex æterna est, in qua omnium rerum cursus decretus est, & paradigma est, in quo omnium sæculorum forma depicta est, quod nulla ratione aboleri potest. Huic igitur ministerium non exhibere malum est, quod exhibere bonum est & maxime cum bona sit voluntate. Quod tum fit, cum parentes conveniunt causa gignendæ prolis, non appetitu exercendi libidinis. Gignendæ prolis dico, quia & præsens Ecclesia multiplicetur, & cœlestis Civitas fabricetur, & electorum numerus compleatur, quorum nihil potest fieri sine conventione tali. Si enim primi parentes Sanctorum omnes aut continentes permansissent aut virgines, nullus Sanctorum ex eis esset natus in sæculo, nullus gloria & honore *coronatus in cœlo, nullus adscitus in Angelorum numero. Sed quia inestimabile bonum est, quod sanctificati sunt in sæculo, quod gloria & honore coronantur in cœlo, & quod adscitus sunt in Angelorum numerum, ex eo parentum fœcunditas beatior prædicatur, & conventus sanctior. Sic ergo melius fuit eis tales filios genuisse quam non genuisse, talemq. fructum nuptiarum protulisse, quam sine fructu continentes, aut virgines extitisse. Quivis bonum sit quibusdam continentes esse, vel virgines, illis viz. quos Deus voluit ab æterno, & præordinavit ita creandos esse in sæculo, ut continentia vel virginitate permaneant: sicut enim voluit ab æterno & præordinavit quosdam, ita creandos esse in sæculo, ut fructum nuptiarum faciant & filios generent, ita etiam voluit & præordinavit ab æterno, quosdam ita creandos esse, ut in continentia vel virginitate permaneant. Et sicut illi ad creandos filios voluntati Dei & præordinationi ministerium exhibent, ita & isti ad conservandam & continentiã & virginitatem voluntati Dei & præordinationi ministrant. Ac per hoc & illorum fœcunditas & istorum virginitas bona est atq. laudabilis, quæ si non ministerium exhiberet voluntati Dei & præordinationi, nec bona esset nec laudabilis. Omne enim quod voluntati Dei & præordinationi contrarium est, nec bonum est nec laudabile. Sic ergo voluit Deus & prædestinavit alios futuros virgines, alios nuptiarum fructum facientes. Si enim omnes essent virgines, nullus Sanctorum qui vel nascitur vel nasciturus sit, in hoc sæculo natus esset, vel nasciturus. Nec ipsi etiã virgines essent, quia nati non essent. Ex fœcunditate enim illorum orta est istorum virginitas. Magnum igitur bonum est fœcunditas, de qua sancta prælucet virginitas. Qui autem virgines esse debeant, & qui nuptiarum fructus facientes, docet eos verbum quod Deus seminat in cordibus illorum. In aliorum enim cordibus seminat verbum bonæ fœcunditatis nuptiarum fructum facientis, in aliorum verò cordibus seminat verbum virginitatis, * ipsi virginitatem servare desiderant: In quibus verò verbum nuptiarum seminat, ipsi facere nuptiarum fructum appetunt.*

* Deest (opinor) pars clausulæ, Illi ergo in quibus seminat verbum virginitatis, &c.

Which, for my Countrymens sake, I have thus Englished.

I would faine know who it was that first ordained, that Christian Priests might not marry, God or Man? For, if it were God, surely, his determination is to be held and observed with all veneration and reverence; But, if it were Man, and not God: and this Tradition came out of the heart of Man, nor out of the Mouth of God, then neither is salvation got by it, if it be observed; nor lost, if it be not observed: For it doth not belong to Man either to save or destroy any man for his merits, but it is proper only unto God. That God hath ordained this, it is neither found written in the Old Testament, nor in the Gospell, nor in the Epistles of the Apostles, in all which is set downe whatsoever God hath enjoyned unto men. It is therefore a Tradition of man, and not an institution of God, nor of his Apostles: As the Apostle instituted (rather) that a Bishop should be the husband of one Wife, which he would never have appointed, if it had been adultery for a Bishop to have at once a Wife, and a Church, as it were two Wives, like as some affirm: Now, that which hath not authority from the holy Scripture, is with the same facility contemned, that it is spoken: For, the holy Church is not the Wife, not the Spouse of the Priest, but of Christ, as S. John saith, He that hath the Bride, he is the Bridegroome. Of the Bridegroome, I say, is the Church the Spouse; and yet it is lawfull even for this Spouse in part to marry, by Apostolique Tradition; For the Apostle speakes thus to the Corinthians: Because of fornication let every man have his own Wife. And I would that all men were as I am, but every man hath his proper gift of God, one thus, another otherwise. For, all men have not one gift, namely, of Virginity and Continency, but some are Virgins and contain, others contain not; to whom he granteth mariage, lest Sathan tempt them through their incontinency, and they should miscary in the ruine of their uncleanesse. So also of Priests, some are continent, and others incontinent; and those which are continent, have received the gift of their continence from God, without whose Gift and Grace, they cannot be continent. But those which are incontinent, have not received this gift of grace, but, whether by the intemperance of their humour, or the weakenesse of their mind, run out into fleshly desires; which they would in no wise doe, if they had received from God the Grace and Vertue of Continence. For they also which are delivered by the Grace of God from the body of this death, feele another Law in their members rebelling against the Law of their minde, and captivating varing them to the Law of ſin, and compelling them to doe that which they would not. This Law therefore, holding them captive, and this Concupiſcence of the fleſh provoking them, they are compelled either to fornicate, or marry: whereof whether is the better, we are taught by the authority of the Apoſtle, who tells us, it is better to marry then to burn. Surely, that which is the better is to be choſen and held; now it is better to marry, becauſe it is worſe to burn; and becauſe it is better to marry then to burn, it is convenient for thoſe which contain not, to marry, not to burn. For marriage is good, ſo Auguſt. ſpeaks in his book (Super Geneſin ad Litteram) in it is commended the good of nature, whereby the pravity of Incontinence is ruled, and the fruitfulneſſe of nature graced; For the weakeneſſe of either Sex, declining towards the ruine of filthineſſe, is well relieved by honeſty of mariage, ſo as the ſame thing, which may be the office of the ſound, is alſo the remedy unto the ſick: Neither yet, becauſe incontinence is evill, is therefore mariage (even that wherewith the incontinent are joyned) to be reputed not good; yea rather, not for that evill is the good faulty, but for this good is that evill pardonable, ſince that good which mariage hath, yea which mariage is, can never be ſin. Now, this good is three-fold, the Fidelity, the Fruit, the Sacrament of that eſtate; In the fidelity, is regarded, That beſides this bond of mariage, there be not carnall ſociety with any other. In the fruit of it, That it be lovingly raiſed and religiouſly bred. In the Sacrament of it, That the mariage be not ſeparated, and that the diſmiſſed party of either Sex, be not joyned to any other, no not for iſſues ſake. This is as it were the rule of Mariage, whereby the fruitfulneſſe of Nature is graced, or the pravity of incontinence ruled. And this rule of mariage, and

C this three-fold good, the eternall Truth hath appointed in the order of his Decree, and that eternall Law of his, againſt which whatſoever is done, ſpoken, or willed, is ſinne; which Auguſtine in his book againſt Fauſtus the Manichee witneſſeth, ſaying, Sin is either Deed, Word, or deſire againſt the Law eternall. This Eternall Law is the divine Will or Decree, forbidding the diſturbance, and commanding the preſervation of due naturall order; whatſoever therefore commands naturall Order to be diſturbed, forbids it to be conſerved, prohibits Men to uſe Mariage, and attaine to the threefold good thereof, Fidelity, Iſſue, Sacrament; and commands them to breake that Rule of Eternall Truth, whereby the friutfulneſſe of nature is graced, or the pravity of incontinency is ruled, commands men to abhorre thoſe things whereby naturall order is held and maintained. This Commandement, I ſay, forbids naturall Order to be obſerved, commands it to be diſturbed; and therefore is againſt the Law of

D God, and by conſequence, is ſinne: For, they ſinne that ordain ſuch a command by which naturall Order is deſtroyed.

Theſe men do not (it ſeems) believe, that of the children of Prieſts, God takes for the building of his City above, and for the reſtoring of the number of Angels: For, if they did believe it, they would never ordaine ſuch a Mandate, becauſe they ſhould wittingly and over-raſhly, goe about to effect, that the ſupernall City ſhould never be perfected and the number of Angels never repaired. For if the ſupernall City be to be perfected even of the ſons of Prieſts, and if the number of Angels be of them to be repayred, thoſe that endeavor to procure that they ſhould not be, do (what in them lies) deſtroy the ſupernall City, and labor that the number of Angels may not be perfected; then which, what can be more perverſely done? For this is done againſt the will and

E predeſtination of him which hath done thoſe things, which ſhall be, for he hath done in his predeſtination thoſe things which ſhall be in effect; whoſoever therefore goes about to procure that God may not in effect do thoſe things, which he hath done in his predeſtination, goes about to make void the very predeſtination of God. If then God have already in his predeſtination decreed, that the ſons of Prieſts ſhall once be in effect, he that goes about to procure that they may not be in effect, endeavours to deſtroy the worke of God, becauſe he hath already done it in predeſtination; and ſo ſtrives to overthrow Gods predeſtination, and to gain-ſtand that will of God which is eternall: For God would from eternity, and before all worlds, create all men in the world, in that certain order wherein he pre-conceived, and predeſtinated to create them; He doth nothing diſorderly, he createth nothing in the world which he hath not fore-ordained, by disposing with the predestination of his mind that went before all worlds. Whatsoever therefore is by him created in his world, doth necessarily follow the predestination of his mind, disposing and preordaining all things, because it is impossible that should not be done, which God from eternity hath willed and fore-ordained to be done. It is therefore necessary that all men should be created in that very Order wherein he willed, and from eternity fore-ordained: Or else, all men are not created as God would have them, not as he fore-ordained them: But because this is inconvenient, it must needs bee that they are created as he willed from eternity, and fore-thought, and fore-ordained, because he hath done all things that he would, and never did any thing which he willed not from everlasting, and hath fore-conceived in his certaine and unchangeable Decree. For neither can his will be frustrated, nor his fore-thought deceived, nor his fore-ordinations altered: Which, since it is so, needs must it be, that as Laicks, so Priests also, of whom men are created, should yeeld their service to the divine will and preordination to the creating of them. For Parents are not the authors of the creation of their Children, but the servants; who if they should not yeeld their service, they should (if it were possible) make void the fore-thought of God, and resist his ordination; which if they should wittingly doe, they should offend the more, if ignorantly the lesse; not onely against God the Father, but also against the heavenly Jerusalem, the Mother of all Saints, because (what in them were) they should not suffer those to be created of whom it is to be builded, and those things to be prepared, whereby that Celestiall Country is bestowed. But from this offence their impotence frees them, because they cannot resist the will of God and crosse his preordination. For the will and predestination of God is that eternall Law, in which the course of all things is decreed, and the patterne wherein the forme of all ages is set forth, which can by no meanes be defaced. Not to yeeld our service then hereunto, is evill, because to yeeld it, is good, and especially if it be done with a good intent, which is then done, when as Parents meet together in a desire of propagation of issue, not in an appetite of exercising their lust. Of propagation, I say, that both the present Church may be multiplied, and the celestiall City built, and the number of the Elect made up, none of which could be done without such conjugall meeting. For if the first Parents of the Saints had continued all either continent or Virgins, no Saints had been born of them in the world, none of them had been crowned with glory and honour in heaven, none of them ascribed into the number of Angels. But since it is an inestimable good, that Saints are born in the world, that they are crowned with glory and honour in heaven, and that they are ascribed into the number of Angels: thereupon the fruitfulnesse of Parents is more blessed, and their meeting holyer. So then it is better for them to have begotten such children, then not to have begotten them, and to have brought forth such fruit of mariage, then to have been continent, or Virgins, without fruit. Although it is good for some to be continent, or virgins, namely, for them whom God eternally willed and preordained to be so created in the world, that they should remaine either in Continence, or Virginity: For as he hath eternally willed and fore-ordained that some should be so created in the world, as that they should yeeld the fruit of mariage, and beget children; so also hath he willed, and from eternity fore-ordained some to be so created, that they should continue in Continency or Virginity: And as these other yeeld their service to the will and preordination of God in the creation of children, so these also serve the will and preordination of God in conserving their Continence, and Virginity; and hereupon is both the fruitfulnes of the one, and the virginity of the other good and laudable; which if it did not yeeld service to the will & preordination of God, would be neither good nor laudable. For whatsoever is contrary to the will and preordination of God, is neither good nor laudable. If therefore God willed and predestinated some to be Virgins, others to yeeld the fruit of mariage (for if all were virgins, no Saint that now is, or shall be born, should either be now or hereafter born in the world, neither should those Virgins be at all, because they should not be born; for of the fruitfulnesse of the one arises the others virginity) therefore is fruitfulnesse a great good, from which holy

holy Virginity hath proceeded: Now that there ſhould be ſome Virgins, and others that ſhould beare the fruits of mariage, the word which God ſoweth in their hearts, reacheth us. For in the hearts of ſome he ſoweth the word of good fruitfulneſſe, yeelding the increaſe of mariage; and in the hearts of others he ſowes the word of Virginity: Thoſe then in whom he ſowes the word of virginity, they deſire to keep virginity; but thoſe in whom he ſowes the word of mariage, they deſire to yeeld the fruit of mariage.

Whereto I will adde for a Concluſion the wiſe and ingenuous judgement of Eraſmus Roterodamus; The rather, becauſe it pleaſed my Reſurer to lay this worthy Author in our diſh.

In his Epiſtle to Chriſtopher Biſhop of Baſil, concerning humane Conſtitutions, Thus he writes.

Habetur Tomo nono Op. Eraſ. pag 982.

Nam in totum quæ ſunt humani juris, quemadmodum in morbis remedia, &c.

FOr thoſe things which are altogether of humane Conſtitution, muſt (like to remedies in diſeaſes) be attempered to the preſent eſtate of matters and times. Thoſe things which were once religiouſly inſtituted, afterwards according to occaſion, and the changed quality of manners and times, may be with more Religion and Piety abrogated; which yet is not to be done by the temerity of the people, but by the authority of Governors, that tumult may be avoided, and that the publick Cuſtome may be ſo altered, that Concord may not be broken: the very ſame is perhaps to be thought concerning the Mariage of Prieſts of old, as there was great paucity of Prieſts, ſo great Piety alſo; They, that they might the more freely attend thoſe holy Services, made themſelves chaſte of their own accord; and ſo much were thoſe Ancients affected to Chaſtity, that they would hardly permit Mariage unto that Chriſtian, whom his Baptiſme found ſingle, but a ſecond Mariage yet more hardly: And now that which ſeemed plauſible in Biſhops and Prieſts, was tranſlated to Deacons, and at laſt to ſub-Deacons; which voluntarily received Cuſtome was confirmed by the authority of Popes. In the meane time, the number of Prieſts increaſed, and their piety decreaſed. How many ſwarmes of Prieſts are maintained in Monaſteries and Colledges? and amongſt them how few are there that live chaſtely? I ſpeak of them which doe publiquely keepe Concubines in their houſes, inſtead of their Wives: I doe not now meddle with the myſteries of their more ſecret luſts, I onely ſpeake of thoſe things which are moſt notoriouſly known to the world: And yet, when we know theſe things, how eaſie are we to admit men into holy Orders, and how difficult in releaſing this conſtitution of ſingle life? when as contrarily S. Paul teaches, that hands muſt not be raſhly laid upon any; and more then once hath preſcribed what manner of men Prieſts and Deacons ought to be; but of a ſingle life, neither Chriſt, nor his Apoſtles, have ever given any Law in the holy Scriptures. Long ſince hath the Church abrogated the nightly Vigils at the Tombes of Martyrs, which yet had been received by the publike cuſtome of Chriſtians, and that for divers Ages. Thoſe Faſts which were wont to continue till the evening, it hath transferred to noone; and many other things hath it changed according to the occasions arising. * And why then doe wee so obstinately urge this humane Constitution especially when so many causes perswade us to an alteration? For first, a great part of our Priests lives with an ill name, and with an unquiet conscience handleth those holy Mysteries; and then the fruit of their labours (for the most part) is utterly lost, because their doctrine is contemned of their people, by reason of their shamefull life. Whereas, if Mariage might be yeelded to those which doe not containe, both they would live more quietly, and should preach Gods word to the people with authority, and might honestly bring up their Children, neither should the one of them be a mutuall shame to the other, &c.

Inter hos quanta rarit as eorũ qui caſtè vivunt?

Nec enim attingo nunc ſecretarum libidinum myſteria, &c.

* Cur hic humanam constitutionem urgemus tam obstinatè, præsertim cum tot causæ suadeant mutationem? Primùm enim magna pars Sacerdotũ vivit cum malâ famâ, parumque requieta conscientia tractat illa sacrosancta mysteria, &c.

A BRIEFE SUMME OF THE Principles of Religion, fit to be known of ſuch as would addreſſe themſelves to Gods TABLE.

Q. How many things are required of a Chriſtian?
A. Two: Knowledge and Practice.
Q. What are we bound to know?
A. God and our ſelves.
Q. What muſt we know of God?
A. What one he is, and what he hath done.

Q. What is God?

A. He is one Almighty and infinite Spirit, Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt.

Q. What hath he done?

A. He hath made all things, he governeth and preſerveth all things, and hath eternally decreed how all things ſhall be done, and hath revealed his will to us in his Word.

Q. What more muſt be known concerning God and his actions?

A. That God the Sonne, Jeſus Chriſt, tooke our nature upon him, dyed for our redemption, roſe againe, and now liveth gloriouſly in Heaven, making interceſſion for us.

Q. Thus much concerning God: What muſt we know of our ſelves?

A. What we were, what we are, and what we ſhall be.

Q. What were we?

A. We were made at firſt perfect and happy, according to Gods Image, in knowledge, in holineſſe, in righteouſneſſe.

Q. What are we?

A. Ever ſince the fall of our firſt Parents, we are all naturally the ſonnes of wrath, ſubject to miſery and death: But thoſe whom God chooſeth out to himſelfe, are in part renewed through grace, and have the Image of God in part repaired in them.

Q. What ſhall we be?

A. At the generall reſurrection of all fleſh, thoſe which were in part renewed here, ſhall be fully perfected and glorified in body and ſoule: thoſe which have lived and dyed in their ſinnes, ſhall be judged to perpetuall torment.

Q. Thus much for our knowledge: Now for our practice what is required of us?

A. Due obedience and ſervice of God, both in our ordinary courſe of life, and alſo in the ſpeciall exerciſe of his worſhip.

Q. What is that obedience which is required of us in the ordinary courſe of our life?

A. It is partly preſcribed us by the Law, and partly by the Goſpell.

Q. What doth the Law require?

A. The

A. The Law contained in Ten Commandements, enjoyneth us all piety to God, and all justice and charity to our neighbour. A

Q. What doth the Gospell require.

A. Faith in the Lord Jesus, with the fruit of it, Repentance; as our onely remedy for the breach of the Law.

Q. What is Faith?

A. The affiance of the soule upon Christ Jesus, depending upon him alone for forgivenesse and salvation.

Q. What is Repentance?

A. An effectuall breaking off our old sinnes with sorrow and detestation, and an earnest purpose and endeavour of contrary obedience.

Q. Thus much of our obedience in the whole course of life: What are the services required more specially in the immediate exercises of Gods worship? B

A. They are chiefly three: first, Due hearing and reading the word: secondly, Receiving the Sacraments: thirdly, Prayer.

Q. Which call you the word of God?

A. The holy Scriptures contained in the Old and New Testament.

Q. How many Sacraments are there?

A. Two: Baptisme, and the Lords Supper.

Q. What is the use of Baptisme?

A. By water washing the Body, to assure us that the blood of Christ, applied to the soule of every beleever, cleanseth him from his sinnes.

Q. What is the use of the Lords Supper? C

A. To be a signe, a seal, a pledge unto us, of Christ Jesus given for us, & given to us.

Q. What signifies the Bread and Wine?

A. The body and blood of Christ, broken and powred out for our redemption.

Q. What is required of every Receiver?

A. Upon paine of judgement, that he prepare himselfe by examination.

Q. Whereof must a man examine himselfe?

A. Whether he finde in himselfe, first, Competent knowledge; secondly, A true (though weak) Faith; thirdly, Unfained repentance for his sinnes; fourthly, Charity and readinesse to forgive; fiftly, An hungring desire to this Sacrament; sixtly, A thankfull heart for Christ, and it.

Q. What is Prayer? D

A. A calling upon God through Christ for a supply of all our wants, and praising him for all his blessings.

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCE, HENRY, PRINCE OF WALES,

HIS HIGHNESSES UNWORTHY SERVANT dedicates all his Labours, and wiſhes all Happineſſe.

Moſt Gracious Prince:

THis worke of mine, which (if my hopes and deſires fail me not) time may hereafter make great, I have preſumed both to dedicate in whole to your Highneſſe, and to parcell out in ſeveralls unto ſubordinate hands. It is no marvell if Bookes have this freedome, when we our ſelves can and ought to be all yours, while we are our owne, and others under you. I dare ſay, theſe Meditations, how rude ſo ever they may fall from my Pen, in regard of their ſubject are fit for a Prince. Here your Highneſſe ſhall ſee how the great patterne of Princes, the KING of HEAVEN, hath ever ruled the World; how his Subſtitutes, earthly Kings, have ruled it under him, and with what ſucceſſe either of glory or ruine. Both your Peace and and Warre ſhall finde here holy and great examples. And if Hiſtory and Obſervation be the beſt Counſellors of your youth, what Story can be ſo wiſe and faithfull as that which God hath written for Men, wherein you ſee both what hath been done, and what ſhould be? What obſervation ſo worthy as that which is both raiſed from God, and directed to him? If the propriety which your Highneſſe juſtly hath in the Worke and Author, may draw your Princely eyes and heart the rather to theſe holy Speculations, your Servant ſhall be happier in this favour, then in all your outward bounty; as one to whom your ſpirituall progreſſe deſerves to be dearer then his own life; and whoſe daily ſuit is, that God would guide your ſteps aright in this ſlippery Age, and continue to rejoyce all good hearts in the view of your gracious proceedings.

The Creation.

WHAT can I see, O God in thy creation, but miracles of wonders? Thou madeſt ſomething of nothing, and of that ſomething, all things. Thou which waſt without a beginning, gaveſt a beginning to Time, and to the World in time. It is the praiſe of us men, if when we have Matter, we can give faſhion: thou gaveſt a being to the Matter, without forme; thou gaveſt a forme to that Matter, and a glory to that Forme. If wee can but finiſh a ſlight and unperfect Matter according to a former patterne, it is the height of our ſkill: but to begin that which never was, whereof there was no example, whereto there was no inclination, wherein there was no poſſibility of that which it ſhould be, is proper only to ſuch power as thine; the infinite power of an infinite Creator: with us, not ſo much as a thought can ariſe without ſome Matter; but here with thee, all Matter ariſes from nothing. How eaſie is it for thee to repaire all out of ſomething, which couldeſt thus fetch all out of nothing? wherein can wee now diſtruſt thee, that haſt proved thy ſelfe thus Omnipotent? Behold: to have made the leaſt Clod of nothing, is more above wonder, then to multiply a World; but now the Matter doth not more praiſe thy power, then the forme thy wiſdome: what beauty is here? what order? what order in working, what beauty in the worke.

Thou mighteſt have made all the World perfect in an inſtant, but thou wouldeſt not. That Will which cauſed thee to create, is reaſon enough why thou dideſt thus create. How ſhould we deliberate in our actions, which are ſo ſubject to imperfection? ſince it pleaſed thine infinite perfection (not out of need) to take leaſure. Neither did thy wiſdome herein proceed in time only, but in degrees: At firſt thou madeſt nothing abſolute; firſt thou madeſt things which ſhould have being without Life; then thoſe which ſhould have life and being; laſtly, thoſe which have Being Life, Reaſon: So we our ſelves in the ordinary courſe of generation, firſt live the life of Vegetation, then of Senſe, of Reaſon afterwards. That inſtant wherein the Heaven and the earth were created in their rude Matter, there was neither Day nor Light, but preſently thou madeſt both Light and Day. Whiles we have this example of thine, how vainely doe we hope to be perfect at once? It is well for us, if through many degrees we can riſe to our conſummation.

But (alas) what was the very Heaven it ſelf without Light? how confuſed? how formeleſſe? like to a goodly Body without a Soul, like a Soul without thee. Thou art Light, and in thee is no darkneſſe. Oh how incomprehenſibly glorious is the light that is in thee, ſince one glimpſe of this created light, gave ſo lively a glory to all thy workmanſhip! This, even the brute Creatures can behold; That, not the very Angels. That ſhines forth only to the other ſupreme World of immortality, this to the baſeſt part of thy creation. There is one cauſe of our darkneſſe on earth, and of the utter darkeneſſe in Hell; the reſtraint of thy light. Shine thou, O God, into the vaſt corners of my Soule, and in thy light I ſhall ſee light.

But whence, O God was that firſt light? the Sun was not made till the fourth day; light the firſt. If man had been, he might have ſeen all lightſome; but whence it had comne he could not have ſeen; as in ſome great pond, we ſee the bankes full, we ſee not the ſprings from whence that water riſeth. Thou madeſt the Sunne, madeſt the Light without the Sun, before the Sunne, that ſo light might depend upon thee, and not upon thy Creature. Thy power will not be limitted to means. It was eaſie to thee to make an Heaven without a Sunne, Light without an Heaven, Day without a Sun, Time without a day: It is good reaſon thou ſhouldeſt be the Lord of thine owne workes: All means ſerve thee: why do we weak wretches diſtruſt thee, in the want of thoſe means, which thou canſt either command, or forbeare? How plainly wouldſt thou teach us, that we Creatures need not one another, ſo long as we have thee? One day we ſhall have light againe without the Sun. Thou ſhalt be our Sunne; thy preſence ſhall be our light: Light is ſown for the righteous. The Sunne and Light is but for the World below it ſelfe; thine only for above. Thou giveſt this light to the Sun, which the Sunne gives to the world: That light which thou ſhalt once give us, ſhall make us ſhine like the Sun in glory.

Now this light which for three daies was thus diſperſed through the whol heavens, it pleaſed thee at laſt to gather and unite into one body of the Sun. The whole Heaven was our Sun, before the Sun was created: but now one Star muſt be the Treaſury of Light to the heaven and earth. How thou loveſt the union and reduction of all things of one kind to their own head and centre! ſo the waters muſt by thy cõmand be gathered into one place, the Sea; ſo the upper Waters muſt be ſevered by theſe Aery limits from the lower: ſo heavy ſubſtances haſten downward, and light mount up; ſo the generall light of the firſt daies muſt be called into the compaſſe of one Sun, ſo thou wilt once gather thine Elect, from all coaſts of Heaven, to the participation of one glory. Why do we abide our thoughts & affections ſcattered from thee, from thy Saints, from thine anointed? Oh let this light which thou haſt now ſpread abroad in the hearts of all thine, once meet in thee: We are as thy Heavens in this their firſt imperfection, be thou our Sun, unto which our light may be gathered.

Yet this light was by thee interchanged with darknes, which thou mightſt as eaſily have commanded to be perpetuall. The continuance, even of the beſt things, cloieth & wearieth: there is nothing but thy ſelf, wherein there is not ſatiety. So pleaſing is the vicitude of things, that the inter-courſe even of thoſe occurrents which in their owne nature are leſſe worthy, gives more contentment, then the unaltered eſtate of better. The day dyes into night, and riſes into the morning againe, that we might not expect any ſtability here below, but in perpetuall ſucceſſions: It is alwayes day with thee above: the night favoreth only of mortality: Why are we not here ſpiritually as we ſhall be hereafter? Since thou haſt made us children of the light, and of the day, teach us to walke ever in the light of thy preſence, not in the darkneſſe of error and unbeleefe.

Now in this thine inlightned frame, how fitly, how wiſely are all the parts diſpoſed that the Method of the Creation might anſwer the Matter, and the forme both. Behold all purity above; below, the drugs and lees of all. The higher I go, the more perfection; each Element ſuperior to other, not more in place then dignity; that by theſe ſtaires of aſcending perfection, our thoughts migh climbe unto the top of all glory, and might know thine imperial Heaven no leſſe glorious above the viſible, then thoſe above the earth. Oh how miſerable is the place of our pilgrimage, in reſpect of our home! Let my ſoule tread a while in the ſteps of thine owne proceedings; and ſo thinke as thou wroughteſt: When we would deſcribe a man, we begin not at the feet but the head: The head of thy Creation is the Heaven; how high? how ſpatious? how glorious? It is a wonder that we can looke up to ſo admirable an height, and that the very eye is not tired in the way. If this aſcending line could be drawn right forwards, ſome that have calculated curiouſly, have found it five hundred yeeres journey unto the ſtarry Heaven. I doe not examine their Art; O Lord I wonder rather at thine, which haſt drawn ſo large a line about this little point of earth: for in the plaineſt rules of Art and experience the Compaſſe muſt needs be ſix times as much as half the height.

A height. We think one Iland great, but the Earth unmeasurable. If we were in that Heaven with these eyes, the whole earth (were it equally enlightned) would seem as little to us, as now the least star in the firmament seems to us upon Earth: And indeed, how few Stars are so little as it? And yet how many void and ample spaces are there beside all the Starres? The hugenesse of thy worke, O God, is little inferior for admiration to the Majesty of it. But oh what a glorious heaven is this which thou hast spred over our heads? With how precious a Vault hast thou walled in this our inferiour World? What worlds of light hast thou set above us? Those things which we see, are wondrous: but those which we beleeve and see not, are yet more. Thou dost but set out these unto view, to shew us what there is within. How proportionable are thy works to thy selfe? Kings erect not cottages, but set forth their magnificence in sumptuous buildings: so hast thou done, O King of glory. If the lowest
B pavement of that Heaven of thine be so glorious, what shall we thinke of the better parts yet unseene? And if this Sunne of thine be of such brightnesse and majesty, oh what is the glory of the Maker of it? And yet if some other of thy Starres were let downe as low as it, those other Starres would be Suns to us; which now thou hadst rather have admired in their distance. And if such a skie be prepared for the use and benefit even of thine Enemies also upon Earth, how happy shall those eternall Tabernacles be which thou hast sequestered for thine owne?

Behold then in this high and stately building of thine, I see three stages; This lowest Heaven for Fowles, for Vapour, for Meteors: The second, for the Starres: The third, for thine Angels & Saints. The first is thine outward Court, open for all: The second is the body of thy covered Temple, wherein are those Candles of heaven pepetually
C burning: The third is thine holy of holies. In the first is Tumult and Vanity: In the second immutability and Rest: In the third glory and blessednesse. The first we feel; the second we see; the third we beleeve. In these two lower is no fecility; for neither the Fowles, nor Starres are happy. It is in the third heaven alone, where thou ô blessed Trinity, enjoyest thy self, and thy glorified spirits enjoy thee. It is the manifestation of thy glorious presence that makes Heaven to be it self. This is the priviledge of thy Children: that they here seeing thee (which art invisible) by the eye of Faith, have already begunne that heaven which the perfect sight of thee shall make perfect above. Let my soul then let these heavens alone, till it may see, as it is seen. That we may descend to this lowest and meanest Region of heaven, wherewith our senses are
D more acquainted. What marvels doe even h ere meet with us? There are thy Clouds thy bottles of Raine, Vessels as thin as the liquor which is contained in them: there they hang, and move, though weighty with their burden: How they are upheld, and why they fall, here & now, we know not, and wonder. These thou makest one while as some Aery Seas to hold water: another while, as some Aery Furnaces whence thou scatterest the sudden fires unto all parts of the Earth, astonishing the World with the fearfull noise of that eruption: out of the midst of water thou fetchest fire, and hard stones out of the midst of thin vapours; another while as some steel-glasses, wherein the Sunne looks and shews his face in the variety of those colours which he hath not; There are thy streames of light, blazing and falling Starres, fires darted up and down in many forms, hollow openings, (and as it were) Gulfes in the sky, bright E circles about the Moon, and other planets, Snowes, Haile: In all which it is enough to admire thy hand, though we cannot search out thine action. There are thy subtill Winds, which we beare and feel, yet neither can see their substance, nor know their causes: whence and whither they passe, and what they are thou knowst. There are thy Fowls of all shapes, colours notes and natures: whilest I compare these with the inhabitants of that other heaven, I find those Stars, and spirits like one another; Those Meteors and fowles, in as many varieties, as there are severall creatures. Why is this? It is because Man (for whose sake these are made) delights in change; thou in constancy? Or is it, that in these thou maiest shew thine owne skill, and their imperfection? There is no variety in that which is perfect, because there is but one perfection; & so much shall we grow neerer to perfectnesse, by how much we draw neerer to unity, and uniformity. From thence, if we goe downe to the great Deepe, the Wombe of moiſture; the Wel of fountains, the great Pond of the World; we know not whether to wonder at the Element it ſelf, or the gueſts which it contains. How doth that ſea of thine roare, and foam and ſwell, as if it would ſwallow up the earth? Thou ſtayeſt the rage of it by an inſenſible violence; and by a naturall miracle confineſt his waves; why it moves, and why it ſtayes, it is to us equally wonderfull: what living Mountaines (ſuch are thy Whales) rowle up and down in thoſe fearfull billows: for greatnes of number, hugenes of quantity, ſtrangenes of ſhapes, variety of faſhions, neither aire nor earth can compare with the Waters. I ſay nothing of thy hid treaſures which thy Wiſdome hath repoſed in the bowels of the earth and ſea; How ſecretly, and how baſely are they laid up? ſecretly, that we might not ſeek them; baſely, that we might not over-eſteem them: I need not dig ſo low as theſe metalls, mineries, quaries which yeeld riches enough of obſervation to the ſoul; How many millions of wonders doth the very face of the earth offer me; Which of theſe Herbes, Flowers, Trees, Leaves, Seeds, Fruits, is there; what Beaſt, what Worm, wherein we may not ſee the footſteps of a Deity? Wherein we may not read infiniteneſſe of power, of ſkill: and muſt be forced to confeſſe, that he which made the Angels and ſtarres of heaven, made alſo the vermine on the earth? O God the heart of man is too ſtrait to admire enough, even that which he treads upon! What ſhall we ſay to thee the Maker of all theſe? O Lord, how wondefull are thy workes in all the World? In wiſdom haſt thou made them all. And in all theſe thou ſpakeſt and they were done. Thy Will is the Word, and thy Word is thy Deede. Our tongue, and hand, and heart are different: all are one in thee; which art ſimply one, and infinit. Here needed no helps, no inſtruments; what could be preſent with the Eternall? what needed, or what could be added to the infinite? Thine hand is not ſhortned, thy Word is ſtill equally effectuall; ſay thou the word, and my ſoule ſhall be made new again: ſay thou the word and my body ſhall be repaired from his duſt. For all things obey thee, O Lord, why doe I not yeeld to the word of thy counſell; ſince I muſt yeeld, as all thy creatures to the word of thy command.

Of Man.

But (O God) what a little Lord haſt thou made over this great World? The leaſt corn of ſand is not ſo ſmall to the whole Earth as man is to the Heaven: when I ſee the Heavens, the Sun, Moon and Stars; O God, what is man? who would think thou ſhouldeſt make all theſe Creatures for one? and that one well neer the leaſt of all? Yet none but he can ſee what thou haſt done; none but he can admire, and adore thee in what he ſeeth; how had he need to do nothing but this, ſince he alone muſt doe it? Certainly, the price and vertue of things conſiſt not in the quantity: one diamond is more worth then many Quarries of ſtone, one Loadſtone hath more vertue then Mountains of earth: It is lawfull for us to praiſe thee in our ſelves: All thy creation hath not more wonder in it, then one of us: other Creatures thou madeſt by a ſimple command; Man, not without a divine conſultation: others at once; Man, thou didſt firſt form, then inſpire: others in ſeverall ſhapes like to none but themſelves; Man, after thine own Image: others with qualities fit for ſervice; Man, for dominion. Man had his name from thee; They had their names from Man. How ſhould we be conſecrated to thee above all others, ſince thou haſt beſtowed more coſt on us then others? What ſhall I admire firſt? Thy providence in the time of our Crearion? Or thy power and wiſdome in the act? Firſt, thou madeſt the great houſe of the World, and furniſheſt it: then thou broughteſt in thy Tenant to poſſeſſe it. The bare walls had been too good for us, but thy love was above our deſert: Thou that madeſt the earth ready for us before we were, haſt by the ſame mercy prepared a place in heaven for us whiles we are on earth. The ſtage was firſt fully prepated, then was man brought forth thither, as an Actor or Spectator: that he might neither be idle nor diſcontent: behold, thou hadſt addreſſed an earth for uſe, and Heaven for contemplation: after thou hadſt drawn that large reall

Map

A Map of the World; thou didſt thus abridge it into this little table of Man; he alone conſiſts of Heaven and Earth; Soule and body. Even this earthly part, which is vile in compariſon of the other; as it is thine (O God) I dare admire it, though I can neglect it as mine own; for loe, this heape of Earth hath an outward reference to Heaven: other Creatures grovell down to their earth, and have all their ſenſes intent upon it; this is reared up towards Heaven, and hath no more power to looke beſide Heaven, then to tread beſide the earth. Unto this, every part hath his wonder. The head is neareſt to heaven, as in place, ſo in reſemblance; both for roundneſſe of figure, & for thoſe divine gueſts which have their ſeat in it; There dwels thoſe majeſticall Powers of reaſon, which makes a Man; all the ſenſes as they have their originall from thence, ſo they do all agree there to manifeſt their vertue: how goodly proportions haſt thou
B ſet in the face? ſuch as tho oft times we can give no reaſon when they pleaſe, yet tranſport us to admiration. What living glaſſes are thoſe which thou haſt placed in the midſt of this viſage, whereby all objects from farre are cleerely repreſented to the minde? and becauſe their tendernes lies open to dangers, how haſt thou defended them with hollow bones, and with prominent browes, and lids? And leſt they ſhould be too much bent on what they ought not, thou haſt given them peculier nerves to pul them up towards the ſeat of their reſt. What a tongue haſt thou given him, the inſtrument not of taſte only, but of ſpeech? how ſweet and excellent voices are formed by that little looſe filme of fleſh? what an incredible ſtrength haſt thou given to the weake bones of the jawes? What a comely and towre-like necke therefore moſt ſinewy, becauſe ſmalleſt? And leſt I be infinite, what able armes and active hands haſt
C thou framed him, whereby he can frame all things to his own conceit? In every part, beauty, ſtrength, convenience meet together. Neither is there any whereof our weakneſſe cannot give reaſon, why it ſhould be no otherwiſe. How haſt thou diſpoſed of all the inward veſſels, for all offices of life, nouriſhment, egeſtion, generation? No veine, ſinew, arterie is idle. There is no piece in this exquiſite frame, whereof the place, uſe, form, doth not admit wonder, and exceed it: Yet this body if it be compared to the ſoule, what is it, but as a clay wall that encompaſſes a treaſure; as a woodden box of a Jeweller; as a coorſe caſe to a rich inſtrument; or as a maſke to a beautifull face? Man was made laſt, becauſe he was worthieſt. The ſoule was inſpired laſt, becauſe yet more noble; If the body have this honor to be the companion of the Soule, yet withall it is the drudge. If it be the inſtrument, yet alſo the clog of that
D divine part. The companion for life, the drudge for ſervice, the inſtrument for action, the clog in reſpect of contemplation. Theſe externall workes are effected by it, the internall which are more noble, hindered, contrary to the bird which ſings moſt in her cage, but flies moſt and higheſt at liberty. This my ſoule teaches me of it ſelf, that it ſelf cannot conceive how capable, how active it is. It can paſſe by her nimble thoughts from heaven to earth in a moment: it can be all things, can comprehend all things; know that which is; and conceive that which never was, never ſhall be: Nothing can fill it, but thou which art infinite: nothing can limit it, but thou which art every where. O God which madeſt it, repleniſh it, poſſeſſe it, dwell thou in it, which haſt appointed it to dwell in clay. The body was made of earth common to his fel-
E lows, the ſoule inſpired immediately from God. The body lay ſenſeleſſe upon the earth like it ſelf: the breath of lives gave it what it is; and that breath was from thee. Senſe, motion, reaſon, are infuſed into it, at once. From whence then was this quickning breath? No ayre, no earth, no water was here uſed to give helpe to this Worke: Thou that breathedſt upon man, and gaveſt him the holy Spirit; didſt alſo breath upon the body & gaveſt it a living Spirit; we are beholden to nothing but thee for our ſodle. Our fleſh is from fleſh, our ſpirit is from the God of Spirits. How ſhould our ſoules riſe up to thee, and fix themſelves in their thoughts upon thee, who alone created them in their infuſion, and infuſed them in their creation? How ſhould they long to return back to the fountaine of their being, and Author of being glorious? Why may we not ſay that this ſoule as it came from thee, ſo it is like thee? as thou, ſo it, is one, immateriall, immortall, underſtanding ſpirit, diſtinguiſhed into three powers which all make up one Spirit. So thou the wiſe Creator of all things, wouldſt have have ſome things to reſemble their Creator. Theſe other creatures are all body; Man is body and ſpirit; the Angels are all ſpirit not without a kinde of ſpirituall compoſition; Thou art alone after thine own manner, ſimple, glorious, infinite; no creature can be like thee in thy proper being; becauſe it is a creature; How ſhould our finite, weake compounded nature give any perfect reſemblance of thine? Yet of all viſible creatures thou vouchſafeſt Man the neereſt correſpondence to thee: not ſo much in the naturall faculties, as in thoſe divine graces, wherewith thou beautifieſt his ſoule. A

Our knowledge, holineſſe, righteouſneſſe, was like the firſt copy from which they were drawn. Behold, we were not more like thee in theſe, then now we are unlike our ſelves in their loſſe. O God we now praiſe our ſelves to our ſhame, for the better we were, we are the worſe, as the ſonne of ſome prodigall, or tainted Anceſtors, tell of the Lands, and Lordſhips which were once theirs. Only do thou whet our deſires anſwerably to the readineſſe of thy mercies, that we may redeeme what we have loſt; that we may recover in thee, what we have loſt in our ſelves. The fault ſhall be ours, if our damage prove not beneficiall. B

I doe not find, that Man thus framed, found the want of an helper. His fruition of God gave him fulneſſe of contentment; the ſweetneſſe which he found in the contemplation of this new workmanſhip, and the glory of the author, did ſo take him up, that he had neither leaſure nor cauſe of complaint. If Man had craved an helper, he had grudged at the condition of his Creation, and had queſtioned that which he had; perfection of being. But he that gave him his being, and knew him better then himſelfe, thinkes of giving him comfort in the creature, whiles he ſought none but in his Maker: He ſees our wants, and fore-caſts our reliefe, when we think our ſelves too happy to complain: How ready will he be to help our neceſſities, that thus provides for our perfection? C

God gives the nature to his Creatures: Man muſt give the name; he that might ſee they were made for him, they ſhall be to him what he will. In ſtead of their firſt homage, they are preſented to their new Lord, and muſt ſee of whom they hold. He that was ſo carefull of mans ſoveraignity in his innocency, how can he be careleſſe of his ſafety in his renovation.

If God had given them their names, it had not been ſo great a praiſe of Adams memory to recall them, as it was now of his judgement (at firſt ſight) to impoſe them: he ſaw the inſide of all the creatures at firſt; (his Poſterity ſees but their ſkins ever ſince;) and by his knowledge he fitted their names to their diſpoſitions. All that he ſaw were fit to be his ſervants, none to be his companions. The ſame God that finds the want, ſupplies it. Rather then mans innocency ſhall want an outward comfort, God will begin a new creation. Not out of the Earth, which was the matter of Man, not out of the inferiour creatures, which were the ſervants of Man, but out of himſelfe, for deareneſſe, for equality. Doubtleſſe ſuch was Mans power of obedience, that if God had bidden him yeeld up his rib, waking, for his uſe, he had done it cheerfully: but the bounty of God was ſo abſolute, that he would not ſo much as conſult with mans Will, to make him happy. As man knew not while he was made, ſo ſhall he not know while his other ſelfe is made out of him: that the comfort might be greater, which was ſeen before it was expected. D E

If the Woman ſhould have been made, not without the paine, or will of the Man, ſhe might have been upbraided with her dependance, and obligation. Now ſhee owes nothing but to her Creator: The rib of Adam ſleeping, can challenge no more of her, then the earth can of him. It was an happy change to Adam, of a rib, for an helper; what helpe did that bone give to his ſide? God had not made it, if it had been ſuperfluous: and yet if Man could not have been perfit without, it had not been taken out.

Many things are uſefull and convenient, which are not neceſſary: and if God had ſeene Man might not want it, how eaſie had it beene for him, which made the Woman of that bone, to turne the fleſh into another bone? But he ſaw man could not complaine of the want of that bone, which he had ſo multiplied, ſo animated.

O God,

A O God, we can never be loſers by thy changes, we have nothing but what is thine: take from us thine own, when thou wilt, we are ſure thou canſt not but give us better.

Of Paradiſe.

Gen. 2

MAN could no ſooner ſee, then he ſaw himſelf happy: His eye-ſight and reaſon were both perfect at once, and the objects of both were able to make him as happy as he would. When he firſt opened his eyes, he ſaw heaven above him, earth under him, the creatures about him, B God before him, hee knew what all theſe things meant as if hee had been long acquainted with them all: He ſaw the heavens glorious, but farre off: his Maker thought it requiſite to fit him with a Paradiſe neerer home. If God had appointed him immediately to heaven, his body had been ſuperfluous; It was fit his body ſhould be anſwered with an earthen Image of that heaven, which was for his ſoule: had Man been made only for contemplation, it would have ſerved as well to have been placed in ſome vaſt deſart, on the top of ſome barren Mountaine; But the ſame power which gave him a heart to meditate, gave him hands to work; and worke fit for his hands. Neither was it the purpoſe of the Creator, that Man ſhould but live: pleaſure may ſtand with innocence; he that rejoyced to ſee all he had made to be good, rejoyceth to ſee all that he had made to be well. God loves to ſee his C creatures happy; Our lawfull delight is his: they know not God that thinke to pleaſe him with making themſelves miſerable

The Idolaters thought it a fit ſervice for Baal, to cut and launce themſelves; never any holy man lookt for thankes from the True God, by wronging himſelfe. Every Earth was not fit for Adam, but a Garden; a Paradiſe. What excellent pleaſures, and rare varieties have men found in Gardens planted by the hands of men? And yet all the World of men cannot make one twigge or leafe, or ſpire of graſſe: When he that made the matter, undertakes the faſhion, how muſt it needs be beyond our capacity, excellent? No herb, no flower, no tree was wanting there, that might be for ornament or uſe; whether for ſight, or for ſent, or for taſte. The bounty of God wrought further then to neceſſity, even to comfort and recreation: Why are we niggardly to our D ſelves, when God is liberall? But for all this; if God had not there converſed with man, no abundance could have made him bleſſed.

Yet behold: that which was mans ſtore-houſe was alſo his work-houſe; his pleaſure was his taſk: Paradiſe ſerved not only to feed his ſenſes, but to exerciſe his hands. If happineſſe had conſiſted in doing nothing, man had not been employed; All his delights could not have made him happy in an idle life. Man therfore is no ſooner made, then he is ſet to work: neither greatneſſe nor perfection can priviledge a folded hand; he muſt labor, becauſe he was happy; how much more we, that we may be? This firſt labor of his was, as without neceſſity, ſo without paines, without wearineſſe; how much more cheerefully we go about our buſineſſes ſo much nearer we E come to our Paradiſe.

Neither did theſe Trees afford him onely action for his hands, but inſtruction to his heart: for here hee ſaw Gods Sacraments grow before him; All other trees had a naturall uſe; theſe two in the middeſt of the Garden, a ſpirituall. Life is the act of the Soule, knowledge the life of the Soule; The Tree of knowledge, and the Tree of life then, were ordained as earthly helps of the ſpirituall part: Perhaps hee which ordained the end, immortality of life; did appoint this Fruit as the means of that life. It is not for us to enquire after the life we had; and the means we ſhould have had. I am ſure it ſerved to nouriſh the ſoule by a lively repreſentation of that living Tree, whoſe fruit is eternall life, and whoſe leaves ſerve to heale the Nations.

O infinite mercy! Man ſaw his Saviour before him ere he had need of a Saviour, he ſaw in whom he ſhould recover an heavenly life, ere he loſt the earthly; but after hee he had tasted of the Tree of Knowledge, he might not taste of the Tree of Life; That immortall food was not for a mortall stomack: Yet then did he most savor that invisible Tree of Life, when he was most restrained from the other. A

O Saviour, none but a Sinner can rellish thee: My taste hath been enough seasoned with the forbidden fruit, to make it capable of thy sweetnesse; Sharpen thou as well the stomack of my soule by repenting, by beleeving: so shall I eate, and in despite of Adam live for ever. The one tree was for confirmation; the other for tryall: one shewed him what life he should have; the other what knowledge he should not desire to have: Alas, he that knew all other things, knew not this one thing, that he knew enough: how Divine a thing is knowledge, whereof even Innocency it self is ambitious? Satan knew what he did: If this bait had been gold, or honor, or pleasure, Man had contemned it: who can hope to avoid error, when even mans perfection is mistaken? he lookt for speculative knowledge, he should have lookt for experimentall: he thought it had been good to know evill: Good was large enough to have perfected his knowledge, and therein his blessednesse. B

All that God made was good, and the Maker of them much more good; they good in their kinds, he good in himself. It would not content him to know God, and his creatures; his curiosity affected to know that which God never made, evill of sinne, and evill of death, which indeed himselfe made by desiring to know them; now wee know well evill enough, and smart with knowing it. How deare hath this lesson cost us, that in some cases it is better to be ignorant; and yet doe the sonnes of Eve inherit this saucy appetite of their Grand-mother: How many thousand souls miscary with the presumptuous affectation of forbidden knowledge! C

O God, thou hast revealed more then we can know, enough to make us happy, teach me a sober knowledge, and a contented ignorance.

Paradise was made for Man, yet there I see the Serpent; What marvell is it if my corruption find the serpent in my closset, in my table, in my bed, when our holy Parents found him in the midest of Paradise? No sooner he is entred, but he tempteth: he can no more be idle, then harmlesse; I doe not see him at any other tree; he knew there was no danger in the rest, I see him at the tree forbidden. How true a serpent is he in every point; In his insinuation to the place; in his choise of the Tree, in his assault of the Woman, in his plausiblenesse of speech to avoid terror, in his question to move doubt, in his reply to worke distrust, in his protestation of safety, in his suggestion to envy and discontent, in his promise of gaine! D

And if he were so cunning at the first, what shall we think of him now, after so many thousand yeares experience? Onely thou (O God) and these Angels that see thy face, are wiser then he; I do not ask why, when he left his goodnesse, thou diddest not bereave him of his skill? Still thou wouldst have him an Angell, though an evill one: And thou knowest how to ordaine his craft to thine own glory; I do not desire thee to abate of his subtilty, but to make me wise; Let me beg it without presumption, make me wiser then Adam: even thine image which he bore made him not (through his owne weakenesse) wise enough to obey thee; thou offeredest him all Fruits, and restrainedest but one; Satan offered him but one, and restrained not the rest: when he chose rather to be at Satans feeding, then thine, it was just with thee to turne him out of thy gates with a curse; why shouldest thou feed a Rebell at thine owne board? E

And yet we transgresse daily and thou shuttest not heaven against us: how is it that we find more mercy then our fore-father? His strength is worthy of severity, our weaknesse finds pitty. That God, from whose face he fled in the Garden, now makes him with shame to fly out of the Garden: those Angels that should have kept him, now keep the gates of Paradise against him; It is not so easie to recover happinesse, as to keep it, or leese it: Yea the same cause that drave Man from Paradise, hath also withdrawn Paradise from the World.

That fiery sword did not defend it against those waters wherewith the sinnes of men drowned the glory of that place: neither now doe I care to seek where that Paradise was, which we lost: I know where that Paradise is, which wee must care to seeke

A seeke and hope to finde. As man was the Image of God, so was that earthly Paradise an Image of Heaven; both the Images are defaced, both the first Patternes are eternall: Adam was in the first, and stayed not: In the second, is the second Adam which said, This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. There was that chosen Vessell, and heard, and saw what could not be expressed: by how much the third heaven exceeds the richest earth; so much doth that Paradise, whereto we aspire, exceed that which we have lost.

Of CAIN and ABEL.

B LOok now (O my soul) upon the two first Brethen, perhaps Twins; and wonder at their contrary dispositions and estates: If the priviledges of Nature had been worth any thing, the first borne Childe should not have been a Reprobate. Gen. 4

Now, that we may ascribe all to free Grace, the elder is a Murderer, the yonger a Saint; though goodnesse may be repaired in our selves, yet it cannot be propagated to ours: Now might Adam see the Image of himselfe in Cain; for after his owne Image begot he him; Adam slue his posterity, Cain his Brother: wee are too like one another in that wherein we are unlike to God: Even the cleerest graine sends forth that chaffe from which it was fanned ere the sowing: yet is this Cain a possession, the same Eve that mistooke the fruit of the Garden, mistooke also
C the fruit of her owne body, her hope deceived her in both; so, many good names are ill bestowed; and our comfortable expectations in earthly things do not seldome disappoint us.

Doubtlesse, their education was holy; For Adam though in Paradise he could not be innocent, yet was a good man out of Paradise; his sinne and fall now made him circumspect, and since he saw that his act had bereaved them of that Image of God, which he once had for them, he could not but labor by all holy indeavours to repaire it in them, that so his care might make amends for his trespasse. How plaine is it, that even good breeding cannot alter destiny? That which is crooked can none make straight; who would think that Brethren and but two brethren, should not love each other? Dispersed love grows weak, and fewnesse of objects useth to unite affections:
D If but two brothers be left alive of many, they thinke that the love of all the rest should survive in them; and now the beames of their affection are so much the hotter, because they reflect mutually in a right line upon each other: yet behold, here are but two Brothers in a World, and one is the butcher of the other. Who can wonder at dissentions amongst thousands of brethren, when he sees so deadly opposition betwixt two, the first roots of brotherhood? who can hope to live plausibly, and securely amongst so many Cains, when he sees one Cain the death of one Abel? The same Devill that set enmity betwixt Man and God, sets enmity betwixt Man and Man; and yet God said, I will put enmity between thy seed and her seed. Our hatred of the Serpent and his seed is from God: Their hatred of the holy Seed is from the
E Serpent: Behold here at once is one person, the Seed of the Woman and of the Serpent: Cains naturall parts are of the Woman; his vitious qualities of the Serpent: The Woman gave him to be a brother, the Serpent to bea man-slayer; all uncharitableneſſe, all quarrels are of one Author: we cannot enterraine Wrath, and not give place to the Devill. Certainly, so deadly an act must needs be deeply grounded.

What then was the occasion of this capitall malice? Abels sacrifice is accepted; what was this to Cain? Cains is rejected what could Abel remedy this? Oh envy, the corrosive of all ill minds; and the root of all desperate actions: the same cause that moved Satan to tempt the first Man to destroy himselfe, and his posterity, the same moves the second Man to destroy the third.

It should have been Cains joy to see his brother accepted; It should have beene his sorrow, to see that himselfe had deserved a rejection, his Brothers example should have excited, and directed him: Could Abel have stayed Gods fire from descending ſcending? Or ſhould he (if he could) reject Gods acceptation, and diſpleaſe his Maker, to content a Brother? Was Cain ever the farther from a bleſſing, becauſe his Brother obtained mercy? How proud and fooliſh is malice? which grows thus mad, for no other cauſe, but becauſe God, or Abel is not leſſe good; It hath been an old and happy danger to be holy; Indifferent actions muſt be carefull to avoyd offence; But I care not what Devill or what Cain be angry that I doe good, or receive good. A

There was never any nature without envy; Every man is born a Cain; hating that goodneſſe in another, which he neglecteth in himſelfe. There was never envy that was not bloudy; for if it eate not anothers heart, it will eate our owne: but unleſſe it be reſtrained, it will ſurely feed it ſelfe with the bloud of others, oft-times in act, alwaies in affection, And that God, which (in good) accepts the will for the deed, condemnes the will for the deed in evill. If there be an evill heart, there will bee an evill eye; and if both theſe, there will be an evil hand. B

How early did Martyrdome come into the world? the firſt man that dyed, dyed for Religion; who dare meaſure Gods love by outward events, when he ſees wicked Cain ſtanding over bleeding Abel; whoſe ſacrifice was firſt accepted, and now himſelfe is ſacrificed; Death was denounced to man as a curſe; yet behold, it firſt lights upon a Saint: how ſoon was it altered by the mercy of that juſt hand which inflicted it? If death had been evill, and life good, Cain had been ſlaine, and Abel had ſurvived; now that it begins with him that God loves, O Death where is thy ſting?

Abel ſaies nothing, his bloud cries: Every drop of innocent bloud hath a tongue, and is not only vocall, but importunate: what a noiſe then did the bloud of my Saviour make in Heaven? who was himſelfe the Shepheard and the Sacrifice; the Man that was offered, and the God to whom it was offered; The Spirit that heard both, ſaies, It ſpake better things then the bloud of Abel. Abels bloud called for revenge, his for mercy. Abels pleaded his own innocency his the ſatisfaction for all the beleeving world: Abel procured Cains puniſhment, his freed all repentant ſoules from puniſhment; better things indeed, then the bloud of Abel. Better, and therefore that which Abels bloud ſaid, was good: It is good, that God ſhould be avenged of ſinners. Execution of juſtice upon offenders, is no leſſe good, then rewards of goodneſſe. C

No ſooner doth Abels bloud ſpeake unto God, then God ſpeaks to Cain; There is no wicked man to whom God ſpeakes not, if not to his eare, yet to his heart: What ſpeech was this? Not an accuſation, but an inqurie; yet ſuch an inqurie as would inferre an accuſation. God loves to have a ſinner accuſe himſelfe, and therefore hath he ſet his Deputy in the breſt of man; neither doth God love this more then nature abhorres it: Cain anſwers ſubbornly: The very name of Abel wounds him no leſſe, then his hand had wounded Abel; Conſciences that are without remorſe, are not without horror: wickedneſſe makes men deſperate; the Murderer is angry with God as of late for accepting his brothers oblation, ſo now for liſtning to his bloud. D

And now he dares anſwer God with a queſtion, Am I my brothers Keeper? where he ſhould have ſaid, Am not I my brothers murderer? Behold, he ſcorneth to keep whom he feared not to kill: Good duties are baſe and troubleſome to wicked minds, whiles even violences of evill are pleaſant. Yet this miſcreant, which neither had grace to avoid his ſinne, nor to confeſſe it, now that he is convinced of ſinne, and curſed for it, how he howleth, how he exclaimeth? he that cares not for the act of his ſinne, ſhall care for the ſmart of his puniſhment. The damned are weary of their torments, but in vain. How great a madneſſe is it to complaine too late! He that would not keep his brother, is caſt out from the protection of God; he that feared not to kill his brother, feares now, that whoſoever meets him will kill him. The troubled conſcience projecteth fearefull things, and ſinne makes even cruell men cowardly: God ſaw it was too much favor for him to die: he therefore wils that which Cain wils. Cain would live; It is yeelded to him, but for a curſe: how often doth God heare ſinners in anger? He ſhall live baniſhed from God, carrying his hell in his boſome, and the brand of Gods vengeance in his fore-head: God rejects him, the Earth repines at him, men abhorre him; himſelf now wiſhes that death which he feared, and no man dare pleaſure him with a murder; how bitter is the end of ſin, yea, without end; ſtill E

Cain

Cain finds that he killed himself more then his brother. We should never sin, if our fore-sight were but as good as our sense; The issue of sin would appeare a thousand times more horrible then the act is pleasant.

Of the Deluge.

THE World was grown so foule with sin, that God saw it was time to wash it with a floud And so close did wickednes cleave to the Authors of it, that when they were washt to nothing, yet it would not off: yea so deep did it stick in the very grain of the earth, that God saw it meet to let it soke long under the waters. So under the Law the very vessels that had touched uncleane water, must either be rinced, or broken. Mankinde began but with one; and yet he that saw the first man, lived to see the Earth peopled with a world of men: yet men grew not so fast as wickednesse. One man could soone and easily multiply a thousand sins, never Man had so many children: so that when there were men enow to store the earth, there were as many sinnes as would reach up to heaven, whereupon the waters come downe from heaven, and swelled up to heaven againe; If there had not been so deep a Deluge of sin, there had beene none of the waters; From whence then was this superfluity of iniquity? Whence, but from the unequall yoke with Infidels? These mariages did not beget men, so much as wickednesse, from hence religious husbands both lost their piety, and gayned a rebellious and godlesse generation.

Gen. 6. 2. 4. 7.

That which was the first occasion of sinne, was the occasion of the increase of sin: A woman seduced Adam, women betray these sons of God: the beauty of the Apple betrayed the woman, the beauty of these women betrayed this holy seed: Eve saw, & lusted, so did they, this also was a forbidden fruit, they lusted, tasted, sinned, died; the most sins begin at the eyes, by them commonly Satan creeps into the heart: that soule can never be in safety, that hath not covenanted with his eyes.

God needed not have given these men any warning of his judgement; they gave him no warning of their sins, no respite: yet that God might approve his mercies to the very wicked; he gives them an hundred and twenty years respite of repenting: how loth is God to strike, that threats so long! He that delights in revenge, surprises his adversary, whereas he that gives long warnings, desires to be prevented: if we were not wilful, we should never smart.

Neither doth he give them time only, but a faithfull teacher. It is an happy thing when he that teacheth others is righteous; Noahs hand taught them as much as his tongue. His businesse in building the Arke, was a reall sermon to the world, wherein at once were taught mercy and life to the beleever; and to the rebellious destruction.

Me thinks I see those monstrous sonnes of Lamech comming to Noah, and asking him, what he meanes by that strange work; whether he means to sale upon the dry land. To whom when he reports Gods purpose and his, they go away laughing at his idlenesse, and tell one another, in sport, that too much holinesse hath made him mad: yet cannot they all flout Noah out of his faith, he preaches, and builds, and finishes. Doubtlesse more hands went to this work then his: many a one wrought upon the Arke, which yet was not saved in the Arke. Our outward Workes cannot save us, without our Faith; wee may helpe to save others, and perish our selves: what a wonder of mercy is this that I here see? One poore family called out of a world, and as it were eight graines of corne fanned from a whole barnfull of chaffe: one Hypocrite was saved with the rest for Noahs sake; not one righteous man was swept away for company, For these few was the earth preserved still under the waters, and all kinds of Creatures upon the Waters; which else had been all destroyed. Still the World stands, for their sakes, for whom it was preserved; Else fire should consume that, which could not be cleansed by water.

This difference is strange; I see the savagest of all creatures, Lyons, Tygers, Beares, by an instinct from God come to seek the Arke (as we see swine fore-seeing a storme run home crying for ſhelter) men I ſee not; Reaſon once debauched is worſe then bruitiſhneſſe: God hath uſe even of theſe fierce and cruell beaſts, and glory by them: even they being created for man, muſt live by him, though to his puniſhment: how gently do they offer and ſubmit themſelves to their Preſerver; renewing that obeyſance to this Repairer of the world, which they before ſin, yeelded to him that firſt ſtored the World: He that ſhut them into the Arke when they were entred, ſhut their mouthes alſo while they did enter. The Lyons fawne upon Noah, and Daniel; What heart cannot the Maker of them mollifie. A

The uncleane beaſts God would have to live, the cleane to multiplie; and therefore he ſends to Noah ſeven of the cleane, of the uncleane two: He knew the one would annoy man with their multitude, the other would inrich him; Thoſe things are worthy of moſt reſpect which are of moſt uſe.

But why ſeven? Surely that God that created ſeven daies in the Weeke, and made one for himſelfe; did here preſerve of ſeven cleane beaſts, one for himſelfe, for ſacrifice; He gives us ſix for one in earthly things, that in ſpirituall wee ſhould bee all for him. B

Now the day is come, all the gueſts are entred, the Arke is ſhut, and the windows of Heaven open: I doubt not but many of thoſe ſcoffers, when they ſaw the violence of the waves deſcending, and aſcending, according to Noahs prediction, came wading middle-deep unto the Arke, and importunately craved that admittance which they once denyed: But now as they formerly rejected God, ſo are they juſtly rejected of God. For ere vengeance begin, repentance is ſeaſonable; but if judgement be once gone out, we cry too late. While the Goſpell ſolicites us, the doores of the Arke are open, if we neglect the time of grace, in vaine ſhall wee ſeek it with teares; God holds it no mercy to pity the obſtinate. Others more bold than they, hope to over-run the judgement, and climbing up to the high Mountaines, looke downe upon the waters, with more hope than feare: and now when they ſee their Hils become Ilands, they climbe up into the talleſt Trees; there with paleneſſe and horror at once look for death, and ſtudy to avoyd it, whom the waves over-take at laſt half dead with famine, and half with feare. Loe now from the tops of the Mountaines they deſcry the Arke floating upon the waters, and behold with envy that which before they beheld with ſcorne. C

In vaine doth he fly whom God purſues. There is no way to fly from his judgements, but to fly to his mercy by repenting. The Faith of the righteous cannot be ſo much derided, as their ſucceſſe is magnified: How ſecurely doth Noah ride out this uproare of Heaven, Earth and waters! He heares the powring downe of the raine above his head; the ſhrieking of Men, and roaring and bellowing of Beaſts, on both ſides him; the raging and threats of the waves under him, he ſaw the miſerable ſhifts of the diſtreſſed unbeleevers; and in the meane time ſits quietly in his dry Cabbin, neither feeling, nor fearing evill: he knew that he which owed the waters, would ſteere him; that he who ſhut him in, would preſerve him. How happy a thing is Faith? what a quiet ſafety, what a heavenly peace doth it worke in the ſoule, in the midſt of all the inundations of evill? D

Now when God hath fetcht again all the life which he had given to his unworthy creatures, and reduced the world unto his firſt forme wherein waters were over the face of the earth, it was time for a renovation of all things to ſucceed this deſtruction. To have continued the Deluge long, had been to puniſh Noah, that was righteous. After forty dayes therfore, the Heavens clear up, after an hundred and fifty the waters ſinke downe: How ſoone is God weary of puniſhing, which is never weary of bleſſing! yet may not the Arke reſt ſuddenly. If we did not ſtay ſome-while under Gods hand, we ſhould not know how ſweet his mercy is, and how great our thankefulneſſe ſhould be. The Arke though it was Noahs Fort againſt the waters, yet it was his priſon; he was ſafe in it, but put up; he that gave him life by it, now thinkes time to give him liberty out of it. E

God doth not reveale all things to his beſt ſervants: behold, He that told Noah an hundred and twenty yeares before, what day he ſhould go into the Arke, yet fortels

him not now in the Arke what day the Arke ſhould reſt upon the Hils and he ſhould goe forth. Noah therefore ſends out his intelligencers, the Raven, and the Dove; whoſe wings in that vaprous ayre might eaſily deſcry further then his ſight: The Raven of quick ſent, of groſſe feed, of tough conſtitution; no Fowle was ſo fit for diſcovery; the likelieſt things alwayes ſucceed not. He neither will venture far into that ſolitary world for feare of want, nor yet come into the Arke for love of liberty; but hovers about in uncertainties. How many carnall mindes flye out of the Arke of Gods Church; and imbrace the preſent world: rather chooſing to feed upon the unſavory carcaſſes of ſinfull pleaſures, then to be reſtrained within the ſtraight liſts of Chriſtian obedience.

The Dove is ſent forth, a Fowle, both ſwift and ſimple. She like a true Citizen of the Arke, returnes; and brings faithfull notice of the continuance of the Waters, by her reſtleſſe and emptie return; by her Olive leafe, of the abatement: how worthy are thoſe Meſſengers to be welcome, which with innocence in their lives, bring glad tyding of peace, and ſalvation, in their mouthes!

Noah rejoyces and believes; yet ſtill he waits ſeven dayes more: It is not good to devoure the favors of God too greedily; but to take them in, that we may digeſt them. O ſtrong faith of Noah, that was not weary with this delay; ſome man would have ſo longed for the open ayre after ſo long cloſeneſſe, that upon the firſt notice of ſafety he would have uncovered, and voyded the Arke, Noah ſtayes ſeven dayes e're he will open; and well neere two Moneths e're hee will forſake the Arke; and not then, unleſſe God, that commanded to enter, had bidden him depart. There is no action good without our Faith: no Faith without a word. Happy is that man, which in all things (neglecting the counſels of fleſh and bloud) depends upon the commiſſion of his Maker.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD STANHOPE,

ONE OF HIS MAJESTIES MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY COUNCELL,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

Right Honorable,

I Durſt appeale to the judgment of a carnall Reader (let him not bee prejudicate) that there is no Hiſtory ſo pleaſant as the Sacred. Set aſide the Majeſty of the Inditer; none can compare with it for Magnificence and Antiquity of the Matter, the ſweetneſſe of compiling, the ſtrange variety of memorable occurrences: And if the delight be ſuch, what ſhall the profit bee eſteemed of that which was written by GOD for the ſalvation of Men? I confeſſe, no thoughts did ever more ſweetly ſteale Me and Time away, then thoſe which I have imployed in this ſubject, and I hope, none can equally benefit others: for, if the meere relation of theſe holy things bee profitable, how much more when it is reduced to uſe? This ſecond part of the World repaired, I dedicate to your Lordſhip, wherein you ſhall ſee Noah as weake in his Tent, as ſtrong in the Arke; an ungracious Sonne reſerved from the the Deluge to his Fathers curſe: modeſt piety rewarded with bleſſings: the building of Babel, begunne in pride, ended in confuſion; Abrahams Faith, Feare, Obedience; Iſaac bound upon the Altar under the hand of a Father that hath forgotten both nature and all his hopes; Sodom burning with a double fire, from Hell, and from Heaven: Lot reſcued from that impure City, yet after finding Sodom in his Cave: Every one of theſe paſſages is not more full of wonder, then of edification. That Spirit which hath penned all theſe things for our learning, teach us their right uſe: and ſanctifie theſe my unworthy Meditations to the good of his Church. To whoſe abundant grace I humbly commend your Lordſhip.

The Second Book.

Noah.

NO ſooner is Noah come out of the Arke, but he builds an Altar: not an houſe for himſelfe, but an Altar to the Lord: Our faith will ever teach us to prefer God to our ſelves. Delayed thankfulneſſe is not worthy of acceptation. Of thoſe few creatures that are left, God muſt have ſome; they are all his: yet his goodneſſe will have Man know that it was he, for whoſe ſake they were preſerved. It was a priviledge to thoſe very bruit creatures, that they were ſaved from the waters, to be offered up in fire unto God: What a favor is it to men, to be reſerved from common deſtructions, to be ſacrificed to their Maker and Redeemer! Gen. 9. 20.

Loe this little fire of Noah, through the vertue of his faith, purged the world, and aſcended up into thoſe heavens, from which the waters fel, & cauſed a glorious Rainbow to appeare therein for his ſecurity: All the ſins of the former world were not ſo unſavory unto God, as this ſmoake was pleaſant. No perfume can be ſo ſweet as the holy obedience of the faithfull. Now God that was before anoyed with the ill ſavor of ſinne, ſmels a ſweet ſavor of reſt: Behold here a new and ſecond reſt: Firſt, God reſted from making the world, now he reſts from deſtroying it: Even while we ceaſe not to offend, he ceaſes from a publike revenge. His word was enough, yet withall he gives a ſigne, which may ſpeake the truth of his promiſe to the very eyes of men: thus he doth ſtill in his bleſſed Sacraments, which are as reall words to the ſoule. The Rain-bow is the pledge of our ſafety, which even naturally ſignifies the end of a ſhower: all the ſignes of Gods inſtitution are proper, and ſignificant.

But who would looke after all this, to have found righteous Noah, the Father of the new World, lying drunken in his tent? Who would think that wine ſhould overthrow him that was preſerved from the waters? That he who could not be tainted with the ſinfull examples of the former world, ſhould begin the example of a new ſin of his own? What are we men, if we be but our ſelves? While God upholds us, no temptation can move us: when he leaves us, no temptation is too weake to overthrow us. What living man ever had ſo noble proofes of the mercy, of the juſtice of God? Mercy upon himſelf, Juſtice upon others. What man had ſo gracious approbation from his maker? Behold, he of whom in an unclean world God ſaid, Thee onely have I found Righteous, proves now uncleane when the world was purged. The Preacher of righteouſneſſe unto the former age, the King, Prieſt, and Prophet of the world renued, is the firſt that renues the ſins of that world which he had reproved, and which he ſaw condemned for ſin: Gods beſt children have no fence for ſins of infirmity: Which of the Saints have not once done that, whereof they are aſhamed? God that lets us fall, knows how to make as good uſe of the ſins of his holy ones, as of their obedience: If we had not ſuch patternes, who could chooſe but deſpaire at the ſight of his ſinnes?

Yet

Yet we find Noah drunken but once. One act can no more make a good heart unrighteous, then a trade of ſinne can ſtand with regeneration: but when I look to the effect of this ſinne, I cannot but bluſh and wonder; Loe, this ſin is worſe then ſin; Other ſinnes move ſhame, but hide it: this diſplayes it to the world. Adam had no ſooner ſinned, but he ſaw and abhorred his owne nakedneſſe, ſeeking to hide it even with buſhes.

Noah had no ſooner ſinned, but he diſcovers his nakedneſſe, and hath not ſo much rule of himſelfe, as to be aſhamed: One houres drunkenneſſe bewrayes that, which more then ſix hundred yeares ſobriety had modeſtly concealed; he that gives himſelfe to wine is not his owne: what ſhall we think of this vice, which robs a man of himſelf, and laies a beaſt in his roome? Noahs nakedneſſe is ſeen in wine, it is no unuſuall quality, in this exceſſe to diſcloſe ſecrets; drunkenneſſe doth both make imperfections, and ſhew thoſe we have, to others eyes; ſo would God have it, that we might be double aſhamed, both of thoſe weakeneſſes which we diſcover, and of that weakneſſe which moved us to diſcover. Noah is uncovered; but in the midſt of his own Tent: It had been ſinfull, though no man had ſeen it: unknown ſins have their guilt and ſhame, and are juſtly attended with known puniſhments. Ungracious Cham ſaw it and laughed; his fathers ſhame ſhould have been his; the deformity of thoſe parts from which he had his being, ſhould have begotten in him a ſecret horror, and dejection: how many graceleſſe men make ſport at the cauſes of their humiliation? Twiſe had Noah given him life: yet neither the name of a Father, and Preſerver, nor Age, nor vertue could ſheild him from the contempt of his owne. I ſee that even Gods Arke may nouriſh Monſters: ſome filthy toads may lye under the ſtones of the Temple. God preſerves ſome men in judgement; Better had it been for Cham to have periſhed in the waters, then to live unto his Fathers curſe. Not content to be a witneſſe of this filthy ſight; he goes on to be a Proclaimer of it. Sin doth ill in the eye, but worſe in the tongue: As all ſinne is a work of darkneſſe, ſo it ſhould be buried in darkneſſe. The report of ſin is oft-times as ill, as the commiſſion; for it can never be blazoned without uncharitableneſſe; ſeldom without infection: Oh the unnaturall and more then Chammiſh impiety of thoſe ſonnes which rejoyce to publiſh the nakedneſſe of their ſpirituall Parents, even to their Enemies.

Yet it was well for Noah that Cham could tell it to none but his own; and thoſe, gracious and dutifull Sonnes. Our ſhame is the leſſe, if none know our faults but our friends. Behold, how love covereth ſinnes; theſe good Sonnes are ſo farre from going forward to ſee their Fathers ſhame, that they go backward to hide it. The cloak is laid on both their ſhoulders, they both goe back with equall paſes, and dare not ſo much as looke backe, leſt they ſhould unwillingly ſee the cauſe of their ſhame; and will rather adventure to ſtumble at their Fathers body, then to ſee his nakednes: How did it grieve them to thinke, that they which had ſo oft come to their holy Father with reverence, muſt now in reverence turne their backs upon him, and that they muſt now cloath him in pity; which had ſo often cloathed them in love! And which addes more to their duty, they covered him, and ſaid nothing. This modeſt ſorrow is their praiſe, and our example; The ſinnes of thoſe we love and honor, we muſt heare of with indignation, fearefully and unwillingly beleeve, acknowledge with griefe and ſhame, hide with honeſt excuſes, and bury in ſilence.

How equall a regard is this both of piety and diſobedience? becauſe Cham ſinned againſt his father, therfore he ſhall be plagued in his children; Japheth is dutifull to his Father, and finds it in his poſterity. Becauſe Cham was an ill Son to his Father, therefore his ſons ſhall be ſervants to his Brethren; becauſe Japheth ſet his ſhoulder to Sems, to beare the cloak of ſhame, therefore ſhall Japheth dwell in the tents of Sem, partaking with him in bleſſings as in duty. When we do but what we ought, yet God is thankfull to us; and rewards that, which we ſhould ſin if we did not: who could ever yet ſhew me a man rebelliouſly undutifull to his Parents, that hath proſpered in himſelfe, and his ſeed?

Of Babel.

HOW soon are men and sinnes multiplied? within one hundred yeares the world is as full of both, as if there had been no Deluge. Though men could not but see the fearefull monuments of the ruine of their Ancestors, yet how quickly had they forgotten a flood? Good Noah lived to see the World both populous, and wicked again; and doubtlesse oftimes repented to have been preserved of some, whom he saw to traduce the vices of the former World, to the renued. It could not but grieve him to see the destroyed Gyants revive out of his owne loines, and to see them of his flesh and bloud tyrannize over themselves. In his sight Nimrod casting off the awe of his holy Grandfather grew imperious and cruell, and made his owne kinsmen servants. How easie a thing it is for a great spirit to be the head of a faction; when even brethren will stoope to servitude. And now when men are combined together, evill and presumptious motions finde encouragement in multitudes; and each man takes a pride in seeming forwardest: we are the cheerfuller in good when we have the assistance of company: much more in sinning, by how much we are more prone to evill then good. It was a proud word; Come let us build us a City and a Tower, whose top may reach to Heaven.

They were newly come downe from the Hils unto the Plaines, and now thinke of raising up an Hill, of building in the plaine: when their tents were pitched upon the Mountaines of Armenia, they were as neere to Heaven as their Tower could make them; but their ambition must needs aspire to an height of their own raising. Pride is ever discontented, and still seeks matter of boasting in her own workes.

How fondly doe men reckon without God, Come, let us build; As if there had been no stop but in their own will: As if both earth and time had been theirs: Still doe all naturall men build Babel forecasting their owne plots so resolutely, as if there were no power to countermand them: It is just with God that peremptory determinations seldome prosper: whereas those things which are fearefully, and modestly undertaken, commonly succeed.

Let us build us a City. If they had taken God with them, it had been commendable; establishing of societies is pleasing to him that is the God of order: But a Tower whose top may reach to heaven, was a shamefull arrogance, an impious presumption. Who would think that we little Ants that creepe upon the earth, should think of climbing up to Heaven, by multiplying of Earth?

Pride ever lookes at the highest: the first man would know as God, these would dwel as God, Covetousnes and Ambition know no limits. And what if they had reacht up to Heaven? some Hils are as high as they could hope to be, and yet are no whit the better; no place alters the condition of Nature: an Angell is glorious, though he be upon earth; and Man is but earth, though he bee above the clouds: The neerer they had been to Heaven, the more subject should they have been to the violences of Heaven; to thunders, lightenings, and those other higher inflamations; what had this been, but to thrust themselves into the hands of the revenger of all wicked insolencies? God loves that Heaven should be lookt at, and affected with all humble desires, with the holy ambitions of Faith, not with the proud imaginations of our owne atchievements.

But wherefore was all this? Not that they loved so much to bee neighbours to heaven, as to bee famous upon earth; It was not commodity that was here sought, not safety, but glory: whither doth not thirst of fame carry men, whether in good or evill? It makes them seeke to climbe to heaven, It makes them not feare to runne downe headlong to hell: Even in the best things desire of praise stands in competition with conscience, and brags to have the more clients. One builds a temple to Diana, in hope of glory, intending it for one of the great wonders of the World, another in hope of fame burnes it. Hee is a rare man that hath not some Babel of his owne, whereon he bestows paines and cost, onely to be talked of. If they had done better things in a vaine-glorious purpose their act had been accursed; if they had built built houſes to God, if they had ſacrificed, prayed, lived well; the intent poyſons the action: but now both the act and the purpoſe are equally vain, and the iſſue is as vain as either.

God hath a ſpeciall indignation at pride above all ſinnes, and will croſſe our endevours, not for that they are evill (what hurt could be in laying one bricke upon another?) but for that they are proudly undertaken: He could have hindred the laying of the firſt ſtone; and might as eaſily have made a trench for the foũdation, the grave of the builders: but he loves to ſee what wicked men would do; and to let fooles run themſelves out of breath: what monument ſhould they have had of their own madneſſe, and his powerfull interruption, if the wals had riſen to no height? To ſtop them then in the midſt of their courſe, he medles not with either their hands, or their feet, but their tongues; not by pulling them out, not by looſing their ſtrings, nor by making them ſay nothing, but by teaching them to ſay too much: Here is nothing varied but the ſound of Letters; even this fruſtrates the work, and befooles the workmen: How eaſie it is for God ten thouſand wayes to correct and foreſtall the greateſt projects of men? He that taught Adam the firſt words, taught them words that never were. One cals for bricke, the other looks him in the face, and wonders what hee commands, and how and why he ſpeakes ſuch words as were never heard; and in ſtead thereof brings him morter, returning him an anſwere as little underſtood: each chides with other, expreſſing his choler, ſo as he onely can underſtand himſelfe: From heat they fall to quiet intreaties, but ſtill with the ſame ſucceſſe. At firſt every man thinks his fellow mocks him: but now perceiving this ſerious confuſion, their only anſwer was ſilence, and ceaſing; they could not come together, for no man could call them to be underſtood; and if they had aſſembled, nothing could be determined becauſe one could never attaine to the others purpoſe: No, they could not have the honor of a generall diſmiſſion, but each man leaves his Trowell and ſtation, more like a foole then he undertooke it: So commonly actions begun in glory, ſhut up in ſhame. All externall actions depend upon the tongue: No man can know anothers minde, if this be not the interpreter; hence, as there were many tongues given to ſtay the building of Babel, ſo there were as many given to build the new Jeruſalem, the Evangelicall Church. How dear hath Babel coſt all the word? At the firſt, when there was but one language, men did ſpend their time in Arts; (ſo was it requiſite at the firſt ſetling of the world) and ſo came early to perfection, but now we ſtay ſo long (of neceſſity) upon the ſhell of tongues, that wee can hardly have time to chew the ſweet kernell of knowledge: Surely men would have grown too proud, if there had been no Babel: It fals out oft-times that one ſin is a remedy of a greater. Diviſion of tongues muſt needs ſlacken any worke: Multiplicity of language had not beene given by the Holy Ghoſt, for a bleſſing to the Church, if the world had not been before poſſeſſed with multiplicity of languages for a puniſhment: Hence it is, that the building of our Sion riſes no faſter, becauſe our tongues are divided; Happy were the Church of God, if we all ſpake but one language: Whiles we differ, we can build nothing but Babel; difference of tongues cauſed their Babel to ceaſe, but it builds ours.

Of Abraham.

Gen. 12.

IT was fit that he which ſhould be the Father and pattern of the faithfull, ſhould be throughly tryed: for in a ſet copy every fault is important, and may prove a rule of error: often trials which Abraham paſſed, the laſt was the ſoreſt: No ſonne of Abraham can hope to eſcape temptations, while he ſees that boſom, in which he deſires to reſt, ſo aſſaulted with difficulties: Abraham muſt leave his Country, and kinred, and live amongſt ſtrangers; The calling of God never leaves men, where it findes them; The earth is the Lords, and all places are alike to the wiſe and faithfull: If Chaldea had not been groſſely Idolatrous Abraham had not left it; no bond muſt ty us to the danger of infection.

But

A But whither must he goe? to a place he knew not, to men that knew not him: it is enough comfort to a good man, whereſoever he is, that he is acquainted with God; we are never out of our way, while we follow the calling of God. Never any man loſt by his obedience to the Higheſt; becauſe Abraham yeelded, God gives him the poſſeſſion of Canaan: I wonder more at his faith in taking this poſſeſſion, then in leaving his owne; Behold, Abraham takes poſſeſſion for that Seed which he had not; which in nature hee was not like to have; of that Land whereof he ſhould not have one foot, wherein his Seed ſhould not be ſetled of almoſt five hundred yeeres after: The power of faith can prevent time, and make future things preſent; if we be the true ſonnes of Abraham, we have already (while wee ſojourne here on earth) the poſſeſſion of our Land of Promiſe: while we ſeek our Countrey, we have it.

Yet even Canaan doth not afford him bread, which yet hee muſt beleeve ſhall B flow with milke and honey to his Seed: ſenſe muſt yeeld to faith; woe were us, if wee muſt judge of our future eſtate by the preſent: Ægypt gives reliefe to Abraham when Canaan cannot. In outward things Gods enemies may fare better then his friends: Thriſe had Ægypt preſerved the Church of God, in Abraham, in Jacob, in Chriſt; God oft-times makes uſe of the world, for the behoofe of his; though without their thankes: as contrarily he uſes the wicked for ſcourges to his own inheritance, and burnes them; becauſe in his good they intended evill.

But what a change is this? hitherto hath Sarah been Abrahams wife, now Ægypt hath made her his ſiſter; feare hath turned him from a huſband to a brother; No ſtrength of faith can exclude ſome doubtings: God hath ſaid, I will make thee a great Nation; Abraham ſaith, the Ægyptians will kill me: He that lived by his faith, yet C ſhrinketh, and ſinneth. How vainely ſhall we hope to beleeve without all feare, and to live without infirmities? Some little aſperſions of unbeliefe cannot hinder the praiſe and power of faith; Abraham beleeved, and it was imputed to him for righteouſneſſe. He that through inconſideratnes doubted twiſe of his own life, doubted not of the life of his Seed, even from the dead and dry wombe of Sarah: yet was it more difficult that his Poſterity ſhould live in Sarah, then that Sarahs husband ſhould live in Ægypt: This was above nature, yet he beleeves it. Sometimes the beleever ſticks at eaſie trials, and yet breaks through the greateſt temptations without feare: Abraham was old ere this promiſe and hope of a ſonne; and ſtill the older, the more uncapable: yet God makes him waite twenty five yeeres for performance. No time is long to faith; which had learned to deferre hopes without fainting and D irkeſomneſſe.

Abraham heard this newes from the Angell, and laughed: Sarah heard it, and laughed: they did not more agree in their deſire, then differ in their affection: Abraham laughed for joy; Sara for diſtruſt: Abraham laughed, becauſe he beleeved it would be ſo; Sarah, becauſe ſhe beleeved it could not be ſo: the ſame act varies in the manner of doing, and the intention of the doer: Yet Sarah laught but within her ſelfe, and is bewraied: How God can finde us out in ſecret ſinnes! how eaſily did ſhe now thinke, that he which could know of her inward laughter, could know of her conception & now ſhe that laughed, and believed not, believeth and feareth. Gen. 17.

What a lively pattern doe I ſee in Abraham and Sarah, of a ſtrong Faith, and weak! of ſtrong in Abraham, and weak in Sarah: She to make God good of his word E to Abraham, knowing her own barrenneſſe, ſubſtitutes an Hagar, and in an ambition of Seed perſwades to Polygamy. Abraham had never looked to obtaine the promiſe by any other then a barren wombe, if his owne wife had not importuned him to take another: when our own apparent meanes faile, weak faith is put to the ſhifts; and projects ſtrange devices of her owne, to attaine the end. She will rather conceive by another wombe, then be childleſſe: when ſhe heares of an impoſſibility to nature, ſhe doubteth, and yet hides her diffidence, and when ſhe muſt believe, feareth, becauſe ſhe did diſtruſt: Abraham heares and believes, and expects and rejoyces; he ſaith not, I am old and weak, Sarah is old and barren; where are the many Nations that ſhall come from theſe withered loynes? It is enough to him that God hath ſaid it: he ſees not the meanes, he ſees the promiſe. He knew that God would rather raiſe him up feed from the very ſtones that be trod upon, then himſelfe ſhould want a large and happy iſſue. A

There is no faith where there is either meanes or hopes. Difficulties and impoſſibilities are the true objects of beliefe: Hereupon God addes to his name, that which he would fetch from his loynes, and made his name as ample as his poſterity: never any man was a loſer by beleeving: Faith is ever recompenced with glory.

Neither is Abraham content onely to wait for God, but to ſmart for him: God bids him cut his owne fleſh; he willingly ſacrifices this parcell of his ſkin and blood to him that was the owner of all: How glad he is to carry this painfull marke of the love of his Creator? How forward to ſeale this covenant with blood, betwixt God and him? not regarding the ſoreneſſe of his body, in compariſon of the confirmation of his ſoul. The wound was not ſo grievous as the ſignification was comfortable. For B herein he ſaw, that from his loynes ſhould come that bleſſed Seed, which ſhould purge his ſoule from all corruption. Well is that part of us loſt, which may give aſſurance of the ſalvation of the whole; our faith is not yet ſound, if it have not taught us to neglect paine for God, and more to love his Sacraments, then our own fleſh.

Of Isaac Sacrificed.

Gen. 22. 1.

BUT all theſe are but eaſie taſkes of Faith: all ages have ſtood amazed at the next; not knowing whether they ſhould more wonder at Gods command, or Abrahams obedience: Many yeeres had that good Patriarch waited for his Iſaac; now at laſt he hath joyfully received him, and that with this gracious acclamation; In Iſaac ſhall thy ſeed be called, and all Nations bleſſed. Behold, the ſon of his Age, the ſonne of his Love, the ſonne of his Expectation, he that might not endure a mock from his brother, muſt now endure the knife of his Father; Take thine only ſonne Iſaac whom thou loveſt, and get thee to the Land of Moriah, and offer him there for a burnt offering. C

Never any gold was tryed in ſo hot a fire. Who but Abraham would not have expoſtulated with God? What? Doth the God of mercies now begin to delight in bloud? Is it poſſible that Murder ſhould become Piety? Or if thou wilt needs take pleaſure in an humane ſacrifice, is there none but Iſaac fit for thine Altar, none but Abraham to offer him? Shall theſe hands deſtroy the fruits of mine owne loynes? D Can I not be faithfull unleſſe I be unnaturall? Or if I muſt needs be the monſter of all Parents, will not Iſmael yet be accepted? O God where is thy mercy; where is thy juſtice? Haſt thou given me but one only ſonne, and muſt I now ſlay him? Why did I wait ſo long for him? Why didſt thou give him me? Why didſt thou promiſe me a bleſſing in him? What will the Heathen ſay, when they ſhall heare of this infamous maſſacre? How can thy Name, and my profeſſion eſcape a perpetuall blaſphemy? With what face ſhall I looke upon my wife Sarah, whoſe ſonne I have murdered? How ſhall ſhe entertaine the Executioner of Iſaac? Or who will beleeve, that I did this from thee? How ſhall not all the World ſpet at this holy cruelty, and ſay, There goes the man that cut the throat of his own ſonne. Yet if he were an ungratious or rebellious child, his deſerts might give ſome colour to this violence: but to lay hands E on ſo deare, ſo dutifull, ſo hopefull a ſonne, is uncapable of all pretences.

But grant that thou which art the God of Nature, maiſt either alter or neglect it; what ſhall I ſay to the truth of thy promiſes? Can thy Juſtice admit contradictions? Can thy decrees be changeable? Canſt thou promiſe and diſappoint? Can theſe two ſtand together, Iſaac ſhall live to be the father of Nations, and Iſaac ſhall now dye by the hand of his Father? when Iſaac is once gone, where is my ſeed, where is my bleſſing? O God, if thy commands and purpoſes be capable of alteration, alter this bloudy ſentence, and let thy firſt word ſtand.

Theſe would have been the thoughts of a weake heart: But God knew that hee ſpake to an Abraham, and Abraham knew that he had to doe with a God: Faith had taught him not to argue, but obey. In a holy wilfulneſſe he either forgets Nature, or

deſpiſes

A despiſes her, he is ſure that what God commands, is good; that what he promiſes is infallible, and therefore is careleſſe of the meanes, and truſts to the end.

In matters of God, whoſoever conſults with fleſh and blood ſhall never offer up his Iſaac to God; there needs no counſellor when we know God is the Commander; here is neither grudging nor deliberating, nor delaying: His faith would not ſuffer him ſo much as to be ſorie for that he muſt doe. Sarah her ſelfe may not know of Gods charge, and her husbands purpoſe, leſt her affection ſhould have overcome her faith; leſt her weakneſſe now growne importunate, ſhould have ſaid, Diſobey God and dye. That which he muſt doe, he will doe; he that hath learned not to regard the life of his ſonne, had learned not to regard the ſorrow of his wife. It is too much tenderneſſe to reſpect the cenſures and conſtructions of others, when we have
B a direct word from God. The good Patriarch riſes early, and addreſſes himſelfe to his ſad journey. And now muſt he travell three whole dayes to this execution; and ſtill muſt Iſaac be in his eye, whom all this while he ſeemes to ſee bleeding upon the pile of wood which he carries; there is nothing ſo miſerable as to dwell under the expectation of a great evill: That miſery which muſt be, is mitigated with ſpeed, and aggravated with delay. All this while if Abraham had repented him, he had leiſure to returne. There is no ſmall tryall even in the very time of tryall: now when they are come within ſight of the choſen Mountaine, the ſervants are diſmiſſed; what a devotion is this that will abide no witneſſes? he will not ſuffer two of his owne Vaſſals to ſee him doe that which ſoone after all the world muſt know he hath done; yet is not Abraham afraid of that piety which the beholders could not ſee without
C horror, without reſiſtance; which no eare could heare of without abomination. What ſtranger could have endured to ſee the Father carie the knife and fire, inſtruments of that death, which he had rather ſuffer then inflict? The ſonne ſecurely carrying that burden which muſt carry him?

But if Abrahams heart could have knowne how to relent, that queſtion of his deare, innocent, and religious ſonne had melted it into compaſſion; My Father, Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the ſacrifice? I know not whether that word, My Father, did not ſtrike Abraham as deepe as the knife of Abraham could ſtrike his ſonne: yet doth he not ſo much as thinke (O miſerable man, that may not at once be a Sonne to ſuch a God, and a Father to ſuch a Sonne) Still he perſiſts, and conceales, and where he meant not, propheſies; My ſonne, God ſhall provide a Lambe for the D burnt-offering.

The heavy tidings was loath to come forth: It was a death to Abraham to ſay what he muſt doe: He knowes his owne faith to act this, he knowes not Iſaacs to endure it. But now when Iſaac hath helped to build the Altar, whereon he muſt be conſumed; he heares (not without aſtoniſhment) the ſtrange command of God, the finall will of his Father: My ſonne, thou art the Lambe which God hath provided for this burnt-offering: If my blood would have excuſed thee, how many thouſand times had I rather to give thee mine owne life, then take thine! Alas, I am full of dayes, and now of long, lived not but in thee; Thou mighteſt have preſerved the life of thy Father, and have comforted his death, but the God of us both hath choſen thee: He that gave thee unto me miraculouſly, bids me by an unuſuall meanes return thee
E unto him. I need not tell thee, that I ſacrifice all my worldly joyes, yea and my ſelfe in thee; but God muſt be obeyed; neither art thou too deare for him that calls thee: Come on my Sonne, reſtore the life that God hath given thee by me: offer thy ſelfe willingly to theſe flames; ſend up thy ſoule cheerefully unto thy glory; and know that God loves thee above others, ſince he requires thee alone to be conſecrated in ſacrifice to himſelfe.

Who cannot imagine with what perplexed mixtures of paſſions, with what changes of countenance, what doubts, what feares, what amazement, good Iſaac received this ſudden meſſage from the mouth of his Father, how he queſtioned, how he pleaded? But when he had ſomewhat digeſted his thoughts, and conſidered that the Author was God, the actor Abraham, the action a ſacrifice, he now approves himſelf the ſonne of Abraham; now he encourages the trembling hand of his Father, with whom he ſtrives in this praiſe of forwardneſſe and obedience; now he offers his hands and feet to the cords, his throat to the knife, his body to the Altar; and growing ambitious of the ſword and fire, intreats his Father to doe that which he would have done though he had diſſwaded him. O holy emulation of faith! Obleſſed agreement of the Sacrificer and Oblation: Abraham is as ready to take, as Iſaac to give; he binds thoſe deare hands which are more ſtraitly bound with the cords of duty and reſolution: he layes his ſacrifice upon the wood, which now before-hand burnt inwardly with the heavenly fire of zeale and devotion.

And now having kiſſed him his laſt, not without mutuall teares; he lifts up his hand to fetch the ſtroke of death at once, not ſo much as thinking, perhaps God will relent after the firſt wound. Now the ſtay of Abraham, the hope of the Church, lies on bleeding under the hand of a father: what bowels can chooſe but yearne at this ſpectacle? which of the ſavageſt Heathens that had bin now upon the hill of Moriah, & had ſeen (through the buſhes) the ſword of a Father hanging over the throat of ſuch a ſonne, would not have beene more perplexed in his thoughts, then that unexpected ſacrifice was in thoſe briers? yet he whom it neereſt concerned, is leaſt touched; Faith hath wrought the ſame in him, which cruelty would in others, Not to be moved. He contemns all feares, and overlookes all impoſſibilities; His heart tels him that the ſame hand which raiſed Iſaac from the dead wombe of Sarah, can raiſe him againe from the aſhes of his ſacrifice: with this confidence was the hand of Abraham now falling upon the throat of Iſaac, who had given himſelfe for dead, and rejoyced in the change; when ſuddenly the Angell of God interrupts him, forbids him, commends him.

The voyce of God was never ſo welcome, never ſo ſweet, never ſo ſeaſonable as now: It was the tryall that God intended, not the fact; Iſaac is ſacrificed, and is yet alive: and now both of them are more happy in that they would have done, then they could have been diſtreſſed if they had done it. Gods charges are oft-times harſh in the beginnings and proceeding, but in the concluſion alwayes comfortable: true ſpirituall comforts are commonly late and ſudden: God defers on purpoſe, that our tryals may be perfect, our deliverance welcome, our recompence glorious; Iſaac had never been ſo precious to his father, if he had not been recovered from death; if he had not been as miraculouſly reſtored, as given: Abraham had never been ſo bleſſed in his ſeed, if he had not neglected Iſaac for God.

The only way to finde comfort in any earthly thing, is to ſurrender it (in a faithfull careleſneſſe) into the hands of God. Abraham came to ſacrifice, he may not goe away with dry hands: God cannot abide that good purpoſes ſhould be fruſtrate. Left either he ſhould not doe that for which he came: or ſhould want meanes of ſpeedy thanksgiving for ſo gracious a diſappointment; Behold a Ram ſtands ready for the ſacrifice, and as it were, proffers himſelfe to this happy exchange. He that made that Beaſt, brings him thither, faſtens him there: Even in ſmall things there is a great providence; what myſteries there are in every act of God! the onely Sonne of God upon this very hill is laid upon the Altar of the Croſſe; and ſo becomes a true ſacrifice for the world, that yet he is raiſed without impeachment, and exempted from the power of death: The Lambe of God which takes away the ſins of the World, is here really offered, and accepted: One Saviour in two figures; in the one dying; reſtored in the other. So Abraham whiles he exerciſes his faith, confirmes it: and rejoyces more to foreſee the true Iſaac in that place offered to death for his ſinnes, then to ſee the carnall Iſaac preſerved from death for the reward of his Faith. Whatſoever is deareſt to us upon earth is our Iſaac; happy are we if we can ſacrifice it to God: thoſe ſhall never reſt with Abraham, that cannot ſacrifice with Abraham.

Of Lot and Sodom.

Before Abraham and Lot grew rich, they dwelt together; now their wealth seperates them; Their society was a greater good then their riches: Many a one is a loser by his wealth; who would account those things good which make us worse? It had been the duty of young Lot to offer rather then to choose; to yeeld rather then contend: who would not here thinke Abraham the Nephew, and Lot the Uncle? It is no disparagement for greater persons to begin treaties of Peace. Better doth it beseem every sonne of Abraham to winne with love, then to sway with power. Abraham yeelds over this right of his choise; Lot takes it. And behold, Lot is crossed in that which he chose, Abraham is blessed in that which was left him; God never suffers any man to leese by an humble remission of his right in a desire of peace.

Wealth hath made Lot not only undutifull, but covetous; hee sees the good Plaines of Jordan, the richnesse of the soyle, the commoditie of the Rivers, the situation of the Cities, and now not once inquiring into the conditions of the Inhabitants, he is in love with Sodom: Outward appearances are deceitfull guides to our judgement, or affections: they are worthy to be deceived that value things as they seeme: It is not long after that Lot payes deare for his rashnesse. He fled for quietnesse with his Uncle, and finds Warre with strangers: Now is he carried prisoner with all his substance, by great Enemies; Abraham must rescue him, of whom he was forsaken. That wealth which was the cause of his former quarrels, is made a prey to mercilesse Heathens: That place which his eye covetously chose, betrayes his life and goods. How many Christians, whiles they have looked at gaine, have lost themselves.

Yet this ill successe hath neither driven out Lot nor amended Sodom, he still loves his commodity, and the Sodomites their sinnes: wicked men grow worse with afflictions, as water growes more cold after an heat: And as they leave not sinning, so God leaves not plaguing them, but still follows them with succession of judgements. In how few yeares hath Sodom forgot she was spoiled, and led captive? If that wicked City had beene warned by the sword, it had escaped the fire; but now this visitation hath not made ten good men, in those five Cities: How fit was this heape for the fire, which was all chaffe? Only Lot vexed his righteous soule with the sight of their uncleannesse; He vexed his own soule, for who bade him stay there? yet because he was vexed, he is delivered. He escapeth their judgment from whose sinnes he escaped. Though he would be a guest of Sodom, yet because he would not entertaine their sinnes, he becomes an Host to the Angels: Even the good Angels are the executioners of Gods judgement: There cannot be a better or more noble act then to doe justice upon obstinate Malefactors.

Who can bee ashamed of that which did not mis-beseeme the very Angels of God? Where should the Angels lodge but with Lot? the Houses of holy men are full of these heavenly Spirits, when they know not; they pitch their Tents in ours, and visit us, when we see not; and when we feel not, portect us. It is the honour of Gods Saints to be attended by Angels. The filthy Sodomites now flock together, stirred up with the fury of envy, and lust, and dare require to doe that in troopes, which to act single, had been too abominable; to imagin, unnaturall: continuance & society in evil makes wicked men outrageous, and impudent: It is not enough for Lot to bee the Witnesse, but he must be the Bawd also. (Bring forth these men that we may know them.)

Behold: even the Sodomites speak modestly; though their acts and intents be villanous. What a shame is it for those which professe purity of heart, to speak filthily? The good man craves and pleads the lawes of Hospitality; and when he sees headstrong purposes of mischiefe, chooses rather to be an ill Father than an ill host: His intencion was good, but his offer was faulty; If through his allowance the Sodomites had defiled his daughters; it had been his sinne: If through violence they had defiled his guests; it had been only theirs: There can be no warrant for us to sinne, lest others ſhould ſinne: It is for God to prevent ſins with judgements, it is not for men to prevent a geater ſinne with a leſſe: the beſt minds when they are troubled, yeeld inconſiderate motions; as water that is violently ſtirred, ſends up bubbles: God meant better to Lot, then to ſuffer his weake offer to be accepted: Thoſe which are bent upon villany are more exaſperated by diſſwaſion; as ſome ſtrong ſtreames, when they are reſiſted by flood-gates, ſwell over the bankes. A

Many a one is hardned by the good word of God; and in ſtead of receiving the counſell, rages at the meſſenger: When men are grown to that paſſe, that they are no whit better by afflictions, and worſe with admonitions, God findes it time to ſtrike; Now Lots gueſts begin to ſhew themſelves Angels, and firſt deliver Lot in Sodom, then from Sodom: Firſt ſtrike them with blindneſſe, whom they will after conſume with fire: How little did the Sodomites thinke that vengeance was ſo neere them! While they went groping in the ſtreet, and curſing thoſe whom they could not find: Lot with the Angels is in ſecure light, and ſees them miſerable, and fore-ſees them burning. It is the uſe of God to blinde and beſot thoſe whom hee meanes to deſtroy: The light which they ſhall ſee ſhall be fiery, which ſhall be the beginning of an everlaſting darkneſſe, and a fire unquenchable: Now they have done ſinning & God begins to judge: Wickedneſſe hath but a time, the puniſhment of wickedneſſe is beyond all time. The reſidue of the night was both ſhort and dangerous. Yet good Lot, though ſought for by the Sodomites, and newly pull'd into his houſe by the Angels, goes forth of his houſe to ſeeke his ſonnes in law: No good man would bee ſaved alone; faith makes us charitable with neglect of all perill: He warnes them like a Prophet, and adviſes them like a Father, but both in vaine; he ſeemes to them as if he mocked, and they doe more then ſeeme to mock him againe. Why ſhould to morrow differ from other dayes? Who ever ſaw it raine fire? Or whence ſhould that brimſtone come? Or if ſuch ſhowres muſt fall, how ſhall nothing burne but this Valley? So to carnall men preaching is fooliſhneſſe, devotion idleneſſe, the Prophets mad men, Paul a babler: Theſe mens incredulity is as worthy of the fire, as the others uncleanneſſe. He that beleeves not, is condemned already. B C

The meſſengers of God doe not only haſten Lot, but pull him by a gracious violence out of that impure City. They thirſted at once after vengeance upon Sodome, and Lots ſafety; they knew God could not ſtrike Sodom, till Lot were gone out, and that Lot could not be ſafe within thoſe walls. We are naturally in Sodom: if God did not hale us out, whiles we linger, wee ſhould be condemned with the world. If God meet with a very good field, he puls up the weeds, and lets the corne grow; if indifferent, he lets the corne and weeds grow together; if very ill, he gathers the few eares of corne, and burnes the weeds. D

Oh the large bounty of God which reacheth not to us only, but to ours! God ſaves Lot for Abrahams ſake, and Zoar for Lots ſake; If Sodom had not beene too wicked, it had eſcaped: Were it not for Gods deare children, that are intermixed with the world, it could not ſtand: The wicked owe their lives unto thoſe few good, whom they hate and perſecute. Now at once the Sunne riſes upon Zoar, and fire fals downe upon Sodom: Abraham ſtands upon the hill, and ſees the Cities burning; It is fair weather with Gods children, when it is fouleſt with the wicked. Thoſe which burned with the fire of luſt, are now conſumed with the fire of vengeance: They ſinned againſt nature; and now againſt the courſe of nature, fire deſcends from Heaven, and conſumes them: Lot may not ſo much as look at the flame, whether for the ſtay of his paſſage, or the horror of the ſight, or tryall of his faith, or fear of commiſeration. Small precepts from God are of importance; obedience is as well tryed, and diſobedience as well puniſhed in little, as in much: His wife doth but turn back her head, whether in curioſity, or unbeleefe, or love and compaſſion of the place; ſhe is turned into a monument of diſobedience: what doth it availe her not to be turned into aſhes in Sodom, when ſhe is turned into a pillar of Salt in the Plaine? He that ſaved a whole City, cannot ſave his own Wife. God cannot abide ſmall ſinnes, in thoſe whom hee hath obliged. If we diſpleaſe him, God can as well meet with us out of Sodom: Lot now comne into Zoar, marvels at the ſtay of her, whom he might not before looke E

back to call; and ſoone after returning to ſeek her, beholds this change with wonder and griefe: He finds Salt inſtead of fleſh, a Pillar inſtead of a Wife: he finds Sodome conſumed, and her ſtanding; and is more amazed with this, by how much it was both more neere him, and leſſe expected.

When God dilivers us from deſtruction, he doth not ſecure us from all afflictions: Lot hath loſt his Wife, his allies, his ſubſtance, and now betakes himſelfe to an uncomfortable ſolitarineſſe.

Yet though he fled from company, he could not fly from ſin: He who could not be tainted with uncleaneſſe in Sodom, is overtaken with drunkenneſſe and inceſt in a Cave: Rather then Satan ſhall want baits, his owne daughters will prove Sodomites; Thoſe which ſhould have comforted, betrayed him: How little are ſome hearts moved with judgements? The aſhes of Sodom, and the Pillar of Salt, were not yet out of their eye, when they dare thinke of lying with their owne Father. They knew that whileſt Lot was ſober, he could not be unchaſte: Drunkennes is the way to all beſtiall affections, and acts. Wine knows no difference either of perſons, or ſins: No doubt, Lot was afterwards aſhamed of his inceſtuous Seed, and now wiſhed he had come alone out of Sodome; yet even this unnaturall bed was bleſſed with increaſe; and one of our Saviours worthy Anceſtors ſprung after from this line. Gods election is not tyed to our meanes; neither are bleſſings or curſes ever traduced; The chaſte bed of holy Parents hath oft times bred a monſtrous generation; and contrarily God hath raiſed ſometimes an holy Seed from the drunken bed of Inceſt, or Fornication. It hath been ſeene, that weighty eares of corne have growne out of the compaſſe of the tilled field: Thus will God magnifie the freedome of his own choice; and let us know that wee are not borne, but made good.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD DENNY,

BARON OF WALTHAM,

MY SINGULAR GOOD PATRON,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

Right Honorable,

I Know, and in all humility confeſſe, how weake my Diſcourſe is, and how unworthy of this Divine ſubject, which I have undertaken; which if an Angell from Heaven ſhould ſay he could ſufficiently comment upon, I ſhould diſtruſt him: Yet this let me ſay (without any vaine boaſting) that theſe thoughts (ſuch as they are) through the bleſſing of God, I have woven out of my ſelfe, as holding it (after our Saviours rule) better to give, than to receive. It is eaſier to heape together large volumes of others labours, than to worke out leſſer of our owne: and the ſuggeſtion of one new thought, is better then many repeated.

This part (which together with the Author is yours) ſhall preſent to your Lordſhip the buſieſt of all the Patriarks, together with with his tryalls, and ſucceſſe: wherein you ſhall ſee Eſau ſtripped by fraud of that which he willingly ſold, Jacobs hard adventures for the bleſſing, and no leſſe hard ſervices for his wives and ſubſtance, his dangerous encounters ending joyfully, the rape of his only daughter, ſeconded with the trecherous murder of his ſonnes; Judahs wrong to Thamar repayed by his owne uncleanneſſe; Joſephs ſaile, impriſonment, honour, piety; The ſinne of his brethren well beſtowed, well anſwered. I ſo touch at the uſes of all theſe, as one that knows it is eaſie to ſay more, and impoſſible to ſay enough. God give a bleſſing to my endeavours, and a pardon to my weakneſſe, to your Lordſhip an increaſe of his graces, and perfection of all happineſſe.

Your Lordſhips humbly and officiouſly devoted in all dutie,

Jos. Hall.

The Third Book.

Of Jacob and Esau.

OF all the Patriarkes, none made so little noyse in the World as Isaac; none lived either so privately, or so innocently: Neither know I whether hee approved himselfe a better sonne or an Husband. For the one; he gave himselfe over to the knife of his Father, and mourned three yeeres for his Mother: for the other he sought not to any handmaids bed, but in a chaste forbearance reserved himselfe for twenty yeares space, and prayed: Rebecca was so long barren, his prayers proved more effectuall then his seed. At last she conceived, as if she had been more then the daughter in law to Sarah, whose sonne was given her, not out of the power of Nature, but of her husbands Faith. Gen. 25. 22

God is oft better to us then we would: Isaac prayes for a sonne; God gives him two at once: Now, she is no lesse troubled with the strife of the children in her wombe, then before with the want of children: we know not when we are pleased; that which we desire, oft-times discontents us more in the fruition; wee are ready to complain both full and fasting. Before Rebecca conceived, she was at ease: Before spirituall regeneration there is all peace in the soule: No sooner is the new man formed in us, but the flesh conflicts with the spirit: There is no grace where is no unquietnesse: Esau alone would not have striven: Nature will ever agree with it self; Never any Rebecca conceived onely an Esau; or was so happy as to conceive none but a Jacob; She must be the mother of both, that she may have both joy and exercise. This strife began early; Every true Israelite begins his warre with his being. How many actions which we know not of, are not without presage and signification?

These two were the champions of two Nations; the field was their mothers wombe; their quarrell precedency and superiority; Esau got the right of Nature, Jacob of grace: yet that there might be some pretence of equality; lest Esau should out-run his brother into the World, Jacob holds him fast by the heele: So his hand was born before the others foot: But because Esau was some minutes the elder; that the younger might have better claime to that which God had promised, he buyes that which he could not winne: If either by ſtrife, or purchaſe, or ſuit, we can attaine ſpirituall bleſſings, we are happy: If Jacob had come forth firſt, he had not knowne how much he was bound to God for the favor of his advancement.

There was never any meat, except the forbidden fruit, ſo deare bought as this broth of Iacob; In both the receiver and the Eater was accurſed. Every true ſeed of Iſrael will be content to purchaſe ſpirituall favors with earthly; And that man hath in him too much of the blood of Eſau, which will not rather dye then forgoe his birth-right.

But what hath careleſſe Eſau loſt, if having ſold his birth-right; he may obtaine the bleſſing? Or what hath Iacob gained, if his brothers Veniſon may countervaile his Pottage? Yet thus hath old Iſaac decreed; who was not now more blind in his eyes, then in his affections: God had forewarned him that the elder ſhould ſerve the yonger, yet Iſaac goes about to bleſſe Eſau.

It was not ſo hard for Abraham to reconcile Gods promiſe and Iſaacs ſacrifice, as for Iſaac to reconcile the ſuperiority of Iacob with Eſaus benediction: for Gods hand was in that, in this none but his owne: The deareſt of Gods Saints have been ſometimes tranſported with naturall affections: He ſaw himſelfe preferred to Iſmael, though the elder; he ſaw his Father wilfully forgetting nature at Gods command, in binding him for ſacrifice; He ſaw Eſau lewdly matched with Heathens; and yet he will remember nothing, but, Eſau is my firſt borne; but how gratious is God, that when we would, will not let us ſinne: And ſo orders our actions, that we doe not what we will, but what we ought.

That God which had ordained the Lordſhip to the younger, will alſo contrive for him the bleſſing; what he will have effected, ſhall not want meanes: the Mother ſhall rather defeat the Sonne, and beguile the Father, then the Father ſhall beguile the choſen ſonne of his bleſſing. What was Jacob to Rebecca more then Eſau? or what mother doth not more affect the elder? But now God inclines the love of the Mother to the younger, againſt the cuſtome of nature; becauſe the father loves the elder, againſt the promiſe: The affections of the Parents are divided, that the promiſe might be fulfilled; Rebeccaes craft ſhall anſwer Iſaacs partiality: Iſaac would unjuſtly turne Eſau into Iacob, Rebecca doth as cunningly turne Iacob into Eſau: her deſire was good, her meanes were unlawfull: God doth oft-times effect his juſt will by our weakeneſſes; yet neither thereby juſtifying our infirmities, nor blemiſhing his owne actions.

Here was nothing but counterfeiting; a fained Perſon, a fained Name, fained Veniſon, a fained anſwer, and yet behold, a true bleſſing; but to the man, not to the meanes: Thoſe were ſo unſound, that Iacob himſelfe doth more feare their curſe then hope for their ſucceſſe. Iſaac was now both ſimple and old: yet if he had perceived the fraud, Iacob had been more ſure of a curſe, then he could be ſure that he ſhould not be perceived.

Thoſe which are plaine-hearted in themſelves, are the bittereſt enemies to deceit in others: Rebecca preſuming upon the Oracle of God, and her huſbands ſimplicity, dare be ſurety for the danger, his counſellor for the carriage of the buſineſſe, his cook for the dyet, yea, dreſſes both the meat and the man: and now puts words into his mouth, the diſh into his hand, the garments upon his backe, the Goats haire upon the open parts of his body, and ſends him in thus furniſhed for the bleſſing; ſtanding no doubt, at the doore, to ſee how well her leſſon was learned, how well her device ſucceeded. And if old Iſaac ſhould by any of his ſenſes have diſcerned the guiſe, ſhe had ſoone ſtept in and undertaken the blame, and urged him with the knowne will of God concerning Iacobs Dominion and Eſaus ſervitude, which either age or affection had made him forget.

And now ſhe wiſhes ſhe could borrow Eſaus tongue as well as his garments, that ſhe might ſecurely deceive all the ſenſes of him, which had ſuffered himſelfe more dangerouſly deceived with his affection: But this is paſt her remedy: her ſonne muſt name himſelfe Eſau with the voice of Iacob. It is hard if our tongue doe not bewray

A wray what we are, in ſpight of our habit. This was enough to work Iſaac to a ſuſpition, to an inquiry, not to an incredulity: He that is good of himſelf, will hardly beleeve evill of another; And will rather diſtruſt his owne ſenſes, then the fidelity of thoſe he truſted: All the ſenſes are ſet to examine; none ſticketh at the judgement but the Eare; to deceive that, Jacob muſt ſecond his diſſimulation with three lyes at one breath: I am Eſau, as thou badſt me, my Veniſon: one ſinne entertained fetcheth in another: and if it be forced to lodge alone, either departeth or dyeth: I love Iacobs bleſſing but I hate his lye. I would not do that wilfully, which Iacob did weakly, upon condition of a bleſſing: He that pardoned his infirmity, would curſe my obſtinateneſſe.

Good Iſaach ſets his hands to try whether his eares informed him aright; he feeles
B the hands of him whoſe voyce he ſuſpected: that honeſt heart could not thinke, that the ſkinne might more eaſily be counterfeited, then the lungs: A ſmall ſatisfaction contents thoſe whom guiltineſſe hath not made ſcrupulous: Iſaac beleeves and bleſſes the younger Sonne in the garments of the elder: If our heavenly Father ſmell upon our backes the ſavour of our elder brothers Robes, we cannot depart from him unbleſſed.

No ſooner is Jacob gone away full of the joy of his bleſſing, then Eſau, comes in, full of the hope of the bleſſing: And now he cannot repent him to have ſold that in his hunger for pottage; which in his pleaſure he ſhall buy again with Veniſon. The hopes of the wicked fail them when they are at higheſt, whereas Gods children find thoſe comforts in extremity which they durſt not expect.

C Now he comes in blowing, and ſweating for his reward, and finds nothing but a repulſe: Lewd men when they thinke they have earned of God, and come proudly to challenge favor, receive no anſwer, but, Who art thou? Both the Father and the Son wonder at each other, the one with feare, the other with griefe; Iſaac trembled and Eſau wept; the one upon conſcience, the other upon envy: Iſaacs heart now told him that he ſhould not have purpoſed the bleſſing where he did; and that it was due to him unto whom it was given, and not purpoſed, hence he durſt not reverſe that which he had done with Gods will; beſides his owne: For now he ſaw that he had done unwilling Juſtice: God will find both time and meanes to reclaime his owne, to prevent their ſins, to manifeſt and reforme their errors. Who would have looked for teares from Eſau? Or who dare truſt teares, when he ſees them fall from ſo graceleſſe Eyes?

D It was a good word, Bleſſe me alſo my Father; Every miſcreant can wiſh himſelfe wel: No man would be miſerable, if it were enough to deſire happineſſe: Why did he not rather weep to his brother for the pottage; then to Iſaac for a bleſſing? If he had not then ſold, he had not needed now to beg: It is juſt with God to deny us thoſe favours which we were careleſſe in keeping, and which we undervalued in enjoying, Eſau's teares findes no place for Iſaacs repentance; Except it were that he hath done that by wyle, which he ſhould have done upon duty.

No motive can cauſe a good heart to repent that he hath done well; How happy a thing it is to know the ſeaſons of grace, and not to neglect them! how deſperate to have known and neglected them! theſe teares were both late and falſe; the teares of E rage, of envy, of carnall deſire; worldly ſorrow cauſeth death: yet whiles Eſau howles out thus for a bleſſing, I heare him cry out of his Fathers ſtore (Haſt thou but one bleſſing, my Father?) of his brothers ſubtlety (Was he not rightly called Jacob?) I doe not heare him blame his own deſerts. He did not ſee, while his Father was deceived, and his Brother crafty, that God was juſt, and himſelfe uncapable: he knew himſelfe profane, and yet claimes a bleſſing.

Thoſe that care not to pleaſe God, yet care for the outward favours of God, and are ready to murmure if they want them, as if God were bound to them, and they free. And yet ſo merciſull is God, that he hath ſecond bleſſings for thoſe that love him not, and gives them all they care for. That one bleſſing of ſpeciall love is for none but Iſrael; but thoſe of common kindneſſe are for them that can ſell their birth-right: this bleſſing was more then Eſau could be worthy of: yet like a ſecond Cain, he reſolves to kill his brother, becauſe he was more accepted: I know not whether he were a worſe ſonne or brother; he hopes for his fathers death, and purpoſes his brothers, and vows to ſhed bloud inſtead of teares. But wicked men cannot be ſo ill as they would; that ſtrong Wreſtler againſt whom Iacob prevailed, prevailed with Eſau, and turned his wounds into kiſſes. An hoaſt of men came with Eſau, an army of Angels met Iacob: Eſau threatned, Iacob prayed: His prayers and preſents have melted the heart of Eſau into love. And now in ſtead of the grim and ſtern countenance of an executioner, Iacob ſees the face of Eſau, as the face of God. Both men and Devils are ſtinted, the ſtouteſt heart cannot ſtand out againſt God. He that can wreſtle earneſtly with God, is ſecure from the harmes of men. Thoſe minds which are exaſperated with violence, and cannot be broken with feare, yet are bowed with love; when the wayes of a man pleaſe God, he will make his enemies at peace with him.

Of Jacob and Laban.

Gen. 29.

ISAACS life was not more retyred and quiet, then Iacobs was buſie and troubleſome. In the one I ſee the image of contemplation, of action in the other. None of the Patriarks ſaw ſo evill dayes as he; from whom juſtly hath the Church of God therfore taken her name. Neither were the faithfull ever ſince called Abrahamits, but Iſraelites. That no time might be loſt, he began his ſtrife in the womb; after that, he flyes for his life from a cruell brother to a cruell uncle. With a ſtaffe goes he over Jordan alone, doubtfull and comfortleſſe, not like the ſonne of Iſaac. In the way, the earth is his bed, and a ſtone his pillow; Yet even there he ſees a viſion of Angels: Iacobs heart was never ſo full of joy, as when his head lay hardeſt. God is moſt preſent with us in our greateſt dejection, and loves to give comfort to thoſe that are forſaken of their hopes.

He came farre to finde out an hard friend; and of a Nephew becomes a Servant, No doubt when Laban heard of his ſiſters ſonne, he looked for the Camels and attendance that came to fetch his ſiſter Rebecca, not thiking that Abrahams ſervant could come better furniſhed then Iſaacs ſonne: but now when he ſaw nothing but a ſtaffe, he looks upon him, not as an Uncle, but a maſter. And while he pretends to offer him a wife as a reward of his ſervice, he craftily requires his ſervice as the dowry of his wife.

After the ſervice of an hard Apprentiſhip hath earned her whom he loved; his wife is changed, and he is in a ſort, forced to an unwilling adultery: His mother had before in a cunning diſguiſe ſubſtituted him who was the younger ſonne, for the elder; and now not long after, his father in law by a like fraud, ſubſtitutes to him the elder daughter for the younger: God comes oftentimes home to us in our own kind; and even by the ſinne of others payes us our owne, when we looke not for it. It is doubtfull whether it were a greater croſſe to marry whom he would not, or to be diſappointed of her whom he deſired. And now he muſt begin a new hope, where he made account of fruition. To raiſe up an expectation once fruſtrate, is more difficult, then to continue a long hope drawn on with likelihoods of performance: yet thus deare is Jacob content to pay for Rachel, fourteene yeares ſervitude. Commonly Gods children come not eaſily by their pleaſures: what miſeries will not love digeſt and overcome? And if Jacob were willingly conſumed with heat in the day, and froſt in the night, to become the ſonne in law to Laban, What ſhould we refuſe to be the ſonnes of God?

Rachel whom he loved, is barren: Lea which was deſpiſed, is fruitfull; How wiſely God weighes out to us our favors and croſſes in an equall ballance: ſo tempering our ſorrows that they may not oppreſſe, and our joyes that they may not tranſport us: each one hath ſome matter of envy to others, and of griefe to himſelfe.

Lea envies Rachels beauty, and love; Rachel envies Leahs fruitfulneſſe: Yet Leah would not be barren nor Rachel bleare-eyed. I ſee in Rachel the image of her Grandmother Sara; both in her beauty of perſon, in her actions, in her ſucceſſe: ſhe alſo will

A will needs ſuborne her handmaid to make her a mother; and at laſt beyond hope her ſelfe conceiveth: It is a weake greedineſſe in us to affect Gods bleſſings by unlawfull meanes; what a proofe and praiſe had it beene of her faith if ſhe had ſtayed Gods leaſure, and would rather have endured her barrennes, then her huſbands polygamy? Now ſhe ſhews her ſelfe the daughter of Laban; the Father for covetouſneſſe, the daughters for emulation have drawn ſinne into Jacobs bed: he offended in yeelding, but they more in ſoliciting him, and therefore the fact is not imputed to Jacob, but to them. In thoſe ſinnes which Satan drawes us into, the blame is ours: in thoſe which we move each other unto, the moſt fault and puniſhment lyes upon the tempter. None of the Patriarkes divided his ſeed into ſo many wombes as Jacob; none was ſo much croſſed in his ſeed.

Thus, rich in nothing but wives and children, was he now returning to his Fathers houſe, accounting his charge his wealth. But God meant him yet more good.
B Laban ſees that both his Family and his Flockes were well encreaſed by Jacobs ſervice. Not his love therefore but his gaine makes him loth to part. Even Labans covetouſneſſe is made by God the meanes to enrich Jacob.

Behold, his ſtrait maſter entreats him to that recompence, which made his nephew mighty, and himſelfe envious: God conſidering his hard ſervice, payd him wages out of Labans folds. Thoſe flocks and heards had but few ſpotted Sheepe and Goats, untill Jacobs covenant: then (as if the faſhion had been altered) they all ran into Party-colours; the moſt and beſt (as if they had been weary of their former owner) changed the colours of their young, that they might change their maſter.

In the very ſhapes and colours of brute creatures there is a divine hand, which diſpoſeth them to his owne ends. Small and unlikely meanes ſhall prevaile where God intends an effect. Little pilled ſticks of Haſell or poplar laid in the troughs, ſhall enrich Jacob with an encreaſe of his ſpotted flocks; Labans ſons might have tryed the ſame meanes & failed: God would have Laban know that he put a difference betwixt Jacob and him, that as for fourteen yeares he had multiplied Jacobs charge of cattell to Laban, ſo now for the laſt ſix yeeres he would multiply Labans flock to Jacob: and if Laban had the more, yet the better were Jacobs: Even in theſe outward things, Gods children have many times ſenſible taſtes of his favours above the wicked.

I know not whether Laban were a worſe Uncle, or Father, or Maſter: he can like D well Jacobs ſervice, not his wealth. As the wicked have no peace with God, ſo the godly have no peace with men; for if they proſper not, they are deſpiſed; if they proſper, they are envied. This Uncle, whom his ſervice had made his father, muſt now upon his wealth be fled from as an enemy, and like an enemy purſues him: If Laban had meant to have taken a peaceable leave, hee had never ſpent ſeven dayes journey in following his innocent ſonne: Jacob knew his churliſhneſſe, and therefore reſolved rather to bee unmannerly then injured: well might hee thinke, that hee, whoſe oppreſſion changed his wages ſo often in his ſtay, would alſo abridge his wages in the parting; now therefore he wiſely prefers his own eſtate to Labans love: it is not good to regard too much the unjuſt diſcontentment of worldly men, and to purchaſe unprofitable favour with too great loſſe.

Behold: Laban follows Jacob with one troope, Eſau meets him with another,
E both with hoſtile intentions: both goe on till the utmoſt point of their execution: both are prevented ere the execution. God makes fooles of the enemies of his Church, he lets them proceed, that they may be fruſtrate, and when they are gone to the utmoſt reach of their tether, he puls them backe to their taſke with ſhame: Loe now, Laban leaves Jacob with a kiſſe; Eſau meets him with a kiſſe: Of the one he hath an oath, teares of the other, peace with both: Who ſhall need to feare man that is in league with God?

But what a wonder is this? Iacob received not ſo much hurt from all his enemies, as from his beſt friend. Not one of his hairs periſhed by Laban or Eſau; yet he loſt a joynt by the Angell, and was ſent halting to his grave: He that knows our ſtrength yet will wreſtle with us for our exerciſe, and loves our violence and importunity.

O happy loſſe of Jacob! he loſt a joynt, and wonne a bleſſing: It is a favour to halt from God, yet this favour is seconded with a greater. He is blessed because he would rather halt, then leave ere he was blessed. If he had left sooner, he had not halted, but he had not prospered: That man shall goe away sound but miserable, that loves a limbe more then a blessing. Surely if Jacob had not wrestled with God hee had beene foyled with evils: how many are the troubles of the righteous!

Now long after; Rachel, the comfort of his life, dyeth. And when, but in her travell, and in his travell to his father? When hee had now before digested in his thoughts the joy and gratulation of his aged Father, for so welcome a burden. His children, (the staffe of his age) wound his soul to the death. Reuben proves incestuous, Judah adulterous, Dinah ravished, Simeon and Levi murderous, Er and Onan stricken dead, Joseph lost, Simeon imprisoned; Benjamin, the death of his Mother, the Fathers right-hand, indangered; himselfe driven by famine in his old age to die amongst the Ægyptians, a people that held it abomination to eat with him. If that Angell, with whom he strove; and who therefore strove for him, had not delivered his soule out of all adversity, he had beene supplanted with evills, and had been so farre from gaining the name of Israel, that he had lost the name of Jacob: now what sonne of Israel can hope for good dayes, when hee heares his Fathers were so evill? It is enough for us, if when we are dead, we can rest with him in the land of Promise. If the Angell of the Covenant once blesse us, no paine, no sorrows can make us miserable.

Of Dinah.

Gen. 34.

I Find but one only daughter of Jacob. Who must needs therefore be a great darling to her Father; and she so miscaries, that shee causes her Fathers griefe to be more then his love. As her mother Leah; so she hath a fault in her eyes; which was Curiosity: Shee will needs see, and be seene; and whiles she doth vainely see, shee is seene lustfully. It is not enough for us to looke to our owne thoughts, except we beware of the provocations of others: If wee once wander out of the lists that God hath set us in our callings, there is nothing but danger: Her Virginity had beene safe, if she had kept home; or if Sechem had forced her in her mothers tent, this losse of her Virginity had beene without her sinne; now she is not innocent that gave the occasion.

Her eyes were guilty of the Temptation; Only to see is an insufficient warrant to draw us in to places of spirituall hazard: If Sechem had seen her busie at home, his love had been free from out-rage, now the lightnesse of her presence gave encouragement to his inordinate desires. Immodesty of behavior makes way to lust; & gives life unto wicked hopes: yet Sechem bewrayes a good nature even in filthinesse; He loves Dinah after his sinne, and will needs marry her whom he had defiled. Commonly lust ends in loathing: Ammon abhors Thamar as much, after his act, as before, he loved her; and beat her out of doores, whom he was sicke to bring in. But Sechem would not let Dinah fare the worse for his sinne. And now he goes about to entertaine her with honest love whom the rage of his lust had dishonestly abused. Her deflouring shall be no prejudice to her, since her shame shall redound to none but him, & he will hide her dishonour with the name of an Husband. What could he now doe, but sue to his Father, to hers, to her self, to her brethren; intreating that with humble, submission, which he might have obtained by violence? Those actions which are ill begun, can hardly be salved up with late satisfactions; wheras good entrances gives strength unto the proceedings, and successe to the end.

The yong mans father doth not only consent, but solicite; and is ready to purchase a daughter either with substance, or paine: The two old men would have ended the matter peaceably; but youth commonly undertakes rashly, and performes with passion. The sons of Jacob think of nothing but reveng, and (which is worst of all) begin their cruelty with craft, and hide their craft with Religion: A smiling malice is most deadly;

A deadly; and hatred doth moſt rancle the heart, when it is kept in and diſſembled. We cannot give our ſiſter to an vncircumciſed man; here was God in the mouth, and Satan in the heart: The bloudieſt of all projects have ever wont to be coloured with Religion: becauſe the worſe any thing is, the better ſhew it deſires to make; and contrarily, the better colour is put upon any vice, the more odious it is; for as every ſimulation addes to an evill, ſo the beſt addes moſt evill: themſelves had taken the daughters and ſiſters of uncircumciſed men; yea Jacob himſelfe did ſo; why might not an uncircumciſed man obtaine their ſiſter? Or if there be a difference of giving and taking, it had been well, if it had not been only pretended. It had beene an happy Raviſhment of Dinah, that ſhould have drawne a whole Countrey into the boſome of the Church: but here was a Sacrament intended, not to the good of the ſoule, but to murder of the body. It was a hard taſke for Hamor and Sechem, not only
B to put the knife to their own foreſkins, but to perſwade a multitude to ſo painfull a condition.

The ſons of Jacob diſſemble with them, they with the people. (Shall not their flocks and ſubſtance be ours?) Common profit is pretended; whereas onely Sechems pleaſure is meant. No motive is ſo powerfull to the vulgar ſort, as the name of Commodity; The hope of this, makes them prodigall of their ſkin and blood; Not the love to the Sacrament, not the love to Sechem: ſiniſter reſpects draw more to the profeſſion of Religion, then conſcience: if it were not for the loaves and fiſhes, the train of Chriſt would be leſſe. But the Sacraments of God miſ-received, never proſper in the end. Theſe men are content to ſmart, ſo they may gaine.

And now that every man lyes ſore of his owne wound, Simeon and Levi ruſh in C armed, and wound all the males to death: Curſed be their wrath, for it was fierce, and their rage, for it was cruell. Indeed, filthineſſe ſhould not have been wrought in Iſrael: yet murder ſhould not have beene wrought by Iſrael; if they had beene fit Judges (which were but bloudy executioners) how farre doth the puniſhment exceed the fault? To puniſh above the offence, is no leſſe injuſtice, then to offend: one offendeth and all feele the revenge: yea all (though innocent) ſuffer that revenge, which he that offended, deſerved not. Sechem ſinneth, but Dinah tempted him: She that was ſo light, as to wander abroad alone, only to gaze, I feare was not over difficult to yeeld: And if having wrought her ſhame, he had driven her home with diſgrace to her Fathers tent, ſuch tyrannous luſt had juſtly called for bloud: but now he craves, and offers, and would pay deare for but leave to give ſatisfacton.

D To execute rigour upon a ſubmiſſe offender, is more mercileſſe than juſt: Or if the puniſhment had been both juſt and proportionable from another, yet from them which had vowed peace and affinity, it was ſhamefully unjuſt. To diſappoint the truſt of another, and to neglect our owne promiſe and fidelity for private purpoſes, adds faithleſneſſe unto our cruelty. That they were impotent, it was through their circumciſion: what impiety was this; inſtead of honouring an holy ſigne, to take an advantage by it? What ſhrieking was there now in the ſtreets of the City of the Hivites? And how did the beguiled Sichemits, when they ſaw the ſwords of the two brethren, die curſing the Sacrament in their hearts, which had betraied them? Even their curſes were the ſins of Simeon and Levi; whoſe fact, though it were abhorred by their Father, yet it was ſeconded by their brethen. Their ſpoile makes good the E others ſlaughter. Who would have looked to have found this outrage in the family of Jacob? How did that good Patriarke, when he ſaw Dinah come home blubbered and wringing her hands, Simeon and Levi ſprinkled with bloud, wiſh that Leah had been barren as long as Rachel! Good Parents have griefe enough (though they ſuſtaine no blame) for their childrens ſinnes: What great evills ariſe from ſmall beginnings! The idle curioſity of Dinah hath bred all this miſchiefe; Raviſhment follows upon her wandring, upon her raviſhment murder, upon the murder ſpoyle: It is holy and ſafe to be jealous of the firſt occaſions of evill, either done or ſuffered.

Of

Of Judah and Thamar.

Gen. 38.

I Finde not many of Jacobs ſonnes more faulty then Iudah; who yet is ſingled out from all the reſt to be the royall Progenitor of Chriſt; and to be honoured with the dignity of the birthright, that Gods election might not be of merit, but of grace: Elſe howſoever he might have ſped alone, Thamar had never been joyned with him in this line: Even Iudah marries a Canaanite; it is no marvell though his Seed proſper not: And yet that good children may not be too much diſcouraged with their unlawfull propagation, the Fathers of the promiſed Seed are raiſed from an inceſtuous bed: Iudah was very young, ſcarce from under the rod of his Father, yet takes no other counſell for his marriage, but from his owne eyes, which were like his ſiſter Dinahs, roving and wanton: what better iſſue could be expected from ſuch beginnings? Thoſe proud Jewes that glory ſo much of their Pedigree and Name from this Patriarke, may now chooſe whether they will have their mother a Canaanite or an Harlot: Even in theſe things oft-times the birth followes the belly. His eldeſt ſonne Er, is too wicked to live; God ſtrikes him dead ere he can leave any iſſue, not abiding any Siens to grow out of ſo bad a ſtock: notorious ſinners God reſerves to his owne vengeance. He doth not inflict ſenſible judgments upon all his enemies, leſt the wicked ſhould thinke there were no puniſhment abiding for them elſe-where. He doth inflict ſuch judgments upon ſome, leſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of evill. It were as eaſie for him to ſtrike all dead, as one: but he had rather all ſhould be warned by one, and would have his enemies find him mercifull, as well as his children, juſt: His brother Onan ſees the judgment, and yet followes his ſins. Every little thing diſcourages us from good; nothing can alter the heart that is ſet upon evill: Er was not worthy of any love; but though he were a miſcreant, yet he was a brother. Seed ſhould have been raiſed to him; Onan juſtly leeſes his life with his Seed, which he would rather ſpill, then lend to a wicked brother. Some duties we owe to humanity, more to neereneſſe of blood. Ill deſerving of others can be no excuſe for our injuſtice, for our uncharitableneſſe. That which Thamar required, Moſes afterward, as from God, commanded; the ſucceſſion of brothers into the barren bed: Some lawes God ſpake to his Church, long ere he wrote them: while the Author is certainly known, the voyce and the finger of God are worthy of equall reſpect. Iudah hath loſt two ſonnes, and now doth but promiſe the third, whom he ſinnes in not giving. It is the weakeneſſe of nature, rather to hazard a ſinne then a danger; and to neglect our own duty, for wrongfull ſuſpition of others: though he had loſt his ſonne in giving him, yet hee ſhould have given him: A faithfull mans promiſe is his debt, which no fear of damage can diſpenſe with.

But whereupon was this ſlackneſſe? Iudah feared that ſome unhappineſſe in the bed of Thamar was the cauſe of his ſonnes miſcariage; whereas it was their fault, that Thamar was both a widow and childleſſe. Thoſe that are but the patients of evill, are many times burdened with ſuſpitions; and therefore are ill thought of, becauſe they fare ill: Afflictions would not be ſo heavy, if they did not lay us open unto uncharitable conceits.

What difference God puts betwixt ſinnes of wilfulneſſe, and infirmitie? The ſons pollution is puniſhed with preſent death, the fathers inceſt is pardoned, and in a ſort proſpereth.

Now Thamar ſeekes by ſubtlety, that which ſhe could not have by award of juſtice: the neglect of due retributions drives men to indirect courſes; neither know I whether they ſin more in righting themſelves wrongfully, or the other in not righting them: She therefore takes upon her the habit of an harlot, that ſhe might performe the act: If ſhe had not wiſhed to ſeeme an Whore, ſhe had not worn that attire, nor choſen that place. Immodeſty of outward faſhion or geſture bewrayes evill deſires: the heart that meanes well, will never wiſh to ſeeme ill; for commonly we affect to ſhew better then we are. Many harlots will put on the ſemblances of chaſtity,

A chastity, of modesty, never the contrary. It is no trusting those, which doe not wish to appeare good. Judah esteemes her by her habit: and now the sight of an harlot hath stird up in him a thought of lust; Satan findes well, that a fit object is halfe a victory.

Who would not be ashamed to see a sonne of Iacob thus transported with filthy affections? At the first sight he is inflamed; neither yet did he see the face of her, whom he lusted after: it was enough motive to him that she was a woman; neither could the presence of his neighbor, the Adullamite, compose those wicked thoughts, or hinder his unchaste acts.

That sinne must needs be impudent which can abide a witnesse: yea so hath his lust besotted him, that he cannot discerne the voyce of Thamar, that he cannot foresee the danger of his shame in parting with such pledges. There is no passion, which
B doth not for the time bereave a man of himselfe: Thamar had learned not to trust him without a pawne; He had promised his sonne to her as a daughter, and failed; now he promised a Kid to her, as an Harlot, and performeth it: Whether his pledge constrained him or the power of his word, I inquire not: Many are faithfull in all things save those which are the greatest, and dearest; If his credit had been as much indangered in the former promise he had kept it: now hath Thamar requited him. She expected long the enjoying of his promised sonne, and he performed not: but here he performes the promise of the Kid, and she stayes not to expect it. Iudah is sorry that he cannot pay the hire of his lust, and now feareth lest he shall be beaten with his own staffe, lest his signet shall be used to confirme, and seale his reproach;
C resolving not to know them; and wishing they were unknown of others. Shame is the easiest wages of sin, and the surest, which ever begins first in our selves. Nature is not more forward to commit sinne, then willing to hide it.

I heare as yet of no remorse in Iudah, but feare of shame. Three moneths hath his sinne slept, and now when he is securest, it awakes and baits him. News is brought him that Thamar begins to swell with her conception, and now he swels with rage, and cals her forth to the flame like a rigorous Judge, without so much as staying for the time of her deliverance, that his cruelty in this Justice, should be no lesse ill, then the unjustice of ocasioning it. If Iudah had not forgotten his sinne, his pitty had been more then his hatred to this of his daughters: How easie is it to detest those sinnes in others, which we flatter in our selves! Thamar doth not deny the sinne, nor D refuse punishment, but cals for that partner in her punishment, which was her partner in the sinne: the staffe, the signet, the handkerchife accuse and convince Iudah, and now he blushes at his owne sentence, much more at his act, and cries out, She is more righteous then I. God will finde a time to bring his children upon their knees, and to wring from them penitent confessions: And rather then hee will not have them soundly ashamed, he will make them the trumpets of their own reproach.

Yet doth he not offer himselfe to the flame with her, but rather excuses her by himselfe. This relenting in his own case, shamed his former zeale: Even in the best men nature is partiall to it selfe: It is good so to sentence others frailties, that yet we remember our owne, whether those that have been, or may be: with what shame, yea with what horror must Iudah needs looke upon the great belly of Thamar, and on her two sonnes, the monuments of his filthinesse?

How must it needs wound his soule, to heare them call him both Father and Grandfather; to call her mother and sister? If this had not cost him many a sigh, hee had no more escaped his Fathers curse, then Ruben did: I see the difference not of E sinnes, but of men: Remission goes not by the measure of the sinne, but the quality of the sinner; yea rather the mercy of the Forgiver: Blessed is the man (not that sinnes not, but) to whom the Lord imputes not his sinne.

Of

Of Joseph.

I Marvel not that Ioseph had the double portion of Iacobs land, who had more then two parts of his sorrowes: None of his sonnes did so truly inherit his afflictions; none of them was either so miserable, or so great: suffering is the way to glory: I see in him not a cleerer type of Christ, then of every Christian; Because we are deare to our Father, and complaine of sinnes, therefore are we hated of our carnall brethren: If Ioseph had not medled with his brothers faults, yet he had been envied for his Fathers affection; but now malice is met with envy: There is nothing more thankleſſe or dangerous then to ſtand in the way of a reſolute ſinner. That which doth correct and oblige the penitent makes the wilfull minde furious and revengefull.

All the ſpight of his brethren cannot make Ioſeph caſt off the livery of his Fathers love: what need we care for the cenſures of men, if our hearts can tell us that we are in favour with God?

But what meant young Ioſeph to adde unto his owne envy, by reporting his dreames? The concealement of our hopes or abilities, hath not more modeſty then ſafety: He that was envied for his dearneſſe, and hated for his intelligence, was both envied and hated for his dreames. Surely God meant to make the relation of theſe dreames, a meanes to effect that which the dreames imported. We men work by likely meanes; God by contraries. The main quarrell was, Behold, this dreamer commeth. Had it not been for his dreames, he had not been ſold: if he had not been ſold, he had not been exalted. So Ioſephs ſtate had not deſerved envy, if his dreames had not cauſed him to be envied. Full little did Ioſeph thinke, when he went to ſeeke his brethren, that this was the laſt time he ſhould ſee his fathers houſe: Full little did his brethren think, when they ſold him naked to the Iſmaelites, to have once ſeene him in the Throne of Ægypt. Gods decree runnes on; and while we either thinke not of it, or oppoſe it, is performed.

In an honeſt and obedient ſimplicitiy, Ioſeph comes to enquire of his brethrens health, and now may not returne to carry newes of his owne miſery: whiles he thinkes of their welfare, they are plotting his deſtruction; Come, let us ſlay him. Who would have expected this cruelty in them, which ſhould be the fathers of Gods Church? It was thought a favor, that Reubens entreaty obtained for him, that he might be caſt into the pit alive, to dye there. He lookt for brethren, and behold, murtherers; Every mans tongue, every mans fiſt was bent againſt him: Each one ſtrives who ſhall lay the firſt hand upon that changeable coat which was dyed with their Fathers love and their envy: And now they have ſtripped him naked, and haling him by both armes, as it were, caſt him alive into his grave. So in pretence of forbearance, they reſolve to torment him with a lingring death: the ſavageſt robbers could not have been more mercileſſe: for now beſides (what in them lyes) they kill their Father in their brother. Nature, if it once degenerate, growes more monſtrous and extreme, then a diſpoſition borne to cruelty.

All this while Ioſeph wanted neither words nor teares; but like a paſſionate ſuppliant (bowing his bare knees to them whom he dreamed ſhould bow to him) intreates and perſwades by the deare name of their brotherhood, by their profeſſion of one common God, for their Fathers ſake, for their owne ſoules ſake, not to ſinne againſt his blood. But envy hath ſhut out mercy; and makes them not only forget themſelves to be brethren, but men. What ſtranger can thinke of poore innocent Ioſeph, crying naked in that deſolate and dry pit (only ſaving that he moyſtned it with teares) and not be moved? Yet his hard-hearted brethren ſit them downe careleſly, with the noiſe of his lamentation in their eares, to eat bread, not once thinking by their owne hunger, what it was for Ioſeph to be affamiſht to death.

Whatſoever they thought, God never meant that Ioſeph ſhould periſh in that pit; and therefore he ſends very Iſmaelites to ranſome him from his Brethren; the ſeed of him that perſecuted his brother Iſaac, ſhall now redeeme Ioſeph from his brethrens brethrens persecution. When they came to fetch him out of the pit, he now hoped for a speedy dispatch; That since they seemed not to have so much mercy, as to prolong his life, they would not continue so much cruelty, as to prolong his death.

And now, when hee hath comforted himselfe with hope of the favor of dying, behold, death exchanged for bondage: how much is servitude, to an ingenuous nature, worse then death? For, this is common to all; that, to none but the miserable: Iudah meant this well, but God better: Reuben saved him from the sword, Iudah from affamishing: God will ever raise up some secret favourers to his own, amongst those that are most malicious. How well was this favor bestowed? If Ioseph had dyed for hunger in the pit, both Iacob and Iudah, and all his brethren had dyed for hunger in Canaan. Little did the Ismaelitish Merchants know what a treasure they
B bought, carried and sold; more precious then all their Balmes and Myrrhs. Little did they thinke that they had in their hands the Lord of Ægypt, the Jewell of the World. Why should we contemne any mans meanneſſe, when we know not his destiny?

One sinne is commonly used for the vaile of another: Iosephs coat is sent home dipped in bloud, that whiles they should hide their owne cruelty, they might afflict their Father, no lesse then their brother. They have devised this reall lye, to punish their old Father, for his love, with so grievous a monument of his sorrow.

Hee that is mourned for in Canaan, as dead, prospers in Ægypt under Potiphar; and of a Slave, is made Ruler: Thus God meant to prepare him for a greater charge; he must first rule Potiphars House, then Pharaohs Kingdome: his owne service is his least
C good, for his very presence procures a common blessing: A whole Family shall fare the better for one Ioseph. Vertue is not looke upon alike with all eyes: his fellowes praise him, his Master trusts him, his Mistresse affects him too much. All the spight of his brethren was not so great a crosse to him, as the inordinate affection of his Mistresse. Temptations on the right hand, are now more perillous, and hard to resist, by how much they are more plausible and glorious; But the heart that is bent upon God knows how to walke steddily, and indifferently betwixt the pleasures of sinne, and feares of evill. He saw this pleasure would advance him: He knew what is was to bee a Minion of one of the greatest Ladies in Ægypt; yet resolves to contemne; A good heart will rather lye in the dust, then rise by wickednesse. How shall I doe this, and sinne against God?

D Hee knew that all the honors of Ægypt could not buy off the guilt of one sin, and therefore abhors not onely her bed, but her company: He that will be safe from the acts of evill, must wisely avoid the occasions. As sinne ends ever in shame, when it is committed, so it makes us past shame, that we may commit it; The impudent strumpet dare not onely solicite, but importune, and in a sort force the modesty of her good servant; She layes hold on his garment; her hand seconds her tongue.

Good Ioseph found it now time to flee, when such an enemy pursued him: how much had he rather leave his cloake, then his vertue! and to suffer his Mistresse to spoyle him of his livery, rather then he should blemish her honor, or his Masters in her, or God in either of them.

This second time is Ioseph stript of his garment; before in the violence of envy,
E now of lust; before of necessity, now of choice: Before, to deceive his Father, now his Master: for behold, the pledge of his fidelity, which he left in those wicked hands, is made an evidence against him, of that which he refused to doe; therefore did he leave his cloak because he would not doe that, of which he is accused and condemned, because he left it: what safety is there against great Adversaries, when, even arguments of innocence are used to convince of evill? Lust yeelded unto, is a pleasant madnesse, but is a desperat madnesse when it is opposed: No hatred burnes so furiously, as that which arises from the quenched coales of love.

Malice is witty to devise accusations of others out of their vertue, and our owne guiltinesse: Ioseph either pleads not, or is not heard.

Doubtlesse he denied the fact, but he dare not accuse the offender: There is not only the praise of patience, but oft-times of wisedome, even in unjust sufferings:

He

He knew that God would finde a time to cleare his innocence, and to regard his chaſte faithfulneſſe. A

No priſon would ſerve him, but Pharaohs. Joſeph had lyen obſcure and not been knowne to Pharaoh, if he had not been caſt into Pharaohs dungeon: the afflictions of Gods children turn ever to their advantages. No ſooner is Joſeph a priſoner, then a Guardian of the priſoners. Truſt and honor accompany him whereſoever he is. In his fathers houſe, in Potiphars, in the Jayle, in the Court: ſtill he hath both favor and rule.

So long as God is with him, he cannot but ſhine in ſpight of men: The wals of that dungeon cannot hide his vertues, the iron cannot bold them. Pharaohs Officers are ſent to witneſſe his graces, which he may not come forth to ſhew: the Cupbearer admires him in the Jayle, but forgets him in the Court. How eaſily doth our owne B proſperity make us either forget the deſervings, or miſeries of others! But as God cannot neglect his owne, ſo leaſt of all in their ſorrowes. After two yeares more of Joſephs patience; that God which cauſed him to be lifted out of the former pit to be ſold, now cals him out of the dungeon to honor. He now puts a dream into the head of Pharaoh. He puts the remembrance of Joſephs ſkill into the head of the Cupbearer; who to pleaſure Pharaoh, not to requite Joſeph, commends the Priſoner, for an Interpreter: He puts an interpretation in the mouth of Joſeph: he puts this choice into the heart of Pharaoh, of a miſerable priſoner, to make him the Ruler of Ægypt. Behold: one houre hath changed his fetters into a chain of gold, his rags into fine linnen, his ſtocks into a Chariot, his Jayle into a Palace, Potiphars captive into his Maſters Lord, the noyſe of his chaines into Abrech. He whoſe chaſtity refuſed the wanton allurements of the Wife of Potiphar, had now given him to his Wife the daughter of Potipherah. Humility goes before honour; Serving and Suffering are the beſt Tutors to Government. How well are Gods children paid for their patience! How happy are the iſſues of the faithfull! Never any man repented him of the advancement of a good man. C

Pharaoh hath not more preferd Joſeph, then Joſeph hath enriched Pharaoh; If Joſeph had not ruled, Ægypt and all the bordering Nations had periſhed. The providence of ſo faithfull an Officer hath both given the Ægyptians their lives; and the money, cattell, lands, bodies of the Ægyptians to Pharaoh. Both have reaſon to be well pleaſed. The ſubjects owe to him their lives; the King his Subjects, and his Dominions: the bounty of God made Ioſeph able to give more then he received. It is like the ſeven yeares of plenty were not confined to Ægypt; other Countries adjoyning were no leſſe fruitfull: yet in the ſeven yeares of famine, Ægypt had corne when they wanted. D

See the difference betwixt a wiſe prudent frugality, and a vaine ignorant expence of the benefits of God: The ſparing hand is both full and beneficiall, whereas the laviſh is not onely empty, but injurious.

Good Iacob is pinched with the common famine. No piety can exempt us from the evils of neighbourhood. No man can tell by outward event, which is the Patriarke, and which the Canaanite.

Neither doth his profeſſion leade him to the hope of a miraculous preſervation. It is a vaine tempting of God, to caſt our ſelves upon an immediate proviſion, with neglect of common meanes: His tenne ſonnes muſt now leave their flocks, and goe downe into Ægypt, to be their Fathers purveyours. And now they go to buy of him whom they had ſold; and bow their knees to him for his reliefe, which had bowed to them before for his owne life. His age, his habite, the place, the language, kept Ioſeph from their knowledge; neither had they called off their minds from their folds, to enquire of matters of forraine State, or to heare that an Hebrew was advanced to the higheſt honor of Ægypt. But he cannot but know them, whom he left at their full growth, whoſe tongue, and habit, and number were all one: whoſe faces had left ſo deepe an impreſſion in his minde, at their unkinde parting: It is wiſedome ſometime to conceale our knowlegde, that we may not prejudice truth. E

He that was hated of his brethren, for being his Fathers ſpye; now accuſes his brethren

A brethren for common ſpies of the weakneſſe of Egypt; he could not without their ſuſpicion have come to a perfit intelligence of his Fathers eſtate, and theirs, if he had not objected to them that which was not. We are alwayes bound to goe the neareſt way to truth. It is more ſafe in caſes of inquiſition, to fetch farre about; that he might ſeeme enough an Ægyptian, he ſweares heathenifhly: how little could they ſuſpect, this Oath could proceed from the ſonne of him, which ſwore by the feare of his Father Iſaac? How oft have ſiniſter reſpects drawne weake goodneſſe to diſguiſe it ſelf even with ſinnes?

It was no ſmall joy to Ioſeph, to ſee this late accompliſhment of his ancient dreame; to ſee the ſuppliants (I know not whether more brethren, or enemies) groveling before him in an unknowne ſubmiſſion: and now it doth him good to ſeeme mercileſſe B to them, whom he had found wilfully cruell; to hide his love from them which had ſhewed their hate to him; and to think how much he favoureth them, & how little they knew it: And as ſporting himſelfe in their ſeeming miſery, he pleaſantly imitates all thoſe actions reciprocally unto them, which they in deſpight & earneſt had done formerly to him, he ſpeakes roughly, rejects their perſwaſions, puts them in hold, and one of them in bonds. The minde muſt not alwayes be judged by the outward face of the actions. Gods countenance is oft-times as ſevere, and his hand as heavy to them whom he beſt loveth. Many a one, under the habit of an Ægyptian, hath the heart of an Iſraelite. No ſong could be ſo delightfull to him, as to heare them in a late remorſe condemne themſelves before him, of their old cruelty towards him, who was now their unknowne witneſſe and Judge.

C Nothing doth ſo powerfully call home the conſcience, as affliction, neither need there any other art of memory for ſinne, beſides miſery. They had heard Ioſephs deprecation of their evill with teares, & had not pittied him; yet Ioſeph doth but heare their mention of this evill which they had done againſt him, and pitties them with teares; he weeps for joy to ſee their repentance, and to compare his ſafety and happineſſe with the cruelty which they intended, and did, and thought they had done.

Yet he can abide to ſee his brother his priſoner; whom no bonds could bind ſo ſtrong, as his affection bound him to his captive: Simeon is left in pawne, in fetters; the reſt returne, with their corne, with their mony, paying nothing for their proviſion, but their labour; that they might be as much troubled with the beneficence of that ſtrange Ægyptian Lord, as before with his imperious ſuſpition. Their wealth was D now more irkeſome to them, then their need: and they feare, God meanes to puniſh them more in this ſuperfluity of money then in the want of victuals (What is this that God hath done to us?) It is a wiſe courſe to be jealous of our gaine; and more to feare, then deſire abundance.

Old Iacob that was not uſed to ſimple and abſolute contentments, receives the bleſſing of ſeaſonable proviſion, together with the affliction of that heavy meſſage, the loſſe of one ſonne, and the danger of another; and knows not whether it be better for him to dye with hunger, or with griefe, for the departure of that ſonne of his right hand: He drives off all till the laſt; Protraction is a kinde of eaſe in evils that muſt come.

At length (as no plea is ſo importunate, as that of famine) Benjamin muſt goe; one E evill muſt be hazarded for the redreſſe of another; What would it availe him, to ſee whom he loved, miſerable? How injurious were that affection to keepe his ſon ſo long in his eye, till they ſhould ſee each other dye for hunger!

The ten brothers returne into Ægypt loaded with double mony in their ſacks, & a preſent in their hands; the danger of miſtaking is requited, by honeſt minds, with more then reſtitution. It is not enough to finde our owne hearts cleare in ſuſpicious actions except we ſatisfie others: Now hath Ioſeph what he would, the ſight and preſence of his Benjamin, whom he therefore borrowes of his Father for a time, that he might returne him with a greater intereſt of joy: And now he feaſts them whom he formerly threatned, and turnes their feare into wonder: all unequall love is not partiall; all the brethren are entertained bountifully, but Benjamin hath a five-fold portion: By how much his welcome was greater, by ſo much his pretended theft seemed more haynous; for good turnes aggravate unkindnesses, and our offences are encreased with our obligations. How easie is it to finde advantages where there is a purpose to accuse! Benjamins sack makes him guilty of that whereof his heart was free; Crimes seeme strange to the innocent; well might they abjure this fact, with the offer of bondage & death: For they which carefully brought againe that which they might have taken, would never take that which was not given them. But thus Ioseph would yet dally with his brethren, and make Benjamin a thiefe, that he might make him a servant, & fright his brethren with the peril of that their charge, that he might double their joy, and amazednesse, in giving them two brothers at once: our happinesse is greater, and sweeter, when we have well feared, and smarted with evills. A

But now when Iudah seriously reported the danger of his old Father, and the sadnesse of his last complaint, compassion and joy will be concealed no longer, but breake forth violently at his voyce and eyes. Many passions doe not well abide witnesses, because they are guilty to their owne weaknesse. Ioseph sends forth his servants, that he might freely weepe. He knew he could not say, I am Ioseph, without an unbeseeming vehemence. B

Never any word sounded so strangely as this, in the eares of the Patriarks. Wonder, doubt, reverence, joy, feare, hope, guiltinesse, strucke them at once. It was time for Ioseph to say, Feare not; No marvell if they stood with paleness and silence before him; looking on him, and on each other: the more they considered, they wondred more; and the more they beleeved, the more they feared: For those words (I am Ioseph) seemed to sound thus much to their guilty thoughts; You are murtherers: and I am a Prince in spight of you: My power and this place, give me all opportunities of revenge; My glory is your shame, my life your danger, your sinne lives together with me. But now the teares and gracious words of Ioseph have soone assured them of pardon and love, and have bidden them turne their eyes from their sinne against their brother, to their happinesse in him, and have changed their doubts into hopes & joyes; causing them to look upon him without feare, though not without shame. His loving embracements cleare their hearts of all jealousies, and hasten to put new thoughts into them of favour, and of greatnesse: So that now forgetting what evill they did to their brother, they are thinking of what good their brother may doe to them. Actions salved up with a free forgivenesse, are as not done: and as a bone once broken, is stronger after well setting, so is love after reconcilement. C

But as wounds once healed, leave a scarre behind them, so remitted injuries leave commonly in the actors a guilty remembrance; which hindred these brethren from that freedom of joy, which else they had conceived: This was their fault, not Iosephs: who strives to give them all security of his love; and will be as bountifull, as they were cruell. They send him naked to strangers, he sends them in new and rich liveries to their Father; they tooke a small summe of money for him, he gives them great treasures; They sent his torne coat to his father; He sends variety of costly rayments to his Father, by them. They sold him to be the load of Camels; He sends them home with Chariots. It must be a great favour that can appease the conscience of a great injury. Now they returne home rich and joyfull, making themselves happy to thinke how glad they should make their Father with this newes. D

That good old man would never have hoped that Ægypt could have afforded such provision as this: Joseph is yet alive: This was not food, but life to him. The returne of Benjamin was comfortable: but that his dead sonne was yet alive after so many yeares lamentation, was tidings too happy to be beleeved, and was enough to endanger that life with excesse of joy, which the knowledge thereof doubled. Over-excellent objects are dangerous in their sudden apprehensions. One graine of that joy would have safely cheared him, whereof a full measure over-layes his heart with too much sweetnesse. There is no earthly pleasure whereof we may not surfet: of the spirituall we can never have enough. E

Yet his eyes revive his minde, which his eares had thus astonished. When he saw the Chariots of his sonne, he beleeved Iosephs life, and refreshed his owne. He had too much before, so that he could not enjoy it: now he saith, I have enough, Joseph my sonne is yet alive.

They

A They told him of his honour, he ſpeakes of his life: life is better then honour. To have heard that Ioſeph lived a ſervant, would have joyed him more, then to heare that he dyed honourably. The greater bleſſing obſcures the leſſe. He is not worthy of honour, that is not thankfull for life.

Yet Ioſephs life did not content Iacob without his preſence: (I will goe downe and ſee him ere I dye:) The ſight of the eye is better then to walke in deſires; Good things pleaſure us not in their being, but in our enjoying.

The height of all earthly contentment appeared in the meeting of theſe two; whom their mutuall loſſe had more endeared to each other: The intermiſſion of comforts hath this advantage, that it ſweetens our delight more in the returne, then was abated in the forbearance. God doth oft-times hide away our Ioſeph for a time, B that we may be more joyous and thankfull in his recovery: This was the ſincereſt pleaſure that ever Iacob had, which therefore God reſerved for his age.

And if the meeting of earthly friends be ſo unſpeakably comfortable; how happy ſhall we be in the light of the glorious face of God our heavenly Father! of that our bleſſed Redeemer whom we ſold to death by our ſinnes! and which now after that noble Triumph hath all power given him in Heaven and Earth.

Thus did Iacob rejoyce when he was to goe out of the Land of Promiſe, to a forraine Nation, for Ioſephs ſake; being glad that he ſhould loſe his Countrey, for his ſonne. What ſhall our joy be, who muſt goe out of this forraine Land of our Pilgrimage, to the home of our glorious inheritance, to dwell with none but our owne; in that better and more lightſome Goſhen, free from all the incumbrances of this Æ- C gypt, and full of all the riches and delights of God? The guilty conſcience can never thinke it ſelfe ſafe: So many yeares experience of Ioſephs love could not ſecure his brethren of remiſſion: thoſe that know they have deſerved ill, are wont to miſ-interpret favours, and thinke they cannot be beloved: All that while his goodneſſe ſeemed but concealed and ſleeping malice; which they feared in their Fathers laſt ſleepe would awake, and bewray it ſelfe in revenge: Still therefore they plead the name of their Father, though dead, not daring to uſe their owne: Good meanings cannot be more wronged then with ſuſpition: It grieves Ioſeph to ſee their feare, and to finde they had not forgotten their owne ſinne, and to heare them ſo paſſionately crave that which they had.

(Forgive the treſpaſſe of the ſervants of thy Fathers God:) What a conjuration of D pardon was this? What wound could be either ſo deep, or ſo feſtred, as this plaſter could not cure? They ſay not, the ſonnes of thy Father, for they knew Iacob was dead, and they had degenerated; but the ſervants of thy Fathers God: How much ſtronger are the bonds of Religion then of Nature? If Ioſeph had beene rancorous, this deprecation had charmed him; but now it reſolves him into teares: They are not ſo ready to acknowledge their old offence, as he to proteſt his love; and if hee chide them for any thing, it is for that they thought they needed to intreat; ſince they might know, it could not ſtand with the fellow-ſervant of their Fathers God to harbour maliciouſneſſe, to purpoſe revenge. Am not I under God? And fully to ſecure them; he turnes their eyes from themſelves to the Decree of God, from the action to the event; as one that would have them thinke, there was no cauſe to repent of E that which proved ſo ſucceſſefull.

Even late confeſſion finds forgiveneſſe; Ioſeph had long agoe ſeene their ſorrow, never but now heard he their humble acknowledgement; Mercy ſtayes not for outward ſolemnities. How much more ſhall that infinite Goodneſſe pardon our ſinnes, when he findes the truth of our repentance?

TO

THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE IAMES LORD HAY,

ALL GRACE AND HAPPINESSE.

Right Honourable,

ALL that I can say for my selfe, is a desire of doing good; which if it were as fervent in richer hearts, the Church which now we see comely, would then be glorious: this honest ambition hath carried me to neglect the feare of seeming prodigall of my little; and while I see others Talents rusting in the earth, hath drawne me to traffique with mine in publike. I hope, no adventure that ever I made of this kinde, shall bee equally gainefull to this my present labour, wherein I take Gods owne History for the ground, and worke upon it by what Meditations my weakenesse can afford: The divinenesse of this subject shall make more then amends for the manifold defects of my discourse; although also the blame of an imperfection is so much the more, when it lighteth upon so high a choice. This part which I offer to your Lordship, shall shew you Pharaoh impotently envious and cruell, the Israelites of friends become slaves, punished onely for prospering; Moses in the Weeds, in the Court, in the Desart, in the Hill of Visions; a Courtier in Ægypt, a Shepheard in Midian, an Ambassador from God, a Leader of Gods people: and when you you ſee prodigious variety of the plagues of Ægypt, you ſhall not know whether more to wonder at the miracles of Moſes, or Pharaohs obſtinacy. Finally, you ſhall ſee the ſame Waves made both a wall and a gulfe in one houre; the Ægyptians drowned, where no Iſraelite was wet-ſhod: and if theſe paſſages yeeld not abundance of profitable thoughts, impute it (not without pardon) to the poverty of my weake conceit; which yet may perhaps occaſion better unto others. In all humble ſubmiſſion I commend them (what they are) to your Lordſhips favourable acceptation, and your ſelfe with them to the gracious bleſſing of our God.

Your Lordſhips in all dutifull obſervance at command,

Jos. Hall.

The Fourth Booke.

The affliction of Iſrael.

Egypt was long an harbour to the Iſraelites; now it proves a Jayle: the Poſterity of Iacob finds too late, what it was for their forefathers to ſell Ioſeph, a ſlave into Ægypt. Thoſe whom the Ægyptians honoured before as Lords, now they contemne as drudges: One Pharaoh advances, whom another labours to depreſſe: Not ſeldome the ſame man changes copies: but if favours out-live one age, they prove decrepit and heartleſſe: It is a rare thing to find poſterity heires of their fathers love: How ſhould mens favour be but like themſelves, variable and inconſtant? there is no cer-
D tainty but in the favour of God, in whom can be no change; whoſe love is intayled upon a thouſand generations.

Yet if the Iſraelites had beene trecherous to Pharaoh, if diſobedient, this great change of countenance had beene juſt; now the only offence of Iſrael, is, that he proſpereth; that which ſhould be the motive of their gratulation, and friendſhip, is the cauſe of their malice. There is no more hatefull ſight to a wicked man, then the proſperity of the conſcionable; None but the ſpirit of that true Harbinger of Chriſt, can teach us to ſay with contentment, He muſt encreaſe, but I muſt decreaſe.

And what if Iſrael be mighty and rich? (If there be warre, they may joyne with our enemies and get them out of the Land.) Behold they are afraid to part with thoſe whom they are grieved to entertaine: either ſtaying, or going is offence enough, to E thoſe that ſeek quarrels; There were no warres, and yet they ſay, If there be warres. The Iſraelites had never given cauſe of feare to revolt, and yet they ſay, Leſt they joyne to our enemies, to thoſe enemies which we may have; So they make their certaine friends ſlaves, for feare of uncertaine enemies. Wickedneſſe is ever cowardly, and full of unjuſt ſuſpicions; it makes a man feare, where no feare is; flye, when none purſues him. What differerence there is betwixt David and Pharaoh! The faith of the one ſayes, I will not be afraid for ten thouſand that ſhould beſet me; The feare of the other ſaies, Leſt if there be warre, they joyne with our enemies; therefore ſhould he have made much of the Iſraelites, that they might be his; his favour might have made them firme; Why might they not as well draw their ſwords for him?

Weak and baſe minds ever incline to the worſe; and ſeeke ſafety, rather in an impoſſibility of hurt, then in the likelihood of juſt advantage. Favours had bin more binding binding then cruelties: yet the fooliſh Ægyptian had rather have impotent ſervants, then able friends. For their welfare alone, Pharaoh owes Iſrael a miſchiefe; and how will he pay it? A (Come let us work wiſely;) Lewd men call wicked policies wiſdome, and their ſucceſſe happineſſe: Herein Satan is wiſer then they; who both laies the plot, and makes them ſuch fooles, as to miſtake villany and madneſſe, for the beſt vertue.

Injuſtice is upheld by violence, whereas juſt governments are maintained by love: Task-maſters muſt be ſet over Iſrael; they ſhould not be the true ſeed of Iſrael, if they were not ſtill ſet to wreſtle with God in afflictions: Heavy burdens muſt be laid upon them: Iſrael is never but loaded, the deſtiny of one of Iacobs ſons is common to all; To lie down betwixt their burdens. If they had ſeemed to breathe them in Goſhen ſometimes, yet even there it was no ſmall miſery to be forainers, and to live among Idolaters; but now the name of a ſlave is added to the name of a ſtranger. Iſrael had gathered ſome ruſt in Idolatrous Egypt, and now he muſt be ſcowred: they had born the burden of Gods anger, if they had not borne the burdens of the Ægyptians. B

As God afflicted them with another minde then the Ægyptians; (God to exerciſe them, the Ægyptians to ſuppreſſe them;) ſo cauſes he the event to differ. Who would not have thought with theſe Ægyptians, that ſo extreme miſery ſhould not have made the Iſraelites unfit both for generation and reſiſtance? Moderate exerciſe ſtrengthens, extreme deſtroyes nature: That God which many times works by contrary means, cauſed them to grow with depreſſion, with perſecution to multiply; How can Gods Church but fare well, ſince the very malice of their enemies benefits them? Oh the ſoveraigne goodneſſe of our God that turnes all our poiſons into cordials! Gods Vine beares the better with bleeding. C

And now the Ægyptians could be angry with their owne maliciouſneſſe, that this was the occaſion of multiplying them whom they hated, and feared; to ſee that this ſervice gained more to the workmen, then to their Maſters; the ſtronger therefore the Iſraelites grew, the more impotent grew the malice of their perſecutors. And ſince their own labour ſtrengthens them, now tyranny will try what can be done by the violence of others: ſince the preſent ſtrength cannot be ſubdued, the hopes of ſucceſſion muſt be prevented: women muſt be ſuborned to be murderers; and thoſe whoſe office is to help the birth, muſt deſtroy it.

There was leſſe ſuſpicion of cruelty in that ſexe, and more opportunity of doing miſchiefe. The male children muſt be born, and die at once; what can be more innocent, then the child that hath not lived ſo much as to cry, or to ſee light? It is fault enough to be the ſonne of an Iſraelite: the daughters may live for bondage, for luſt; a condition ſo much (at the leaſt) worſe then death, as their ſex was weaker. O marvelous cruelty, that a man ſhould kill a man, for his ſexes ſake! Whoſoever hath looſed the reynes unto cruelty, is eaſily carried into incredible extremities. D

From burdens they proceed to bondage, and from bondage to blood: from an unjuſt vexation of their body, to an inhumane deſtruction of the fruit of their body. As the ſins of the concupiſcible part, from ſlight motions, grow on to foule executions, ſo doe thoſe of the iraſcible; there is no ſinne, whoſe harbour is more unſafe, then of that of malice: But oft-times the power of tyrants anſwers not their will: evill commanders cannot alwaies meet with equally miſchievous agents. E

The feare of God teaches the Midwives to diſobey an unjuſt command; they well knew, how no excuſe it is for evill, I was bidden. God ſaid to their hearts, Thou ſhalt not kill: this voice was lowder then Pharaohs. I commend their obedience in diſobeying; I dare not commend their excuſe; there was as much weakneſſe in their anſwer, as ſtrength in their practice: as they feared God in not killing, ſo they feared Pharaoh in diſſembling; oft-times thoſe that make conſcience of greater ſinnes, are overtaken with leſſe. It is well and rare, if we can come forth of a dangerous action without any ſoyle; and if we have eſcaped the ſtorme, that ſome after drops wet us not.

Who would not have expected that the Midwives ſhould be murdered, for not murthering? Pharaoh could not be ſo ſimple to think theſe women truſty; yet his indignation had no power to reach to their puniſhment. God proſpered the Midwives,

A wives, who can harm them? Even the not doing of evill is rewarded with good. And why did they prosper? Because they feared God; not for their dissimulation, but their piety. So did God crown their merits, but covered not their infirmity. How fondly doe men lay the thank upon the sinne, which is due to the vertue: true wisedome teaches to distinguish Gods actions, and to ascribe them to the right cause. Pardon belongs to the lye of the Mid-wives, and remuneration to their godly prosperity to their feare of God.

But that which the Mid-wives will not, the multitude shall doe. It were strange wicked rulers should not finde some or other instruments of violence: all the people must drown who the women saved. Cruelty hath but smoked before, now it flames up, secret practising hath made it shamelesse; that now it dare proclaime tyranny. It is
B a miserable state, where every man is made an executioner; there can be no greater argument of an ill cause, then a bloudy persecution, whereas Truth upholds her self by mildnesse, and is promoted by patience. This is their act, what was their issue? The people must drowne their males, themselves are drowned: they dyed by the same meanes, by which they caused the poore Israelitish infants to dye, that law of retaliation which God will not allow to us, because we are fellow-creatures, he justly practiseth in us. God would have us reade our sins in our judgements, that we might both repent of our sins, and give glory to his Justice.

Pharaoh raged before, much more now, that he received a message of dismission; the monitiõs of God make ill men worse the waves do not beat, nor roare any where so much, as at the bank which restrains them. Corruption when it is checked grows
C mad with rage; as the vapour in a cloud would not make that fearfull report, if it met not with opposition. A good heart yeelds at the stillest voice of God. But the most gratious motions of God harden the wicked. Many would not be so desperately settled in their sins, if the word had not controuled them. How mild a message was this to Pharaoh, and yet how galling? We pray thee let us goe. God commands him that which he feared. He tooke pleasure in the present servitude of Israel: God calls for a release. If the sute had beene for mitigation of labour, for preservation of their children, it might have carried some hope, and have found some favour: but now God requires that which he knowes will as much discontent Pharaoh, as Pharaohs cruelty could discontent the Israelites; Let us goe. How contrary are Gods precepts to naturall minds? and indeed, as they love to crosse him in their practise, so he loves to crosse D them in their commands before, and his punishments afterwards: It is a dangerous signe of an ill heart to feele Gods yoke heavy.

Moses talks of sacrifice, Pharaoh talks of worke. Any thing seemes due worke to a carnall mind saving Gods service: nothing superfluous, but religious duties. Christ tels us, there is but one thing necessary: Nature tels us there is nothing but that needlesse: Moses speaks of devotion, Pharaoh of idlenesse. It hath bin an old use, as to cast faire colours upon our owne vicious actions, so to cast evill aspersions upon the good actions of others. The same Devill that spoke in Pharaoh, speakes still in our scoffers, and calls Religion Hypocrisie, conscionable care, singularity. Every vice hath a title, and every vertue a disgrace.

Yet while possible taskes were imposed, there was some comfort: Their diligence
E might save their backs from stripes. The conceit of a benefit to the commander, and hope of impunity to the labourer, might give a good pretence to great difficulties: but to require tasks not faisible, is tyrannicall, and doth onely picke a quarrell to punish; they could neither make straw, nor finde it, yet they must have it. Do what may be, is tolerable, but do what cannot be, is cruell. Those which are above others in place, must measure their commands, not by their owne wills, but by the strength of their inferiours. To require more of a beast then he can doe is inhumane. The taske is not done; the task-masters are beaten: the punishment lyes where the charge is; they must exact it of the people, Pharaoh of them. It is the misery of those which are trusted with authority, that their inferiours faults are beaten upon their backs. This was not the fault to require it of the taske-masters; but to require it by the taske-masters, of the people. Publike persons do either good or ill with a thousand hands, and with no fewer shall receive it.

Of the birth and breeding of Moses.

Exod. 2

IT is a wonder that Amram the father of Moses, would thinke of the mariage bed in so troublesome a time, when he knew he should beget children either to slavery or slaughter: yet even now in the heat of this bondage he maries Iochebed: the drowning of his sons was not so great an evill, as his owne burning; the thraldome of his daughters not so great an evil, as the subjection unto sinfull desires. He therefore uses Gods remedy for his sinne; and referres the sequell of his danger to God. How necessary is this imitation for those which have not the power of containing! perhaps we would have thought it better to live childlesse! but Amram and Iochebed durst not incurre the danger of a sin, to avoid the danger of a mischiefe. No doubt when Iochebed the mother of Moses saw a man-child born of her, and him beautifull and comely, she fell into extreame passion, to thinke that the executioners hand should succeed the Midwives. All the time of her conception, she could not but feare a sonne; now she sees him, and thinkes of his birth and death at once, her second throes are more grievous then her first. The paines of travell in others are somewhat mitigated with hope, and countervailed with joy, that a man-child is born, in her they are doubled with feare, the remedy of others is her complaint: still she lookes when some fierce Ægyptian would come in, and snatch her new-born infant out of her bosome; whose comelinesse had now also added to her affection.

Many times God writes presages of Majesty and honor, even in the faces of childre. Little did she thinke, that she held in her lap the Deliverer of Israel. It is good to hazard in greatest appearances of danger. If Iochebed had said, If I beare a son, they will kill him, where had beene the great Rescuer of Israel? Happy is that resolution which can follow God hood-winkt, and let him dispose of the event: When she can no longer hide him in her wombe, she hides him in her house, afraid lest every of his cryings should guide the executioners to his cradle. And now she sees her treasure can be no longer hid, she ships him in a barke of bulrushes, and commits him to the mercy of the waves, and (which was more mercilesse) to the danger of an Ægyptian passenger, yet doth she not leave him without a guardian.

No tyranny can forbid her to love him, whom she is forbidden to keepe; Her daughters eyes must supply the place of her armes. And if the weake affection of a mother, were thus effectually carefull, what shall we think of him, whose love, whose compassion is (as himselfe) infinite? His eye, his hand, cannot but be with us, even when we forsake our selves: Moses had never a stronger protection about him, no not when all his Israelites were pitched about his Tent in the Wildernesse, then now when he lay sprawling alone upon the waves: no water, no Ægyptian can hurt him. Neither friend nor mother dare owne him, and now God challenges his custody. When we seeme most neglected and forlorne in our selves, then is God most present, most vigilant.

His providence brings Pharaohs daughter thither to wash her selfe. Those times lookt for no great state: A Princesse comes to bathe her selfin the open streame: she meant only to wash her self; God fetches her thither, to deliver the Deliverer of his people. His designes goe beyond ours. We know not (when we set our foot over our threshold) what he hath to do with us. This event seemed casuall to this Princesse, but predetermined and provided by God, before she was: how wisely and sweetly God brings to passe his own purposes, in our ignorance and regardlesnesse! She saw the Arke, opens it, finds the child weeping; his beauty and his teares had God provided for the strong perswasions of mercy. This young and lively Oratory prevailed. Her heart is struck with compassion, and yet her tongue could say; It is an Hebrew child.

See here the mercifull daughter of a cruell father: It is an uncharitable and injurious ground, to judge of the childs disposition by the parents. How well doth pitty beseeme great personages! & most in extremities. It had beene death to another to rescue

A reſcue the child of an Hebrew; in her it was ſafe and noble. It is a happy thing, when great ones improve their places to ſo much more charity, as their liberty is more.

Moſes his ſiſter finding the Princeſſe compaſſionate, offers to procure a nurſe, and fetches the mother: and who can be ſo fit a nurſe as a mother? She now with glad hands receives her child, both with authority and reward. She would have given all her ſubſtance for the life of her ſon; and now ſhe hath a reward to nurſe him. The exchange of the name of a mother, for the name of a nurſe, hath gained her both her ſon, and his education, and with both a recompence. Religion doth not call us to a weak ſimplicity, but allowes us as much of the Serpent as of the Dove: lawfull policies have from God both liberty in the uſe, and bleſſing in the ſucceſſe.

The good Lady did not breed him as ſome child of almes, or as ſome wretched
B outcaſt, for whom it might be favour enough to live, but as her own ſon; in all the delicacies, in all the learning of Ægypt. Whatſoever the Court or the Schoole could put into him, he wanted not; yet all this could not make him forget that he was an Hebrew. Education works wondrous changes, and is of great force either way: a little advancement hath ſo puffed ſome up above themſelves, that they have not only forgot their friends, but ſcorned their parents. All the honours of Ægypt could not win Moſes not to call his nurſe, mother, or weane him from a willing miſery with the Iſraelites. If we had Moſes his faith, we could not but make his choice. It is only our infidelity that binds us ſo to the world, and makes us preferre the momentany pleaſures of ſinne, unto that everlaſting recompence of reward.

He went forth, and looked on the burdens of Iſrael. What needed Moſes to have
C afflicted himſelf with the afflictions of others? Himſelfe was at eaſe and pleaſure in the Court of Pharaoh. A good heart cannot endure to be happy alone: & muſt needs, unbidden, ſhare with others in their miſeries. He is no true Moſes that is not moved with the calamities of Gods Church. To ſee an Ægyptian ſmite an Hebrew, it ſmote him, and moved him to ſmite. He hath no Iſraelitiſh blood in him, that can endure to ſee an Iſraelite ſtricken either with hand or with tongue.

Here was his zeale: where was his authority? Doubtleſſe, Moſes had an inſtinct from God of his Magiſtracy, elſe how ſhould he think they would have underſtood what himſelf did not? Oppreſſions may not be righted by violence, but by law. The redreſſe of evill by a perſon unwarranted, is evill. Moſes knew that God had called him, he knew that Pharaoh knew it not: therefore he hides the Ægyptian in the ſand.
D Thoſe actions which may be approved unto God are not alwaies ſafe with men: as contrarily, too many things goe current with men, which are not approved of God.

Another Hebrew is ſtricken, but by an Hebrew: the act is the ſame, the agents differ: neither doth their profeſſion more differ, then Moſes his proceedings. He gives blowes to the one: to the other, words. The blowes, to the Ægyptian were deadly, the words, to the Hebrew, gentle and plauſible. As God makes a difference betwixt chaſtiſements of his own, and puniſhments of ſtrange children: ſo muſt wiſe Governors learn to diſtinguiſh of ſins and judgements, according to circumſtances. How mildly doth Moſes admoniſh! Sirs, ye are brethren. If there had been but any dram of good nature in theſe Hebrewes, they had relented: now it is ſtrange to ſee, that being ſo univerſally vexed with their common adverſary, they ſhould yet vexe one
E another: One would have thought that a common oppoſition ſhould have united them more, yet now private grudges doe thus dangerouſly divide them. Blowes enow were not dealt by the Egyptians, their own muſt adde to the violence. Still ſatan is thus buſie, and Chriſtians are thus malicious, that (as if they wanted enemies) they flie in one anothers faces. While we are in this Egypt of the world, all unkinde ſtrifes would eaſily be compoſed, if we did not forget that we are brethren.

Behold an Egyptian in the skin of an Hebrew: How dogged an anſwer doth Moſes receive to ſo gentle a reproof? Who would not have expected that this Hebrew had bin enough dejected with the cõmon affliction? But vexations may make ſome more miſerable, not more humble; as we ſee ſickneſſes make ſome tractable, others more froward. It is no eaſie matter to beare a reproof well, if never ſo well tempered, no Sugar can bereave a Pill of his bitterneſſe. None but the gracious can ſay, Let the righteous ſmite me. Next to the not deſerving a reproof, is the well taking of it. But who is ſo ready to except and exclaime as the wrong-doer? The patient replies not. One injury drawes on another: firſt to his brother, then to his reprover. Guiltineſſe will make a man ſtirre upon every touch: he that was wronged could incline to reconciliation: Malice makes men uncapable of good counſell, and there are none ſo great enemies to juſtice, as thoſe which are enemies to peace.

With what impatience doth a galled heart receive an admonition! This unworthy Iſraelite is the patterne of a ſtomackfull offender, firſt, he is moved to choler in himſelfe: then he cals for the authority of the admoniſher: a ſmall authority will ſerve for a loving admonition. It is the duty of men, much more of Chriſtians, to adviſe againſt ſin; yet this man askes, Who made thee a Judge? for but finding fault with his injury. Then he aggravates, and miſconſtrues, Wilt thou kill me? when Moſes meant onely to ſave both. It was the death of his malice onely that was intended, and the ſafety of his perſon. And laſtly, he upbraids him with former actions, Thou killedſt the Egyptian: What if he did? What if unjuſtly? What was this to the Hebrew? Another mans ſin is no excuſe for ours. A wicked heart never looks inward to it ſelfe, but outward to the quality of the reprover; if that afford exception, it is enough; as a dog runs firſt to revenge on the ſtone: What matter is it to me who he be that admoniſheth me? Let me look home into my ſelf: let me look to his advice. If that be good, it is more ſhame to me to be reproved by an evil man. As a good mans allowance cannot warrant evill, ſo an evil mans reproofe may remedy evil: If this Hebrew had been well pleaſed, Moſes had not heard of his ſlaughter; now in choler all will out; and if this mans tongue had not thus caſt him in the teeth with bloud, he had been ſurpriſed by Pharaoh, ere he could have known that the fact was known.

Now he growes jealous, flees, and eſcapes. No friend is ſo commodious in ſome caſes as an adverſary; This wound which the Hebrew thought to give Moſes, ſaved his life. As it is good for a man to have an enemy, ſo it ſhall be our wiſdome to make uſe of his moſt cholerick objections. The worſt of an enemy may prove moſt ſoveraigne to our ſelves. Moſes flees. It is no diſcomfort for a man to flee when his conſcience purſues him not: Where Gods warrant will not protect us, it is good for the heeles to ſupply the place of the tongue.

Moſes when he may not in Ægypt, he will be doing juſtice in Midian. In Ægypt, he delivers the oppreſſed Iſraelite; in Midian the wronged daughters of Iethro. A good man wil be doing good, whereſoever he is; his Trade is a compound of Charity & Juſtice; as therefore evill diſpoſitions cannot be changed with aires, no more will good Now then he ſits him down by a well in Midian. There he might have to drink, but where to eat he knew not. The caſe was altred with Moſes; To come from the dainties of the Court of Ægypt, to the hunger of the fields of Midian; it is a leſſon that all Gods children muſt learn to take out, To want and to abound. Who can think ſtrange of penury when the great governour of Gods people once hath nothing? Who would not have thought in this caſe, Moſes ſhould have bin heartleſſe & ſullen, ſo caſt down with his own complaints, that he ſhould have had no feeling of others, yet how hot is he upon Juſtice? No adverſity can make a good man neglect good duties: he ſees the oppreſſion of the ſhepherds, the image of that other he left behind him in Ægypt: the Maids (daughters of ſo great a Peere) draw water for their flocks, the inhumane ſhepherds drive them away; rudeneſſe hath no reſpect either to Sexe or Condition; if we lived not under lawes, this were our caſe; Might would be the meaſure of Juſtice: we ſhould not ſo much as enjoy our own water. Unjuſt courſes will not ever proſper: Moſes ſhall rather come from Ægypt to Midian to beat the ſhepherds, then they ſhall vex the daughters of Iethro. This act of Juſtice was not better done then taken. Reuel requites it kindly with an hoſpitall entertainment. A good nature is ready to anſwer courteſies: we cānot do too much for a thankful man. And if a courteous Heathen reward the watring of a ſheep in this bountifull manner, how ſhal our God recōpence but a cup of cold water that is given to a diſciple? This favor hath won Moſes, who now cōſents to dwel with him, though out of the church. Curioſity, or whatſoever idle occaſions may not draw us (for our reſidence) out of the

A the bounds of the Church of God: danger of life may; we love not the Church if we easily leave it: if in a case of life, we leave it not (upon opportunity) for a time of respit, we love not our selves. The first part of Moses his requitall was his wife, one of those whom he had formerly protected.

I do not so much marvell that Iethro gave him his daughter (for he saw him valiant, wise, learned, nobly bred) as that Moses would take her; a stranger both in Bloud and Religion. I could plead for him necessity: his owne nation was shut up to him: if he would have tryed to fetch a daughter of Israel, he had indangered to leave himself behind: I could plead some correspondence in common principles of Religion; for doubtlesse Moses his zeale could not suffer him to smother the truth in himselfe: he should have beene an unfaithfull servant if he had not beene his Masters teacher. Yet
B neither of these can make this match either safe, or good. The event bewrayes it dangerously inconvenient. This choice had like to have cost him deare: she stood in his way for circumcision; God stands in his way for revenge. Though he was now in Gods message, yet might he not be forborne in this neglect. No circumstance either of the dearnesse of the Solicitor or our owne ingagement, can beare out a sinne with God: Those which are unequally yoked, may not ever looke to draw one way. True love to the person cannot long agree with dislike of the religion. He had need to be more then a man that hath a Zipporah in his bosome, and would have true zeale in his heart. All this while Moses his affection was not so tied to Midian, that he could forget Ægypt. He was a stranger in Midian: what was he else in Ægypt? Surely, either Ægypt was not his home, or a miserable one; and yet in reference to it, he calls his
C son Gershom, a stranger there. Much better were it to be a stranger there then a dweller in Ægypt. How hardly can we forget the place of our abode or education, although never so homely! And if he so thought of his Ægyptian home, where was nothing but bondage and tyranny, how should we think of that home of ours, above, where is nothing but rest and blessednesse?

Of Moses calling.

FOrty yeares was Moses a Courtier, and forty yeares (after that) a Shepheard. That great men may not be ashamed of honest vocations: the D greatest that ever were have beene content to take up with meane trades. The contempt of honest callings in those which are well borne; argues pride without wit. How constantly did Moses stick to his hooke? and yet a man of great spirits, of excellent learning, of curious educacion: and if God had not (after his forty yeares service) called him off, he had so ended his daies. Humble resolutions are so much more heroicall, as they fall into higher subjects.

There can be no fitter disposition for a leader of Gods people, then constancy in his undertakings, without eyther wearinesse, or change. How had he learned to subdue all ambitious desires, and to rest content with his obscurity! so he might have the freedome of his thoughts and full opportunity of holy meditations, he willingly leaves the World to others, and envies not his proudest acquaintance of E the Court of Pharaoh. He that hath true worth in himself, and familiarity with God, finds more pleasure in the Desarts of Midian, then others can doe in the Palaces of Kings.

Whiles he is tending his sheepe, God appeared unto him: God never graces the idle with his visions; when he finds us in our callings, we find him in the tokens of his mercy. Satan appeares to the idle man in manifold temptations; or rather presents himself, and appeares not. God was ever with Moses, yet was he not seene till now. He is never absent from his; but sometimes he makes their senses witnesses of his presence. In small matters may be greater wonders. That a bush should burn, is no marvell; but that it should not consume in burning, is justly miraculous: God chuseth not ever great subjects wherin to exercise his power. It is enough that his power is great in the smallest. When I look upon this burning bush with Moses, me thinks I can never ſee a worthier and more lively Embleme of the Church; that in Ægypt was in the furnace; yet waſted not. Since then how oft hath it beene flaming, never conſumed! The ſame power that enlightens it, preſerves it; and to none but to his enemies is he a conſuming fire: Moſes was a great Philoſopher: but ſmall skill would have ſerved to know the nature of fire, & of the buſh: that fire meeting with combuſtible matter, could not but conſume: If it had bin ſome ſolid wood, it would have yeelded later to the flames; but buſhes are of ſo quick diſpatch, that the joy of the wicked is compared to a fire of thornes. He noted a while, ſaw it continued, and began to wonder. It was ſome marvell how it ſhould come there: but how it ſhould continue without ſupply, yea, without diminution of matter, was truly admirable. Doubtleſſe he went oft about it and viewed it on all ſides, and now when his eyes and mind could meet with no likely cauſes, ſo far off, reſolves, I wil go ſee it: His curioſity led him nearer, and what could he ſee but a buſh and a flame, which he ſaw at firſt unſatisfied? It is good to come to the place of Gods preſence, howſoever; God may perhaps ſpeak to thy heart, though thou come but for novelty: Even thoſe which have come upon curioſity have beene oft taken: abſence is without hope; If Moſes had not come, he had not beene called out of the buſh.

To ſee a fire not conſuming the buſh, was much; but to heare a ſpeaking fire, this was more; and to heare his owne name out of the mouth of the fire, it was moſt of all. God makes way for his greateſt meſſages by aſtoniſhment and admiration: as on the contrary, careleſneſſe carries us to a meere unproficiency under the beſt meanes of God: If our hearts were more awfull, Gods meſſages would be more effectuall to us.

In that appearance God meant to call Moſes to come, yet when he is come, inhibits him (Come not hither.) We muſt come to God, muſt not come too neare him. When we meditate of the great myſteries of his word, we come to him: we come too neare him when we ſearch into his counſels. The Sun and the fire ſay of themſelves, Come not too neare: how much more the light which none can attaine unto? We have all our limits ſet us: The Gentiles might come into ſome outer courts, not into the inmoſt. The Jewes might come into the inner Court, not into the Temple: the Prieſts and Levites into the Temple, not into the Holy of Holies: Moſes to the Hill, not to the Buſh. The waves of the Sea had not more need of bounds, then mans preſumption. Moſes muſt not come cloſe to the buſh at all; and where he may ſtand, he may not ſtand with his ſhooes on. There is no unholineſſe in clothes: God prepared them for man at firſt, and that of skins, leſt any exception ſhould be taken at the hides of dead beaſts. This rite was ſignificant. What are the ſhooes but worldly and carnall affections? If theſe be not caſt off when we come to the holy place, we make our ſelves unholy: how much leſſe ſhould we dare to come with reſolutions of ſinne? This is not only to come with ſhooes on, but with ſhooes bemired with wicked filthineſſe; the touch whereof profanes the pavement of God, and makes our preſence odious.

Moſes was the Son of Amram, Amram of Kohath, Kohath of Levi, Levi of Iacob, Iacob of Iſaac, Iſaac of Abraham. God puts together both ends of his pedigree, I am the God of thy father, and of Abraham, Iſaac, Iacob. If he had ſaid onely, I am thy God, It had bin Moſes his duty to attend awfully; but now that he ſayes, I am the God of thy Father, and of Abraham, &c. He challenges reverence by preſcription. Any thing that was our Anceſters, pleaſes us; their Houſes, their Veſſels, their Cote-armour; How much more their God? How carefull ſhould parents be to make holy choyces? Every preſident of theirs are ſo many monuments and motives to their poſterity. What an happineſſe it is to be born of good Parents! hence God claimes an intereſt in us and we in him, for their ſake. As many a man ſmarteth for his fathers ſin, ſo the goodneſſe of others is crowned in a thouſand generations. Neither doth God ſay, I was the God of Abraham, Iſaac, Iacob; but, I am. The Patriarkes ſtill live after ſo many thouſand yeares of diſſolution. No length of time can ſeparate the ſoules of the juſt from their Maker. As for their body, there is ſtill a reall relation betwixt the duſt of it, & the ſoule: & if the being of this part be more defective, the being

A ing of the other is more lively, and doth more then recompence the wants of that earthly halfe.

God could not describe himselfe by a more sweet name then this, I am the God of thy father, and of Abraham, &c. yet Moses hides his face for feare. If he had said, I am the glorious God that made heaven and earth, that dwels in light inaccessible, whom the Angels cannot behold; or, I am God the avenger, just and terrible, a consuming fire to mine enemies, here had beene just cause of terror.

But why was Moses so frighted with a familiar compellation? God is no lesse awfull to his own in his very mercies. Great is thy mercy that thou mayest be feared: for to them no lesse majesty shines in the favours of God, then in his judgements and justice. The wicked heart never feares God but thundring, or shaking the earth, or
B raining fire from heaven; but the good can dread him in his very sunne-shine: his loving deliverances and blessings affect them with awfulnesse. Moses was the true son of Iacob, who when he saw nothing but visions of love and mercy, could say, How dreadfull is this place?

I see Moses now at the bush hiding his face at so mild a representation: hereafter we shall see him in this very Mount betwixt heaven and earth; in Thunder, Lightning, Smoak, Earth-quakes, speaking mouth to mouth with God, bare-faced, and fearlesse: God was then more terrible, but Moses was lesse strange. This was his first meeting with God, further acquaintance makes him familiar, and familiarity makes him bold: Frequence of conversation gives us freedome of accesse to God; and makes us poure out our hearts to him as fully and as fearlesly as to our friends.
C In the meane time now at first hee made not so much haste to see, but he made as much to hide his eyes: Twice did Moses hide his face; once for the glory which God put upon him, which made him so shine, that he could not be beheld of others; once for Gods own glory, which he could not behold. No marvell. Some of the creatures are too glorious for mortall eyes: how much more, when God appeares to us in the easiest manner, must his glory needs overcome us? Behold the difference betwixt our present and future estate: Then the more Majesty of appearance, the more delight: when our sinne is quite gone, all our feare at Gods presence shall be turned into joy. God appeared to Adam before his sinne with comfort, but in the same forme which after his sin was terrible. And if Moses cannot abide to look upon Gods glory when he descends to us in mercy, how shall wicked ones abide to see his fearfull presence
D when he sets upon vengeance! In this fire he flamed and consumed not, but in his revenge our God is a consuming fire.

First, Moses hides himself in feare, now in modesty. Who am I? None in all Ægypt or Midian was comparably fit for this embassage. Which of the Israelites had bin brought up a Courtier, a Scholler, an Israelite by bloud, by education an Ægyptian, learned, wise, valiant, experienced? Yet, Who am I? The more fit any man is for whatsoever vocation, the lesse he thinks himself. Forwardnesse argues insufficiency. The unworthy thinks still, Who am I not? Modest beginnings give hopefull proceedings, and happy endings. Once before, Moses had taken upon him, and laid about him, hoping then they would have known, that by his hand God meant to deliver Israel: but now when it comes to the point, Who am I? Gods best servants are not ever in an E equall disposition to good duties. If we find differences in our selves sometimes, it argues that grace is not our owne. It is our frailty, that those services which we are forward to, a loose off, we shrink at, neare hand, and fearfully misse-give. How many of us can bid defiances to death, and suggest answers to absent temptations, which when they come home to us, we flye off, and change our note, and in stead of action, expostulate!

Of the plagues of Ægypt.

Exod. 7. 6 &c.

IT is too much honour for flesh and bloud to receive a message from heaven, yet here God sends a message to man, and is repulsed: well may God aske, Who is man that I should regard him? but for man to aske, Who is the Lord? is a proud and bold blasphemy. Thus wild is Nature at the first; but ere God hath done with Pharaoh, he will be known of him, he will make himself known by him, to all the world. God might have swept him away suddenly. How unworthy is he of life, who with the same breath that he receives, denies the Giver of it! But he would have him convinced, ere he were punished; First therefore he workes miracles before him, then upon him. Pharaoh was now, from a staffe of protection and sustentation to Gods people, turned to a Serpent that stung them to death; God shews himself in this reall Embleme, doing that suddenly before him, which Satan had wrought to him by leisure; And now when he crawles, and winds, & hisses, threatning perill to Israel, he shews him how in an instant he can turn him into a sensless stick, & make him if not useful, yet fearless: The same God which wrought this, gives Satan leave to imitate it; the first plague that he meant to inflict upon Pharaoh, is delusion: God can be content the devill should win himself credit, where he meanes to judge; and holds the honour of a miracle well lost, to harden an enemy: Yet to shew that his miracle was of power, the others of permission; Moses his Serpent devours theirs: how easily might the Ægyptians have thought, that he which caused their Serpent not to be, could have kept it from being: and that they which could not keep their Serpent from devouring, could not secure them from being consumed! but wise thoughts enter not into those that must perish. All Gods Judgments stand ready, and wait but till they be called for. They need but a watch-word to be given them: No sooner is the rod lift up, but they are gone forth into the world, presently the waters run into bloud, the Frogs and Lice crawle about, and all the other troops of God come rushing in upon his adversaries: All creatures conspire to revenge the injuries of God. If the Ægyptians looke upward, there they have Thunder, Lightning, Hayle, Tempests; one while no light at all, another while such fearfull flashes as had more terror then darkenesse. If they look under them, there they see their waters changed into bloud, their earth swarming with Frogs and Grashoppers: if about them, one while the Flies fill their eyes and eares; another while they see their fruits destroyed, their cattell dying, their children dead. If, lastly, they look upon themselves, they see themselves lothsome with Lice, painfull and deformed with Scabs, Biles, and Botches.

First, God begins his Judgments with waters. As the river of Nilus was to Ægypt, in stead of heaven, to moisten and fatten the earth; so their confidence was more in it then in heaven. Men are sure to be punisht most and soonest, in that which they make a corrivall with God. They had before defiled the rivers with the bloud of Innocents; and now it appeares to them, in his owne colour. The waters will no longer keep their counsell: Never any man delighted in bloud, which had not enough of it ere his end: they shed but some few streames, and now behold, whole rivers of bloud: Neither was this more a monument of their slaughter past, then an image of their future destruction. They were afterward over-whelmed in the Red Sea, and now before hand they see the Rivers red with bloud. How dependant and servile is the life of man, that cannot either want one Element, or endure it corrupted! It is hard to say whether there were more horror, or annoyance in this plague. They complaine of thirst, and yet doubt whether they should dye, or quench it with bloud. Their fish (the chiefe part of their sustenance) dies with infection, and infecteth more by being dead. The stench of both is ready to poyson the inhabitants; yet Pharaohs curiosity carries him away quite from the sense of the judgement: he had rather send for his Magicians to work feats, then to humble himself under God for the removall of this plague; and God plagues his curiosity with deceit, those whom he trusts shall

A ſhall undoe him with prevailing; the glory of a ſecond miracle ſhall be obſcured by a falſe imitation, for a greater glory to God in the ſequell.

The rod is lift up again, Behold, that Nilus which they had before adored, was never ſo beneficiall as it is now troubleſome; yeelding them not onely a dead, but a living annoyance: It never did ſo ſtore them with Fiſh, as now it plagues them with Frogges; whatſoever any man makes his god, beſides the true one, ſhall be once his tormenter. Thoſe lothſome creatures leave their owne element, to puniſh them which rebelliouſly detaine Iſrael from their owne. No Bed, no Table can be free from them, their dainty Ladies cannot keep them out of their boſomes; neither can the Ægyptians ſooner open their mouthes, then they are ready to creep into their throats; as if they would tell them, that they came on purpoſe to revenge the B wrongs of their Maker: yet even this wonder alſo is Satan allowed to imitate. Who can marvell to ſee the beſt vertues counterfaited by wicked men, when he ſees the Devill emulating the miraculous power of God? the feats that Satan plaies may harden, but cannot benefit. He that hath leave to bring Frogs, hath neither leave, nor power, to take them away, nor to take away the ſtench from them. To bring them, was but to adde to the Judgement; to remove them was an act of mercy. God doth commonly uſe Satan in executing of judgement, never in the workes of mercy to men.

Yet even by thus much is Pharaoh hardned, and the Sorcerers growne inſolent. When the devill and his agents are in the height of their pride, God ſhames them in a trifle. The rod is lift up: the very duſt receives life: Lice abound every where, and
C make no difference betwixt beggars and Princes. Though Pharaoh and his Courtiers abhorred to ſee themſelves louzy; yet they hoped this miracle would be more eaſily imitable: but now the greater poſſibility, the greater foyle. How are the great wonder-mongers of Ægypt abaſhed, that they can neither make Lice of their own, nor deliver themſelves from the lice that are made! Thoſe that could make Serpents and Frogs, could not either make or kill Lice; to ſhew them that thoſe Frogs and Serpents were not their own workmanſhip. Now Pharaoh muſt needs ſee how impotent a devill he ſerved that could not make that vermine which every day riſes voluntarily out of corruption. Iannes and Iambres cannot now make thoſe Lice (ſo much as by deluſion) which at another time they cannot chuſe but produce unknowing, and which now they cannot avoid. That ſpirit which is powerfull to exe-
D cute the greateſt things when he is bidden, is unable to doe the leaſt when he is reſtrained. Now theſe corrivals of Moſes can ſay, This is the finger of God. Ye fooliſh inchanters, was Gods finger in the Lice, not in the Frogs, not in the Bloud, not in the Serpent? And why was it rather in the leſſe, then in the greater? Becauſe ye did imitate the other, not theſe. As if the ſame finger of God had not been before in your imitation, which was now in your reſtraint: As if ye could have failed in theſe, if ye had not been only permitted the other. Whiles wicked minds have their full ſcope, they never look up above themſelves; but when once God croſſes them in their proceedings, their want of ſucceſſe teaches them to give God his owne. All theſe plagues perhaps had more horror then paine in them. The Frogs creep upon their clothes, the Lice upon their skins: but thoſe ſtinging Hornets which ſucceed
E them, ſhall wound and kill. The water was annoyed with the firſt plague, the earth with the ſecond and third; this fourth fills the ayre, and beſides corruption brings ſmart. And that they may ſee this winged army comes from an angry God (not either from nature, or chance) even the very Flies ſhall make a difference betwixt Ægypt and Goſhen. He gave them their being, ſets them their ſtint. They can no more ſting an Iſraelite, then favor an Ægyptian. The very wings of Flies are directed by a providence, and doe acknowlege their limits. Now Pharaoh finds how impoſſible it is for him to ſtand out with God, ſince all his power cannot reſcue him from Lice and Flies.

And now his heart begins to thaw a little: Goe, doe ſacrifice to your God in this Land: or (ſince that will not be accepted,) Goe into the wilderneſſe, but not far: but how ſoon it knits again! Good thoughts make but a thorow-fare of carnall hearts, they can never ſettle

ſettle there: yea, his very miſgiving hardens him the more: that now neither the murren of his cattell, nor the botches of his ſervants can ſtir him a whit. He ſaw his cattle ſtruck dead with a ſudden contagion; he ſaw his Sorcerers (after their conteſtation with Gods meſſengers) ſtruck with a ſcab in their very faces, and yet his heart is not ſtruck. Who would think it poſſible that any ſoule could be ſecure in the middeſt of ſuch variety, and frequence of judgements? Theſe very plagues have not more wonder in them, then their ſucceſſe hath. To what an height of obduration will ſinne lead a man, and of all ſins, incredulity? Amidſt all theſe ſtorms Pharaoh ſleepeth, till the voice of Gods mighty thunders, and hayle mixed with fire, rouzed him up a little. A

Now, as betwixt ſleeping and waking, he ſtarts up and ſayes, God is righteous, I am wicked; Moſes pray for us; and preſently layes downe his head againe. God hath no ſooner done thundering, then he hath done fearing. All this while you never find him carefull to prevent any one evill, but deſirous ſtill to ſhift it off, when he feeles it; never holds conſtant to any good motion; never prayes for himſelf, but careleſly wils Moſes and Aaron to pray for him; never yeelds God his whole demand, but higleth & dodgeth, like ſome hard chapman, that would get a releaſe with the cheapeſt: Firſt, they ſhall not goe; then, Goe and ſacrifice, but in Ægypt; next, Goe ſacrifice in the wildernes, but not far off; after, Goe ye that are men; then, Goe you and your children onely; at laſt, Goe all ſave your ſheep and cattle. Whereſoever meere Nature is, ſhe is ſtill improvident of future good, ſenſible of preſent evill, inconſtant in good purpoſes; unable, through unacquaintance, and unwilling to ſpeake for her ſelf, niggardly in her grants, and unchearfull. The plague of the Graſhoppers ſtartled him a little; and the more through the importunity of his ſervants: for when he conſidered the fiſh deſtroyed with the firſt blow, the cattle with the fift, the corne with the ſeventh, the fruit and leaves with this eighth, and nothing now left him, but a bare fruitleſſe earth to live upon (and that, covered over with Locuſts) neceſſity drove him to relent for an advantage: Forgive me this once; take from me this death onely. B C

But as conſtrained repentance is ever ſhort and unſound; the Weſt wind, together with the Graſhoppers, blowes away his remorſe; and now is he ready for another judgement. As the Graſhoppers tooke away the ſight of the earth from him, ſo now a groſſe darkneſſe takes away the ſight of heaven too: other darkneſſes were but privative, this was reall and ſenſible. The Ægyptians thought this night long, (how could they chuſe when it was ſix in one?) and ſo much the more, for that no man could riſe to talk with other, but was neceſſarily confined to his own thoughts: One thinks the fault in his owne eyes, which he rubs oftentimes in vaine: Others think, that the Sunne is loſt out of the Firmament, and is now withdrawn for ever: Others, that all things are returning to their firſt confuſion: all think themſelves miſerable, paſt remedy, and wiſh (whatſoever had befalne them) that they might have had but light enough to ſee themſelves dye. D

Now Pharaoh proves like to ſome beaſts that grow mad with baiting: grace often reſiſted, turnes to deſperateneſſe, Get thee from me, look thou ſee my face no more, whenſoever thou commeſt in my ſight, thou ſhalt die. As if Moſes could not plague him as well in abſence: as if he that could not take away the Lice, Flyes, Frogs, Graſhoppers, could at his pleaſure take away the life of Moſes, that procured them. What is this but to run upon the judgements, and run away from the remedies? Evermore when Gods meſſengers are abandoned, deſtruction is neare. Moſes will ſee him no more, till he ſee him dead upon the ſands; but God will now viſit him more then ever: The fearefulleſt plagues God ſtill reſerves for the upſhot: All the former doe but make way for the laſt. Pharaoh may exclude Moſes and Aaron, but Gods Angell he cannot exclude: Inſenſible meſſengers are uſed, when the viſible are debarred. E

Now God begins to call for the Bloud they owed him: In one night every houſe hath a carkaſſe in it, and (which is more grievous) of their firſt born, and which (is yet more fearefull) in an inſtant. No man could comfort other; every man was too full of his owne ſorrow, helping rather to make the noiſe of the lamentation more dolefull

A dolefull, and aſtoniſhing. How ſoone hath God changed the note of this tyrannicall people! Ægypt was never ſo ſtubborne in denying paſſage to Iſrael, as now importunate to entreat it: Pharaoh did not more force them to ſtay before, then now to depart: whom lately they would not permit, now they hire to go. Their rich Jewels of ſilver and gold were not too deare for them, whom they hated; how much rather had they to ſend them away wealthy, then to have them ſtay to be their Executors? Their love to themſelves obtained of them the enriching of their enemies; and now they are glad to pay them well for their old work, and their preſent journey: Gods people had ſtayed like Slaves, they goe away like Conquerors, with the ſpoile of thoſe that hated them; armed for ſecurity, and wealthy for maintenance.

Old Iacobs ſeventy ſoules which he brought down into Ægypt, in ſpight of their
B bondage, and bloud-ſhed, go forth ſix hundred thouſand men, beſides children. The world is well mended with Iſrael, ſince he went with his ſtaffe and his ſcrip over Jordan. Tyranny is too weak, where God bids, increaſe and multiply. I know not where elſe the good herb over-growes the weeds; the Church out-ſtrips the World. I feare if they had lived in eaſe and delicacy, they had not beene ſo ſtrong, ſo numerous. Never any true Iſraelite loſt by his affliction. Not onely for the action, but the time, Pharaohs choice meets with Gods: That very night, when the hundred and thirty yeares were expired, Iſrael is gone, Pharaoh neither can, nor can will to keepe them any longer; yet in this, not fulfilling Gods will, but his owne. How ſweetly doth God diſpoſe of all ſecond cauſes, that whiles they doe their own will, they doe his!

C The Iſraelites are equall glad of this haſte. Who would not be ready to goe, yea to flie out of bondage? They have what they wiſhed; it was no ſtaying for a ſecond invitation. The loſſe of an opportunity is many times unrecoverable: the love of their liberty made the burden of their dough light: who knew whether the variable mind of Pharaoh might returne to a deniall, and (after all his ſtubbornneſſe) repent of his obedience? It is fooliſh to hazard where there is certainty of good offers, and uncertainty of continuance. They goe therefore; and the ſame God that fetcht them out, is both their guide and protector. How carefully doth he chuſe their way! not the nearer, but the ſafer. He would not have his people ſo ſuddenly change from bondage to warre.

It is the wondrous mercy of God, that he hath reſpect, as to his owne glory, ſo to D our infirmities. He intends them warres hereafter, but after ſome longer breathing, and more preparation; his goodneſſe ſo orders all, that evils are not ready for us, till we be ready for them. And as he chuſes, ſo he guides their way. That they might not erre in that ſandy and untracted wilderneſſe, himſelfe goes before them: who could but follow chearfully, when he ſees God lead him? He that led the wiſe men by a Star, leads Iſrael by a Cloud: That was an higher object, therefore he gives them an higher, and more heavenly conduct; This was more earthly; therefore he contents himſelf with a lower repreſentation of his preſence; A pillar of cloud and fire: A pillar for firmnes; of cloud and fire for viſibility and uſe. The greater light extinguiſhes the leſſe; therefore in the day he ſhewes them not fire, but a cloud: In the night nothing is ſeene without light; therefore he ſhewes them not the cloud, but fire: The E cloud ſhelters them from heat by day; the fire digeſts the rawneſſe of the night. The ſame God is both a cloud and a fire to his children, ever putting himſelfe into thoſe formes of gracious reſpects, that may beſt fit their neceſſities.

As good motions are long ere they can enter into hard hearts, ſo they ſeldome continue long. No ſooner were the backs of Iſrael turned to depart, then Pharaohs heart and face is turned after them, to fetch them back againe. It vexes him to ſee ſo great a command, ſo much wealth, caſt away in one night; which now he reſolves to redeeme, though with more plagues. The ſame ambition and covetouſneſſe that made him weare out ſo many judgements, will not leave him till it have wrought out his full deſtruction. All Gods vengeances have their end; the finall perdition of his enemies, which they cannot reſt till they have attained: Pharaoh therefore and his Ægyptians will needs goe fetch their bane. They well knew that Iſrael was fitter to ſerve then to fight, weary with their ſervitude, not trained up to war, not furniſhed with proviſion for a field: Themſelves Captaines and Souldiers by profeſſion, furniſhed with horſes, and Chariots of warre. They gave themſelves therefore the victory beforehand, and Iſrael eyther for ſpoile or bondage: yea, the weake Iſraelites gave up themſelves for dead, and already are talking of their graves. They ſee the Sea before them; behind them the Ægyptians: they know not whether is more mercileſſe, and are ſtricken with the feare of both. O God, how couldeſt thou forbeare ſo diſtruſtfull a people! they had ſeene all thy wonders in Ægypt and in their Goſhen; they ſaw even now thy pillar before them, and yet they did more feare Ægypt then beleeve thee. Thy patience is no leſſe miracle then thy deliverance. But in ſtead of removing from them, the cloudy pillar removes behind them, and ſtands betwixt the Iſraelites and Ægyptians: as if God would have ſaid, They ſhall firſt overcome me, O Iſrael, ere they touch thee. Wonder did now juſtly ſtrive with feare in the Iſraelites, when they ſaw the cloud remove behind them, and the ſea remove before them. They were not uſed to ſuch bulwarkes. God ſtood behind them in the cloud; the ſea reared them up wals on both ſides them. That which they feared would be their deſtruction, protected them: how eaſily can God make the cruelleſt of his creatures both our friends and patrons.

Yet here was faith mixed with unbeleefe. He was a bold Iſraelite that ſet the firſt foot into the channell of the Sea: and every ſtep that they ſet in that moiſt way, was a new exerciſe of their faith. Pharaoh ſees all this, and wonders; yet hath not the wit or grace to thinke (though the pillar tells him ſo much) that God made a difference betwixt him and Iſrael. He is offended with the Sea, for giving way to his enemies, and yet ſees not why he may not truſt it as well as they. He might well have thought, that he which gave light in Goſhen, when there was darkneſſe in Ægypt, could as well diſtinguiſh in the Sea: but he cannot now either conſider, or feare: it is his time to periſh. God makes him faire way, and lets him run ſmoothly on, till he be come to the midſt of the Sea; not one wave may riſe up againſt him, to wet ſo much as the hoofe of his horſe. Extraordinary favours to wicked men, are the forerunners of their ruine.

Now when God ſees the Ægyptians too farre to returne, he findes time to ſtrike them with their laſt terror: they know not why, but they would return too late. Thoſe Chariots in which they truſted, now faile them, as having done ſervice enough, to carry them into perdition. God purſues them, and they cannot flye from him. Wicked men make equall haſte, both to ſin, and from judgement: but they ſhall one day finde, that it is not more eaſie to run into ſin, then impoſſible to run away from judgement: the ſea will ſhew them, that it regards the rod of Moſes, not the Scepter of Pharaoh; and now (as glad to have got the enemies of God at ſuch advantage) ſhuts her mouth upon them, and ſwallowes them up in her waves, and after ſhe had made ſport with them a while, caſts them upon her ſand, for a ſpectacle of triumph to their adverſaries.

What a ſight was this to the Iſraelites, when they were now ſafe on the ſhore, to ſee their enemies come floating after them upon the billowes, and to find among the carkaſſes upon the ſands, their knowne oppreſſors, which now they can tread upon with inſultation! they did not cry more loud before, then now they ſing. Not their faith, but their ſenſe, teaches them now to magnifie that God after their deliverance, whom they hardly truſted for their deliverance.

THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCE CHARLES, PRINCE of Great Britaine.

Most excellent Prince,

ACcording to the true duty of a ſervant, I entended all my Contemplations to your now glorious Brother, of ſweet and ſorrowfull memory. The firſt part whereof, as it was the laſt Book, that ever was dedicated to that deare, and immortall name of his: ſo it was the laſt, that was turned over by his gracious hand.

Now, ſince it pleaſed the GOD of ſpirits to call him from theſe poore Contemplations of ours, to the bleſſed contemplation of himſelfe, to ſee him as He is, to ſee as he is ſeene; to whom is this ſequell of my labours due, but to your Highneſſe, the heire of his Honour and Vertues? Every yeare of my ſhort pilgrimage, is like to adde ſomething to this Worke; which in regard of the ſubject, is ſcarce finite: The whole doth not onely crave your Highneſſes Patronage, but promiſes to requite your Princely acceptation, with many ſacred examples, and rules, both for pietie, and wiſedome; towards the decking up of this flouriſhing ſpring of your Age; in the hopes whereof, not onely we live, but he that is dead, lives ſtill in you: And if any peece of theſe endevours come ſhort of my deſires, I ſhall ſupply the reſt with my prayers: which ſhall never be wanting to the God of Princes, that your happy proceedings may make glad the Church of God, and your ſelfe in either World, glorious.

Your Highneſſes in all humble devotion, and faithfull obſervance,

The waters of Marah.

ISRAEL was not more loth to come to the Red Sea, then to part from it. How ſoone can God turne the horror of any evill into pleaſure! One ſhore reſounded with ſhrieks of feare; the other with Timbrels and Dances, and Songs of Deliverance. Every maine affliction is our Red Sea, which while it threats to ſwallow, preſerves us. At laſt, our Songs ſhall be louder then our cryes. The Iſraelitiſh Dames, when they ſaw their danger, thought they might have left their Timbrels behind them; how unprofitable a burden ſeemed thoſe inſtruments of Muſick! yet now they live to renue that forgotten Minſtralſie, and Dancing, which their bondage had ſo long diſcontinued: and well might thoſe feet dance upon the ſhore, which had walked thorow the Sea. The Land of Goſhen was not ſo bountifull to them, as theſe Waters. That afforded them a ſervile life: This gave them at once freedome, victory, riches, beſtowing upon them the remainder of that wealth which the Ægyptians had but lent. It was a pleaſure to ſee the floating carcaſſes of their Adverſaries; and every day offers them new booties: It is no marvell then if their hearts were tyed to theſe banks. If we finde but a little pleaſure in our life, we are ready to dote upon it. Every ſmall contentment glues our affections to that we like: And if here our imperfect delights hold us ſo faſt, that we would not be looſed; how forcible ſhall thoſe infinite joyes be above, when our ſoules are once poſſeſſed of them?

Exod. 15.

Yet if the place had pleaſed them more, it is no marvell they were willing to follow Moſes; that they durſt follow him in the Wilderneſſe, whom they followed through the Sea: It is a great confirmation to any people, when they have ſeene the hand of God with their guide. O Saviour, which haſt undertaken to carry me from the ſpirituall Ægypt to the Land of Promiſe; How faithfull, how powerfull have I found thee? How fearleſly ſhould I truſt thee? how cheerefully ſhould I follow thee through contempt, poverty, death it ſelfe! Maſter, if it be thou, bid us come unto thee.

Immediately before, they had complained of too much water: now they goe three dayes without. Thus God meant to puniſh their infidelity, with the defect of that, whoſe abundance made them to diſtruſt. Before, they ſaw all Water, no Land, now all dry and dusty Land, and no water. Extremities are the best tryals of men; as in bodies, those that can beare sudden changes of heats and cold without complaint, are the strongest. So much as an evill touches upon the meane, so much help it yeelds towards patience; Every degree of sorrow is a preparation of the next: but when we passe to extreames without the meane, we want the benefit of recollection, and must trust to our present strength. To come from all things to nothing, is not a descent but a downfall; and it is a rare strength and constancy not to be maimed at least. These headlong evills, as they are the sorest, so they must be most provided for; as on the contrary, a sudden advancement from a low condition to the height of Honour, is most hard to manage. No man can marvell how that Tyrant blinded his Captives, when he heares that he brought them immediately, out of a dark dungeon, into Roomes that were made bright and glorious. We are not worthy to know, for what we are reserved: no evill can amate us, if we can overcome sudden extremities.

The long deferring of a good (though tedious) yet makes it the better when it comes. Well did the Israelites hope that the Waters which were so long in finding, would be precious when they were found: Yet behold, they are crossed, not only in their desires, but in their hopes, for after three daies travell, the first Fountaines they finde are bitter Waters. If these Wells had not ran pure Gall, they could not have so much complained: Long thirst will make bitter waters sweet; yet such were these Springs, that the Israelites did not so much like their moisture, as abhor their relish. I see the first handsell that God gives them in their voyage to the Land of Promise; Thirst and Bitternesse. Satan gives us pleasant entrances into his waies, and reserves the bitternesse for the end: God inures us to our worst at first, and sweetens our conclusion with pleasure.

The same God that would not lead Israel through the Philistins Land, lest they should shrink at the sight of Warre, now leads them through the Wildernesse, and feares not to try their patience with bitter potions. If he had not loved them, the Aegyptian Furnace or Sword had prevented their thirst, or that Sea whereof their Enemies drunk dead; and yet see how he dyets them. Never any have had so bitter draughts upon Earth as those he loves best: The palate is an ill judge of the favours of God. O my Saviour, thou didst drink a more bitter Cup from the hands of thy Father, then that which thou refusedst of the Jewes, or then that which I can drink from thee.

Before, they could not drink if they would; now they might and would not. God can give us blessings with such a tang, that the fruition shall not much differ from the want: So many a one hath riches, not grace to use them; many have children, but such as they preferre barrennesse. They had said before, Oh that we had any water! now, Oh that we had good water! It is good so to desire blessings from God, that we may be the better for enjoying them; so to crave water, that it may not be sawced with bitternesse.

Now, these fond Israelites in stead of praying, murmur; in stead of praying to God, murmur against Moses. What hath the righteous done? He made not either the Wildernesse dry, or the Waters bitter; Yea (if his conduct were the matter) what one foot went he before them without God? The Pillar led them, and not he; yet Moses is murmured at. It is the hard condition of authority, that when the multitude fare well, they applaud themselves; when ill, they repine against their Governours. Who can hope to be free, if Moses escape not? Never any Prince so merited of a people. He thrust himself upon the Pikes of Pharaohs tyranny. He brought them from a bondage worse then death. His rod divided the Sea, and shared life to them, death to their Pursuers. Who would not have thought these men so obliged to Moses, that no death could have opened their mouthes or raised their hands against him? Yet now, the first occasion of want makes them rebell. No benefit can stop the mouth of Impatience: If our turn be not served for the present, former favours are either forgotten, or contemned. No marvell if we deale so with men, when God receives this measure from us. One yeere of Famine, One Summer of Pestilence, One Moone of unsea-

A unſeaſonable weather, makes us over-looke all the bleſſings of God; and more to mutine at the ſenſe of our evill, then to praiſe him for our varieties of good: whereas favours well beſtowed, leave us both mindfull and confident; and will not ſuffer us either to forget or diſtruſt. O God, I have made an ill uſe of thy mercies, if I have not learned to be content with thy corrections.

Moſes was in the ſame want of water with them, in the ſame diſtaſte of bitterneſſe, and yet they ſay to Moſes, What ſhall we drink? If they had ſeene him furniſhed with full veſſels of ſweet water, and themſelves put over to this unſavoury liquor, envy might have given ſome colour to this mutiny: but now their Leaders common miſery, might have freed him from their murmurs. They held it one piece of the late Egyptian tyranny, that a taske was required of them, which the impoſers
B knew they could not performe; to make Brick when they had no Straw: Yet they ſay to Moſes, What ſhall we drink? Themſelves are growne Exactors, and are ready to menace more then ſtripes, if they have not their ends, without meanes. Moſes tooke not upon him their proviſion, but their deliverance: and yet, as if he had been the common Victualer of the Camp, they aske, What ſhall we drink? When want meets with impatient minds, it tranſports them to fury; Every thing diſquiets, and nothing ſatisfies them.

What courſe doth Moſes now take? That which they ſhould have done, and did not: They cried not more fervently to him, then he to God: if he were their Leader, God was his; That which they unjuſtly required of him, he juſtly requires of God, that could doe it; He knew whence to look for redreſſe of all complaints; this was
C not his charge, but his Makers, which was able to maintaine his owne act. I ſee and acknowledge the harbour, that we muſt put into, in all our ill weather. It is to thee, O God, that we muſt poure out our hearts, which onely canſt make our bitter waters ſweet.

Might not that Rod, which tooke away the liquid nature from the waters, and made them ſolid; have alſo taken away the bitter quality from theſe waters, and made them ſweet: ſince to flow is naturall unto the water; to be bitter is but accidentall. Moſes durſt not imploy his Rod without a Precept; he knew the power came from the commandement. We may not preſume on likelihoods, but depend upon warrants; therefore Moſes doth not lift up his Rod to the Waters, but his hand and voyce to God.

D The hand of faith never knocked at heaven in vaine: no ſooner hath Moſes ſhewed his grievance, then God ſhewes him the remedy: yet an unlikely one, that it might be miraculous. He that made the waters, could have given them any ſavour: How eaſie is it for him that made the matter, to alter the quality! It is not more hard to take away, then to give. Who doubts but the ſame hand that created them, might have immediately changed them? Yet that Almighty power will doe it by meanes. A piece of wood muſt ſweeten the waters: What relation hath wood to water? or that which hath no ſavor, to the redreſſe of bitterneſs? Yet here is no more poſſibility of failing, then proportion to the ſucceſſe. All things are ſubject to the command of their Maker; He that made all of nothing, can make every thing of any thing: There is ſo much power in every creature, as he will pleaſe to give. It is the praiſe of E omnipotency to work by improbabilities; Eliſha with Salt, Moſes with wood, ſhall ſweeten the bitter waters; Let no man deſpiſe the meanes, when he knowes the Author.

God taught his people by actions, as well as words. This entrance ſhewed them their whole journey; wherein they ſhould taſte of much bitterneſſe: but at laſt through the mercy of God, ſweetned with comfort. Or did it not repreſent themſelves rather, in the journey? in the fountaines of whoſe hearts, were the bitter waters of manifold corruptions, yet their unſavoury ſoules are ſweetned by the graces of his Spirit. O Bleſſed Saviour: the Wood of thy Croſſe, that is, the application of thy ſufferings, is enough to ſweeten a whole Sea of bitterneſſe. I care not how unpleaſant a potion I finde in this Wilderneſſe, if the power and benefit of thy pretious death may ſeaſon it to my ſoule.

The Quailes and Manna.

Exod. 16. 12

THE thirſt of Iſrael is well quenched: for beſides the change of the waters of Marah, their ſtation is changed to Elim; where were twelve Fountaines, for their twelve Tribes, and now they complaine as faſt of hunger.

Contentation is a rare bleſſing; becauſe it ariſes either from a fruition of all comforts, or a not deſiring of ſome which we have not. Now, we are never ſo bare, as not to have ſome benefits; never ſo full, as not to want ſomething, yea as not to be full of wants. God hath much adoe with us; either we lack health or quietneſſe, or children, or wealth, or company, or our ſelves in all theſe. It is a wonder theſe men found not fault with the want of ſawce to their Quailes, or with their old cloathes, or their ſolitary way. Nature is moderate in her deſires; but conceit is unſatiable. Yet who can deny hunger to be a ſore vexation? Before, they were forbidden ſowre bread, but now what leaven is ſo ſowre as want? When meanes hold out, it is eaſie to be content. Whiles their dough, and other cates laſted, whiles they were gathering of the Dates of Elim, we heare no newes of them. Who cannot pray for his dayly bread, when he hath it in his cup-board? But when our owne proviſion failes us, then not to diſtruſt the proviſion of God, is a noble tryall of faith. They ſhould have ſaid; He that ſtopt the mouth of the Sea, that it could not devoure us, can as eaſily ſtop the mouth of our ſtomacks: It was no eaſier matter to kill the firſt-borne of Ægypt, by his immediate hand, then to preſerve us; He that commanded the Sea to ſtand ſtill and guard us, can as eaſily command the earth to nouriſh us: He that made the Rod a Serpent, can as well make theſe ſtones bread: He that brought armies of Frogs and Caterpillers to Ægypt, can as well bring whole drifts of birds and beaſts to the deſart: He that ſweetned the waters with Wood, can as well refreſh our bodies with the fruits of the earth. Why doe we not wait on him, whom we have found ſo powerfull? Now they ſet the mercy and love of God upon a wrong laſte; Whiles they meaſure it only by their preſent ſenſe. Nature is jocond and cheerefull, whiles it proſpereth: let God withdraw his hand; no ſight, no truſt. Thoſe can praiſe him with Timbrels for a preſent favour, that cannot depend upon him, in the want of meanes for a future. We all are never weary of receiving, ſoone weary of attending.

The other mutiny, was of ſome few male-contents, perhaps, thoſe ſtrangers, which ſought their owne protection under the wing of Iſrael; this of the whole troup. Not that none were free: Caleb, Ioſhua, Moſes, Aaron, Miriam were not yet tainted: uſually God meaſures the ſtate of any Church, or country by the moſt; the greater part carries both the name and cenſure. Sinnes are ſo much greater, as they are more univerſall: ſo far is evill from being extenuated by the multitude of the guilty, that nothing can more aggravate it. With men commonneſſe may plead for favour; with God it pleads for judgement. Many hands draw the Cable with more violence, then few: The leproſie of the whole body is more loathſome, then that of a part.

But what doe theſe mutiners ſay? Oh that we had dyed by the hand of the Lord! And whoſe hand was this, Oh ye fond Iſraelites, if ye muſt periſh by famine? God carried you forth; God reſtrained his creatures from you: and while you are ready to dye thus, ye ſay, Oh that we had dyed by the hand of the Lord!

It is the folly of men, that in immediate judgments they can ſee Gods hand; not in thoſe, whoſe ſecond cauſes are ſenſible: whereas God holds himſelf equally intereſſed in all: challenging that there is no evill in the City, but from him. It is but one hand, and many inſtruments, that God ſtrikes us with: The water may not loſe the name, though it come by chanels and pipes from the ſpring. It is our faithleſneſſe, that in viſible meanes we ſee not him that is inviſible.

And when would they have wiſht to die? When we ſate by the fleſh-pots of Egypt:

Alas,

A Alas, what good would their flesh-pots have done them, in their death? If they might sustaine their life, yet what could they availe them in dying? For if they were unpleasant, what comfort was it, to see them? If pleasant, what comfort to part from them? Our greatest pleasures are but paines in their losse. Every minde affects that which is like it selfe. Carnall minds are for the flesh-pots of Ægypt, though bought with servitude; spirituall are for the presence of God, though redeemed with famine; and would rather die in Gods presence, then live without him in the sight of delicate or full dishes.

They loved their lives well enough: I heard how they shrieked, when they were in danger of the Ægyptians; yet now they say, Oh that we had dyed! Not, Oh that we might live by the flesh-pots; but, Oh that we had dyed! Although life be
B naturally sweet, yet a little discontentment makes us weary. It is a base cowardlinesse, so soone as ever we are called from the garison to the field, to thinke of running away. Then is our fortitude worthy of praise, when we can endure to be miserable.

But what? can no flesh-pots serve but those of Ægypt? I am deceived, if that Land afforded them any flesh-pots save their owne: Their Landlords of Ægypt held it abomination to eat of their dishes, or to kill that which they did eat. In those times then they did eat of their owne; and why not now? They had droves of cattle in the Wildernesse: why did they not take of them? Surely, if they would have bin as good husbands of their cattle, as they were of their dough, they might have had e-C nough to eat without need of murmuring: for if their back-burden of dough lasted for a moneth; their heards might have served them many yeares. All grudging is odious; but most, when our hands are full. To whine in the midst of abundance, is a shamefull unthankfulnesse.

When a man would have looked that the anger of God should have appeared in fire: now behold, his glory appeares in a Cloud. Oh the exceeding long suffering of God, that heares their murmurings! and as if he had been bound to content them, in stead of punishing, pleases them; as a kind mother would deal with a crabbed child, who rather stils him with the brest, then calls for the rod. One would have thought, that the sight of the cloud of God should have dispel'd the cloud of their distrust; & this glory of God should have made them ashamed of themselves, and afraid of him: Yet I do not hear them once say, What a mighty and gracious God have we distru-
D sted? Nothing will content an impotent mind, but fruition. When an heart is hardned with any passion, it will indure much, ere it will yeeld to relent.

Their eies saw the cloud; their eares heard the promise, the performance is speedy & answerable. Needs must they be convinced, when they saw God as glorious in his work, as in his presence; when they saw his word justified by his act. God tels them afore-hand what he will doe, that their expectation might stay their hearts. He doth that which he fore-told, that they might learne to trust him, ere he performe. They desired meat, and receive Quailes; they desired bread, and have Manna. If they had had of the courcest flesh, and of the basest Pulse, hunger would have made it dainty: But now God will pamper their famine; and gives them meat of Kings, & Bread of Angels. What a world of Quailes were but sufficient to serve six hundred thousand E persons? They were all strong, all hungry; neither could they be satisfied with single Fowles. What a Table hath God prepared in the Desart, for abundance, for delicacy? Never Prince was so served in his greatest pomp, as these rebellious Israelites in the Wildernesse. God loves to over-deserve of men; and to exceed not only their sins; but their very desires, in mercy. How good shall we finde him to those that please him, since he is so gracious to offenders! If the most graceless Israelites be fed with Quailes and Manna; Oh, what goodnesse is that he hath laid up for them that love him! As on the contrary, If the Righteous scarce be saved, where will the Sinners appeare? Oh God, thou canst, thou wilt make this difference. Howsoever with us men, the most crabbed and stubborne oftentimes fare the best; the Righteous Judge of the World frames his remunerations as he findes us: And if his mercy sometime provoke the worst to repentance by his temporall favours, yet he ever reserves

ſo much greater reward for the Righteous: as eternity is beyond time, and heaven above earth. A

It was not of any naturall inſtinct, but from the over-ruling power of their Creator, that theſe Quailes came to the Deſart. Needs muſt they come whom GOD brings. His hand is in all the motions of his meaneſt Creatures. Not onely we, but they move in him. As not many Quailes, ſo not one Sparrow falls without him: How much more are the actions of his beſt creature, Man, directed by his providence? How aſhamed might theſe Iſraelites have been, to ſee theſe creatures ſo obedient to their Creator, as to come and offer themſelves to their ſlaughter; whiles they went ſo repiningly to his ſervice and their owne preferment? Who can diſtruſt the proviſion of the great Houſe-keeper of the world, when he ſees how he can furniſh his tables at pleaſure? Is he growne now careleſſe, or we faithleſſe rather? Why doe we not repoſe upon his mercy? Rather then we ſhall want, when we truſt him, he will fetch Quailes from all the coaſts of heaven to our board. Oh Lord, thy hand is not ſhortned to give: let not ours be ſhortned, or ſhut in receiving. B

Eliahs ſervitors, the Ravens, brought him his full ſervice of bread, and fleſh at once; each morning and evening. But theſe Iſraelites have their fleſh at even, and their bread in the morning: Good reaſon there ſhould be a difference. Eliahs table was upon Gods direct appointment; the Iſraelites upon their mutiny: Although God will relieve them with proviſion, yet he will puniſh their impatience with delay; ſo ſhall they know themſelves his people, that they ſhall finde they were murmurers. Not onely in the matter, but in the order, God anſwers their grudging; Firſt they complaine of the want of fleſh-pots, then of bread. In the firſt place therefore they have fleſh, bread after. When they have fleſh, yet they muſt ſtay a time ere they can have a full meale; unleſſe they would eat their meat breadleſſe, and their bread dry. God will be waited on and will give the conſummation of his bleſſings at his own leaſure. In the evening of our life, we have the firſt pledges of his favour: but in the morning of our reſurrection, muſt we looke for our perfect ſaciety of the true Manna, the bread of life. C

Now the Iſraelites ſped well with their Quailes; they did eat and digeſt, and proſper: not long after, they have Quailes with a vengeance; the meat was pleaſant, but the ſauce was fearfull, They let down the Quailes at their mouth, but they came out at their noſtrils. How much better had it been to have died of hunger, through the chaſtiſement of God, then of the plague of God, with the fleſh betwixt their teeth! Behold, they periſh of the ſame diſeaſe then, whereof they now recover. The ſame ſinne repeated, is death, whoſe firſt act found remiſſion: Relapſes are deſperate, where the ſickneſſe it ſelf is not. With us men, once goes away with a warning, the ſecond act is but whipping, the third is death. It is a mortall thing to abuſe the lenity of God; we ſhould be preſumptuouſly mad, to hope that God will ſtand us for a ſinning-ſtock, to provoke him how we will. It is more mercy then he owes us, if he forbeare us once: it is his juſtice to plague us the ſecond time: We may thanke our ſelves, if we will not be warned. D

Their meat was ſtrange, but nothing ſo much as their bread. To find Quailes in a Wilderneſſe was unuſuall; but for bread to come down from Heaven was yet more. They had ſeen Quailes before (though not in ſuch number:) Manna was never ſeen till now. From this day till their ſetling in Canaan, God wrought a perpetuall miracle in this food. A miracle in the place: other bread riſes up from below, this fell down from above; neither did it ever rain bread till now; Yet ſo did this heavenly ſhowre fall, that it is confined to the Camp of Iſrael. A miracle in the quantity: That every morning ſhould fall enough to fill ſo many hundred thouſand mouthes and mawes. A miracle in the compoſition; That it was ſweet like hony-cakes, round like Corianders, tranſparent as dew. A miracle in the quality; That it melted by one heat, by another hardened. A miracle in the difference of the fal; That (as if it knew times, and would teach them as wel as feed them) it fell double in the even of the Sabbath, and on the Sabbath fell not. A miracle in the putrefaction and preſervation; That it E

was

A was full of wormes, when it was kept beyond the due hour for diſtruſt: full of ſweetneſſe, when it was kept a day longer for religion; Yea, many Ages, in the Ark, for a monument of the power and mercy of the Giver. A miracle in the continuance and ceaſing; That this ſhowre of bread followed their Camp in all their removals, till they came to taſte of the bread of Canaan, and then withdrew it ſelfe, as if it ſhould have ſaid: Ye need no miracles now ye have meanes.

They had the types; we have the ſubſtance. In this wilderneſſe of the World, the true Manna is rained upon the tents of our hearts. He that ſent the Manna, was the Manna, which he ſent: He hath ſaid, I am the Manna that came downe from Heaven. Behold, their whole meales were ſacramentall: Every morſell they did eat, was ſpirituall. We eat ſtill of their Manna: ſtill he comes downe from heaven. He hath
B ſubſtance enough for worlds of ſoules; yet only is to be found in the liſts of the true Church; He hath more ſweetneſſe then the hony, and the hony-comb. Happy are we if we can find him ſo ſweet as he is.

The ſame hand that rained Manna upon their tents, could have rained it into their mouths, or laps. God loves we ſhould take paines for our ſpirituall food. Little would it have availed them, that the Manna lay about their tents, if they had not gone forth and gathered it, beaten it, bak't it: Let ſalvation be never ſo plentifull, if we bring it not home, and make it ours by faith, we are no whit the better. If the work done, and meanes uſed, had been enough to give life, no Iſraelite had dyed: Their bellies were full of that bread, whereof one crumme gives life: yet they dyed many of them in diſpleaſure. As in naturall, ſo in ſpirituall things, we may not truſt to
C meanes: The carcaſſe of the Sacrament cannot give life, but the ſoule of it; which is the thing repreſented. I ſee each man gather, and take his juſt meaſure out of the common heap. We muſt be induſtrious, and helpfull each to other: but when we have done, Chriſt is not partiall. If our ſanctification differ, yet our juſtification is equall in all.

He that gave a Gomer to each, could have given an Ephah: As eaſily could he have rained down enough for a moneth, or a yeare at once, as for a day. God delights to have us live in a continuall dependence upon his providence, and each day renue the acts of our faith and thankfulneſſe. But what a covetous Iſraelite was that, which in a fooliſh diſtruſt would be ſparing the charges of God; & reſerving that for morning,
D which he ſhould have ſpent upon his ſupper? He ſhall know, that even the bread that came down from heaven can corrupt: The Manna was from above; the worms and ſtink from his diffidence. Nothing is ſo ſoveraigne which being perverted, may not annoy in ſtead of benefiting us.

Yet I ſee ſome difference between the true and typicall Manna; God never meant that the ſhadow and the body ſhould agree in all things. The outward Manna reſerved, was poyſon: the ſpirituall Manna is to us, as it was to the Ark; not good, unleſſe it be kept perpetually; If we keep it, it ſhall keep us from putrefaction. The outward Manna fell not at all on the Sabbath: The ſpirituall Manna (though it balks no day) yet it falls double on Gods day: and if we gather it not then; we famiſh. In that true Sabbath of our glorious reſt, we ſhall for ever feed of that Manna which we have
E gathered in this eeven of our life.

The Rocke of Rephidim.

Exod. 17

BEfore, Iſrael thirſted and was ſatisfied; after that, they hungred and were filled; now they thirſt again. They have bread and meat, but want drink: It is a marvell if God do not evermore hold us ſhort of ſomething, becauſe he would keep us ſtill in exerciſe. We ſhould forget at whoſe coſt we live, if we wanted nothing. Still God obſerves a viciſſitude of evill, & good; and the ſame evills that we have paſſed, return upon us in their courſes. Croſſes are not of the nature of thoſe diſeaſes, which they ſay a man can have but once. Their firſt ſeiſure doth but make way for their re-entry. None but our laſt enemy comes once once for all; and I know not, if that: for even in living we dye dayly. So muſt we take our leaves of all afflictions, that we reſerve a lodging for them, and expect their returne. A

All Iſrael murmured when they wanted bread, meat, water; and yet all Iſrael departed from the wilderneſſe of Sin to Rephidim, at Gods command. The very worſt men will obey God in ſomething; none but the good, in all: He is rarely deſperate, that makes an univerſall oppoſition to God. It is an unſound praiſe that is given a man, for one good action: It may be ſafely ſaid of the very Devils themſelves, that they doe ſomething well: They know and beleeve, and tremble. If we follow God, and murmur, it is all one, as if we had ſtayed behind.

Thoſe diſtruſt his providence in their neceſſity, that are ready to follow his guidance in their welfare. It is an harder matter to endure in extreame want, then to obey an hard commandement. Sufferings are greater trials, then actions: How many have we ſeen jeopard their lives, with chearfull reſolution, which cannot indure in cold bloud to loſe a limb with patience! Becauſe God wil have his throughly tried, he puts them to both, and if we cannot indure both to follow him from Sin, and to thirſt in Rephidim, we are not ſound Iſraelites. B

God led them, on purpoſe to this dry Rephidim: He could as well have conducted them to another Elim, to convenient waterings: Or he that gives the waters of all their channels, could as well have derived them to meet Iſrael: But God doth purpoſely carry them to thirſt. It is not for neceſſity, that we fare ill, but out of choyce: It were all one with God to give us health, as ſickneſſe; abundance as poverty. The treaſury of his riches hath more ſtore then his creature can be capable of; we could not complaine, if it were not good for us to want. C

This ſhould have been a contentment able to quench any thirſt: God hath led us hither; If Moſes out of ignorance had miſguided us, or we chanceably falne upon theſe dry deſarts, though this were no remedy of our griefe, yet it might be ſome ground of our complaint. But now the counſell of ſo wiſe and mercifull a God, hath drawn us into this want; and ſhall not he as eaſily find the way out? It is the Lord, let him doe what he will. There can be no more forcible motive to patience, then the acknowledgement of a divine hand that ſtrikes us. It is fearfull to be in the hand of an adverſary; but who would not be confident of a Father? Yet in our fraile humanity, choler may tranſport a man from remembrance of nature; but when we feele our ſelves under the diſcipline of a wiſe God, that can temper our afflictions to our ſtrength, to our benefit; who would not rather murmur at himſelf; that he ſhould ſwerve towards impatience? Yet theſe ſturdy Iſraelites wilfully murmur: and will not have their thirſt quenched with faith, but with water. Give us water. D

I looked to heare when they would have entreated Moſes to pray for them: but in ſtead of entreating, they contend, and in ſtead of prayers, I finde commands: Give us water. If they had gone to God without Moſes, I ſhould have praiſed their faith: but now they goe to Moſes without God, I hate their ſtubborn faithleſneſſe. To ſeek to the ſecond meanes, with neglect of the firſt, is the fruit of a falſe faith.

The anſwer of Moſes is like himſelf, mild and ſweet: Why contend you with me? Why tempt ye the Lord? In the firſt expoſtulation condemning them of injuſtice; ſince not he, but the Lord had afflicted them. In the ſecond, of preſumption; that ſince it was God that tempted them by want, they ſhould tempt him by murmuring. In the one, he would have them ſee their wrong; in the other their danger. As the act came not from him, but from God; ſo he puts it off to God, from himſelf: Why tempt ye the Lord? The oppoſition which is made to the inſtruments of God, redounds ever to his perſon. He holds himſelfe ſmitten through the ſides of his Miniſters: ſo hath God incorporated theſe reſpects, that our ſubtilty cannot divide them. E

But what temptation is this? Is the Lord among us or no? Infidelity is crafty, & yet fooliſh; Crafty in her inſinuations, fooliſh in her conceits. They imply, if we were ſure the Lord were with us, we would not diſtruſt; They conceive doubts of his preſence, after ſuch confirmations. What could God doe more, to make them know him preſent,

A sent, unleſſe every moment ſhould have renued miracles? The plagues of Egypt, and the diviſion of the Sea were ſo famous, that the very Innes of Iericho rang of them. Their waters were lately ſweetned; the Quailes were yet in their teeth; the Manna was yet in their eye; yea, they ſaw God in the Pillar of the Cloud, and yet they ſay, Is the Lord amongſt us? No argument is enough to an incredulous heart; not reaſon, not ſenſe, not experience. How much better was that faith of Thomas, that would beleeve his eyes and hands, though his eares he would not? Oh the deep infidelity of theſe Iſraelites, that ſaw and beleeved not!

And how will they know if God be amongſt them? As if he could not be with them, and they be athirſt: either God muſt humour carnall minds, or be diſtruſted: If they proſper (though it be with wickedneſſe) God is with them; If they be thwarted in their own deſignes, ſtraight, Is God with us? It was the way to put God from them, to diſtruſt and murmure. If he had not bin with them, they had not lived; If he had been in them, they had not mutined. They can think him abſent in their want, and cannot ſee him abſent in their ſin: and yet wickedneſſe, not affliction, argues him gone; yet then is he moſt preſent, when he moſt chaſtiſes.

Who would not have looked, that this anſwer of Moſes ſhould have appeaſed their fury? As what can ſtill him that will not be quiet to think he hath God for his Adverſary? But as if they would wilfully warre againſt heaven, they proceed; yet with no leſſe craft then violence; bending their exception to one part of the anſwer: and ſmoothly omitting, what they could not except againſt. They wil not hear of tempting God; they maintain their ſtrife with Moſes, both with words and ſtones. How C malicious, how heady is impatience! The act was Gods, they caſt it upon Moſes, Wherefore haſt thou brought us? The act of God was mercifull, they make it cruell, To kill us and our children: As if God and Moſes meant nothing but their ruine, who intended nothing but their life and liberty. Fooliſh men! What needed this journey to death? Were they not as obnoxious to God in Ægypt? Could not God by Moſes as eaſily have killed them in Ægypt, or in the Sea, as their enemies? Impatience is full of miſconſtruction; If it be poſſible to finde out any gloſſe to corrupt the Text of Gods actions, they ſhall bee ſure not to ſcape untainted.

It was no expoſtulating with an unreaſonable multitude; Moſes runs ſtraight to him that was able at once to quench their thirſt, and their fury: What ſhall I doe to this people? It is the beſt way to truſt God with his own cauſes: when men will be in- D termedling with his affaires, they undoe themſelves in vaine. We ſhall finde difficulties in all great enterpriſes: If we be ſure we have begun them from God, we may ſecurely caſt all events upon his providence, which knows how to diſpoſe, and how to end them.

Moſes perceived rage, not in the tongues only, but in the hands of the Iſraelites. Yet a while longer and they will ſtone me. Even the Leader of Gods people, feared death; and ſinned not in fearing. Life is worthy to be deare to all; eſpecially to him, whom publike charge hath made neceſſary: Meere feare is not ſinfull; It is impotence and diſtruſt that accompany it, which make it evill. How well is that feare beſtowed, that ſends us the more importunately to God! Some man would have thought of flight; Moſes flies to his Prayers; and that not for revenge, but for help. Who but E Moſes would not have ſaid, This twice they have mutined, and been pardoned; and now again thou ſeeſt, O Lord, how madly they rebell; and how bloudily they intend againſt me; preſerve me, I beſeech thee, and plague them. I heare none of this; but imitating the long-ſuffering of his God, he ſeeks to God for them, which ſought to kill him for the quarrell of God.

Neither is God ſooner ſought then found: All Iſrael might ſee Moſes goe towards the Rock: None but the Elders might ſee him ſtrike it. Their unbeliefe made them unworthy of this priviledge. It is no ſmal favour of God, to make us witneſſes of his great Works; That he crucifies his Son before us; that he fetches the water of Life out of the true Rock, in our ſight, is an high prerogative; If his rigour would have taken it, our infidelity had equally excluded us, whom now his mercy hath received.

Moſes muſt take his Rod; God could have done it by his wil, without a word; or by his word, without the Rod; but he will doe by meanes, that which he can as easily doe without. There was no vertue in the Rod, none in the ſtroke; but all in the command of God. Meanes muſt be uſed, and yet their efficacy muſt be expected out of themſelves.

It doth not ſuffice God to name the Rod, without a deſcription; (Whereby thou ſmoteſt the River:) Wherefore? but to ſtrengthen the faith of Moſes, that he might well expect this wonder from that, which he had tryed to be miraculous. How could he but firmely beleeve, that the ſame meanes which turned the waters into bloud, and turned the ſea into a wall, could as well turn the ſtone into water? Nothing more raiſes up the heart in preſent affiance, then the recognition of favours, or wonders paſſed. Behold, the ſame Rod that brought plagues to the Egyptians, brings deliverances to Iſrael. By the ſame meanes can God ſave and condemne: like as the ſame ſword defends and kills.

That power which turned the wings of the Quailes to the wilderneſſe, turned the courſe of the water through the Rock: he might (if he had pleaſed) have cauſed a Spring to well out of the plaine earth; but he will now fetch it out of the ſtone, to convince and ſhame their infidelity.

What is more hard and dry then the Rock? What more moiſt and ſupple then water? That they may be aſhamed to think, they diſtruſted leſt God could bring them water out of the Clouds or Springs, the very Rock ſhall yeeld it.

And now, unleſſe their hearts had beene more rocky than this ſtone, they could not but have reſolved them into teares, for this diffidence.

I wonder to ſee theſe Iſraelites fed with Sacraments: Their bread was ſacramentall, whereof they communicated every day: leſt any man ſhould complaine of frequence, the Iſraelites received daily; and now their drinke was ſacramentall, that the ancient Church may give no warrant of a dry Communion.

Twice therefore hath the Rock yeelded them water of refreſhing, to ſignifie that the true ſpirituall Rock yeelds it alwaies. The Rock that followed them was Chriſt: Out of thy ſide, O Saviour, iſſued that bloudy ſtreame, whereby the thirſt of all beleevers is comfortably quenched: Let us but thirſt, not with repining, but with faith; this Rock of thine ſhall abundantly flow forth to our ſoules, and follow us, till this water be changed into that new wine, which we ſhall drink with thee in thy Fathers Kingdome.

The Foyle of Amalek: or the hand of Moses lift up.

Exod. 17. 12

NO ſooner is Iſraels thirſt ſlaked, then God hath an Amalekite ready to aſſault them. The Almighty hath choice of rods to whip us with; and will not be content with one tryall. They would needs be quarrelling with Moſes, without a cauſe; and now God ſends the Amalekites to quarrel with them. It is juſt with God, that they which would be cõtending with their beſt friends, ſhould have work enough of contending with enemies.

In their paſſage out of Ægypt, God would not leade them the neareſt way, by the Philiſtims Land, leſt they ſhould repent at the ſight of warre; now they both ſee, and feele it. He knows how to make the fitteſt choice of the times of evill; and withholds that one while, which he ſends another, not without a juſt reaſon, why hee ſends, and with-holds it: And though to us they come ever (as we think) unſeaſonably, and at ſome times more unfitly then others; ye he that ſends them knows their opportunities.

Who would not have thought, a worſe time could never have beene pickt for Iſraels warre, then now? In the feebleneſſe of their troupes, when they were wearied, thirſty, unweaponed; Yet now muſt the Amalekites doe that, which before, the Philiſtims might not doe: We are not worthy, not able to chuſe for our ſelves.

To

A To be ſick, and dye in the ſtrength of youth, in the minority of children: To be pinched with poverty, or miſcariage of children in our age, how harſhly unſeaſonable it ſeemes! But the infinite wiſdome that orders our events, knows how to order our times. Unleſſe we will be ſhameleſſe unbeleevers, O Lord, we muſt truſt thee with our ſelves and our ſeaſons, and know, that not that which we deſire, but that which thou haſt appointed, is the fitteſt time for our ſufferings.

Amalek was Eſau's grand-child; and theſe Iſraelites the Sons of Iacob. The abode of Amalek was not ſo far from Ægypt, but they might well heare what became of their Couſins of Iſrael, and now, doubtleſſe, out of envy watcht their opportunity of revenge for their old grudge. Malice is commonly hereditary, and runs in the bloud, and (as we uſe to ſay of Runnet) the older it is, the ſtronger.

B Hence is that fooliſh hoſtility, which ſome men unjuſtly nouriſh upon no other grounds then the quarrels of their fore-fathers. To wreak our malice upon poſterity, is at the beſt, but the humour of an Amalekite.

How cowardly and how crafty was this Skirmiſh of Amalek! They doe not bid them battell in faire termes of War, but without all noiſe of warning, come ſtealing upon the hindmoſt, and fall upon the weak and ſcattered remnants of Iſrael.

There is no looking for favour at the hands of malice: The worſt that either force or fraud can doe, muſt be expected of an Adverſary, but much more of our ſpiritual enemy, by how much his hatred is deeper. Behold, this Amalek lies in ambuſh to hinder our paſſage unto our Land of Promiſe; and ſubtilly takes all advantages of our weakneſſes. We cannot be wiſe or ſafe if we ſtay behind our colours, and ſtrengthen
C not thoſe parts, where is moſt perill of oppoſition.

I doe not heare Moſes ſay to his Ioſhua, Amalek is come up againſt us; it matters not whether thou goe againſt him or not; or if thou goe, whether alone or with company; or if accompanied, whether with many or few, ſtrong or weak; or if ſtrong men, whether they fight or no; I will pray on the Hill: but, Chooſe us out men and goe fight.

Then onely can we pray with hope, when we have done our beſt. And though the meanes cannot effect that, which we deſire; yet God will have us uſe the likelieſt meanes on our part, to effect it. Where it comes immediately from the charge of God, any meanes are effectuall; One ſtick of wood ſhall fetch water out of the Rock, another ſhall fetch bitterneſſe out of the water: but in thoſe projects which we
D make for our owne purpoſes, we muſt chuſe thoſe helps which promiſe moſt efficacy. In vaine ſhall Moſes be upon the Hill, if Ioſhua be not in the Valley. Prayer without meanes, is a mockery of God.

Here are two ſhadowes of one ſubſtance; The ſame Chriſt in Ioſhua fights againſt our ſpirituall Amalek, and in Moſes ſpreads out his armes upon the Hill; and in both, conquers. And why doth he climb up the hill rather than pray in the valley? perhaps that he might have the more freedome to his thoughts; which, following the ſenſe, are ſo much more heavenly, as the eye ſees more of heaven. Though vertue lies not in the place, yet choice muſt be made of thoſe places, which may be moſt help to our devotion: Perhaps that he might be in the eye of Iſrael.

The preſence and ſight of the Leader gives heart to the people: neither doth any E thing more move the multitude, then example. A publike perſon cannot hide himſelfe in the Valley: but yet it becomes him beſt to ſhew himſelf upon the Hill.

The hand of Moſes muſt be raiſed, but not empty; neither is it his owne Rod that he holds, but Gods. In the firſt meeting of God with Moſes, the Rod was Moſes's; it is like, for the uſe of his trade: now the propriety is altered; God hath ſo wrought by it, that now he challenges it; and Moſes dare not call it his owne.

Thoſe things which it pleaſes God to uſe for his owne ſervice, are now changed in their condition. The bread of the Sacrament was once the Bakers, now it is Gods; the water was once every mans, now it is the Laver of Regeneration. It is both unjuſt and unſafe to hold thoſe things common, wherein God hath a peculiarity.

At other times, upon occaſion of the plagues, and of the Quailes, and of the Rock, hee was commanded to take the Rod in his hand, now hee doth it unbidden. Hee doth it not now for miraculous operation, but for incouragement.

For when the Israelites should cast up their eyes to the Hill, and see Moses and his Rod, (the man and the meanes that had wrought so powerfully for them) they could not but take heart to themselves, and think, There is the man that delivered us from the Egyptian, Why not now from the Amalekite? There is the Rod which turned waters to bloud, and brought varieties of plagues upon Egypt; Why not now on Amalek?

Nothing can more hearten our faith, than the view of the monuments of Gods favour: if ever we have found any word or act of God cordiall to us, it is good to fetch it forth oft to the eye. The renewing of our sense, and remembrance, makes every gift of God perpetually beneficiall.

If Moses had received a command, that Rod which fetcht water from the Rock, could as well have fetcht the bloud of the Amalekites out of their bodies: God will not work miracles alwaies; neither must we expect them unbidden.

Not as a Standard-bearer so much as a suppliant doth Moses lift up his hand: The gesture of the body should both expresse and further the piety of the soule. This flesh of ours is not a good servant unlesse it help us in the best offices: The God of Spirits doth most respect the soule of our devotion; yet it is both unmannerly and irreligious to be misgestured in our Prayers. The careless and uncomely carriage of the body helps both to signifie and make a prophane soule.

The hand and the Rod of Moses never moved in vaine; Though the Rod did not strike Amalek, as it had done the Rock: yet it smote Heaven, and fetcht downe victory. And that the Israelites might see, the hand of Moses had a greater stroke in the fight than all theirs, the successe must rise and fall with it: Amalek rose, and Israel fell with his hand falling: Amalek fell, and Israel rises, with his hand raised. Oh the wondrous power of the prayers of faith! All heavenly favours are derived to us from this channell of grace: To these are we beholden for our peace, preservations, and all the rich mercies of God which we enjoy. We could not want if we could aske.

Every mans hand would not have done this, but the hand of a Moses. A faithlesse man may as well hold his hand and tongue still; he may babble, but prayes not; he prayes ineffectually, and receives not: Onely the prayer of the Righteous availeth much; and onely the beleever is righteous.

There can be no merit, no recompence answerable to a good mans praier, for heaven and the eare of God is open to him: but the formall devotions of an Ignorant, and faithlesse man, are not worth that crust of bread which he askes: Yea, it is presumption in himself; how should it be beneficiall to others? it prophanes the name of God, in stead of adoring it.

But how justly is the fervency of the prayer added to the righteousnesse of the person? When Moses hand slackned, Amalek prevailed. No Moses can have his hand ever up; It is a title proper to God, that his hands are stretched out still: whether to mercy or vengeance. Our infirmity will not suffer any long intention, either of body or minde. Long prayers can hardly maintaine their vigour; as in tall bodies the spirits are diffused. The strongest hand will languish, with long extending: And when our devotion tires, it is seene in the successe; then straight our Amalek prevailes. Spirituall wickednesses are mastered by vehement prayer; and by heartlessnesse in prayer overcome us.

Moses had two helps, A stone to sit on, and an hand to raise his: And his sitting and holpen hand is no whit lesse effectuall. Even in our prayers will God allow us to respect our owne infirmities. In cases of our necessity, he regards not the posture of body, but the affections of the soule.

Doubtlesse Aaron and Hur did not onely raise their hands, but their mindes with his: The more cords the easier draught. Aaron was brother to Moses: There cannot be a more brotherly office, than to help one another in our praiers, and to excite our mutuall devotions. No Christian may think it enough to pray alone; He is no true Israelite, that will not be ready to lift up the weary hands of Gods Saints:

All

A All Israel saw this: or if they were so intent upon the slaughter, and spoile, that they observed it not, they might heare it after from Aaron and Hur: yet this contents not God; It must be written. Many other miracles had God done before; not one, directly commanded to be recorded: The other were onely for the wonder; this for the imitation of Gods people. In things that must live by report, every tongue addes or detracts something; The word once written is both inalterable and permanent.

As God is carefull to maintaine the glory of his miraculous victory: so is Moses desirous to second him; God by a Book, and Moses by an Altar, and a name. God commands to enroule it in parchment; Moses registers it in the stones of his Altar; which he raises not only for future memory, but for present use. That hand which
B was weary of lifting up, straight offers a sacrifice of praise to God: How well it becomes the just to be thankfull! Even very nature teacheth us men to abhor ingratitude in small favours. How much lesse can that Fountain of goodnesse abide to be laded at with unthankfull hands? O God, we cannot but confesse our deliverances: where are our Altars? where are our Sacrifices? where is our Iehovah-nissi? I doe not more wonder at thy power in preserving us, than at thy mercy, which is not weary of casting away favours upon the ingratefull.

The Law.

C IT is but about seven weeks, since Israel came out of Ægypt: In which space God had cherished their faith by five severall wonders: yet now he thinks it time to give them Statutes from heaven, as well as bread. The Manna and water from the Rock (which was Christ in the Gospel) were given before the Law. The Sacraments of Grace, before the legal Covenant. The grace of God preventeth our obedience; Therefore should we keep the Law of God, becaus we have a Saviour. Oh the mercy of our God! which before we see what we are bound to doe, shewes us our remedy, if we doe it not: How can our faith disanull the Law, when it was before it? It may help to fulfill that which shall be: it cannot frustrate that which was not. The Letters which God had written in our fleshy tables, were now (as those which are carved in some D barkes) almost grown out; he saw it time to write them in dead Tables, whose hardnesse should not be capable of alteration: He knew, that the stone would be more faithfull then our hearts.

O marvellous accordance betwixt the two Testaments! In the very time of their delivery, there is the same agreement, which is in the substance. The ancient Jewes kept our Feasts, and we still keep theirs. The Feast of the Passeover is the time of Christs resurrection, then did he passe from under the bondage of Death. Christ is our Passeover, the spotlesse Lamb, whereof not a bone must be broken. The very day, wherein God came down in fire and thunder to deliver the Law, even the same day came also the Holy Ghost down upon the Disciples in fiery tongues, for the propagation of the Gospel. That other was in fire and smoak, obscurity was
E mingled with terrour: This was in fire without smoak, befitting the light and clearnesse of the Gospel: Fire, not in flashes, but in tongues; not to terrifie, but to instruct. The promulgation of the Law, makes way for the Law of the Gospel; No man receives the Holy Ghost, but he which hath felt the terrours of Sinai.

God might have imposed upon them a Law perforce; They were his creatures, and he could require nothing but justice. It had been but equall that they should be compelled to obey their Maker; yet that God which loves to doe all things sweetly, gives the Law of justice in mercy, and will not imperiously command, but craves our assent for that, which it were rebellion not to doe.

How gentle should be the proceeding of fellow creatures, who have an equality of being, with an inequality of condition, when their infinite Maker requests, where he might constrain! God will make no covenant with the unwilling; how much lesse the covenant of Grace, which ſtands all upon love? If we ſtay till God offer violence to our will, or to us, againſt our will, we ſhall die ſtrangers from him. The Church is the Spouſe of Chriſt; he wil enjoy her love by a willing contract, not by a raviſhment. The obſtinate have nothing to doe with God; The title of all Converts, is, A willing people.

That Iſrael inclined to God, it was from God; he inquires after his own gifts in us, for our capacity of more. They had not received the Law, unleſſe they had firſt received a diſpoſition fit to be commanded. As there was an inclination to heare, ſo there muſt be a preparation for hearing. Gods juſtice had before prepared his Iſraelites, by hunger, thirſt, fear of enemies; his mercie had prepared them by deliverances, by proviſions of water, meat, bread: & yet beſides all the ſight of God in his miracles, they muſt be three daies prepared to hear him. When our ſouls are at the beſt, our approach to God requires particular addreſſes: And if three dayes were little enough to prepare them to receive the Law; how is all our life ſhort enough to prepare for the reckoning of our obſerving it? And if the word of a command expected ſuch readineſſe; what ſhall the word of promiſe, the promiſe of Chriſt and ſalvation?

The Moraine of Ægypt was not ſo infectious as their vices; the contagion of theſe ſtuck ſtill by Iſrael: All the water of the Red Sea, and of Marah, and that which guſhed out of the Rock, had not waſhed it off. From theſe, they muſt now be ſanctified. As ſin is alwaies dangerous; ſo moſt, when we bring it into Gods ſight: It envenometh both our perſons and ſervices, and turnes our good into evill. As therefore we muſt be alwaies holy: ſo moſt, when we preſent our ſelves to the holy eyes of our Creator. We waſh our hands every day; but when we are to ſit with ſome great perſon, we ſcowre them with balls. And if we muſt be ſanctified only to receive the Law, how holy muſt we be to receive the grace promiſed in the Goſpell?

Neither muſt themſelves only be cleanſed, but their very cloathes: Their garments ſmelt of Ægypt, even they muſt be waſhed: Neither can cloathes be capable of ſin, nor can water cleanſe from ſinne: The danger was neither in their garments, nor their skin; yet they muſt be waſhed, that they might learne by their cloathes, with what ſoules to appeare before their God. Thoſe garments muſt be waſhed, which ſhould never wax old, that now they might begin their age in purity; as thoſe which were in more danger of being foule, then bare. It is fit that our reverence to Gods preſence ſhould appeare in our very garments; that both without and within we may be cleanly: but little would neatneſſe of veſtures availe us with a filthy ſoule. The God of ſpirits looks to the inner man; and challenges the purity of that part which reſembles himſelf: Cleanſe your hands yee ſinners, and purge your hearts yee double minded.

Yet even when they were waſhed and ſanctified, they may not touch the Mount; not only with their feet, but, not with their eyes: The ſmoak keeps it from their eies; the marks from their feet. Not only men that had ſome impurity at their beſt, are reſtrained, but even beaſts which are not capable of any unholines. Thoſe beaſts which muſt touch his Altars, yet might not touch his hill: And if a beaſt touch it, he muſt die: yet ſo as no hands may touch that, which hath touched the hill. Unreaſonableneſſe might ſeem to be an excuſe in theſe creatures: that therefore which is death to a beaſt, muſt needs be capitall to them, whoſe reaſon ſhould guide them to avoid preſumption. Thoſe Iſraelites which ſaw God every day in the pillar of fire, and the cloud, muſt not come neare him in the Mount. God loves at once familiarity and feare; Familiarity in our converſation, and fear in his commands. He loves to be acquainted with men, in the walks of their obedience: yet he takes ſtate upon him in his ordinances; and will be trembled at, in his word and Judgements.

I ſee the difference of Gods cariage to men in the Law, and in the Goſpel: There the very Hill where he appeared, may not be touched of the pureſt Iſraelite; here the hemme of his garment is touched by the woman, that had the flux of bloud; yea, his very face was touched with the lips of Iudas. There the very earth was prohibited them, on which he deſcended: Here his very body and bloud is profered to our touch and taſte. Oh the marvellous kindneſſe of our God! How unthankfull are we,

if

A if we doe not acknowledge this mercy above his ancient people! They were his own; yet ſtrangers in compariſon of our liberty. It is our ſhame and ſinne, if in theſe meanes of intireneſſe, we be no better acquainted with God, than they, which in their greateſt familiarity were commanded aloofe.

God was ever wonderfull in his works, and fearfull in his judgments: but he was never ſo terrible in the execution of his will, as now in the promulgation of it. Here was nothing but a majeſtical terror in the eies, in the eares of the Iſraelites; as if God meant to ſhew them by this, how fearful he could be. Here was the lightning darted in their eies, the thunders roaring in their eares, the Trumpet of God drowning the thunder-claps, the voice of God out-ſpeaking the Trumpet of the Angel; the Cloud enwrapping, the ſmoak aſcending, the fire flaming, the Mount trembling, Moſes B climbing and quaking, paleneſſe and death in the face of Iſrael, uproare in the Elements, and all the glory of Heaven turned into terror. In the deſtruction of the firſt world, there were clouds without fire: In the deſtruction of Sodom there was fire raining without clouds; but here was fire, ſmoak, clouds, thunder, earthquakes, & whatſoever might work more aſtoniſhment, then ever was in any vengeance inflicted.

And if the Law were thus given, how ſhall it be required? If ſuch were the Proclamation of Gods Statutes, what ſhall the Seſſions be? I ſee, and tremble at the reſemblance. The Trumpet of the Angel called unto the one: The voyce of an Archangell, the Trumpet of God ſhall ſummon us to the other. To the one, Moſes (that climbed up that Hill, and alone ſaw it) ſayes, God came with ten thouſands of his Saints; In the other, thouſand thouſands ſhall miniſter to him, & ten thouſand thouſands ſhall ſtand before him. In the one, Mount Sinai only was on a flame; all the C World ſhall be ſo, in the other. In the one there was fire, ſmoak, thunder and lightning; In the other a fiery ſtream ſhall iſſue from him, wherewith the heavens ſhall be diſſolved, and the Elements ſhall melt away with a noiſe. O God, how powerfull art thou to inflict vengeance upon ſinners, who didſt thus forbid ſinne! and if thou wert ſo terrible a Lawgiver, what a Judge ſhalt thou appeare? What ſhall become of the breakers of ſo fiery a Law? Oh where ſhall thoſe appeare that are guilty of the tranſgreſſing that Law, whoſe very delivery was little leſſe than death? If our God ſhould exact his Law but in the ſame rigor wherein he gave it, ſinne could not quit the coſt: But now the fire wherein it was delivered, was but terrifying; the fire wherein it ſhall be required, is conſuming. Happy are thoſe that are from under the D terrours of that Law, which was given in fire, and in fire ſhall be required.

God would have Iſrael ſee, that they had not to doe with ſome impotent Commander, that is fain to publiſh his Lawes without noyſe, in dead paper; which can more eaſily injoyne, than puniſh; or deſcry, than execute; and therefore, before he gives them a Law, he ſhewes them that he can command Heaven, Earth, Fire, Ayre, in revenge of the breach of the Law; That they could not but think it deadly to diſpleaſe ſuch a Law-giver, or violate ſuch dreadfull Statutes; that they might ſee all the Elements, examples of that obedience, which they ſhould yeeld unto their Maker.

This fire wherein the Law was given, is ſtill in it; and will never out: Hence are thoſe terrours which it flaſhes in every conſcience, that hath felt remorſe of ſin. E very mans heart is a Sinai, and reſembles to him both heaven and hell. The ſting of death is ſin, and the ſtrength of ſin is the Law.

That they might ſee he could finde out their cloſeſt ſins, he delivers his Law in the light of fire, from out of the ſmoak; that they might ſee what is due to their ſins, they ſee fire above, to repreſent the fire that ſhould be below them; that they might know he could waken their ſecurity, the Thunder, and lowder voyce of God ſpeaks to their hearts. That they might ſee what their hearts ſhould doe, the Earth quakes under them. That they might ſee they could not ſhift their appearance, the Angels call them together. Oh royall Law, and mighty Law-giver! How could they think of having any other God, that had ſuch proofes of this? How could they think of making any reſemblance of him whom they ſaw could not be ſeen, and whom they ſaw in not being ſeene, infinite? How could they think of daring to prophane his his Name, whom they heard to name himſelf, with that voyce, Iehovah? How could they think of ſtanding with him for a day, whom they ſaw to command that heaven, which makes and meaſures day? How could they think of diſobeying his Deputies, whom they ſaw ſo able to revenge? How could they think of killing, when they were half dead with the feare of him, that could kill both body and ſoul? How could they think of the flames of luſt, that ſaw ſuch fires of vengeance? How could they think of ſtealing from others, that ſaw whoſe the heaven and earth was to diſpoſe of at his pleaſure? How could they think of ſpeaking falſly, that heard God ſpeak in ſo fearfull a tone? How could they think of coveting others goods, that ſaw how weak and uncertaine right they had to their own? Yea, to us was this Law ſo delivered; to us in them: neither had there been ſuch ſtate in the promulgation of it, if God had not intended it for Eternity. We men, that ſo feare the breach of humane Lawes, for ſome ſmall mulcts of forfeiture; how ſhould we feare thee (O Lord) that canſt caſt body and ſoule into hell!

The Golden Calfe.

Exod. 32

IT was not much above a moneth, ſince Iſrael made their covenant with God; ſince they trembled to heare him ſay, Thou ſhalt have no other Gods but me; ſince they ſaw Moſes part from them, and climbe up the Hill to God: and now they ſay, Make us gods, we know not what is become of this Moſes. Oh, ye mad Iſraelites, have ye ſo ſoone forgotten that fire and thunder, which you heard and ſaw? Is that ſmoak vaniſhed out of your minde, as ſoone as out of your ſight? Could your hearts ceaſe to tremble with the earth? Can ye in the very ſight of Sinai, call for other gods? And, for Moſes, was it not for your ſakes that he thruſt himſelf into the midſt of that ſmoak and fire, which ye feared to ſee a far off? Was he not now gone after ſo many ſudden embaſſages, to be your Leiger with God? If ye had ſeene him take his heeles, and run away from you into the wilderneſſe, what could ye have ſaid or done more? Behold, our better Moſes was with us a while upon earth, he is now aſcended into the Mount of Heaven, to mediate for us; ſhall we now think of another Saviour? Shall we not hold it our happineſſe, that he is for our ſakes above?

And what if your Moſes had been gone for ever? Muſt ye therefore have gods made? If ye had ſaid, Chooſe us another Governour, it had been a wicked and unthankfull motion; ye were too unworthy of a Moſes, that could ſo ſoone forget him: but to ſay, Make us gods, was abſurdly impious. Moſes was not your God, but your Governor: neither was the preſence of God tyed to Moſes: You ſaw God ſtill when he was gone, in his pillar, and in his Manna, & yet ye ſay, Make us gods: Every word is full of ſenſleſſe wickedneſſe. How many gods would you have? or what gods are thoſe that can be made? or (what ever the Idolatrous Ægyptians did) with what face can ye, after ſo many miraculous obligations, ſpeak of another God? Had the voyce of God ſcarce done thundring in your eares? Did you ſo lately heare and ſee him to be an infinite God? Did ye quake to heare him ſay out of the midſt of the flames, I am Iehovah thy God: Thou ſhalt have no gods but me? Did ye acknowledge God your Maker, and doe ye now ſpeak of making of gods? If ye had ſaid, Make us another man to goe before us, it had been an impoſſible ſuite. Aaron might help to marre you and himſelf; He could not make one haire of a man: and doe ye ſay, Make us gods? And what ſhould thoſe gods doe? Goe before you. How could they goe before you that cannot ſtand alone? your help makes them to ſtand, and yet they muſt conduct you. Oh the impatient ingratitude of carnall mindes! Oh the fottiſhneſſe of Idolatry! Who would not have ſaid, Moſes is not with us, but he is with God for us? He ſtaies long: He that called him, withholds him: His delay is for our ſakes, as well as his aſcent. Though we ſee him not, we will hope for him: his favours to us have deſerved not to be rejected: Or, if God will keep him from us; he that withholds him, can ſupply him: He that ſent him can leade us without him; His fire

A fire and Cloud is all-sufficient; God hath said and done enough for us, to make us trust him: We will, we can have no other God; we care not for any other guide. But behold here is none of this: Moses staies but some five and thirty daies, and now he is forgotten, and is become but this Moses: Yea, God is forgotten, with him, and, as if God and Moses had been lost at once, they say, Make us gods. Naturall men must have God at their bent: and if he come not at a call, he is cast off, and they take themselves to their owne shifts: like as the Chinois whip their gods, when they answer them not; whereas his holy ones wait long, and seek him; and not onely in their sinking, but from the bottome of the deepes; call upon him; and though he kill them, will trust in him.

Superstition besots the mindes of men, and blindes the eye of reason; and first B makes them not men, ere it makes them Idolaters. How else could he that is the Image of God fall downe to the Images of creatures? how could our fore-fathers have so doted upon stocks and stones, if they had been themselves? As the Syrians were first blinded and then led into the midst of Samaria: so are Idolaters first bereaved of their wits and common sense, and afterward are carried brutishly into all palpable impiety.

Who would not have beene ashamed to heare this answer from the brother of Moses, Pluck off your Eare-rings? He should have said, Pluck this Idolatrous thought out of your hearts: and now in stead of chiding he soothes them. And as if he had bin no kin to Moses, he helps to leade them back again from God to Egypt. The people importuned him, perhaps with threats. He that had waded through all the menaces of C Pharaoh, doth he now shrink at the threats of his owne? Moses is not afraid of the terrors of God: His faith that carried him thorow the water, led him up to the fire of Gods presence; whiles his brother Aaron feares the faces of those men, which he lately saw pale with the feare of their glorious Law-giver. As if he that forbad other gods, could not have maintained his own act, and agent, against men. Sudden feares when they have possessed weak mindes, lead them to shamefull errors. Importunity or violence may lessen, but they cannot excuse a fault. Wherfore was he a Governor, but to depresse their disordered motions? Facility of yeelding to a sin, or wooing it with our voluntary suit, is a higher staire of evill: but, even at last to be won to sin, is damnable. It is good to resist any onset of sin; but one condescent loses all the thanks of our opposition. What will it availe a man, that others are plagued for soD liciting him, whiles he smarteth for yeelding? If both be in hell, what ease is it to him that another is deeper in the pit?

What now did Aaron? Behold, he that alone was allowed to climb up the trembling and fiery Hill of Sinai, with Moses, and heard God say, Thou shalt not make to thy self any graven Image, for I am a Iealous God: (as if he meant particularly to prevent this act) within one moneth, calls for their eare-rings, makes the graven Image of a Calfe, erects an Altar, consecrates a day to it, calls it their god, and weeps not to see them dance before it. It is a miserable thing, when Governours humour the people in their sins; and in stead of making up the breach, enlarge it. Sin will take heart by the approbation of the meanest looker on; but if authority once second it, it growes impudent: As contrarily, where the publike government opposes evill (though it E be under-hand practised, not without feare) there is life in that State.

Aaron might have learned better counsell of his brothers example. When they came to him with stones in their hands, and said, Give us water, he ran as roundly to God, with prayers in his mouth; so should Aaron have done, when they said, Give us gods: but he weakly runs to their eare-rings, that which should be made their god: not to the True God, which they had and forsooke. Who can promise to himselfe freedome from grosse infirmities, when he that went up into the Mount, comes downe, and doth that in the valley, which he heard forbidden in the Hill?

I see yet, and wonder at the mercy of that God, which had justly called himselfe jealous. This very Aaron, whose infirmity had yeelded to so foule an Idolatry, is after chosen by God, to be a Priest to himselfe: he that had set up an Altar to the Calfe, must serve at the Altar of God: He that had melted and carved out the

Calfe

Calfe for a god, muſt ſacrifice Calves and Rams, and Bullocks unto the True God: He that conſecrated a day to the Idol, is himſelfe conſecrated to him, which was diſhonoured by the Idol. The groſeſt of all ſins cannot prejudice the calling of God; Yea, as the light is beſt ſeene in darkneſſe, the mercy of God is moſt magnified in our unworthineſſe. A

What a difference God puts betweene perſons and ſins! while ſo many thouſand Iſraelites were ſlaine, that had ſtomackfully deſired the Idol; Aaron that in weakneſſe condeſcended, is both pardoned the fact, and afterwards laden with honour from God. Let no man take heart to ſin, from mercy: He that can purpoſe to ſin upon the knowledge of Gods mercy, in the remiſſion of infirmities, preſumes, and makes himſelf a wilfull offender. It is no comfort to the wilfull that there is remiſſion to the weak and penitent. B

The eare-rings are pluckt off: Ægyptian jewels are fit for an Idolatrous uſe. This very gold was contagious. It had beene better the Iſraelites had never borrowed theſe ornaments, then that they ſhould pay them back to the Idolatry of their firſt owners. What coſt the ſuperſtitious Iſraelites are content to be at for this lewd devotion! The riches and pride of their outward habite, are they willing to part with, to their molten god; as glad to have their eares bare that they might fill their eyes. No gold is too deare, for their Idol; each man is content to ſpoile his wives and children of that whereof they ſpoyled the Ægyptians.

Where are thoſe worldlings, that cannot abide to be at any coſt for their Religion; which could be content to doe God chargeleſſe ſervice? Theſe very Iſraelites that were ready to give gold, not out of their purſes, but from their very eares to miſ-devotion, ſhall once condemne them. O Sacriledge ſucceeding to Superſtition! of old they were ready to give gold to the falſe ſervice of God; we, to take away gold from the true: How doe we ſee men prodigall to their luſts and ambitions, and we hate not to be niggards to God? C

This gold is now grown to a Calfe, Let no man think that form came forth caſually out of the melted eare-rings: This ſhape was intended by the Iſraelites, and perfected by Aaron: they brought this god in their hearts with them out of Ægypt, and now they ſet it up in their eyes. Still doth Ægypt hurt them: Servitude was the leaſt evill that Iſrael receives from Ægypt; for that ſent them ſtill to the true God, but this Idolatrous example led them to a falſe. The very ſight of evill is dangerous: and it is hard for the heart not to run into thoſe ſins, to which the eye and eare is inured: Not out of love, but cuſtome, we fall into ſome offences. D

The Iſraelites wrought ſo long in the furnaces of the Ægyptians brick, that they have brought forth a molten Calfe. The black Calfe with the white ſpots, which they ſaw worſhipped in Ægypt, hath ſtollen their hearts: And they, which before would have been at the Ægyptian fleſh-pots, would now be at their devotions. How many have fallen into a faſhion of ſwearing, ſcoffing, drinking, out of the uſuall practice of others; as thoſe that live in an ill ayre, are infected with diſeaſes! A man may paſſe thorow Æthiopia unchanged: but he cannot dwell there, and not be diſcoloured.

Their ſin was bad enough, let not our uncharitableneſſe make it worſe: No man may think they have ſo put off humanity, and ſenſe, with their Religion, as to think that Calfe a god; or that this Idoll, which they ſaw yeſterday made, did bring them out of Ægypt, three moneths agoe. This were to make them more beaſts then that Calfe, which this Image repreſented: Or if they ſhould have been ſo inſenſate, can we think that Aaron could be thus deſperately mad? The Image and the Holy-day were both to one Deity: To morrow is the Holy-day of the Lord your God. It was the True God they meant to worſhip in the Calfe: and yet at beſt this Idolatry is ſhamefull. It is no marvell if this foule ſin ſeeke pretences; yet no excuſe can hide the ſhame of ſuch a face. Gods jealouſie is not ſtirred only by the rivality of a falſe god; but of a falſe worſhip: nothing is more dangerous then to mint Gods ſervices in our owne braine. E redreſſed it. He knew ere Moſes came up, what Iſrael would doe ere he came down: like as he knew the two Tables would be broken, ere he gave them. God moſt wiſely permits, and ordinates ſin to his own ends, without our excuſe: and though he could eaſily by his own hands remedy evils; yet he will doe it by meanes, both ordinary, and ſubordinate. It is not for us to look for any immediate redreſſe from God, when we have a Moſes, by whom it may be wrought: Since God himſelf expects this from man, why ſhould man expect it from God?

God ſends down Moſes to remedy this ſin. He could as eaſily have prevented, as redreſſed

Now might Moſes have found a time to have bin eaven with Iſrael for all their unthankfulneſſe, and mutinous inſurrections; Let me alone: I will conſume them, and make thee a mighty Nation. Moſes ſhould not need to ſollicite God for revenge; God ſollicites him, in a ſort, for leave to revenge. Who would look for ſuch a word from God to Man, Let me alone? As yet Moſes had ſaid nothing; Before he opens his mouth, God prevents his importunity, as fore-ſeeing that holy violence, which the requeſts of Moſes would offer to him. Moſes ſtood trembling before the Majeſty of his Maker, & yet heares him ſay, Let me alone. The mercy of our God hath, as it were, obliged his power to the faith of men: The fervent prayers of the faithfull, hold the hands of the Almighty. As I finde it ſaid afterwards of Chriſt, That he could doe no miracles there becauſe of their unbeliefe: So now, I heare God (as if he could not doe execution upon Iſrael, becauſe of Moſes's faith) ſay, Let me alone, that I may conſume them.

We all naturally affect propriety, and like our owne ſo much better, as it is freer from partners. Every one would be glad to ſay, with that proud one, I am, and there is none beſide me: ſo much the more ſweetly would this meſſage have ſounded to nature, I will conſume them, and make of thee a mighty Nation: How many indeavour that (not without danger of curſes and uproare) which was voluntarily tendred unto Moſes! Whence are our depopulations, and incloſures, but for that men cannot abide either fellowes or neighbours? But how graciouſly doth Moſes ſtrive with God, againſt his owne preferment? If God had threatned, I will conſume thee, and make of them a mighty Nation; I doubt whether he could have been more moved. The more a man can leave himſelf behinde him, and aſpire to a care of community, the more ſpirituall he is. Nothing makes a man ſo good a patriot, as Religion.

Oh the ſweet diſpoſition of Moſes; fit for him that ſhould be familiar with God! He ſaw they could be content to be merry and happy without him, he would not be happy without them. They had profeſſed to have forgotten him: he ſlacks not to ſue for them. He that will ever hope for good himſelfe, muſt returne good for evill unto others.

Ye was it not Iſrael ſo much that Moſes reſpected, as God in Iſrael. He was thrifty and jealous for his Maker, and would not have him loſe the glory of his mighty deliverances; nor would abide a pretence for any Ægyptian dogge to bark againſt the powerfull work of God; Wherefore ſhall the Egyptians ſay? If Iſrael could have periſhed without diſhonour to God, perhaps his hatred to their Idolatry would have overcome his naturall love, & he had let God alone. Now ſo tender is he over the Name of God, that he would rather have Iſrael ſcape with a ſin, then Gods glory ſhould be blemiſhed in the opinions of men, by a juſt judgement. He ſaw that the eyes and tongues of all the world were intent upon Iſrael; a people ſo miraculouſly fetcht from Ægypt, whom the Sea gave way to; whom heaven fed; whom the Rock watered; whom the fire and cloud guarded, which heard the audible voyce of God. He knew withall, how ready the world would be to miſconſtrue, & how the Heathens would be ready to caſt imputations of levity or impotence upon God; and therefore ſaies, What will the Egyptians ſay? Happy is that man which can make Gods glory the ſcope of all his actions, and deſires; neither cares for his own wel-fare, nor fears the miſeries of others, but with reſpect to God in both. If God had not given Moſes this care of his glory, he could not have had it: and now his goodneſſe takes it ſo kindly, as if himſelf had received a favour from his creature; & for a reward of the grace he had wrought, promiſes not to doe that which he threatned. But what needs God to care for the ſpeech of the Ægyptians, men, Infidels? And if they had beene good, yet their cenſure ſhould have bin unjuſt. Shall God care for the tongues of men; the holy God, for the tongues of Infidels? The very Iſraelites, now they were from under the hands of Ægypt, cared not for their words; and ſhall the God of Heaven regard that which is not worth the regard of men? Their tongues could not walk a gainſt God, but from himſelf; and if it could have been the worſe for him; would he have permitted it? But, O God, how dainty art thou of thine honour, that thou canſt not endure the worſt of men ſhould have any colour to taint it! What doe we men ſtand upon our juſtice and innocence, with neglect of all unjuſt cenſures; when that infinite God, whom no cenſures can reach, will not abide that the very Egyptians ſhould falſly taxe his power and mercy? Wiſe men muſt care, not only to deſerve well, but to heare well, and to wipe off, not onely crimes, but cenſures. A

There was never ſo precious a Monument, as the Tables written with Gods own hand. If we ſee but the ſtone which Iacobs head reſted on; or, on which the foot of Chriſt did once tread; we look upon it with more then ordinary reſpect: With what eye ſhould we have beheld this ſtone, which was hewed and written with the very finger of God? Any manu-ſcript ſcroll written by the hand of a famous man, is laid up amongſt our jewels; What place then ſhould we have given to the hand-writing of the Almighty! B

That which he hath dictated to his ſervants the Prophets, challenges juſt honour from us; how doth that deſerve veneration, which his own hand wrote immediatly!

Propheſies and Euangelicall diſcourſes he hath written by others, never did he write any thing himſelf but theſe Tables of the Law: neither did he ever ſpeak any thing audibly to whole mankinde, but it; The hand, the ſtone, the Law were all his. By how much more precious this Record was, by ſo much was the fault greater, of defacing it. What King holds it leſſe then rebellion, to teare his writing, and blemiſh his Seale? At the firſt he ingraved his image in the table of mans heart; Adam blurred the Image, but (through Gods mercy) ſaved the Tablet. Now he writes his will in the Tables of ſtone; Moſes breaks the Tables, and defaced the writing: if they had been given him for himſelf, the Author, the matter had deſerved, that as they were written in ſtone, for permanency; ſo they ſhould be kept for ever: and as they were everlaſting in uſe, ſo they ſhould be in preſervation. Had they been written in clay, they could but have been broken: but now they were given for all Iſrael, for all mankinde. He was but the meſſenger, not the owner. Howſoever therefore Iſrael had deſerved, by breaking this Covenant with God, to have this Monument of Gods Covenant with them broken by the ſame hand that wrote it: yet how durſt Moſes thus careleſly caſt away the Treaſure of all the world; and by his hands undoe that, which was with ſuch coſt and care done by his Creator? How durſt he faile the truſt of that God, whoſe pledge he received with awe, and reverence? He that expoſtulated with God, to have Iſrael live and proſper, why would he deface the rule of their life, in the keeping wherof they ſhould proſper? I ſee, that forty daies talk with God cannot bereave a man of paſſionate infirmity: he that was the meekeſt upon earth, in a ſudden indignation abandons that, which in cold bloud he would have held faſter then his life: He forgets the Law written, when he ſaw it broken; His zeale for God hath tranſported him from himſelf, & his duty to the charge of God: He more hates the Golden Calf, wherin he ſaw ingraven the Idolatry of Iſrael, then he honoured the Tables of ſtone, wherein God had ingraven his Commandements; and more longed to deface the Idol, then he cared to preſerve the Tables. Yet that God, which ſo ſharply revenged the breach of one Law, upon the Iſraelites, checks not Moſes for breaking both the Tables of the Law. The Law of God is ſpirituall; the internall breach of one Law, is ſo hainous, that in compariſon of it, God ſcarce counts the breaking of the outward Tables, a breach of the Law. The goodneſſe of God winks at the errours of honeſt zeale, and ſo loves the ſtrength of good affections, that it paſſeth over their infirmities: How highly God doth eſteeme a well governed zeale; when his mercy crownes it with all the faults! C D E

The Tables had not offended: The Calfe had, and Iſrael in it. Moſes takes revenge on both: He burnes and ſtamps the Calfe to powder, and gives it Iſrael to drink;

A drink; that they might have it in their guts, in ſtead of their eyes: How he haſteth to deſtroy the Idol, wherein they ſinned! that, as an Idol is nothing, ſo it might be brought to nothing; and Atomes and duſt is neareſt to nothing: that in ſtead of going before Iſrael, it might paſſe thorow them; ſo as the next day they might finde their god in their excrements, to the juſt ſhame of Iſrael, when they ſhould ſee their new God cannot defend himſelfe, from being either nothing, or worſe.

Who can but wonder to ſee a multitude of ſo many hundred thouſands (when Moſes came running downe the Hill) to turne their eyes from their god, to him; And on a ſudden, in ſtead of worſhipping their Idol, to batter it in pieces, in the very height of the novelty? In ſtead of building Altars, and kindling fires to it, to kindle an hotter fire than that, wherewith it was melted, to conſume it? In ſtead of dancing
B before it, to abhorre and deface it; in ſtead of ſinging, to weep before it? There was never a more ſtiffe-necked people: yet I doe not heare any one man of them ſay, He is but one man, We are many; how eaſily may we deſtroy him; rather then he our god? If his brother durſt not reſiſt our motion in making it: Why will we ſuffer him to dare reſiſt the keeping of it? It is our act, and we will maintaine it. Here was none of this; but an humble obeyſance to the baſeſt & bloudieſt revenge that Moſes ſhall impoſe. God hath ſet ſuch an impreſſion of Majeſty in the face of lawfull authority, that wickedneſſe is confounded in it ſelfe to behold it. If from hence viſible powers were not more feared than the inviſible God, the world would be over-run with out-rage. Sin hath ſuch a guiltineſſe in it ſelf, that when it is ſeaſonably checked, it pulls in his head, and ſeekes rather an hiding place than a fort.

C The Idol is not capable of a further revenge: It is not enough, unleſſe the Idolaters ſmart: The gold was good, if the Iſraelites had not beene evill: ſo great a ſin cannot be expiated without bloud. Behold, that meek ſpirit, which in his plea with God, would rather periſh himſelfe, then Iſrael ſhould periſh, armes the Levites againſt their brethren, and rejoyces to ſee thouſands of the Iſraelites bleed, and bleſſes their executioners.

It was the mercy of Moſes that made him cruell: He had been cruell to all, if ſome had not found him cruell. They are mercileſſe hands, which are not ſometimes imbrued in bloud: There is no leſſe charity, then juſtice, in puniſhing ſinners with death; God delights no leſſe in a killing mercy, than in a pitifull juſtice: ſome tender hearts would be ready to cenſure the rigour of Moſes. Might not Iſrael have repen-
D ted and lived? Or if they muſt dye, muſt their brethrens hand be upon them? Or, if their throats muſt be cut by their brethren, ſhall it be done in the very heat of their ſin? But they muſt learne a difference betwixt pity, and fondneſſe; mercy and unjuſtice. Moſes had an heart as ſoft as theirs, but more hot; as pitifull, but wiſer. He was a good Phyſitian, and ſaw that Iſrael could not live unleſſe he bled: he therefore lets out this corrupt bloud, to ſave the whole body. There cannot be a better ſacrifice to God then the bloud of Malefactors: and this firſt ſacrifice ſo pleaſed God in the hands of the Levites, that he would have none but them ſacrifice to him for ever. The bloud of the Idolatrous Iſraelites cleared that Tribe from the bloud of the innocent
E Sichemites.

The Vayle of Moses.

IT is a wonder, that neither Moses nor any Israelite gathered up the shivers of the former Tables: Every sheard of that stone, and every letter of that writing had been a Relique worth laying up: but he well saw how headlong the people were to Superstition; and how unsafe it were to feed that disposition in them. Exod. 34.

The same zeale that burnt the Calfe to ashes, concealed the ruines of this Monument. Holy things, besides their use, challenge no further respect. The breaking of the Tables did as good as blot out all the Writing; and the writing defaced, left no vertue in the stone, no reverence to it.

If God had not been friends with Israel, he had not renewed his Law. As the Israelites were wilfully blinde, if they did not see Gods anger in the Tables broken: so could they not but hold it a good signe of grace, that God gave them his Testimonies.

There was nothing wherein Israel outstripped all the rest of the world more, then in this priviledge; the pledge of his Covenant, the Law written with Gods owne hand. Oh what a favour then is it, where God bestowes his Gospell upon any Nation? That was but a killing letter: this is the power of God to salvation.

Never is God throughly displeased with any people, where that continues. For, like as those which purpose love, when they fall off, call for their tokens back againe; so when God begins once perfectly to mislike, the first thing he withdrawes, is his Gospell.

Israel recovers this favour, but with an abatement; Hew thee two Tables. God made the first Tables: The matter, the form was his; now Moses must hew the next: As God created the first man after his owne Image; but, that once defaced, Adam begat Cain after his own; Or, as the first Temple razed, a second was built; yet so far short, that the Israelites wept at the sight of it. The first works of God are still the purest: those that he secondarily works by us, decline in their perfection. It was reason, that though God had forgiven Israel, they should still find they had sinned. They might see the footsteps of displeasure in the differences of the Agent.

When God had told Moses before, I will not goe before Israel, but my Angell shall lead them; Moses so noted the difference, that he rested not till God himselfe undertook their conduct: So might the Israelites have noted some remainders of offence, whiles in ſtead of that which his owne hand did formerly make, he ſaith now, Hew thee; And yet theſe ſecond Tables are kept reverently in the Ark, when the other lay mouldred in ſhivers upon Sinai; like as the repaired Image of God in our Regeneration is preſerved, perfited, and laid up at laſt, ſafe in Heaven; whereas the firſt Image of our created innocence is quite defaced; ſo the ſecond Temple had the glory of Chriſts exhibition, though meaner in frame. The mercifull reſpects of God are not tyed to glorious out-ſides; or the inward worthineſſe of things or perſons: He hath choſen the weak and ſimple, to confound the wiſe and mighty.

Yet God did this work by Moſes; Moſes hewed, and God wrote: Our true Moſes repaires that Law of God which we in our nature had broken; He revives it for us, and it is accepted of God, no leſſe then if the firſt Characters of his Law had bin ſtill entire. We can give nothing but the Table; it is God that muſt write in it. Our hearts are but a bare board, till God by his finger engrave his Law in them; yea, Lord, we are a rough Quarry; hew thou us out, and ſquare us fit for thee to write upon.

Well may we marvell, to ſee Moſes, after this overſight, admitted to this charge againe: Who of us would not have ſaid, Your care indeed deſerves truſt; you did ſo carefully keep the firſt Tables, that it would doe well to truſt you with ſuch another burden.

It was good for Moſes, that he had to doe with God, not with men: The God of mercy will not impute the ſlips of our infirmity to the prejudice of our faithfulneſſe. He that after the miſ-anſwer of the one Talent, would not truſt the evill ſervant with a ſecond, becauſe he ſaw a wilfull neglect; will truſt Moſes with his ſecond Law, becauſe he ſaw fidelity in the worſt error of his zeale. Our charity muſt learne as to forgive, ſo to beleeve where we have been deceived: Not that we ſhould wilfully beguile our ſelves in an unjuſt credulity, but that we ſhould ſearch diligently into the diſpoſition of perſons, and grounds of their actions; perhaps none may be ſo ſure as they that have once diſappointed us. Yea, Moſes brake the firſt; therefore he muſt hew the ſecond: If God had broken them, he would have repaired them; The amends muſt be where the fault was. Both God and his Church looke for a ſatisfaction in that wherein we have offended.

It was not long ſince Moſes his former faſt of forty dayes: when he then came down from the hill, his firſt queſtion was not for meat: and now going up againe to Sinai, he takes not any repaſt with him: That God which ſent the Quailes to the Hoſt of Iſrael, and Manna from Heaven, could have fed him with dainties: He goes up confidently in a ſecure truſt of Gods proviſion. There is no life to that of faith; Man lives not by bread onely: The Viſion of God did not only ſatiate but feaſt him. What a bleſſed ſatiety ſhall there be, when we ſhall ſee him as he is; and he ſhall be all in all to us; ſince this very fraile mortality of Moſes was ſuſtained, and comforted but with repreſentations of his preſence!

I ſee Moſes the receiver of the Law, Elias the Reſtorer of the Law, Chriſt the Fulfiller of the old Law, and Author of the new, all faſting forty dayes: and theſe three great faſters I finde together glorious in Mount Tabor. Abſtinence merits not; For Religion conſiſts not in the belly, either full or empty: What are meats or drinks to the Kingdome of God, which is like himſelf, ſpirituall? But it prepares beſt for good duties. Full bellies are fitter for reſt: not the body, ſo much as the ſoul, is more active with emptineſſe; Hence, ſolemne prayer takes ever faſting to attend it, and ſo much the rather ſpeeds in Heaven, when it is ſo accompanied. It is good ſo to diet the body, that the ſoule may be fatned.

When Moſes came down before, his eyes ſparkled with anger; and his face was both interchangeably pale, and red with indignation: now it is bright with glory. Before, there were the flames of fury in it, now the beames of Majeſty. Moſes had before ſpoken with God; why did not his face ſhine before? I cannot lay the cauſe upon the inward trouble of his paſſions, for this brightneſſe was externall. Whither ſhall we impute it, but to his moſt intireneſſe with God.

The more familiar acquaintance we have with God, the more doe we partake of him. He that paſſes by the fire, may have ſome gleames of heat; but he that ſtands by it,

A it, hath his colour changed. It is not possible a man should have any long conference with God, and be no whit affected. We are strangers from God, it is no wonder if our faces be earthly; but he that sets himselfe apart to God, shall finde a kinde of Majesty and awfull respect put upon him, in the mindes of others.

How did the heart of Moses shine with illumination, when his face was thus lightsome! And if the flesh of Moses in this base composition, so shined by conversing with God forty dayes in Sinai; what shall our glory be, when clothed with incorruptible bodies, we shall converse with him for ever in the highest Heaven?

Now his face onely shone: afterwards the three Disciples saw all his body shining. The nature of a glorified body, the clearer Vision, the immediate presence of that fountaine of glory, challenge a farre greater resplendence to our faces, then his.

B O God, we are content that our faces be blemished a while with contempt, and blubbred with teares; how can we but shine with Moses, when we shall see thee more then Moses!

The brightnesse of Moses's face reflected not upon his own eies; He shone bright, and knew not of it: he saw Gods face glorious, he did not think others had so seene his. How many have excellent graces, and perceive them not! Our owne sense is an ill judge of Gods favors to us; Those that stand by, can convince us in that which we deny to our selves. Here below it is enough if we can shine in the eyes of others; above, we shall shine and know it. At this instant Moses sees himselfe shine: then he needed not. God meant not that he should more esteem himself, but that he should be more honoured of the Israelites: That other glory shall be for our owne happi-

C nesse, and therefore requires our knowledge.

They that did but stand still to see anger in his face; ran away to see glory in it: Before, they had desired that God would not speak to them any more but by Moses; and now that God doth but looke upon them in Moses, they are afraid; and yet there was not more difference betwixt the voyces, than the faces of God and Moses. This should have drawne Israel to Moses so much the more, to have seene this impression of Divinity in his face.

That which should have comforted, affrights them: Yea, Aaron himself, that before went up into the Mount to see and speak with God, now is afraid to see him that had seene God: Such a feare there is in guiltinesse, such confidence in innocency. When the soul is once cleared from sin, it shall run to that glory with joy, the least glimpse

D whereof now appales it, and sends it away in terrour. How could the Israelites now chuse but thinke; How shall we abide to looke God in the face, since our eyes are dazeled with the face of Moses! And well may we still argue, If the Image of God, which he hath set in the fleshy fore-head of authority, dant us; how shall we stand before the dreadfull Tribunall of Heaven?

Moses marvels to see Israel run away from their Guide, as from their Enemy; and lookes back to see if he could discerne any new cause of feare; and not conceiving how his milde face could affray them, calls them to stay and retire.

Oh my people, whom doe ye flee? It is for your sakes that I ascended, staid, came downe: Behold, here are no armed Levites to strike you, no Amalekites, no Ægyptians to pursue you, no fires and thunders to dismay you. I have not that Rod of God

E in my hand, which you have seene to command the Elements: Or if I had; so farre am I from purposing any rigour against you, that I now lately have appeased God towards you; and loe here the pledges of his reconciliation. God sends me to you for good, and doe you run from your best friend? Whither will ye goe from me, or without me? Stay and heare the charge of that God, from whom ye cannot flee.

They perceive his voyce the same, though his face were changed, and are perswaded to stay, and return and heare him, whom they dare not see; and now after many doubtfull paces, approaching nearer, dare tell him he was grown too glorious.

Good Moses, finding that they durst not look upon the Sun of his face, clouds it with a vayle: Choosing rather to hide the work of God in him, then to want opportunity of revealing Gods will to his people. I doe not heare him stand upon termes of reputation; If there be glory in my face, God put it there; he would not have placed ced it ſo conſpicuouſly, if he had meant it ſhould be hid: Hide ye your faces rather, which are blemiſhed with your ſinne; and looke not that I ſhould wrong God and my ſelfe, to ſeeme leſſe happy in favour of your weakneſſe. But without all ſelfe reſpects, he modeſtly hides his glorified face; and cares not their eyes ſhould pierce ſo farre, as to his skinne, on condition, that his words may pierce into their eares. It is good for a man ſometimes to hide his graces; Some Talents are beſt improved by being laid up: Moſes had more glory by his Vaile, then by his face. Chriſtian modeſty teaches a wiſe man, not to expoſe himſelfe to the faireſt ſhew, and to live at the utmoſt pitch of his ſtrength.

There is many a rich ſtone laid up in the bowels of the Earth; many a faire Pearle laid up in the boſome of the Sea, that never was ſeene, nor never ſhall be. There is many a goodly Starre, which becauſe of height comes not within our account. How did our true Moſes, with the Vaile of his fleſh, hide the glory of his Deity, and put on vileneſſe, beſides the laying aſide of Majeſty: and ſhut up his great & Divine Miracles, with, See you tell no man! How far are thoſe ſpirits from this, which care only to be ſeene; and wiſh only to dazle others eyes with admiration, not caring for unknown Riches? But thoſe yet more, which deſire to ſeeme above themſelves, whether in parts or graces, whoſe Vaile is fairer then their skin. Modeſt faces ſhall ſhine through their Vailes, when the vain-glorious ſhall bewray their ſhame through their covering.

That God which gave his Law in ſmoak, delivered it again through the Vaile of Moſes. Iſrael could not look to the end of that, which ſhould be aboliſhed; for the ſame cauſe had God a Vaile upon his own face, which hid his preſence in the Holy of Holies. Now as the Vaile of God did rend, when he ſaid, It is finiſhed, ſo the Vaile of Moſes was then pulled off: We clearly ſee Chriſt, the end of the Law; Our Ioſhua that ſucceeded Moſes, ſpeakes to us bare-faced: what a ſhame is it there ſhould be a Vaile upon our hearts, when there is none on his face?

When Moſes went to ſpeak with God, he pulled off his Vaile: It was good reaſon he ſhould preſent to God that face which he had made. There had beene more need of his Vaile, to hide the glorious face of God from him, then to hide his from God: but his faith and thankfulnes ſerve for both theſe uſes. Hypocrites are contrary to Moſes: he ſhewed his worſt to men, his beſt to God; they ſhew their beſt to men, their worſt to God: but God ſees both their Vaile and their face: and I know not whether he more hates their vaile of diſſimulation, or their face of wickedneſſe.

Nadab and Abihu.

Levit. 10. Numb. 3. 4.

That God which ſhewed himſelfe to men in fire when he delivered his Law, would have men preſent their Sacrifices to him in fire: and this fire he would have his owne, that there might be a juſt circulation in this creature; as the water ſends up thoſe vapours, which it receives, downe againe in raine. Hereupon it was, that fire came downe from God unto the Altar: That as the charge of the Sacrifice was delivered in fire and ſmoke, ſo God might ſignifie the acceptation of it in the like faſhion wherein it was commanded. The Baalites might lay ready their Bullock upon the wood, and water in their Trench: but they might ſooner fetch the bloud out of their bodies, and deſtroy themſelves, then one flaſh out of Heaven to conſume the Sacrifice.

That Devill which can fetch down fire from Heaven, either maliciouſly, or to no purpoſe; (although he abound with fire, and did as fervently deſire this fire in emulation to God, as ever he deſired mitigation of his own) yet now he could no more kindle a fire for the Idolatrous Sacrifice, then quench the flames of his own torment. Herein God approves himſelf only worthy to be ſacrificed unto, that he creates the fire for his own ſervice; whereas the impotent Idols of the Heathen muſt fetch fire from their neighbors Kitchen; and themſelves are fit matter for their borrowed fire.

The Iſraelites (that were led too much with ſenſe) if they had ſeene the Bullock conſumed

A consumed with a fire fetcht from a common hearth, could never have acknowledged what relation the Sacrifice had to God; had never perceived that God took notice of the Sacrifice; but now they see the fire comming out from the presence of God, they are convinced both of the power and acceptation of the Almighty; They are at once amazed, and satisfied to see the same God answer by fire, which before had spoken by fire: God doth not lesse approve our Euangelicall Sacrifices, then theirs under the Law; but as our Sacrifices are spirituall, so are the signes of his acceptation; Faith is our guide, as Sense was theirs. Yea, even still doth God testifie his approbation by sensible evidences: when by a lively faith and fervent zeale our hearts are consecrated to God, then doth his heavenly fire come down upon our Sacrifices, then are they holy, living, acceptable.

B This flame, that God kindled, was not as some momentany bonfire, for a sudden and short triumph, nor as a domesticall fire, to goe out with the day; but is given for a perpetuity, and neither must dye, nor be quenched. God, as he is himself eternall, so he loves permanency and constancy of grace in us: If we be but a flash and away, God regards us not; all promises are to perseverance. Sure, it is but an elementary fire, that goes out; that which is celestiall, continues: it was but some presumptuous heat in us that decaies upon every occasion.

But he that miraculously sent down this fire at first, will not renew the miracle every day, by a like supply; It began immediately from God, it must be nourished by means. Fuell must maintain that fire which came from Heaven; God will not work miracles every day: if he have kindled his Spirit in us, we may not expect he shall

C every day begin again; we have the fuell of the Word and Sacraments, Prayers, and Meditations, which must keep it in for ever. It is from God that these helps can nourish his graces in us; like as every flame of our materiall fire hath a concourse of providence, but we may not expect new infusions: rather know, that God expects of us an improvement of those habituall graces we have received.

While the people with feare and joy see God lighting his own fire, fire from heaven, the two sons of Aaron, in a careless presumption, will be serving him with a common flame; As if he might not have leave to choose the forms of his own worship. If this had been done some ages after, when the memory of the originall of this heavenly fire had been worn out, it might have been excused with ignorance: but now, when God had newly sent his fire from above, newly commanded the continu-

D ance of it; either to let it goe out, or whiles it still flamed, to fetch prophane coales to Gods Altar, could savour of no lesse then presumption and Sacriledge; when we bring zeale without knowledge, misconceits of faith, carnall affections, the devices of our Wil-worship, superstitious Devotions into Gods Service; we bring common fire to his Altar; these flames were never of his kindling; He hates both Altar, Fire, Priest and Sacrifice. And now behold, the same fire which consumed the Sacrifice before, consumes the Sacrificers. It was the signe of his acceptation, in consuming the beast; but whiles it destroyed men, the fearfull signe of his displeasure. By the same meanes can God bewray both love and hatred. We would have pleaded for Nadab and Abihu; They are but young men, the sons of Aaron, not yet warm in their Function; let both age, and bloud, and inexperience excuse them as yet. No

E pretences, no priviledges can bear off a sin with God: Men think either to patronize, or mitigate evills, by their fained reasons. That no man may hope the plea either of birth, or of youth, or of the first commission of evill, may challenge pardon; I see here young men, sons of the Ruler of Israel, for the first offence struck dead.

Yea, this made God the more to stomack, and the rather to revenge this impiety, because the sons of Aaron did it. God had both pardoned and graced their father, he had honoured them; of the thousands of Israel, culling them out for his Altar: and now, as their father set up a false god, so they bring false fire unto the True God.

If the sons of Infidels live godlesly, they doe their kinde; their punishment shall be (though just) yet lesse: but if the Children of religious Parents, after all Christian nurture, shall shame their Education; God takes it more hainously, and revenges it more sharply. The more bonds of duty, the more plagues of neglect.

If

If from the Agents, we look to the act it self; set aside the originall descent, and what difference was there betwixt these fires? Both lookt alike, heated alike, ascended alike, consumed alike: both were fed with the same materiall wood, both vanished into smoke; There was no difference, but in the Commandement of God. A

If God had injoyned ordinary fire, they had sinned to look for celestiall: now he commanded only the fire which he sent; they sinned in sending up Incense, in that fire, which he commanded not. It is a dangerous thing in the service of God to decline from his own institutions; we have to doe with a power which is wise to prescribe his owne worship, just to require what he hath prescribed, powerfull to revenge that which he hath not required.

If God had struck them with some Leprosie in their fore-head, as he did their Aunt Miriam, soon after; or with some palsie, or lingring consumption, the punishment had been grievous: but he, whose judgements are ever just, sometimes secret, saw fire the fittest revenge, for a sin of fire; his owne fire fittest to punish strange fire; a sudden judgement, fit for a present and exemplary sin; He saw, that if he had winkt at this, his service had been exposed to prophanation. B

It is wisdome in governours to take sin at the first bound; and so to revenge it, that their punishments may be preventions. Speed of death is not alwaies a judgement: suddennesse as it is ever justly suspicable; so then certainly argues anger, when it finds us in an act of sin. Leasure of repentance is an argument of favour; when God gives a man Law, it implies that he would not have judgement surprise him.

Doubtlesse, Aaron lookt somewhat heavily on this sad spectacle; It could not but appale him, to see his two sons dead before him, dead in displeasure, dead suddenly, dead by the immediate hand of God. And now he could repent him of his new honour, to see it succeed so ill with the sons of his loynes: neither could he chuse but see himself striken in them. But his Brother Moses that had learned not to know either Nephewes, or Brother, when they stood in his way to God, wisely turned his eyes from the dead carkasses of his Sons, to his respect of the living God; My Brother, this event is fearfull, but just; These were thy sons, but they sinned; it was not for God, it is not for thee, to look so much who they were, as what they did. It was their honour and thine, that they were chosen to minister before the Lord: He that called them, justly required their Sanctification and obedience. If they have profaned God, and themselves; can thy naturall affection so miscarry thee, that thou couldest wish their impunity with the blemish of thy Maker? Our sons are not ours, if they disobey our Father: to pitty their misery, is to partake of their sin; If thou grudge at their judgement, take heed lest the same fire of God come forth upon this strange fire of nature. Shew now whether thou more lovest God, or thy sons; Shew whether thou be a better Father, or a Son. C D

Aaron, weighing these things, holds his peace, not out of an amazement, or sullennesse, but out of patient and humble submission; and seeing Gods pleasure, and their desert, is content to forget that he had sons. He might have had a silent tongue, and a clamorous heart. There is no voyce louder in the eares of God, then a speechlesse repining of the soule. Heat is more intended with keeping in; but Aarons silence was no lesse inward: He knew how little he should get by brawling with God. If he breathed out discontentment, he saw God could speak fire to him again; And therefore he quietly submits to the will of God; And held his peace, because the Lord had done it. There is no greater proofe of grace, then to smart patiently; and humbly and contentedly to rest the heart in the justice, and wisdome of Gods proceeding; and to be so farre from chiding, that we dispute not. Nature is froward; and though she well knowes we meddle not with our match, when we strive with our Maker, yet she pricks us forward to this idle quarrell; and bids us with Iobs wife, Curse and dye. If God either chide or smite (as servants are charged to their Masters) we may not answer again; when Gods hand is on our back, our hand must be on our mouth: else, as mothers doe their children, God shall whip us so much the more for crying. E piety. There Aaron sees his sons lye; he may neither put his hand to them, to bury them, nor shed a teare for their death. Never parent can have juster cause of mourning, then to see his sons dead in their sin; if prepared, and penitent, yet who can but sorrow for their end? but to part with children to the danger of a second death, is worthy of more than teares. Yet Aaron must learn so far to deny nature, that he must more magnifie the justice of God, than lament the judgement. Those whom God hath called to his immediate service, must know, that he will not allow them the common passions and cares of others. Nothing is more naturall than sorrow for the death of our own: if ever griefe be seasonable, it becomes a funerall. And if Nadab and Abihu had died in their beds, this favor had bin allowed them, the sorrow of their Father and brethren: for when God forbids solemne mourning to his Priests, over the dead, he excepts the cases of this nearnesse of bloud. Now all Israel may mourne for these two; onely the father and brethren may not. God is jealous lest their sorrow should seeme to countenance the sin, which he had punished: even the fearfullest acts of God must be applauded by the heaviest hearts of the faithfull.

That which the Father and Brother may not doe, the Cousins are commanded: dead carcasses are not for the presence of God; his justice was shown sufficiently in killing them: They are now fit for the grave, not the Sanctuary: neither are they carryed out naked, but in their coates. It was an unusuall sight for Israel to see a linnen Ephod upon the Beere; The judgement was so much the more remarkable, because they had the badge of their calling upon their backs.

Nothing is either more pleasing unto God, or more commodious to men, then that when he hath executed judgement, it should be seen and wondred at; for therefore he strikes some that he may warne all.

Of Aaron and Miriam.

THe Israelites are stayed seven dayes in the station of Hazzeroth, for the punishment of Miriam. The sins of the Governours are a just stop to the people; all of them smart in one; all must stay the leasure of Miriams recovery. Whosoever seekes the land of Promise, shall finde many lets: Amalek, Og, Sehon, and the Kings of Canaan meet with Israel: these resisted, but hindred not their passage, their sins only stay them from removing. Afflictions are not crosses to us, in the way to heaven, in comparison to our sinnes.

What is this I see? is not this Aaron that was brother in nature, & by office joynt-Commissioner with Moses? Is not this Aaron, that made his Brother an intercessor for him, to God, in the case of his Idolatry? Is not this Aaron, that climbed up the Hil of Sinai, with Moses? Is not this Aaron, whom the mouth & hand of Moses consecrated an high Priest unto God? Is not this Miriam, the elder sister of Moses? Is not this Miriam, that led the Triumph of the Women, and sung gloriously to the Lord? Is not this Miriam, which laid her brother Moses in the Reeds, and fetcht her mother to be his Nurse? Both, Prophets of God; both, the flesh & bloud of Moses: And doth this Aaron repine at the honour of him, which gave himself that honour, and saved his life? Doth this Miriam repine at the prosperity of him whose life she saved? Who would not have thought this should have been their glory, to have seene the glory of their owne brother? what could have been a greater comfort to Miriam, than to think, How happily doth he now sit at the Sterne of Israel, whom I saved from perishing in a Boate of Bul-rushes! It is to me, that Israel owes this Commander, But now envy hath so blinded their eies, that they can neither see this priviledge of nature, nor the honour of Gods choyce. Miriam and Aaron are in mutiny against Moses. Who is so holy that sins not? What sin is so unnaturall that the best can avoid without God: But what weakenesse soever may plead for Miriam, who can but grieve to see Aaron at the end of so many sins? Of late I saw him carving the molten Image, & consecrating an Altar to a false god: now I see him seconding an unkinde mutiny against his brother: Both sins finde him accessary; neither principall principall. It was not in the power of the legall Prieſthood to performe, or promiſe innocency to her Miniſters: It was neceſſary we ſhould have another high Prieſt, which could not be tainted. That King of righteouſneſſe was of another order; He being without ſin, hath fully ſatisfied for the ſins of men. Whom can it now offend, to ſee the blemiſhes of the Evangelicall Prieſthood, when Gods firſt high Prieſt is thus miſcarryed? A

Who can looke for love and proſperity at once, when holy and meek Moſes finds enmity in his own fleſh and bloud? Rather than we ſhall want, A mans enemies ſhall be thoſe of his owne houſe. Authority cannot faile of oppoſition, if it be never ſo mildly ſwayed: that common make-bate will rather raiſe it out of our own boſome; To doe well, and heare ill, is Princely.

The Midianitiſh wife of Moſes coſt him dear. Before, ſhe hazarded his life; now, the favour of his people: Unequall matches are ſeldome proſperous. Although now this ſcandall was only taken: Envy was not wiſe enough to chooſe a ground of the quarrell. Whether ſome ſecret and emulatory brawls paſſed between Zipporah and Miriam, (as many times theſe ſparkes of private brawles grow into a perillous and common flame) or whether now that Iethro and his Family was joyned with Iſrael, there were ſurmiſes of tranſporting the government to ſtrangers; or whether this unfit choice of Moſes is now raiſed up to diſparage Gods gifts in him; Even in ſight, the exceptions were frivolous: Emulation is curious; and out of the beſt perſon, or act, will raiſe ſomething to cavill at. B

Seditions doe not ever look the ſame way they move; Wiſe men can eaſily diſtinguiſh betwixt the viſor of actions, and the face. The wife of Moſes is mentioned, his ſuperiority is ſhor at. Pride is lightly the ground of all ſedition. Which of their faces ſhined like Moſes? yea, let him but have drawn his vayle, which of them durſt looke on his face? Which of them had faſted twice forty dayes? Which of them aſcended up to the top of Sinai, and was hid with ſmoak and fire? Which of them received the Law twice in two ſeverall Tables, from Gods own hand? And yet they dare ſay, Hath God ſpoken only by Moſes? They do not deny Moſes his honor, but they challenge a part with him: and as they were the elder in nature, ſo they would be equall in dignity, equall in adminiſtration. According to her name, Miriam would be exalted. And yet how unfit were they? One, a woman, whom her ſexe debarred from rule; the other a Prieſt, whom his office ſequeſtred from earthly government. Self-love makes men unreaſonable, and teaches them to turne the glaſſe to ſee themſelves bigger, others leſſe than they are. It is an hard thing for a man, willingly and gladly to ſee his equals lifted over his head, in worth and opinion. Nothing will more try a mans grace, than queſtions of emulation. That man hath true light which can be content to be a candle before the Sun of others. C D

As no wrong can eſcape God; ſo leaſt of all thoſe which are offered to Princes: he that made the eare needs no intelligence of our tongues. We have to doe with a God, that is light of hearing, we cannot whiſper any evill ſo ſecretly, that he ſhould not cry out of noyſe: and what need we any further evidence, when our Judge is our witneſſe?

Without any delation of Moſes, God heares and challenges them. Becauſe he was meek, therfore he complained not: Becauſe he was meek and complained not, therefore the Lord ſtruck in for him the more. The leſſe a man ſtrives for himſelfe, the more is God his Champion. It is the honour of great perſons, to undertake the patronage of their Clients: How much more will God revenge his Elect, which cry to him day and night! He that ſaid, I ſeek not mine own glory, addes, But there is one that ſeekes it, and judges. God takes his part ever that fights not for himſelfe. E

No man could have given more proofes of his courage, than Moſes. He ſlew the Ægyptian; He confronted Pharaoh in his own Court; he beat the Midianite ſhepherds; he feared not the troupes of Ægypt; He durſt look God in the face amidſt all the terrours of Sinai: and yet that ſpirit, which made and knew his heart, ſayes, He was the mildeſt man upon earth. Mildneſſe and fortitude may well lodge together in one breaſt; to correct the miſ-conceits of thoſe men, that think none valiant, but thoſe that are fierce and cruell.

No

A No sooner is the word out of Miriams mouth, then the Word of Gods reproofe meets it; How he bestirs him, and will be at once seen and heard, when the name of Moses is in question! Moses was zealously carefull for Gods glory, and now God is zealous for his. The remunerations of the Almighty, are infinitely gratious. He cannot want honour and patronage, that seeks the honour of his Maker. The ready way to true glory, is goodnesse.

God might have spoken so loud, that Heaven and Earth should have heard it, so as they should not have needed to come forth for audience: but now, he calls them out to the barre, that they may be seene to heare. It did not content him, to chide them within doors: the shame of their fault had been lesse in a private rebuke: but the scandall of their repining was publike. Where the sin is not afraid of the light,

B God loves not the reproofe should be smothered.

They had depressed Moses, God advances him: They had equalled themselves to Moses, God prefers him to them. Their plea was, that God had spoke by them, as wel as by Moses: Gods reply is, That he hath in a more intire fashion spoken to Moses, then them. God spake to the best of them, but either in their dream, sleeping; or in vision, waking: But to Moses he spake with more inward illumination, with more lively representation: To others, as a stranger; to Moses, as a friend. God had never so much magnified Moses to them, but for their envy. We cannot devise to pleasure Gods servants, so much as by despiting them.

God was angry when he chode them, but more angry when he departed. The withdrawing of his presence, is the presence of his wrath. Whiles he stayes to re-

C prove, there is favour in his displeasure: but when he leaves either man, or Church, there is no hope but of vengeance. The finall absence of God, is hell it selfe. When he forsakes us (though for a time) it is an introduction to his utmost judgement. It was time to look for a judgment, when God departed: so soone as he is gone from the eyes of Miriam, the leprosie appeares in her face: her foule tongue is punished with a foule face. Since she would acknowledge no difference betwixt her selfe and her brother Moses, every Israelite now sees his face glorious, hers leprous. Deformitie is a fit cure of pride. Because the venome of her tongue would have eaten into the reputation of her brother, therefore a poisonous infection eates into her flesh. Now both Moses and Miriam need to weare a vaile: the one to hide his glory; the other her deformity. That Midianite Zipporah, whom she scorned, was beautifull in

D respect of her.

Miriam was striken, Aaron escaped: both sinned; his Priesthood could not rescue him; the greatnesse of his dignity did but adde to the hainousnesse of his sinne: his repentance freed him; Alas, my Lord, I beseech thee lay not this sin upon us, which we have foolishly committed. I wonder not to see Aaron free, while I see him penitent; This very confession saved him before, from bleeding for Idolatry, which now preserves him from Leprosie, for his envious repining. The universall Antidote, for all the judgments of God, is our humble repentance.

Yea, his sad deprecation prevailed, both to clear himself, and to recover Miriam; The brother sues for himself and his sister, to that brother whom they both emulated: for pardon from himself, and that God which was offended in him. Where now

E is that equality which was pretended? Behold, he that so lately made his brother his fellow, now makes him his God: Lay not this sinne upon us; Let her not be as one dead: As if Moses had imposed this plague, and could remove it. Never any opposed the servants of God, but one time or other they have beene constrained to confesse a superiority.

Miriam would have wounded Moses with her tongue; Moses would heal her with his, O Lord, heal her now: The wrong is the greater, because his sister did it. He doth not say, I sought not her shame, she sought mine; if God have revenged it, I have no reason to looke on her, as a sister, who lookt at me, as an adversary: But, as if her leprosie were his, he cryes out for her cure. O admirable meeknesse of Moses! His people the Jewes rebelled against him; God proffers revenge; He would rather dye, then they should perish: His sister rebels against him, God workes his revenge: He will not give God peace, till ſhe be recured. Behold a worthy and noble patterne for us to follow. How farre are they from this diſpoſition, who are not onely content God ſhould revenge; but are ready to prevent Gods revenge with their owne? A

Gods love to Moſes ſuffers him not to obtain preſently his ſute for Miriam; his good nature to his ſiſter, made him pray againſt himſelfe. If the judgment had been at once inflicted, and removed, there had been no example of terror for others: God either denies, or differs the grant of our requeſts, for our good; It were wide for us, if our ſuits ſhould be ever heard. It was fit for all parts, Miriam ſhould continue ſome while leprous. There is no policie in a ſudden removall of juſt puniſhment: unleſſe the raine ſo fall that it lie, and ſoake into the earth, it profits nothing. If the Judgments of God ſhould be onely as paſſengers, and not ſojourners at leaſt, they would be no whit regarded. B

The Searchers of Canaan.

Numb. 13.

I Can but wonder at the counſel of God. If the Iſraelites had gone on to Canaan, without enquiry, their confidence had poſſeſſed it: now they ſend to eſpie the Land, ſix hundred thouſand of them never lived to ſee it: And yet I ſee God enjoyning them to ſend; but enjoyning it, upon their inſtance. Some things God allowes in judgement; their importunity, and diſtruſt extorted from God this occaſion of their overthrow. That which the Lord moves unto, proſpers; but that which we move him to firſt, ſeldome ſucceedeth. What needed they doubt of the goodneſſe of that Land, which God told them did flow with milk and honey? What needed they to doubt of obtaining that, which God promiſed to give? When we will ſend forth our ſenſes, to be our ſcouts in the matters of faith, and rather dare truſt men, then God, we are worthy to be deceived. C

The baſeſt ſort of men are commonly held fit enough for intelligencers; but Moſes, to make ſure work, chooſeth forth the beſt of Iſrael, ſuch as were like to be moſt judicious in their inquiry, and moſt credible in their report. Thoſe that ruled Iſrael at home, could beſt deſcry for them abroad; What ſhould direct the body, but the head? Men can judge but by appearance; It is for him onely that ſees the event, ere he appoint the meanes, not to be deceived. It had been better for Iſrael to have ſent the offall of the multitude: By how leſſe the credit of their perſons is, by ſo much leſſe is the danger of ſeducement. The error of the mighty is armed with authority, and in a ſort commands aſſent; whether in good or evill, Greatneſſe hath ever a train to follow it at the heeles. D

Forty dayes they ſpent in this ſearch; and this cowardly unbeliefe in the ſearch ſhall coſt them forty yeares delay of the fruition. Who can abide to ſee the Rulers of Iſrael ſo baſely timorous? They commend the Land, the fruit commends it ſelf, and yet they plead difficulty: We be not able to go up. Their ſhoulders are laden with the grapes, and yet their hearts are overlaid with unbeliefe: It is an unworthy thing to plead hardneſſe of atchieving, where the benefit will more then requite the indeavour. Our Land of Promiſe is above; we know, the fruit thereof is ſweet and glorious, the paſſage difficult. The gyantly ſons of Anak (the powers of darkneſſe) ſtand in our way: If we ſit down and complain, we ſhall once know, that without ſhall be the fearfull. E

See the idle pleas of diſtruſt; We are not able: They are ſtronger. Could not God inable them? Was he not ſtronger then their Giants? Had he not promiſed to diſplace the Canaanites, to ſettle them in their ſtead? How much more eaſie is it for us to ſpy their

A their weakneſſe, then for them to eſpie the ſtrength of their adverſaries? When we meaſure our ſpirituall ſucceſſe by our owne power, we are vanquiſhed before we fight: He that would overcome, muſt neither look upon his own arme, nor the arme of his enemy, but the mouth and hand of him that hath promiſed, and can performe. Who are we fleſh and bloud, with our breath in our noſtrils, that we ſhould fight with Principalities, powers, ſpirituall wickedneſſes in heavenly places? The match is too unequall, we are not like Graſhoppers to theſe Giants; when we compare our ſelves with them, how can we but deſpaire? when we compare them with God, how can we be diſcouraged? He that hath brought us into this field, hath promiſed us victory. God knew their ſtrength, ere he offered to commit us.

Well might they have thought, Were not the Amalekites ſtronger then we? were
B not they armed, we naked? Did not the onely hand of Moſes, by lifting up, beat them down? Were not the Ægyptians no leſſe our maſters? Did not Death come running after us in their Chariots? Did we not leave theſe buryed in the Sea, the other unburied in the wilderneſſe? Whence had the Anakims their ſtrength, but from him that bids us goe up againſt them? Why have the bodies of our forefathers taken poſſeſſion of their Hebron, but for us? But now, their feare hath not left them ſo much reaſon, as to compare their adverſaries with others, but only with themſelves: Doubtleſſe, theſe Giants were mighty, but their feare hath ſtretched them out ſome Cubits, beyond their ſtature. Diſtruſt makes our dangers greater, and our helps leſſe then they are, and forecaſts ever worſe then ſhall be; and if evils be poſſible, it makes them certaine.

C Amongſt thoſe twelve Meſſengers, whom our ſecond Moſes ſent thorow the Land of Promiſe, there was but one Iudas: but amongſt thoſe twelve, which the former Moſes addreſſed thorow the ſame Land, there is but one Caleb: and yet thoſe were choſen out of the meaneſt, theſe out of the heads of Iſrael. As there is no ſociety free from ſome corruption: ſo it is hard, if in a community of men, there be not ſome faithfulneſſe.

We ſhall wrong God, if we feare leſt good cauſes ſhall be quite forſaken; he knowes how to ſerve himſelf of the beſt, if the feweſt; and could as eaſily be attended with a multitude, if he did not ſeek his own glory, in unlikelihoods.

Ioſhua was ſilent, and wiſely ſpared his tongue for a further advantage; Only Caleb ſpake: I doe not heare him ſay, Who am I to ſtrive with a multitude? What can Io-
D ſhua and I doe againſt ten Rulers? It is better to ſit ſtill, then to riſe and fall: But he reſolves to ſwimme againſt this ſtreame, and will either draw friends to the truth, or enemies upon himſelfe.

True Chriſtian fortitude teaches us not to regard the number, or quality of the opponents, but the equity of the cauſe; and cares not to ſtand alone, and challenge all commers: and if it could be oppoſed by as many worlds, as men, it may be overborn, but it cannot be daunted: Whereas popularity carries weak minds, and teaches them the ſafety of erring with a multitude.

Caleb ſaw the Giantly Anakims, and the walled Cities, as well as the reſt; and yet he ſayes, Let us goe up and poſſeſſe it: As if it were no more, but to goe, and ſee, and conquer. Faith is couragious, and makes nothing of thoſe dangers, wherewith o-
E thers are quailed.

It is very materiall with what eyes we look upon all objects. Feare doth not more multiply evils, then faith diminiſheth them; which is therefore bold, becauſe either it ſees not, or contemnes that terrour, which feare repreſents to the weake. There is none ſo valiant as the beleever.

It had been happy for Iſrael, if Calebs counſell had been as effectuall as good. But how eaſily have theſe Rulers diſcouraged a faint-hearted people! In ſtead of lifting up their enſignes, and marching towards Canaan; they ſit them downe, and lift up their voyce and cry. The rods of their Ægyptian Task-maſters had never been ſo fit for them, as now, for crying. They had cauſe indeed to weep for the ſin of their infidelity: but now they weep for feare of thoſe enemies they ſaw not. I feare if there had beene ten Calebs to perſwade, and but two faint ſpies to diſ-courage them, those two cowards would have prevailed against those ten solicitors: How much more now ten oppose, and but two incourage! An easie Rhetorick drawes us to the worse part; yea, it is hard not to run down the hill. The faction of evill is so much stronger in our nature, then that of Good, that every least motion prevailes for the one: scarce any suite for the other.

Now is Moses in danger of losing all the cost and care, that ever he bestowed upon Israel: His people are already gone back to Ægypt, in their hearts; and their bodies are returning. Oh ye rebellious Hebrewes, where shall God have you at last! Did ever Moses promise to bring you to a fruitfull Land without inhabitants? To give you a rich Country, without resistance? Are not the graves of Canaan as good, as those of Ægypt? What can ye but dye at the hands of the Anakims? Can ye hope for lesse from the Ægyptians? What madnesse is this to wish to dye, for feare of death? Is there lesse hope from your enemies, that shall be, when ye goe under strong and expert Leaders, then from the enemies that were, when ye shall return masterlesse? Can those cruell Ægyptians so soone have forgotten the bloud of their fathers, children, brothers, husbands, which perished in pursuing you? Had ye rather trust the mercy of known enemies, then the promise of a faithfull God? Which way will ye return? Who shall divide the Sea for you? Who shall fetch you water out of the Rock? Or can ye hope that the Manna of God will follow you, while ye run from him? Feeble mindes, when they meet with crosses they lookt not for, repent of their good beginnings, and wish any difficulty rather then that they finde. How many have pulled back their foot from the narrow way, for the troubles of a good profession?

It had bin time for the Israelites to have fallen down on their faces before Moses and Aaron, and to have said, Ye led us thorow the Sea, make way for us into Canaan. Those Giants are strong, but not so strong as the Rock of Rephidim; ye stroke that and it yeelded; If they be tall, the Pillar of God is higher then they: when we look on our selves, we see cause of feare; but when we consider the miraculous power of you our leaders, we cannot but contemne those men of measures. Leave us not therefore, but goe before us in your directions, goe to God for us in your praiers. But now contrarily Moses and Aaron fall on their faces to them, and sue to them, that they would be content to be conducted. Had they bin suffered to depart, they had perished; Moses and his few had bin victorious: and yet, as if he could not be happy without them, he falls on his face to them, that they would stay. We have never so much need to be importuned as in those things whose benefit should make us most importunate. The sweetnesse of Gods Law, and our promised glory is such, as should draw all hearts after it; And yet if we did not sue to men (as for life) that they would be reconciled to God, and be saved, I doubt whether they would obey; yea, it were well, if our sute were sufficient to prevaile.

Though Moses and Aaron intreat upon their faces, and Ioshua and Caleb perswade and rend their garments, yet they move nothing. The obstinate multitude, growne more violent with opposing, is ready to return them stones for their prayers. Such hath been ever the thanks of fidelity and truth; crossed wickednesse proves desperate, and in stead of yeelding, seekes for revenge. Nothing is so hatefull to a resolute sinner, as good counsell: We are become enemies to the world because we tell them truth.

That God which was invisibly present whiles they sinned, when they have sinned shewes himself glorious. They might have seen him before, that they should not sin; now they cannot chuse but see him in the height of their sin. They saw before, the Pillar of his ordinary presence: now they see him unusually terrible; that they may with shame and horror, confesse him able to defend, able to revenge. The help of God uses to shew it self in extremity. He that can prevent evills, conceales his ayde, till danger be ripe; and then he is as fearfull, as before he seemed connivent.

A

Corah's Conſpiracy.

Numb. 16.

THe teares of Iſrael were ſcarce dry, ſince the ſmart of their laſt mutiny, and now they begin another. The multitude is like a raging Sea, full of unquiet billowes of diſcontentment, whereof one riſes in the fall of another. They ſaw God did but threaten, and therefore are they bold to ſin: It was now high time they ſhould know what it is for God to be angry. There was never ſuch a revenge taken of Iſrael; never any better deſerved. When leſſer warnings will not ſerve, God looks into his Quiver for deadly arrowes. In the meane time what a weary life did Moſes lead in theſe continuall ſucceſſions of B conſpiracies? What did he gaine by this troubleſome government, but danger and deſpight? Who but he would not have wiſht himſelf rather with the ſheep of Iethro, then with theſe Wolves of Iſrael? But, as he durſt not quit his hook, without the calling of God; ſo now he dare not his Scepter, except he be diſmiſſed of him that called him; no troubles, no oppoſitions can drive him from his place: we are too weak, if we ſuffer men to chaſe us from that ſtation where God hath ſet us.

I ſee the Levites, not long ſince, drawing their ſwords for God and Moſes, againſt the reſt of Iſrael; and that fact wins them both praiſe and bleſſing: Now they are the forwardeſt in the rebellion againſt Moſes and Aaron, men of their own Tribe. There is no aſſurance of a man for one act: whom one ſin cannot faſten upon, another may. Yea, the ſame ſin may finde a repulſe one while from the ſame hand, which
C another time gives it entertainment: and that yeeldance loſes the thank of all the former reſiſtance. It is no praiſe to have done once well, unleſſe we continue.

Outward priviledges of bloud can avail nothing, againſt a particular calling of God. Theſe Reubenites had the right of the naturall primogeniture; yet doe they vainly challenge preeminence, where God hath ſubjected them. If all civil honor flow from the King, how much more from the God of Kings? his hand exalts the poore, and caſts down the mighty from their throne. The man that will be lifting up himſelf, in the pride of his heart, from under the foot of God, is juſtly trodden in the duſt.

Moſes is the Prince of Iſrael, Aaron the Prieſt; Moſes was milde, Aaron popular; yet both are conſpired againſt: their places are no leſſe brothers, then their perſons. Both are oppoſed at once; he that is a traitor to the Church, is a traitor to the King.
D Any ſuperiority is a mark of Envy. Had Moſes and Aaron bin but fellowes with the Iſraelites, none had been better beloved; their diſpoſitions were ſuch, as muſt needs have forced favour from the indifferent; now they were advanced, their malice is not inferiour to their honour. High towers muſt look for lightnings; we offer not to undermine but thoſe walls, which we cannot ſcale. Nature in every man is both envious, and diſdainfull; and never loves to honour another, but where it may be an honour to it ſelfe.

There cannot be conceived an honor leſſe worth emulation, then this principality of Iſrael; a people that could give nothing; a people that had nothing, but in hope; a people whom their leader was faine to feed with bread and water; which paid him no tribute, but of ill words; whoſe command was nothing but a burden: and yet this E dignity was an eye-ſore to theſe Levites and theſe Reubenites, Ye take too much upon you, ye ſonnes of Levi.

And this challenge (though thus unſeaſonable) hath drawn in two hundred and fifty Captaines of Iſrael. What wonder is it, that the ten Rulers prevailed ſo much with the multitude to diſſwade them from Canaan; when three traitors prevailed thus with 250 Rulers, famous in the Congregation, and men of renown? one man may kindle ſuch a fire, as all the world cannot quench. One plague-ſore may infect a whole Kingdome: The infection of evill is much worſe then the act.

It is not like, theſe Leaders of Iſrael could erre without followers; He is a meane man that drawes not ſome Clients after him. It hath bin ever a dangerous policy of Satan, to aſſault the beſt: he knowes, that the multitude (as we ſay of Bees) will follow their Maſter.

Nothing can be more pleasing to the vulgar sort, then to heare their Governours taxed, and themselves flattered. All the Congregation is holy; Every one of them; Wherefore lift ye up your selves? Every word is a falshood. For Moses dejected himself (Who am I?) God lifted him up, over Israel: And so was Israel holy, as Moses was ambitious. What holinesse was there in so much infidelity, feare, Idolatry, mutiny, disobedience? What could make them uncleane, if this were holinesse? They had scarce wip't their mouthes, or washt their hands, since their last obstinacy: and yet these pick-thanks say, All Israel is holy. A

I would never desire a better proofe of a false teacher, then flattery: true meaning need not uphold it self by soothing. There is nothing easier then to perswade men well of themselves; when a mans self-love meets with anothers flattery, it is an high praise that will not be beleeved. It was more out of opposition, then beleefe, that these men plead the holinesse of Israel. Violent adversaries, to uphold a side, will maintain those things they beleeve not. B

Moses argues not for himself, but appeales to God; neither speaks for his own right, but his brother Aarons; He knew that Gods immediate service was worthy to be more precious, then his government: That, his Princedome served but to the glory of his Master. Good Magistrates are more tender over Gods honor then their own; and more sensible of the wrongs offered to Religion, then to themselves.

It is safest to trust God with his own causes. If Aaron had bin chosen by Israel, Moses would have sheltred him under their authority: Now that God did immediately appoint him, his patronage is sought, whose the election was. We may easily fault in the managing of divine affaires; and so our want of successe cannot want sin; He knowes how to use, how to blesse his owne meanes. C

As there was a difference betwixt the people and Levites, so betwixt the Levites and Priests. The God of order loves to have our degrees kept. Whiles the Levites would be looking up to the Priests, Moses sends down their eyes to the people. The way not to repine at those above us, is to look at those below us. There is no better remedy for ambition, then to cast up our former receits, and to compare them with our deservings, and to confer our own estate with inferiors; So shall we finde cause to be thankfull that we are above any, rather then of envy that any is above us.

Moses hath chid the sons of Levi, for mutining against Aaron; and so much the more, because they were of his own Tribe: now he sends for the Reubenites, which rose against himself. They come not, and their message is worse then their absence. Moses is accused of injustice, cruelty, falshood, trechery, usurpation; and Egypt it self must be commended, rather then Moses shall want reproach. Innocency is no shelter from ill tongues; malice never regards how true any accusation is, but how spightfull. D

Now it was time for Moses to be angry. They durst not have bin thus bold, if they had not seen his mildnesse. Lenity is ill bestowed upon stubborn natures; It is an injurious senslesnesse, not to feele the wounds of our reputation. It well appeares he is angry, when he praies against them. He was displeased before, but when he was most bitter against them, he still prayed for them: but now he bends his very prayers against them. Look not to their offering. There can be no greater revenge, then the imprecation of the righteous; there can be no greater judgement then Gods rejection of their services. With us men, what more argues dislike of the person, then the turning back of his present? What will God accept from us, if not prayers? E

The innocence of Moses calls for revenge on his Adversaries. If he had wronged them in his government, in vain should he have looked to Gods hand for right. Our sins exclude us from Gods protection; whereas uprightnesse challenges, and findes his patronage. An Asse taken had made him uncapable of favour. Corrupt Governours lose the comfort of their own brest, and the tuition of God.

The same tongue that prayed against the Conspiratours, praies for the people. As lewd men think to carry it with number; Corah had so farre prevailed, that he had drawn the multitude to his side. God, the avenger of treasons, would have consumed them all at once; Moses & Aaron pray for their Rebels. Although they were worthy of death, & nothing but death could stop their mouthes; yet their mercifull Leaders will

A will not buy their owne peace, with the loſſe of ſuch enemies. Oh rare and imitable mercy! The people riſe up againſt their Governours; Their Governours fall on their faces to God for the people; ſo farre are they from plotting revenge, that they will not endure God ſhould revenge for them.

Moſes knew well enough that all thoſe Iſraelites muſt periſh in the Wilderneſſe; God had vowed it for their former inſurrection; yet how earneſtly doth he ſue to God, not to conſume them at once! The very reſpit of evills is a favour next to the removall.

- Corah kindled the fire; the two hundred and fifty Captains brought ſticks to it; All Iſraell warmed themſelves by it; only the incendiaries periſh. Now doe the Iſraelites owe their life to them, whoſe death they intended. God and Moſes knew to
B diſtinguiſh betwixt the heads of the faction & the train; though neither be faultleſſe, yet the one is plagued, the other forgiven. Gods vengeance, when it is at the hotteſt, makes differences of men: Get you away from about the Tabernacles of Corah. Ever before common judgement there is a ſeparation. In the univerſall judgment of all the earth, the Judge himſelf will ſeparate; in theſe paticular executions, we muſt ſeparate our ſelves. The ſociety of wicked men, eſpecially in their ſins, is mortally dangerous: whiles we will not be parted, how can we complaine, if we be enwrapped in their condemnation? our very company ſins with them, why ſhould we not ſmart with them alſo?

Moſes had well hoped, that when theſe Rebels ſhould ſee all the Iſraelites run from them, as from Monſters, and looking affrightedly upon their Tents, and ſhould
C heare that fearfull Proclamation of vengeance, againſt them, (howſoever they did before ſet a face on their conſpiracy; yet now) their hearts would have miſgiven. But lo, theſe bold Traitors ſtand impudently ſtaring in the doore of their Tents, as if they would out-face the revenge of God; as if Moſes had never wrought miracle before them; as if no one Iſraelite had ever bled for rebelling. Thoſe that ſhall periſh are blinded. Pride and infidelity obdures the heart, and makes even cowards fearleſſe.

So ſoone as the innocent are ſevered, the guilty periſh: the earth cleaves and ſwallowes up the Rebels. This element was not uſed to ſuch morſels. It devours the carkaſſes of men; but bodies informed with living ſoules, never before. To have ſeene them ſtruck dead upon the earth had bin fearfull; but to ſee the earth at once their executioner and grave, was more horrible. Neither the Sea, nor the earth are fit to D give paſſage; The Sea is moiſt and flowing, and will not be divided, for the continuity of it; The earth is dry and maſſie, and will neither yeeld naturally, nor meet again, when it hath yeelded; yet the waters did cleave to give way unto Iſrael, for their preſervation; the earth did cleave, to give way to the Conſpirators, in judgement: Both Sea and earth did ſhut their jawes again upon the adverſaries of God.

There was more wonder in this later. It was a marvell that the waters opened: it was no wonder that they ſhut again; for, the retyring and flowing, was naturall. It was no leſſe marvell, that the earth opened; but more marvell that it did ſhut again, becauſe it had no naturall diſpoſition to meet, when it was divided. Now might Iſrael ſee, they had to doe with a God that could revenge with eaſe.

There were two ſorts of Traitors; the Earth ſwallowed up the one, the Fire the E other. All the Elements agree to ſerve the vengeance of their Maker. Nadab and Abihu brought fit perſons, but unfit fire to God; theſe Levites bring the right fire, but unwarranted perſons before him; Fire from God conſumes both. It is a dangerous thing to uſurp ſacred functions. The Miniſtery will not grace the man; The man may diſgrace the Miniſtery.

The common people were not ſo faſt gathered to Corahs flattering perſwaſion before, as now they ran from the ſight and feare of his judgement. I marvell not if they could not truſt that earth whereon they ſtood, whiles they knew their hearts had been falſe. It is a madneſſe to run away from puniſhment, and not from ſinne.

AARONS Censer and Rod.

WHen shall we see an end of these murmurings, and these judgements? Because these men rose up against Moses and Aaron, therefore God consumed them; and because God consumed them, therefore the people rise up against Moses and Aaron: and now because the people thus murmure, God hath againe begun to consume them. What a circle is here of sinnes, and judgments? wrath is gone out from God; Moses is quick sighted, and spies it at the setting out. By how much more faithfull and familiar we are with God, so much earlier doe we discern his judgments; as those which are well acquainted with men, know by their looks and gestures that which strangers understand but by their actions; As finer tempers are more sensible of the changes of weather. Hence the Seers of God have ever from their Watch-tower descried the judgements of God a far off. If another man had seen from Carmel a Cloud of a hand-breadth, he could not have told Ahab he should be wet. It is enough for Gods Messengers, out of their acquaintance with their Masters proceedings, to foresee punishment: no marvell if those see it not, which are wilfully sinfull: we men reveal not our secret purposes either to enemies or strangers: all their favour is to feele the plague, ere they can espie it.

Moses, though he were great with God, yet he takes not upon him this reconciliation; he may advise Aaron what to doe, himselfe undertakes not to act it: It is the work of the Priesthood to make an atonement for the people; Aaron was first his brothers tongue to Pharaoh, now he is the peoples tongue to God: he only must offer up the Incense of the publike prayers to God. Who would not think it a small thing to hold a Censer in his hand? yet if any other had done it, he had faln with the dead, and not stood betwixt the living and dead; In stead of the smoak ascending, the fire had descended upon him; and shal there be lesse use, or lesse regard of the Evangelicall ministery, then the Legall? When the world hath poured out all his contempt, we are they that must reconcile men to God, and without us they perish.

I know not whether more to marvell at the courage or mercy of Aaron: his mercy, that he would yet save so rebellious a people; his courage, that he would save them, with so great a danger of himself. For, as one that would part a fray, he thrusts himselfe under the strokes of God; and puts it to the choice of the revenger, whether he will smite him, or forbeare the rest; He stands boldly betwixt the living and the dead, as one that will either dye with them, or have them live with him; the sight of fourteen hundred carkases dismaid him not: he that before feared the threats of the people, now fears not the strokes of God. It is not for Gods Ministers to stand upon their own perils in the common causes of the Church: their prayers must oppose the judgements of the Almighty; when the fire of Gods anger is kindled, their Censers must smoak with fire from the Altar. Every Christian must pray the removall of vengeance; how much more they whom God hath appointed to mediate for his people? every mans mouth is his own; but they are the mouthes of all.

Had Aaron thrust in himself with empty hands, I doubt whether he had prevailed; now his Censer was his protection: when we come with supplications in our hands, we need not feare the strokes of God. We have leave to resist the divine judgments by by our prayers, with favour and ſucceſſe. So ſoon as the incenſe of Aaron aſcended up unto God, he ſmelt a ſavour of reſt; he will rather ſpare the offenders, then ſtrike their interceſſor. How hardly can any people miſcarry, that have faithfull Miniſters to ſue for their ſafety: Nothing but the ſmoke of hearty prayers can cleanſe the ayre from the plagues of God. A

If Aarons ſacrifice were thus accepted; how much more ſhall the High-Prieſt of the New Teſtament, by interpoſing himſelf to the wrath of his Father, deliver the offenders from death? The plague was entred upon all the ſons of men: O Saviour, thou ſtoodſt betwixt the living and the dead, that all which beleeve in thee, ſhould not periſh. Aaron offered and was not ſtricken; but thou O Redeemer, wouldſt offer and be ſtruck, that by thy ſtripes we might be healed: So ſtoodſt thou betwixt the dead and living, that thou wert both alive and dead; and all this that we, when we were dead, might live for ever. B

Nothing more troubled Iſrael, then a feare leſt the two brethren ſhould cunningly ingroſſe the government to themſelves. If they had done ſo, what wiſe man would have envied them an office ſo little worth, ſo dearely purchaſed? But becauſe this conceit was ever apt to ſtir them to rebellion, and to hinder the benefit of this holy ſoveraignty; therefore God hath endevoured nothing more, then to let them ſee that theſe officers, whom they ſo much envied, were of his own proper inſtitution: They had ſcarce ſhut their eyes, ſince they ſaw the confuſion of thoſe two hundred and fifty uſurping ſacrificers; and Aarons effectuall interceſſion for ſtaying the plague of Iſrael. In the one, the execution of Gods vengeance upon the competitors of Aaron, for his ſake; In the other, the forbearance of vengeance upon the people for Aarons mediation, might have challenged their voluntary acknowledgment of his juſt calling from God; If there had been in them either awe, or thankfulneſſe, they could not have doubted of his lawfull ſupremacy. How could they chooſe but argue thus: Why would God ſo fearefully have deſtroyed the rivals that durſt conteſt with Aaron, if he would have allowed him any equall? Wherefore ſerve thoſe plates of the Altar, which we ſee made of thoſe uſurped Cenſers, but to warne all poſterity of ſuch preſumption? Why ſhould God ceaſe ſtriking, whiles Aaron interpoſed betwixt the living and the dead, if he were but as one of us? Which of us if we had ſtood in the plague, had not added to the heap? Incredulous minds will not be perſwaded with any evidence. Theſe two brothers had lived aſunder forty yeares, God makes them both meet in one office of delivering Iſrael. One halfe of the miracles were wrought by Aaron; he ſtrooke with the Rod, whiles it brought thoſe plagues on Ægypt. The Iſraelites heard God call him up by name to mount Sinai; they ſaw him anointed from God: and (leſt they ſhould think this a ſet match betwixt the brethren) they ſaw the earth opening, the fire iſſuing from God upon their emulous oppoſites: they ſaw his ſmoke a ſufficient antidote for the plague of God; and yet ſtill Aarons calling is queſtioned. Nothing is more naturall to every man, than unbeliefe: but the earth never yeelded a people ſo ſtrongly incredulous, as theſe; and after ſo many thouſand generations, their children doe inherit their obſtinacy; ſtill doe they oppoſe the true High Prieſt, the Anointed of God: ſixteene hundred yeares deſolation hath not drawn from them to confeſſe him whom God hath choſen. C D E

How deſirous was God to give ſatisfaction even to the obſtinate! There is nothing more materiall, then that men ſhould be aſſured their ſpirituall guides have their Commiſſion and Calling from God: The want whereof is a prejudice to our ſucceſſe. It ſhould not be ſo: but the corruption of men will not receive good, but from due meſſengers.

Before, God wrought miracles in the Rod of Moſes; now, in the Rod of Aaron. As Pharaoh might ſee himſelfe in Moſes his Rod; who, of a rod of defence and protection, was turned into a venomous Serpent: So Iſrael might ſee themſelves in the Rod of Aaron. Every Tribe and every Iſraelite was, of himſelfe, as a ſere-ſtick, without life, without ſap; and if any one of them had power to live, and flouriſh, he muſt acknowledge it from the immediate power, and gift of God.

Before

A Before Gods calling, all men are alike: Every name is alike written in their Rod; there is no difference in the letters, in the wood; neither the characters of Aaron are fairer, nor the ſtaffe more precious; It is the choice of God that makes the diſtinction: So it is in our calling of Chriſtianity; All are equally devoid of the poſſibility of grace: All equally liveleſſe, by nature we all are ſons of wrath: If we be now better then others, who ſeparated us? We are all Crab-ſtocks in this Orchard of God, he may graffe what fruit he pleaſes upon us, only the grace and effectuall calling of God makes the difference.

These twelve heads of Iſrael would never have written their names in their rods, but in hope they might be choſen to this dignity. What an honour was this Prieſthood, whereof all the Princes of Iſrael are ambitious? If they had not thought it an B high preferment, they had never ſo much envied the office of Aaron. What ſhall we think of this change? Is the Euangelicall miniſtration of leſſe worth then the Leviticall? Whiles the Teſtament is better, is the ſervice worſe? How is it that the great think themſelves too good for this imployment? How is it, that under the Goſpell men are diſparaged with that which honoured them under the Law; that their ambition and our ſcorne meet in one ſubject?

These twelve rods are not laid up in the ſeverall cabinets of their Owners; but are brought forth and laid before the Lord. It is fit God ſhould make choice of his own attendants. Even we men hold it injurious to have ſervants obtruded upon us by others: never ſhall that man have comfort in his Miniſtery whom God hath not choſen. The great Commander of the world hath ſet every man in his ſtation; To one C he hath ſaid, Stand thou in this Tower and watch; To another, Make thou good theſe Trenches; To a third, Digge thou in this Mine. He that gives and knowes our abilities, can beſt ſet us on work.

This Rod was the paſtorall ſtaffe of Aaron, the great Shepherd of Iſrael. God teſtifies his approbation of his charge, by the fruit. That a rod cut off from the tree, ſhould bloſſome, it was ſtrange; but that in one night it ſhould bear buds, bloſſomes, fruit, and that both ripe and hard, it was highly miraculous. The ſame power that revives the dead plants of winter, in the Spring, doth it here without earth, without time, without Sunne; that Iſrael might ſee and grant, it was no reaſon his choyce ſhould be limited, whoſe power is unlimited.

Fruitfulneſſe is the beſt argument of the calling of God: Not only all the plants D of his ſetting, but the very boughs cut off from the body of them, will flouriſh. And that there may not want a ſucceſſion of increaſe, here are fruit, bloſſomes, buds; both proofe and hope inſeparably mixed.

It could not but be a great comfort unto Aaron, to ſee his rod thus miraculouſly flouriſhing; to ſee this wonderfull Teſtimony of Gods favour and election: Sure he could not but think, Who am I, O God, that thou ſhouldeſt thus chooſe me out of all the Tribes of Iſrael? My weakneſſe hath bin more worthy of thy rod of correction, then my rod hath bin worthy of theſe bloſſomes. How haſt thou magnified me in the ſight of all thy people? How able art thou to uphold my imbecility with the rod of thy ſupport? how able to defend me with the rod of thy power, who haſt thus brought fruit out of the ſapleſſe rod of my profeſſion? That ſervant of God is E worthy to faint, that holds it not a ſufficient incouragement to ſee the evident proofes of his Maſters favour.

Commonly, thoſe fruits which are ſoone ripe, ſoone wither, but theſe Almonds of Aarons rod are not more early, then laſting: the ſame hand which brought them out before their time, preſerved them beyond their time; and for perpetuall memory, both rod and fruit muſt be kept in the Ark of God. The Tables of Moſes, the Rod of Aaron, the Manna of God, are monuments fit for ſo holy a ſhrine. The Doctrine, Sacraments and government of Gods people, are precious to him, and muſt be ſo to men. All times ſhall ſee and wonder, how his ancient Church was fed, taught, ruled. Moſes his rod did great miracles, yet I finde it not in the Ark. The Rod of Aaron hath this priviledge, becauſe it caried the miracle ſtill in it ſelf, whereas the wonders of that other Rod were paſſed. Thoſe monuments would God have continued in his Church, which carry in thē the moſt manifeſt evidences of that which they import.

The ſame God, which by many tranſient demonſtrations had approved the calling of Aaron to Iſrael, will now have a permanent memoriall of their conviction, that whenſoever they ſhould ſee this relique, they ſhould be aſhamed of their preſumption & infidelity. The name of Aaron was not more plainly written in that rod, then the ſin of Iſrael was in the fruit of it; and how much Iſrael findes their rebellion beaten with this rod, appeares in their preſent relenting and complaint; Behold, we are dead, we periſh. God knowes how to pull down the biggeſt ſtomach, and can extort glory to his own Name from the moſt obſtinate gainſayers.

The Brazen Serpent.

Num. 21.

SEven times already hath Iſrael mutined againſt Moſes, and ſeven times hath either bin threatned, or puniſhed; yet now they fall to it afreſh. As a teaſty man findes occaſion to chafe at every trifle; ſo this diſcontented people either finde or make all things troubleſome. One while they have no water; then bitter; One while no God; then one too many; One while no bread; then bread enough, but too light; One while they will not abide their Governours; then they cannot abide their loſſe. Aaron and Miriam were never ſo grudged alive, as they are bewayled dead. Before, they wanted Onions, Garlike, Fleſh-pots; now they want Figs, Vines, Pomegranates, Corne. And as crabbed children that cry for every thing they can think of, are whipped by their wiſe mother: So God juſtly ſerves theſe fond Iſraelites.

It was firſt their way that makes them repine; They were fain to goe round about Idumea, the journey was long and troubleſome. They had ſent intreaties to Edom for licence of paſſage the next way, reaſonably, ſubmiſly; It was churliſhly denyed them. Eſau lives ſtill in his poſterity; Iacob in Iſrael; The combate which they began in Rebeccaes belly, is not yet ended. Amalek, which was one limbe of Eſau, followes them at the heeles; The Edomite, which was another, meets them in the face: So long as there is a world, there will be oppoſition to the choſen of God. They may come at their perill; the way had bin nearer, but bloudy; they dare not goe it, and yet complaine of length.

If they were afraid to purchace their reſting place with warre, how much leſſe would they their paſſage? What ſhould God doe with impatient men? They will not goe the neareſt way, and yet complaine to goe about. He that will paſſe to the promiſed land, muſt neither ſtand upon length of way, nor difficulty. Every way hath his inconveniencies; the neareſt hath more danger, the fartheſt hath more paine; either, or both muſt be overcome, if ever we will enter the reſt of God.

Aaron and Miriam were now paſt the danger of their mutinies; for want of another match, they joyne God with Moſes, in their murmurings: Though they had not mentioned him, they could not ſever him in their inſurrection; For, in the cauſes of his own ſervants, he challenges even when he is not challenged. What will become of thee, O Iſrael, when thou makeſt thy Maker thine enemy? Impatience is the couſin to frenſie; this cauſes men not to care upon whom they run, ſo they may breathe out ſome revenge. How oft have we heard men that have bin diſpleaſed by others, teare the Name of their Maker in pieces? He that will judge, and can confound, is fetcht into the quarrell without cauſe. But if to ſtrive with a mighty man be unwiſe and unſafe, what ſhall it be to ſtrive with the mighty God?

As an angry child caſts away that which is given him, becauſe he hath not that he would; ſo doe theſe fooliſh Iſraelites; their bread is light, and their water unſatisfying, becauſe their way diſpleaſed them. Was ever people fed with ſuch bread or water? Twice hath the very Rock yeelded them water, & every day the heaven affords them bread. Did any one ſoule amongſt them miſcarry, either for hunger or thirſt? But no bread will down with them, ſave that which the earth yeelds; no water but from the naturall Wells or Rivers. Unleſſe nature may be allowed to be her owne carver, ſhe is never contented.

Manna

A Manna had no faulr, but that it was too good, and too frequent; the pulſe of Ægypt had been fitter for theſe coorſe mouthes: This heavenly bread was unſpeakably delicious, it taſted like wafers of honey; & yet even this Angels food is contemned. He that is full deſpiſeth an honey-combe. How ſweet & delicate is the Goſpel! Not onely the fathers of the Old Teſtament, but the Angels deſired to look into the glorious myſteries of it, and yet we are cloyed. This ſupernaturall food is too light: the bread-corn of our humane reaſon, and profound diſcourſe, would better content us.

Moſes will not revenge this wrong, God will; yet will he not deal with them himſelf, but he ſends the fiery Serpents to anſwer for him: How fitly! They had carried themſelves like ſerpents to their governors; how oft had they ſtung Moſes & Aaron, near to death? If the Serpent bite when he is not charmed, no better is a ſlanderer.

B Now theſe venemous adders revenge it, which are therefore called fiery; becauſe their poyſon ſcalded to death; God hath an hand in the annoyance and hurt of the baſeſt creature; how much leſſe can the ſting of an ill tongue, or the malice of an ill ſpirit, ſtrike us without him? Whiles they were in Goſhen, the Frogs, Lice, Caterpillers ſpared them, and plagued the Ægyptians; now they are rebellious in the deſart, the ſerpents find them out and ſting them to death. He that brought the Quailes thither to feed them, fetches theſe ſerpents thither to puniſh them. While we are at wars with God, we can look for no peace with his creatures: Every thing rejoyces to execute the vengeance of his Maker. The ſtones of the field will not be in league with us, while we are not in league with God.

C Theſe men, when the Spies had told them news of the Gyants of Canaan, a little before had wiſht, Would God we were dead in this wilderneſſe: Now God hath heard their prayers, what with the plague, what with the ſerpents, many thouſands of them dyed. The ill wiſhes of our impatience are many times heard. As thoſe good things are not granted us which we pray for without care, ſo thoſe evils which we pray for and would not have, are oft granted. The eares of God are not onely open to the prayers of faith, but to the imprecations of infidelity. It is dangerous wiſhing evill to our ſelves or ours; it is juſt with God to take us at our word, and to effect that which our lips ſpeak againſt our heart.

Before, God hath ever conſulted with Moſes, and threatned ere he puniſht; now he ſtrikes & ſayes nothing. The anger is ſo much more, by how much leſſe notified. When God is not heard before he is felt, (as in the hewing of wood, the blow is not

D heard till the axe be ſeen to have ſtruck) it is a fearfull ſign of diſpleaſure: it is with God as with us men, that ſtill revenges are ever moſt dangerous. Till now all was well enough with Iſrael, and yet they grudged; Thoſe that will complain without a cauſe, ſhall have cauſe to complaine for ſomething. Diſcontented humours ſeldome ſcape unpuniſhed, but receive that moſt juſtly whereat they repined unjuſtly.

Now the people are glad to ſeek to Moſes unbidden. Ever heretofore they have been wont to be ſued to, and intreated for without their own intreaty; now their miſery makes them importunate; There needs no ſolicitor where there is ſenſe of ſmart. It were pitty men ſhould want affliction, ſince it ſends them to their prayers and confeſſions. All the perſwaſions of Moſes could not doe that which the Serpents have done for him. O God, thou ſeeſt how neceſſary it is we ſhould be ſtung ſome-

E times, elſe we ſhould run wilde, and never come to a ſound humiliation; we ſhould never ſeek thee, if thy hand did not finde us out.

They had ſpoken againſt God and Moſes, and now they humbly ſpeak to Moſes that he would pray to God for them. He that ſo oft prayed for the unbidden, cannot but much more doe it requeſted, and now obtaines the meanes of their cure. It was equally in the power of God to remove the ſerpents, and to heale their ſtinging; to have cured the Iſraelites by his word, and by his ſigne: But he findes it beſt for his people (to exerciſe their faith) that the Serpents may bite, and their bitings may invenome, and that this venome may indanger the Iſraelites; & that they, thus affected, may ſeek to him for remedy, & ſeeking may find it from ſuch means as ſhould have no power but in ſignification; that while their bodies were cured by the ſign, their ſouls might be confirmed by the matter ſignified. A ſerpent of braſſe could no more heale, then ſting them. What remedy could their eyes give to their legs? Or what could a Serpent of cold braſſe prevaile againſt a living and fiery Serpent? In this troubleſome Deſart we are all ſtung by that fiery and old Serpent; O Saviour, it is to thee we muſt look, and be cured; It is thou that wert their Paſchal Lamb, their Manna, their Rock, their Serpent. To all purpoſes doſt thou vary thy ſelfe to thy Church, that we may finde thee every where: Thou art for our nouriſhment, refreſhing, cure; as hereafter, ſo even now, all in all. A

This Serpent which was appointed for cure to Iſrael, at laſt ſtings them to death, by Idolatrous abuſe. What poyſon there is in Idolatry, that makes even Antidotes deadly! As Moſes therefore raiſed this Serpent, ſo Ezekias pulled it down: God commanded the raiſing of it, God approved the demoliſhing of it. Superſtitious uſe can mar the very inſtitutions of God: how much more the moſt wiſe and well-grounded devices of men? B

Of Balaam.

Num. 22, 23.

Moab and Midian had been all this while ſtanders by, and lookers on, If they had not ſeene the pattern of their own ruine in theſe neighbours, it had never troubled them, to ſee the Kings of the Amorites and Baſhan to fall before Iſrael. Had not the Iſraelites camped in the plains of Moab, their victories had been no eye-ſore to Balac. Wicked men never care to obſerve Gods judgements till themſelves be touched; The fire of a neighbours houſe would not ſo affect us, if it were not with the danger of our owne: Secure mindes never ſtartle till God come home to their very ſenſes. C

Balac and his Moabites had wit enough to feare, not wit enough to prevent judgement: They ſee an enemy in their borders, and yet take no right courſe for their ſafety. Who would not have looked, that they ſhould have come to Iſrael with conditions of peace? Or why did they not think, Either Iſraels God is ſtronger then ours, or he is not? If he be not, why are we afraid of him? If he be, why doe we not ſerve him? The ſame hand which gives them victory, can give us protection. Carnall men that are ſecure of the vengeance of God, ere it doe come, are maſtered with it, when it doth come; and not knowing which way to turne them, run forth at the wrong doore.

The Midianites joyne with the Moabites in conſultation, in action againſt Iſrael: One would have thought, they ſhould have looked for favour from Moſes for Iethro's ſake, which was both a Prince of their country, and father in law to Moſes; and either now, or not long before was with Iſrael in the Wilderneſſe. Neither is it like, but that Moſes having found forty years harbour amongſt them, would have been (what he might) inclinable to favourable treaties with them; but now they are ſo faſt linked to Moab, that they will either ſink or ſwim together. Intireneſſe with wicked conſorts is one of the ſtrongeſt chains of Hell, and bindes us to a participation both of ſin, and puniſhment: An eaſie occaſion wil knit wicked hearts together in conſpiracy againſt the Church of God. D

Their errand is deviliſh (Come curſe Iſrael:) That which Satan could not do by the ſwords of Og and Sehon, he will now try to effect by the tongue of Balaam. If either ſtrength or policy would prevail againſt Gods Church, it could not ſtand. And why ſhould not we be as induſtrious to promote the glory of God, and bend both our hands and heads to the cauſes of the Almighty? When all helps fail Moab, the Magician is ſought to. It is a ſign of a deſperate cauſe, to make Satan either our Counſellor, or our refuge. E

Why did they not ſend to Balaam to bleſſe themſelves, rather then to curſe Iſrael? It had been more eaſie to be defended from the hurt of their enemies, then to have their enemies laid open to be hurt by them. Pride & malice did not care ſo much for ſafety, as for conqueſt; it would not contẽt them to eſcape Iſrael, if Iſrael may eſcape them; it was not thank-worthy to ſave their own bloud, if they did not ſpil the bloud of others; As if their own proſperity had been nothing, if Iſrael alſo proſpered. If there

A there be one project worſe then another, a wicked heart will finde it out: Nothing but deſtruction will content the malicious.

I know not whether Balaam were more famous, or Balac more confident. If the King had not been perſwaded of the ſtrength of his charm, he had not ſent ſo far, & paid ſo dear for it; now he truſts more to his inchantment, then to the forces of Moab and Midian; and (as if heaven and earth were in the power of a charmers tongue) he ſaith, He that thou bleſſeſt, is bleſſed; and he whom thou curſeſt, is curſed. Magick, through the permiſſion of God, is powerfull; for whatſoever the Devill can doe, the Magician may doe; but it is madneſſe to think either of them omnipotent. If either the curſes of men, or the indeavours of the powers of darkneſſe, ſhould be effectual, all would be hell. No, Balac: So ſhort is the power of thy Balaam, that neither thou,
B nor thy prophet himſelf can avoid that curſe, which thou wouldſt have brought upon Iſrael. Had Balaam been a true Prophet of God, this bold aſſurance had been but juſt. Both thoſe ancient Seers, and the Prophets of the Goſpel have the ratification of God in heaven, to their ſentences on earth. Why have we leſſe care of the bleſſings, and leſſe feare of the curſes and cenſures of Gods Miniſters? Who would not rather have Eliſha's guard, then both the Kings of Iſrael and Aſſyria? He himſelfe as he had the Angelicall chariots and horſemen about him, ſo was he the chariots and horſemen of Iſrael. Why ſhould our faith be leſſe ſtrong then ſuperſtition? Or why ſhould Gods agents have leſſe vertue then Satans?

I ſhould wonder to hear God ſpeak with a falſe prophet, if I did not know, it hath been no rare thing with him (as with men) to beſtow words, even where he will not
C beſtow favour. Pharaoh, Abimelec, Nebuchadnezzar, receive viſions from God: neither can I think this ſtrange, when I heare God ſpeaking to Satan in a queſtion no leſſe familiar then this of Balaam, Whence com'ſt thou, Satan? Not the ſound of the voice of God, but the matter which he ſpeaks argues love: He may ſpeak to an enemy; he ſpeaks peace to none but his owne. It is a vaine brag, God hath ſpoken to me. So may he doe to reprobates or devils. But what ſaid he? Did he ſay to my ſoule, I am thy ſalvation? Hath he indented with me that he will be my God, and I ſhall be his? I cannot heare this voice and not live.

God heard all the conſultation and meſſage of theſe Moabites; theſe meſſengers could not have moved their foot or their tongue but in him; and yet he which asked Adam where he was, askes Balaam, What men are theſe? I have ever ſeene, that God
D loves to take occaſion of proceeding with us from our ſelves, rather then from his own immediate preſcience. Hence it is, that we lay open our wants, and confeſſe our ſins to him that knows both, better then our own hearts, becauſe he will deale with us from our owne mouthes.

The prevention of God forbids both his journey and his curſe: And what if he had been ſuffered to goe and curſe? What corne had this wind ſhaken, when God meant to bleſſe them? How many Buls have bellowed out execrations againſt this Church of God? what are we the worſe? Yet I doubt, if we had been ſo much bleſſed, had not thoſe Balaamitiſh curſes been ſpent upon us. He that knows what waſte wind the cauſeleſſe curſes of wicked men are, yet will not have Balaam curſe Iſrael; becauſe he will not allow Balac ſo much incouragement, in his oppoſition, as the E conceit of this help. Or perhaps, if Balac thought this Sorcerer a true Prophet, God would not have his Name, ſo much, as in the opinion of the Heathen, ſcandalized, in uſurping it to a purpoſe, which he meant not ſhould ſucceed.

The hand of God is in the reſtraint of many evils, which we never knew to be towards us. The Iſraelites ſate ſtill in their Tents, they little thought what miſchiefe was brewing againſt them: without ever making them of counſell, God croſſes the deſigns of their enemies. He that keepeth Iſrael is both a ſure and a ſecret friend.

The reward of the divination had eaſily commanded the journey, and curſe of the covetous prophet if God had not ſtayed him. How oft are wicked men curbed by a divine hand; even in thoſe ſins which their heart ſtands to? It is no thank to lewd men that their wickedneſſe is not proſperous. Whence is it that the world is not over-run with evill, but from this; that men cannot be ſo ill as they would?

The first entertainment of this message would make a stranger think Balaam wise and honest; he wil not give a sudden answer, but craves leasure to consult with God, and promises to return the answer he shall receive. Who would not say, This man is free from rashnesse, from partiality? Dissimulation is crafty, and able to deceive thousands. The words are good: when he comes to action, the fraud bewrays it self; For, both he insinuates his own forwardnesse, and casts the blame of the prohibition upon God, and (which is worse) delivers but half his answer: he saies indeed, God refuses to give me leave to goe: he saies not, as it was, He charges me not to curse them, for they are blessed. So did Balaam deny, as one that wisht to be sent for again. Perhaps a peremptory refusall had hindred his further solicitation. Concealment of some truths is sometimes as faulty as a denyall. True fidelity is not niggardly in her relations. A

Where wickednesse meets with power, it thinks to command all the world, and takes great scorn of any repulse. So little is Balac discouraged with one refusall, that he sends so much the stronger message; Mo Princes, and more honourable. Oh that we could be so importunate for our good, as wicked men are for the compassing of their own designes! A deniall doth but whet the desires of vehement suitors. Why are we faint in spirituall things, when we are not denyed, but delayed? B

Those which are themselves transported with vanity, and ambition, think that no heart hath power to resist these offers. Balacs Princes thought they had struck it dead, when they had once mentioned promotion to great honour. Self-love makes them think they cannot be slaves, whiles others may be free; and that all the world would be glad to run on madding after their bait. Nature thinks it impossible to contemn honour and wealth; and becausse too many souls are thus taken, cannot beleeve that any would escape. But let carnall hearts know, there are those can spit the world in the face, and say, Thy gold and silver perish with thee: and that in comparison of a good conscience, can tread under foot his best proffers, like shadowes, as they are; and that can doe as Balaam said. C

How neer truth and falshood can lodge together! Here was piety in the lips, and covetousnesse in the heart. Who can any more regard good words, that heares Balaam speak so like a Saint? An houseful of gold and silver may not pervert his tongue, his heart is won with lesse; for if he had not already swallowed the reward, & found it sweet, why did he again solicit God, in that which was peremptorily denied him? If his mind had not been bribed already, why did he stay the messengers? why did he expect a change in God? why was he willing to feed them with hope of successe, which had fed him with hope of recompence? One prohibition is enough for a good man. Whiles the delay of God doth but hold us in suspence, importunity is holy & seasonable; but when once he gives a resolute deniall, it is profane saucinesse to solicite him. When we aske what we are bidden, our suits are not more vehement then welcome; but when we beg prohibited favours, our presumption is troublesome, and abominable: No good heart will endure to be twice forbidden. D

Yet this importunity hath obtained a permission; but a permission worse then a deniall. I heard God say before, Goe not, nor curse them; Now he sayes, Go, but curse not; Anon, he is angry that he did go. Why did he permit that which he forbade, if he be angry for doing that which he permitted? Some things God permits with an indignation; not for that he gives leave to the act, but that he gives a man over to his sin in the act; this sufferance implyes not favour, but judgment: so did God bid Balaam to goe, as Solomon bids the young man follow the wayes of his owne heart. It is one thing to like, another thing to suffer; Moses never approved those legall divorces, yet he tolerated them: God never liked Balaams journey, yet he displeasedly gives way to it: As if he said, Well, since thou art so hot, set on this journey, be gone. And thus Balaam took it: else, when God after professed his displeasure for the journey, it had been a ready answer, Thou commandedst me; but herein his confession argues his guilt. Balaams suit and Israels Quails had both one fashion of grant; in anger. How much better is it, to have gratious denials, then angry yeeldings? E

A small perswasion hartens the willing: It booted not to bid the covetous Prophet hasten to his way. Now he makes himself sure of successe; His corrupt heart tels him, that

A that as God had relented in his licence to goe, ſo he might perhaps in his licence to curſe; and he ſaw how this curſe might bleſſe him with abundance of wealth: he roſe up early therefore and ſadled his Aſſe. The night ſeemed long to his forwardneſſe. Covetous men need neither clock nor bell to awaken them; their deſires make them reſtleſſe. Oh that we could with as much eagerneſſe ſeek the true riches, which onely can make us happy!

We that ſee only the out-ſide of Balaam, may marvel, why he that permitted him to goe, afterward oppoſes his going; but God that ſaw his heart, perceived what corrupt affections carried him: he ſaw, that his covetous deſires and wicked hopes, grew the ſtronger, the nearer he came to his end: An Angel is therefore ſent to withhold the haſty Sorcerer. Our inward diſpoſition is the life of our actions, according
B to that doth the God of ſpirits judge us, whiles men cenſure according to our externall motions. To goe at all when God had commanded to ſtay, was preſumptuous; but to goe with a deſire to curſe, made the act doubly ſinfull, and fetcht an Angel to reſiſt it. It is one of the worthy imployments of good Angels, to make ſecret oppoſition to evill deſigns: Many a wicked act have they hindered, without the knowledge of the agent. It is all one with the Almighty to work by ſpirits and men; It is therefore our glory to be thus ſet on work: To ſtop the courſe of evil, either by diſſwaſion or violence, is an Angelicall ſervice.

In what danger are wicked men that have Gods Angels their oppoſites? The devil moved him to goe, a good Angel reſiſts him. If an heavenly Spirit ſtand in the way of a Sorcerers ſin, how much more ready are all thoſe ſpirituall powers, to ſtop the
C miſcariages of Gods dear children? how oft had we faln yet more, if theſe guardians had not upheld us, whether by removing occaſions, or by caſting in good inſtincts? as our good indeavours are oft hindred by Satan, ſo are our evill by good angels; elſe were not our protection equall to our danger; and we could neither ſtand nor riſe.

It had been as eaſie for the Angel to ſtrike Balaam, as to ſtand in his way; and to have followed him in his ſtarting aſide, as to ſtop him in a narrow path: But even the good Angels have their ſtints in their executions. God had ſomewhat more to doe with the tongue of Balaam, and therefore he will not have him ſlain, but withſtood; and ſo withſtood, that he ſhall paſſe. It is not ſo much glory to God, to take away wicked men, as to uſe their evill to his own holy purpoſes. How ſoone could the Commander of heaven and earth rid the world of bad members? But ſo ſhould he D loſe the praiſe of working good by evill inſtruments. It ſufficeth that the Angels of God reſiſt their actions, while their perſons continue.

That no man may marvell to ſee Balaam have viſions from God, and utter prophecies from him; his very Aſſe hath his eyes opened to ſee the Angell, which his Maſter could not; & his mouth opened to ſpeak more reaſonably then his Maſter. There is no beaſt deſerves ſo much wonder, as this of Balaam; whoſe common ſenſe is advanced above the reaſon of his Rider; ſo as for the time the Prophet is bruitiſh, and the beaſt propheticall. Who can but ſtand amazed at the eye, at the tongue of this ſilly creature? For ſo dull a ſight; it was much to ſee a bodily object, that were not too apparent; but to ſee that ſpirit which his rider diſcerned not, was far beyond nature. To heare a voice come from that mouth, which was uſed only to bray, it was
E ſtrange and uncouth; but to heare a beaſt, whoſe nature is noted for incapacity, to out-reaſon his Maſter, a profeſſed Prophet, is in the very height of miracles: Yet can no heart ſtick at theſe, that conſiders the diſpenſation of the Almighty, in both. Our eye could no more ſee a beaſt, then a beaſt can ſee an Angell, if he had not given this power to it. How eaſie is it for him that made the eye of man and beaſt, to dimme or enlighten it at his pleaſure! and if his power can make the very ſtones to ſpeak, how much more a creature of ſenſe? That evill ſpirit ſpake in the Serpent to our firſt Parents; Why is it more that a ſpirit ſhould ſpeak in the mouth of a beaſt? how ordinarily did the heathen receive their Oracles out of ſtones and trees? do not we our ſelves teach birds to ſpeak thoſe ſentences they underſtand not? we may wōder, we cannot diſtruſt, when we compare the act with the Author; which can as eaſily create a voice without a body, as a body without a voice. Who now can hereafter plead plead his ſimplicity and dulneſſe of apprehending ſpirituall things, when he ſees how God exalts the eyes of a beaſt, to ſee a ſpirit? who can be proud of ſeeing viſions, ſince an Angel appeared to a beaſt? neither was his skin better after it than others of his kind. Who can complain of his own rudeneſſe and inability to reply in a good cauſe, when the very beaſt is inabled by God to convince his Maſter? There is no mouth into which God cannot put words: and how oft doth he chooſe the weak, and unwiſe, to confound the learned and mighty! A

What had it been better for the Aſſe to ſee the Angell, if he had ruſhed ſtill upon his ſword? Evils were as good not ſeen, as not avoided; but now he declines the way and ſaves his burthen. It were happy for perverſe ſinners, if they could learn of this beaſt, to run away from fore-ſeen judgements. The revenging Angel ſtands before us; and though we know we ſhall as ſure die, as ſin, yet we have not the wit or grace to give back; though it be with the hurt of a foot to ſave the body; with the paine of the body to ſave the ſoule. B

I ſee, what fury and ſtripes the impatient Prophet beſtows upon this poore beaſt, becauſe he will not go on; yet if he had gone on, himſelf had periſhed. How oft doe we wiſh thoſe things, the not obtaining whereof is mercy? We grudge to be ſtaid in the way to death, and fly upon thoſe which oppoſe our perdition.

I doe not (as who would not expect) ſee Balaams haire ſtand upright, nor himſelf alighting, and appaled at this monſter of miracles: But, as if no new thing had happened, he returnes words to the beaſt, full of anger, void of admiration; Whether his trade of ſorcering had ſo inured him to receive voices from his Familiars, in ſhape of beaſts, that this event ſeemed not ſtrange to him; Or, whether his rage, and covetouſneſſe had ſo tranſported him, that he had no leaſure to obſerve the unnaturall unuſualneſs of the event. Some men make nothing of thoſe things, which overcome others with horror and aſtoniſhment. C

I heare the Angel of God taking notice of the cruelty of Balaam to his beaſt: his firſt words to the unmercifull Prophet, are in expoſtulating of his wrong. We little think it, but God ſhall call us to an account for the unkind and cruell uſages of his poore mute creatures: He hath made us Lords, not tyrants; owners, not tormenters; he that hath given us leave to kill them, for our uſe, hath not given us leave to abuſe them at our pleaſure; they are ſo our drudges, that they are our fellows by creation. It was a ſigne the Magician would eaſily wiſh to ſtrike Iſrael with a curſe, when he wiſhed a ſword to ſtrike his harmleſſe beaſt. It is ill falling into thoſe hands, whom beaſts finde unmercifull. D

Notwithſtanding theſe rubs Balaam goes on, and is not afraid to ride on that beaſt, whoſe voyce he had heard: And now, Poſts are ſped to Balac with the newes of ſo welcome a gueſt: He that ſent Princes to fetch him, comes himſelfe on the way to meet him; Although he can ſay (Am not I able to promote thee?) yet he gives this high reſpect to him as his better, from whom he expected the promotion of himſelf, and his people. Oh the honour that hath been formerly done by heathens, to them that have borne but the face of Prophets! I ſhame, and grieve to compare the times and men: Onely, O God, be thou mercifull to the contempt of thy ſervants.

As if nothing needed but the preſence of Balaam, the ſuperſtitious King (out of the joy of his hope) feaſts his gods, his Prophet, his Princes; and on the morrow carries him up to the high places of his Idol. Who can doubt whether Balaam were a falſe prophet, that ſees him ſacrificing in the mount of Baal? Had he beene from the true God, he would rather have ſaid, Pull me downe theſe altars of Baal, then Build me here ſeven others. The very place convinces him of falſhood and Idolatry; And why ſeven Altars? What needs all this pomp? When the true God never required but one at once, as himſelfe is one; why doth the falſe prophet call for no leſſe then ſeven? as if God ſtood upon numbers? as if the Almighty would have his power either divided or limited? Here is nothing but a glorious and magnificent pretence of devotion. It hath been ever ſeen, that the falſe worſhippers of God have made more pompous ſhews, and fairer flouriſhes of their piety, and religion, then the true. E

Now when Balaam ſees his ſeven bullocks and ſeven rams ſmoking upon his ſeven Altars,

A Altars, he goes up higher into the mount (as ſome counterfeit Moſes) to receive the anſwer of God. But will God meet with a Sorcerer? Will he make a Prophet of a Magician? O man, who ſhall preſcribe God what inſtruments to uſe? he knows how to imploy, not only Saints, & Angels, but wicked men, beaſts, devils, to his own glory: He that put words into the mouth of the Aſſe, puts words into the mouth of Balaam; the words doe but paſſe from him; they are not polluted, becauſe they are not his; as the Trunk, through which a man ſpeaks, is not more eloquent for the ſpeech that is uttered through it. What a notable proclamation had the Infidels wanted of Gods favour to his people, if Balaams tongue had not been uſed? How many ſhall once ſay, Lord, we have propheſied in thy name, that ſhall heare, Verily I know you not?

What madneſſe is this in Balaam? He that found himſelfe conſtant in ſoliciting,
B thinks to finde God not conſtant in denying; and, as if that infinite Deity were not the ſame every where, hopes to change ſucceſſe with places. Neither is that bold forehead aſhamed to importune God againe in that, wherein his own mouth had teſtified an aſſurance of deniall. The reward was in one of his eyes, the revenging Angell in the other: I know not whether (for the time) he more loved the bribe, or feared the Angel. And whiles he is in this diſtraction, his tongue bleſſes againſt his heart, and his heart curſes againſt his tongue. It angers him that he dare not ſpeak what he would; and now at laſt rather then loſe his hopes, he reſolves to ſpeak worſe then curſes. The feare of Gods judgements in a worldly heart is at length overcome with the love of gaine.

Of PHINEAS.

Balaam pretended an haſt homeward; but he lingred ſo long that he left his bones in Midian. How juſtly did he periſh with the ſword of Iſrael, whoſe tongue had inſenſibly ſlain ſo many thouſands of them? As it is uſually ſaid of the devill, that he goes away in a ſtench, ſo may it be truly ſaid of this Prophet of his; according to the faſhion of all hypocrites, his words were good, his actions abominable; he would not curſe, but he would adviſe, and his counſel is worſe then a curſe; for his curſe had hurt none but himſelfe, his counſell coſt the bloud of 24000 Iſraelites. He that had heard God ſpeak by Balaam, would not look
D for the devill in the ſame mouth: and if God himſelf had not witneſſed againſt him, who could beleeve that the ſame tongue which uttered ſo divine prophecies, ſhould utter ſo villanous and curſed advice? Hypocriſie gains this of men, that it may doe evill unſuſpected: But now he that heard what he ſpake in Balac's eare, hath bewrayed, and condemned his counſell, and himſelfe.

This policie was fetcht from the bottome of hell. It is not for lack of deſire that I curſe not Iſrael; thou doſt not more wiſh their deſtruction, then I doe thy wealth, and honour: But ſo long as they hold firm with God, there is no ſorcery againſt Iacob; withdraw God from them, and they ſhall fall alone, and curſe themſelves; draw them into ſinne, and thou ſhalt withdraw God from them. There is no ſinne more plauſible then wantonneſſe; One fornication ſhall draw in another, and both ſhall
E fetch the anger of God after them; ſend your faireſt womē into their tents, their ſight ſhall draw them to luſt, their luſt to folly, their folly to Idolatry; and now God ſhall curſe them for thee, unasked. Where Balaam did ſpeak wel, there was never any Prophet ſpake more divinely: where he ſpake ill, there was never any devil ſpake more deſperately: Ill counſel ſeldome ſucceedeth not: Good ſeed fals often out of the way, and roots not, but the tares never light amiſſe. This project of the wicked Magician was too proſperous. The daughters of Moab come into the tents of Iſrael, and have captived thoſe whom the Amorites & Amalekites could not reſiſt. Our firſt mother Eve bequeathed this dowry to her daughters, that they ſhould be our helpers to ſin; the weaker ſexe is the ſtronger in this conqueſt: had the Moabites ſent their ſubtilleſt Counſellors, to perſwade the Iſraelites to their Idol-ſacrifices, they had been repelled with ſcorne; but now the beauty of their women is over-eloquent and ſucceſ-

full. That which in the first world betrayed the sonnes of God, hath now insnared Gods people; It had been happy for Israel if Balaam had used any charms but these. As it is the use of God to fetch glory to himselfout of the worst actions of Satan, so it is the guise of that evill one (through the just permission of the Almighty) to raise advantage to himselfe from the fairest pieces of the workmanship of God: No one meanes hath so much inriched hell, as beautifull faces.

All Idols are abominable; but this of Baal-Peor was, besides the superstition of it, beastly; Neither did Baal ever put on a form of so much shame, as this; yet very Israelites are drawne to adore it. When lust hath blinded the eyes, it carries a man whither it lists; even beyond all differences of sin. A man besotted with filthy desires, is fit for any villany.

Sin is no lesse crafty then Satan himselfe; give him but roome in the eye, and he will soone be possessed of body and soule. These Israelites first saw the faces of these Moabites and Midianites, then they grew to like their presence, from thence to take pleasure in their feasts: From their boords they are drawne to their beds, from their beds to their Idols, and now they are joyned to Baal-Peor, and separated from God. Bodily fornication is the way to spirituall: If we have made Idols of flesh, it is just to be given up to Idols of wood and stones. If we have not grace to resist the beginnings of sin, where shall we stay? If our foot slip into the mouth of hell, it is a miracle to stop ere we come to the bottome.

Well might God be angry, to see his people goe a whoring in this double fornication; neither doth he smother his wrath, but himselfe strikes with his plague, and bids Moses strike with the sword. He strikes the body, and bids Moses strike the head. It had been as easie for him to plague the Rulers, as the vulgar: and one would think these should be more properly reserved for his immediate hand; but these he leaves to the sword of humane authority, that he might win awe to his own ordinances. As the sins of great men are exemplary, so are their punishments. Nothing procures so much credit to government, as strict and impartiall executions of great and noble offenders. Those whom their sins have imbased, deserve no favour in the punishmẽt. As God knows no honour, no royalty in matter of sin, no more may his Deputies. Contrarily, connivence at the outrages of the mighty, cuts the sinews of any State; neither doth any thing make good laws more contemptible, then the making difference of offenders; that small sacrileges should be punished, when great ones ride in triumph. If good ordinations turn once to Spiders webs, which are broken thorow by the bigger Flies, no hand will feare to sweep them down.

God was angry; Moses and all good Israelites grieved; the heads hanged up; the people plagued: yet behold, one of the Princes of Israel fears not to brave God and his Ministers, in that sin which he sees so grievously revenged in others. I can never wonder enough at the impudence of this Israelite. Here is fornication, an odious crime, and that of an Israelite, whose name challenges holinesse; yea, of a Prince of Israel, whose practice is a rule to inferiors; & that with a woman of Midian, with whõ even a chaste contract had bin unlawfull; & that with contempt of all government; and that in the face of Moses and all Israel; and that in a time of mourning, and judgment for that same offence. Those that have once passed the bounds of modesty, soone grow shameless in their sins. Whiles sin hides it self in corners, there is yet hope; for, where there is shame, there is a possibility of grace; but when once it dare looke upon the Sun, and send chalenges to authority, the case is desperate, and ripe for judgement. This great Simeonite thought he might sin by priviledge; He goes, as if he said, Who dares controll me? His nobility hath raised him above the reach of correction. Commonly, the sins of the mighty are not without presumption, and therefore their vengeance is no lesse then their security; and their punishment is so much greater, as their conceit of impunity is greater. All Israel saw this bold lewdnesse of Zimri, but their hearts and eyes were so full of grief, that they had not room enough for indignation. Phineas lookt on with the rest, but with other affections. When he saw this defiance bidden to God, and this insultation upon the sorrow of his people, that whiles they were wringing their hands, a proud miscreant durst outface face their humiliation with his wicked dalliance; his heart boyles with a desire of an holy revenge; and now that hand which was used to a Censer, and sacrificing knife, takes up his Javelin, & with one stroke joynes these two bodies in their death, which were joyned in their sin; and in the very flagrance of their lust, makes a new way for their souls to their own place. O noble and heroicall courage of Phineas! which as it was rewarded of God, so is worthy to be admired of men. He doth not stand casting of scruples; who am I to do this? the son of the high Priest; My place is all for peace & mercy; It is for me to sacrifice, & pray for the sin of the people, not to sacrifice any of the people for their sin. My duty calls me to appease the anger of God, what I may, not to revenge the sins of men; to pray for their conversion, not to work the confusion of any sinner; and who are these? Is not the one a great Prince in Israel, the other a Princesse of Midian? Can the death of two so famous persons goe unrevenged? Or if it be safe, and fit, why doth my Uncle Moses rather shed his own teares, then their bloud? I will mourn with the rest; let them revenge whom it concerneth. But the zeale of God hath barred out all weak deliberations; and he holds it now both his duty and his glory to be an executioner of so shameless a pair of offenders.

God loves this heat of zeale, in all the cariages of his servants; and if it transport us too far, he pardoneth the errors of our fervency, rather thē the indifferences of lukewarmness. As these two were more beasts, thē any that ever he sacrificed, so the shedding of their bloud was the acceptablest sacrifice, that ever he offered unto God: for both all Israel is freed frō the plague, & all his posterity have the Priesthood intailed to thē, so long as the Jewes were a people. Next to our prayers, there is no better sacrifice thē the bloud of malefactors; not as it is theirs, but as it is shed by authority. Governors are faulty of those sins they punish not. There can be no better sight in any state, thē to see a malefactor at the gallows. It is not enough for us to stād gazing upon the wickedness of the times (yea although with tears) unless we endeavor to redresse it; especially publike persons carry not their Javelin in their hand for nought.

Every one is ready to ask Phineas for his commission; and those that are willing to salve up the act, plead extraordinary instinct from God, who (no doubt) would not have accepted that which himself wrought not. But what need I run so far for this warrant, when I hear God say to Moses, Hang up all the heads of Israel; and Moses say to the Under-Rulers, Every one slay his men that are joyned to Baal-Peor. Every Israelite is now made a Magistrate for his execution; and why not Phineas amongst the rest? Doth his Priest-hood exempt him from the bloud of sinners? How then doth Samuel hew Agag in pieces? Even those may make a carkasse, which may not touch it. And if Levi got the Priesthood, by shedding the bloud of Idolaters; why may it not stand with that Priesthood, to spill the bloud of a fornicator and Idolater? Ordinary justice will bear out Phineas in this act: It is not for every man to challenge this office, which this double proclamation allowed to Phineas. All that private persons can doe, is either to lift up their hands to heaven for redresse of sin, or to lift up their hands against the sin, not against the person. Who made thee a Judge, is a lawfull question, if it meet with a person unwarranted.

Now the sin is punished, the plague ceaseth. The revenge of God sets out ever after the sin; but if the revenge of men (which commonly comes later) can overtake it, God gives over the chase. How oft hath the infliction of a lesse punishment, avoided a greater. There are none so good friends to the State, as couragious and impartiall Ministers of Justice. These are the reconcilers of God and the people more then the prayers of them that sit still, and doe nothing.

The death of Moses.

After many painfull and perillous enterprises, now is Moses drawing to his rest. He hath brought his Israelites from Ægypt, thorow the Sea and wilderness, within the sight of their promised Land; and now himself must take possession of that Land whereof Canaan was but a type. When we have have done that we came for. it is time for us to be gone; This earth is only made for action, not for fruition: the services of Gods children should be ill rewarded, if they must stay here alwaies. Let no man think much that those are fetcht away which are faithfull to God; they should not change, if it were not to their preferment. It is our folly that we would have good men live for ever, & account it an hard measure, that they were. He that lends them to the world, owes them a better turn then this earth can pay them. It were injurious to wish, that goodnesse should hinder any man from glory. So is the death of Gods Saints precious, that it is certain.

Moses must go up to mount Nebo, and die. The time, the place, and every circumstance of his dissolution is determined. That one dies in the field, another in his bed, another in the water: one in a forraine Nation, another in his own, is fore-decreed in heaven. And, though we heare it not vocally, yet God hath called every man by his name, & saith, Die thou there. One man seems to die casually, another by an inexpected violence: both fall by a destiny; & all is set down to us by an eternall decree, He that brought us into the world, will carry us out according to his own purposes.

Moses must ascend up to the hill to die. He received his charge for Israel upon the hill of Sinai; and now he delivers up his charge on the hill of Nebo: His brother Aaron dyed on one hill, he on another. As Christ was transfigured on an hill, so was this excellent type of his; neither doubt I, but that these hils were types to them of that heaven whither they were aspiring. It is the goodnesse of our God, that he will not have his children dye any where, but where they may see the Land of Promise before them; neither can they depart without much comfort, to have seene it: Contrarily, a wicked man that looks down, and sees hell before him, how can he chuse but finde more horror in the end of death, then in the way?

How familiarly doth Moses hear of his end! It is no more betwixt God & Moses, but, Goe up and dye. If he had invited him to a meale, it could not have bin in a more sociable compellation; no otherwise then he said to his other Prophet, Up and eate. It is neither harsh, nor newes to Gods children, to heare or think of their departure; To them death hath lost his horror, through acquaintance: Those faces which at first sight seemed ill-favoured, by oft viewing, grow out of dislike: They have so oft thought & resolved of the necessity, and of the issue of their dissolution, that they cannot hold it either strange or unwelcome: He that hath had such intire conversation with God, cannot feare to goe to him. Those that know him not, or know that he will not know them, no marvell if they tremble.

This is no small favour, that God warnes Moses of his end; he that had so oft made Moses of his counsell, what he meant to doe with Israel, would not now doe ought with himself, without his knowledge. Expectation of any maine event, is a great advantage to a wise heart; If the fiery chariot had fetht away Elias unlookt for, wee should have doubted of the favour of his transportation: It is a token of judgement, to come as a thiefe in the night. God forewarnes one by sickneſſe, another by age, another by his secret instincts, to prepare for their end: If our hearts be not now in a readinesse, we are worthy to be surprised.

But what is this I heare? Displeasure mixed with love? and that to so faithfull a servant as Moses? he must but see the Land of Promise, he shall not tread upon it; because he once, long agoe, sinned in distrusting. Death, though it were to him an entrance into glory, yet shall be also a chastisement of his infidelity. How many noble proofes had Moses given of his courage and strength of faith? How many gracious services had he done to his Master? Yet for one act of distrust, he must be gathered to his Fathers. All our obediences cannot beare out one sinne against God; How vainly shall we hope to make amends to God for our former trespasses, by our better behaviour, when Moses hath this one sin laid in his dish, after so many and worthy testimonies of his fidelity? When we have forgotten our sins, yet God remembers them, and (although not in anger, yet) he cals for our arrerages. Alas, what shall become of them with whom God hath ten thousand greater quarrels; that amongst many millions of sins, have scattered some few acts of formall services? If Moses must die the first death for one fault, how shal they escape the second for sinning alwayes?

A waies? Even where God loves, he will not wink at sin; and if he doe not punish, yet he will chastise: How much lesse can it stand with that eternall Justice, to let wilfull sinners escape judgement?

It might have bin just with God, to have reserved the cause to himself; and in a generality, to have told Moses, that his sin must shorten his journey: but it is more of mercy, then justice, that his children shall know why they smart; That God may at once both justifie himself, and humble them for their particular offences: Those to whom he meanes vengeance, have not the sight of their sins till they be past repentance. Complain not that God upbraids thee with thy old sins, whosoever thou art: but know, it is an argument of love; whereas concealment is a fearfull signe of a secret dislike from God.

B But what was that noted sin which deserves this late exprobration, and shal carry so sharp a chastisement? Israel murmured for water; God bids Moses take the rod in his hand, and speak to the rock to give water; Moses in stead of speaking, and striking the rock with his voice, strikes it with the rod: Here was his sin; An over-reaching of his commission; a fearfulnesse and distrust of the effect. The rod, he knew, was approved for miracles; he knew not how powerfull his voyce might be; therefore he did not speak, but strike, and he stroke twice for failing; And now, after these many yeares, he is striken for it of God. It is a dangerous thing in divine matters, to goe beyond our warrant: Those sins which seeme triviall to men, are hainous in the account of God; Any thing that savours of infidelity, displeases him more then some other crimes of morality. Yet the moving of the Rod was but a diverse thing from C the moving of the tongne, it was not contrary; He did not forbid the one, but he commanded the other: This was but acrosse the streame, not against it; where shall they appeare, whose whole courses are quite contrary to the Commandements of God?

Vpon the act done, God passed the sentence of restraining Moses with the rest, from the promised Land: now he performes it: Since that time, Moses had many favours from God; all which could not reverse this decreed castigation; That everlasting rule is grounded upon the very essence of God, I am Iehovah, I change not. Our purposes are as our selves, fickle and incertaine; His are certain, and immutable: some things which he reveales he alters; nothing that he hath decreed. Besides the soule of Moses (to the glory whereof God principally intended this change) I D finde him carefull of two things: His Successor, and his Body: Moses moves for the one: the other God doth unasked: He that was so tender over the welfare of Israel, in his life would not slacken his care in death: He takes no thought for himself (for he knew how gainfull an exchange he must make.) All his care is for his charge. Some envious natures desire to be missed, when they must goe; and wish that the weaknesse, or want of a Successor, may be the foyle of their memory, and honour: Moses is in a contrary disposition; It sufficeth him not, to finde contentment in his own happinesse, unlesse he may have an assurance, that Israel shall prosper after him. Carnall mindes are all for themselves and make use of government, onely for their owne advantages; But good hearts look ever to the future good of the Church, above their own, against their own. Moses did well, to shew his good affection to his E people; but in his silence God would have provided for his own: He that called him from the sheep of Iethro, will not want a governour for his chosen, to succeed him; God hath fitted him, whom he will chuse. Who can be more meet, then he whose name, whose experience, whose graces might supply, yea revive Moses to the people? He that searched the Land before, was fittest to guide Israel into it; He that was indued with the Spirit of God, was the fittest deputy for God: He that abode still in the Tabernacle of Ohel-moed, as Gods attendant, was fittest to be sent forth from him, as his Lieutenant: But, oh the unsearchable counsell of the Almighty! Aged Caleb, and all the Princes of Israel are past over; and Ioshua the servant of Moses, is chosen to succeed his master; The eye of God is not blinded either with gifts, or with bloud, or with beauty, or with strength: but as in his eternall elections, so in his temporary, he will have mercy on whom he will

And wel doth Ioshua succeed Moses; The very acts of God of old were allegories; where the Law ends, there the Saviour begins; we may see the Land of Promise in the Law; Only Jesvs the mediator of the new Testament can bring us into it. So was he a servant of the Law, that he supplies all the defects of the Law to us: He hath taken possession of the promised Land for us, he shall carry us from this wilderness, to our rest. A

It is no small happiness to any State, when their Governours are chosen by worthiness; and such elections are ever from God; whereas the intrusions of bribery & injust favour or violence, as they make the common-wealth miserable, so they come from him which is the author of confusion: Woe be to that State that suffers it; woe be to that person that works it; for both of them have sold themselves; the one to servitude, the other to sin. B

I doe not heare Moses repine at Gods choyce, and grudge that this Scepter of his is not hereditary; but he willingly laies hands upon his servant, to consecrate him for his successor. Ioshua was a good man, yet he had some sparks of envy; for when Eldad and Medad prophesied, he stomackt it; (My Lord Moses, forbid them.) He that would not abide two of the Elders of Israel to prophesie, how would he have allowed his servant to sit in his throne? What an example of meeknesse (besides all the rest) doth he here see in this last act of his master, who without all murmuring resigns his chair of State to his Page? It is all one to a gracious heart, whom God will please to advance: Emulation and discontentment are the affections of carnall mindes. Humility goes ever with regeneration; which teaches a man to think (what ever honour be put upon others) I have more then I am worthy of. C

The same God that by the hands of his Angels caried up the soule of Moses to his glory, doth also by the hand of his Angels cary his body downe into the valley of Moab, to his sepulture. Those hands which had taken the Law from him, those eies that had seene his presence, those lips that had conferred so oft with him, that face that did so shine with the beames of his glory, may not be neglected when the soul is gone: He that took charge of his birth and preservation in the Reeds, takes charge of his cariage out of the world: The care of God ceaseth not over his own, either in death or after it. How justly doe we take care of the comely burials of our friends, when God himself gives us this example!

If the ministery of man had bin used in this grave of Moses, the place might have bin known to the Israelites; but God purposely canceales this treasure, both from men and devils; that so he might both crosse their curiosity, and prevent their superstition. If God had loved the adoration of his servants reliques, he could never have had a fitter opportunity for this devotion, then in the body of Moses. It is folly to place Religion in those things, which God hides on purpose from us, It is not the property of the Almighty, to restraine us from good. D

Yet that divine hand which lockt up this treasure, and kept the key of it, brought it forth afterwards, glorious. In the transfiguration, this body which was hid in the valley of Moab, appeared in the hill of Tabor; that we may know, these bodies of ours are not lost, but laid up; and shall as sure be raised in glory, as they are laid downe in corruption. We know that when he shall appeare, we shall also appeare with him in Glory. E

Rahab.

Ioshua 2.

IOSHVA was one of those twelve searchers which were sent to view the Land of Canaan; yet now he addresses two Spies, for a more particular Survey: Those twelve were only to enquire of the generall condition of the people, and Land; these two to finde out the best entrance into the next part of the Countrey, and into their greatest City. Ioshua himselfe was full of Gods Spirit, and had the Oracle of God ready for his direction: yet now he goes not to the Propitiatory for consultation, but to the Spies. Except where ordinary meanes fail us, it is no appealing to the immediate help of God; we may not seek to the postern, but where the common gate is shut. It was promised Ioshua, that he should lead Israel into the promised Land; yet he knew it was unsafe to presume. The condition of his provident care was included in that assurance of successe. Heaven is promised to us, but not to our carelesnesse, infidelity, disobedience. He that hath set this blessed Inheritance before us, presupposes our wisdome, faith, holinesse.

Either force or policy are fit to be used unto Canaanites. He that would be happy in this spirituall warfare, must know where the strength of his enemy lyeth, and must frame his guard according to the others assault. It is a great advantage to a Christian, to know the fashion of Satans on-sets, that he may the more easily compose himself to resist. Many a soule hath miscarried, through the ignorance of his enemy, which had not perished, if it had well knowne that the weakenesse of Satan stands in our faith.

The Spies can finde no other lodging, but Rahabs house. She was a victualler by profession, and (as those persons and trades, by reason of the commonnesse of entertainment, were amongst the Jewes infamous by name, and note) she was Rahab the Harlot; I will not think she professed filthinesse: onely her publike trade (through the corruption of those times) hath cast upon her this name of reproach; yea, rather will I admire her faith, then make excuses for her calling. How many women in Israel (now Miriam was dead) haue given such proofes of their knowledge and faith? How noble is that confeſſion, which ſhe makes of the power and truth of God? Yea, I ſee here, not only a Diſciple of God, but a Propheteſſe. Or if ſhe had once bin publike, as her houſe was; now ſhe is a chaſt and worthy Convert; and ſo approved her ſelf for honeſt and wiſe behaviour, that ſhe is thought worthy to be the great Grandmother of Davids Father; and the holy Line of the Meſſias, is not aſhamed to admit her into that happy Pedigree. The mercy of our God doth not meaſure us by what we were; It would be wide with the beſt of us, if the eye of God ſhould look backward to our former eſtate: there he ſhould ſee Abraham an Idolater, Paul a Perſecutor, Manaſſes a Necromancer, Mary Magdalen a Curtizan; and the beſt vile enough to be aſhamed of himſelf. Who can deſpaire of mercy that ſees even Rahab fetcht into the bloud of Iſrael, and Line of Chriſt? A

If Rahab had not received theſe Spies, but as unknown paſſengers, with reſpect to their money, and not to their errand, it had bin no praiſe; for in ſuch caſes the thank is rather to the gueſt, then to the Oaſt; but now ſhe knew their purpoſe; ſhe knew that the harbour of them was the danger of her own life; and yet ſhe hazards this entertainment. Either faith or friendſhip are never tried, but in extremities. To ſhew countenance to the meſſengers of God, whiles the publike face of the State ſmiles upon them, is but a courteſie of courſe; but to hide our own lives in theirs, when they are perſecuted, is an act that looks for a reward. Theſe times need not our favour; wee know not what may come: Alas! how likely is it they would ſhelter them in danger, which reſpect them not in proſperity? B

All intelligences of State come firſt to the Court; It moſt concerns Princes to harken after the affaires of each other. If this poore Inholder knew of the Sea dryed up before Iſrael, and of the diſcomfiture of Og and Sehon; Surely this rumour was ſtale with the King of Jericho; he had heard it and feared; and yet in ſtead of ſending Ambaſſadours for peace, he ſends Purſuivants for the Spies. The ſpirit of Rahab melted with that ſame report, wherewith the King of Iericho was hardened: All make not one uſe of the meſſages of the proceedings of God. C

The King ſends to tell her what ſhe knew; ſhe had not hid them, if ſhe had not known their errand. I know not whether firſt to wonder at the gracious proviſion of God for the Spies, or at the ſtrong faith which he hath wrought in the heart of a weak woman; two ſtrangers, Iſraelites, Spies (and noted for all theſe) in a forrain, in an hoſtile Land, have a ſafe harbour provided them, even amongſt their enemies; In Iericho, at the very Court-gate, againſt the Proclamation of a King, againſt the indeavours of the people. Where cannot the God of heaven either find or raiſe up friends to his owne cauſes and ſervants? D

Who could have hoped for ſuch faith in Rahab? which contemned her life for the preſent, that ſhe might ſave it for the future; neglected her own King and Country, for ſtrangers which ſhe never ſaw; and more feared the deſtruction of that City, before it knew that it had an adverſary, then the diſpleaſure of her King, in the mortall revenge of that, which he would have accounted trechery. She brings them up to the rooſe of her houſe, and hides them with ſtalks of flaxe: That plant which was made to hide the body from nakedneſſe and ſhame, now is uſed to hide the Spies from death. Never could theſe ſtalks have bin improved ſo well with all her huſwifry, after they were bruiſed, as now before they were fitted to her wheele: Of theſe ſhe hath woven an everlaſting web, both of life and propagation. And now her tongue hides them no leſſe then her hand: her charity was good, her excuſe was not good. Evill may not be done, that good may come of it; we may doe any thing but ſin, for promoting a good cauſe: And if not in ſo maine occaſions; how ſhall God take it, that we are not dainty of falſhoods in trifles? E

No man will look that theſe Spies could take any ſound ſleep in theſe beds of ſtalks; it is enough for them that they live, though they reſt not. And now when they heare Rahab comming up the ſtaires, doubtleſſe they looked for an executioner: but behold, ſhe comes up with a meſſage better then their ſleep, adding to their protection, advice for their future ſafety; whereto ſhe makes way by a faithfull report of Gods former wonders, & the preſent diſpoſition of her people; and by wiſe capitulations

A lations for the life and ſecurity of her Family. The newes of Gods miraculous proceedings for Iſrael, have made her reſolve of their ſucceſſe, and the ruines of Jericho. Then onely doe we make a right uſe of the works of God, when by his judgements upon others, we are warned to avoid our own. He intends his acts for preſidents of juſtice.

The parents and brethren of Rahab take their reſt; They are not troubled with the fear & care of the ſucceſſe of Iſrael, but ſecurely goe with the current of the preſent condition: She watches for them all, and breaks her mid-night ſleep to prevent their laſt. One wiſe and faithfull perſon does well in an houſe; where all are careleſſe there is no comfort, but in periſhing together. It had bin an ill nature in Rahab, if ſhe had bin content to be ſaved alone: that her love might be a match to her faith, ſhe
B covenants for all her family; and ſo returnes life to thoſe, of whom ſhe received it. Both the bond of nature, and of grace, will draw all ours to the participation of the ſame good, with our ſelves.

It had bin never the better for the Spies, if after this nights lodging they had bin turned out of doores to the hazard of the way; for ſo the purſuers had light upon them, and prevented their return with their death. Rahabs counſell therefore was better then her harbour; which ſent them (no doubt, with victuals in their hands) to ſeek ſafety in the mountaines, till the heat of that ſearch were paſt. He that hath given us charge of our lives, will not ſuffer us to caſt them upon wilfull adventures: Had not theſe Spies hid themſelves in thoſe Deſart hils, Iſrael had wanted directors for their enterpriſes. There is nothing more expedient for the Church, then that
C ſome of Gods faithfull meſſengers ſhould withdraw themſelves, and give way to perſecutions. Courage in thoſe that muſt die, is not a greater advantage to the Goſpel, then a prudent retiring of thoſe, which may ſurvive, to maintain and propagate it.

It was a juſt and reaſonable tranſaction betwixt them, that her life ſhould be ſaved by them, which had ſaved theirs; They owe no leſſe to her, to whom they were not ſo much gueſts as priſoners: and now they paſſe not their promiſe onely, but their oath. They were ſtrangers to Rahab, and for ought ſhe knew, might have bin godleſſe: yet ſhe dares truſt her life upon their oath. So ſacred and inviolable hath this bond ever bin, that an heathen woman thought her ſelf ſecure upon the oath of an Iſraelite.

Neither is ſhe more confident of their oath taken, then they are carefull both of D taking and performing it. So far are they from deſiring to ſalve up any breach of promiſe, by equivocation, that they explain all conditions; and would prevent all poſſibilities of violation All Rahabs Family muſt be gathered into her houſe; & that red cord, which was an inſtrument of their delivery, muſt be a ſigne of hers. Behold, this is the ſaving colour: The deſtroying Angell ſees the doore-cheeks of the Iſraelites ſprinkled with red, and paſſes them over. The Warriours of Iſrael ſee the window of Rahab dyed with red, and ſave her family from the common deſtruction. If our ſoules have this tincture of the precious bloud of our Saviour, upon our doores or windowes, we are ſafe.

But if any one of the brethren of Rahab ſhall fly from this red flag, and rove about the City, and not contain himſelf under that roofe, which hid the Spies, it is in vain
E for him to tell the avengers, that he is Rahabs brother: That title will not ſave him in the ſtreet, within doores it will. If we will wander out of the limits that God hath ſet us, we caſt our ſelves out of his protection; we cannot challenge the benefit of his gracious Preſervation, and our moſt precious Redemption, when we fly out into the by-waies of our own hearts; not for innocence, but for ſafety and harbour: The Church is that houſe of Rahab, which is ſaved when all Jericho ſhall periſh. Whiles we keep us in the liſts thereof, we cannot miſcarry, through miſ-opinion; but when once we run out of it, let us look for judgement from God, and errour in our own judgement.

Iordan

Iosh. 3

Iordan divided.

THe two Spies returned with newes of the victory that should be. I doe not heare them say, The Land is unpeopled, or the people are unfurnished with armes; unskilfull in the discipline of warre; but (They faint because of us; therefore their Land is ours.) Either successe or discomfiture begins ever at the heart. A mans inward disposition doth more then presage the event. As a man raises up his own heart before his fall, and depresses it before his glory; so God raises it up before his exaltation, and casts it down before his ruine. It is no otherwise in our spirituall conflicts; If Satan see us once faint, he gives himself the day. There is no way to safety, but that our hearts be the last that shall yeeld. That which the Heathens attributed to Fortune, we may justly to the hand of God; that he speedeth those that are forward. All the ground that we lose, is given to our adversaries.

This newes is brought but over-night; Ioshua is on his way by morning, and prevents the Sun for hast. Delaies, whether in the businesse of God or our own, are hatefull and prejudiciall. Many a one loses the Land of Promise by lingring; if we neglect Gods time, it is just with him to crosse us in ours.

Ioshua hastens till he have brought Israel to the verge of the promised Land: Nothing parts them now but the river of Jordan. There he staies a time; that the Israelites might feed themselves a while with the sight of that, which they should afterwards enjoy. That which they had bin forty yeares in seeking, may not be seized upon too suddenly: God loves to give us cooles and heats in our desires; and will so allay our joyes, that their fruition hurt us not. He knowes, that as it is in meats, the long forbearance whereof causes a surfet, when we come to full feed: so it fares in the contentments of the minde; therefore he feeds us not with the dish, but with the spoone; and will have us neither cloyed nor famished. If the mercy of God have brought us within sight of heaven, let us be content to pause a while, and upon the banks of Jordan, fit our selves for our entrance.

Now that Israel is brought to the brim of Canaan, the cloud is vanished which led them all the way: and as soon as they have but crossed Jordan, the Manna ceaseth, which nourisht them all the way. The cloud and Manna were for their passage, not for their rest; for the wildernesse, not for Canaan. It were as easie for God to work miracles alwaies; but he knows, that custome were the way to make them no miracles. He goes by-waies but till he have brought us into the Road, and then he refers us to his ordinary proceedings. That Israelite should have bin very fooliſh, that would still have said, I will not stirre till I see the cloud, I will not eate unlesse I may have that food of Angels. Wherefore serves the Ark but for their direction? wherefore serves the Wheat of Canaan but for bread? So, fond is that Christian, that will still depend upon expectation of miracles, after the fulnesse of Gods Kingdome. If God beare us in his armes when we are children, yet when we are well grown he looks we should goe on our own feet; it is enough that he upholds us, though he carry us not.

He that hitherto had gone before them in the cloud, doth now goe before them in the Ark; the same guide, in two divers signes of his presence. The cloud was for Moses, the Ark for Ioshua's time: the cloud was fit for Moses; the Law offered us Christ, but enwrapped in many obscurities. If he were seen in the cloud, he was heard from the cover of the Ark. Why was it the Ark of the Testimony, but because it witnessed both his presence and love? And within it, were his Word, the Law; and his Sacrament, the Manna. Who can wish a better Guide, then the God of Heaven, in his Word, and Sacraments? Who can know the way into the Land of Promise, so well as he that owes it? And what meanes can better direct us thither, then those of his Institution?

That Ark which before was as the heart, is now as the head; It was in the middest of Israel, whiles they camped in the Desart; now when the cloud is removed, it is in the

A the front of the Army; That as before they depended upon it for life, ſo now they ſhould for direction. It muſt goe before them on the ſhoulders of the ſons of Levi; they muſt follow it, but within ſight, not within breathing. The Levites may not touch the Ark, but onely the barres: The Iſraelites may not approach nearer then a thouſand paces to it. What awfull reſpects doth God require to be given unto the teſtimonies of his preſence? Vzzah paid dear for touching it; the men of Beth-ſhemeſh for looking into it. It is a dangerous thing to be too bold with the Ordinances of God. Though the Iſraelites were ſanctified, yet they might not come neare either the Mount of Sinai, when the Law was delivered, or the Ark of the Covenant, wherein the Law was written. How fearfull ſhall their eſtate be, that come with unhallowed hearts and hands to the Word of the Goſpel, and the true Manna of the Euangelicall Sacrament? As we uſe to ſay of the Court and of fire, ſo may we of theſe Divine
B Inſtitutions, We freeze if we be far off from them; and if we be more neare then befits us, we burn. Vnder the Law we might look at Chriſt aloofe, now under the Goſpel we may come neare him: He calls us to him; yea, he enters into us.

Neither was it onely for reverence that the Ark muſt be, not ſtumbled at, but waited on, a farre; but alſo for convenience, both of ſight and paſſage: Thoſe things that are neare us, though they be leſſe, fill our eye; Neither could ſo many thouſand eyes ſee the ſame object upon a levell, but by diſtance; It would not content God, that one Iſraelite ſhould tell another, Now the Ark goes, now it turnes, now it ſtands; but he would have every one his own witneſſe. What can be ſo comfortable to a good heart, as to ſee the pledges of Gods preſence and favour? to hear of the lo-
C ving kindneſſes of God is pleaſant, but to behold and feele the evidences of his mercy, is unſpeakably delectable: Hence the Saints of God, not contenting themſelves with faith, have ſtil praied for ſight and fruition, and mourned when they have wanted it. What an happy proſpect hath God ſet before us, of Chriſt Jeſus crucified for us, and offered unto us?

Ere God will work a miracle before Iſrael, they have charge to be ſanctified. There is an holineſſe required to make us either patients or beholders of the great works of God; how much more when we ſhould be actors in his ſacred ſervices? There is more uſe of ſanctification, when we muſt preſent ſomething to God, then when he muſt doe ought to us.

The ſame power that divided the Red-ſea before Moſes, divides Jordan before Ioſhua;
D that they might ſee the Ark no leſſe effectuall then the cloud, and the hand of God as preſent with Ioſhua, to bring them into Canaan, as it was with Moſes to bring them out of Ægypt: The bearers of the Ark had need be faithfull; they muſt firſt ſet their foot into the ſtreames of Jordan, and beleeve that it will give way; The ſame faith that led Peter upon the water, muſt carry them into it. There can be no Chriſtian without beleefe in God; but thoſe that are neare to God in his immediate ſervices, muſt goe before others no leſſe in beleeving, then they doe in example.

The waters know their Maker: That Jordan that flowed with full ſtreames when Chriſt went into it to be baptized, now gives way when the ſame God muſt paſſe thorow it in ſtate: then there was uſe of his water, now of his ſand: I heare no newes of any Rod to ſtrike the waters; the preſence of the Ark of the Lord God, the Lord
E of all the World, is ſign enough to theſe Waves; which now, as if a ſinew were broken, runs back to their Iſſues, and dare not ſo much as wet the feet of the Prieſts that bore it; What ayleth thee, O Sea, that thou fleddeſt, and thou Iordan, that thou wert driven back? Ye mountains, that ye leaped like Rammes, and ye little hils, like Lambs? The earth trembled at the preſence of the Lord, at the preſence of the God of Iacob. How obſervant are all the Creatures to the God that made them? How glorious a God doe we ſerve? whom all the powers of the Heavens and Elements are willingly ſubject unto; and gladly take that nature which he pleaſes to give them. He could have made Jordan like ſome ſolid pavement of Chryſtall for the Iſraelites feet to have trod upon, but this work had not bin ſo magnificent. Every ſtrong Froſt congeales the water in a naturall courſe; but for the River to ſtand ſtill, and run on heaps, and to be made a liquid wall for the paſſage of Gods people, is, for Nature to run out of it ſelf, to doe doe homage to her Creator: Now muſt the Iſraelites needs think; How can the Canaanites ſtand out againſt us when the Seas and Rivers give us way? With what joy did they now trample upon the dry channell of Jordan, whiles they might ſee the dry Deſarts overcome; the promiſed Land before them; the very waters ſo glad of them that they ran back to welcome them into Canaan? The paſſages into our promiſed Land are troubleſome and perillous; and even at laſt, offer themſelves to us the main hindrances of our ſalvation; which after all our hopes threaten to defeat us: for what will it avail us to have paſſed a wilderneſſe, if the waves of Jordan ſhould ſwallow us up? But the ſame hand that hath made the way hard, hath made it ſure: He that made the wilderneſſe comfortable, will make Jordan dry; he will maſter all difficulties for us; and thoſe things which we moſt feared, will he make moſt ſoveraign and beneficiall to us. O God, as we have truſted thee with the beginning, ſo will we with the finiſhing of our glory. Faithfull art thou that haſt promiſed, which wilt alſo doe it.

He that led them about, in forty yeares journey, thorow the wilderneſſe, yet now leads them the neareſt cut to Jericho; He will not ſo much as ſeek for a Foord for their paſſage; but divides the waters. What a ſight was this to their heathen adverſaries, to ſee the waters make both a lane, and a wall for Iſrael? their hearts could not chuſe but be broken, to ſee the ſtreames broken off for a way to their enemies. I doe not ſee Ioſhua haſting thorow this channell, as if he feared leſt the Tide of Jordan ſhould return; but as knowing that watery wall ſtronger then the walls of Jericho, he paces ſlowly: And leſt this miracle ſhould paſſe away with themſelves, he commands twelve ſtones to be taken out of the channell of Jordan, by twelve ſelected men from every Tribe, which ſhall be pitched in Gilgal; and twelve other ſtones to be ſet in the midſt of Jordan, where the feet of the Prieſts had ſtood with the Ark; That ſo both land and water might teſtifie the miraculous way of Iſrael, whiles it ſhould be ſaid of the one, Theſe ſtones were fetcht out of the pavement of Jordan; of the other, There did the Arke reſt whiles we walked dry-ſhod thorow the deeps of Jordan: of the one, Jordan was once as dry as this Gilgal; of the other, Thoſe waves which drown theſe ſtones, had ſo drowned us, if the power of the Almighty had not reſtrained them. Many a great work had God done for Iſrael, which was now forgotten: Ioſhua therefore will have Monuments of Gods mercy, that future Ages might be both witneſſes, and applauders of the great works of their God.

The ſiege of Jericho.

Josh. 6.

Ioſhua begins his warres with the circumciſion and Paſſeover; He knew that the way to keep the bloud of his people from ſhedding, was to let out that Paganiſh bloud of their uncircumciſion. The perſon muſt be in favour, ere the work can hope to proſper: His predeceſſor Moſes had like to have been ſlain for neglect of this Sacrament, when he went to call the people out of Ægypt: he juſtly feares his owne ſafety, if now he omit it, when they are brought into Canaan: we have no right of inheritance in the ſpirituall Canaan, the Church of God, till we have received the Sacrament of our matriculation: So ſoon as our covenants are renued with our Creator, we may well look for the viſion of God for the aſſurance of victory.

What ſure work did the King of Jericho think he had made! he blocked up the paſſages, barred up the gates, defended the walls, and did enough to keep out a common enemy: If we could doe but this to our ſpirituall adverſaries, it were as impoſſible for us to be ſurpriſed, as for Jericho to be ſafe. Me thinks I ſee how they called their councell of warre, debated of all meanes of defence, gathered their forces, trained their ſouldiers, ſet ſtrong guards to the gates & wals; and now would perſwade one another, that unleſſe Iſrael could flie into their City, the ſiege was vain. Vaine worldlings think their Rampiers and Barricadoes can keep out the vengeance of God; their blindneſſe ſuffers them to look no further then the meanes: The ſupreme hand

A hand of the Almighty comes not within the compaſſe of their feares. Every carnall heart is a Jericho ſhut up; God ſets downe before it, and diſplaies mercy and judgement in ſight of the walls thereof; it hardens it ſelfe in a wilfull ſecurity, and ſaith, Tuſh, I ſhall never be moved.

Yet their courage and fear fight together within their wals, within their boſomes: Their courage tells them of their own ſtrength; their feare ſuggeſts the miraculous ſucceſſe of this (as they could not but think) inchanted generation; and now whiles they have ſhut out their enemy, they have ſhut in their own terror. The moſt ſecure heart in the world hath ſome flaſhes of feare; for it cannot but ſometimes look out of it ſelf, and ſee what it would not. Rahab had notified that their hearts fainted: and yet now their faces bewray nothing but reſolution. I know not whether the heart or
B the face of an hypocrite be more falſe; and as each of them ſeeks to beguile the other, ſo both of them agree to deceive the beholders: In the midſt of laughter their heart is heavy; who would not think him merry that laughes? yet their rejoycing is but in the face: who would not think a blaſphemer or prophane man reſolutely careleſſe? If thou hadſt a window into his heart, thou ſhouldeſt ſee him tormented with horrors of conſcience.

Now the Iſraelites ſee thoſe walled cities and towers, whoſe height was reported to reach to heaven; the fame whereof had ſo affrighted them ere they ſaw them, and were ready doubtleſſe to ſay in their diſtruſt, Which way ſhall we ſcale theſe invincible fortifications? what ladders, what Engines ſhal we uſe to ſo great a work? God prevents their infidelity; Behold, I have given Iericho into thine hand. If their wals had
C their foundations laid in the center of the earth; If the battlements had bin ſo high built that an Eagle could not ſoare over them; this is enough, I have given it thee. For on whoſe earth have they raiſed theſe caſtles? Out of whoſe treaſure did they digge thoſe piles of ſtone? whence had they their ſtrength and time to build? Cannot he that gave, recall his own? O ye fooles of Jericho, what if your walls be ſtrong, your men valiant, your leaders skilfull, your King wiſe, when God hath ſaid, I have given thee the City? What can ſwords or ſpeares doe againſt the Lord of Hoſts? Without him meanes can do nothing; how much leſſe againſt him? How vain and idle is that reckoning, wherein God is left out? Had the Captain of the Lords hoſt drawn his ſword for Jericho, the gates might have bin opened; Iſrael could no more have entred, then they can now be kept from entring, when the wals were faln. What courſes
D ſo ever we take for our ſafety, it is good making God of our ſide: Neither men nor devils can hurt us againſt him; neither men nor Angels can ſecure us from him. There was never ſo ſtrange a ſiege as this of Jericho: Here was no mount raiſed, no ſword drawn, no Engine planted, no Pioners undermining; Here were trumpets ſounded, but no enemy ſeene; here were armed men, but no ſtroke given: They muſt walk and not fight; ſeven ſeverall daies muſt they pace about the wals, which they may not once look over to ſee what was within. Doubtleſſe, theſe inhabitants of Jericho made themſelves merry with this ſight; when they had ſtood ſix daies upon their wals, and beheld none but a walking enemy; What (ſay they) could Iſrael find no walk to breathe them with, but about our wals? Have they not travelled enough in their forty years Pilgrimage, but they muſt ſtretch their limbs in this circle? Surely if their
E eies were engines, our wals could not ſtand: we ſee they are good footmen, but when ſhall we try their hands? What, doe theſe vaine men think Jericho will be won with looking at? Or, doe they only come to count how many paces it is about our City? If this be their manner of ſiege we ſhall have no great cauſe to feare the ſword of Iſrael. Wicked men think God in jeſt, when he is preparing for their judgement. The Almighty hath waies and counſels of his owne, utterly unlike to ours: which becauſe our reaſon cannot reach, we are ready to condemne of fooliſhneſſe and impoſſibility. With us there is no way to victory but fighting, and the ſtrongeſt carries the ſpoile: God can give victory to the feet as well as to the hands, and when he will, makes weakneſſe no diſadvantage. What ſhould we do but follow God thorow by-waies, and know, that he will in ſpight of nature lead us to our end?

All the men of warre muſt compaſſe the City, yet it was not the preſence of the great great warriours of Israel that threw down the wals of Jericho. Those foundations were not so slightly laid, as that they could not indure either a look, or a march, or a battery: It was the Ark of God, whose presence demolished the walls of that wicked City. The same power that drave back the waters of Jordan before, and afterwards laid Dagon on the floore, cast down all those forts. The Priests beare on their shoulders that mighty engine of God, before which those wals, if they had bin of molten brasse, could not stand. Those spirituall wickednesses, yea, those gates of hell, which to nature are utterly invincible, by the power of the Word of God (which he hath committed to the carriage of his weak servants) are overthrown and triumphed over. Thy Ark, O God, hath bin long amongst us; how is it that the walls of our corruptions stand still unruined? It hath gone before us; his Priests have carried it, we have not followed it, our hearts have not attended upon it; and therefore how mighty soever it is in it self, yet to us it hath not bin so powerfull, as it would.

Seven daies together they walk this round; They made this therefore their Sabbaths daies journey; and who knowes whether the last and longest walk, which brought victory to Israel, were not on this day? Not long before, an Israelite is stoned to death for but gathering a few sticks that day: Now all the host of Israel must walk about the wals of a large and populous City, and yet doe not violate the day. Gods precept is the rule of the justice and holinesse of all our actions: Or was it, for that revenge upon Gods enemies is an holy work, and such as God vouchsafes to priviledge with his own day? or, because when we have undertaken the exploits of God, he will abide no intermission till we have fulfilled them? He allowes us to breathe, not to break off till we have finished.

It had bin as easie for God to have given this successe to their first daies walk, yea to their first pace, or their first sight of Jericho; yet he will not give it untill the end of their seven daies toile: It is the pleasure of God to hold us both in work and in expectation; and though he require our continuall indeavours for the subduing of our corruptions, during the six daies of our life, yet we shall never finde it perfectly effected till the very evening of our last day: In the meane time it must content us that we are in our walk, and that these walls cannot stand, when we come to the measure and number of our perfection. A good heart groanes under the sense of his infirmities, faine would be rid of them, and strives and praies: but when he hath all done, untill the end of the seventh day, it cannot be: If a stone or two moulder off from these walls in the meane time, that is all; but the foundations will not be removed till then.

When we heare of so great a designe as the miraculous winning of a mighty City, who would not look for some glorious meanes to work it? when we heare that the Ark of God must besiege Jericho, who would not look for some royall equipage? But behold, here seven Priests must goe before it, with seven Trumpets of Rammes horns. The Israelites had trumpets of silver, which God had appointed for the use of assembling and dissolving the Congregation, for war, and for peace. Now I doe not hear them called for; but in stead thereof Trumpets of Rams horns; base for the matter, and not loud for sound; the shortnesse and equall measure of those instruments could not afford, either shrilnesse of noise, or variety. How meane and homely are those meanes which God commonly uses in the most glorious works. No doubt, the Citizens of Jericho answered this dull alarum of theirs, from their walls, with other instruments of louder report, and more martiall ostentation: and the vulgar Israelites thought, We have as cleare and as costly trumpets as theirs; yet no man dares offer to sound the better, when the worse are commanded. If we finde the ordinances of God poore and weak, let it content us that they are of his own choosing, and such as whereby he will so much more honour himselfe, as they in themselves are more inglorious. Not the out-side, but the efficacy, is it that God cares for.

No Ram of iron could have bin so forcible for battery as these Rams hornes: For when they sounded long, and were seconded with the shout of the Israelites, all the wals of Jericho fell down at once: They made the heaven ring with their shout; but the ruine of those walls drowned their voyce, and gave a pleasant kinde of horrour

A to the Iſraelites: The earth ſhooke under them with the fall; but the hearts of the Inhabitants ſhooke yet more: many of them doubtleſſe were ſlain with thoſe walles, wherein they had truſted: A man might ſee death in the faces of all the reſt that remained; who now being halfe dead with aſtoniſhment, expected the other halfe from the ſword of their enemies; They had now neither meanes, nor will to reſiſt; for if onely one breach had been made (as it uſes in other ſieges) for the entrance of the enemy; perhaps new ſupplies of defendants might have made it up with their carkaſſes: but now, at that once Jericho is turned to a plaine field, every Iſraelite, without reſiſtance, might runne to the next booty, and the throats of their enemies ſeemed to invite their ſwords to a diſpatch.

If but one Iſraelite had knockt at the gates of Jericho, it might have been thought, B their hand had helped to the victory: Now, that God may have all the glory, without the ſhow of any rivall, yea of any meanes, they do but walke and ſhout, and the walls give way. He cannot abide to part with any honour, from himſelfe: As he doth all things, ſo he would be acknowledged.

They ſhout all at once. It is the preſence of Gods Arke & our conjoyning prayers, that are effectuall to the beating downe of wickedneſſe. They may not ſhout, till they be bidden: if we will be unſeaſonable in our good actions, we may hurt, and not benefit our ſelves.

Every living thing in Jericho, man, woman, child, cattel, muſt die: our folly would thinke this mercileſſe: but there can be no mercy in injuſtice, and nothing but injuſtice in not fulfilling the charge of God: The death of Malefactors, the condemna- C tion of wicked men, ſeeme harſh to us; but we muſt learne of God, that there is a puniſhing mercy. Curſed be that mercy that oppoſes the God of mercy.

Yet was not Ioſhua ſo intent upon the ſlaughter, as not to be mindful of Gods part, and Rahabs: Firſt, he gives charge (under a curſe) of reſerving all the treaſure for God; Then of preſerving the Family of Rahab. Thoſe two Spyes, that received life from her, now returne it to her, and hers: They call at the window with the red cord; and ſend up news of life to her, the ſame way which they received theirs: Her houſe is no part of Jericho; neither may fire be ſet to any building of that City, till Rahab and her family be ſet ſafe without the hoſt. The actions of our faith and charity will be ſure to pay us; if late, yet ſurely. Now Rahab findes what it is to beleeve God; whiles out of an impure idolatrous Citie, ſhe is tranſplanted into the Church of God, and D made a mother of a Royall and holy poſteritie.

Of ACHAN.

WHen the wals of Jericho were falne, Ioſhua charged the Iſraelites but with two precepts; Of ſparing Rahabs houſe, & of abſtaining from that treaſure, which was anathematized to God; and one of them is broken: As in the entrance to Paradiſe, but one tree was forbidden, and that was eaten of. God hath provided for our weakneſſe in the paucity of commands: but our innocency ſtands not ſo much in ha- E ving few precepts, as in keeping thoſe we have. So much more guilty are we in the breach of one, as we are more favoured in the number. Joſh. 7.

They needed no command to ſpare no living thing in Jericho: but to ſpare the treaſure, no command was enough. Impartialitie of execution is eaſier to performe, then contempt of theſe worldly things; becauſe we are more prone to covet for our ſelves, then to pity others. Had Ioſhua bidden ſave the men and divide the treaſure; his charge had been more plauſible, then now to kill the men, and ſave the treaſure; or, if they muſt kill, earthly minds would more gladly ſhed their enemies blood, for a booty, then out of obedience, for the glory of their Maker. But now, it is good reaſon, ſince God threw down thoſe wals, and not they; that both the bloud of that wicked City ſhould be ſpilt to him, not to their own revenge; and that the treaſure ſhould be reſerved for his uſe, not for theirs. Who but a miſcreant can grudge, that God ſhould ſerve himſelfe of his own? I cannot blame the reſt of Iſrael, if they were well pleaſed with their conditions; onely one Achan troubles the peace, and his ſinne is imputed to Iſrael: the innocence of ſo many thouſand Iſraelites, is not ſo forcible to excuſe his one ſinne, as his one ſinne is to taint all Iſrael. A

A lewd man is a pernicious creature: That he damnes his own ſoule, is the leaſt part of his miſchiefe; he commonly draws vengeance upon a thouſand, either by the deſert of his ſinne, or by the infection. Who would not have hoped that the ſame God, which for ten righteous men would have ſpared the five wicked Cities, ſhould not have been content to drowne one ſinne, in the obedience of ſo many righteous? But ſo venemous is ſinne, (eſpecially, when it lights among Gods people) that one dram of it is able to infect the whole maſſe of Iſrael. B

Oh righteous people of Iſrael, that had but one Achan! How had their late circumciſion cut away the uncleane foreskin of their diſobedience? How had the bloud of their Paſchal Lamb ſcoured their ſoules from covetous deſires? The world was well mended with them, ſince their ſtubborne murmurings in the Deſert. Since the death of Moſes, and the government of Ioſhua, I do not find them in any diſorder. After that the Law hath brought us under the conduct of the true Ieſus, our ſins are more rare & our ſelves are more conſcionable. Whiles we are under the Law, we do not ſo keep it, as when we are delivered from it: our Chriſtian freedome is more holy then our ſervitude. Then have the Sacraments of God their due effect, when their receit purgeth us from our old ſinnes; and makes our converſation cleane and ſpirituall.

Little did Ioſhua know, that there was any ſacriledge committed by Iſrael: that ſin is not halfe cunning enough, that hath not learned ſecrecie: Ioſhua was a vigilant Leader, yet ſome ſinnes will eſcape him: Onely that eye which is every where, findes us out in our cloſe wickedneſſe. It is no blame to authority, that ſome ſinnes are ſecretly committed: The holieſt congregation, or family, may be blemiſht with ſome malefactors: it is juſt blame, that open ſinnes are not puniſhed; we ſhall wrong government, if we ſhall expect, the reach of it ſhould be infinite. He therefore, which if he had known the offence, would have ſent up prayers & teares to God, now ſends Spyes for a further diſcovery of Ai: They returne, with newes of the weakneſſe of their adverſaries: and (as contemning their paucity) perſwades Ioſhua, that a wing of Iſrael is enough to overſhadow this city of Ai. The Iſraelites were ſo fleſhed with their former victory, that now they think no wals or men can ſtand before them. Good ſucceſſe lifts up the heart with too much confidence; and whiles it diſſwades men from doing their beſt, oft-times diſappoints them. With God, the meanes can never be too weake; without him, never ſtrong enough. C D

It is not good to contemne an impotent enemy. In this ſecond battell the Iſraeletes are beaten: it was not the fewneſſe of their aſſailants that overthrew them, but the ſin that lay lurking at home. If all the hoſt of Iſrael had ſet upon this poore village of Ai, they had been all equally diſcomfited: The wedge of Achan did more fight againſt them, then all the ſwords of the Cananites. The victories of God goe not by ſtrength, but by innocence.

Doubtleſſe, theſe men of Ai inſulted in this foyle of Iſrael, and ſaid; Loe, theſe are the men, from whoſe preſence the waters of Jordan ran back; now they runne as faſt away from ours: Theſe are they, before whom the wals of Jericho fell downe; now they are falne as faſt before us; and all their neighbours took heart from this victory. Wherein I doubt not, but beſides the puniſhment of Iſraels ſinne, God intended the further obduration of the Cananites: Like as ſome skilfull player loſes on purpoſe at the beginning of the game, to draw on the more abetments. The newes of their overthrow ſpred as farre as the fame of their ſpeed; and every City of Canaan could ſay, Why not we as well as Ai? E

But good Ioſhua that ſucceeded Moſes, no leſſe in the care of Gods glory then in his government, is much dejected with this event. He rends his clothes, falls on his face, caſts duſt upon his head, and (as if he had learned of his Maſter, how to expoſtulate with God) ſayes, What wilt thou doe to thy mighty Name?

That Ioſhua might ſee, God took no pleaſure to let the Iſraelites lye dead upon the earth,

A earth, before their enemies; himselfe is taxed for but lying all day, upon his face, before the Arke. All his expostulations are answered in one word; Get thee up, Israel hath sinned. I doe not heare God say, Lye still, & mourne for the sin of Israel. It is to no purpose to pray against punishment, while the sinne continues. And though God loves to be sued to; yet he holds our requests unseasonable, till there be care had of satisfaction. When we have risen, & redressed sin, then may we fal down for pardon.

Victory is in the free hand of God, to dispose where he will; & no man can marvell that the dice of Warre run ever with hazard, on both sides, so as God needed not to have given any other reason of this discomfiture of Israel, but his owne pleasure: yet Iosua must now know, that Israel which before prevailed for their faith, is beaten for their sin. When we are crossed in just and holy quarrels, we may well thinke there
B is some secret evill unrepented of, which God would punish in us; which though we see not, yet he so hates, that he will rather be wanting to his owne cause, then not revenge it. When we goe about any enterprise of God, it is good to see that our hearts be cleere from any pollution of sin; and when we are thwarted in our hopes, it is our best course to ransack our selves, & to search for some sin hid from us in our bosom, but open to the view of God.

The Oracle of God, which told him, a great offence was cõmitted, yet reveals not the person It had been as easie for him, to have named the man as the crime. Neither doth Iosua request it; but refers that discovery to such a meanes, as whereby the offender (finding himselfe singled out by the lot) might be most convinced. Achan thought he might have lyen as close in all that throng of Israel, as the wedge of gold
C lay in his Tent. The same hope of secresie whith moved him to sinne, moved him to confidence in his sinne: but now, when he saw the lot fall upon his Tribe, he began to start a little; when upon his Family, he began to change countenance; when upon his household, to tremble & feare; when upon his person, to be utterly confounded in himselfe. Foolish men thinke to runne away with their privie sinnes; and say, Tush, no eye shall see me: but when they think themselves safest, God puls them out with shame. The man that hath escaped justice, and now is lying downe in death, would thinke; My shame shall never be discloséd, but before men and Angels shall he be brought on the scaffold, and finde confusion, as sure as late.

What needed any other evidence, when God had accused Achan? Yet Iosua will have the sin out of his mouth, in whose heart it was hatched; My sonne, I beseech thee
D give glory to God. Whõ God had convinced as a malefactor, Iosua beseeches as a son. Some hot spirit would have said; Thou wretched traitor, how hast thou pilfred from thy God, and shed the bloud of so many Israelites, and caused the Host of Israel to shew their backes, with dishonour, to the Heathen? now shall we fetch this sin out of thee with tortures; and plague thee with a condigne death. But like the Disciple of him whose servant he was, he meekly intreats that, which he might have extorted by violence, (My sonne, I beseech thee.) Sweetnesse of compellation, is a great help towards the good entertainment of an admonition: roughnesse & rigor, many times hardens those hearts, which meeknesse would have melted to repentance: whether we sue, or convince, or reprove, little good is gotten by bitternesse. Detestation of the sin, may well stand wtth favour to the person: and these two not distinguished cause great
E wrong either in our charity, or justice; for, either we uncharitably hate the creature of God, or unjustly affect the evill of men. Subjects are as they are called, sonnes to the Magistrate: All Israel was not onely of the family, but as of the loynes of Iosua; such must be the corrections, such the provisions of Governors, as for their children; as againe, the obedience and love of Subjects must be filiall.

God had glorified himselfe sufficiently, in finding out the wickednesse of Achan; neither need he honour from men, much lesse from sinners; They can dishonour him by their iniquities, but what recompence can they give him for their wrongs? yet Iosua sayes, My sonne, give glory to God; Israel should now see, that the tongue of Achan did justifie God in his lot. The confession of our sins doth no lesse honour God, then his glory is blemished by their commission. Who would not be glad to redeeme the honour of his Redeemer, with his own shame?

The lot of God, and the mild words of Ioshua, wonne Achan to accuse himselfe, ingenuously, impartially: a storme perhaps would not have done that, which a Sunshine had done. If Achan had come in uncalled; and before any question made, out of an honest remorse, had brought in his sacrilegious booty, and cast himselfe and it at the foot of Ioshua; doubtlesse, Israel had prospered, and his sinne had caried away pardon: now he hath gotten thus much thanke, that he is not a desperate sinner. God will once wring from the conscience of wicked men their own inditements; They have not more carefully hid their sinne, then they shall one day freely proclaime their own shame. A

Achans confession, though it were late, yet was it free and ful: For he doth not onely acknowledge the act, but the ground of his sinne; I saw, and coveted, and tooke. The eye betrayed the heart; and that, the hand; and now all conspire in the offence. If we list not to flatter our selves, this hath been the order of our crimes. Evill is uniforme; and beginning at the senses, takes the inmost fort of the soule, and then armes our own outward forces against us; This shall once be the lascivious mans song, I saw, and coveted, and took: This the theeves; this the Idolaters; this the gluttons and drunkards: All these receive their death by the eye. But, oh fooliſh Achan! with what eyes didst thou look upon that spoile, which thy fellowes saw and contemned? Why couldest thou not before, as well as now, see shame hid under that gay Babyloniſh garment? and an heap of stones covered with those shekels of silver? The over-prizing, and over-desiring of these earthly things, caries us into all mischiefe; and hides from us the sight of Gods judgements: whosoever desires the glory of metals, or of gay cloathes, or honour, cannot be innocent. B C

Well might Ioshua have proceeded to the execution of him, whom God and his own mouth accused: but as one that thought no evidence could be too strong, in a case that was capital; he sends to see, whether there was as much truth in the confession, as there was falshood in the stealth. Magistrates and Judges must pace slowly, and sure, in the punishment of offenders. Presumptions are not ground enough for the sentence of death; no, not in some cases the confessions of the guilty: It is no warrant for the Law to wrong a man, that he hath before wronged himselfe. There is lesse ill in sparing an offender, then in punishing the innocent.

Who would not have expected, since the confession of Achan was ingenuous, and his pillage still found entire, that his life should have been pardoned? But here was, Confesse and die; he had been too long sick of this disease, to be recovered. Had his confession been speedy and free, it had saved him. How dangerous it is, to suffer sin to lye fretting into the soule! which if it were washt off betimes with our repentance, could not kill us. In mortall offences, the course of humane justice is not stayd by our penitence: It is well for our soules that we have repented, but the lawes of men take not notice of our sorrow. I know not whether the death, or the teares of a malefactor, be a better sight: The censures of the Church are wip't off with weeping, not the penalties of lawes. D

Neither is Achan alone called forth to death, but all his family, all his substance. The actor alone doth not smart with sacriledge; all that concernes him, is enwrapped in the judgment. Those that defile their hands with holy goods, are enemies to their own flesh and bloud. Gods first revenges are so much the more fearefull, because they must be exemplary. E

Of the Gibeonites.

Ios. 9.

THe newes of Israels victory had flown over all the Mountaines, & Valleys of Canaan; & yet those Heathenish Kings and people are mustered together against them. They might have seen themselves in Jericho & Ai; and have well perceived, it was not an arme of flesh, that they must resist, yet they gather their forces, and say, Tush, we shall speed better. It is madnes in a man, not to be warned, but to run upon the point of those judgments, where-

A wherewith he ſees others miſcary, and not to beleeve, till he cannot recover. Our aſſent is purchaſed too late, when we have overſtayed prevention; and truſt to that experience which we cannot live to redeeme.

Onely the Hivites are wiſer then their fellowes, & will rather yeeld & live. Their intelligence was not diverſe from the reſt; all had equally heard of the miraculous conduct, and ſucceſſe of Iſrael: but their reſolution was diverſe. As Rahab ſaved her Family, in the midſt of Jericho: ſo theſe foure cities preſerved themſelves, in the midſt of Canaan; and both of them, by beleeving what God would do. The efficacy of Gods marvellous workes, is not in the acts themſelves, but in our apprehenſion; ſome are overcome with thoſe motives, which others have contemned for weake.

Had theſe Gibeonites joyned with the forces of all their neighbours, they had pe-
B riſhed in their common ſlaughter; If they had not gone a way by themſelves, death had met them; It may have more pleaſure, it cannot have ſo much ſafety, to follow the multitude. If examples may lead us, the greateſt part ſhuts out God upon earth, & is excluded from God elſewhere. Some few poore Hivites yeeld to the Church of God, & eſcape the condemnation of the world. It is very like their neighbours flouted at this baſe ſubmiſſion of the Gibeonites, and out of their termes of honour, ſcorned to beg life of an enemy, whiles they were out of the compaſſe of mercy: but when the bodies of theſe proud Jebuſites and Perizzites lay ſtrewed upon the earth, and the Gibeonites ſurvived; whether was more worthy of ſcorne and inſultation?

If the Gibeonites had ſtayed till Iſrael had beſieged their Cities, their yeeldance had been fruitleſſe; now they make an early peace, and are preſerved. There
C is no wiſdome in ſtaying till a judgment come home to us; the onely way to avoid it, is to meet it halfe way. There is the ſame remedy of warre, and of danger: To provoke an enemy in his own borders, is the beſt ſtay of invaſion; and to ſolicit God betimes in a manifeſt danger, is the beſt antidote for death.

I commend their wiſedome in ſeeking peace; I do not commend their falſhood, in the manner of ſeeking it: who can look for any better of Pagans? But as the faith of Rahab is ſo rewarded, that her lye is not puniſhed: ſo the fraud of theſe Gibeonites is not an equall match of their beleefe, ſince the name of the Lord God of Iſrael brought them to this ſuit of peace.

Nothing is found fitter to deceive Gods people, then a counterfait copy of age:
D Here are old ſacks, old bottles, old ſhooes, old garments, old bread. The Iſraelites that had worne one ſuit forty yeares, ſeemed new clad in compariſon of them. It is no new policy, that Satan would beguile us with a vaine colour of antiquity, clothing falſhood in rags. Errors are never the elder for their patching: Corruption can do the ſame that time would doe: we may make age as well as ſuffer it. Theſe Gibeonites did teare their bottles, and ſhooes, and clothes, and made them naught, that they might ſeeme old: ſo do the falſe patrons of new errours. If we be caught with this Gibeonitiſh ſtratagem, it is a ſigne we have not conſulted with God.

The ſentence of death was gone out againſt all the inhabitants of Canaan. Theſe Hivites acknowledge the truth, and judgments of God, and yet ſeeke to eſcape by a league with Iſrael. The generall denunciations of the vengeance of God, enwrap all ſinners; Yet may we not deſpaire of mercy. If the ſecret counſell of the Almighty
E had not deſigned theſe men to life, Ioſhua could not have been deceived with their league. In the generality there is no hope: Let us come in old rags of our vileneſſe, to the true Ioſhua, and make our truce with him; we may live, yea, we ſhall live. Some of the Iſraelites ſuſpect the fraud; & notwithſtanding al their old garments, & proviſions, can ſay, It may be thou dwelleſt amongſt us: If Ioſhua had continued this doubt, the Gibeonites had torne their bottles in vaine. In caſes and perſons unknowne, it is ſafe not to be too credulous: Charity it ſelfe will allow ſuſpition, where we have ſeen no cauſe to truſt.

If theſe Hivites had not put on new faces, with their old cloathes, they had ſurely changed countenance, when they heard this argument of the Iſraelites, (It may bee thou dwelleſt amongſt us; how then can I make a league with thee?) They had (perhaps) hoped, their ſubmiſſion would not have been refuſed, whereſoever they had dwelt:

but leſt their neighbourhood might be a prejudice, they come diſguiſed; and now heare, that their neerneſſe of abode was an unremovable barre of peace. It was quarrell enough, that they were Canaanites: God had forbidden both the league, and the life of the native inhabitants. He that cals himſelfe the God of peace, proclaimes himſelfe the God of Hoſts: and not to fight where he hath commanded, is to breake the peace with God, whiles we nouriſh it with men. Contention with brethren is not more hatefull to him then leagues with Idolaters. The condition that he hath ſet to our peace is our poſſibility and power. That fals not within the poſſibility of our power which we cannot doe lawfully.

What a ſmooth tale did theſe Gibeonites tell for themſelves? of the remoteneſſe of their Country, the motives of their journey, the conſultation of their Elders; the ageing of their proviſions by the way: that it might ſeem not onely ſafe, but deſerved on their parts, that they ſhould be admitted to a peace, ſo far ſought and purchaſed with ſo much toyle, and importunity. Their cloathes and their tongues agreed together; and both diſagree from the truth. Deceit is ever lightly wrapped up in plauſibility of words; as faire faces often-times hide much unchaſtity. But this guile ſped the better, becauſe it was clad with much plainneſſe: For who would have ſuſpected, that clouted ſhooes, and ragged coats could have covered ſo much ſubtilty? The caſe ſeemed ſo cleare, that the Iſraelites thought it needleſſe to conſult with the mouth of the Lord. Their owne eyes and eares were called onely to counſell; and now their credulity hath drawne them into inconvenience.

There is no way to convince the Gibeonitiſh pretences of antiquity, but to have recourſe to the Oracle of God. Had this been adviſed with, none of theſe falſe rags had ſhamed the Church of God: whether in our practice, or judgement, this direction cannot faile us, whereas what wee take upon the words of men, proves ever either light, or falſe wares.

The facility of Iſrael had led them into a league, to an oath, for the ſafety of the Gibeonites: and now within three dayes they find both their neighbourhood and deceit. Thoſe old ſhooes of theirs would eaſily hold to cary them back to their home. The march of a great Army is eaſie: yet within three dayes the Iſraelites were before their Cities. Ioſhua might now have taken advantage of their own words, to diſſolve his league, and have ſaid; Ye are come from a farre Country, theſe Cities are neere; Theſe are not therefore the people, to whom we are ingaged by our promiſe, and oath: And if theſe Cities be yours, yet ye are not your ſelves. Erewhile, ye were ſtrangers, now you are Hivites borne, and dwelling in the midſt of Canaan: we will therefore deſtroy theſe Cities neere-hand, and do you ſave your people afarre off. It would ſeeme very queſtionable, Whether Ioſhua needed to hold himſelfe bound to this oath; for fraudulent conventions oblige not; and Iſrael had put in a direct caveat of their vicinity: yet dare not Ioſhua and the Princes truſt to ſhifts, for the eluding their oath; but muſt faithfully performe, what they have raſhly promiſed.

Ioſhuaes heart was cleare from any intention of a league with a Canaanite, when he gave his oath to theſe diſguiſed ſtrangers: yet he durſt neither repeale it himſelfe, neither doe I heare him ſue to Eleazar the High-Prieſt, to diſpenſe with it; but takes himſelfe tyed to the very ſtrict words of his oath, not to his owne purpoſe. His tongue had bound his heart and hands, ſo as neither might ſtirre; leſt while he was curious of fulfilling the will of God, he ſhould violate the oath of God. And if the Gibeonites had not known theſe holy bonds indiſſoluble, they neither had been ſo importunate to obtaine their vow, nor durſt they have truſted it being obtained. If either diſpenſation with oaths, or equivocation in oaths, had been known in the world, or at leaſt approved, theſe Gibeonites had not lived, and Iſrael had ſlain them without ſin: Either Iſrael wanted skill; or our reſervers, honeſty.

The multitude of Iſrael, when they came to the wals of theſe foure exempted Cities, itched to be at the ſpoile; Not out of a deſire to fulfill Gods commandement, but to enrich themſelves, would they have falne upon theſe Hivites; They thought all loſt that fell beſides their fingers. The wealthy City of Jericho was firſt altogether interdicted them; the wals and houſes either fell, or muſt be burnt; the men & cattel killed;

A killed; the goods and treasure confiscate to God. Achans booty shewes, that City was both rich and proud: yet Israel might be no whit the better for them, carying away nothing but empty victory : and now foure other Cities must be exempted from their pillage. Many an envious looke did Israel therefore cast upon these wals ; and many bitter words did they cast out against their Princes, the enemies of their gaine; whether for swearing, or for that they would not forsweare : But howsoever, the Princes might have said in a returne to their fraud, We swore indeed to you, but not the people: yet, if any Israelite had but pulled downe one stone from their wals, or shed one drop of Gibeonitish bloud, he had no lesse plagued all Israel for perjury, then Achan had before plagued them for sacriledge. The sequell shewes how God would have taken it: For, when three hundred yeares after, Saul (perhaps forgetting
B the vow of his fore-fathers) slew some of these Gibeonites, although out of a well-meant zeale; all Israel smarted for the fact, with a three yeares famine, and that in Davids raigne, who received this Oracle from God ; It is for Saul, and for his bloudy house; because he slew the Gibeonites. Neither could this wrong be expiated, but by the bloud of Sauls seven sonnes, hanged up at the very Court-gates of their father.

Iosh. 9. 23. Iosua and the Princes had promised them life, they promised them not liberty: no Covenant was past against their servitude. It was just therefore with the Rulers of Israel, to make slavery the price both of their lives, and their deceit. The Israelites had themselves been drudges, if the Gibeonites had not beguiled them, and lived. The old rags therefore wherewith they came disguised, must now be their best suits, and their life must be toilesomely spent in hewing of wood, and drawing of water
C for all Israel. How deare is life to our nature, that men can be content to purchase it with servitude ? It is the wisedome of Gods children to make good use of their over-sights. The rash oath of Israel proves their advantage : Even wicked men gaine by the out-side of good actions : Good men make a benefit of their sinnes.

The Rescue of GIBEON.

THE life of the Gibeonites must cost them servitude from Israel, and dangers from their neighbors: if Joshuah will but sit still, the deceit of the Gibeonites shall be revenged by his enemies. Five Kings are up in Armes against them, and are ready to pay their fraud with violence. What should these poore men do? If they make not their peace, they dye by strangers; if they doe make their peace with Forrainers, they must dye by neighbors. There is no course that threatens not some danger: We have sped well, if our choice hath light upon the easiest inconvenience. Josh. 10

If these Hivites have sinned against God, against Israel; yet what have they done to their neighbours? I heare of no trechery, no secret information, no attempt. I see no sinne but their league with Israel, and their life: yet (for ought we finde) they were freemen; no way either obliged, or obnoxious. As Satan, so wicked men cannot abide to lose any of their community: If a Convert come home, the Angels welcome him with songs, the Divels follow him with uproare and fury, his old Partners with scornes and obloquie.

I find these neighbour Princes halfe dead with feare, and yet they can find time to be sick of envy. Malice in a wicked heart is the King of passions: all other vaile and bow when it comes in place; even their owne life was not so deare to them as revenge. Who would not rather have looked that these Kings should have tryed to have followed the coppie of this League? Or if their fingers did itch to fight, why did they not rather thinke of a defensive warre against Israel, than an offensive against the Gibeonites? Gibeon was strong, and would not be wonne without blood; yet these Amorites, which at their best were too weak for Israel, would spend their forces before hand on their Neighbors. Here was a strong hatred in weake brests: they feared, and yet began to fight; they feared Israel, yet began to fight with Gibeon. If they had face still, their destruction had not been so sudden: the malice of the wicked, hastens the pace of their own judgement. No rod is so fit for a mischievous man as his owne.

Gibeon and these other Cities of the Hivites, had no King: and none yeelded, and escaped, but they. Their Elders consulted before for their league; neither is there any challenge sent to the King, but to the city: and now these five Kings of the Amorites have unjustly compacted against them. Soveraignty abused, is a great spur to courage: the conceit of authority in great persons, many times lies in the way of their own safety, whiles it will not let them stoop to the ordinary courses of inferiours. Hence it is, that heaven is peopled with so few Great-ones: hence it is, that true contentment seldome dwels high; whiles meaner men of humble spirits, enjoy both earth and heaven.

The Gibeonites had well proved, that though they wanted an Head, yet they wanted wanted not wit; and now the ſame wit that wonne Joſhua and Iſrael to their friendſhip and protection, teacheth them to make uſe of thoſe they had wonne. If they had not more truſted Joſhua, than their wals, they had never ſtolne that League; and when ſhould they have uſe of their new protectors, but now that they were aſſailed? Whither ſhould we flie, but to our Joſhua, when the powers of darknes (like mighty Amorites) have beſieged us? If ever we will ſend up our prayers to him, it will be when we are beleagured with evils. If we truſt to our owne reſiſtance, wee cannot ſtand; we cannot miſcarry, if we truſt to his: in vaine ſhall we ſend to our Joſhua in theſe ſtraits, if we have not before come to him in our freedome. A

Which of us would not have thought Joſhua had a good pretence for his forbearance, and have ſaid; You have ſtolne your League with me; why doe you expect helpe from him whom ye have deceived? All that we promiſed you, was a ſufferance to live: enjoy what we promiſed, we will not take your life from you. Hath your faithfulneſſe deſerved to expect more than our covenant? We never promiſed to hazard our lives for you, to give you life with the loſſe of our owne. But that good man durſt not conſtrue his owne covenant to ſuch an advantage: he knew little difference betwixt killing them with his owne ſword, and the ſword of an Amorite: whoſoever ſhould give the blow, the murder would be his. Even permiſſion in thoſe things we may remedy, makes us no leſſe actors than conſent: ſome men kill as much by looking on, as others by ſmiting: We are guilty of all the evil we might have hindred. B

The noble diſpoſition of Joſhua, beſides his ingagement, will not let him forſake his new vaſſals: Their confidence in him, is argument enough to draw him into the Field. The greateſt obligation to a good minde, is anothers truſt; which to diſappoint, were mercileſſy perfidious. How much leſſe ſhall our true Joſhua faile the confidence of our faith? Oh, my Saviour, if we ſend the meſſengers of our prayers to thee into thy Gilgal, thy mercy bindes thee to reliefe: never any ſoule miſcarried that truſted thee; we may be wanting in our truſt, our truſt can never want ſucceſſe. C

Speed in beſtowing, doubles a gift; a benefit deferred, loſes the thankes, and proves unprofitable. Joſhua marches all night, and fights all day for the Gibeonites: They tooke not ſo much paines in comming to deceive him, as he in going to deliver them. It is the nobleſt victory to overcome evill with good: If his very Iſraelites had been in danger, he could have done no more: God, and his Joſhua, make no difference betwixt Gibeonites Iſraelited, and his owne naturall people. All are Iſraelites whom he hath taken to league: we ſtrangers of the Gentiles, are now the true Jewes; God never did more for the naturall Olive, than for that wild Impe which he hath grafted in. And as theſe Hivites could never be thankfull enough to ſuch a Joſhua, no more can we to ſo gracious a Redeemer, who forgetting our unworthines, deſcended to our Gibeon, and reſcued us from the powers of hell and death. D

Joſhua fought, but God diſcomfited the Amorites. The praiſe is to the workeman, not the inſtrument: Neither did God ſlay them onely with Joſhua's ſword, but with his owne haile-ſtones; that now the Amorites may ſee both theſe revenges come from one hand. Theſe bullets of God doe not wound, but kill: It is no wonder that theſe five Kings flie; they may ſoone run away from their hope, never from their horror. If they looke behind, there is the ſword of Iſrael, which they dare not turne upon, becauſe God had taken their heart from them before their life: if they looke upwards, there is the hail-ſhot of God fighting againſt them out of heaven; which they can neither reſiſt, nor avoid. E

If they had no enemy but Iſrael, they might hope to run away from death, ſith fear is a better footman, than deſire of revenge; but now whitherſoever they run, heaven will be about their heads: and now, all the reaſon that is left them in this confuſion of their thoughts, is to wiſh themſelves well dead; there is no evaſion, where God intends a revenge. We men have deviſed to imitate theſe inſtruments of death, and ſend forth deadly bullets out of a cloud of ſmoak, wherin yet as there is much danger, F

ſo

A so much uncertainty: but this God, that discharges his Ordnance from heaven, directs every shot to an head, and can as easily kill as shoot. It is a fearfull thing to fall into the hands of the living God: he hath moe wayes of vengeance, than he hath creatures. The same heaven that sent forth water to the old world, fire to the Sodomites, lightning and thunder-bolts to the Egyptians, sends out haile-stones to the Amorites. It is a good care how we may not anger God; it is a vaine study how we may flie from his judgements, when we have angred him; if we could run out of the world, even there shall we find his revenges far greater.

Was it not miracle enough that God did braine their Adversaries from heaven, but that the Sun and Moon must stand still in heaven? It is not enough that the Amorites flie, but that the greatest Planets of heaven must stay their owne course, to B witnes and wonder at the discomfiture? For him which gave them both being and motion, to bid them stand still, it seemes no difficulty, although the rarenesse would deserve admiration: but for a man to command the chief stars of heaven (by whose influence he liveth) as the Centurion would do his servant; Sun, stay in Gibeon, and Moon stand still in Aialon, it is more than wonder. It was not Joshua, but his faith that did this; not by way of precept, but of prayer; If I may not say, that the request of a faithfull man (as we say of the great) commands. Gods glory was that which Joshua aimed at: he knew that all the world must needs be witnesses of that, which the eye of the world stood still to see. Had he respected but the slaughter of the Amorites, he knew the Haile-stones could doe that alone; the Sun needed not stand still to direct that cloud to persecute them; but the glory of the slaughter was C sought by Joshua, that he might send that up, whence those Haile-stones and that victory came: All the earth might see the Sun and Moon; all could not see the Cloud of Haile, which becaus of that heavy burthen flew but low. That all Nations might know, the same hand commands both in Earth, in the Clouds, in heaven, Joshua now prayes, that he which disheartned his enemies upon earth, and smote them from the cloud, would stay the Sun and Moon in heaven. God never got himselfe so much honour by one dayes worke amongst the Heathen, and when was it more fit than now, when five Heathen Kings are banded against him.

The Sun and the Moone were the ordinary gods of the world: and who would not but thinke that their standing stil but one houre, should be the ruine of nature? And now all Nations shall well see, that there is an higher than their highest, that D their gods are but servants to the God whom themselves should serve, at whose pleasure both they and nature shall stand at once. If that God which meant to worke this miracle, had not raised up his thoughts to desire it, it had beene a blameable presumption, which now is a faith worthy of admiration. To desire a miracle without cause, is a tempting of God. O powerfull God that can effect this! O power of faith that can obtaine it! What is there that God cannot doe? and what is there which God can doe, that faith cannot doe?

The Altar of the Reubenites.

Reuben and Gad were the first that had an inheritance assigned them; yet they must enjoy it last: So it fals out oft in the heavenly Canaan, the first in Title are last in possession. They had their lot assigned them beyond Jordan; which though it were allotted them in peace, must bee purchased with their warre: that must bee done for their brethren which needed not bee done for themselves: ney must yet still fight, and fight for most, that as they had the first patrimonie, ey might endure the first encounter. I doe not heare them say, This is our are, let us sit downe, and injoy it quietly, fight who will for the rest: but en they knew their owne portion, they leave wives and children to take possession, seſſion, and march armed before their brethren, till they had conquered all Canaan. Whether ſhould we more commend, their courage, or their charity? Others were moved to fight with hope; they only with love: they could not win more, they might loſe themſelves; yet they will fight, both for that they had ſomething, and that their brethren might have. Thankfulneſſe and love can doe more with Gods children, than deſire to merit, or neceſſity: No true Iſraelite can (if he might chuſe) abide to ſit ſtill beyond Jordan, when all his brethren are in the field. Now, when all this warre of God was ended, and all Canaan is both won and divided, they returne to their owne; yet not till they were diſmiſſed by Joſhua: all the ſweet attractives of their private love cannot haſten their peace. If heaven be never ſo ſweet to us, yet may we not runne from this earthen warfare, till our great captaine ſhall pleaſe to diſcharge us. If theſe Reubenites had departed ſooner, they had been recalled, if not as cowards, ſurely as fugitives; now, they are ſent backe with victory and bleſſing. How ſafe and happy it is to attend both the call and the diſpatch of God!

Being returned in peace to their home, their firſt care is, not for Trophees, nor for houſes, but for an Altar to God; an Altar, not for ſacrifice, which had been abominable, but for a memoriall what God they ſerve. The firſt care of true Iſraelites, muſt be the ſafety of Religion; the world, as it is inferiour in worth, ſo muſt it be in reſpect: he never knew God aright, that can abide any competition with his Maker.

The reſt of the Tribes no ſooner heare newes of their new Altar, but they gather to Shiloh, to fight againſt them: they had ſcarce breathing from the Canaanitiſh warre, and now they will goe fight with their brethren: if their brethren will (as they ſuſpected) turne Idolaters, they cannot hold them any other than Canaanites. The Reubenites and their fellowes had newly ſetled the reſt of Iſrael in their poſſeſſions: and now ere they can be warme in their ſeates, Iſrael is up in Armes to thruſt them out of their owne. The hatred of their ſuſpected Idolatry, makes them forget either their blood, or their benefits. Iſraes ſayes, Theſe men were the firſt in our battels, and ſhall be the firſt in our revenge: they fought well for us; we will try how they can fight for themſelves. What if they were our champions? Their revolt from God hath loſt them the thank of their former labours; their Idolatry ſhall make them of brethren, adverſaries; their owne blood ſhall give handſell to their new Altar. O noble and religious zeale of Iſrael! Who would thinke theſe men the ſonnes of them that danced about the molten Calfe? that conſecrated an Altar to that Idoll. Now they are ready to die or kill, rather than endure an Altar without an Idoll? Every overture in matter of Religion, is worthy of ſuſpition, worthy of our ſpeedy oppoſition: God lookes for an early redreſſe of the firſt beginnings of impiety. As in treaſons or mutinies, wiſe Statſ-men find it ſafeſt to kill the ſerpent in the egge; ſo in motions of ſpirituall alterations, one ſpooneſull of water will quench that fire at the firſt, which afterwards whole buckets cannot abate.

Yet doe not theſe zealous Iſraelites run raſhly and furiouſly upon their brethren, nor ſay, What need we expoſtulate? The fact is cleere: what care we for words, when we ſee their Altar? What can this meane, but either ſervice to a falſe god, or diviſion in the ſervice of the true? There can be no excuſe for ſo manifeſt a crime: why doe we not rather thinke of puniſhment, than ſatisfaction? But they ſend ere they goe, and conſult ere they execute. Phineas the ſon of Eleazar the Prieſt, and ten Princes (for every Tribe one) are addreſſed both to inquire and diſſwade; to inquire of the purpoſe of the fact; to diſſwade from that which they imagined was purpoſed. Wiſdome is a good guide to zeale, and onely can keepe it from running out into fury: If diſcretion doe not hold in the reines, good intentions will both break their owne necks, and the riders: yea, which is ſtrange, without this, the zeale of God may lead us from God.

Not onely wiſedome, but charity moved them to this meſſage. For, grant the had been guilty, must they perish unwarned? Peaceable meanes must first be used to recall them, ere violence be sent to persecute them. The old rule of Israel, hath been still to inquire of Abel; No good shepheard sends his dog to pull out the throat of his straied sheep, but rather fetches it on his shoulders to the fold. Sudden cruelty stands not with Religion: He which will not himselfe break the bruised reed, how will he allow us, either to bruise the whole, or to break the bruised, or to burne the broken!

Neither yet was here more charity in sending, than uncharitablenesse in the misconstruction. They begin with a challenge; and charge their brethren deeply with transgression, apostasie, rebellion. I know not how two contrary qualities fall into love; it is not naturally suspicious, and yet many times suggests jealous feares of those we affect. If these Israelites had not loved their brethren, they would never have sent so farre to restraine them; they had never offered them part of their own patrimony: if they had not been excessively jealous, they had not censured a doubtfull action so sharpely. They met at Shilo, where the Tabernacle was; but if they had consulted with the Arke of God, they had saved both this labour, and this challenge: This case seemed so plaine, that they thought advice needlesse; Their inconsiderateneſse therefore brands their brethren with crimes whereof they were innocent; and makes themselves the onely offenders. In cases which are doubtfull and uncertaine, it is safe either to suspend the judgement, or to passe it in favour; otherwise, a plaine breach of charity in us, shall be worse than a questionable breach of justice in another.

Yet this little gleame of their uncharitable love began at themselves; if they had not feared their owne judgements in the offence of Reuben, I know not whether they had been so vehement: The fearefull revenges of their brethrens sin, are still in their eye. The wickednesse of Peor stretched not so farre as the plague; Achan sinned, and Israel was beaten: therefore by just induction, they argue (Yee rebell to day against the Lord; to morrow will the Lord be wroth with all the Congregation.) They still tremble at the vengeance passed; and finde it time to prevent their owne punishment in punishing their brethren. Gods proceedings have then their right use, when they are both carefully remembred, and made patterns of what he may doe.

Had these Reubenites been as hot in their answer, as the Israelites were in their charge, here had growne a bloody warre out of mis-prision: But now, their answer is mild and moderate, and such as well shewed that though they were further from the Arke, yet no lesse neere to God. They thought in themselves, This act of ours, though it were well meant by us, yet might well be by interpretation scandalous; it is reason our mildnesse should give satisfaction for that offence, which we have not prevented. Hereupon their answer was as pleasing, as their act was dangerous. Even in those actions whereby an offence may be occasioned (though not given) charity bindes us to cleare both our owne name, and the consciences of others.

Little did the Israelites look for so good a ground of an action so suspicious; An Altar without a sacrifice? an Altar and no Tabernacle? an Altar without a precept, and yet not against God? It is not safe to measure all mens actions by our owne conceit, but rather to thinke there may be a further drift and warrant of their act, than we can attaine to see.

By that time the Reubenites have commented upon their owne worke, it appears as justifiable, as before offensive. What wisdome and religion is found in that Altar, which before shewed nothing but Idolatry? This discourse of theirs is full both of reason & piety; We are severed by the river Jordan from the other Tribes; perhaps hereafter, our choice may exclude us from Israel: Posterity may peradventure say, Jordan is the bounds of al natural Israelites; the streams wherof never gave way to those beyond the river: If they had bin ours, either in blood or religion, they would not have been sequestred in habitation. Doubtlesse therefore these men are the off-spring of some strangers, which by vicinity of abode, have gotten some tincture of our language, manners, religion; What have we to doe with them, what have they to do with the Tabernacle of God? Sith therefore we may not either remove Gods Altar to us, or remove our Patrimony to the altar; the Pattern of the altar shall goe with us, not for sacrifice, but for memoriall; that both the posterity of the other Israelites may know we are no lesse derived from them, than this Altar from theirs; and that our posterity may know they pertaine to that Altar whereof this is the resemblance. There was no danger of the present; but posterity might both offer and receive prejudice, if this Monument were not. It is a wise and holy care to prevent the dangers of ensuing times, and to settle Religion upon the succeeding generations. As we affect to leave a perpetuity of our bodily issue, so much more to traduce piety with them. Do we not see good husbands set and plant those trees, whereof their grand-children shall receive the first fruit, and shade? Why are we lesse thrifty in leaving true religion intire to our childrens children?

Ehvd and Eglon.

Judg. 3

AS every man is guilty of his owne sorrow, these Israelites bred mischiefe to themselves: It was their mercy, that plagued them with those Canaanites, which their obedience should have rooted out. If foolish pitty be a more humane sinne, yet it is no lesse dangerous than cruelty: Cruelty kils others, unjust pitty kils our selves. They had bin Lords alone of the Promised land, if their cõmiseration had not over-swayd their justice; and now, their enemies are too cruell to them (in the just revenge of God) because they were too mercifull. That God, which in his revealed will had commanded all the Canaanites to the slaughter, yet secretly gives over Israel to a toleration of some Canaanites for their owne punishment. He hath bidden us cleanse our hearts of all our corruptions: yet he will permit some of these thornes still in our sides, for exercise, for humiliation. If we could lay violent hands upon our sins, our soules should have peace; now, our indulgence costs us many stripes: and many teares, what a continued circle is here of sins, judgements, repentance, deliverances? The conversation with Idolaters taints them with sin; their sin draws on judgement, the smart of the judgement moves them to repentance, upon their repentance followes speedy deliverance, upon their peace and deliverance they sin againe.

Othniel, Calebs nephew, had rescued them from Idolatry and servitude: his life and their innocence and peace ended together. How powerful the presence of one good man is in a Church or State, is best found in his losse.

A man that is at once eminent in place and goodnes, is like a stake in a hedge; pull that up, and al the rest are but loose and rotten sticks, easily removed: or like the pillar of a vaulted roof, which either supports, or ruins the building. Who would not think Idolatry an absurd and unnatural sin, which as it hath the fewest inducements, so had also the most direct inhibitions from God; and yet after all these warnings, Israel fals into it againe: neither affliction, nor repentance can secure an Israelite, from redoubling the worst sin, if he be left to his owne frailty. It is no censuring of the truth of our present sorrow, by the event of a following miscarriage; The former cries of Israel to God were unfained, yet their present wickednesse is abominable: Let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall.

No sooner had he said (Israel had rest) but he ads, They committed wickednes: The security of any people is the cause of their corruption; standing waters soon grow noisome. Whiles they were exercised with war, how scrupulous were they of the least intimation of Idolatry? the news of a bare Altar beyond Jordan, drew them together for a revenge; now they are at peace with their enemies, they are at variance with

A with God. It is both hard and happy not to be the worse with liberty; The sedentary life is most subject to diseases.

Rather than Israel shall want a scourge for their sinne, God himselfe shall raise them up an enemy: Moab had no quarrell but his owne ambition: but God meant by the ambition of the one part, to punish the Idolatry of the other; his justice can make one sin the executioner of another, whilst neither shall look for any other measure from him, but judgement: The evil of the city is so his, that the instrument is not guiltles. Before, God had stirred up the King of Syria against Israel; now, the King of Moab; afterwards, the King of Canaan: He hath more variety of judgements, than there can be offences; if we have once made him our adversary, he shal be sure to make us adversaries enough; which shall revenge his quarrell, whilst B they prosecute their owne.

Even those were Idolaters, by whose hands God plagued the Idolatries of Israel. In Moab, the same wickednesse prospers, which in Gods owne people is punished: the Justice of the Almighty can leave brook evil in his own; the same heathen which provoked Israel to sinne, shall scourge them for sinning. Our very profession hurts us, if we be not innocent.

No lesse than eighteen yeares did the rod of Moab rest upon the inheritance of God: Israel seemes as borne to servitude; they came from their bondage in the Land of Ægypt, to serve in the Land of Promise: They had neglected God, now they are neglected of God; their sinnes have made them servants, whom the choice of God had made free, yea, his first borne. Worthy are they to serve those men, C whose false gods they had served; and to serve them alwayes in thraldome, whom they have once served in Idolatry. We may not measure the continuance of punishment, by the time of the commission of sinne; one minuits sin deserves a torment beyond all time.

Doubtlesse, Israel was not so insensible of their owne misery, as not to complaine sooner than the end of eighteene yeares: The first houre they sighed for themselves, but now they cryed unto God. The very purpose of affliction is to make us importunate: He that heares the secret murmurs of our griefe, yet will not seeme to heare us, till our cryes be loud and strong. God sees it best to let the penitent dwell for the time under their sorrowes; he sees us sinking all the while, yet hee lets us alone, till wee be at the bottome: and when once wee can say, D Out of the depths have I cried to thee; instantly followes, The Lord heard me. A vehement suter cannot but be heard of God, whatsoever he askes. If our prayers want successe, they want heart; their blessing is according to their vigour. Wee live in bondage to these Spirituall Moabites, our owne corruptions; It discontents us: but where are our strong cries unto the God of Heaven? Where are our teares? If we could passionately bemoane our selves to him, how soone should wee be more than conquerours? Some good motions wee have to send up to him, but they faint in the way. We may call long enough, if we cry not to him.

The same hand that raised up Eglon against Israel, raised up also Ehud for Israel, against Eglon: When that Tyrant hath revenged God of his people, God will re- E venge his people of him. It is no priviledge to be an instrument of Gods vengeance by evill meanes. Though Eglon were an Usurper, yet had Ehud been a Traytor, if God had not sent him: it is onely in the power of him that makes Kings, when they are once setled, to depose them. It is no more possible for our moderne butchers of Princes, to shew they are imployed by God, than to escape the revenge of God, in offering to doe this violence, not being imployed.

What a strange choice doth God make of an Executioner? A man shut of his right hand; either he had but one hand, or used but one, and that the worse, and the more unready. Who would not have thought both hands too little for such a worke; or, if either might have beene spared, how much rather the left. God seeth not as man seeth: It is the ordinary wont of the Almighty, to make choice of the unlikelieſt meanes.

The inſtruments of God muſt not be meaſured by their owne power, or aptitude; but by the will of the Agent. Though Ehud had no hands, he that imploied him, had enabled him to this ſlaughter. In humane things, it is good to looke to the meanes; in divine, to the worker; No meanes are to be contemned that God will uſe, no meanes to be truſted that man will uſe without him.

It is good to be ſuſpicious where is leaſt ſhew of danger, and moſt appearance of favour. This left-handed man comes with a preſent in his hand, but a dagger under his skirt. The Tyrant, beſides ſervice, lookt for gifts; and now receives death in his bribe: Neither God nor men doe alwayes give where they love. How oft doth God give extraordinary illumination, power of miracles, beſides wealth and honor, where he hates? So doe men too oft accompany their curſes with preſents; either leaſt an enemy ſhould hurt us, or that we may hurt them. The intention is the favour in gifts, and not the ſubſtance.

Ehuds faith ſupplies the want of his hand: Where God intends ſucceſſe, he lifts up the heart with reſolutions of courage, and contempt of danger. What indifferent beholder of this project would not have condemned it, as unlikely to ſpeed; To ſee a maimed man goe alone to a great King, in the middeſt of all his troopes; to ſingle him out from all witneſſes, to ſet upon him with one hand in his own parlor, where his Courtiers might have heard the leaſt exclamation, and have comne in, if not to the reſcue, yet to the revenge? Every circumſtance is full of improbabilities; Faith evermore over-lookes the difficulties of the way, and bends her eyes onely to the certainty of the end. In this inteſtine ſlaughter of our tyrannical corruptions, when we caſt our eyes upon our ſelves, we might well deſpaire: Alaſſe, what can our left hands doe againſt theſe ſpirituall wickedneſſes? But when we ſee who hath both commanded, and undertaken to proſper theſe Holy deſignes, how can we miſ-doubt the ſucceſſe? I can doe all things through him that ſtrengthens me.

When Ehud had obtained the convenient ſecrecy both of the weapon and place; now with a confident forehead he approaches the Tyrant, and ſalutes him, with a true and awfull preface to ſo important an act: I have a meſſage to thee from God. Even Ehuds poynard was Gods meſſage; not onely the vocall admonitions, but alſo the reall Judgements of God, are his errands to the world. He ſpeaks to us in raine and waters, in ſickneſſes and famin, in unſeaſonable times and inundations: Theſe are the ſecondary meſſages of God; if we will not heare the firſt, we muſt heare theſe to our coſt.

I cannot but wonder at the devout reverence of this Heathen Prince: he ſate in his chaire of State; the unweildineſſe of his fat body was ſuch, that he could not riſe with readineſſe and eaſe; yet no ſooner doth he heare newes of a meſſage from God, but he riſes up from his throne, and reverently attends the tenor thereof: Though he had no ſuperiour to controll him, yet he cannot abide to be unmannerly in the buſineſſe of God.

This man was an Idolater, a Tyrant: yet what outward reſpects doth he give to the true God? Externall ceremonies of piety, and complements of devotion, may well be found with falſhood in Religion. They are a good ſhaddow of truth where it is: but where it is not, they are the very body of hypocriſie. He that had riſen up in Armes againſt Gods people, and the true worſhip of God, now riſes up in reverence to his Name. God would have liked well to have had leſſe of his courteſie, more of his obedience.

He lookt to have heard the meſſage with his eares, and he feeles it in his guts; ſo ſharpe a meſſage, that it pierced the body, and let out the ſoule through that uncleane paſſage: neither did it admit of any anſwer, but ſilence and death. In that part had he offended by pampering it, and making it his god; and now his bane finds the ſame way with his ſin.

This one hard and cold morſell, which he cannot digeſt, payes for all thoſe glut-

A gluttonous delicates, whereof he had formerly surfetted. It is the manner of God, to take fearefull revenges of the professed enemies of his Church.

It is a marvel, that neither any noyse in his dying, nor the fall of so grosse a body, called-in some of his attendants: But that God, which hath intended to bring about any designe, disposes of all circumstances to his own purpose. If Ehud had not come forth with a calme and setled countenance, and shut the doores after him, all his project had been in the dust. What had it been better that the King of Moab was slaine, if Israel had neither had a messenger to informe, nor a Captain to guide them? Now he departs peaceably, and blowes a Trumpet in Mount Ephraim; gathers Israel, and fals upon the body of Moab, as well as he had done upon the head, and procures freedome to his people. He that would undertake great enterprises, B had need of wisedome, and courage; wisedome to contrive, and courage to execute; wisedome to guide his courage, and courage to second his wisedome: both which, if they meet with a good cause, cannot but succeed.

JAEL and SISERA.

C IT is no wonder if they who ere foure score dayes after the Law delivered, fell to Idolatry alone, now after foure score yeares since the Law restored, fel to Idolatry among the Canaanites. Peace could in a shorter time worke looseneſſe in any people. And if forty yeares after Othoniels deliverance, they relapsed, what marvell is it that in twice forty after Ehud, they thus miscarried? What are they the better to have killed Eglon the King of Moab, if the Idolatry of Moab have killed them? The sinne of Moab shall be found a worse Tyrant than their Eglon. Israel is for every market; they sold themselves to Idolatry, God sels them to the Canaanites; it is no marvell they are slaves, if they will be Idolaters. After their longest intermission, they have now the sorest bondage. None of their Tyrants were so potent, as Jabin with his nine hundred chariots of iron. The longer the reckoning is deferred, the greater is the sum: God provides on purpose mighty Adversaries for his Church, that their humiliation may be the greater in sustaining, and his glory may be greater in deliverance. Judg. 4

D I doe not finde any Prophet in Israel, during their sinne; but so soone as I heare newes of their repentance, mention is made of a Propheteſſe, and Judge of Israel. There is no better signe of Gods reconciliation, than the sending of his holy messengers to any people: He is not utterly falne out with those whom he blesses with prophecy. Whom yet doe I see raised to this honour? Not any of the Princes of Israel; not Barac the captaine; not Lapidoth the husband; but a woman, for the honor of her sexe; a wife, for the honour of wedlock: Deborah the wife of Lapidoth.

He that had choice of all the millions of Israel, cals out two weake women, to deliver his people; Deborah shall judge, Jael shal execute. All the Palaces of Israel must yeeld to the Palme-tree of Deborah; The weakneſſe of the instruments, re-E dounds to the greater honor of the Workman. Who shal aske God any reason of his elections, but his owne pleasure? Deborah was to sentence, not to strike; to command, not to execute: this act is masculine, fit for some Captaine of Israel; Shee was the head of Israel, it was meet some other should be the hand. It is an imperfect and titular government, where there is a commanding power, without correction, without execution. The message of Deborah finds out Barac the son of Abinoam in his obscure secrecy, and cals him from a corner of Nepthali, to the honour of this exploit. He is sent for, not to get the victory, but to take it; not to overcome, but to kill; to pursue, and not to beat Sisera. Who could not have done this worke, whereto not much courage, no skill belonged? Yet even for this, will God have an instrument of his owne choice: It is most fit that God should serve himselfe where he liſt, of his owne, neither is it to be inquired, whom we think meet for any imployment, but whom God hath called.

Deborah had been no Propheteſſe, if ſhe durſt have ſent in her owne name; Her meſſage is from him that ſent her ſelfe, Hath not the Lord God of Iſrael commanded? Baracs anſwer is faithful, though conditionate; and doth not ſo much intend a refuſall to goe without her, as a neceſſary bond of her preſence with him. Who can blame him that he would have a Propheteſſe in his company? If the man had not bin as holy as valiant, he would not have wiſhed ſuch ſociety. How many think it a perpetuall bondage to have a Prophet of God at their elbow? God had never ſent for him ſo farre, if he could have been content to goe up without Deborah; He knew that there was both a bleſſing, and incouragement in that preſence. It is no putting any truſt in the ſucceſſe of thoſe men, that neglect the meſſengers of God.

To preſcribe that to others, which we draw back from doing our ſelves, is an argument of hollownes and falſity: Barac ſhal ſee that Deborah doth not offer him that cup whereof ſhe dare not begin; without regard of her ſex, ſhe marches with him to Mount Tabor, and rejoyces to be ſeen of the ten thouſand of Iſrael. With what ſcorne did Siſera looke at theſe gleanings of Iſrael? How unequall did this match ſeeme of ten thouſand Iſraelites againſt his three hundred thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, nine hundred chariots of Iron? And now in a bravery, he cals for his troops, and means to kill this handfull of Iſrael with the very ſight of his piked chariots; & only feared it would be no victory to cut the throats of ſo few. The faith of Deborah and Barac was not appalled with this word of Adverſaries, which from Mount Tabor they ſaw hiding all the valley below them; they knew whom they had beleeved, and how little an arme of fleſh could doe againſt the God of Hoſts.

Barac went down againſt Siſera, but it was God that deſtroyed him. The Iſraelites did not this day weild their own ſwords, leſt they ſhould arrogate any thing; God told them before-hand it ſhould be his owne act. I heare not of one ſtroke that any Canaanite gave in this fight; as if they were called hither onely to ſuffer. And now proud Siſera, after many curſes of the heavineſſe of that iron carriage, is glad to quit his chariot, and betake himſelfe to his heeles. Who ever yet knew any earthly thing truſted in, without diſappointment? It is wonder if God make us not at laſt as weary of whatſoever hath ſtolne our hearts from him, as ever we were fond.

Yet Siſera hopes to have ſped better than his followers, in ſo ſeaſonable an harbour of Jael. If Heber and Jael had not been great perſons, there had been no note taken of their Tents; there had been no league betwixt King Jabin and them: Now, their greatneſſe makes them knowne, their league makes them truſted. The diſtreſſe of Siſera might have made him importunate, but Jael begins the courteſie, and exceeds the deſire of her gueſt: He askes water to drink, ſhe gives him milke; he wiſhes but ſhelter, ſhe makes him a bed; he deſires the protection of her Tent, ſhe covers him with a mantle. And now Siſera pleaſes himſelfe with his happy change, and thinks how much better it is to be here, than in that whirling of chariots, in that horrour of flight, amongſt thoſe ſhrikes, thoſe wounds, thoſe carkaſſes: Whiles he is in theſe thoughts, his wearineſſe and eaſie repoſall hath brought him aſleep. Who would have looked that in this tumult and danger, even betwixt the very jawes of death, Siſera ſhould find time to ſleep? how many worldly hearts doe ſo in the middeſt of their ſpirituall perils?

Now, whiles he was dreaming, doubtleſſe of the claſhing of armors, ratling of chariots, neihging of horſes, the clamor of the cõquered, the furious purſuit of Iſrael, Jael ſeeing his temples lie ſo faire, as if they invited the naile & hammer, entred into the thought of this noble execution; certainly not without ſome checks of doubt, and pleas of feare: What if I ſtrike him? And yet who am I, that I ſhould dare to think of ſuch an act? Is not this Siſera, the famouſeſt captaine of the world, whoſe name hath wont to be feareſull to whole Nations? What if my hand ſhould ſwerve in the ſtroke? What if he ſhould awake, whiles I am lifting up this inſtrument of death? What if I ſhould be ſurpriſed by ſome of his followers whiles the fact is greene, and and yet bleeding? Can the murther of so great a Leader be hid, or unrevenged? Or if I might hope so, yet can my heart allow me to be secretly treacherous? Is there not peace betwixt my house and him? Did not I invite him to my Tent? Doth he not trust to my friendship and hospitality? But what doe these weake feares, these idle fancies of civility? If Sisera be in league with us, yet is he not at defiance with God? Is he not a Tyrant to Israel? Is it for nothing that God hath brought him into my Tent? May I not now finde meanes to repay unto Israel all their kindnesse to my Grand-father Jethro? Doth not God offer me this day, the honour to be the rescuer of his people? Hath God bidden me strike, and shal I hold my hand? No, Sisera, sleepe now thy last, and take here this fatall reward of all thy cruelty and oppression.

He that put this instinct into her heart, did put also strength into her hand; he that guided Sisera to her Tent, guided the nayle thorow his temples; which hath made a speedy way for his soule thorow those parts, and now hath fastened his eare so close to the earth, as if the body had been listning what was become of the soule. There lies now the great terror of Israel at the foote of a woman: He that brought so many hundred thousands into the field, hath not now one Page left, either to avert his death, or to accompany it, or bewaile it: He that had vaunted of his yron chariots, is slaine by one nayle of yron, wanting onely this one point of his infelicity, that he knows not by whose hand he perished.

GIDEONS Calling.

THe judgements of God stil the further they goe, the forer they are; the bondage of Israel under Jabin was great, but it was freedome in comparison of the yoke of the Midianites. During the former tyranny, Deborah was permitted to judg Israel under a Palme-tree; Under this, not so much as private habitations wil be allowed to Israel. Then, the seat of judgement was in sight of the Sunne; now, their very dwellings must be secret under the earth. They that rejected the protection of God, are glad to seek to the mountaines for shelter; and as they had savagely abused themselves, so they are faine to creep into dens and caves of the rocks, like wilde creatures, for safegard: God had sowne spirituall seed amongst them, and they suffered their heathenish neighbours to pull it up by the roots; and now, no sooner can they sowe their materiall seed; but Midianites and Amalekites are ready by force to destroy it. As they inwardly delt with God, so God deales outwardly by them; Their eyes may tell them what their soules have done: yet that God, whose mercy is above the worst of our sinnes, sends first his Prophet with a message of reproofe, and then his Angell with a message of deliverance. The Israelites had smarted enough with their servitude, yet God sends them a sharpe rebuke: It is a good signe when God chides us; his round reprehensions are ever gracious forerunners of mercy: whereas his silent connivence at the wicked, argues deepe and secret displeasure: the Prophet made way for the Angel, reproofe for deliverance, humiliation for comfort. Judg. 6.

Gideon was threshing Wheat by the Wine-presse. Yet Israel hath both Wheat and Wine, for all the incursions of their enemies. The worst estate out of hel, hath either some comfort, or at least, some mitigation; in spight of the malice of the world, God makes secret provision for his own. How should it be, but he that owns the earth, and all creatures, should reserve ever a sufficiency from forrainers (such the wicked are) for his household? In the worst of the Midianitish tyranny, Gideons field and barn are priviledged, as his fleece was afterwards from the showre.

Why did Gideon thresh out his corn? To hide it; Not from his neighbours, but his enemies: his granary might easily be more close than his barn. As then, Israelites threshed out their corne, to hide it from the Midianites: but now, Midianites thresh out corne, to hide it from the Israelites. These rurall Tyrants of our time, doe not more lay up corne than curses: he that with-draweth corne, the people will curse him; yea, God will curse him, with them, and for them. A

What shifts nature will make to live! Oh that we could be so carefull to lay up spirituall food for our soules, out of the reach of those spirituall Midianites! we could not but live in despight of all adversaries.

The Angels, that have ever God in their face, and in their thoughts, have him also in their mouthes: The Lord is with thee. But this which appeared unto Gideon, was the Angell of the Covenant, the Lord of Angels. Whiles he was with Gideon, he might well say, The Lord is with thee. Hee that sent the Comforter, was also the true Comforter of his Church: He well knew how to lay a sure ground of consolation, and that the onely remedy of sorrow, and beginning of true joy, is, The presence of God. The griefe of the Apostles for the expected losse of their Master, could never be cured by any receit but this, of the same Angel, Behold I am with you to the end of the World. What is our glory, but the fruition of Gods presence? The punishment of the damned, is a separation from the beatificall face of God; needs must therefore his absence in this life be a great torment to a good heart: and no crosse can be equivalent to this beginning of heaven in the Elect, The Lord is with thee. B

Who can complaine either of solitarinesse or opposition, that hath God with him? With him, not only as a witnesse, but as a party: Even wicked men and divels cannot exclude God, not the bars of hell can shut him out: he is with them perforce, but to judge, to punish them: yea, God will be ever with them to their cost; but to protect, comfort, save, he is with none but his. C

Whiles he cals Gideon valiant, he make him so. How could he be but valiant, that had God with him? The godlesse man may be carelesse, but cannot be other than cowardly. It pleases God to acknowledge his owne graces in men, that he may interchange his owne glory, with their comfort; how much more should we confesse the graces of one another? An envious nature is prejudiciall to God; he is a strange man in whom there is not some visible good; yea, in the Divels themselves we may easily note some commendable parts, of knowledge, strength, agility: Let God have his owne in the worst creature; yea, let the worst creature have that praise which God would put upon it. D

Gideon cannot passe over this salutation, as some fashionable complement, but laies hold on that part, which was most important; the tenure of all his comfort; and (as not regarding the praise of his valour) inquires after that which should be the ground of his valour, the presence of God: God had spoken particularly to him; he expostulates for all. It had been possible God should be present with him, not with the rest; as he promised to have been with Moses, Israel: and yet when God saies The Lord is with thee, he answers, Alas Lord, if the Lord be with us. Gideon cannot conceive of himselfe as an exempt person; but puts himself among the throng of Israel, as one that could not be sensible of any particular comfort, while the common case of Israel laboured. The maine care of a good heart is still for the publick, neither can it injoy it selfe, while the Church of God is distressed. As faith drawes home generalities, so charity diffuses generalities from it selfe to all. E

Yet the valiant man was here weake, weake in faith, weake in discourse; whiles he argues Gods absence by affliction, his presence by deliverances, and the unlikelihood of successe by his owne disability; all grosse inconsequences: rather should he have inferred Gods presence upon their correction; for whersoever God chastises, there he is, yea, there he is in mercy: nothing more proves us his, than his stripes; he will not bestow whipping where he loves not. Fond nature thinks God should not suffer the wind to blow upon his deare ones, because her selfe makes this use of her owne indulgence; but none out of the place of torment, have suffered so much as his deerest children. He saies not we are Idolaters; therefore the Lord hath for-

A saken us, becauſe we have forſaken him: This ſequell had been as good, as the other was faulty; (The Lord hath delivered us unto the Midianites, therefore hee hath forſaken us:) Sins, not afflictions, argue God abſent.

Whiles Gideon bewrayeth weakneſſe, God both gives him might, and imploies it; (Goe in this thy might, and ſave Iſrael.) Who would not have looked that God ſhould have looked angerly on him, and chid him for his unbeleefe? but he whoſe mercy will not quench the weakeſt fire of grace, though it be but in flax, lookes upon him with compaſſionate eyes; and to make good his owne Word, gives him that valour he had acknowledged.

Gideon had not yet ſaid, Lord, deliver Iſrael: much leſſe had he ſaid, Lord, deliver Iſrael by my hand. The mercy of God prevents the deſire of Gideon: If God ſhould not
B begin with us, we ſhould be ever miſerable; If he ſhould not give us till we aske, yet who ſhould give us to aske? If his Spirit did not worke thoſe holy groanes and ſighs in us, we ſhould never make ſuit to God. He that commonly gives us power to crave, ſometimes gives us without craving, that the benefit might be ſo much more welcome, by how much leſſe it was expected; and we ſo much more thankfull, as he is more forward. When he bids us aske, it is not for that he needs to be intreated; but that he may make us more capable of bleſſings by deſiring them: And where he ſees fervent deſires, he ſtayes not for words; and he that gives ere we aske, how much more will he give when we aske?

He that hath might enough to deliver Iſrael, yet hath not might enough to keep himſelfe from doubting. The ſtrongeſt faith will ever have ſome touch of infidelity.
C And yet this was not ſo much a diſtruſt of the poſſibility of delivering Iſrael, as an inquiry after the meanes; wherby ſhall I ſave Iſrael? The ſalutation of the Angel to Gideon, was as like Gabriels ſalutation of the bleſſed Virgin, as their anſwers were like: Both Angels brought newes of deliverance, both were anſwered with a queſtion of the meanes of performance; with a report of the difficulties in performing: Ah my Lord, wherby ſhall I ſave Iſrael! How the good man diſparages himſelfe! It is a great matter (O Lord) that thou ſpeakeſt of, and great actions require mighty Agents: As for me, who am I? My Tribe is none of the greateſt in Iſrael; My fathers family is one of the meaneſt in his Tribe, and I the meaneſt in his family; Poverty is a ſufficient barre to great enterpriſes.

Wherby ſhall I? Humility is both a ſigne of following glory, and a way to it, and an D occaſion of it: Bragging and height of ſpirit will not carry it with God: None have ever been raiſed by him, but thoſe which have formerly dejected themſelves: None have been confounded by him, that have been abaſed in themſelves. Thereupon it is that he addes; I will therefore be with thee; as if he had anſwered, Hadſt thou not been ſo poore in thy ſelfe, I would not have wrought by thee. How ſhould God be magnified in his mercies, if we were not unworthy? How ſhould he be ſtrong, if not in our weakneſſe?

All this while, Gideon knew not it was an Angell that ſpake with him; He ſaw a man ſtand before him like a Traveller, with a ſtaffe in his hand. The unuſualneſſe of thoſe revelations in thoſe corrupted times was ſuch, that Gideon might think of any thing rather than an Angel: No marvell if ſo ſtrange a promiſe from an unknowne
E meſſenger found not a perfect aſſent; Faine would he beleeve, but faine would he have good warrant for his faith. In matters of faith, we cannot goe upon too ſure grounds. As Moſes therefore being ſent upon the ſame errand, deſired a ſigne whereby Iſrael might know that God ſent him: So Gideon deſires a ſigne from this bearer to know that his newes is from God.

Yet the very hope of ſo happy newes, not yet ratified, ſtirres up in Gideon both joy and thankfulneſſe. After all the injury of the Midianites, he was not ſo poore, but he could beſtow a Kid and cakes upon the reporter of ſuch tidings. Thoſe which are rightly affected with the glad newes of our ſpirituall deliverance, ſtudy to ſhew their loving reſpects to the meſſengers.

The Angel ſtaies for the preparing of Gideons feaſt. Such pleaſure doth God take in in the thankfull indeavours of his ſervants, that he patiently waits upon the leiſure of our performances. Gideon intended a dinner, the Angel turned it into a ſacrifice. He, whoſe meat and drinke it was to doe his Fathers will, cals for the broth and fleſh to be powred out upon the ſtone; and when Gideon look'd he ſhould have bleſſed, and eaten, he touches the feaſt with his ſtaffe, and conſumes it with fire from the ſtone, and departes. He did not ſtrike the ſtone with his ſtaffe (for the attrition of two hard bodies would naturally beget fire) but he touched the meat, and brought fire from the ſtone: And now, whiles Gideon ſaw and wondred at the ſpiritual act, he loſt the ſight of the Agent. A

Hee that came without intreating, would not have departed without taking leave, but that he might increaſe Gideons wonder, and that his wonder might increaſe his faith. His ſalutation therefore was not ſo ſtrang, as his farewell. Moſes touched the rocke with his ſtaffe, and brought forth water, and yet a man, and yet continued with the Iſraelites. This meſſenger touches the ſtone with his ſtaffe, and brings forth fire, and preſently vaniſhes, that he may approve himſelfe a ſpirit. And now Gideon, when he had gathered up himſelfe, muſt needs thinke, He that can raiſe fire out of a ſtone, can raiſe courage and power out of my dead breſt; He that by this fire hath conſumed the broth and fleſh, can by the feeble flame of my fortitude conſume Midian. B

Gideon did not ſo much doubt before, as now he feared. We that ſhall once live with and be like the Angels, in the eſtate of our impotency thinke wee cannot ſee an Angel, and live. Gideon was acknowledged for mighty in valour, yet hee trembles at the ſight of an Angel. Peter, that durſt draw his ſword upon Malchus, and all the traine of Judas, yet feares when he thought he had ſeene a ſpirit. Our naturall courage cannot beare us out againſt ſpirituall objects. This Angel was homely and familiar, taking upon him for the time, a reſemblance of that fleſh whereof he would afterwards take the ſubſtance; yet even the valiant Gideon quakes to have ſeen him: How aweſull and glorious is the God of Angels, when he will be ſeen in the ſtate of Heaven! C

The Angel that departed for the wonder, yet returnes for the comfort of Gideon; It is not the wont of God to leave his children in a maze, but he brings them out in the ſame mercy which led them in, and will magnifie his grace in the one, no leſſe than his power in the other.

Now Gideon growes acquainted with God, and enterchanges pledges of familiarity; He builds an Altar to God, and God conferres with him; and (as he uſes where he loves) imployes him. His firſt taske muſt be to deſtroy the god of the Midianites, then the Idolaters themſelves. Whiles Baals Altar and grove ſtood in the hill of Ophrah, Iſrael ſhould in vaine hope to prevaile: It moſt juſt with God, that judgement ſhould continue with the ſinne, and no leſſe mercy, if it may remove after it. Wouldeſt thou faine be rid of any judgement? Inquire what falſe Altars and groves thou haſt in thy heart! downe with them firſt. D

Firſt muſt Baals altar be ruined, ere God's be built; both may not ſtand together; The true God will have no ſociety with Idols, neither will allow it us. I doe not heare him ſay, That Altar and grove which were abuſed to Baal, conſecrate now to me; but as one whoſe holy jealouſie will abide no worſhip til there be no Idolatry, he firſt commands down the monuments of ſuperſtition, and then injoyns his own ſervice; yet the wood of Baals grove muſt be uſed to burne a ſacrifice unto God: When it was once cut downe, Gods deteſtation and their danger ceaſed. The good creatures of God that have been profaned to Idolatry, may, in a change of their uſe, be imploied to the holy ſervice of their Maker. E

Though ſome Iſraelites were penitent under this humiliation, yet ſtill many of them perſiſted in their wonted idolatry: the very houſhold of Gideons father were ſtil Baalites, and his neighbours of Ophrah were in the ſame ſin: yea, if his father had bin free, what did he with Baals grove and altar? He dares not therefore take his fathers ſervants, though he tooke his Bullocks, but commands his owne. The Maſter is beſt

A best seen in the servants: Gideons servants (amongst the Idolatrous retinue of Joash) are religious, like their Master; yet the mis-devotion of Joash, and the Ophrathites was not obstinate. Joash is easily perswaded by his sonnes, and easily perswades his neighbours how unreasonable it is to plead for such a god as cannot speak for himselfe; to revenge his cause, that could not defend himselfe. Let Baal plead for himselfe. One example of a resolute on-set in a noted person, may doe more good than a thousand seconds in the proceeding of an action.

Soone are all the Midianites in an uprore to lose their god; They need not now be bidden to muster themselves for revenge. He hath no Religion that can suffer an indignity offered to his god.

GIDEONS Preparation and Victory.

Jud. 7

OF all the instruments that God did use in so great a worke, I find none so weake as Gideon, who yet (of all others) was stiled valiant: naturall valour may well stand with spirituall cowardise. Before he knew that he spake with a God, he might have just colours for his distrust; but after God had approved his presence, and Almighty power, by fetching fire out of the stone, then, to call for a watery signe of his promised deliverance, was no other than to powre water upon the fire of the spirit. C The former triall god gave, vanished; this, upon Gideons choice and intreaty: The former miracle was strong enough to carry Gideon thorow his first exploit of ruinating the Idolatrous Grove, and Altar; but now when he saw the swarme of the Midianites and Amalekites about his eares, he cals for new aid, and not trusting to his Abiezrites, and his other thousands of Israel, he runs to God for a further assurance of victory.

The refuge was good, but the manner of seeking it, savours of distrust. There is nothing more easie than to be valiant when no perill appeareth; but when evils assaile us upon equall termes, it is hard, and commendable, not to be dismayed. If God had made that proclamation now, which afterwards was commanded to be made by Gideon, Let the timerous depart; I doubt whether Israel had not wanted a D Guide: yet how willing is the Almighty to satisfie our weak desires!

What tasks is He content to be set by our infirmity? The fleece must be wet, and the ground dry; the ground must be wet, and the fleece dry: Both are done; that now Gideon may see whether he would make himselfe hard earth, or yeelding wool; God could at pleasure distinguish betwixt him, and the Midianites; and powre downe either mercies or judgement where he lists; and that he was set on worke by that God which can command all the Elements, and they obey him. Fire, water, earth, serve both him and (when he will) his.

And now, when Gideon had his reciprocall proofe of his insuing successe, he goes on (as he well may) harnessed with resolution, and is seene in the head of his troops, and in the face of the Midianites. If we cannot make up the match with E God, when we have our owne asking, we are worthy to sit out.

Gideon had but thirty two thousand souldiers at his heeles; The Midianites covered all the valley, like Grashoppers: and now, whiles the Israelites thinke, Wee are too few; God sayes, The people are too many. If the Israelites must have looked for victory from their fingers, they might well have said, The Midianites are too many for us: but that God, whose thoughts and words are unlike to mens, sayes, They are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hands. If humane strength were to be opposed, there should have needed an equality; but now, God meant to give the victory, his care is not how to get it, but how not to lose or blemish the glory of it gotten. How jealous God is of his honour! He is willing to give deliverance to Israel, but the praise of the deliverance he will keep to himselfe, and will ſhorten the meanes, that he may have the full meaſure of the glory. And if he will not allow lawfull meanes to ſtand in the light of his honour, how wil he indure it to be croſſed ſo much as indirectly? It is leſſe danger to ſteale any thing from God, than his glory.

As a Prince, which if we ſteale, or clip his coyne, may pardon it; but if wee goe about to rob him of his Crowne, will not be appeaſed. There is nothing that we can give to God, of whom we receive all things; that which he is content to part with, he gives us; but he will not abide wee ſhould take ought from him which he would reſerve for himſelfe. It is all one with him to ſave with many, as with few; but he rather chuſes to ſave by few, that all the victory may redownd to himſelfe. O God, what art thou the better for praiſes, to whom, becauſe thou art infinite, nothing can be added? It is for our good that thou wouldeſt be magnified of us; Oh teach us to receive the benefit of they mercifull favours, and to returne thee the thanks.

Gideons Army muſt be leſſened. Who are ſo fit to be caſhiered as the fearefull? God bids him therefore proclaime licence for all faint hearts to leave the field. An ill inſtrument may ſhame a good work: God will not glorifie himſelfe by cowards. As the timerous ſhall be without the gates of heaven, ſo ſhall they be without the liſts of Gods field. Although it was not their courage that ſhould ſave Iſrael, yet without their courage God would not ſerve himſelf of them. Chriſtianity requires men; for if our ſpirituall difficulties meet not with high ſpirits, in ſtead of whetting our fortitude, they quaile it. Davids royall Band of Worthies, was the type of the forces of the Church, all valiant men, and able to incounter with thouſands.

Neither muſt we be ſtrong only, but acquainted with our owne reſolutions, not out of any carnall preſumption, but out of a faithfull reliance upon the ſtrength of God, in whom when we are weake, then we are ſtrong. Oh thou white-liver! doth but a foule word or a frowne ſcare thee from Chriſt? Doth the loſſe of a little land, or ſilver diſquiet thee? Doth but the ſight of the Midianites in the valley ſtrike thee? Home then, home to the world; thou art not then for the conquering Band of Chriſt: If thou canſt not reſolve to follow him through infamy, priſons, rackes, jybbets, flames, depart to thine houſe, and ſave thy life to thy loſſe.

Me thinks now, Iſrael ſhould have complained of indignity, and have ſaid, Why ſhouldſt thou think, O Gideon, that there can be a cowardly Iſraelite? And if the experience of the power and mercy of God, be not enough to make us fearleſſe: yet the ſenſe of ſervitude muſt needs have made us reſolute; for who had not rather to be buried dead, than quick? Are we not faine to hide our heads in the caves of the earth, and to make our graves our houſes? Not ſo much as the very light that we can freely injoy; the tyranny of death is but ſhort and eaſie, to this of Midian: and yet what danger can there be of that, ſith thou haſt ſo certainly aſſured us of Gods promiſe of victory, and his miraculous confirmation? No, Gideon, thoſe hearts that have brought us hither after thy colours, can as well keep us from retiring.

But now, who can but bleſſe himſelfe, to find of two and thirty thouſand Iſraelites, two and twenty thouſand cowards? Yet all theſe in Gideons march, made as faire a flouriſh of courage as the boldeſt. Who can truſt the faces of men, that ſees in the Army of Iſrael above two for one timerous? How many make a glorious ſhew in the warfaring Church, which, when they ſhall ſee danger of perſecution, ſhal ſhrink from the Standard of God? hope of ſafety, examples of neighbours, deſire of praiſe, feare of cenſures, coaction of laws, fellowſhip of friends, draw many into the field; which ſo ſoone as ever they ſee the Adverſary, repent of their conditions: and if they may cleanly eſcape, will be gone early from Mount Gilead. Can any man be offended at the number of theſe ſhrinkers, when he ſees but ten thouſand Iſraelites left of two and thirty thouſand in a morning?

Theſe men that would have been aſhamed to goe away by day, now drop away by night: and if Gideon ſhould have called any one of them back, and ſaid, Wilt thou flie? would have made an excuſe; The darkneſſe is a fit vaile for their paleneſſe,

or

A or blushing; fearfulnesse cannot abide the light: None of these thousands of Israel but would have been loth Gideon should have seen his face whiles he said, I am fearfull; Very shame holds some in their station, whose hearts are already fled. And if we cannot indure that men should be witnesses of that fear which we might live to correct, how shall we abide once to shew our fearfull heads before that terrible Judge, when he cals us forth to the punishment of our feare? O the vanity of foolish hypocrites, that run upon the terrors of God, whilst they would avoid the shame of men!

How doe we think the small remainder of Israel looked, when in the next morning-muster they found themselves but ten thousand left? How did they accuse their timerous Countrymen, that had left but this handfull to encounter the millions of Midian? and yet still, God complaines of too many; and upon his triall,

B dismisses nine thousand seven hundred more. His first tryall was of the valour of their mindes: his next is of the ability of their bodies. Those, which besides boldnesse, are not strong, patient of labour and thirst, willing to stoope, content with a little (such were those that tooke up water with their hands) are not for the select Band of God. The Lord of Hosts will serve himselfe of none but able Champions: If he have therfore singled us into his combate, this very choice argues that he finds that strength in us, which we cannot confesse in our selves. How can it but comfort us in our great trials, that if the searcher of hearts did not find us fit, he would never honour us with so hard an imployment?

Now, when there is not scarce left one Israelite to every thousand of the Midianites, it is seasonable with God to joyne battell. When God hath stripped us of all

C our earthly confidence, then doth he find time to give us victory; and not till then, lest he should be a loser in our gaine: like as at last he unclothes us of our body, that he may cloath us upon with glory.

If Gideon feared when he had two and thirty thousand Israelites at his heeles, is it any wonder if he feared when all these were shrunk into three hundred? Though his confirmation were more, yet his meanes were abated. Why was not Gideon rather the Leader of those two and twenty thousand run-awayes, than of these three hundred souldiers? O infinite mercy and forbearance of God, that takes not vantage of so strong an infirmity, but in stead of casting, encourages him! That wise providence hath prepared a dreame in the head of one Midianite, an interpretation in the mouth of another, and hath brought Gideon to be an auditor of both, and hath

D made his enemies Prophets of his victory, incouragers of the attempt, proclaimers of their owne confusion. A Midianite dreames, a Midianite interprets. Our very dreames many times are not without God; there is a providence in our sleeping fancies: even the enemies of God may have visions, and power to construe them aright. How usually are wicked men forewarned of their own destruction? To foreknow and not avoid, is but an aggravation of judgement.

When Gideon heard good newes (though from an enemy) he fell downe and worshipped. To heare himselfe but a Barly-cake, troubled him not, when he heard withall, that his roling downe the hill should breake the Tents of Midian. It matters not how base wee be thought, so wee may be victorious. The

E soule that hath received full confirmation from God in the assurance of his salvation, cannot but bow the knee, and by all gestures of body tell how it is ravished. I would have thought, Gideon should rather have found full confirmation in the promise and act of God, than in the dreame of the Midianite. Dreames may be full of uncertainty; Gods undertakings are infallible: well therefore might the Miracle of God give strength to the dreame of a Midianite; but what strength could a Pagans dreame give to the miraculous Act of God? yet by this is Gideon throughly setled. When we are going, a little thing drives us on; when we are come neere to the shore, the very tide without sails is enough to put us into the harbor. We shal now hear no more of Gideons doubts, but of his atchievements. And though God had promised by these three hundred to chase the Midianites, yet he neglects not wise stratagems to effect it. To wait for Gods performance in doing nothing, is to abuse that divine providence, which will so work, that will not allow us idle. A

Now, when we would looke that Gideon should give charge of whetting their swords, and sharpening their speares, and fitting their Armour, he onely gives order for empty Pitchers and Lights, and Trumpets. The cracking of these pitchers shall breake in peices this Midianitish clay: the kindling of these lights shall extinguish the light of Midian: these Trumpets sound no other than a soule-peale to all the Hoast of Midian: there shall need nothing but noise and light to confound this innumerable Army.

And if the pitchers, and brands, and trumpets of Gideon, did so daunt and dismay the proud troopes of Midian and Amaleck, who can we thinke shall be able to stand before the last terror, wherein the Trumpet of the Archangell shall sound, and the Heavens shall passe away with a noise, and the Elements shall be on a flame about our eares? B

Any of the weakest Israelites would have served to have broken an empty pitcher, to have carried a light, and to have sounded a Trumpet, and to strike a flying adversary. Not to the basest use will God employ an unworthy Agent; he will not allow so much as a cowardly Torch-bearer.

Those two and twenty thousand Israelites that slipt away for feare, when the feareful Midianites fled, can pursue and kill them, and can follow them at the heels, whom they durst not looke in the face. Our flight gives advantage to the feeblest adversary, whereas our resistance foileth the greatest: How much more, if we have once turned our backes upon a tentation, shall our spirituall enemies (which are ever strong) trample us in the dust? Resist, and they shall flee: stand still, and we shall see the salvation of the Lord. C

The revenge of Succoth and Penuel.

Judg. 8. 12

Gideon was of Manasseh: Ephraim and he were brothers, sonnes of Joseph: None of all the Tribes of Israel fall out with their victorious Leader, but he. The agreement of brothers is rare; by how much nature hath more endeared them, by so much are their quarrels more frequent and dangerous. I did not heare the Ephraimites offering themselves into the front of the Army, before they fight: and now they are ready to fight with Gideon, because they were not called to fight with Midian: I heare them expostulating after it; After the exploit done, cowards are valiant. Their quarrell was, that they were not called: It had beene a greater praise of their valour to have gone unbidden. What need was there to call them, when God complained of multitude, and sent away those which were called? None spake so big in the end of the fray, as the fearfullest. D

Ephraim flies upon Gideon, whilest the Midianites flie from him; when Gideon should be pursuing his enemies, he is pursued by brethren, and now is glad to spend that wind in pacifying of his own, which should have been bestowed in the slaughter of a common adversary. It is a wonder, if Satan suffer us to be quiet at home, whiles we are exercised with wars abroad. Had not Gideon learned to speak faire, as well as to smite, he had found worke enough from the swords of Josephs sons: his good words are as victorious as his sword; his pacification of friends, better than his execution of enemies. E

For ought I see, the envy of Israelites was not more troublesom to Gideon, than the opposition of Midian: He hath left the envy of Ephraim behind him; before him, he finds the envy of Succoth and Penuel: The one envies that he should overcome without them; the other, that he should say, He had overcome. His pursuit leads him to Succoth, there he craves relieve, and is repelled. Had he said, Come forth and draw your sword with me against Zeba and Zalmunna, the motion had beene but equall:

A quall: A common intereſt challenges an univerſall aid: Now he ſayes but, Give morſels of bread to my followers; He is turned off with a ſcorne; He aſkes bread, and they give him a ſtone. Could he aske a more ſlender recompence of their deliverance, or a leſſe reward of his victory? Give morſels of bread. Before this act, all their ſubſtance had been to ſmall an hire for their freedome from Midian; now, when it is done, a morſel of breed is too much: Wel might he challenge bread, where he gave liberty and life. It is hard, if thoſe which fight the warres of God, may not have neceſſary reliefe; that whiles the enemy dies by them, they ſhould die by famine. If they had laboured for God at home in peace, they had bin worthy of maintenance; how much more now, that danger is added to their toile? Even very executioners look for fees: but here were not malefactors, but adverſaries to be ſlaine; the ſword of power and
B revenge was now to be weilded, not of quiet juſtice. Thoſe that fight for our ſoules againſt ſpiritual powers, may challenge bread from us; and it is ſhameleſſe unthankfulnes to deny it. When Abraham had vanquiſhed the five Kings, and delivered Lot and his family, the King of Salem met him with bread and wine; and now theſe ſons of Abraham, after an equal victory, aske dry bread, and are denied by their brethren: Craftily yet, and under pretence of a falſe title; had they acknowledged the victory of Gideon, with what forehead could they have denied him bread?

Now, I know not whether their faithleſneſſe, or envy lie in their way? Are the hands of Zeba and Zalmunna, in thy hands? There were none of theſe Princes of Succoth and Penuel, but thought themſelves better men than Gideon; That he therefore
C alone ſhould doe that, which all the Princes of Iſrael durſt not attempt, they hated and ſcorned to heare. It is never ſafe to meaſure events by the power of the inſtrument; nor in the cauſes of God (whoſe calling makes the difference) to meaſure others by themſelves: There is nothing more dangerous, than in holy buſineſſes to ſtand upon compariſons, and our own reputation; ſith it is reaſon God ſhould both chuſe, and bleſſe where he liſts.

To have queſtioned ſo ſudden a victory, had been pardonable: but to deny it ſcornefully, was unworthy of Iſraelites. Carnall men thinke that impoſſible to others, which themſelves cannot doe: From hence are their cenſures, hence their exclamations.

Gideon hath vowed a fearefull revenge, and now performes it; the taunts of his brethren may not ſtay him from the purſuit of the Midianites; common enmities
D muſt firſt be oppoſed, domeſticall at more leaſure. The Princes of Succoth feared the tyranny of the Midianitiſh Kings, but they more feared Gideons victory. What a condition hath their envy drawne them into? That they are ſorry to ſee Gods enemies captive; that Iſraels freedome muſt be their death, that the Midianites and they muſt tremble at one and the ſame Revenger. To ſee themſelves priſoners to Zeba and Zalmunna, had not been ſo fearefull, as to ſee Zeba and Zalmunna priſoners to Gideon. Nothing is more terrible to evill mindes, than to reade their owne condemnation in the happy ſucceſſe of others; Hell it ſelfe would want one piece of his torment, if the wicked did not know thoſe whom they contemned, glorious.

I know not whether more to commend Gideons wiſedome and moderation in the E proceedings, than his reſolution and juſtice in the execution of this buſineſſe. I doe not ſee him run furiouſly into the City, and kill the next; His ſword had not been ſo drunken with blood, that it ſhould know no difference: But he writes down the names of the Princes, and ſingles them forth for revenge.

When the Leaders of God come to Jericho, or Ai, their ſlaughter was unpartiall; not a woman or childe might live to tell newes; but now that Gideon comes to a Succoth, a City of Iſraelites, the Rulers are called forth to death, the people are frighted with the example, not hurt with the judgement. To enwrappe the innocent in any vengeance, is a murderous injuſtice: indeed where all joyne in the ſinne, all are worthy to meet in the puniſhment. It is like, the Citizens of Succoth could have beene glad to ſuccor Gideon, if their Rulers had not forbidden: they must therefore escape, whiles their Princes perish. A

I cannot thinke of Gideons revenge, without horror; That the Rulers of Succoth should have their flesh torne from their backs with thornes and briers, that they should bee at once beaten and scratcht to death: What a spectacle it was to see their bare bones looking some-where thorow the bloody ragges of their flesh and skinne, and every stroke worse than the last; death multiplyed by torment! Justice is sometimes so severe, that a tender beholder can scarce discerne it from cruelty.

I see the Midianites fare lesse ill; the edge of the sword makes a speedy and easie passage for their lives, whiles these rebellious Israelites dye lingring under thornes and briers, envying those in their death, whom their life abhorred. How soever men live or dye without the pale of the Church, a wicked Israelite shall be sure of B plagues. How many shall unwish themselves Christians, when Gods revenges have found them out?

Peni-el The place where Jacob wrestled with God, and prevailed, now hath wrestled against God, and takes a fall; they see God avenged, which would not beleeve him delivering.

It was now time for Zeba and Zalmunna to follow those their troops to the grave, whom they had led in the field: Those which the day before were attended with an hundred thirty five thousand followers, have not so much as a Page now left to weepe for their death, and have lived onely to see all their friends, and some enemies dye for their sakes.

Who can regard earthly greatnesse, that sees one night change two of the great- C est Kings of the World into captives? It had been both pitty and sinne, that the Heads of that Midianitish tyranny, into which they had drawn so many thousands, should have escaped that death.

And yet, if private revenge had not made Gideon just, I doubt whether they had died; The blood of his brothers cals for theirs, and awakes his sword to their execution; He both knew and complained of the Midianitish oppression, under which Israel groaned: yet the cruelty offered to all the thousands of his Fathers sons, had not drawne the blood of Zeba and Zalmunna, if his own mothers sons had not bled by their hands.

He that slew the Rulers of Succoth and Penuel, and spared the people, now hath slaine the people of Midian, and would have spared their Rulers: but that God D which will find occasions to winde wicked men into judgement, will have them slaine in a private quarrel, which had more deserved it for the publike; If we may not rather say, that Gideon revenged these as a Magistrate, not as a brother: For Governours to respect their owne ends in publike actions, and to weare the sword of justice in their owne sheath, it is a wrongfull abuse of authority. The slaughter of Gideons brethren, was not the greatest sin of the Midianitish Kings; this alone shall kill them, when the rest expected an unjust remission. How many lewd men hath God paid with some one sin for all the rest.

Some that have gone away with unnaturall filthinesse, and capital thefts, have clipped off their owne dayes with their coine; Others, whose bloody murders have been punished in a mutinous word; Others, whose suspected felony hath payd the E price of their unknowne rape. O God, thy judgements are just, even when mens are unjust!

Gideons yong son is bidden to revenge the death of his Uncles; His sword had not yet learned the way to blood, especially of Kings, though in Irons: Deadly executions require strength both of heart & face. How are those aged in evil, that can draw their swords upon the lawfully Anointed of God? These Tyrants plead not now for continuance of life, but for the haste of their death; Fall thou upon us. Death is ever accompanied with paine, which it is no marvell if we wish short: We doe not more affect protraction of an easfull life, than speed in our dissolution; for here every pang that tends towards death, renues it: To lie an houre under death, is tedious; but to be dying a whole day, we thinke above the ſtrength of humane patience. O, what [illegible] we then conceive of that death, which knowes no end? As this life is no leſſe frail than the body which it animates; ſo that death is no leſſe eternall than the ſoule which muſt endure it.

For us to be dying ſo long as we now have leave to live, is intolerable; and yet one onely minuit of that other tormenting death, is worſe than an age of this. O the deſperate infidelity of careleſſe men, that ſhrink at the thought of a momentany death, and feare not eternall! This is but a killing of the body; that is a deſtruction of body and ſoule.

Who is ſo worthy to weare the Crowne of Iſrael, as he that wonne the Crowne from Midian? Their Vſurpers were gone, now they are headleſſe; It is a doubt whether they were better to have had no Kings, or Tyrants: they ſue to Gideon to accept of the Kingdome, and are repulſed: There is no greater example of modeſty than Gideon. When the Angel ſpake to him, he abaſed himſelfe below all Iſrael; when the Ephraimits contended with him, he prefers their gleanings to his vintage, and caſts his honour at their feet: and now when Iſrael proffers him that Kingdome which he had merited, he refuſes it. He that in overcomming would allow them to cry, The ſword of the Lord, and of Gideon, in governing, will have none but The ſword of the Lord.

That which others plot, and ſue, and ſweare, and bribe for, Dignity and ſuperiority, he ſeriouſly rejects; whether it were, for that he knew God had not yet called them to a Monarchy; or rather, for that he ſaw the Crowne among thornes? What doe we ambitiouſly affect the command of theſe mole-hils of earth, when wiſe men have refuſed the proffers of Kingdomes? Why doe not we rather labour for that Kingdome which is free from all cares, from all uncertainty?

Yet he that refuſes their Crown, cals for their eare-rings, although not to enrich himſelfe, but religion. So long had God been a ſtranger to Iſrael, that now ſuperſtition goes currant for devout worſhip. It were pitty that good intentions ſhould make any man wicked; here they did ſo. Never man meant better than Gideon in his rich Ephod; yet this very act ſet all Iſrael on whoreing: God had choſen a place and a ſervice of his owne. When the wit of man will bee over-pleaſing God with better devices than his owne, it turnes to madneſſe, and ends in miſchiefe.

ABIMELECS Vsurpation.

Gideon refuſed the Kingdome of Iſrael when it was offered; his ſeventy ſonnes offered not to obtaine that Scepter, which their Fathers victory had deſerved to make hereditary: onely Abimelec the coucubines ſonne, ſues, and ambitiouſly plots for it. What could Abimelec ſee in himſelfe, that hee ſhould over-looke all his brethren? If hee looke to his Father, they were his equals; if to his mother, they were his betters. Thoſe that are moſt unworthy of honour, are hotteſt in the chaſe of it, whilſt the conſcience of better deſerts bids men ſit ſtill, and ſtay to be either importuned, or neglected. There can bee no greater ſigne of unfitneſſe, than vehement ſute. It is hard to ſay, whether there be more pride, or ignorance in Ambition. I have noted this difference betwixt Spirituall and earthly honour, and the Clients of both; wee cannot be worthy of the one without earneſt proſecution; nor with earneſt proſecution worthy of the other: The violent obtaine heaven; onely the meek are worthy to inherit the earth.

That which an aſpiring heart hath projected, it wil find both argument and means to effect. If either bribes or favour will carry it, the proud man will not ſit out. The Shechemites are fit brokers for Abimelec; That City which once betrayed it ſelfe to utter depopulation in yeelding to the ſuit of Hamor, now betraies it ſelfe, and all Iſrael, in yeelding to the requeſt of Abimelec. By them hath this Uſurper made himſelfe a faire way to the Throne. It was an eaſie queſtion, Whether will ye admit of the ſons of Gideon for your Rulers, or of ſtrangers? If of the ſons of Gideon, whether of al, or one? If of one, whether of your own fleſh and blood, or of others unknown? To caſt off the ſons of Gideon for ſtrangers, were unthankfull: To admit of ſeventy Kings in one ſmall Countrey, were unreaſonable; To admit of any other rather than their own kinſman, were unnaturall. Gideons ſons therefore muſt rule amongſt all Iſrael; One of his ſonnes amongſt thoſe ſeventy: and who ſhould bee that one but Abimelec? Natural reſpects are the moſt dangerous corrupters of all elections; What hope can there be of worthy Superiours in any free people, where neerneſſe of blood carries it from fitneſſe of diſpoſition? Whileſt they ſay, He is our brother, they are enemies to themſelves and Iſrael.

Faire words have won his brethren; they the Shechemites; the Shechemites furniſh him with money; money with men; His men begin with murder, and now Abimelec raignes alone; Flattery, bribes and blood, are the uſuall ſtaires of the Ambitious: The money of Baal is a fit hire for murderers; that which Idolatry hath gathered, is fitly ſpent upon Treaſon: One Devill is ready to helpe another in miſchiefe; ſeldome ever is ill gotten riches better imployed. It is no wonder if he that hath Baal his Idoll, now make an Idoll of Honour. There was never any man that worſhipped but one Idoll. Woe be to them that lie in the way of the aſpiring: Though they be brothers, they ſhall bleed; yea, the neerer they are, the more ſure is their ruine. Who would not now think that Abimelec ſhould find an hell in his breſt, after ſo barbarous and unnaturall a maſſacre? and yet behold, he is as ſenſleſſe as the ſtone, upon which the blood of his ſeventy brethren was ſpilt. Where ambition hath poſſeſt it ſelfe throughly of the ſoule, it turnes the heart into ſteele, and makes it uncapable of a conſcience; All ſins will eaſily downe with the man that is reſolved to riſe.

Onely Jotham fell not at that fatall ſtone with his brethren: It is an hard battell were none eſcapes. He eſcapes, not to raigne, nor to revenge; but to be a Prophet, and a witneſſe of the vengeance of God upon the Uſurper, upon the abettors: He lives to tell Abimelec that he was but a bramble, a weed rather than a tree. A right bramble indeed; that grew but out of the baſe hedge-row of a Concubine, that could not liſt up his head from the earth, unleſſe he were ſupported by ſome buſh or pale of Shechem, that had laid hold of the fleece of Iſrael, and had drawne blood of all his brethren; and laſtly, that had no ſubſtance in him, but the ſap of vaine-glory, and the pricks of cruelty. It was better than a Kingdome to him, out of his obſcure Beer, to ſee the fire out of this bramble to conſume thoſe trees; The view of Gods revenge, is ſo much more pleaſing to a good heart, than his owne by how much it is more juſt and full.

There was never ſuch a patterne of unthankfulneſſe, as theſe Iſraelites: They which lately thought a Kingdome too ſmall recompence for Gideon and his ſonnes, now thinke it too much for his ſeed to live; and take life away from the ſonnes of him, that gave them both life and liberty. Yet if this had beene ſome hunderd of yeares after, when time had worne out the memory of Jerub-baal, it might have borne a better excuſe. No man can hope to hold pace with Time; The beſt names may not think ſcorne to be unknowne to following generations: but, ere their Deliverer was cold in his coffin, to pay his benefits (which deſerved to be everlaſting:) with the extirpation of his Poſterite, it was more than ſavage. What can bee looked for from Idolaters? If a man have caſt off his God, he will eaſily caſt off his freinds: When religion is once gone, humanity wil not ſtay long after.

That which the people were puniſhed afterwards for but deſiring, he enjoies. Now is Abimelec ſeated in the Throne which his father refuſed, and no rivall is ſeen to envy his peace. But how long will this glory laſt? Stay but three years, and ye ſhall ſee this this bramble withered, and burnt. The proſperity of the wicked is ſhort and fickle; a ſtolne Crowne (though it may looke faire) cannot be made of any but brittle ſtuffe. All life is uncertaine; but wickedneſſe over-runs nature.

The evil ſpirit thruſt himſelf into the plot of Abimelecs uſurpation and murder, and wrought with the Shechemites for both: and now God ſends the evill ſpirit betwixt Abimelec and the Shechemites, to worke the ruine of each other. The firſt could not have been without God; but in the ſecond, God challenges a part: Revenge is his, where the ſinne is ours. It had been pitty that the Shechemites ſhould have been plagued by any other hand than Abimelecs: They raiſed him unjuſtly to the Throne, they are the firſt that feele the weight of his Scepter. The fooliſh bird limes her ſelfe with that which grew from her owne excretion: Who wonders to ſee the kind Peaſant ſtung with his owne ſnake?

The breach begins at Shechem: his owne Countrey-men flie off from their promiſed allegeance: Though all Iſrael ſhould have falne off from Abimelec, yet they of Shechem ſhould have ſtuck cloſe: It was their act, they ought to have made it good. How ſhould good Princes be honoured, when even Abimelecs once ſetled, cannot be oppoſed with ſafety? Now they beginne to revolt to the reſt of Iſrael. Yet, if this had been done out of repentance, it had been praiſe-worthy; but to be done out of a treacherous inconſtancy, was unworthy of Iſraelites. How could Abimelec hope for fidelity of them, whom he had made and found traitors to his fathers blood? No man knows how to be ſure of him that is unconſcionable: He that hath been unfaithfull to one, knowes the way to be perfidious, and is onely fit for his truſt that is worthy to be deceived: whereas faithfulneſſe, beſides the preſent good, layes a ground of further aſſurance. The friendſhip that is begun in evill, cannot ſtand; wickedneſſe, both of it owne nature, and through the curſe of God, is ever unſteady: and though there be not a diſagreement in hell (being but the place of retribution, not of action) yet on earth there is no peace among the wicked; whereas that affection which is knit in God, is indiſſoluble.

If the men of Shechem had abandoned their falſe god, with their falſe King, and out of a ſerious remorſe, and deſire of ſatisfaction for their Idolatry and blood, had oppoſed this Tyrant, and preferred Jotham to his Throne, there might have been both warrant for their quarrel, and hope of ſucceſſe: but now, if Abimelec be a wicked uſurper, yet the Shechemites are idolatrous Traitors. How could they thinke, that God would rather revenge Abimelecs bloody intruſion by them, than their treachery and Idolatry by Abimelec? When the quarrell is betwixt God and Satan, there is no doubt of the iſſue; but when one divell fights with another, what certainty is there of the victory? Though the cauſe of God had been good, yet it had been ſafe for them to looke to themſelves: The unworthineſſe of the agent many times curſes a good enterprize.

No ſooner is a ſecret diſlike kindled in any people againſt their governours, than there is a Gaal ready to blow the coales; It were a wonder if ever any faction ſhould want an Head; As contrarily, never any man was ſo ill, as not to have ſome favourers: Abimelec hath a Zebul in the midſt of Shechem; Lightly, all treaſons are betrayed even with ſome of their owne; His intelligence brings the ſword of Abimelec upon Shechem, who now hath demoliſhed the City, and ſowne it with Salt. O the juſt ſucceſſions of the revenges of God! Gideons Ephod is puniſhed with the blood of his ſons; the blood of his ſons is ſhed by the procurement of the Shechemites: the blood of the Shechemites is ſhed by Abimelec: the blood of Abimelec is ſpilt by a woman. The retaliations of God are ſure and juſt, and make a more due pedigree, than deſcent of nature.

The purſued Shechemites flie to the houſe of their god Berith; now they are ſafe: that place is at once a fort, and a ſanctuary. Whither ſhould we flie in our diſtreſſe but to our God? And now this refuge ſhall teach them what a God they have ſerved: The jealous God whom they had forſaken, hath them now where he would, and rejoyces at once to be avenged of their god, and them: Had they not made the house of Baal their shelter, they had not died so fearefully. Now, according to the prophecy of Jotham, a fire goes out of the bramble, and consumes these Cedars, and their eternall flames begin in the house of their Berith: the confusion of wicked men, rises out of the false Deities which they have doted on. A

Of all the Conspiratours against Gideons sons, onely Abimelec yet survives, and his day is now comming. His successe against Shechem, hath filled his heart with thoughts of victory; He hath caged up the inhabitants of Tebez within their tower also; and what remaines for them, but the same end with their neighbours? And behold while his hand is busie in putting fire to the door of their tower, which yet was not high (for then he could not have discerned a woman to be his Executioner) a stone from a womans hand strikes his head; His paine in dying, was not so much as his indignation to know by whom he died: and rather will he dye twice than a woman shall kill him. If God had not knowne his stomack so big, he had not vexed him with the impotency of his victor: God finds a time to reckon with wicked men for al the arrerages of their sinnes. Our sins are not more our debts to God, than his Judgements are his debts to our sinnes, which at last he will be sure to pay home. There now lies the greatnesse of Abimelec; upon one stone had he slaine his seventy brethren, and now a stone slaies him; His head had stolne the crowne of Israel, and now his head is smitten: And what is Abimelec better that he was a King? What difference is there between him and any of his seventy brethren whom he murthered, save onely in guiltinesse? They beare but their owne blood; he, the weight of all theirs. How happy a thing is it to live well! that our death, as it is certaine, so may be comfortable: What a vanity is it to insult in the death of them, whom we must follow the same way? B C

The Tyrant hath his payment, and that time which he should have bestowed in calling for mercy to God, and washing his soule with the last teares of contrition, he vainely spends in deprecating an idle reproch; Kil me, that it may not be said he died by a woman: A fit conclusion for such a life. The expectation of true and endlesse torment, doth not so much vex him, as the frivolous report of a dishonor: neither is he so much troubled with Abimelec is frying in hell, as Abimelec is slaine by a woman. So, vaine fooles are niggardly of their reputation, and prodigall of their soules; Doe we not see them runne wilfully into the field, into the grave, into hell? and all, lest it should be said, They have but as much feare as wit.

JEPTHA.

ISrael, that had now long gone a whoring from God, hath beene punished by the regiment of the Concubines sonne, and at last seekes protection from the son of an harlot: It is no small misery to be obliged unto the unworthy. The Concubines son, made sute to them; They make sute to the son of the harlot. It was no fault of Jeptha that he had an ill mother, yet is he branded with the indignity of his bastardy; neither would God conceale this blemish of nature, which Jeptha could neither avoide nor remedy. God, to shew his detestation of whoredome, revenges it not onely upon the actors, but upon their issue: Hence he hath shut out the base sonne from the Congregation of Israel, to the tenth generation, that a transient evill might have a during reproach attending it; and that after the death of the Adulterer, yet his shame might live. But, that God, who justly ties men to his lawes, will not abide that we should tie him to our lawes, or his owne; He can both rectifie and ennoble the blood of Jeptha. That no man should be too much discouraged with the errors of his propagation, even the base son of man may be the lawfully begotten of God; and though he be cast out from the inheritance of his brethren upon earth, may be admitted to the Kingdome of Israel.

I heare no praise of the lawful issue of Gilead; onely this miss-begotten son is commended for his valour, and set at the sterne of Israel: The common gifts of God, respect not the parentage or blood, but are indifferently scattered where he pleases to let them fall. The choice of the Almighty is not guided by our rules; As in spirituall, so in earthly things, it is not in him that willeth. If God would have men glory in these outward privileges, he would bestow them upon none but the worthy.

Now, who can be proud of strength or greatnesse, when he sees him that is not so honest, yet is more valiant, and more advanced? Had not Jeptha been base, he had not been thrust out; and if he had not been thrust out from his brethren, he had never been the Captaine of Israel. By contrary paces to ours, it pleaseth God to come to his owne ends: and how usually doth he looke the contrary way, to that he moves? No man can measure the conclusion of Gods act by his beginning: He that fetches good out of evill, raises the glory of men out of their ruine. Men love to goe the neerest way, and often faile: God commonly goes about, and in his own time comes safely home.

The Gileadites were not so forward to expell Jeptha, as glad to recall him: No Ammonite threatned them when they parted with such an helper: Now, whom they cast out in their peace, they fetch home in their danger and misery. That God, who never gave ought in vaine, will finde a time to make use of any gift that hee hath bestowed upon men: The valour of Jeptha shall not rust in his secrecy, but be imploied to the common preservation of Israel. Necessity wil drive us to seek up al our our helps, even those whom our wantonnesse hath despised. A

How justly are the suits of our need upbraided with the errors of our prosperity! The Elders of Gilead now heare of their ancient wrong, and dare not find fault with their exprobration; Did ye not hate me and expell me out of my Fathers house? How then come yee now to mee in time of tribulation? The same expostulation that Jeptha makes with Gilead, God also at the same time makes with Israel; Ye have forsaken me, and served other gods; wherefore should I deliver you any more? Goe and cry unto the gods whom ye have served. As wee, so God also findes it seasonable, to tell his children of their faults, whiles he is whipping them. It is a safe and wise course, to make much of those in our peace, whom we must make use of in our extremity; else it is but just, that we should be rejected of those, whom we have rejected.

Can we look for any other answer from God than this? Did ye not drive me out B of your houses, out of your hearts, in the time of your health and jollity? Did ye not plead the strictnesse of my charge, and the weight of my yoke? Did not your wilfull sinnes expell me from your soules? What do you now crouching and creeping to me in the evill day? Surely, O God, it is but justice, if thou be not found of those which were glad to lose thee; it is thy mercy, if after many checks and delayes, thou wilt be found at last. Where an act cannot be reversed, there is no amends, but confession; and if God himselfe take up with this satisfaction, He that confesses, shall finde mercy; how much more should men hold themselves well payd with words of humility and deprecation?

Jeptha's wisdome had not been answerable to his valour, if he had not made his match before-hand; Hee could not but know how treacherously Israel had dealt C with Gideon. We cannot make too sure worke when we have to doe with unfaithfull men: It hath been an old policy to serve our selves of men; and after our advantage, to turne them up. He bargaines therefore for his Soveraignty ere he win it, Shall I be your Head? We are all naturally ambitious, and are ready to buy honor even with hazard. And if the hope of a troublesome superiority incouraged Jeptha to fight against the forces of Ammon, what heart should we take in the battels of God against spirituall wickednesses, when the God of Heaven hath said, To him that overcomes, will I give power over nations, and to sit with me in my Throne? O that we could bend our eies upon the recompence of our reward; how willingly should we march forward against these mighty Ammonites! Jeptha is noted for his valor, and yet he D intreats with Ammon, ere he fights. To make war any other than our last remedy, is D not courage, but cruelty and rashnes: And now, when reason will not prevaile, he betakes himselfe to his sword.

As God began the war with Jeptha, in raising up his heart to that pitch of fortitude; so Jeptha began his warre at God, in craving victory from him, and powring out his vow to him: His hand took hold of his sword; his heart of God: therefore he whom the old Testament stiles valiant, the new stiles faithfull; he who is commended for his strength, dares trust in none, but the arme of God: If thou wilt give the Ammonites into my hand. If Jeptha had not lookt upward for his victory, in vaine had the Gileadites lookt up to him. This is the disposition of all good hearts; they looke to their sword or their bow, as servants, not as Patrones; and whilst they use them, trust to God. If we could doe so in all our businesses, we should have both E more joy in their successe, and lesse discomfort in their miscarriage. It was his zeale to vow: it was his sin to vow rashly. Jacob, his forefather, of whom he learned to vow, might have taught him a better forme, If God will be with me, then shall the Lord be my God. It is well with vowes, when the thing promised makes the promise good: But when Jeptha saves, whatsoever thing commeth out of the doores of my house, shal be the Lords, or I will offer it for a burnt sacrifice; his devotion is blind, and his good affection overruns his judgement: For what if a dog, or a swine, or an asse had met him? where had been the promise of his consecration?

Vowes are as they are made; like unto Sents, if they be of ill composition, nothing offends more; if wel tempered, nothing is more pleasant: Either certainty of evil, or uncer-

A uncertainty of good, or impossibility of performance, makes vows no service to God. When we vow what we cannot, or what we ought not doe, we mock God in stead of honouring him: It is a vaine thing for to goe about to catch God hood-winkt: The conscience shall never find peace in any way, but that which we see before us, and which we know safe, both in the kind, and circumstances. There is no comfort in (Peradventure I may please God;) What good childe will not take part of the Parents joy? If Jeptha returne with Trophees, it is no marvell if his daughter meet him with Timbrels: O that we could be so affected with the glorious acts of our heavenly Father! Thou subduest thine enemies, and mightily deliverest thy people, O God; a song waiteth for thee in Sion.

Who would have suspected danger in a dutifull Triumph? Well might Jepthaes B daughter have thought; My sexe forbade me to doe any thing towards the helpe of my Fathers victory; I can doe little, if I cannot applaud it: If nature have made me weake, yet not unthankfull; nothing forbids my joy to be as strong as the victors: Though I might not go out with my father to fight, yet I may meet him with gratulations; A Timbrel may become these hands which were unfit for a sword; This day hath made me the daughter of the Head of Israel; This day hath made both Israel free, my Father a Conquerer, and my selfe in him noble: and shall my affection make no difference? What must my Father needs think, if he shall find me sitting sullenly at home, whiles all Israel strives who shal run first to blesse him with their acclamations? Should I onely be insensible of his and the common happinesse?

And now, behold when she lookes for most thankes, her Father answers the mea- C sures of her feet with the knockings of his breast, and weepes at her musick, and teares his clothes, to looke upon her whom he best loved, and gives no answer to her Timbrels, but Alasse, my daughter, thou art of them that trouble me: Her joy alone hath changed the day, and lost the comfort of that victory, which she injoyed to see wonne. It fals out often, that those times and occasions which promise most contentment, prove most dolefull in the issue: The heart of this virgin was never lifted up so high as now, neither did any day of her life seeme happy but this; and this onely proves the day of her solemne and perpetuall mourning: As contrarily, the times and events which we have most distrusted, prove most beneficiall. It is good in a faire morning, to thinke of that storme that may rise ere night, and to injoy both good and evill fearefully.

D Miserable is that devotion which troubles us in the performance; Nothing is more pleasant than the acts of true piety: Jeptha might well see the wrong of this religion, in the distaste of it; yet whiles himselfe had troubled his daughter, he sayes, Alasse, my daughter, thou art of them that trouble me: She did but her duty: hee did what he should not; yet he would be rid of the blame, though he cannot of the smart. No man is willing to own a sin; the first man shifted it from himselfe to his wife; this, from himselfe to his daughter: He was ready to accuse another which only committed it himself. It were happy if we could be as loth to commit sin, as to acknowledge it.

The inconsideration of this vow was very rough, and setled; I have opened my E mouth, and cannot goe backe. If there were just cause to repent, it was the weakenesse of his zeale, to thinke that a vow could bind him to evill; An unlawfull vow is ill made, but worse performed. It were pitty this constancy should light upon any, but an holy object; No loane can make a truer debt, than our vow; which if we pay not in our performance, God will pay us with judgement. We have all opened our mouthes to God in that initiall and solemne vow of Christianity; Oh that we could not goe backe! So much more is our vow obligatory, by how much the thing vowed is more necessary.

Why was the soul of Jeptha thus troubled, but because he saw the entail of his new honor thus suddenly cut off? he saw the hope of posterity extinguish'd, in the virginity of his daughter. It is natural to us, to affect that perpetuity in our succession, w^ch is denied us in our persons; our very bodyes would emulate the eternity of the soul.

And

And if God have built any of us an houſe on earth, as well as prepared us an houſe in Heaven, it muſt be confeſſed a favour, worth our thankfulneſſe: but as the perpetuity of our earthly houſes is uncertain; ſo let us not reſt our hearts upon that, but make ſure of the Houſe which is eternall in the heavens. A

Doubtleſſe, the goodnes of the Daughter added to the Fathers ſorrow: She was not more loving, than religious; neither is ſhe leſſe willing to be the Lords, than her fathers: and as provoking her Father to that which he thought piety, though to her owne wrong, ſhe ſayes, If thou haſt opened thy mouth unto the Lord, doe with me as thou haſt promiſed. Many a daughter would have diſſwaded her Father with teares, and have wiſht rather her fathers impiety, than her own prejudice; She ſues for the ſmart of her fathers vow. How obſequious ſhould children be to the wil of their careſull Parents even in their final diſpoſition in the world, when they ſee this holy maid willing to abandon the world upon the raſh vow of a Father! They are the living goods of their Parents, and muſt therefore wait upon the beſtowing of their owners: They miſtake themſelves, which thinke they are their owne; If this maid had vowed her ſelfe to God without her Father, it had been in his power to abrogate it; but now that he vowed her to God without her ſelfe, it ſtands in force. But what ſhall we ſay to thoſe children, whom their Parents Vow and Care cannot make ſo much as honeſt; that will be no other than godleſſe, in ſpight of their Baptiſme and Education? What, but that they are given their Parents for a curſe, and ſhall one day find what it is to be rebellious. B

All her deſire is, that ſhe may have leave to bewaile that which ſhe muſt be forced to keep, her virginity: If ſhe had not held it an affliction, there had bin no cauſe to bewaile it; it had been no thank to undergoe it, if ſhe had not knowne it to be a croſſe. Teares are no argument of impatience; we may mourne for that we repine not to beare. How comes that to be a meritorious vertue under the Goſpel, which was but a puniſhment under the Law? The daughters of Iſrael had been too laviſh of their tears, if virginity had been abſolutely good: What injury ſhould it have been to lament that ſpirituall preferment, which they ſhould rather have emulated? C

While Jepthaes daughter was two months in the mountaines, ſhe might have had good opportunity to eſcape her fathers vow; but as one, whom her obedience tyed as cloſe to her father, as his vow tied him to God, ſhe returnes to take up that burden, which ſhe had bewailed to fore-ſee: If we be truly dutifull to our Father in heaven, we would not ſlip our necks out of the yoke though we might, nor flie from his commands, though the dore were open. D

Judg. 13

OF extraordinary perſons, the very birth and conception is extraordinary; God begins his wonders betimes, in thoſe whom he will make wonderfull; There was never any of thoſe which were miraculouſly conceived, whoſe lives were not notable and ſingular. The preſages of the wombe, and the cradle, are commonly anſwered in the life: It is not the uſe of God to caſt away ſtrange beginnings. If Manoahs wife had not beene barren, the Angell had not been ſent to her: Afflictions have this advantage, that they occaſion God to ſhew that mercy to us, whereof the proſperous are uncapable; It would not beſeeme a mother to be ſo indulgent to an healthfull child, as to a ſicke. It was to the woman that the Angell appeared, not to the husband; whether for that the reproach of barrenneſſe lay upon her more heavily, than on the Father, or for that the birth of the childe ſhould coſt her more deare than her husband; or laſtly, for that the difficulty of this newes was more in her conception, than in his generation: As Satan layes his batteries ever to the weakeſt; ſo contrarily, God addreſſeth his comforts to thoſe hearts that have E

moſt

A most need; As at the first, because Eve had most reason to be dejected, for that her sinne had drawne man into the transgression, therefore the Cordiall of God most respecteth her; The seed of the woman shall break the Serpents head.

As a Physician first tels the state of the disease with his symptomes, and then prescribes; so doth the Angell of God, first tell the wife of Manoah her complaint, then her remedy; Thou art barren: All our Afflictions are more noted of that God which sends them, than of the Patient that suffers them: how can it be but lesse possible to indure any thing that he knows not, than that he inflicteth it not? He saith to one, Thou art sicke; to another, thou art poore; to a third, thou are defamed; Thou art oppressed, to another: That All-seeing eye takes notice from heaven of every mans condition, no lesse than if he should send an Angell to tell us he knew it; His B knowledge compared with his mercy, is the just comfort of all our sufferings. O God, we are many times miserable, and feele it not; Thou knowst even those sorrows which we might have; Thou knowest what thou hast done: doe what thou wilt.

Thou art barren. Not that the Angell would upbraid the poore woman with her affliction; but therefore he names her paine, that the mention of her cure might be so much more welcome; Comfort shall come unseasonably to that heart, which is not apprehensive of his owne sorrow: We must first know our evils, ere we can quit them. It is the just method of every true Angell of God, first to let us see that whereof either we doe, or should complaine, and then to apply comforts: Like as a good Physician first puls downe the body, and then raises it with cordials. If we cannot abide to heare of our faults, we are not capable of amendment.

C If the Angell had first said, Thou shalt conceive, and not premised, Thou art barren; I doubt whether she had conceived faith in her soule, of that infant which her body should conceive; Now, his knowledge of her present estate, makes way for the assurance of the future. Thus ever it pleases our good God, to leave a pawne of his fidelity with us; that we should not distrust him in what he will doe, when we finde him faithfull in that which we see done.

It is good reason, that he which gives the sonne to the barren mother, should dispose of him, and diet him both in the wombe first, and after in the world. The mother must first be a Nazarite, that her son may be so. Whiles she was barren, she might drinke what she would: but now, that she shall conceive a Samson, her choice must be limited; There is an holy austerity that ever followes the speciall calling D of God: The worldling may take his full scope, and deny his backe and belly nothing; but he that hath once conceived that blessed burthen, whereof Samson was a type, must be strict and severe to himselfe; neither his tongue, nor his pallat, nor his hand, may runne ryot: Those pleasures which seemed not unseemely for the multitude, are now debarred him. We borrow more names of our Saviour than one; As we are Christians, so we are Nazarites; The consecration of our God is upon our heads, and therefore our very haire should be holy. Our appetite must be curbed, our passions moderated, and so estranged from the world, that in the losse of Parents, or children, nature may not make us forget grace. What doth the loosenesse of vaine men perswade them that God is not curious, when they see him thus precisely ordering the very diet of his Nazarites? Nature pleads for liberty; Reli- E gion for restraint: not that there is more uncleanesse in the grape, than in the fountaine; but that wine finds more uncleanesse in us, than water; and that the high feed is not so fit for devotion, as abstinence. Who sees not a ceremony in this command? which yet carries with it this substance of everlasting use, that God and the belly will not admit of one servant; that quaffing and cramming is not the way to heaven: A drunken Nazarite is a monster among men. We have now more scope than the ancient: not drinking of wine, but drunkennesse with wine is forbidden to the Evangelicall Nazarite; wine, wherein is excesse. Oh that ever Christians should quench the Spirit of God, with a liquour of Gods owne making! that they should suffer their hearts to be drowned with wine, and should so live, as if the practice of the Gospel were quite contrary to the rule of the Law.

The mother must conceive the onely Giant of Israel, and yet must drinke but water; neither must the child touch any other cup. Never wine made so strong a champion as water did here. The power of nourishment is not in the creatures, but in their Maker. Daniel and his three companions kept their complexion, with the same diet wherewith Samson got his strength; he that gave that power to the grape, can give it to the streame. O God, how justly doe we raise our eyes from our tables unto thee, which canst make water nourish, and wine enfeeble us!

Samson had not a better mother, than Manoah had a wife; she hides not the good newes in her owne bosome, but imparts it to her husband: That wife hath learned to make a true use of her head, which is ever ready to consult with him about the messages of God. If she were made for his helper, he is much more hers. Thus should good women make amends for their first offence; that as Eve no sooner had received an ill motion, but she delivered it to her husband; so they should no sooner receive good, than they should impart it.

Manoah (like one which in those lewd times had not lost his acquaintance with God) so soone as he heares the newes, fals downe upon his knees. I doe not heare him call forth and addresse his servants to all the coasts of heaven (as the children of the Prophets did in the search of Elias) to finde out the messenger; but I see him rather looke straight up, to that God which sent him; My Lord, I pray thee let that man of God come againe. As a straight line is the shortest, the neerest cut to any blessing is to goe by heaven; As we may not sue to God, and neglect means, so we must sue to God for those meanes which we shall use.

When I see the strength of Manoahs faith, I marvell not that he had a Samson to his sonne; he saw not the messenger, he heard not the errand, he examined not the circumstances; yet now he takes thought, not whether he shall have a sonne, but how he shall order the son which he must have; and sues to God, not for the son which as yet he had not, but for the direction of governing him, when he should be. Zachariah had the same message, and craving a signe, lost that voyce wherewith he craved it: Manoah seeks no signe for the promise, but counsel for himselfe; and yet, that Angel spake to Zachary himselfe, this only to the wife of Manoah; that, in the Temple, like a glorious spirit; this, in the house, or field, like some Prophet, or Traveller; that to a Priest, this to a Woman. All good men have not equall measures of faith; The bodies of men have not more differences of stature, than their graces: Credulity to men is faulty and dangerous; but in the matters of God, is the greatest vertue of a Christian; Happy are they that have not seen, yet beleeved: True faith takes all for granted, yea for performed, which is once promised.

He that before sent his Angel unasked, will much more send him againe, upon intreaty; those heavenly messengers are ready both to obey their Maker, and to releive his children. Never any man prayed for direction in his duties to God, and was repulsed: rather will God send an Angel from Heaven to instruct us, than our good desires shall be frustrate.

Manoah prayed, the Angel appeared againe; not to him, but to his wife. It had been the shorter way to have come first to the man, whose prayers procured his presence: But as Manoah went directly, and immediately to God, so God comes mediately and about to him; and will make her the meanes to beare the message to her husband, who must beare him the sonne: Both the blessing and the charge are chiefly meant to her. It was a good care of Manoah, when the Angell had given order to his wife alone for the governing of the childs diet, to proffer himselfe to his charge; How shall wee order the childe? As both the Parents have their part in the being of their children, so should they have in their education; it is both unreasonable and unnaturall in husbands to cast this burden upon the weaker vessell alone: it is no reason that she which alone hath had the paine of their birth, should have the paine of their breeding. Though the charge be renued to the wife, yet the speech is directed to the husband; the act must be hers, his must be the over-sight; Let her observe al I commanded her. The head must over-look the body;

A body; it is the duty of the husband, to be carefull that the wife doe her duty to God.

As yet, Manoah saw nothing but the out-side of a man, and therefore offers the Angel an answerable entertainment, wherein there is at once Hospitality and Thankfulnesse. No man shall bring him good newes from God, and goe away unrecompenced; How forward he is to feast him, whom he took for a Prophet! their feet should be so much more beautifull, that bring us newes of salvation, by how much their errand is better.

That Manoah might learn to acknowledge God in this man, he sets off the proffer of his thankfulnesse from himselfe, to God; and (as the same Angel which appeared to Gideon) turnes his feast into a sacrifice: And now he is Manoahs solicitor to
B better thankes than he offered. How forward the good Angels are to incite us unto piety! Either this was the Sonne himselfe, which said it was his meat and drinke to doe his Fathers will, or else one of his spiritual attendance of the same diet. We can never feast the Angels better, than with our hearty sacrifices to God; Why doe not we learne this lesson of them, whom we propound to our selves as patterns of our obedience? We shall be once like the Angels in condition: why are we not in the meane time in our dispositions? If we doe not provoke, and exhort one another to godlinesse, and doe care more for a feast than a sacrifice, our appetite is not Angelicall, but brutish.

It was an honest mind in Manoah, while he was addressing a sacrifice to God, yet not to neglect his messenger; faine would he know whom to honour; True piety is
C not uncivill, but whiles it magnifies the Authour of all blessings, is thankfull to the meanes. Secondary causes are worthy of regard: neither need it detract any thing from the praise of the agent, to honour the instrument. It is not only rudenes, but injustice in those, which can be content to heare good newes from God, with contempt of the bearers.

The Angel will neither take nor give, but conceales his very name from Manoah. All honest motions are not fit to be yeelded to; good intentions are not always sufficient grounds of condiscent. If we doe sometimes aske what we know not, it is no marvell if we receive not what we aske. In some cases, the Angel of God tels his name unasked, as Gabriel to the Virgin; here, not by intreaty: If it were the Angel of the covenant, he had as yet no name but Jehovah: If a created Angel, he had no
D commission to tell his name; and a faithfull messenger hath not a word beyond his charge: Besides that, he saw it would be of more use for Manoah, to know him really, than by words. O the bold presumption of those men, which (as if they had long sojourned in heaven, and been acquainted with all the holy legions of spirits) discourse of their orders, of their titles, when this one Angel stops the mouth of a better man than they, with why doest thou aske after my name, which is secret? Secret things to God; revealed to us and our children. No word can be so significant as actions; The act of the Angel tels best who he was; He did wonderfully: Wonderful therefore was his name. So soon as ever the flame of the sacrifice ascended, he mounted up in the smoake of it; that Manoah might see ths sacrifice, and the messenger be-
E longed both to one God; and might know, both whence to acknowledge the message, and whence to expect the performance.

Gideons Angel vanished at his sacrifice, but this in the sacrifice; that Manoah might at once see both the confirmation of his promise, and the acceptation of his obedience, whiles the Angel of God vouchsafed to perfume himself with that holy smoake, and carry the sent of it up into heaven. Manoah beleeved before, and craved no signe to assure him; God voluntarily confirmes it to him above his desire: To him that hath, shall be given: Where there are be ginnings of faith, the mercy of God will add perfection.

How doe we think Manoah and his wife looked to see this spectacle? They had not spirit enough left to looke one upon another: but in stead of looking up cheerfully to heaven, they fall down to the earth upon their faces; as weake eyes are dazled with that which ſhould comfort them. This is the infirmity of our nature, to be afflicted with the cauſes of our joy; to be aſtoniſhed with our confirmations; to conceive death in that viſion of God, wherein our life and happineſſe conſiſts. If this homely ſight of the Angel did ſo confound good Manoah, what ſhall become of the enemies of God, when they ſhall be brought before the glorious Tribunall of the God of Angels?

I marvell not now, that the Angel appeared both times rather to the wife of Manoah; her faith was the ſtronger of the two. It fals out ſometimes, that the weaker veſſel is fuller; and that of more precious liquor: that wife is no helper, which is not ready to give ſpiritual comfort to her husband. The reaſon was good, and irrefragable, If the Lord were pleaſed to kill us, he would not have received a burnt offering from us. God wil not accept gifts, where he intends puniſhment, and profeſſes hatred. The ſacrifice of the wicked, is an abomination to the Lord. If we can find aſſurance of Gods acceptation of our ſacrifices, we may be ſure he loves our perſons. If I incline to wickedneſſe in my heart, the Lord will not heare me; but the Lord hath heard me.

Samsons Marriage.

Of al the Deliverers of Iſrael, there is none of whom are reported ſo many weakneſſes, or ſo many miracles, as of Samſon. The newes which the Angel told of his conception and education, was not more ſtrange, than the newes of his owne choyce; he but ſees a daughter of the Philiſtims, and fals in love; All this ſtrength begins in infirmity; One maid of the Philiſtims overcomes that Champion, which was given to overcome the Philiſtims: Even he that was dieted with water, found heat of unfit deſires. As his body was ſtrong, notwithſtanding that fare, ſo were his paſſions; without the gift of continency, a low feed may impaire nature, but not inordination. To follow nothing but the eye in the choice of his wife, was a luſt unworthy of a Nazarite; This is to make the ſenſe not a Counſeller, but a Tyran.

Yet was Samſon in this very impotency, dutiful; He did not in the preſumption of his ſtrength, raviſh her forcibly; He did not make up a clandeſtine match without conſulting with his parents, but he makes ſute to them for conſent; Give me her to wife: As one that could be maſter of his owne act, though not of his paſſion; and as one that had learned ſo to be a ſutor, as not to forget himſelfe to be a ſon. Even in this deplored ſtate of Iſrael, children durſt not preſume to be their own carvers; how much leſſe is this tolerable in a wel-guided and Chriſtian Common-wealth? Whoſoever now diſpoſe of themſelves without their Parents, they doe wilfully unchild themſelves, and change naturall affection for violent.

It is no marvell if Manoah and his wife were aſtoniſhed at this unequal motion of their ſon; Did not the Angel (thought they) tell us that this child ſhould be conſecrated to God; and muſt he begin his youth in unholy wedlock? Did not the Angel ſay, that our ſon ſhould begin to ſave Iſrael from the Philiſtims; and is he now captived in his affections by a daughter of the Philiſtims? Shal our deliverance from the Philiſtims begin in an alliance? Have we bin ſo ſcrupulouſly carefull, that he ſhould eate no uncleane thing, and ſhall we now conſent to an Heatheniſh match? Now therefore, they gravely indeavour to cool this intemperate heat of his paſſion, with good counſell; as thoſe which well knew the inconveniences of an unequall yoke; corruption in Religion, alienation of affections, diſtraction of thoughts, connivence at Idolatry, death of zeale, dangerous underminings, and laſtly, an unholy ſeed: Who can blame them, if they were unwilling to call a Philiſtim daughter?

I wiſh Manoah could ſpeak ſo loud, that all our Iſraelites might hear him; Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among al Gods people, that thou goeſt to take a wife of the uncircumciſed Philiſtims? If Religion be any other than a cypher, how

A how dare we not regard it in our most important choice? Is she a faire Philistim? Why is not this deformity of the soule more powerfull to dissuade us, than the beauty of the face, or of metall, to allure us? To dote upon a faire skin, when we see a Philistim under it, is sensuall and brutish.

Affection is not more blinde, than deafe. In vaine doe the parents seeke to alter a young man, not more strong in body, than in will; Though he cannot defend his desires, yet he pursues them; Get her, for she pleases me. And although it must needs be a weak motion that can plead no reason, but appetite; yet the good Parents, sith they cannot bow the affection of their son with perswasion, dare not breake it with violence. As it becomes not children to be forward in their choyce; so parents maynot be too peremptory in their deniall: It is not safe for children to over-
B run parents in setling their affections; nor for parents (where the impediments are not very material) to come short of their children, when the affections are once setled: The one is disobedience; the other may be tyranny.

I know not wether I may excuse either Samson in making this sute, or his parents in yeelding to it, by a divine dispensation in both: For on the one side, whiles the Spirit of God notes, that as yet his parents knew not this was of the Lord, it may seeme that he knew it; and is it likely he would know and not impart it? This alone was enough to win, yea to command his parents; It is not mine eye onely, but the counsell of God that leads me to this choice: The way to quarrell with the Philistims, is to match with them; If I follow mine affection, mine affection followes God, in this project. Surely, he that commanded his Prophet afterwards to marry
C an harlot, may have appointed his Nazarite to marry with a Philistim: On the other side, whether it were of Gods permitting, or allowing, I find not: It might so be of God, as all the evil in the city; and then the interposition of Gods decree, shal be no excuse of Samsons infirmity. I would rather thinke, that God meant onely to make a Treacle of a Viper; and rather appointed to fetch good out of Samsons evil, than to approve that for god in Samson, which in it selfe was evill.

When Samson went on wooing, he might have made the sluggards excuse, There is a Lion in the way: but he that could not be staid by perswasion, will not by feare. A Lion, young, wilde, fierce, hungry, comes roaring upon him, when he had no weapon but his hand, no fence but his strength: the same providence that carried him to Timnah, brought the Lion to him. It hath been ever the fashion of God, to ex-
D ercise his Champions with some initiatory incounters: Both Samson and David must first fight with Lions, then with Philistims; and he whose type they bore, meetes with that roaring Lion of the wildernesse, in the very threshold of his publike charge. The same hand that prepared a Lion for Samson, hath proportionable matches for every Christian; God never gives strength, but he imployes it: Poverty meets one like an armed man; Infamy, like some furious Mastive, comes flying in the face of another: the wild Bore out of the forrest, or the bloody Tiger of persecution sets upon one; the brawling curs of hereticall pravity or contentious neighbourhood, are ready to bait another: and by all these meaner and brutish adversaries, will God fit us for greater conflicts: It is a pledge of our future victory over the spirituall Philistims, if we can say, My soule hath been among Lions. Come
E forth now, thou weak Christian, and behold this preparatory battel of Samson; Dost thou thinke God deals hardly with thee in matching thee so hard, and calling thee forth to so many fraies? What doest thou but repine at thine owne glory? How shouldst thou be victorious without resistance?

If the parents of Samson had now stood behind the hedge, and seene this incounter, they would have taken no further care of matching their sonne with a Philistim; For who that should see a strong Lion ramping upon an unarmed man, would hope for his life and victory? The beast came bristling up his fearefull mane, wafting his raised sterne; his eyes sparkling with fury, his mouth roaring out knels of his last passage, and breathing death from his nostrils, & now rejoiced at so faire a prey. Surely, if the Lion had had no other adversary than him whom he saw, he had not loſt his hope; but now he could not ſee that his Maker was his enimy; The Spirit of the Lord came upon Samſon; What is a beaſt in the hand of the Creator? He that ſtroke the Lions with the awe of Adam, Noah, and Daniel, ſubdued this rebellious beaſt to Samſon; What marvell is it, if Samſon now tore him, as if it had beene a young Kid? If his bones had been braſſe, and his skinne plates of Iron, all had been one: The right hand of the Lord bringeth mighty things to paſſe. A

If that roaring Lion that goes about continually ſeeking whom he may devoure, find us alone among the vineyards of the Philiſtims, where is our hope? Not in our heeles; he is ſwifter than we: not in our weapons; we are naturally unarmed: not in our hands, which are weake and languiſhing; but in the Spirit of that God, by whom we can doe all things: If God fight in us, who can reſiſt us? There is a ſtronger Lion in us, than that againſt us. B

Samſon was not more valiant than modeſt; he made no words of this great exployt: The greateſt performers ever make the leaſt noyſe; He that works wonders alone, could ſay, See thou tell no man; whereas thoſe, whoſe hands are moſt impotent, are buſieſt of their tongues. Great talkers ſhew, that they deſire only to be thought eminent, whereas the deepeſt waters are leaſt heard.

But whiles he concealed his event from others, he pondered it in himſelfe; and when he returned to Timnah, went out of the way to ſee his dead Adverſary, and could not but recall to himſelfe his danger, and deliverance; Here the beaſt met me, thus he fought, thus I ſlew him. The very dead Lyon taught Samſon thankfulnes: there was more honey in this thought, than in the carkaſſe. The mercies of God are ill beſtowed upon us, if we cannot ſtep aſide to view the monuments of his deliverances; Dangers may be at once paſt, and forgotten. As Samſon had not found his honey-combe, if he had not turned aſide to ſee his Lyon; ſo we ſhall loſe the comfort of Gods benefits, if he doe not renew our perils by meditation. C

Leſt any thing ſhould befall Samſon wherein is not ſome wonder, his Lyon doth more amaze him dead than alive; For loe, that carkaſſe is made an Hive; and the bitterneſſe of death is turned into the ſweetneſſe of honey. The Bee a nice and dainty creature, builds her cels in an unſavory carkaſſe; the carkaſſe that promiſed nothing but ſtrength, and annoyance, now offers comfort and refreſhing; and in a ſort, payes Samſon for the wrong offered. Oh the wonderfull goodneſſe of our God, that can change our terrors into pleaſure, and can make the greateſt evils beneficiall? Is any man by his humiliation under the hand of God, growne more faithfull and conſcionable? there is honey out of the Lyon. Is any man by his temptation or fall, become more circumſpect? there is alſo honey out of the Lyon: there is no Samſon, to whom every Lyon doth not yeeld honey: Every Chriſtian is the better for his evils; yea, Satan himſelfe, in his exerciſe of Gods children, advantageth them. D

Samſon doth not diſdaine theſe ſweets, becauſe he finds them uncleanly laid; His diet was ſtrict, and forbad him any thing that favoured of legall impurity; yet he eates the honey-combe out of the belly of a dead beaſt; good may not be refuſed, becauſe the meanes are accidentally evill; Hony is hony ſtill, though in a dead Lyon. Thoſe are leſſe wiſe, and more ſcrupulous than Samſon, which abhorre the graces of God, becauſe they finde them in ill veſſels: One cares not for the Preachers true Doctrine, becauſe his life is evill; Another will not take a good receit from the hand of a Phyſician, becauſe he is given to unlawfull ſtudies; A third will not receive a deſerved contribution from the hands of a Vſurer. It is a weake neglect not to take the hony, becauſe we hate the Lyon: Gods children have right to their fathers bleſſings whereſoever they find them. E

The match is now made; Samſon (though a Nazarite) hath both a wedding, and a feaſt; God never miſliked moderate ſolemnities in the ſevereſt life; and yet this Bridall feaſt was long, the ſpace of ſeven dayes. If Samſon had matched with the beſt Iſraelite, this celebration had beene no greater; neither had this, perhaps, been ſo long, if the cuſtome of the place had not required it. Now I doe not heare him plead his Nazaritiſme for a colour of ſingularity: It is both lawfull and fit, in things not prohibited, to conforme our ſelves to the manners and rites of thoſe with whom we live.

That Samſon might thinke it an honour to match with the Philiſtims, he, whom before the Lyon found alone, is now accompanied with thirty attendants; They called them companions, but they meant them for ſpies. The courteſies of the world are hollow and thankleſſe; neither doth it ever purpoſe ſo il, as when it ſhews faireſt. None are ſo neer to danger, as thoſe whom it entertaines with ſmiles; whiles it frownes, we know what to truſt to; but the favours of it are worthy of nothing but fears and ſuſpition: Open defiance is better than falſe love.

Auſterity had not made Samſon uncivill; he knowes how to entertaine Philiſtims with a formall familiarity: And that his intellectuall parts might be approved anſwerable to his armes, he will firſt try maſteries of wit, and ſet their braines on work with harmeleſſe thoughts; His Riddle ſhall oppoſe them, and a deepe wager ſhall binde the ſolution; Thirty ſhirts, and thirty ſuits of raiment; neither their loſſe, nor their gaine could be much, beſides the victory, being divided unto thirty partners: but Samſons muſt needs be both wayes very large, who muſt give or receive thirty alone. The ſeven dayes of the feaſt are expiring, and yet they which had been all this while devouring of Samſons meat, cannot tel who that eater ſhould be from whence meat ſhould come. In courſe of nature, the ſtrong feeder takes in meat, and ſends out filthineſſe; but, that meat and ſweetneſſe ſhould come from a devouring ſtomack, was beyond their apprehenſion.

And as fooles and dogs uſe to begin in jeſt, and end in earneſt, ſo did theſe Philiſtims; and therefore they force the Bride to intice her husband to betray himſelfe. Covetouſneſſe and Pride, have made them impatient of loſſe: and now they threat to fire her, and her fathers houſe, for recompence of their entertainment, rather than they will loſe a ſmall wager to an Iſraelite. Somewhat of kinne to theſe ſavage Philiſtims, are thoſe cholericke Gameſters, which, if the Dice be not their friend, fall out with God, curſe (that which is not) Fortune; ſtrike their fellowes, and are ready to take vengeance upon themſelves: Thoſe men are unfit for ſport, that loſe their patience together with their wager.

I doe not wonder, that a Philiſtim woman loved herſelfe and her Fathers family, more than an Iſraelitiſh Bride-grome; and if ſhe beſtowed tears upon her husband, for the ranſome of them. Samſon himſelfe taught her this difference, I have not told it my Father or my Mother, and ſhould I tell it thee? If ſhe had not beene as ſhe was, ſhe had neither done this to Samſon, nor heard this from him; Matrimonial reſpects are dearer than naturall; It was the law of him that ordained marriage (before ever Parents were) that Parents ſhould be forſaken for the husband or wife: But now, Iſraelitiſh Parents are worthy of more entireneſſe, than a wife of the Philiſtims: And yet whom the Lyon could not conquer, the tears of a woman have conquered. Samſon never bewrayed infirmity but in uxorioufneſſe: What aſſurance can there be of him that hath a Philiſtim in his boſome? Adam, the perfecteſt man, Samſon, the ſtrongeſt man, Salomon, the wiſeſt man, were betrayed with the flattery of their helpers. As there is no comfort comparable to a faithfull yoke-fellow: ſo woe be to him that is matched with a Philiſtim.

It could not but much diſcontent Samſon, to ſee that his adverſaries had plowed with his Heifer, and that upon his owne backe; now therefore he paies his wager to their coſt. Aſcalon, the City of the Philiſtims, is his wardrobe, he fetches thence thirty ſutes, lined with the lives of the owners: He might with as much eaſe have ſlaine theſe thirty companions, which were the authors of this evill; but his promiſe forbade him, whiles he was to clothe their bodies, to unclothe their ſoules; and that Spirit of God, which ſtirr'd him up to revenge, directed him in the choice of the ſubjects. If we wonder to ſee thirty throats cut for their ſutes, we may eaſily know, that this was but the occaſion of that ſlaughter, whereof the cauſe was their oppreſſion and tyranny. David ſlew two hundred Philiſtims for their fore-skins: but but the ground of this act was their hostility. It is just with God to destine what enemies he pleases, to execution: It is not to be expostulated why this man is stricken rather than another, when both are Philistims.

Samsons Victory.

Judges 15, 1.

I Can no more justifie Samson in the leaving of his wife, than in the chusing her: He chose her, because she pleased him; and because she despised him, he left her. Though her feare made her false to him in his Riddle, yet she was true to his bed: That weake treachery was worthy of a checke, not a desertion. All the passions of Samson were strong, like himselfe: but (as vehement motions are not lasting) this vehement winde is soone allaid; and he is now returning with a Kid, to winne her that had offended him, and to renue that feast which ended in her unkindnesse. Slight occasions may not break the knot of matrimoniall love; and if any just offence have slackned it on either part, it must be fastned againe by speedy reconciliation.

Now Samsons father in law shews himselfe a Philistim, the true parent of her that betrayed her husband; for no sooner is the Bride-groom departed, than he changes his son: What pretence of friendship soever he made, a true Philistim will soon be weary of an Israelite. Samson hath not so many days liberty to enjoy his wedding as he spent in celebrating it: Marriage hath bin ever a sacred Institution, and who but a Philistim would so easily violate it? One of his thirty companions enjoys his wife together with his sute; and now laughs to be a partner of that bed, wheron he was an attendant. The good nature of Samson, having forgotten the first wrong, carried him to a proffer of familiarity, & is repulsed; but with a gentle violence, I had thought thou hadst hated her. Lawful wedlock may not be dissolved by imaginations, but by proofs.

Who shall stay Samson from his owne wife? He that slew the Lion in the way of his wooing, and before whom thousands of the Philistims could not stand, yet suffers himselfe to be resisted by him that was once his father in Law, without any returne of private violence.

Great is the force of duty once conceived, even to the most unworthy: This thought, I was his son, binds the hands of Samson; else how easily migh he, that slew those thirty Philistims for their sutes, have destroyd this family for his wife? How unnaturall are those mouths, that can curse the loines from which they are proceeded; and those hands, that dare lift up themselves against the means of their life and being?

I never read that Samson slew any but by the motion and assistance of the Spirit of God: and the divine wisedome hath reserved these offenders to another revenge. Judgement must descend from others to them, sith the wrong proceeded from others, by them. In the very marriage, God fore-saw and intended this parting, and in the parting this punishment upon the Philistims. If the Philistims had not beene as much enemies to God, as to Samson; enemies to Israel in their oppression, no lesse than to Samson in this particular injury, that purpose and execution of revenge had been no better than wicked: Now he to whom vengeance belongs, sets him on work, and makes the act justice: when he commands, even very cruelty is obedience.

It was a busie and troublesome project of Samson, to use the foxes for his revenge: for not without great labor & many hands could so many wild creatures be got together, neither could the wit of Samson want other devices of hostility: but hee meant to find out such a punishment, as might in some sort answer the offence, and might imply as much contempt, as trespasse. By wiles, seconded with violence, had they wronged Samson, in extorting his secret, and taking away his wife: and what other Embleme could these foxes tyed together present unto them, than wilinesse combined by force to work mischiefe?

These foxes destroy their corn, before he which sent thē, destroy the persons. Those judge-

A judgements which begin in outward things, end in the owners. A ſtranger that had been of neither ſide, would have ſaid, What pity is it, to ſee good corn thus ſpoiled? If the creature be conſidered apart from the owners, it is good; and therfore if it be miſ-ſpent, the abuſe reflects upon the maker of it; but if it be looked upon with reſpect to an il Maſter, the beſt uſe of it, is to periſh. He therefore that ſlue the Egyptian cattell with murrain, and ſmote their fruit with haileſtones; he that conſumed the vines of Iſrael with the Palmer-worme, and Caterpiller, and Canker-worme, ſent alſo Foxes by the hand of Samſon, into the fields of the Philiſtims. Their corne was too good for them to injoy, not too good for the Foxes to burn up: God had rather his creatures ſhould periſh any way, than ſerve for the luſt of the wicked.

There could not be ſuch ſecrecy in the catching of three hundred Foxes, but it B might well be knowne who had procured them: Rumour will ſwiftly flie of things not done: but of a thing ſo notoriouſly executed, it is no marvell if Fame be a blab. The mention of the offence drawes in the provocation: and now the wrong to Samſon is ſcanned and revenged; Becauſe the fields of the Philiſtims are burned for the wrong done to Samſon by the Timnite in his daughter, therefore the Philiſtims burn the Timnite and his daughter. The tying of the fire-brand betweene two Foxes, was not ſo witty a policy, as the ſetting of a fire of diſſention betwixt the Philiſtims. What need Samſon be his own executioner, when his enemies will undertake that charge? There can be no more pleaſing proſpect to an Iſraelite, than to ſee the Philiſtims together by the eares.

If the wife of Samſon had not feared the fire for her ſelf, and her fathers houſe, ſhe C had not betrayed her husband, her husband had not thus plagued the Philiſtims, the Philiſtims had not conſumed her and her father with fire: now ſhe leaps into that flame which ſhe meant to avoid. That evill which the wicked feared, meets them in their flight: How many in a feare of poverty, ſeeke to gaine unconſcionably, and die beggers? How many to ſhunne paine and danger, have yeelded to evill, and in the long runne, have been met in the teeth with that miſchiefe which they had hoped to have left behind them? How many in a deſire to eſchew the ſhame of men, have falne into the confuſion of God? Both good and evill are ſure paymeſters at the laſt.

He that was ſo ſoon pacified towards his wife, could not but have thought this revenge more than enough, if he had not rather weilded Gods quarrel than his own; D He knew that God had raiſed him up on purpoſe, to be a ſcourge to the Philiſtims, whom as yet he had angred more than puniſhed: As if theſe therefore had been but flouriſhes before the fray, he ſtirres up his courage, and ſtrikes them both hip and thigh, with a mighty plague. That God which can doe nothing imperfectly, where he begins either mercy or judgement, will not leave till he have happily finiſhed: As it is in his favours, ſo in his puniſhments; One ſtroke drawes on another.

The Iſraelites were but ſlaves, and the Philiſtims were their Maſters: ſo much more indignely therefore muſt they needs take it, to be thus affronted by one of their owne vaſſals: yet ſhall we commend the moderation of theſe Pagans. Samſon, being not mortally wronged by one Philiſtim, fals foule upon the whole Nation; the Philiſtims hainouſly offended by Samſon, doe not fall upon the whole Tribe of E Judah, but being muſtered together, call to them for ſatisfaction from the perſon offending: The ſame hand of God which wrought Samſon to revenge, reſtrained them from it; It is no thanke to themſelves, that ſometimes wicked men cannot be cruell.

The men of Judah, are by their feare made friends to their Tyrants, and traytors to their friend; It was in their cauſe that Samſon had ſhed blood, and yet they conſpire with the Philiſtims to deſtroy their owne fleſh and blood. So ſhall the Philiſtims be quit with Iſrael, that as Samſon by Philiſtims revenged himſelfe of Philiſtims; ſo they of an Iſraelite, by the hand of Iſraelites. That which open enemies dare not attempt, they worke by falſe brethren; and theſe are ſo much more perilous, as they are more entire.

It

It had been no leſſe eaſie for Samſon to have ſlaine thoſe thouſands of Judah that came to bind him, than thoſe other of the Philiſtims that meant to kill him bound: And what if he had ſaid; Are ye turned traytors to your Deliverer? your blood be upon your own heads: but the Spirit of God (without whom he could not kill either beaſt or man) would never ſtirre him up to kill his brethren, though degenerated into Philiſtims; they have more power to binde him, than he to kill them: Iſraelitiſh blood was precious to him, that made no more ſcruple of killing a Philiſtim, than a Lyon. That bondage and uſury that was allowed to a Jew from a Pagan, might not be exacted from a Jew. A

The Philiſtims that had before plowed with Samſons Heifer in the caſe of the Riddle, are now plowing a worſe furrow with an Heifer more his owne. I am aſhamed to heare theſe cowardly Jews ſay, Knoweſt thou not that the Philiſtims are Lords over us? Why haſt thou done thus unto us? we are therefore come to bind thee. Whereas they ſhould have ſaid; We find theſe tyrannicall Philiſtims to uſurp dominion over us; thou haſt happily begun to ſhake off their yoke, and now we are come to ſecond thee with our ſervice; the valour of ſuch a Captaine ſhall eaſily lead us forth to liberty; we are ready either to die with thee, or be freed by thee: A fearefull man can never be a true friend; rather than incurre any danger, he will be falſe to his owne ſoule. O cruell mercy of theſe men of Judah! we will not kill thee, but we will bind thee, and deliver thee to the hands of the Philiſtims, that they may kill thee. As if it had not beene much worſe to die an ignominious and tormenting death, by the hands of the Philiſtims, than to be at once diſpatch'd by them, which wiſhed either his life ſafe, or his death eaſie. B

When Saul was purſued by the Philiſtims, upon the mountaines of Gilboa, he could ſay to his Armour-bearer, Draw forth thy ſword and kill me, leſt the uncircumciſed come and thruſt me thorow, and mocke me; and at laſt would rather fall upon his owne ſword, than theirs: And yet theſe coſins of Samſon can ſay, we will not kill thee, but we will bind thee, and deliver thee. It was no excuſe to theſe Iſraelites, that Samſons binding had more hope, than his death; It was more in the extraordinary mercy of God, than their will, that he was not tyed with his laſt bonds: Such is the goodneſſe of the Almighty, that he turns the cruell intentions of wicked men to an advantage. C

Now theſe Jewes that might have let themſelves looſe from their owne bondage, are binding their Deliverer, whom yet they knew able to have reſiſted. In the greateſt ſtrength, there is uſe of patience; There was more fortitude in this ſuffering, than in his former actions; Samſon abides to be tyed by his owne countrymen, that he may have the glory of freeing himſelfe victoriouſly. Even ſo, O Saviour, our better Nazarite, thou which couldſt have called to thy Father, and have had twelve Legions of Angels for thy reſcue, wouldſt be bound voluntarily, that thou mighteſt triumph; So the bleſſed Martyrs were racked, and would not be looſed, becauſe they expected a better reſurrection. If we be not as well ready to ſuffer ill, as to doe good, we are not fit for the conſecration of God. D

To ſee Samſon thus ſtrongly manicled, and expoſed to their ful revenge, could not but be a glad ſpectacle to theſe Philiſtims; and their joy was ſo full, that it could not but flie forth of their mouthes in ſhouting and laughter; Whom they ſaw looſe with terror, it is pleaſure to ſee bound. It is the ſport of the ſpirituall Philiſtims, to ſee any of Gods Nazarits fettered with the cords of iniquity; & their Imps are ready to ſay A ha, ſo would we have it. But the event anſwers their falſe joy, with that clauſe of triumph, Rejoyce not over me, O mine enemy: though I fall, yet I ſhall riſe again. How ſoon was the countenance of theſe Philiſtims changed, & their ſhouts turned into ſhrickings? The Spirit of the Lord came upon Samſon; and then, what are cords to the Almighty? His new bonds are as flax burnt with fire; and he rouzes up himſelfe like that yong Lion whom he firſt incountred, and flies upon thoſe cowardly adverſaries, who if they had not ſeen his cords, durſt not have ſeene his face. If they had been ſo many divels as men, they could not have ſtood before the Spirit, which lifted up the E

heart and hand of Samſon. Wicked men never ſee fairer proſpect, than when they are upon the very threſhold of deſtruction; Security and Ruine are ſo cloſe bordering upon each other, that where we ſee the face of the one, we may be ſure the other is at his back. Thus didſt thou, O bleſſed Saviour, when thou wert faſtened to the Croſſe, when thou layeſt bound in the grave with the cords of death; thus didſt thou miraculouſly raiſe up thy ſelfe, vanquiſh thine enemies, and lead Captivity captive; Thus doe all thy holy ones, when they ſeeme moſt forſaken, and laid open to the inſultation of the world, finde thy Spirit mighty to their deliverance, and the diſcomfiture of their malicious adverſaries.

Thoſe three thouſand Iſraelites were not ſo ill adviſed, as to come up into the Rocke unweaponed, to apprehend Samſon; Samſon therefore might have had his choice of ſwords, or ſpeares, for his skirmiſh with the Philiſtims; yet he leaves all the munition of Iſrael, and finding the new jaw-bone of an Aſſe, takes that up in his hand, and with that baſe inſtrument of death, ſends a thouſand Philiſtims to their place. All the ſwords and ſhields of the armed Philiſtims, cannot reſiſt that contemptible Engine, which hath now left a thouſand bodies as dead as the carkaſſe of that beaſt, whoſe bone it was. This victory was not in the weapon, was not in the arme: it was in the Spirit of God, which moved the weapon in the arme. O God, if the meanes be weake, yet thou art ſtrong: Through God we ſhall doe great acts; Yea, I can doe all things through him that ſtrengtheneth me. Seeſt thou a poore Chriſtian, which by weake counſell hath obtained to overcome a tentation? there is the Philiſtim vanquiſh'd with a ſorry jaw-bone.

It is no marvell if he were thus admirably ſtrong and victorious, whoſe bodily ſtrength God meant to make a Type of the ſpirituall power of Chriſt: And behold, as the three thouſands of Judah ſtood ſtil, gazing with their weapons in their hands, whiles Samſon alone ſubdued the Philiſtims; ſo did men and Angels ſtand looking upon the glorious atchievements of the Son of God, who might juſtly ſay, I have trod the wine-preſſe alone.

Both the Samſons complained of thirſt; The ſame God which gave this Champion victory, gave him alſo refreſhing; and by the ſame meanes; The ſame bone yeelds him both conqueſt, and life; and is of a weapon of offence, turned into a Wel of water: He that fetch'd water out of the flint for Iſrael, fetches it out of a bone for Samſon. What is not poſſible to the infinite power of that Almighty Creator, that made all things of nothing? He can give Samſon hony from the mouth of the Lyon, and water from the mouth of the aſſe. Who would not cheerefully depend upon that God, which can fetch moyſture out of drineſſe, and life out of death?

SAMSONS End.

I Cannot wonder more at Samſon ſtrength, than his weakneſſe; Hee that beganne to caſt away his love upon a wife of the Philiſtims, goes on to miſ-ſpend himſelfe upon the harlots of the Philiſtims: He that did not ſo much overcome the men, as the women overcame him. His affections blinded him firſt, ere the Philiſtims could doe it: Would he elſe, after the effuſion of ſo much of their blood, have ſuffered his luſt to carry him within their wals, as one that cared more for his pleaſure, than his life? Oh ſtrange debauchednesſe, and preſumption of a Nazarite? The Philiſtims are up in armes to kill him; he offers himſelfe to their City, to their ſtewes, and dares expoſe his life to one of their harlots, whom hee had ſlaughtered. I would have looked to have ſeen him betake himſelfe to his ſtronger Rock, than that of Etam, and by his auſtere devotion, to ſeek protection of him, of whom he received ſtrength: but now, as if he had forgotten his conſecration, I find him turned Philiſtim for his bed, and of a Nazarite ſcarce a man. In vaine doth he nouriſh nouriſh his haire, whiles he feeds theſe paſſions. How eaſily do vigor of body, & infirmity of mind lodge under one roof? On the contrary, a weakiſh outſide is a ſtrong motive to mortification: Samſons victories have ſubdued him, and have made him firſt a ſlave to lewd deſires, and then to the Philiſtims. I may ſafely ſay, that more veſſels miſcarry with a faire gale, than with a tempeſt.

Yet was not Samſon ſo blinded with luſt, as not [illegible] at all to looke before him; he fore-ſaw, the morning would be dangerous, the bed of his fornication therefore could hold him no longer than midnight; then he riſes, and in a mock of thoſe ambuſhes which the Azzahites layd for him, he carries away the gates wherein they thought to have encaged him. If a temptation have drawne us aſide, to lie downe to ſin, it is happy for us if we can riſe ere we be ſurpriſed with judgement. Samſon had not left his ſtrength in the bed of an harlot; neither had that God which gave it him, ſtript him of it with his clothes, when he laid him downe in uncleanneſſe: His mercy uſes not to take vantage of our unworthineſſe, but even when wee caſt him off, holds us faſt. That bountifull hand leaves us rich of common graces, when we have miſ-ſpent our better ſtore: Like as our firſt Parents, when they had ſpoyled themſelves of the Image of their Creator, yet were left wealthy of noble faculties of the ſoule.

I find Samſon com[illegible] off from his ſinne with ſafety, he runnes away lightly with an heavier weight than the gates of Azzah, the burthen of an il act. Preſent impunity argues not an abatement of the wickedneſſe of his ſinne, or of the diſlike of God: nothing is ſo worthy of pitty, as ſinners peace: Good is not therefore good, becauſe it proſpers, but becauſe it is commanded: Evill is not evill becauſe it is puniſhed, but becauſe it is forbidden.

If the holy Parents of Sampſon lived to ſee theſe outrages of their Nazarite, I doubt whether they did not repent of their joy, to heare the newes of a ſonne. It is a ſhame to ſee how he that might not drinke wine, is drunk with the cup of fornications; His luſt carries him from Azzah, to the plain of Sorek, and now hath found a Dalilah, that ſhall pay him for all his former uncleanneſſe. Sinne is ſteepe and ſlippery, and if after one fall, we have found where to ſtand, it is the praiſe, not of our footing, but of the hand of God.

The Princes of the Philiſtims knew already where Samſons weakneſſe lay, though not his ſtrength; and therefore they would intice his harlot by gifts, to intice him by her dalliance to betray himſelfe. It is no marvell, if ſhe that would be filthy, would be alſo perfidious. How could Samſon chuſe but thinke, if luſt had not bewitched him, ſhe, whoſe body is mercenary to me, will eaſily ſell me to others; She will be falſe, if ſhe will be an harlot. A wide conſcience will ſwallow any ſinne? Thoſe that have once thralled themſelves to a known evil, can make no other difference of ſins, but their own loſſe, or advantage: A lyer can ſteale, a theefe can kill; a cruell man can be a Traytor; a drunkard can falſifie; wickedneſſe once entertained, can put on any ſhape: Truſt him in nothing that makes not a conſcience of every thing.

Was there ever ſuch another motion made to a reaſonable man? Tell me wherein thy great ſtrength lyeth, and wherewith thou mayeſt be bound to doe thee hurt. Who would not have ſpurned ſuch a ſutor out of doores? What will not impudency aske, or ſtupiditie receive? Hee that killed the thouſand Philiſtims for comming to binde him, indures this harlot of the Philiſtims to conſult with himſelfe of binding him; and when upon the tryall of a falſe anſwer, hee ſaw ſo apparant trechery, yet wilfully betrayes his life by her, to his enemies: All ſinnes, all paſſions have power to infatuate a man, but luſt moſt of all. Never man that had drunk flagons of wine, had leſſe reaſon than this Nazarite; Many a one loſes his life; but this caſts it away; not in hatred of himſelfe, but in love to a ſtrumpet. We wonder that a man could poſſibly be ſo ſottiſh, and yet we our ſelves by tentation become no leſſe inſenſate; Sinfull pleaſures, like a common Dalilah, lodge in our boſomes: we know they aime at nothing but the death of our ſoule, we will yeeld to them, and die: Every willing ſinner is a Samſon, let us not inveigh againſt

A gainſt his ſenſleſneſſe, but our own: Nothing is ſo groſſe and unreaſonable to a well diſpoſed mind, which tentation will not repreſent fit, and plauſible: No ſoule can out of his own ſtrength ſecure himſelfe from that ſin which he moſt deteſteth.

As an hood-winck'd man ſees ſome little glimmering of light, but not enough to guide him; ſo did Samſon, who had reaſon enough left him to make trial of Dalilah, by a crafty miſ-information; but not enough upon that triall, to diſtruſt and hate her; he had not wit enough to deceive her thrice, not enough to keep himſelf from being deceived by her. It is not ſo great wiſedome to prove them whom we diſtruſt, as it is folly to truſt them whom we have found trecherous: Thrice had he ſeen the Philiſtims in her chamber, ready to ſurprize him, upon her bonds; and yet wil needs be a ſlave to his Traytor. Warning not taken, is a certaine preſage of deſtruction;
B and if once neglected it receive pardon, yet thrice is deſperate.

What man would ever play thus with his owne ruine? His harlot binds him, and cals in her executioners to cut his throat; he riſes to ſave his own life, and ſuffers them to carry away theirs in peace. Where is the courage of Samſon? where his zeale? He that killed the Philiſtims for their clothes; He that ſlue a thouſand of them in the field at once; in this quarrell, now ſuffers them in his chamber unrevenged. Whence is this? His hands were ſtrong, but his heart was effeminate; his harlot had diverted his affection. Whoſoever ſlackens the reines to his ſenſuall appetite, ſhall ſoon grow unfit for the calling of God. Samſon hath broke the green withies, the new ropes: the woofe of his haire; and yet ſtill ſuffers himſelf fettered with thoſe inviſible bonds of an harlots love, & can indure her to ſay, How canſt thou
C ſay I love thee, when thy heart is not with me? thou haſt mockt me theſe three times: Whereas he ſhould rather have ſaid unto her, How canſt thou challenge any love from me, that haſt this thrice ſought my life? O canſt thou thinke my mocks a ſufficient revenge of this trechery? but contrarily, he melts at this fire; and by her importunate inſinuations, is wrought againſt himſelfe. Wearineſſe of ſolicitation hath won ſome to thoſe actions, which at the firſt motion they deſpiſed; like as we ſee ſome ſutors are diſpatcht, not for the equity of the cauſe, but the trouble of the proſecution, becauſe it is more eaſie to yeeld, not more reaſonable. It is more ſafe to keep our ſelves out of the noyſe of ſuggeſtions, than to ſtand upon our power of deniall.

Who can pitty the loſſe of that ſtrength which was ſo abuſed? Who can pitty him the loſſe of his locks, which after ſo many warnings can ſleep in the lap of Da-
D lilah? It is but juſt, that he ſhould riſe up from thence ſhaven and feeble; not a Nazarite, ſcarce a man. If his ſtrength had lien in his haire, it had been out of himſelf; it was not therefore in his locks, it was in his conſecration, whereof that haire was a ſigne. If the razor had come ſooner upon his head, he had ceaſed to be a Nazarite; and the gift of God had at once ceaſed, with the calling of God; not for the want of that excretion, but for want of obedience. If God withdraw his graces, when he is too much provoked, who can complaine of his mercy? He that ſleeps in ſin, muſt looke to wake in loſſe and weakneſſe. Could Samſon think, Though I tell her, my ſtrength lies in my haire, yet ſhe will not cut it, or though ſhe doe cut my haire, yet ſhall I not loſe my ſtrength: that now he riſes and ſhakes himſelfe in hope of his former vigour? Cuſtome of ſucceſſe makes men confident in their ſins, and cauſes
E them to miſtake an arbitrary tenure for a perpetuity.

His eyes were the firſt offenders, which betrayed him to luſt: and now they are firſt pulled out, and he is led a blind captive to Azzah, where he was firſt captived to his luſt. The Azzahites, which lately ſaw him not without terror, running lightly away with their gates at midnight, ſee him now in his own perpetuall night ſtruggling with his chaines: and that he may not want paine, together with his bondage, he muſt grind in his priſon.

As he paſſed the ſtreet, every boy among the Philiſtims could throw ſtones at him, every woman could laugh and ſhout at him; and what one Philiſtim doth not ſay, whiles he laſhes him unto blood, there is for my brother, or my kinſman whom thou ſleweſt? Who can looke to runne away with a ſinne, when Samſon a Nazarite is thus plagued? This great heart could not but have broken with indignation, if it had not pacified it selfe with the conscience of the just desert of all this vengeance.

It is better for Samson to be blind in prison, than to abuse his eyes in Sorek: yea, I may safely say, he was more blind when he saw licentiously, than now that he sees not. He was a greater slave when he served his affections, than now in grinding for the Philistims. The losse of his eyes, shewes him his sinne; neither could he see how ill he had done, till he saw not.

Even yet, still the God of mercy look'd upon the blindnes of Samson, and in these fetters inlargeth his heart from the worse prison of his sin; his haire grew together with his repentance, and his strength with his haire. Gods merciful humiliations of his owne, are sometimes so severe, that they seeme to differ little from desertions; yet at the worst, he loves us bleeding: and when we have smarted enough, we shall feele it.

What thankfull Idolaters were these Philistims? They could not but know, that their bribes, and their Dalilah, had delivered Samson to them; and yet they sacrifice to their Dagon; and, as those that would be liberall in casting favors upon a senslesse Idol (of whom they could receive none) they cry out, Our god hath delivered our enemy into our hands. Where was their Dagon, when a thousand of his clients were slaine with an Asses jaw? there was more strength in that bone, than in all the makers of this god; and yet these vaine Pagans say, Our god. It is the quality of superstition to misinterpret all events, and to feed it selfe with the conceit of those favours, which are so farre from being done, that their authors never were. Why doe not we learn zeale of Idolaters? And if they be so forward in acknowledgment of their deliverances to a false deity; how cheerfully should we ascribe ours to the true? O God, whatsoever be the means, thou art the Author of all our successe. O that men would praise the Lord for his goodnesse, and tell the wonders that he doth for the sons of men!

No Musician would serve for this feast, but Samson; he must now be their sport, which was once their terror, that he might want no sorrow; scorn is added to his misery: Every wit and hand plays upon him; Who is not ready to cast his bone and his jest at such a captive? So as doubtlesse he wish't himselfe no lesse deafe, than blind, and that his soule might have gone out with his eyes. Oppression is able to make a wise man mad; & the greater the courage is, the more painful the insultation.

Now Samson is punished, shall the Philistims escape? If the judgement of God beginne at his owne, what shall become of his enemies? This advantage shall Samson make of their tyranny, that now death is no punishment to him, his soule shall flie forth in this bitternesse, without paine; and that his dying revenge shall be no lesse sweet to him than the liberty of his former life. He could not but feele God mock'd through him; and therefore whiles they are scoffing, he prayes; his seriousnesse hopes to pay them for all those jests. If hee could have beene thus earnest with God in his prosperity, the Philistims had wanted this laughing stocke. No devotion is so fervent, as that which arises from extremity: O Lord God, I pray thee thinke upon me; O God, I beseech thee strengthen mee at this time onely. Though Samsons haire were shorter, yet he knew Gods hand was not; as one therefore that had yet eyes enow to see him that was invisible, and whose faith was recovered before his strength, he sues to that God, which was a party in this indignity, for power to revenge his wrongs more than his own: It is zeale that moves him, and not malice; his renued faith tels him, that he was destined to plague the Philistims, and reason tels him, that his blindnesse puts him out of the hope of such another opportunity. Knowing therfore, that this play of the Philistims must end in his death, he recollects al the forces of his soule & body, that his death may be a punishment in stead of a disport; and that his soule may be more victorious in the parting, than in the animation: and so addresses himselfe both to die, and kill; as one whose soule shall not feele his owne dissolution, whiles it shall carry so many thousand Philistims with it to the pit. All the acts of Samson are for wonder, not for imitation:

A tion: So diddest thou, O blessed Saviour, our better Samson, conquer in dying, and triumphing upon the chariot of the Crosse, didst lead Captivity captive: The law, sin, death, hell, had never been vanquisht, but by thy death: All our life, liberty, and glory, springs out of thy most precious blood.

MICHAES Idolatry.

THe mother of Micha hath lost her silver, and now she fals to cursing: Iudg. 17. B she did afterwards but change the forme of her god; her silver was her god, ere it did put on the fashion of an image: else she had not so much cursed to lose it, if it had not too much possessed her in the keeping. A carnall heart cannot forgoe that wherein it delights, without impatience; cannot be impatient, without curses: whereas the man that hath learned to injoy God, and use the world, smiles at a shipwrack, and pitties a thiefe, and cannot curse, but pray.

Micha had so little grace, as to steale from his mother: and that out of wantonnesse, not out of necessity; for if shee had not beene rich, so much could not have been stolne from her; and now, he hath so much grace as to restore it; her curses have fetcht againe her treasures: He cannot so much love the money, as he feares her imprecations: Wealth seemes too deare, bought with a curse: C Though his fingers were false, yet his heart was tender. Many that make not conscience of committing sinne, yet make conscience of facing it: It is well for them, that they are but novices in evill. Those whom custome hath fleshed in sinne, can either deny and forsweare, or excuse and defend it; their seared hearts cannot feele the gnawing of any remorse; and their forehead hath learned to be as impudent, as their heart is senslesse.

I see no argument of any holinesse in the mother of Micha: her curses were sin to her selfe; yet Micha dares not but feare them. I know not whether the causlesse curse be more worthy of pitty, or derision; it hurts the Author, not his adversary: but the deserved curses that fall even from unholy mouthes, are worthy to be feared: How much more should a man hold himselfe blasted with the just imprecati- D ons of the godly? What metall are those made of, that can applaud themselves in the bitter curses which their oppressions have wrung from the poore, and rejoyce in these signes of their prosperity?

Neither yet was Micha more stricken with his mothers curses, than with the conscience of sacriledge: so soone as he findes there was a purpose of devotion in this treasure, he dares not conceale it, to the prejudice (as he thought) of God, more than of his mother. What shall we say to the palate of those men, which as they find no good relliſh but in stolne waters; so best in those which are stolne from the fountain of God? How soon hath the old woman changed her note? Even now she passed an indefinite curse upon her sonne for stealing; and now she blesses him absolutely, for restoring; Blessed be my son of the Lord. She hath forgotten the theft, E when she sees the restitution: How much more shall the God of mercies be more pleased with our confession, than provoked with our sin?

I doubt not but this silver, and this superstition came out of Egypt, together with the mother of Micha. This history is not so late in time, as in place; for the Tribe of Dan was not yet setled in that first division of the promised land; so as this old woman had seen both the Idolatry of Egypt, and the golden Calfe in the Wildernesse; and no doubt, contributed some of her earerings to that Deity; and after all the plagues which she saw inflicted upon her brethren for that Idoll of Horeb, and Baal-Peor, she still reserves a secret love to superstition, and now shewes it. Where misreligion hath once possessed it selfe of the heart, it is very hardly cleansed out; but (like the plague) will hang in the very clothes, and after long lurking, breake forth in an unexpected infection; and old wood is the apteſt to take this fire? After all the airing in the deſart, Micha's mother will ſmell of Egypt. A

It had been better the ſilver had been ſtolne than thus beſtowed; for now they have ſo imployed it, that it hath ſtolne away their hearts from God; and yet while it is molten into an image, they think it dedicated to the Lord. If Religion might be judged according to the intention, there ſhould ſcarce be any Idolatry in the world. This woman loved her ſilver enough; and if ſhe had not thought this coſtly piety worth thanks, ſhe knew which way to have imployed her ſtock to advantage. Even evill actions, have oft times good meanings, and thoſe good meanings are anſwered with evill recompences. Many a one beſtowes their coſt, their labour, their blood, and receives torment in ſtead of thanks.

Behold a ſuperſtitious Sonne of a ſuperſtitious Mother; She makes a god, and he harbours it; yea, (as the ſtreame is commonly broader than the head) he exceeds his mother in evill: He hath an houſe of gods, an Ephod, Teraphin; and that he migh be compleat in his devotion, he makes his ſonne his Prieſt, and feoffes that ſinne upon his ſonne, which he received from his Mother. Thoſe ſinnes which nature convayes not to us, we have by imitation. Every action and geſture of the Parents, is an example to the childe: and the mother, as ſhe is more tender over her ſonne, ſo by the power of a reciprocall love, ſhe can worke moſt upon his inclination. Whence it is, that in the hiſtory of the Iſraelitiſh Kings, the mothers name is commonly noted: and as civilly, ſo alſo morally, The birth followes the belly. Thoſe ſonnes may bleſſe their ſecond birth, that are delivered from the ſinnes of their education. B

Who cannot but think how farre Micha over-look'd all his fellow Iſraelites, and thought them profane and godleſſe in compariſon of himſelf? How did he ſecretly clap himſelfe on the breſt, as the man, whoſe happineſſe it was to ingroſſe Religion from al the Tribes of Iſrael, and little can imagine, that the further he runs, the more out of the way. Can an Iſraelite be thus Paganiſh? O Micha! how hath ſuperſtition bewitched thee, that thou canſt not ſee rebellion in every of theſe actions, yea, in every circumſtance rebellion? What, more gods than one? An houſe of gods, beſide Gods houſe? An Image of ſilver to the inviſible God? An Ephod, and no Prieſt? A Prieſt, beſides the family of Levi? A Prieſt of thine owne begetting, of thine owne conſecration? What monſters doth mans imagination produce, when it is forſaken of God? It is well ſeen there is no King in Iſrael. If God had been their King, his lawes had ruled them. If Moſes or Joſhua had been their King, their ſword had awed them. If any other, the courſes of Iſrael could not have been ſo headleſſe. We are beholden to government for order, for peace, for Religion. Where there is no King, every one will be a King, yea, a God to himſelfe. We are worthy of nothing but confuſion, if we bleſſe not God for authority. C D

It is no marvell if Levites wandred for maintenance, while there was no King in Iſrael. The tithes and offerings were their due: if theſe had bin paid, none of the holy Tribe needed to ſhift his ſtation. Even where Royall power ſeconds the claime of the Levite, the injuſtice of men ſhortens his right. What ſhould become of the Levites, if there were no King? And what of the Church, if no Levites? No King therefore, no Church. How could the impotent child live without a Nurſe? Kings ſhall by thy nurſing fathers, and Queens thy nurſes, ſaith God. Nothing more argues the diſorder of any Church, or the decay of Religion, than the forced ſtragling of the Levites. There is hope of growth, when Micha rides to ſeek a Levite; but when the Levite comes to ſeek a ſervice of Micha, it is a ſigne of gaſping devotion. E

Micha was no obſcure man; all Mount Ephraim could not but take notice of his domeſticall gods. This Levite could not but heare of his diſpoſition, of his miſ-devotion; yet want of maintenance, no leſſe than conſcience, draws him on, to the danger of an Idolatrous patronage. Holineſs is not tied to any profeſſion. Happy were it for the Church, if the Clergy could be a previledge from lewdnes: when need meets with unconſcionablenes, al conditions are eaſily ſwallowed of unlawful entrances of wicked

A wicked executions: Ten shekels and a sute of apparell, and his diet, are good wages for a needy Levite. He that could bestow 1100 shekels upon his puppets, can afford but ten to his Priest: so hath he at once a rich Idol, and a beggerly Priest. Whosoever affects to serve God good cheape, shewes, that he makes God but a stale to Mammon.

Yet was Micha a kind patron, though not liberall. He cals the young Levite his father, and uses him as his sonne; and what he wants in meanes, supplies in affection. It were happy, if Christians could imitate the love of Idolaters towards them which serve at the Altar. Micha made a shift with the Priesthood of his owne sonne; yet that his heart checks him in it, appeares both by the change, and his contentment in the change: Now I know that the Lord will be good to mee, seeing I have a Levite to my
B Priest: Therefore, whiles his Priest was no Levite, he sees there was cause why God should not be good to him. If the Levite had not come to offer his service, Michaes sonne had beene a lawfull Priest. Many times the conscience runnes away smoothly with an unwarrantable action, and rests it self upon those grounds, which afterward it sees cause to condemne. It is a sure way therefore to informe our selves throughly ere we settle our choice, that we be not driven to reverse our acts with late shame and unprofitable repentance.

Now did Micha begin to see some little glimpse of his owne error: He saw his Priesthood faulty; he saw not the faults of his Ephod, of his Images, of his gods: and yet (as if he thought all had been well, when he had amended one) he saies, Now
C I know the Lord wil be good to me. The carnall heart pleases it selfe with an outward formality; and so delights to flatter it selfe, as that it thinks, if one circumstance be right, nothing can be amisse.

Israel was at this time extremly corrupted; yet the spies of the Danites had taken notice even of this young Levite, and are glad to make use of his Priesthood. If they had but gone up to Shilo, they might have consulted with the Arke of God: but worldly minds are not curious in their holy services: If they have a god, an Ephod, a Priest, it suffices them: They had rather injoy a false worship with ease, than to take paines for the true: Those that are curious in their diet, in their purchases, in their attire, in their contracts, yet in Gods businesse are very indifferent.

The author of lies sometimes speaks truth for an advantage: and from his mouth this flattering Levite speaks what he knew would please, not what he knew would D fall out: The event answers his prediction, and now the spies magnifie him to their fellowes: Micha's Idoll is a god, and the Levite is his Oracle. In matter of judgement, to be guided only by the event, is the way to error; falshood shall be truth, and Satan an angell of light, if we follow this rule: Even very conjectures sometimes happen right; A Prophet, or a Dreamer, may give a true signe or wonder, and yet himselfe say, Let us goe after other gods. A small thing can winne credit with weake minds, which, where they have once sped, cannot distrust.

The Idolatrous Danites are so besotted with this successe, that they will rather E steale, than want the gods of Micha; and because the gods without the Priests can doe them lesse service, than the Priest without the gods, therefore they steale the Priest with the gods. O miserable Israelites! that could thinke that a god which could be stolne; that could looke for protection from that which could not keep it selfe from stealing; which was won by their theft, not their devotion! Could they worship those Idols more devoutly than Micha that made them? And if they could not protect their maker from robbery, how shal they protect their theeves? If it had been the holy Arke of the true God, how could they think it would blesse their violence, or that it would abide to be translated by rapine and extortion? Now their superstition hath made them mad upon a god, they must have him; by what meanes they care not, though they offend the true God, by stealing a false. Sacriledge is fit to be the first service of an Idol. The spies of Dan had been courteously entertain'd by Micha: thus they rewarded his hospitality. It is no trusting the honesty of Idolaters: if they have once cast off the true God, whom will they respect?

It seemes Levites did not more want maintenance, than Israel wanted Levites: A
Here was a Tribe of Israel without a spirituall guide. The with-drawing of due meanes, is the way to the utter desolation of the Church; Rare offerings make cold Altars. There needed smal force to draw this Levite to chang his charge; Hold thy peace, and come, and be our father and Priest; whether is it better &c. Here is no patience, but joy: He that was won with ten shekels, may be lost with eleven: When maintenance and honour cals him, he goes undriven; and rather steales himselfe away, than is stolne. The Levite had too many gods, to make conscience of pleasing one: There is nothing more inconstant, than a Levite that seeks nothing but himselfe.

Thus the wilde fire of Idolatry, which lay before couched in the private hall of Micha, now flies furiously thorow all the Tribe of Dan; who (like to theeves that B have carried away plaguie clothes) have insensibly infected themselves, and their posterity to death. Heresie and superstition have small beginnings, dangerous proceedings, pernicious conclusions. This contagion is like a canker, which at the first, is scarce visible, afterwards it eates away the flesh, and consumes the body.

The Levites Concubine.

THere is no complaint of a publickly disordered State, where a Levite is not at one end of it, either as an agent, or a patient. In the Idolatry of Micha, and the Danites, a Levite was an actor: In the violent uncleannes of Gibeah, a Levite suffers. No Tribe shall sooner feele the want of government, than that of Levi. Judg. 19

The Law of God allowed the Levite a wife; humane connivence, a Concubine; neither did the Jewish concubine differ from a wife, but in some outward complements; Both might challenge all the true Essence of marriage; so little was the difference, that the father of the concubine is called the father in law to the Levite. She whom ill custome had of a wife made a concubine, is now by her lust, of a concubine made an harlot: Her fornication, together with the change of her bed, hath changed her abode. Perhaps her owne conscience thrust her out of doores, perhaps the just severity of her husband. Dismission was too easie a penalty for that which God had sentenced with death. She that had deserv'd to be abhorred of her husband, seeks shelter from her father. Why would her father suffer his house to be defiled with an adultresse, though out of his own loins? Why did he not rather say, What? Doest thou thinke to find my house an harbor for thy sinne? Whiles thou wert a wife to thine husband, thou wert a daughter to me; Now, thou art neither; Thou art not mine; I gave thee to thy husband; Thou art not thy husbands, thou hast betrayed his bed; Thy filthinesse hath made thee thine own and thine adulterers; Goe seek thine entertainment, where thou hast lost thine honesty; Thy lewdnes hath brought a necessity of shame upon thine abettors; How can I countenance thy person, and abandon thy sin? I had rather be a just man, than a kind Father; Get thee home therefore to thy husband, crave his forgivenesse upon thy knees, redeeme his love with thy modesty and obedience; when his heart is once open to thee, my doores shall not be shut. In the meane time, know, I can be no father to an harlot. Indulgence of Parents is the refuge of vanity, the bawd of wickednesse, the bane of children. How easily is that Theise induced to steale, that knowes his Receiver! When the lawlesnesse of youth knowes where to find pitty and toleration, what mischiefe can it forbeare?

By how much better this Levite was, so much more injurious was the concubines sin. What husband would not have said, She is gone, let shame and griefe goe with her; I shall find one no lesse pleasing, and more faithfull: Or if it be not too much mercy in me to yeeld to a returne, let her that hath offended, seek me: What more direct way is there to a resolved loosenesse, than to let her see I cannot want her? The good nature of this Levite casts off all these termes; and now, after foure monthes absence, sends him to seeke for her, that had run away from her fidelity:

And

And now he thinkes, She ſinned againſt me; perhaps ſhe hath repented; perhaps, ſhame and feare have with-held her from returning; perhaps ſhe will be more loyall, for her ſin: If her importunity ſhould win me, halfe the thankes were loſt; but now, my voluntary offer of favor ſhall oblige her for ever. Love procures truer ſervitude than neceſſity: Mercy becomes well the heart of any man, but moſt of a Levite. He that had helped to offer ſo many ſacrifices to God for the multitude of every Iſraelites ſins, ſaw how proportionable it was, that man ſhould not hold one ſinne unpardonable: He had ſerved at the Altar to no purpoſe, if he (whoſe trade was to ſue for mercy) had not at all learned to practiſe it.

And if the reflexion of mercy wrought this in a ſervant, what ſhal we expect from him, whoſe eſſence is mercy? O God, we doe every day break the holy covenant of our love; We proſtitute our ſelves to every filthy tentation, and then run, and hide our ſelves in our fathers houſe, the world. If thou didſt not ſeeke us up, we ſhould never return; if thy gracious proffer did not prevent us, we ſhould be uncapable of forgiveneſſe. It were abundant goodneſſe in thee to receive us, when we ſhould intreat thee: but lo, thou intreateſt us that we would receive thee. How ſhould we now adore, and imitate thy mercy, ſith there is more reaſon, we ſhould ſue to each other, than that thou ſhouldſt ſue to us; becauſe we may as wel offend, as be offended!

I doe not ſee the womans father make any meanes for reconciliation: but when remiſſion came home to his doors, no man could entertain it more thankfully. The nature of many men is forward to accept, and negligent to ſue for; they can ſpend ſecret wiſhes upon that, which ſhall coſt them no indeavour.

Great is the power of love, which can in a ſort undoe evils paſt, if not for the act, yet for the remembrance. Where true affection was once conceived, it is eaſily pieced againe, after the ſtrongeſt interruption. Here needs no tedious recapitulation of wrongs, no importunity of ſute. The unkindneſſes are forgotten, their love is renued; and now the Levite is not a ſtranger, but a ſon; By how much more willingly he came, by ſo much more unwillingly he is diſmiſſed. The foure months abſence of his daughter is anſwered with foure dayes feaſting; Neither was there ſo much joy in the former wedding feaſt, as in this; becauſe then he delivered his daughter intire; now, deſperate; then he found a ſonne; but now, that ſon hath found his loſt daughter, and he found both. The recovery of any good, is far more pleaſant than the continuance.

Little doe we know what evill is towards us. Now did this old man, and this reſtored couple promiſe themſelves al joy and contentment after this unkind ſtorme; and ſaid in themſelves, Now we begin to live. And now this feaſt, which was meant for their new nuptials, proves her funerall. Even when we let our ſelves looſeſt to our pleaſures, the hand of God (though inviſibly) is writing bitter things againſt us. Sith we are not worthy to know, it is wiſedome to ſuſpect the worſt, while it is leaſt ſeen.

Sometimes it fals out, that nothing is more injurious than curteſie. If this old man had thruſt his ſon and daughter early out of doors, they had avoided this miſchiefe; now, his loving importunity detaines them to their hurt, and his owne repentance. Such contentment doth ſincere affection find in the preſence of thoſe we love, that death it ſelfe hath no other name, but departing. The greateſt comfort of our life, is the fruition of friendſhip, the diſſolution whereof, is the greateſt paine of death: As all earthly pleaſures, ſo this of love, is diſtaſted with a neceſſity of leaving. How worthy is that onely love to take up our hearts, which is not open to any danger of interruption; which ſhall out-live the date even of faith and hope, and is as eternall, as that God, and thoſe bleſſed ſpirits whom we love? If we hang never ſo importunately upon one anothers ſleeves, and ſhead floods of teares to ſtop their way, yet we muſt be gone hence; no occaſion, no force, ſhall then remove us from our fathers houſe.

The Levite is ſtayed beyond his time by importunity; the motions whereof are boundleſſe and infinite; one day draws on another; neither is there any reaſon of this dayes

A dayes ſtay, which may not ſerve ſtill for to morrow. His reſolution at laſt breakes thorow all thoſe kind hinderances; rather will he venture a benighting, than an unneceſſary delay. It is a good hearing that the Levite makes haſte home: An honeſt mans heart is where his calling is; ſuch a one, when he is abroad, is like a fiſh in the ayre; whereinto if it leape for recreation, or neceſſity, yet it ſoone returnes to his owne element. This charge, by how much more ſacred it is, ſo much more attendance it expecteth: Even a day breakes ſquare with the conſcionable.

The Sunne is ready to lodge before them. His ſervant adviſes him to ſhorten his journey, holding it more fit to truſt an early Inne of the Jebuſites, than to the mercy of the night. And if that counſell had been followed, perhaps, they which found Jebuſites in Iſrael, might have found Iſraelites in Jebus. No wiſe man can hold good counſell diſparaged, by the meanneſſe of the Author: If we be glad to receive any treaſure from our ſervant, why not precious admonitions?

B It was the zeale of this Levite, that ſhut him out of Jebus; we will not lodge in the City of ſtrangers. The Jebuſites were ſtrangers in Religion, not ſtrangers enough in their habitation: The Levite will not receive common courteſie from thoſe which were aliens from God, though home-borne in the heart of Iſrael. It is lawfull enough in terms of civility to deale with Infidels; the earth is the Lords, and we may injoy it in the right of the owner, while we proteſt againſt the wrong of the uſurper; yet the leſſe communion with Gods enemies, the more ſafery. If there were another aire to breath in from theirs, another earth to tread upon, they ſhould C have their owne. Thoſe that affect a familiar intimeneſſe with Jebuſites, in converſation, in leagues of amity, in matrimoniall contracts, bewray either too much boldneſſe, or too little conſcience.

He hath no blood of an Iſraelite, that delights to lodge in Jebus: It was the fault of Iſrael, that an heathenish Towne ſtood yet in the navel of the tribes, and that Jebus was no ſooner turned to Jeruſalem: Their lenity and negle& were guilty of this neighbour-hood, that now no man can paſſe from Bethleem Juda to Mount Ephraim, but by the City of the Jebuſites. Seaſonable juſtice might prevent a thouſand evils which afterwards know no remedy but patience.

The way was not long betwixt Jebus and Gibeah: for the Sunne was ſtooping when the Levite was over againſt the firſt, and is but now declined when he comes D to the other. How his heart was lightened, when he entred into an Iſraelitis City! and can thinke of nothing but hoſpitality, reſt, ſecurity. There is no perfume ſo ſweet to a Traveller as his own ſmoake. Both expectation and feare doe commonly diſappoint us; for ſeldome ever doe we injoy the good we looke for, or ſmart with a feared evill. The poore Levite could have found but ſuch entertainment with the Jebuſites. Whither are the poſterity of Benjamin degenerated, that their Gibeah ſhould be no leſſe wicked than populous? The firſt ſigne of a ſetled godleſneſſe, is, that a Levite is ſuffered to lie without doores. If God had been in any of their houſes, his ſervant had not beene excluded. Where no reſpect is given to Gods meſſengers, there can be no Religion.

Gibeah was a ſecond Sodome; even there alſo is another Lot; which is therefore E ſo much more hoſpitall to ſtrangers, becauſe himſelfe was a ſtranger. The Hoſt as well as the Levite is of Mount Ephraim. Each man knows beſt to commiſerate that evill in others, which himſelfe hath paſſed thorow. All that profeſſe the Name of Chriſt are Country-men, and yet ſtrangers here below. How cheerefully ſhould we entertaine each other, when we meet in the Gibeah of this inhoſpitall world?

This good old man of Gibeah came home late from his worke in the fields: The Sunne was ſet ere he gave over; and now, ſeeing this man a ſtranger, an Iſraelite, a Levite, an Ephraimite, and that in his way to the houſe of God, to take up his lodging in the ſtreet, he proffers him the kindneſſe of his houſe-roome. Induſtrious ſpirits are the fitteſt receptacles of all good motions; whereas thoſe which give themſelves to ille and looſe courſes, doe not care ſo much as for themſelves. I heare of but one man at his work in all Gibeah, the reſt were quaffing and revelling. That one man ends his worke with a charitable entertainment; the other end their play in a brutiſh beaſtlineſſe and violence. Theſe villaines had learned both the actions and the language of the Sodomites: One uncleane divell was the prompter to both: and this honeſt Ephraimite, had learn'd of righteous Lot, both to intreat, and to proffer. As a perplexed Mariner, that in a ſtorme muſt caſt away ſomething, although precious; ſo this good Hoſt, rather will proſtitute his daughter a virgin, together with the concubine, than this prodigious villany ſhould be offered to a man, much more to a man of God.

heare

The deteſtation of a fouler ſinne drew him to over-reach in the motion of a leſſer; which if it had been accepted, how could he have eſcaped the partnerſhip of their uncleanneſſe, and the guilt of his daughters raviſhment? No man can waſh his hands of that ſinne, to which his will hath yeelded. Bodily violence may be inoffenſive in the patient; voluntary inclination to evil (though out of feare) can never be excuſeable: yet, behold, this wickedneſſe is too little to ſatisfie theſe monſters.

Who would have looked for ſo extreme abomination from the loins of Jacob, the wombe of Rachel, the ſons of Benjamin? Could the very Jebuſites their neighbours be ever accuſed of ſuch unnaturall outrage? I am aſhamed to ſay it, Even the worſt Pagans were Saints to Iſrael. What availes it that they have the Arke of God in Shilo, while they have Sodom in their ſtreets? that the Law of God is in their fringes, whiles the Divell is in their hearts? Nothing but hell it ſelfe can yeeld a worſe creature than a depraved Iſraelite; the very meanes of his reformation, are the fuell of his wickedneſſe.

Yet Lot ſped ſo much better in Sodome, than this Ephraimite did in Gibeah, by how much more holy gueſts he entertained. There the gueſts were Angels; here a ſinfull man. There the gueſts ſaved the Hoſt; here the Hoſt could not ſave the gueſt from brutiſh violence. Thoſe Sodomites were ſtricken with outward blindneſſe, and defeated: Theſe Benjamites are only blinded with luſt, and prevaile. The Levite comes forth; perhaps, his coat ſaved his perſon from this villany; who now thinkes himſelfe well, that he may have leave to redeeme his owne diſhonour with his concubines. If he had not loved her dearely, he had never ſought her ſo far, after ſo foule a ſinne: Yet now his hate of that unnaturall wickedneſſe overcame his love to her; She is expoſed to the furious luſt of Ruffians, and (which he miſ-doubteth) abuſed to death.

O the juſt and even courſe which the Almighty Judge of the world holds in all his retributions! This woman had ſhamed the bed of a Levite, by her former wantonneſſe; ſhe had thus farre gone ſmoothly away with her ſin, her father harboured her, her husband forgave her, her owne heart found no cauſe to complaine, becauſe ſhe ſmarted not: now, when the world had forgotten her offence, God cals her to reckoning, and puniſhes her with her own ſin. She had voluntarily expoſed her ſelfe to luſt; now is expoſed forcibly. Adultery was her ſinne, adultery was her death. What ſmiles ſoever wickedneſſe caſts upon the heart, whiles it ſollicits; it will owe us a diſpleaſure, and prove it ſelfe a faithfull Debtor.

The Levite looked to find her humbled with this violence, not murthered; and now indignation moves him to adde horror to the fact: Had not his heart been raiſed up with an exceſſe of deſire, to make the crime as odious as it was ſinfull, his action could not be excuſed. Thoſe hands that might not touch a carkaſs, now carve the corps of his own dead wife into morſels, and ſend theſe tokens to al the Tribes of Iſrael; that when they ſhould ſee theſe gobbets of the body murthered, the more they might deteſt the murtherers. Himſelfe puts on cruelty to the dead, that he might draw them to a juſt revenge of her death. Actions notoriouſly villanous, may juſtly countenance an extraordinary meanes of proſecution. Every Iſraelite hath a part in a Levites wrong; No Tribe hath not his ſhare in the carkaſſe and the revenge.

The

The desolation of BENIAMIN.

THese morsels could not chuse but cut the hearts of Israel with horrour and compassion; horrour of the act, and compassion of the sufferer: and now their zeale drawes them together, either for satisfaction, or revenge. Who would not have looked that the hands of Benjamin should have beene first upon Gibeah; and that they should have readily sent the heads of the offenders for a second service after the gobbets of the Concubine? But now, in stead of punishing the sinne, they patronize the actors: and will rather die in resisting justice, than live and prosper in furthering it.

Surely, Israel had one Tribe too many: all Benjamin is turned into Gibeah, the sonnes not of Benjamin, but of Belial. The abetting of evill, is worse than the commission; This may be upon infirmity, but that must be upon resolution. Easie punishment is too much favour to sinne: connivence is much worse: but the defence of it (and that unto blood) is intolerable. Had not these men been both wicked and quarrellous, they had not drawne their swords in so foule a cause. Peaceable dispositions are hardly drawne to fight for innocence: yet these Benjaminites (as if they were in love with villany, and out of charity with God) will be the wilfull Champions of lewdnesse. How can Gibeah repent them of that wickednesse, which all Benjamin will make good, in spight of their consciences? Even where sinne is suppressed, it will rise; but where it is encouraged, it insults and tyrannizes.

It was more just that Israel should rise against Benjamin, than that Benjamin should rise for Gibeah, by how much it is better to punish offenders, than to shelter the offenders from punishing. And yet the wickednesse of Benjamin sped better for the time, than the honesty of Israel. Twice was the better part foyled by the lesse, and worse; The good cause was sent backe with shame: the evill returned with victory and triumph. O God! their hand was for thee in the fight, and thy hand was with them in their fall; They had not fought for thee, but by thee; neither could they have miscarried in the fight, if thou hadst not fought against them; Thou art just and holy in both. The cause was thine: the sinne in managing of it, was their owne. They fought in an holy quarrell, but with confidence in themselves: for, as presuming of victory, they aske of God, not what should be their successe, but who should be their Captaine. Number and innocence made them too secure: It was just therefore with God, to let them feele, that even good zeale cannot beare our presumption; and that victory lies not in the cause, but in the God that ownes it.

Who cannot imagine how much the Benjaminites insulted in their double field, and day? And now began to think God was on their side: those swords which had been taught the way into forty thousand bodies of their brethren, cannot feare a new encounter. Wicked men cannot see their prosperity a peece of their curse, neither can examine their actions, but the events. Soone after, they shall find what it was, to add blood unto filthinesse, and that the victory of an evill cause, is the way to ruine and confusion.

I should have feared, lest this double discomfiture should have made Israel either distrustfull, or weary of a good cause: but still I finde them no lesse couragious, with more humility. Now, they fast, and weep, and sacrifice: These weapons had been victorious in their first assault; Benjamin had never been in danger of pride for overcomming, if this humiliation of Israel had prevented the fight. It is seldome seen, but that which we doe with feare, prospereth; whereas confidence in undertaking, layes even good endeavours in the dust.

Wickednesse could never bragge of any long prosperity, nor complaine of the lacke lack of payment: Still God is even with it at last: Now he paies the Benjaminites both that death which they had lent to the Israelites, and that wherin they stood indebted to their brother-hood of Gibeah: And now, that both are met in death, there is as much difference betwixt those Israelites, and these Benjaminites, as betwixt Martyrs and Malefactors. To die in a sinne, is a fearefull revenge of giving patronage to sinne: The sword consumes their bodies, another fire their Cities, whatsoever became of their soules.

Now might Rachel have justly wept for her children, because they were not; for, behold, the men, women, and children of her wicked Tribe, are cut off; onely some few scattered remainders, ran away from this vengeance, and lurked in caves and rocks, both for feare and shame: There was no difference, but life, betwixt their brethren and them; the earth covered them both: yet unto them doth the revenge of Israel stretch it selfe, and vowes to destroy, if not their persons, yet their succession; as holding them unworthy to receive any comfort by that sex, to which they had been so cruell, both in act and maintenance. If the Israelites had not held marriage and issue a very great blessing, they had not thus revenged themselves of Benjamin: Now, they accounted the with-holding of their wives, a punishment second unto death. The hope of life in our posterity, is the next contentment to an enjoying of life in our selves.

They have sworne, and now upon cold blood repent them. If the oath were not just, why would they take it? And if it were just, why did they recant it? If the act were justifiable, what needed these teares? Even a just oath may be rashly taken: not only injustice, but temerity of swearing ends in lamentation. In our very civill actions, it is a weakneſſe to doe that which we would after reverse; but in our affaires with God, to check our selves too late, and to steepe our oathes in teares, is a dangerous folly. He doth not command us to take voluntary oathes; He commands us to keepe them. If we bind our selves to inconvenience, we may justly complaine of our own fetters: Oathes doe not only require justice, but judgement; wise deliberation, no lesse than equity.

Not conscience of their fact, but commiseration of their brethren, led them to this publick repentance. O God, why is this come to passe, that this day one Tribe of Israel shall want? Even the justest revenge of men is capable of pitty. Insultation in the rigour of Justice, argues cruelty; Charitable minds are grieved to see that done, which they would not wish undone; the smart of the offender doth not please them, which yet are throughly displeased with the sinne, and have given their hands to punish it. God himselfe takes no pleasure in the death of a sinner, yet loves the punishment of sinne: As a good parent whips his childe, yet weeps himselfe. There is a measure in victory and revenge, if never so just; which to exceed, leeses mercy in the suit of Justice.

If there were no fault in their severity, it needed no excuse; and if there were a fault, it will admit of no excuse: yet, as if they meant to shift off the sinne, they expostulate with God; O Lord God of Israel, why is this come to passe this day? God gave them no command of this rigour; yea, he twice croſt them in the execution, and now in that which they intreated of God with tears, they challenge him. It is a dangerous injustice, to lay the burthen of our sins upon him which tempteth no man, nor can be tempted with evill; whiles we would so remove our sin, we double it.

A man that knew not the power of an oath, would wonder at this contrariety in the affections of Israel: they are sorry for the slaughter of Benjamin; & yet they slay those that did not help them in the slaughter. Their oath cals them to more blood: The excesse of their revenge upon Benjamin, may not excuse the men of Gilead: If ever oath might look for a dispensation, this might plead it; now, they dare not but kill the men of Iabesh Gilead, lest they should have left upon themselvs a greater sin of sparing than punishing. Iabesh Gilead came not up to aid Israel, therfore all the inhabitats must die. To exempt our selves (whether out of singularity, or stubbornnes) from the common actions of the Church, when we are lawfully cal'd to them, is an offence worthy of of judgement: In the maine quarrels of the Church neutrals are punished. This execution shall make amends for the former; of the spoile of Jabesh-Gilead, shal the Benjamites be stored with wives: that no man may think these men slain for their daughters, they plainly die for their sinne; and these Gileadites might not have lived, wit hout the perjury of Israel: and now, sith they must die, it is good to make benefit of necessity. I inquire not into the rigour of the oath: If their solemne vow did not bind them to kill all of both sexes in Benjamin, why did they not spare their Virgins? And if it did so bind them, why did they spare the Virgins of Gilead? Favours must be inlarged in all these religious restrictions; Where breath may be taken in them, it is not fit nor safe they should be strainted.

Foure hundred Virgins of Gilead have lost parents and brethren, and kinred, and now finde husbands in lieu of them. An inforced marriage was but a miserable comfort for such a losse: like Wards, or Captives, they are taken, and chuse not. These suffice not; their friendly adversaries consult for more upon worse conditions. Into what troublesome and dangerous straits doe men thrust themselves, by either unjust, or inconsiderate Vowes?

In the midst of all this common lawlesnesse of Israel, here was conscience made on both sides, of matching with Infidels: The Israelites can rather be content their daughters should be stolne by their owne, than that the daughters of aliens should be given them. These men which had not grace enough to detest and punish the beastlinesse of their Gileadites, yet are not so graceless, as to chuse them wives of the Heathen. All but Atheists (howsoever they let themselves loose) yet in some things finde themselves restrained, and shew to others that they have a conscience. If there were not much danger and much sinne in this unequall yoke, they would never have perswaded to so heavy an inconvenience: Disparity of Religion in matrimoniall contracts, hath so many mischiefes, that it is worthy to be redeemed with much prejudice.

They which might not give their owne daughters to Benjamin, yet give others, whiles they give leave to steale them. Stolne marriages are both unnaturall, and full of hazard; for love (whereof marriage is the knot) cannot be forced: this was rather rape, than wedlock. What unlikenesse (perhaps contrariety) of disposition, what aversnesse of affection, may there be in not only a sudden, but a forceable meeting? If these Benjaminites had not taken liberty of giving themselves ease by divorcement, they would often have found leasure to rue this stolne booty: This act may not be drawne to example; and yet here was a kind of indefinite consent: both deliberation, and good liking, are little enough for a during estate, and that which is once done for ever.

These Virgins come up to the feast of the Lord, and now, out of the midst of their dances are carried to a double captivity. How many Virgins have lost themselves in dances? and yet this sport was not immodest. These Virgins danced by themselves, without the company of those which might move towards unchastity; for, if any men had been with them, they had found so many rescuers, as they had assaulters; now, the exposing of their weake sexe to this injury, proves their innocence. Our usuall dances are guilty of more sin; Wanton gestures, and unchast touches, looks, motions, draw the heart to folly: The ambushes of evill spirits carry away many a soule from dances, to a fearefull desolation.

It is supposed, that the parents thus rob'd of their daughters, will take it heavily. There cannot be a greater crosse than the miscarriage of children: They are not onely the living goods, but pieces of their parents; that they should therefore be torne from them by violence, is no lesse injury, than the dismembring of their own bodies.

NAOMI

Naomi and Ruth.

Ruth. 1.

BEtwixt the raigne of the Judges, Israel was plagued with tyranny, and whiles some of them raigned, with famine. Seldome did that rebellions people want somewhat to humble them. One rod is not enough for a stubborne childe: The famine must needes be great, that makes the inhabitants to runne their Countrey. The name of home is so sweet, that wee cannot leave it for a little. Behold, that land which had wont to flow with milke and honey, now abounds with want and penury: and Bethleem in stead of an house of bread, is an house of famine. A fruitfull land doth God make barren, for the wickednesse of them that dwell therein. The earth beares not for it selfe, but for us; God is not angry with it, but with men. For our sakes, is was first cursed to thornes and thistles, after that to moisture, and since that (not seldome) to drought; and by all these to barrennesse. We may not looke alwayes for plenty. It is a wonder, whiles there is such superfluity of wickednesse, that our earth is no more sparing of her fruits.

The whole earth is the Lords, and in him ours. It is lawfull for the owners to change their houses at pleasure. Why should we not make free use of any part of our owne possessions? Elimelech and his family remove from Bethleem Juda unto Moab. Nothing but necessity can dispense with a locall relinquishing of Gods Church; Not pleasure, nor profit, not curiosity. Those which are famished out, God cals, yea, drives from thence. The Creator and possessour of the earth, hath not confined any man to his necessary destruction.

It was lawfull for Elimelech to make use of Pagans, and Idolaters, for the supply of all needfull helps. There cannot be a better imployment of Moabites, than to be the treasurers and purveyors of Gods children: Wherfore serve they, but to gather for the true owners? It is too much niceness in them, which forbeare the benefit they might make of the faculties of profane, or heriticall persons; They consider not that they have more right to the good such men can doe, than they that doe it, and challenge that good for their owne.

But I cannot see, how it could be lawfull for his sonnes to match with the daughters of Moab. Had these men heard how farre, and under how solemne an oath their father Abraham sent for a wife of his owne Tribe, for his sonne Isaac? Had they heard the earnest charge of holy Isaac, to the sonne he blessed, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan? Had they forgotten the plagues of Israel for but a short conversation with the Moabitish women? If they plead remoteness from their owne people; Did they not remember how far Jacob walked to Padan-Aram? Was it further from Moab to Bethleem, than from Bethleem to Moab? and if the care of themselves led them from Bethleem to Moab; should not their care of obedience to God, have as well carried them back from Moab to Bethleem? Yet if their wives would have left their Idolatry with their maiden-head; the match had beene more safe; but now, even at the last farewell, Naomi can say of Orpah, that she is returned to her gods. These men haye sinned in their choyce, and it speedes with them accordingly. Where did ever one of these unequall matches prosper? The two sonnes of Elimelech are swept away childlesse in the prime of their age, and in stead of their seed, they leave their carkasses in Moab, their wives widdowes, their mother childlesse, and helplesse amongst Infidels, in that age which most needed comfort. How miserable doe we now find poore Naomi? which is left destitute of her country, her husband, her children, her friends; and turned loose, and solitary to the mercy of the world: yet even out of these hopelesse ruines will God raise comfort to his servant. The first good newes is, that God hath visited his people with bread; now therefore, since her husband and sonnes were unrecoverable,

she

A shee will try to recover her country, and kindred. If we can have the same conditions in Judah, that we have in Moab, we are no Israelites if we returne not. Whiles her husband and sons lived, I heare no motion of retiring home; now these her earthly stayes are removed, shee thinks presently of removing to her country; Neither can we so heartily thinke of our home above, whiles we are furnished with these worldly contentments; when Gods strips us of them, straight wayes our mind is homeward.

She that came from Bethleem, under the protection of an husband, attended with her sonnes, stored with substance; resolves now to measure all that way alone. Her adversity had stript her of all, but a good heart; that remaines with her, and beares up her head in the deepest of her extremity. True Christian fortitude wades thorow
B all evils; and though we be up to the chin, yet keeps firme footing against the streame: where this is, the sex is not discerned; neither is the quantity of the evill read in the face. How well doth this courage become Israelites, when we are left comfortlesse in the midst of the Moab of this world, to resolve the contempt of all dangers, in the way to our home? As contrarily, nothing doth more mis-beseem a Christian, than that his spirit should flag with his estate, and that any difficulty should make him despaire of attaining his best ends.

Goodnesse is of a winning quality whereseoever it is; and even amongst Infidels will make it selfe friends. The good disposition of Naomi carries away the hearts of her daughters in law with her; so as they are ready to forsake their kindred, their country, yea their owne mother, for a stranger, whose affinity dyed with C her sonnes. Those men are worse than Infidels, and next to Divels, that hate the vertues of Gods Saints; and could love their persons well, if they were not conscionable.

How earnestly doe these two daughters of Moab plead for their continuance with Naomi; and how hardly is either of them disswaded from partaking of the misery of her society! There are good natures even among Infidels, and such as for moral disposition, and civill respects, cannot be exceeded by the best professors. Who can suffer his heart to rest in those qualities, which are common to them that are without God?

Naomi could not be so insensible of her owne good, as not to know how much comfort she might reape to the solitarinesse, both of her voyage, and her wid-
D dow-hood, by the society of these two yonger widdowes, whose affections she had so well tried; even very partnership is a mitigation of evils; yet so earnestly doth shee dissuade them from accompanying her, as that shee could not have sayd more, if she had thought their presence irkesome, and burdenous: Good dispositions love not to pleasure themselves with the disadvantage of others; and had rather be miserable alone, than to draw in partners to their sorrow; for the sight of anothers calamity, doth rather double their owne; and if themselves were free, would affect them with compassion: As contrarily, ill minds care not how many companions they have in misery, nor how few consorts in good; If themselves miscarry, they could be content all the world were inwrapped with them in the same distresse.

E I marvell not that Orpah is by this seasonable importunity perswaded to return; from a mother in law, to a mother in nature; from a toilesome journey, to rest; from strangers, to her kinred; from an hopelesse condition, to liklihoods of contentment. A little intreaty wil serve to move nature to be good unto it selfe: Every one is rather a Naomi to his own soule, to perswade it to stay still, and injoy the delights of Moab, rather than to hazard our entertainment in Bethleem. Will Religion allow me this wilde liberty of my actions, this loose mirth, these carnall pleasures? Can I be a Christian, and not live sullenly? None but a regenerate heart can chuse rather to suffer adversity with Gods people, than to injoy the pleasures of sin for a season.

The one sister takes an unwilling farewell, and moistens her last kisses with many teares: the one cannot bee driven backe, but repels one intreaty with another; Intreat mee not to leave thee; for whither thou goeſt, I will goe; where thou dwelleſt, I will dwell, thy people ſhall be my people, thy God my God, where thou dieſt, I will die, and there will I be buried. Ruth ſaw ſo much upon ten yeares triall, in Naomi, as was more worth than all Moab; and in compariſon whereof, all worldly reſpects deſerved nothing but contempt: The next degree unto godlineſſe is the love of goodneſſe: He is in a faire way to grace, that can value it; If ſhe had not been already a Proſelyte, ſhe could not have ſet this price upon Naomies vertue. Love cannot be ſeparated from a deſire of fruition; In vaine had Ruth proteſted her affection to Naomi, if ſhe could have turned her out to her journey alone; love to the Saints doth not more argue our intereſt in God, than ſociety argues the truth of our love.

As ſome tight veſſell that holds out againſt Wind and Water, ſo did Ruth againſt all the powers of a mothers perſwaſions; The impoſſibility of the comfort of marriage in following her (which drew back her ſiſter in law) cannot move her. She heares her mother, like a modeſt matron (contrary to the faſhion of theſe times) ſay, I am too old to have a husband, and yet ſhee thinkes not on the contrary, I am too young to want an Husband: It ſhould ſeeme, the Moabites had learned this faſhion of Iſrael, to expect the brothers raiſing of ſeed to the deceaſed; The widow-hood and age of Naomi cuts off that hope; neither could Ruth then, dreame of a Boaz that might advance her; It is no love that cannot make us willing to be miſerable for thoſe we affect: The holloweſt heart can be content to follow one that proſpereth: Adverſity is the onely fornace of friendſhip: If love will not abide both fire and anvile, it is but counterfeit; ſo in our love to God, we doe but crack, and vaunt in vaine, if we cannot be willing to ſuffer for him.

But if any motive might hope to ſpeed, that which was drawne from example, was moſt likely; Behold, thy ſiſter in law is gone back unto her people, and to her gods; return thou after her. This one art-leſſe perſwaſion hath prevailed more with the world, than all the places of reaſon: How many millions miſcarry upon this ground; thus did my fore-fathers; Thus doe the moſt; I am neither the firſt, nor the laſt! Doe any of the rulers? We ſtraight think that, either ſafe or pardonable, for which we can plead a precedent. This good woman hath more warrant for her reſolution, than anothers practice: The mind can never be ſteady, whiles it ſtands upon others feet, and till it be ſetled upon ſuch grounds of aſſurance, that it will rather lead than follow; and can ſay with Joſhua, whatſoever become of the world, I and my houſe will ſerve the Lord.

If Naomi had not been a perſon of eminent note, no knowledge had been taken at Bethleem of her return. Poverty is ever obſcure; and thoſe that have little, may go and come without noiſe. If the ſtreets of Bethleem had not before uſed to ſay, There goes Naomi; they had not now asked, is not this Naomi? She that had loſt all things, but her name, is willing to part with that alſo; Call me not Naomi, but call me Marah. Her humility cares little for a glorious name, in a dejected eſtate. Many a one would have ſet faces upon their want, and in the bitterneſſe of their condition, have affected the name of beauty. In all formes of good, there are more that care to ſeeme, than to be: Naomi hates this hypocriſie, and ſince God hath humbled her, deſires not to be reſpected of men. Thoſe which are truely brought downe, make it not dainty that the world ſhould thinke them ſo; but are ready to be the firſt proclaimers of their owne vileneſſe.

Naomi went full out of Bethleem to prevent want; and now ſhe brings that want home with her, which ſhe deſired to avoid. Our blindneſſe oft-times carries us into the perils we ſeek to eſchew: God findes it beſt many times, to croſſe the likely projects of his deareſt children; and to multiply thoſe afflictions, which they feared ſingle.

Ten yeares have turned Naomi into Marah: What aſſurance is there of theſe earthly

A earthly things, whereof one houre may ſtrip us? What man can ſay of the years to come, Thus I will be? How juſtly doe we contemne this uncertainty, and looke up to thoſe riches that cannot but indure, when heaven and earth are diſſolved?

BOAZ and RVTH.

WHiles Elimelech ſhifted to Moab to avoid the famine, Boaz abode ſtill at Bethleem, and continued rich and powerfull: He ſtaid at home, and found that which Elimelech went to ſeek, and miſſed. The judgement B of famine doth not lightly extend it ſelfe to all: Peſtilence and the Sword ſpare none; but dearth commonly plagueth the meaner ſort, and balketh the mighty. When Boaz his ſtore-houſe was empty, his fields were full, and maintained the name of Bethleem. I do not heare Ruth ſtand upon the terms of her better education, or wealthy Parentage; but now, that God hath called her to want, ſhe ſcornes not to lay her hand unto all homely ſervices; and thinks it no diſparagement to find her bread in other mens fields: there is no harder leſſon to a generous mind, nor that more beſeems it, than either to beare want, or to prevent it; Baſe ſpirits give themſelves over to idleneſſe, and miſery, and becauſe they are croſſed, will ſullenly periſh. Ruth 2

That good woman hath not been for nothing in the ſchoole of patience; ſhe hath C learned obedience to a poore ſtep-mother; ſhe was now a widow, paſt reach of any danger of correction; beſides, that penury might ſeeme to diſpenſe with awe. Even children doe eaſily learne to contemne the poverty of their owne parents; Yet hath ſhe inured her ſelfe to obedience, that ſhe wil not ſo much as go forth into the field to gleane, without the leave of her mother in law, and is no leſſe obſequious to Marah, than ſhe was to Naomi. What ſhall we ſay to thoſe children, that in the maine actions of their life, forget they have naturall Parents? It is a ſhame to ſee, that in meane families, want of ſubſtance cauſeth want of duty; and that children ſhould think themſelves priviledged for unreverence, becauſe the Parent is poore. Little doe we know when we go forth in the morning, what God meanes to do with us ere night: There is a providence that attends on us in all our waies, and guids us D inſenſibly to his own ends; That divine hand leads Ruth blind-fold to the field of Boaz: That ſhe meets with his reapers, and fals upon his land amongſt all the fields of Bethleem, it was no praiſe to her election, but the gracious diſpoſition of him, in whom we move; His thoughts are above ours, and doe ſo order our actions, as we, if we had knowne, ſhould have wiſhed. No ſooner is ſhe come into the field, but the reapers are friendly to her; no ſooner is Boaz come into his field, but he invits her to more bounty than ſhe could have deſired; now, God begins to repay into her boſome her love and duty to her mother in law. Reverence and loving reſpects to Parents, never yet went away unrecompenced; God will ſurely raiſe up friends amongſt ſtrangers to thoſe that have been officious at home.

It was worth Ruths journey from Moab, to meet with ſuch a man as Boaz, whom E we find thrifty, religious, charitable; Though he were rich, yet he was not careleſſe; he comes into the field to over-ſee his reapers. Even the beſt eſtate requires carefull managing of the owner; He wanted no officers to take charge of his huſbandry, yet he had rather be his owne witneſſe: After all the truſt of others, the Maſters eye feeds the horſe.

The Maſter of the great houſhold of the world, gives us an example of this care, whoſe eye is in every corner of his large poſſeſſion; Not civility onely, but Religion binds us to good husbandry; We are all ſtewards; and what account can we give to our Maſter, if we never looke after our eſtate? I doubt whether Boaz had been ſo rich, if he had not been ſo frugall: yet was he not more thrifty than religious: He comes not to his reapers, but with a bleſſing in his mouth: The Lord be with you, as one that knew, if he were with them, and not the Lord; his presence could availe nothing. All the businesse of the family speeds the better for the Masters benediction; Those affaires are likely to succeed, that take their beginning at God.

Charity was well matched with his Religion; without which, good workes are but hypocrisy: no sooner doth he heare the name of the Moabitesse, but he seconds the kindnesse of his reapers; and still he rises in his favours: First, she may gleane in his field; then she may drinke of his vessels; then she shall take her meale with his reapers; and part of it, from his owne hand: Lastly, his work-men must let fall sheaves for her gathering. A small thing helpes the needy: an handfull of gleanings, a lap-full of parched corne, a draught of the servants bottles, a loose sheafe was such a favour to Ruth, as shee thought was above all recompence: This was not seen in the estate of Boaz, which yet makes her for the time happy. If we may refresh the soule of the poore with the very offals of our estate, and not hurt our selves, woe be to us if we doe it not. Our barnes shall be as full of curses as of corne, if we grudge the scattered eares of our field to the hands of the needy.

How thankfull doth Ruth take these small favours from Boaz? Perhaps, some rich Jewell in Moab would not haue been so welcome. Even this was a presage of her better estate. Those which shall receive great blessings, are ever thankfull for little; and if poore soules be so thankfull to us, for but an handfull, or a sheafe; how should we be affected to our God for whole fields full, for full barns, full garners?

Doubtlesse, Boaz, having taken notice of the good nature, dutifull carriage, and the neare affinity of Ruth, could not but purchase some greater beneficence, and higher respects to her: yet now onwards he fits his kindnesse to her condition, and gives her that, which to her meannesse seemed much, though he thought it little. Thus doth the bounty of our God deale with us: It is not for want of love, that he gives us no greater measure of grace, but for want of our fitnesse and capacity: He hath reserved greater preferments for us, when it shall be seasonable for us to receive them.

Ruth returnes home wealthy with her Ephah of Barley, and thankfully magnifies the liberality of Boaz, her new benefactor: Naomi repayes his beneficence with her blessing; Blessed be he of the Lord. If the rich can exchange their almes with the poore for blessings, they have no cause to complaine of an ill bargaine. Our gifts cannot be worth their faithfull prayers; therefore it is better to give than to receive; because he that receives, hath but a worthlesse almes; he that gives, receives an unvaluable blessing.

I cannot but admire the modesty and silence of these two women: Naomi had not so much as talked of her kindred in Bethlem, nor til now, had she told Ruth that she had a wealthy kinsman; neither had Ruth inquired of her husbands great alliance; but both sate down meekly with their own wants, and cared not to know any thing else, save that themselves were poore. Humility is ever the way to honour.

It is a discourtesie where we are beholden, to alter our dependancy. Like as men of trade take it ill, if customers which are in their bookes, goe for their wares to another shop. Wisely doth Naomi advise Ruth, not to be seen in any other field, whiles the harvest lasted. The very taking of their favours, is a contentment to those which have already well deserved; and it is quarrell enough that their curtesie is not received. How shall the God of Heaven take it, that whiles he gives and proffers large, we runne to the World, that can afford us nothing but vanity and vexation?

Those that can least act, are oft times the best to advise. Good old Naomi sits still at home, and by her counsell payes Ruth all the love she owes her. The face of that action to which she directs her, is the worst piece of it; the heart was sound. Perhaps, the assurance, which long trial had given her of the good government, and firme

A firme chaſtity of her daughter in law, together with her perſwaſion of the religious gravity of Boaz, made her thinke that deſigne ſafe, which to others had beene perilous, if not deſperate. But beſides that, holding Boaz next of blood to Elimelech, ſhee made account of him as the lawfull husband of Ruth; ſo as there wanted nothing but a challenge, and conſummation. Nothing was abated, but ſome outward ſolemnities (which though expedient for the ſatisfaction of others; yet were not eſſentiall to marriage:) And if there were not theſe colours for a project ſo ſuſpitious, it would not follow, that the action were warrantable, becauſe Naomies. Why ſhould her example be more ſafe in this, than in matching her Sonnes with Infidels; than in ſending backe Orpah to her fathers gods? If every act of an holy perſon ſhould be our rule, we ſhould B have crooked lives: Every action that is reported, is not ſtraight wayes allowed. Our courſes were very uncertaine, if God had not given us rules, whereby we may examine the examples of the beſt Saints, and as well cenſure, as follow them. Let them that ſtumble at the boldneſſe of Ruth, imitate the continence of Boaz.

Theſe times were not delicate. This man (though great in Bethleem) layes him down to reſt upon a pallat, in the floor of his barne; when he awakes at midnight, no marvel if he were amazed to find himſelfe accompanied; yet, though his heart were cheared with wine, the place ſolitary, the night ſilent, the perſon comly, the invitation plauſible, could he not be drawne to a raſh act of luſt; His appetite could not get the victory of reaſon, though it had wine and opportunity to helpe it. Herein Boaz C ſhewed himſelf a great maſter of his affections, that he was able to reſiſt a fit tentation. It is no thank to many, that they are free of ſome evils; perhaps they wanted not will, but convenience. But if a man, when he is fitted with all helps to his ſin, can repell the pleaſure of ſin, out of conſcience; this is true fortitude.

In ſtead of touching her as a wanton, he bleſſes her as a father, incourageth her as a friend, promiſeth her as a kinſman, rewards her as a patron, and ſends her away laden with hopes, and gifts; no leſſe chaſte, more happy than ſhe came. O admirable temperance worthy the proginitor of him, in whoſe lips and heart was no guile!

If Boaz had been the next kinſman, the marriage had needed no protraction, but now that his conſcience told him, that Ruth was the right of another, it had not been more ſenſuality than injuſtice, to have touched his kinſwoman. It was not any bodily D impotency, but honeſty & conſcience that reſtrained Boaz; for the very next night ſhe conceived by him; that good man wiſhed his marriage bed holy, & durſt not lie downe in the doubt of a ſinne. Many a man is honeſt out of neceſſity, and affects the praiſe of that, which he could not avoid; but that mans minde is ſtill an adulterer, in the forced continence of his body. No action can give us true comfort, but that which we doe out of the grounds of obedience.

Thoſe which are fearefull of ſinning, are careful not to be thought to ſin. Boaz, though he knew himſelf to be cleare, would not have occaſion of ſuſpition given to others; (Let no man know that a woman came into the floore:) A good heart is no leſſe afraid of a ſcandall, than of a ſin; whereas thoſe that are reſolved not to make any ſcruple of ſin, deſpiſe others conſtructions, not caring whom they offend, ſo that E they may pleaſe themſelves. That Naomi might ſee her daughter in law was not ſent back in diſlike, ſhe comes home laden with corn; Ruth hath gleaned more this night, than in halfe the harveſt. The care of Boaz was, that ſhe would not returne to her mother empty: Love whereſoever it is, cannot be niggardly. We meaſure the love of God by his gifts; How ſhall he abide to ſend us away empty from thoſe treaſures of goodneſſe!

Boaz is reſtleſſe in the proſecution of this ſuit; and hies him from his threſhing-floore, to the gate, and there convents the neerer kinſman before the Elders of the city: what was it that made Boaz ſo ready to entertain, ſo forward to urge this match? Wealth ſhe had none, not ſo much as bread, but what ſhe gleaned out of the field: Friends ſhee had none, and thoſe ſhee had elſewhere, Moabites: Beauty ſhee could not have much after that ſcorching in her travel, in her gleanings; Himſelf tels her, what drew his heart to her, (All the City of my people doth know that thou art a vertuous woman) Vertue in whomſoever it is found, is a great dowry; and where it meets with an heart that knowes how to value it, is accounted greater riches than al that is hid in the bowels of the earth. The corne heape of Boaz was but chaffe to this, and his money droſſe.

As a man that had learned to ſquare his actions to the law of God, Boaz proceeds legally with his rivall; and tels him of a parcel of Elimelechs land (which, it is like, upon his removal to Moab, he had alienated;) which he (as the next kinſman) might have power to redeeme; yet ſo as he muſt purchaſe the wife of the deceaſed with the land. Every kinſman is not a Boaz; the man could liſten to the land, if it had been free from the clog of a neceſſary marriage; but now he will rather leave the land, than take the wife, leſt whiles he ſhould preſerve Elimelechs inheritance, he ſhould deſtroy his owne; for the next ſeed, which he ſhould have by Ruth, ſhould not be his heire, but his deceaſed kinſmans; How knew he whether God might not by that wife, ſend heires enough for both their eſtates? rather had he therefore incurre a manifeſt injuſtice, than hazard the danger of his inheritance. The Law of God bound him to raiſe up ſeed to the next in blood; the care of his inheritance drawes him to a neglect of his duty, though with infamy and reproach; and now he had rather his face ſhould be ſpit upon, and his name ſhould be called The houſe of him whoſe ſhoo was pulled off, than to reſerve the honour of him, that did his brother right, to his owne prejudice.

How many are there, that doe ſo over-love their iſſue, as that they regard neither ſinne nor ſhame in advancing it? And that will rather indanger their ſoule, than loſe their name? It is a wofull inheritance that makes men heirs of the vengeance of God. Boaz is glad to take the advantage of his refuſall; and holds that ſhoo (which was the ſigne of his tenure) more worth than all the land of Elimelech. And whereas other wives purchaſe their husbands with a large dowry, this man purchaſeth his wife at a deare rate, and thinks his bargaine happy. All the ſubſtance of the earth, is not worth a vertuous and prudent wife; which Boaz doth now ſo rejoyce in, as if he this day only began to be wealthy.

Now is Ruth taken into the houſe of Boaz; ſhe that before had ſaid, ſhe was not like one of his maidens, is now become their Miſtreſſe. This day ſhe hath gleaned all the fields and barnes of a rich husband; and (that there might be no want in her happineſſe) by a gracious husband ſhe hath gained an happy ſeed; and hath the honour, above all the Dames of Iſrael, to be the great grand-mother of a King, of David, of the Meſſiah.

Now is Marah turned back againe to Naomi; and Orpah, if ſhe heare of this in Moab, cannot but envy at her ſiſters happineſſe. O the ſure and bountifull paiments of the Almighty! Who ever came under his wing in vaine? Who ever loſt by truſting him? Who ever forſook the Moab of this World for the true Iſrael, and did not at laſt rejoyce in the change?

Anna and Peninna.

1 Sam. 1. 4.

ALL cuſtomes, where they are once entertained, are not eaſily diſcharged; Polygamy, beſides carnall delight, might now plead age and example: ſo as even Elkanah (though a Levite) is tainted with the ſinne of Lamech; Like as faſhions of attire, which at the firſt were diſliked as uncomely, yet when they are once growne common, are taken up of the graveſt. Yet this ſinne (as then currant with the time) could not make Elkanah not religious. The Houſe of God in Shilo was duly frequented of him; often times, alone, in his ordinary courſe of attendance; with all his males, thrice

A thrice a yeare; and once a yeare with all his family. The continuance of an unknowne ſinne cannot hinder the uprightneſſe of a mans heart with God; as a man may have a mole upon his backe, and yet thinke his skinne cleare; the leaſt touch of knowledge or wiſulneſſe marres his ſincerity.

He that by vertue of his place was imployed about the ſacrifices of others, would much leſſe neglect his owne. It is a ſhame for him that teaches Gods people that they ſhould not appeare before the Lord empty, to bring no ſacrifice for himſelfe. If Levites be profane, who ſhould be religious?

It was the faſhion, when they ſacrificed, to feaſt; ſo did Elkanah; the day of his devotion is the day of his triumph; he makes great cheere for his whole family, even for that wife which he loved leſſe. There is nothing more comely than cherfulneſſe
B in the ſervices of God. What is there in all the world, wherewith the heart of man ſhould be ſo lift up, as with the conſcience of his duty done to his Maker? Whiles we doe ſo, God doth to us, as our glaſſe, ſmile upon us, while we ſmile on him.

Love will be ſeene by entertainment; Peninna and her children ſhall not complaine of want, but Anna ſhall find her husbands affection in her portion: as his love to her was double, ſo was her part; She fared not the worſe, becauſe ſhe was childleſſe: no good husband will diſlike his wife for a fault out of the power of her redreſſe: yea, rather, that which might ſeeme to loſe the love of her husband, winnes it, her barrenneſſe. The good nature of Elkanah laboured by his deare reſpects to recompence this affliction, that ſo ſhe might find no leſſe diſcontentment in the fruit of his hearty love, than ſhe had grief from her own fruitleſneſſe. It is the
C property of true mercy, to be moſt favorable to the weakeſt: Thus doth the gracious Spouſe of the Chriſtian ſoule pitty the barrenneſſe of his ſervants. O Saviour, we ſhould not find thee ſo indulgent to us, if we did not complain of our owne unworthineſſe. Peninna may have the more children, but barren Anna hath the moſt love. How much rather could Elkanah have wiſhed Peninna barren, and Anna fruitfull? but if ſhe ſhould have had both iſſue and love, ſhe had been proud, and her rivall deſpiſed. God knowes how to diſperſe his favours ſo, that every one may have cauſe both of thankfulneſſe and humiliation; whiles there is no one that hath all, no one but hath ſome: If envy and contempt were not thus equally tempered, ſome would be over haughty, and others too miſerable; But now, every man ſees that in himſelfe which is worthy of contempt, and matter of emulation in others; and con-
D trarily, ſees what to pitty, and diſlike in the moſt eminent, and what to applaud in himſelfe; and out of this contrariety, ariſes a ſweet mean of contentation.

The love of Elkanah is ſo unable to free Anna from the wrongs of her rival, that it procures them rather. The unfruitfulnes of Anna had never with ſo much deſpight beene laid in her diſh, if her husbands heart had beene as barren of love to her. Envy, though it take advantage of our weakneſſes, yet is ever raiſed upon ſome grounds of happineſſe in them whom it emulates; it is ever an ill effect of a good cauſe: If Abels ſacrifice had not been accepted, and if the acceptation of his ſacrifice had not been a bleſſing, no envy had followed upon it.

There is no evill of another, wherein it is fit to rejoyce, but his envy, and this is worthy of our joy and thankfulneſſe, becauſe it ſhewes us the price of that good,
E which wee had, and valued not. The malignity of envy is thus well anſwered, when it is made the evill cauſe of a good effect to us, when God and our ſoules may gaine by anothers ſinne. I doe not find that Anna inſulted upon Peninna, for the greater meaſure of her husbands love, as Peninna did upon her, for her fruitfulnes. Thoſe that are truely gracious, know how to receive the bleſſings of God without contempt of them that want; and have learned to be thankefull, without overlineſſe.

Envy, when it is once conceived in a malicious heart, is like fire in billets of Juniper, which (they ſay) continues more yeares than one. Every yeare was Anna thus vexed with her emulous partner, and troubled both in her prayers and meals: Amidſt all their feaſtings, ſhe fed on nothing but tears. Some diſpoſitions are leſſe senſible, and more careleſſe of the diſpight and injuries of others, and can turn over unkind uſages, with contempt. By how much more tender the heart is, ſo much more deeply is it ever affected with diſcourteſies: As wax receives and retains that impreſſion, which in the hard clay cannot be ſeen; or as the eye feeles that moate, which the skin of the eye-lid could not complaine of. Yet the husband of Anna (as one that knew his duty) labours by his love, to comfort her againſt theſe diſcontentments, Why weepeſt thou? Am not I better to thee than ten ſonnes? It is the weakneſſe of good natures, to give ſo much advantage to an enemy; what would malice rather have, than the vexation of them whom it perſecutes? We cannot better pleaſe an adverſary, than by hurting our ſelves: This is no other than to humour envy, to ſerve the turne of thoſe that maligne us, and to draw on that malice whereof we are weary; whereas careleſneſſe puts ill will out of countenance, and makes it withdraw it ſelfe in a rage, as that which doth but ſhame the author, without the hurt of the patient. In cauſeleſſe wrongs, the beſt remedy is contempt.

She that could not find comfort in the loving perſwaſions of her husband, ſeeks it in her prayers; ſhe riſes up hungry from the feaſt, and hies her to the Temple; there ſhe powres out her teares and ſupplications. Whatſoever the complaint be, here is the remedy. There is one univerſall receit for all evils, prayer: when all helps failes us, this remaines, and whiles we have an heart, comforts it.

Here was not more bitterneſſe in the ſoule of Anna, than fervency; ſhe did not only weep and pray, but vow unto God; If God will give her a ſonne, ſhe will give her ſonne to God back againe: Even nature it ſelfe had conſecrated her ſonne to God; for he could not but be borne a Levite: But if his birth make him a Levite, her vow ſhall make him a Nazarite, and dedicate his minority to the Tabernacle. The way to obtaine any benefit, is to devote it in our hearts, to the glory of that God, of whom we aske it: By this meanes ſhall God both pleaſure his ſervant, and honour himſelfe; whereas, if the ſcope of our deſires be carnall, we may be ſure, either to faile of our ſuit, or of a bleſſing.

ELI and ANNA.

1 Sam. 1.

OLd Eli ſits on a ſtoole, by one of the poſts of the Tabernacle: Where ſhould the Prieſts of God be but in the Temple? Whether for action or over-ſight. Their very preſence keeps Gods houſe in order, and the preſence of God keeps their hearts in order.

It is oft found, that thoſe which are themſelves conſcionable, are too forward to the cenſuring of others: good Eli, becauſe he marks the lips of Anna to move without noyſe, chides her as drunken, and uncharitably miſconſtrues her devotion: It was a weak ground whereon to build ſo heavy a ſentence. If ſhe had ſpoken too loud, and incompoſedly, he might have had ſome juſt colour for his conceit; but now to accuſe her ſilence (notwithſtanding all her teares which he ſaw) of drunkenneſſe, it was a zealous breach of charity.

Some ſpirit would have been enraged with ſo raſh a cenſure: When anger meets with griefe, both turne into fury; But this good woman had been inured to reproaches, and beſides, did well ſee the reproofe aroſe from miſpriſion, and the miſpriſion from zeale; and therefore anſwers meekly, as one that had rather ſatisfie, than expoſtulate; Nay, my Lord, but I am a woman troubled in ſpirit. Eli may now learne charity of Anna: If ſhe had been in that diſtemper, whereof he accuſed her, his juſt reproofe had not beene ſo eaſily digeſted: Guiltineſſe is commonly clamorous and impatient, whereas innocence is ſilent, and careleſſe of miſ-reports. It is naturall to all men, to wipe off from their name all aſperſions of evil, but none doe it with ſuch violence as they which are faulty. It is a ſigne the horſe is galled, that ſtirs too much when he is touched.

She

A She that was censured for drunken, censures drunkennesse more deeply than her reprover; Count not thine hand-maid for a daughter of Belial. The drunkards stile begins in lawlesnesse, proceeds in unprofitablenesse, ends in misery; and all shut up in the denomination of this pedegree. A Son of Belial.

If Anna had been tainted with this sinne, she would have denyed it with more favour, and have disclaimed it with an extenuation; What if I should have been merry with wine? yet I might be devout: If I should have over-joyed in my sacrifice to God, one cup of excesse had not been so hainous: now her freedome is seen in her severity. Those which have cleare hearts from any sinne, prosecute it with rigour; whereas the guilty are ever partiall: their conscience holds their hand, and tels them that they beat themselves whiles they punish others.

B Now Eli sees his error, and recants it; and to make amends for his rash censure, prayes for her. Even the best may erre, but not persist in it: When good natures have offended, they are unquiet, till they have hastened satisfaction. This was within his office, to pray for the distressed: Wherefore serves the Priest, but to sacrifice for the people? and the best sacrifices are the prayers of faith.

She that began her prayers with fasting and heavinesse, rises up from them with cheerefulnesse and repast. It cannot be spoken, how much ease and joy the heart of man finds in having unloaded his cares, and powred out his supplications into the eares of God; since it is well assured, that the suite which is faithfully asked, is already granted in heaven. The conscience may well rest, when it tels us, that wee have neglected no meanes of redressing our affliction; for then it may resolve to C looke either for amendment, or patience.

The sacrifice is ended, and now Elkanah and his family rise up early to returne unto Ramah: but they dare not set forward till they have worshipped before the Lord. That journey cannot hope to prosper, that takes not God with it. The way to receive blessings at home, is to be devout at the Temple.

She that before conceived faith in her heart, now conceives a son in her wombe: God will rather work miracles than faithfull prayers shall return empty. I do not find that Peninna asked any son of God, yet she had store; Anna begged hard for this one, and could not til now obtain him. They which are deareſt to God, do oft-times with great difficulty worke out those blessings, which fall into the mouths of the careless. That wise disposer of all things, knows it fit to hold us short of those D favors which we sue for, whether for the trial of our patience, or the exercise of our faith, or the increase of our importunity, or the doubling of our obligation.

Those children are most like to prove blessings, which the parents have begged of God; and which are no lesse the fruit of our supplications, than of our body. As this childe was the son of his mothers prayers, and was consecrated to God ere his possibility of being; so now himselfe shall know, both how hee came, and whereto he was ordained; and lest he should forget it, his very name shall teach him both; (She called his name Samuel.) He cannot so much as heare himself named, but he must needs remember both the extraordinary mercy of God, in giving him to a barren mother; and the vow of his mother, in restoring him backe to God by her zealous dedication; and by both of them learne holinesse and obedience. There E is no necessity of significant names; but we cannot have too many monitors to put us in mind of our duty.

It is wont to be the fathers priviledge to name his childe; but because this was his mothers sonne, begotten more by her prayers, than the seed of Elkanah, it was but reason, that she should have the chiefe hand, both in his name and disposing. It had been in indeed the power of Elkanah, to have changed both his name and profession, and abrogate the vow of his wife; that wives might know, they were not their owne; and that the Rib might learne to know the Head: But husbands shall abuse their authority, if they shall wilfully crosse the holy purposes and religious indeavours of their yoke-fellowes. How much more fit is it for them to cherish all good desires in the weaker vessels? and as we use, when we carry a small ſmall light in a wind, to hide it with our lap, or hand, that it may not goe out. If the wife be a Vine, the husband ſhould be an Elme to up-hold her in all worthy enterpriſes, elſe ſhe fals to the ground and proves fruitleſſe.

The yeare is now come about; and Elkanah cals his family to their holy journey, to goe up to Jeruſalem, for the anniverſary ſolemnity of their ſacrifice: Anna's heart is with them, but ſhe hath a good excuſe to ſtay at home, the charge of her Samuel: her ſucceſſe in the Temple, keeps her happily from the Temple; that her devotion may be doubled, becauſe it was reſpited. God knowes how to diſpence with neceſſities; but if we ſuffer idle and needleſſe occaſions to hold us from the Tabernacle of God, our hearts are but hollow to Religion.

Now, at laſt, when the child was weaned from her hand, ſhe goes up and payes her vow, and with it, payes the intereſt of her intermiſſion. Never did Anna goe up with ſo glad a heart to Shilo, as now that ſhe carries God this reaſonable preſent, which himſelfe gave to her, and ſhe vowed to him; accompanied with the bounty of other ſacrifices, more in number and meaſure, than the law of God required of her; and al this is too little for her God, that ſo mercifully remembred her affliction and miraculouſly remedied it. Thoſe hearts which are truly thankfull, doe no leſſe rejoyce in their repayment, than in their receit; and doe as much ſtudy, how to ſhew their humble and fervent affections, for what they have, as how to compaſſe favours when they want them; their debt is their burthen, which when they have diſcharged, they are at eaſe.

If Anna had repented of her vow, and not preſented her ſon to the Tabernacle, Eli could not have challenged him; He had only ſeene her lips ſtirre, not hearing the promiſe of her heart. It was enough that her own ſoule knew her vow, and God which was greater than it. The obligation of a ſecret vow, is no leſſe, than if it had ten thouſand witneſſes.

Old Eli could not chuſe but much rejoyce, to ſee this fruit of thoſe lips, which he thought moved with wine; and this good prooſe, both of the mercifull audience of God, and the thankfull fidelity of his hand-maid; this ſight cals him downe to his knees (He worſhipped the Lord.) We are unprofitable witneſſes of the mercies of God, and the graces of men, if we doe not glorifie him for others ſakes, no leſſe than for our owne.

Eli and Anna grew now better acquainted; neither had he ſo much cauſe to praiſe God for her, as ſhe afterwards for him. For if her owne prayers obtained her firſt child; his bleſſing inriched her with five more. If ſhe had not given her firſt ſonne to God ere ſhe had him; I doubt whether ſhe had not been ever barren; or if ſhe had kept her Samuel at home, whether ever ſhe had conceived againe; now, that piety which ſtripped her of her only child for the ſervice of her God, hath multiplied the fruit of her wombe, and gave her five for that one, which was ſtill no leſſe hers, becauſe he was Gods. There is no ſo certaine way of increaſe, as to lend, or give unto the owner of all things.

ELI and his Sonnes.

IF the conveyance of Grace were naturall, holy Parents would not be ſo ill ſuted with children. What good man would not rather wiſh his loynes dry, than fruitfull of wickedneſſe? Now, we can neither traduce goodneſſe, not chuſe but traduce ſinne. If vertue were as well entailed upon us, as ſinne, one might ſerve to checke the other in our children; but now, ſince Grace is derived from heaven, on whomſoever it pleaſes the Giver, and that evill which ours receive hereditarily from us, is multiplyed by their owne corruption, it can be no wonder, that good men have ill children; it is rather a wonder that any children are not evill. The ſonnes of Eli are

A as lewd, as himſelfe was holy. If the Goodneſſe of examples, precepts, education, profeſſion, could have beene preſervatives from extremity of ſinne, theſe ſons of an holy Father had not been wicked; now, neither parentage nor breeding, nor Prieſt-hood can keep the ſonnes of Eli from the ſonnes of Belial. If our children be good, let us thanke God for it; this was more than we could give them; if evill, they may thanke us, and themſelves: us, for their birth-ſinne; themſelves for the improvement of it to that height of wickedneſſe.

If they had not been ſonnes of Eli, yet being Prieſts of God, who would not have hoped their very calling ſhould have infuſed ſome holineſſe into them? But now even their white Ephod covers our foule ſinnes; yea, rather, if they which ſerve at the Altar, degenerate, their wickedneſſe is ſo much more above others, as
B their places is holier. A wicked Prieſt is the worſt creature upon earth. Who are Divels, but they which were once Angels of light? Who can ſtumble at the ſinnes of the Evangelicall Levites, that ſees ſuch impurity before the Arke of God? That God which promiſed to be the Levites portion, had ſet forth the portion of his Miniſters; he will feaſt them at his owne Altar; the breſt and the right ſhoulder of the peace-offering was their morſell: theſe bold and covetous Prieſts will rather have the fleſh-hooke their arbiter, than God; whatſoever thoſe three teeth faſten upon, ſhall be for their tooth; they were weary of one joynt, and now their delicacy affects variety; God is not worthy to carve for theſe men, but their own hands; and this they doe not receive, but take; and take violently, unſeaſonably; It had bin fit God ſhould be firſt ſerved; their preſumption wil not ſtay his leiſure;
C ere the fat be burned, ere the fleſh be boyled, they ſnatch more than their ſhare from the Altar, as if the God of Heaven ſhould waite on their palate; as if the Iſraelites had come thither to ſacrifice to their bellies; and (as commonly a wanton tooth is the harbinger to luxurious wantonneſſe) they are no ſooner fed, than they neigh after the Dames of Iſrael; holy women aſſemble to the doore of the Tabernacle; theſe varlets tempt them to luſt, that came thither for devotion; they had wives of their owne, yet their unbridled deſires rove after ſtrangers, and feare not to pollute even that holy place with abhominable filthineſſe. O ſinnes, too ſhamefull for men; much more for the ſpirituall guides of Iſrael! He that makes himſelfe a ſervant to his tooth, ſhall eaſily become a ſlave to all inordinate affections. That Arke which expiated other mens ſinnes, added to the ſinnes of the ſacri-
D ficers; Doubtleſſe, many a ſoule was the cleaner for the blood of the ſacrifices, which they ſhed; while their owne were more impure: And as the Altar cannot ſanctifie the Prieſt, ſo the uncleanneſſe of the Miniſter cannot pollute the offering; becauſe the vertue thereof is not in the agent, but in the inſtitution; in the repreſentation his ſinne is his owne, the comfort of the Sacrament is from God; Our Clergie is no charter for heaven; Even thoſe whoſe trade is devotion, may at once ſhew the way to heaven by their tongue, and by their foot lead the way to hell. It is neither a Coule, nor an Ephod that can priviledge the ſoule.

The ſinne of theſe men was worthy of contempt, yea, perhaps, their perſons; but for the people therefore, to abhor the offerings of the Lord, was to add their evill unto the Prieſts, and to offend God, becauſe he was offended; There can no offence
E be juſtly taken, even at men; much leſſe at God for the ſake of men: No mans ſins ſhould bring the ſervice of God into diſlike; this is to make holy things guilty of our profaneneſſe. It is a dangerous ignorance, not to diſtinguiſh betwixt the worke, and the inſtrument; whereupon it oft comes to paſſe, that we fall out with God, becauſe we find cauſe of offence from men, and give God juſt cauſe to abhorre us, becauſe we abhorre his ſervice unjuſtly. Although it be true (of great men eſpecially) that they are the laſt that know the evils of their owne houſe, yet either it could not be when all Iſrael rung of the lewdneſſe of Elies ſonnes, that he onely ſhould not know it, or if hee knew it not, his ignorance cannot be excuſed; for a ſeaſonable reſtraint might have prevented this extremity of debauchedneſſe. Complaints are long muttered of the great, ere they dare break forth to open conteſtation:

teſtation: publick accuſations of authority, argues intolerable extremities of evill; nothing but age can plead for Eli, that hee was not the firſt accuſer of his Sonnes: now, when their enormities came to be the voyce of the multitude, he muſt heare it perforce; and doubtleſſe he heard it with griefe enough, but not with anger enough: hee that was the Judge of Iſrael, ſhould have unpartially judged his owne fleſh and blood; never could hee have offered a more pleaſing ſacrifice, than the depraved blood of ſo wicked Sonnes. In vaine doe we rebuke thoſe ſinnes abroad, which wee tolerate at home. That man makes himſelfe but ridiculous, that leaving his owne houſe on fire, runs to quench his neighbours. A

I heard Eli ſharpe enough to Anna, upon but a ſuſpicion of ſin; & now, how milde I find him to the notorious crimes of his own? Why doe you ſo my ſonnes? It is no good report; my ſons, doe no more ſo: The caſe is altered with the perſons. If nature may be allowed to ſpeak in judgement, and to make difference, not of ſinnes, but offenders, the ſentence muſt needs ſavour of partiality. Had theſe men but ſome little ſlackened their duty, or heedleſly omitted ſome rite of the ſacrifice, this cenſure had not bin unfit; but to puniſh the thefts, rapins, ſacrilledges, adulteries, inceſts of his ſonnes, with Why doe ye ſo, was no other than to ſhave that head, which had deſerved cutting off. As it is with ill humours, that a weak doſe doth but ſtir, and anger them, not purge them out; ſo it fareth with ſinnes: An eaſie reproofe doth but incourage wickedneſſe, and makes it think it ſelfe ſo ſlight, as that cenſure importeth. A vehement rebuke to a capitall evil, is but like a ſtrong ſhowre to a ripe field, which layes that corn which were worthy of a ſickle. It is a breach of juſtice, not to proportionate the puniſhmēt to the offence: to whip a man for a murder, or to puniſh the purſe for inceſt, or to burn treaſon in the hand, or to award the ſtocks to burglary, it is to patronize evil, in ſtead of avenging it: of the two extrems, rigour is more ſafe for the publick weale, becauſe the over-puniſhing of one offender frights many from ſinning. It is better to live in a common-wealth where nothing is lawfull, than where every thing. B C

Indulgent parents are cruel to themſelves, and their poſterity. Ely could not have deviſed which way to have plagued himſelf, and his houſe ſo much, as by his kindnes to his childrens ſins. What variety of judgements doth he now heare of from the meſſenger of God! Firſt, becauſe his old age (which uſes to be ſubject to choler) inclined now to misfavour his ſons; therefore there ſhall not be an old man left of his houſe for ever: and becauſe it vexed him not enough to ſee his ſons enemies to God in their profeſſion, therefore he ſhal ſee his enemy in the habitation of the Lord; & becauſe himſelf forbore to take vengeance of his ſons, and eſteemed their life above the glory of his Maſter, therfore God wil revenge himſelfe, by killing them both in one day; and becauſe he abuſed his ſoveraignty by connivence at ſin, therefore ſhall his houſe be ſtripped of this honour, and ſee it tranſlated to another; and laſtly, becauſe he ſuffered his ſons to pleaſe their owne wanton appetite, in taking meate off from Gods trencher, therefore, thoſe which remaine of his houſe, ſhall come to his ſucceſſors, to beg a peice of ſilver, and a morſell of bread: in a word, becauſe he was partiall to his ſonnes, God ſhall execute all this ſeverely upon him and them. I doe not read of any fault Ely had, but indulgence; and which of the notorious offenders were plagued more? Parents need no other meanes to make them miſerable, than ſparing the rod. D E

Who ſhould be the bearer of theſe fearful tidings to Ely, but yong Samuel, whom himſelf had trained up? he was now grown paſt his mothers coats, fit for the meſſage of God. Old Ely rebuked not his yong ſons, therefore yong Samuel is ſent to rebuke him. I marvel not whiles the Prieſthood was ſo corrupted, if the Word of God were precious, if there were publick viſion; It is not the manner of God to grace the unworthy; The ordinary miniſtration in the Temple was too much honor for thoſe that robbed the Altar, though they had no extraordinary revelations. Hereupon it was, that God lets old Ely ſleepe (who ſlept in his ſinne) and awakes

A wakes Samuel, to tell him what he would doe with his maſter. He which was wont to be the mouth of God to the people, muſt now receive the Meſſage of God from the mouth of another; As great perſons will not ſpeake to thoſe with whom they are highly offended, but ſend them their checks by others.

The lights of the Temple were now dim, & almoſt ready to give place to the morning, when God called Samuel; to ſignifie, perhaps, that thoſe which ſhould have been the lights of Iſrael, burned no leſſe dimly, and were neere their going out, & ſhould be ſucceeded with one, ſo much more lightſome than they, as the Sunne was more bright than the lamps. God had good leaſure to have delivered this meſſage by day; but he meant to make uſe of Samuels miſtaking; and therfore ſo ſpeaks, that Ely may be asked for an anſwer, & perceive himſelf both omitted & cenſured. He that meant
B to uſe Samuels voice to Ely, imitates the voice of Ely to Samuel; Samuel had ſo accuſtomed himſelf to obedience and to anſwer the cal of Ely, that lying in the further cels of the Levits, he is eaſily raiſed from his ſleep; and even in the night runnes for his meſſage to him, who was rather to receive it from him. Thrice is the old man diſquieted with the diligence of his ſervant; and, though viſions were rare in his dayes, yet is he not ſo unacquainted with God, as not to attribute that voyce to him, which himſelfe heard not. Wherefore, like a better Tutor than a Parent, hee teaches Samuel what he ſhall anſwer, Speake Lord, for thy ſervant heareth.

It might have pleaſed God at the firſt call, to have delivered his meſſage to Samuel, not expecting the anſwer of a novice unſeen in the viſions of a God; yet doth
C he rather deferre it till the fourth ſummons, and will not ſpeake till Samuel confeſſed his audience. God loves ever to prepare his ſervants for his imployments, and wil not commit his errands, but to thoſe, whom he addreſſeth both by wonder, and attention and humility.

Eli knew wel the gracious faſhion of God, that where he tended a favour, prorogation could be no hinderance, and therefore after the call of God thrice anſwered with ſilence, he inſtructs Samuel to be ready for the fourth: If Samuels ſilence had been wilfull, I doubt whether he had been againe ſollicited; Now God doth both pitty his error, and requite his diligence by redoubling his name at laſt.

Samuel had now many yeares miniſtred before the Lord, but never till now heard his voyce; and now heares it with much terrour; for, the firſt word that he heares
D God ſpeake, is threatning, and that of vengeance to his Maſter. What were theſe menaces, but ſo many premonitions to himſelfe that ſhould ſucceed Eli? God begins early to ſeaſon their hearts with feare, whom he meanes to make eminent inſtruments of his glory. It is his mercy to make us witneſſes of the judgements of others; that we may be forewarned, ere we have the occaſions of ſinning.

I doe not heare God bid Samuel deliver his meſſage to Eli; He that was but now made a Prophet, knowes that the errands of God intend not ſilence; and that God would not have ſpoken to him of another, if he had meant the newes ſhould be reſerved to himſelfe: Neither yet did he run with open mouth unto Eli, to tell him this viſion unasked. No wiſe man will be haſty to bring ill tidings to the great; rather doth he ſtay til the importunity of his Maſter ſhould wring it from his unwil-
E lingneſſe; and then as his concealment ſhewed his love, ſo his full relation ſhall approve his fidelity. If the heart of Eli had not told him this newes, before God told it Samuel, he had never been ſo inſtant with Samuel, not to conceale it; His conſcience did well preſage that it concerned himſelfe; guiltineſſe needs no Prophet to aſſure it of puniſhment. The mind that is troubled, projecteth terrible things: and though it cannot ſingle out the judgement allotted to it, yet it is in a confuſed expectation of ſome grievous evill. Surely, Eli could not think it worſe than it was; The ſentence was fearefull, and ſuch, as I wonder, the neck, or the heart of old Eli could hold out the report of; That God ſweares he wil judge Elies houſe, and that with beggery, with death, with deſolation, and that the wickedneſſe of his houſe ſhal not be purged with ſacrifice, or offrings for ever: and yet this which every

Iſraelites

Israelites eare should tingle to heare of, when it should be done; old Eli hears with an unmoved patience, and humble submission, It is the Lord, let him doe what seemeth him good. O admirable faith, and more than humane constancy and resolution, worthy of the aged president of Shilo, worthy of an heart sacrificed to that God, whose justice had refused to expiate his sinne by sacrifice! If Eli have been an ill Father to his sonnes, yet he is a good son to God, and is ready to kisse the very rod he shall smart withall; It is the Lord whom I have ever found holy, and just, and religious, and he cannot but be himselfe; Let him doe what seemeth him good; for whatever seemeth good to him, cannot but be good; how soever it seemes to me: Every man can open his hand to God while he blesses; but to expose our selves willingly to the afflicting hand of our Maker, and to kneele to him while he scourges us, is peculiar onely to the faithful. A

If ever a good heart could have freed a man from temporall punishments, Eli must needs have escaped: Gods anger was appeased by his humble repentance, but his justice must be satisfied: Elies sin and his sonnes, was in the eye and mouth of all Israel; his therefore should have been much wronged by their impunity. Who would not have made these spirituall guides an example of lawlesnesse, and have said, What care I how I live, if Elies sonnes goe away unpunished? As not the teares of Eli, so not the words of Samuel may fall to the ground: We may not measure the displeasure of God by his stripes; many times, after the remission of the sinne, the very chastisements of the Almighty are deadly: No repentance can assure us that we shall not smart with outward afflictions; That can prevent the eternall displeasure of God, but still it may be necessary and good we should be corrected: Our care and suit must be, that the evils which shall not be averted, may be sanctified. B C

If the prediction of these evils were fearefull, what shall the execution be? The presumption of the ill-taught Israelites shall give occasion to this judgement; for being smitten before the Philistims, they send for the Arke into the field. Who gave them authority to command the Arke of God at their pleasure? Here was no consulting with the Arke which they would fetch; no inquiry of Samuel, whether they should fetch it; but an heady resolution of presumptuous Elders to force God into the field, and to challenge successe. If God were not with the Arke, why did they send for it, and rejoyce in the comming of it? If God were with it, why was not his allowance asked, that it should come? How can the people be good, where the Priests are wicked? When the Arke of the Covenant of the Lord of Hosts that dwels betweene the Cherubins, was brought into the Host (though with meane and wicked attendance) Israel doth (as it were) fill the heaven, and shake the earth with shouts; As if the Arke and victory were no lesse unseparable, than they and their sins. Even the lewdest men wil be looking for favour from that God, whom they cared not to displease, contrary to the conscience of their deservings. Presumption doth the same in wicked men, which Faith doth in the holiest. Those that regarded not the God of the Arke, thinke themselves safe and happy in the Arke of God: Vaine men are transported with a confidence in the out-side of Religion, not regarding the substance and soule of it, which onely can give them true peace. But rather than God will humour superstition in Israelites, he will suffer his owne Arke to fall into the hands of Philistims: Rather will he seem to slacken his hand of protection, than he will be thought to have his hands bound by a formall misconfidence. The slaughter of the Israelites was no plague to this. It was a greater plague rather to them that should survive, and behold it. The two sonnes of Eli, which had helped to corrupt their brethren, die by the hands of the uncircumcised, and are now too late separated from the Arke of God by Philistims, which should have been before separated by their Father: They had lived formerly to bring Gods Altar into contempt, and now live to carry his Arke into captivity: and at last, as those that had made up the measure of their wickednesse, are slaine in their sin. D E

A Ill newes doth ever either runne, or flie: The man of Benjamin, which ran from the Hoſt, hath ſoone filled the City with out-cries; and Elies eares with the cry of the City. The good old man, after ninety and eight yeares, ſits in the gate, as one that never thought himſelfe too aged to doe God ſervice; and heares the newes of Iſraels diſcomfiture, and his ſonnes death, though with ſorrow, yet with patience; but when the meſſenger tels him of the Arke of God taken, he can live no longer; that word ſtrikes him downe backward from his throne, and kils him in the fall: no ſword of a Philiſtim could have ſlain him more painfully, neither know I whether his neck or his heart were firſt broken. O fearefull judgement, that ever any Iſraelites eare could tingle withall! The Arke loſt: what good man would wiſh to live without God? Who can chuſe but thinke he hath lived too long, that hath B over-lived the Teſtimonies of Gods preſence with his Church? Yea, the very daughter in law of Eli, a woman, the wife of a lewd husband; when ſhee was at once travelling (upon that tidings) and in that travell, dying (to make up the full ſumme of Gods judgement upon that wicked houſe) as one inſenſible of the death of her father, of her husband, of her ſelfe, in compariſon of this loſſe, cals her (then unſeaſonable) ſonne Ichabod, and with her laſt breath, ſaies, The glory is departed from Iſrael, the Arke is taken. What cares ſhe for a poſterity, which ſhould want the Arke? What cares ſhe for a ſonne come into the world of Iſrael, when God was gone from it? And how willingly doth ſhee depart from them, from whom God was departed? Not outward magnificence, not ſtate, not wealth, not favour of the mighty, but the preſence of God in his Ordinances, are the glory of Iſrael: the C ſubducing whereof is a greater judgement than deſtruction.

Oh Iſrael, worſe now than no people! a thouſand times more miſerable than Philiſtims: Thoſe Pagans went away triumphing with the Arke of God, and victory; and leave the remnants of the choſen people to lament, that they once had a God.

Oh cruell and wicked indulgence, that is now found guilty of the death, not onely of the Prieſts, and people, but of Religion! Unjuſt mercy can never end in leſſe than blood; and it were well, if onely the body ſhould have cauſe to complaine of that kind cruelty.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGULAR GOOD LORD,

The Lord HAY, Baron of SALEY,

One of His Majesties most Honourable Privie Councell.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

VPon how just reason these my Contemplations goe forth so late after their Fellowes, it were needlesse to give account to your Lordship, in whose traine I had the honour (since my last) to passe both the Sea and the Twede. All my private studies have gladly vayled to the publike services of my Soveraigne Master: No sooner could I recover the happinesse of my quiet thoughts, then I renued this my divine taske: Wherein I cannot but professe to place so much contentment, as that I wish not any other measure of my life, then it; What is this, other then the exaltation of ISAACS delight, to walk forth into the pleasant fields of the Scriptures, and to meditate of nothing under heaven? Yea, what other then IACOBS sweet vision of Angels, climbing up and downe that sacred Ladder, which God hath set between heaven and earth? Yea, (to rise yet higher) what other then an imitation of holy Moſes, in his converſing with God himſelfe, on the Horeb of both Teſtaments? And if I may call your Lo: forth a little from your great affaires of Court and State, to bleſſe your eyes with this proſpect, how happy ſhall you confeſſe this change of objects? and how unwillingly ſhal you obtain leave of your thoughts to returne unto theſe ſublunary imployments? Our laſt Diſcourſe left Gods Arke amongſt the Philiſtims; now we returne to ſee what it doth there, and to fetch it thence: Wherein your Lo: ſhall finde the revenges of God never ſo deadly, as when he gives moſt way unto men; The vaine confidence of wickedneſſe ending in a late repentance: The fearfull plagues of a preſumptuous ſawcines with God, not prevented with the honeſty of good intentions; The mercy of God accepting the ſervices of an humble Faithfulneſſe in a meaner dreſſe. From thence you ſhall ſee the dangerous iſſue of an affected innovation, although to the better; The errors of credulity, and blind affection in the holieſt Governours, guilty of the peoples diſcontentment; The ſtubborne headdineſſe of a multitude that once findes the reynes ſlack in their necks, not capable of any pauſe, but their owne fall; The untruſty promiſes of a faire outſide, and a plauſible entrance, ſhutting up in a wofull diſappointment. What doe I foreſtall a diſcourſe ſo full of choice? your Lo. ſhall finde every line uſefull, and ſhall willingly confeſſe that the Story of God can make a man not leſſe wiſe, then good.

Mine humble thankefulneſſe knowes not how to expreſſe it ſelf otherwiſe, then in theſe kind of preſents, and in my hearty prayers for the increaſe of your honour, and happineſſe, which ſhall never be wanting from

Your Lo. ſincerely and thankfully devoted,

THE TWELFTH BOOKE.

The Arke and Dagon.

IF men did not miſtake God, they could not ariſe to ſuch height of impiety: The acts of his juſt judgement are imputed to impotence; that God would ſend his Arke captive to the Philiſtims, is ſo conſtrued by them, as if he could not keep it: the wife of Phineas cryed out, that glory was departed from Iſrael; The Philiſtims dare ſay in triumph, that glory is departed from the God of Iſrael: The Arke was not Iſraels, but Gods; this victory reaches higher then to men. Dagon had never ſo great a day, ſo many ſacrifices, as now that he ſeemes to take the God of Iſrael priſoner: Where ſhould the captive be beſtowed, but in cuſtody of the victor? It is not love, but inſultation, that lodges the Arke cloſe beſide Dagon. What a ſpectacle was this, to ſee uncircumciſed Philiſtims laying their profane hands upon the Teſtimony of Gods preſence? to ſee the glorious Mercy-ſeat under the roof of an Idol? to ſee the two Cherubins ſpreading their wings under a falſe god? 1 Sam. 5.4

Oh the deep and holy wiſedome of the Almighty, which over-reaches all the finite conceits of his creatures, who whiles he ſeems moſt to neglect himſelf, fetches about moſt glory to his owne name; he winks and ſits ſtill on purpoſe, to ſee what men would doe, and is content to ſuffer indignity from his creature, for a time, that he may be everlaſtingly magnified in his juſtice, and power: That honour pleaſeth God and men beſt, which is raiſed out of contempt.

The Ark of God was not uſed to ſuch Porters; The Philiſtims carry it unto Aſhdod, that the victorie of Dagon may be more glorious: What paines Superſtition puts men unto for the triumph of a falſe cauſe! And if profane Philiſtims can think it no toyle to carry the Ark where they ſhould not, what a ſhame is it for us, if we doe not gladly attend it where we ſhould? How juſtly may Gods truth ſcorne the imparitie of our zeale?

If the Iſraelites did put confidence in the Arke, can we marvell that the Philiſtims did put confidence in that power, which (as they thought) had conquered the Arke? The leſſe is ever ſubject unto the greater; What could they now think but that heaven and earth were theirs? Who ſhall ſtand out againſt them, when the God of Iſrael hath yeelded? Securitie and preſumption attend ever at the threſhold of ruine.

God will let them ſleepe in this confidence; in the morning they ſhall find how vainly they have dreamed. Now they begin to find they have but gloried in their own plagne, and overthrown nothing but their own peace. Dagon hath an houſe, when God hath but a Tabernacle; It is no meaſuring of Religion by outward glory: Into this houſe the proud Philiſtims come, the next morning, to congratulate unto their god, ſo great a captive, ſuch divine ſpoiles, and in their early devotions to fall downe before him, under whom the God of Iſrael was fallen: and loe, where they find their god, fallen downe on the ground upon his face, before him whom they thought both his priſoner and theirs: Their god is forced to doe that, which they ſhould have done voluntarily; although God caſt down that dumb rivall of his for ſcorn, not for adoration. Oh ye fooliſh Philiſtims, could ye think that the ſame houſe could hold God and Dagon? could ye think a ſenſeleſſe ſtone, a fit companion and guardian for the living God? Had ye laid your Dagon upon his face, proſtrate before the Arke, yet would not God have endured the indignity of ſuch a lodging; but now that ye preſume to ſet up your carved ſtone, equall to his Cherubins, goe reade your folly in the floore of your Temple, and know that he which caſt your god ſo low, can caſt you lower.

The true God owes a ſhame to thoſe which will be making matches betwixt himſelfe and Belial.

But this perhaps was onely a miſchance, or a neglect of attendance; lay to your hands, O ye Philiſtims, and raiſe up Dagon into his place: It is a miſerable god that needs helping up; Had ye not beene more ſenſeleſſe then that ſtone, how could you chooſe but think, How ſhall he raiſe us above our enemies, that cannot riſe alone? How ſhall he eſtabliſh us in the ſtation of our peace, that cannot hold his own foot? If Dagon did give the foyle unto the God of Iſrael, what power is it, that hath caſt him upon his face, in his owne Temple? It is juſt with God, that thoſe which want grace, ſhall want wit too; it is the power of ſuperſtition, to turn men into thoſe ſtocks and ſtones which they worſhip: They that make them are like unto them: Doubtleſſe, this firſt fall of Dagon was kept as ſecret, and excuſed as well as it might, and ſerved rather for aſtoniſhment, then conviction; there was more ſtrangeneſſe then horrour in that accident: That whereas Dagon had wont to ſtand, and the Philiſtims fall downe, now Dagon fell down, and the Philiſtims ſtood, and muſt become the patrons of their own god; their god worſhips them upon his face, and craves more help from them, then ever he could give: But if their ſottiſhneſſe can digeſt this, all is well.

Dagon is ſet in his place, and now thoſe hands are lift up to him, which helped to lift him up; and thoſe faces are proſtrate unto him, before whom he lay proſtrate. Idolatry and ſuperſtition are not eaſily put out of countenance; but will the jealouſie of the true God put it up thus? Shall Dagon eſcape with an harmleſſe fall? Surely, if they had let him lye ſtill upon the pavement, perhaps that inſenſible ſtatue had found no other revenge; but now, they will be advancing it to the rood-loft againe, and affront Gods Arke with it, the event will ſhame them, and let them know, how much God ſcorns a partner either of his own making, or theirs.

The morning is fitteſt for devotion, then doe the Philiſtims flock to the Temple of their god. What a ſhame is it for us to come late to ours? Although not ſo much piety as curioſity did now haſten their ſpeed, to ſee what reſt their Dagon was allowed to get in his owne roofe; and now behold their kind god is come to meet them in the way; ſome pieces of him ſalute their eyes upon the threſhold. Dagons head and hands are over-run their fellowes, to tell the Philiſtims how much they were miſtaken in a god.

This ſecond fall breaks the Idol in pieces, and threats the ſame confuſion to the worſhippers of it. Eaſie warnings neglected end ever in deſtruction. The head is for deviſing, the hand for execution: In theſe two powers of their god, did the Philiſtims chiefly truſt; theſe are therefore laid under their feet, upon the threſhold, that they might afar off ſee their vanity, and that (if they would) they might ſet their foot on that beſt piece of their god, whereon their heart was ſet.

There

A There was nothing wherein that Idol resembled a man, but in his head and hands: the rest was but a scaly portraiture of a fish; God would therefore separate from this stone, that part which had mocked man, with the counterfeit of himselfe, that man might see what an unworthy lumpe he had matched with himself, and set up above himselfe: The just quarrell of God is bent upon those means, and that parcell which have dared to rob him of his glory.

How can the Philistims now misse the sight of their own folly? how can they be but enough convicted of their mad idolatry, to see their god lie broken to morsels, under their feet? every piece whereof proclaims the power of him that brake it, and the stupidity of those that adored it. Who would expect any other issue of this act, but to heare the Philistims say, We now see how superstition hath blinded us? Da-
B gon is no god for us, our hearts shall never more rest upon a broken statue: That onely true God, which hath beaten ours, shall challenge us by the right of conquest: but here was none of this; rather a further degree of their dotage followes upon this palpable conviction: They cannot yet suspect that god, whose head they may trample upon, but in stead of hating their Dagon, that lay broken upon their threshold, they honour the threshold, on which Dagon lay, and dare not set their foot on that place which was hallowed by the broked head and hands of their Deitie. Oh the obstinacie of Idolatry, which where it hath got hold of the heart, knowes neither to blush, nor yeeld, but rather gathers strength from that which might justly confound it! The hand of the Almighty, which moved them not in falling upon their god, fals now neerer them upon their persons, and strikes them in their bodies, which
C would not feele themselves stricken in their Idol: Paine shall humble them whom shame cannot. Those which had entertained the secret thoughts of abominable idolatrie within them, are now plagued in the inwardest and most secret part of their bodies, with a loathsome disease; and now grow weary of themselves, in stead of their idolatry. I doe not heare them acknowledge it was Gods hand, which had stricken Dagon their god, till now, they find themselves stricken: Gods judgements are the rack of godlesse men; If one straine make them not confesse, let them be stretched but one wrench higher, and they cannot be silent. The just avenger of sin will not lose the glory of his executions, but will have men know from whom they smart.

The Emerods were not a disease beyond the compasse of naturall causes, neither
D was it hard for the wiser sort, to give a reason of their complaint, yet they ascribe it to the hand of God: The knowledge and operation of secondary causes should be no prejudice to the first; They are worse then the Philistims, who when they see the means, doe not acknowledge the first Mover; whose active and just power is no lesse seen in imploying ordinary agents, then in raising up extraordinarie: neither doth he lesse smite by a common fever, then a revenging Angel.

They judge right of the cause, what doe they resolve for the cure? (Let not the Arke of the God of Israel abide with us) where they should have said, Let us cast out Dagon, that we may pacifie and retain the God of Israel: they determine to thrust out the Ark of God, that they might peaceably enjoy themselves, and Dagon. Wicked men are upon all occasions glad to be rid of God, but they can with no pa-
E tience endure to part with their sins; and whiles they are weary of the hand that punisheth them, they hold fast the cause of their punishment.

Their first and onely care is to put away him, who as he hath corrected, so can ease them. Folly is never separated from wickednesse.

Their heart told them that they had no right to the Ark. A Councel is called of their Princes & Priests. If they had resolved to send it home, they had done wisely; Now they do not carry it away, but they carry it about from Ebenezer to Ashdod, from Ashdod to Gath, from Gath to Ekron: Their stomack was greater then their conscience; The Ark was too sore for them, yet it was too good for Israel; and they will rather die then make Israel happie. Their conceit, that the change of ayre could appease the Arke, God useth to his owne advantage; for by this meanes his power is knowne, and his judgement spred over all the country of the Philistims:

ſtims: What doe theſe men now, but ſend the plague of God to their fellowes? The juſtice of God can make the ſins of men their mutuall executioners; It is the faſhion of wicked men to draw their neighbours into the partnerſhip of their condemnation.

Whereſoever the Arke goes, there is deſtruction; The beſt of Gods ordinances, if they be not proper to us, are deadly. The Iſraelites did not more ſhout for joy, when they ſaw the Arke come to them, then the Ekronites cry out for griefe to ſee it brought amongſt them: Spirituall things are either ſoveraign, or hurtfull, according to the diſpoſition of the receivers. The Arke doth either ſave, or kill, as it is entertained.

At laſt, when the Philiſtims are well weary of paine and death, they are glad to be quit of their ſin: The voyce of the Princes and people is changed to the better, (Send away the Arke of the God of Iſrael, and let it returne to his owne place.) God knowes how to bring the ſtubbornneſt enemy upon his knees, and makes him doe that out of feare, which his beſt child would doe out of love and duty. How miſerable was the eſtate of theſe Philiſtims? Every man was either dead, or ſick: thoſe that were left living (through their extremitie of pain) envied the dead, and the cry of their whole Cities went up to heaven. It is happy that God hath ſuch ſtore of plagues and thunderbolts for the wicked: If he had not a fire of judgement, wherewith the yron hearts of men might be made flexible, he would want obedience, and the world peace.

The Arkes revenge and returne.

1 Sam. 6.

IT had wont to be a ſure rule, Whereſoever God is among men, there is the Church: Here only it failed: The teſtimony of Gods preſence was many moneths amongſt the Philiſtims, for a puniſhment to his owne people, whom he left, for a curſe to thoſe forrainers which entertained it; Iſrael was ſeven moneths without God: How doe we thinke faithfull Samuel took this abſence? How deſolate and forlorn did the Tabernacle of God look, without the Arke? There were ſtill the Altars of God; his Prieſts, Levites, Tables, Veiles, Cenſers, with all the legall acouſtrements: Theſe without the Arke, were as the Sunne without light, in the midſt of an Eclipſe: If all theſe had beene taken away, and onely the Arke had beene remaining, the loſſe had beene nothing to this, that the Arke ſhould be gone, and they left: For what are all theſe without God, and how all-ſufficient is God without theſe? There are times, wherein God withdrawes himſelfe from his Church, and ſeemes to leave her without comfort, without protection: Sometimes we ſhall finde Iſrael taken from the Arke, otherwhiles the Arke is taken from Iſrael: In either, there is a ſeparation betwixt the Arke and Iſrael: Heavy times to every true Iſraelite, yet ſuch as whoſe example may relieve us in our deſertions: Still was this people, Iſrael; the ſeed of him, that would not be left of God without a bleſſing; and therefore without the teſtimony of his preſence, was God preſent with them: It were wide with the faithfull, if God were not oftentimes with them, when there is no witneſſe of his preſence.

One act was a mutuall penance to the Iſraelites and Philiſtims, I know not to whether more: Iſrael grieved for the loſſe of that, whoſe preſence grieved the Philiſtims, their paine was therefore no other then voluntary: It is ſtrange, that the Philiſtims would endure ſeven moneths ſmart with the Arke, ſince they ſaw, that the preſence of the Priſoner would not requite, no nor mitigate to them, one houres miſery: Fooliſh men will be ſtrugling with God, till they be utterly either breathleſſe or impotent. Their hope was, that time might abate diſpleaſure, even whiles they perſiſted to offend: The falſe hopes of worldly men coſt them deare; they could not be ſo miſerable, if their own hearts did not deceive them with miſ-expectations of impoſſible favour.

In

A In matters that concerne a God, who is so fit to be consulted with, as the priests? The Princes of the Philistims had before given their voices, yet nothing is determined, nothing is done without the direction and assent of those whom they accounted sacred: Nature it self sends us in divine things, to those persons, whose calling is divine: It is either distrust, or presumption, or contempt, that carries us our owne wayes in spirituall matters, without advising with them, whose lips God hath appointed to preserve knowledge: There cannot but arise many difficulties in us about the Arke of God; whom should we consult with but those which have the Tongue of the Learned?

Doubtlesse, this question of the Arke did abide much debating: There wanted not faire probabilities on both sides: A wise Philistim might well plead, If God had B either so great care of the Arke, or power to retain it, how is it become ours? A wiser then he would reply, If the God of Israel had wanted either care or power, Dagon and we had been still whole: why doe we thus grone, and dye, all that are but within the aire of the Arke, if a divine hand doe not attend it? Their smart pleads enough for the dismission of the Arke: The next demand of their Priests and Soothsayers, is, how it should be sent home: Affliction had made them so wise, as to know, that every fashion of parting with the Arke would not satisfie the owner: oftentimes the circumstance of an action mars the substance: In divine matters we must not onely looke, that the body of our service be sound, but that the clothes be fit: Nothing hinders, but that sometimes good advice may fall from the mouth of wicked men. These superstitious Priests can counsell them, not to send away the Arke C of God empty, but to give it a sin-offering: They had not lived so farre from the smoke of the Jewish Altars, but that they knew, God was accustomed to manifold oblations, and chiefly to those of expiation. No Israelite could have said better: Superstition is the Ape of true devotion, and if we look not to the ground of both, many times it is hard by the very outward acts to distinguish them: Nature it self teacheth us, that God loves a full hand: He that hath been so bountifull to us, as to give us all, looks for a returne of some offering from us; If we present him with nothing but our sins, how can we look to be accepted? The sacrifices under the Gospel are spirituall, with these must we come into the presence of God, if we desire to carry away remission and favour.

The Philistims knew well, that it were bootlesse for them to offer, what they D listed; their next suit is to be directed in the matter of their oblation: Pagans can teach us, how unsafe it is to walke in the wayes of Religion without a guide, yet here their best teachers can but guesse at their duty, and must devise for the people, that, which the people durst not impose upon themselves: The golden Emerods, and Mise, were but conjecturall prescripts: With what security may we consult with them which have their directions from the mouth and hand of the Almighty?

God struck the Philistims at once in their god, in their bodies, in their land: In their god, by his ruine and dismembering: In their bodies, by the Emerods: In their land, by the mise: That base vermine did God send among them on purpose to shame their Dagon and them, that they might see, how unable their god was E (which they thought the Victor of the Arke) to subdue the least Mouse, which the true God did create, and command to plague them. This plague upon their fields, began together with that upon their bodies: it was mentioned, not complained of, till they think of dismissing the Arke: Greater crosses doe commonly swallow up the lesse: At least, lesser evils are either silent, or unheard, while the eare is filled with the clamor of greater. Their very Princes were punished with the Mise, as well as with the Emerods; God knows no persons in the execution of judgments; the least and meanest of all Gods creatures is sufficient to be the revenger of his Creator.

God sent them Mise, and Emerods of flesh and blood: they returne him both these of gold, to imply, both, that these judgements came out from God, and that they did gladly give him the glory of that, whereof he gave them paine and sorrow; and that they would willingly buy off their paine with the best of their substance: The proportion betwixt the complaint and satisfaction is more precious to him, then the Metall. There was a publike confession in this resemblance, which is so pleasing unto God, that he rewards it, even in wicked men, with a relaxation of outward punishment. The number was no lesse significant, then the form: Five golden Emerods, and Mise, for the five Princes and divisions of Philistims. As God made no difference in punishing, so they make none in their oblation: The people are comprised in them, in whom they are united, their severall Princes: They were one with their Prince, their Offering is one with his; as they were Ring-leaders in the sin, so they must be in the satisfaction: In a multitude it is ever seene, as in a beast, that the body follows the head. Of all others, great men had need to look to their wayes, it is in them, as in figures, one stands for a thousand: One Offering serves not all, there must be five, according to the five heads of the offence. Generalities will not content God; every man must make his severall peace, if not in himself, yet in his head: Nature taught them a shadow of that, the substance and perfection whereof is taught us by the grace of the Gospel; every soule must satisfie God, if not in it self, yet in him, in whom we are both one, and absolute: we are the body, whereof Christ is the head, our sin is in our selves, our satisfaction must be in him.

Samuel himself could not have spoken more divinely, then these Priests of Dagon; they do not only talk of giving glory to the God of Israel, but fall into an holy and grave expostulation (wherefore then should ye harden your hearts, as the Ægyptians, and Pharaoh hardned their hearts, when he wrought wonderfully amongst them? &c.) They confesse a supereminent and revenging hand of God over their gods, they parallel their plagues with the Ægyptian; they make use of Pharaohs sin, and judgement; What could be better said? All Religions have afforded them, that could speak well: These good words left them still both Philistims, and superstitious: How should men be hypocrites, if they had not good tongues? yet (as wickednesse can hardly hide it sefe) these holy speeches are not without a tincture of that Idolatry, wherewith the heart was infected: For they professe care not onely of the persons, and lands of the Philistims, but of their gods; (that he may take his hand from you, and from your gods.) Who would think that wisdome and folly could lodge so neere together? that the same men should have care both of the glory of the true God, and preservation of the false? That they should be so vaine, as to take thought for those gods which they granted to be obnoxious unto an higher Deitie? Oft times even one word bewrayeth a whole pack of falshood, and though Superstition be a cleanly counterfeit, yet some one slip of the tongue discovers it, as we say of devils, which though they put on faire formes, yet are they knowne by their cloven feet.

What other warrant these superstitious Priests had for the maine substance of their advice, I know not; sure I am, the probability of the event was faire; that two Kine never used to any yoak, should run from their Calves (which were newly shut up from them) to draw the Arke home into a contrary way, must needs argue an hand above nature: What else should over-rule bruit creatures to prefer a forced cariage unto a naturall burden? What should carry them from their owne home, towards the home of the Arke? What else should guide an untamed and untaught Teame, in as right a path toward Israel, as their Teachers could have gone? What else could make very beasts more wise then their Masters? There is a speciall providence of God, in the very motions of bruit creatures, Neither Philistims nor Israelites saw ought that drove them, yet they saw them so run, as those that were led by the Divine Conduct. The reasonlesse creatures also doe the will of their Maker; every act that is done either by them, or to them, makes up the decree of the Almighty; and if in extraordinary actions and events his hand is more visible, yet it is no lesse certainly present in the common.

Little did the Israelites of Bethshemesh look for such a sight whiles they were reaping their Wheat in the Valley, as to see the Arke of God come running to them without a Convoy; neither can it be said, whether they were more affected with joy,

or

A or with astonishment; with joy at the presence of the Ark, with astonishment at the Miracle of the transportation: Down went their Sickles, and now every man runs to reap the comfort of this better harvest, to meet that Bread of Angels, to salute those Cherubims, to welcome that God, whose absence had bin their death: But as it is hard not to over-joy in a sudden prosperity, and, to use happinesse is no lesse difficult, then to forbeare it; These glad Israelites cannot see but they must gaze, they cannot gaze on the glorious out-side, but they must be (whether out of rude jollity, or curiosity, or suspition of the purloining some of those sacred implements) prying into the secrets of Gods Ark: Nature is too subject to extremities, and is ever either too dull in want, or wanton in fruition: It is no easie matter to keep a meane, whether in good or evill.

B Bethshemesh was a City of Priests, they should have knowne better how to demeane themselves towards the Arke; this priviledge doubled their offence. There was no malice in this curious inquisition, the same eyes that lookt into the Arke, lookt also up to heaven in their Offerings, and the same hands that touched it, offered sacrifice to the God that brought it. Who could expect any thing now but acceptation? who would suspect any danger? It is not a following act of devotion that can make amends for a former sin: There was a death owing them, immediately upon their offence, God will take his owne time for the execution; In the meane while, they may sacrifice, but they cannot satisfie, they cannot escape. The Kine are sacrificed, the Cart burnes them that drew it: Here was an offering of praise, when they had more need of a trespasse offering; many an heart is lifted up in a conceit of joy, C when it hath just cause of humiliation: God lets them alone with their Sacrifice, but when that is done, he comes over them with a back-reckoning for their sin: Fifty thousand and seventy Israelites are struck dead for this unreverence to the Ark: A wofull welcome for the Ark of God into the borders of Israel. It killed them for looking into it, who thought it their life to see it; It dealt blowes, and death on both hands, to Philistims, to Israelites, to both of them for prophaning it: The one with their Idol, the other with their eyes. It is a fearfull thing to use the holy Ordinances of God with an unreverent boldnesse. Feare and trembling become us in our accesse to the Majesty of the Almighty: Neither was there more state, then secresie in Gods Arke; some things the wisdome of God desires to conceale; The unreverence of the Israelites was no more faulty, then their curiosity; secret things to God, things re- D vealed to us and to our children.

The remove of the Arke.

1 Sam. 4. 11

HEare of the Bethshemites lamentation, I heare not of their repentance; they complaine of their smart, they complaine not of their sin; and for ought I can perceive, speake, as if God were curious, rather then they faulty: (Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God, and to whom shall he go from us?) As if none could please that God which misliked them: It is the fashion of naturall men to justifie themselves in their owne courses; if they cannot charge any earthly thing with the blame of their suffering, they will cast it upon E Heaven: That a man pleads himselfe guilty of his own wrong, is no common work of Gods Spirit. Bethshemesh bordered too neare upon the Philistims; If these men thought the very presence of the Arke hurtfull, why doe they send to their neighbours of Kiriath-jearim, that they might make themselves miserable? Where there is a misconceit of God, it is no marvell if there be a defect of Charity: How cunningly doe they send their message to their neighbours? They doe not say, the Arke of God is come to us of it owne accord, lest the men of Kiriath-jearim should reply, It is come to you, let it stay with you: They say only, The Philistims have brought it; they tell of the presence of the Arke, they doe not tell of the successe, lest the example of their judgement should have discouraged the forwardnesse of their reliefe: And after all, the offer was plausible; Come ye downe and take it up to you; as if the honour had been too great for themselves, as if their modesty had beene such, that they would not forestall and engrosse happinesse from the rest of Israel.

It is no boot to teach Nature how to tell her own tale, smart and danger will make a man witty: He is rarely constant, that will not dissemble for ease. It is good to be suspicious of the evasions of those which would put off misery. Those of Bethshemesh were not more crafty then these of Kiriath-jearim (which was the ground of their boldnesse) faithfull: So many thousand Bethshemites could not be dead, and no part of the rumour flie to them: they heard how thick, not onely the Philistims, but the bordering Israelites fell downe dead before the Arke; yet they durst adventure to come, and fetch it, even from amongst the carkasses of their brethren: They had bin formerly acquainted with the Arke, they knew it was holy, it could not be changeable, and therefore they well conceived this slaughter to arise from the unholinesse of men, not from the rigour of God, and thereupon can seek comfort in that, which others found deadly: Gods children cannot by any meanes be discouraged from their honour, and love to his Ordinances: If they see thousands struck down to Hell by the Scepter of Gods Kingdome, yet they will kisse it upon their knees, and if their Saviour be a Rock of offence, and the occasion of the fall of millions in Israel, they can love him no lesse: They can warme them at the fire, wherewith they see others burned; they can feed temperately of that, whereof others have surfeited to death, &c.

Bethshemesh was a City of Priests and Levites: Kiriath-jearim a City of Juda, where we heare but of one Levite, Abinadab; yet this City was more zealous for God, more reverent and conscionable in the entertainment of the Arke, then the other. We heard of the taking down of the Ark by the Bethshemites, when it came miraculously to them; we doe not heare of any man sanctified for the attendance of it, as was done in this second lodging of the Ark: Grace is not tyed either to number, or meanes. It is in spirituall matters, as in the estate: Small helps with good thrift inrich us, when great patrimonies lose themselves in the neglect. Shiloh was wont to be the place which was honoured with the presence of the Ark; Ever since the wickednesse of Elies Sonnes, that was forlorn, and desolate, and now Kiriath-jearim succeeds into this priviledge: It did not stand with the royall liberty of God, no not under the Law, to tye himself unto places and persons: Unworthinesse was ever a sufficient cause of exchange. It was not yet his time to stir from the Jews, yet he removed from one Province to another: Lesse reason have we to think, that so God will reside amongst us, that none of our provocations can drive him from us, &c.

Israel, which had found the misery of Gods absence, is now resolved into teares of contrition, and thankfulnesse upon his returne: There is no mention of their lamenting after the Lord, while he was gone, but when he was returned, and settled in Kiriath-jearim: The mercies of God draw more teares from his children, then his judgements do from his enemies: There is no better sign of good nature or grace, then to be won to repentance with kindnesse: Not to think of God, except we be beaten unto it, is servile: Because God was come againe to Israel, therefore Israel is returned to God; If God had not come first, they had never come: If he, that came to them, had not made them come to him, they had bin ever parted. They were cloyed with God, while he was perpetually resident with them, now that his absence had made him dainty, they cleave to him fervently, and penitently in his returne: This was it, that God meant in his departure, a better welcome at his comming back.

I heard no newes of Samuel all this while the Ark was gone: Now when the Ark is returned and placed in Kiriath-jearim, I heare him treat with the people. It is not like, he was silent in this sad desertion of God, but now he takes full advantage of the professed contrition of Israel, to deale with them effectually, for their perfect conversion unto God. It is great wisdome in spirituall matters, to take Occasion by the fore-lock, and to strike whiles the iron is hot: We may beat long enough at the doore, but till God have opened, it is no going in, and when he hath opened, it is no delaying to enter. The tryall of sincerity is the abandoning of our wonted sinnes:

A sinnes. This Samuel urgeth (If ye be come againe unto the Lord with all your heart, put away the strange gods from among you, and Ashtaroth:) In vain had it been to professe repentance, whilst they continued in Idolatry; God will never acknowledge any convert that staies in a knowne sinne: Graces and Vertues are so linkt together, that he, which hath one, hath all: The partiall conversion of men unto God is but hatefull hypocrisie. How happily effectuall is a word spoken in season? Samuels exhortation wrought upon the hearts of Israel, and fetcht water out of their eyes; suits, and confessions, and vowes out of their lips, and their false gods out of their hands: yet it was not meerely remorse, but feare also, that moved Israel to this humble submission.

B The Philistims stood over them still, and threatned them with new assaults, the memory of their late slaughter, and spoyle, was yet fresh in their minds, sorrow for the evils past, and feare of the future fetcht them downe upon their knees: It is not more necessary for men to be cheared with hopes, then to be awed with dangers: where God intends the humiliation of his servants, there shall not want meanes of their dejection: It was happy for Israel that they had an enemy. Is it possible that the Philistims after those deadly plagues, which they sustained from the God of Israel, should think of invading Israel? those that were so mated with the presence of the Arke, that they never thought themselves safe, till it was out of sight, do they now dare to thrust themselves upon the new revenge of the Arke? It slew them whiles they thought to honour it, and doe they think to escape, whiles they resist it? It slew them in their own Coasts, and do they come to it to seek death? yet behold no sooner do the Philistims heare, that the Israelites are gathered to Mizpeh, but the Princes of the Philistims gather themselves against them: No warnings will serve obdurate hearts, wicked men are even ambitious of destruction; Judgements need not to goe finde them out, they run to meet their bane.

The Philistims come up, and the Israelites feare; they that had not the wit to feare, whilst they were not friends with God, have not now the grace of fearlessnesse, when they were reconciled to God: Boldnesse and Feare are commonly misplaced in the best hearts; When we should tremble, we are confident, and when we should be assured, we tremble: Why should Israel have feared, since they had made their peace with the God of Hosts? Nothing should affright those, which are upright with God. The peace, which Israel had made with God, was true, but tender. They durst not trust their owne innocency, so much as the prayers of Samuel; Cease not to cry to the Lord our God for us. In temporall things nothing hinders, but we may fare better for other mens faith, then for our owne: It is no small happinesse to be interessed in them which are Favourites in the Court of Heaven; one faithfull man in these occasions is more worth then millions of the wavering and uncertaine.

A good heart is easily won to devotion: Samuel cryes, and sacrificeth to God; he had done so, though they had intreated his silence, yea his forbearance. Whiles he is offering, the Philistims fight with Israel, and God fights with the Philistims. (The Lord thundred with a great thunder that day upon the Philistims, and scattered them:) Samuel fought more upon his knees, then all Israel besides: The voice of God answered E the voyce of Samuel, and speakes confusion and death to the Philistims: How were the proud Philistims dead with feare, ere they dyed, to heare the fearfull thunder-claps of an angry God against them? to see, that Heaven it self fought against them? He that slew them secretly in the revenges of his Arke, now kills them with open horrour in the fields: If presumption did not make wicked men mad, they would never lift their hand against the Almighty; what are they in his hands, when he is disposed to vengeance?

The meeting of Saul and Samuel.

1 Sam. 9.

SAmuel began his acquaintance with God early, and continued it long: He began it in his long Coats, and continued to his gray haires: (Hee judged Israel all the dayes of his life.) God doth not use to cast off his old Servants; their age indeareth them to him the more; If we be not unfaithfull to him, he cannot be unconstant to us. At last his decayed age met with ill partners, his Sonnes for Deputies, and Saul for a King; The wickednesse of his Sonnes gave the occasion of a change: Perhaps Israel had never thought of a King, if Samuels Sonnes had not beene unlike their Father: Who can promise himself holy children, when the loynes of a Samuel, and the education in the Temple, yeelded monsters? It is not likely, that good Samuel was faulty in that indulgence for which his owne mouth had denounced Gods judgements against Hely: yet this holy man succeeds Hely in his crosse, as well as his place, though not in his sin; and is afflicted with a wicked succession: God will let us finde, that grace is by gift, not by inheritance.

I feare Samuel was too partiall to nature in the surrogation of his Sons, I doe not heare of Gods allowance to this act: If this had been Gods choyce, as well as his, it had been like to have received more blessing. Now all Israel had cause to rue, that these were the Sons of Samuel, for now the question was not of their vertues, but of their bloud; not of their worthinesse, but their birth; even the best heart may be blinded with affection. Who can marvell at these errors of Parents love, when he that so holily judged Israel all his life, mis-judged of his owne Sons.

It was Gods ancient purpose to raise up a King to his people: How doth he take occasion to performe it, but by the unruly desires of Israel? even as we say of humane proceedings, that ill manners beget good lawes. That, Monarchy is the best forme of government, there is no question. Good things may be ill desired, so was this of Israel; If an itching desire of alteration had not possessed them, why did they not rather sue for a reformation of their Governours, then for a change of government? Were Samuels sons so desperately evill, that there was no possibility of amendment? Or if they were past hope, were there not some others to have succeeded the justice of Samuel, no lesse then these did his person? What needed Samuel to be thrust out of place? what needed the ancient forme of administration to be altred? He that raised up their Judges, would have found time to raise them up Kings: Their curious, and inconstant new-fangleneſſe, will not abide to stay it, but with an heady importunity labours to over-hasten the pace of God. Where there is a setled course of good government (howsoever blemished with some weaknesses) it is not safe to be over-forward to a change, though it should be to the better. He, by whom Kings reigne, sayes, They have cast him away that he should not reigne over them because they desire a King to reigne over them: Judges were his owne institution to his people, as yet Kings were not; after that Kings were setled, to desire the government of Judges, had bin a much more seditious inconstancy: God hath not appointed to every time and place those forms, which are simply best in themselves, but those, which are best to them, unto whom they are appointed; which we may neither alter, till he begin, nor recall, when he hath altred.

This businesse seemed personally to concern Samuel, yet he so deales in it, not as a party, not as a Judge of his own Case, but as a Prophet of God, as a friend of his opposite; He praies to God for advice, he foretels the state and courses of their future King. Wilfull men are blind to all dangers, are deafe to all good counsels. Israel must have a King though they pay never so deare for their longing: The vain affectation of conformity to other Nations overcomes all discouragements; there is no readier way to error, then to make others examples the rule of our desires, or actions. If every man have not grounds of his owne, whereon to stand, there can be no stability in his resolutions or proceedings.

Since

A Since then they chuſe to have a King, God himſelf will chuſe and appoint the King which they ſhall have. The Kingdome ſhall begin in Benjamin, which was to endure in Iuda: It was no probability or reaſon, this firſt King ſhould prove well, becauſe he was abortive, their humor of innovation deſerved to be puniſhed with their own choyce: Kiſh the father of Saul was mighty in eſtate, Saul was mighty in perſon, over-looking the reſt of the people in ſtature, no leſſe then he ſhould do in dignity. The ſenſes of the Iſraelites could not but be well pleaſed for the time, howſoever their hearts were afterwards; when men are carried with outward ſhewes, it is a ſigne that God meanes them a deluſion.

How farre God fetches his purpoſes about! The Aſſes of Kiſh, Sauls father, are ſtrayed away: What is that to the newes of a Kingdome? God laies theſe ſmall ac-
B cidents for the ground of greater deſignes: The Aſſes muſt be loſt, none but Saul muſt goe with his fathers ſervant to ſeek them: Samuel ſhall meet them in the ſearch: Saul ſhall be premoniſhed of his inſuing Royalty; Little can we by the beginning of any action, gueſſe at Gods intention in the concluſion.

Obedience was a fit entrance into Soveraignty: The ſervice was homely for the ſon of a great man, yet he refuſeth not to goe, as a fellow to his fathers ſervant, upon ſo meane a ſearch: The diſobedient and ſcornfull are good for nothing, they are neither fit to be ſubjects nor governours. Kiſh was a great man in his country, yet he diſdaineth not to ſend his ſon Saul upon a thrifty errand, neither doth Saul plead his diſparagement for a refuſal. Pride and wantonneſſe have marred our times: Great pa-
C rents count it a diſreputation to imploy their ſons in courſes of frugality; and their pampered children think it a ſhame to doe any thing: and ſo beare themſelves, as thoſe that hold it the onely glory to be either idle or wicked.

Neither doth Saul goe faſhionably to work, but does this ſervice heartily and painfully, as a man, that deſires rather to effect the command, then pleaſe the Commander: He paſſed from Ephraim to the Land of Shaliſha, from Shaliſha to Salim, from Salim to Jemini, whence his Houſe came; from Jemini to Zuph, not ſo much as ſtaying with any of his kinred ſo long as to victaile himſelf: He that was afterward an ill King, approved himſelfe a good Sonne. As there are diverſities of relations and offices, ſo there is of diſpoſitions; thoſe, which are excellent in ſome, attaine not to a mediocrity in other: It is no arguing from private vertues to publike; from dexterity in one ſtation to the reſt: A ſeverall grace belongs to the particular
D carriage of every place whereto we are called, which if we want, the place may well want us.

There was more praiſe of his obedience in ceaſing to ſeek, then in ſeeking: he takes care, leſt his father ſhould take care for him, that whilſt he ſtrould ſeeme officious in the leſſe, he might not neglect the greateſt. A blinde obedience in ſome caſes doth well, but it doth far better, when it is led with the eyes of diſcretion; otherwiſe we may more offend in pleaſing, then in diſobeying.

Great is the benefit of a wiſe and religious attendant, ſuch an one puts us into thoſe duties and actions which are moſt expedient, and leaſt thought of. If Saul had not had a diſcreet Servant, he had returned but as wiſe as he came; now he is drawn
E in to conſult with the man of God, and heares more then he hoped for. Saul was now a ſufficient journey from his fathers houſe, yet his religious ſervant in this remoteneſſe, takes knowledge of the place, where the Prophet dwels, and how honourably doth he mention him to his maſter: Behold, in this City is a man of God, and he is an honourable man, all that he ſaith commeth to paſſe: Gods Prophets are publique perſons; as their function, ſo their notice concernes every man: There is no reaſon God ſhould abate any of the reſpect due to his Miniſters under the Goſpell: Saint Pauls ſuit is both univerſall and everlaſting; I beſeech you, brethren, know them that labour among ſt you.

The chiefe praiſe is to be able to give good advice; the next is to take it. Saul is eaſily induced to condeſcend: He whoſe curioſity led him voluntarily at laſt, to the Witch of Endor, is now led at firſt by good counſell to the man of God; neither is his care in going, leſſe commendable, then his will to goe. For as a man, that had bin catechized not to goe unto God empty-handed, he asks, What ſhall we bring unto the man? What have we? The caſe is well altred in our times: Every man thinks, what may I keep back? There is no gain ſo ſweet, as of a robbed Altar; yet Gods charge is no leſſe under the Goſpel, Let him that is taught, make his Teacher partaker of all. As this faithfull care of Saul was a juſt preſage of ſucceſſe, more then he looked for, or could expect; ſo the ſacrilegious unthankfulneſſe of many, bodes that ruine to their ſoul and eſtate, which they could not have grace to feare. A

He that knew the Prophets abode, knew alſo the honor of his place, he could not but know that Samuel was a mixt perſon: The Judge of Iſrael, and the Seer: yet both Saul & his Servant purpoſe to preſent him with the fourth part of a ſhekle, to the value of about our five pence. They had learned that thankfulnes was not to be meaſured of good men by the weight, but by the will of the Retributor: How much more will God accept the ſmall offerings of his weak Servants, when he ſees them proceed from great love? B

The very maids of the City can give direction to the Prophet, they had liſtened after the holy affaires, they had heard of the Sacrifice, and could tell of the neceſſity of Samuels preſence: Thoſe that live within the Sun-ſhine of Religion, cannot but be ſomewhat coloured with thoſe beames: Where there is practice and example of piety in the better ſort, there will be a reflection of it upon the meaneſt: it is no ſmall benefit to live in religious and holy places, we ſhall be much to blame, if all goodneſſe fall beſide us: Yea ſo skilfull were theſe Damzels in the faſhions of their publike Sacrifices, that they could inſtruct Saul and his Servant, unasked, how the people would not eate, till Samuel came to bleſſe the Sacrifice. This meeting was not more a Sacrifice, then it was a Feaſt: theſe two agree well, we have never ſo much cauſe to rejoyce in feaſting, as when we have duly ſerved our God: The Sacrifice was a feaſt to God, the other to men; The body may eat and drink with contentment, when the ſoul hath bin firſt fed, and hath firſt feaſted the Maker of both: Goe eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy drink with a merry heart, for God now accepteth thy works. The Sacrifice was before conſecrated, when it was offered to God; but it was not conſecrated to them, till Samuel bleſſed it, his bleſſing made that meate holy to the gueſts, which was formerly hallowed to God: All creatures were made good, & took holineſſe from him, which gave them their being: Our ſin brought that curſe upon them, which (unleſſe our prayers remove it) cleaves to them ſtill, ſo as we receive them not without a curſe. We are not our owne friends except our Prayers help to take that away, which our ſin hath brought, that ſo to the cleane all may be cleane: It is an unmannerly godleſneſſe, to take Gods creatures without the leave of their Maker, and well may God withhold his bleſſing from them, which have not the grace to aske it. C D

Thoſe gueſts which were ſo religious, that they would not eat their Sacrifice unbleſſed, might have bleſſed it themſelves; Every man might pray, though every man might not ſacrifice; yet would they not either eat, or bleſſe, whiles they looked for the preſence of a Prophet. Every Chriſtian may ſanctifie his owne meat, but where thoſe are preſent, that are peculiarly ſanctified to God, this ſervice is fitteſt for them: It is commendable to teach Children the practice of Thankſ-giving, but the beſt is ever moſt meet to bleſſe our tables, and thoſe eſpecially, whoſe office it is to offer our prayers to God. E

Little did Saul think, that his comming and his errand was ſo noted of God, as that it was fore-ſignified unto the Prophet, and now, behold Samuel is told a day before of the man, time, and place of his meeting. The eye of Gods providence is no leſſe over all our actions, all our motions. We cannot goe any whither without him, he tells all our ſteps; ſince it pleaſeth God therefore to take notice of us, much more ſhould we take notice of him, and walk with him, in whom we move. Saul came beſide his expectation to the Prophet, he had no thought of any ſuch purpoſe, till his Servant made this ſudden motion unto him of viſiting Samuel, and yet God ſaies to his Prophet, I will ſend thee a man out of the Land of Benjamin. The over-ruling hand of the Almighty works us inſenſibly, and all our affaires to his own ſecret determinations;

A nations; ſo as whiles we think to doe our own wils, we do his. Our own intentions we may know, Gods purpoſes we know not; we muſt go the way that we are called, let him lead us to what end he pleaſeth; it is our duty to reſigne our ſelves and our wayes to the diſpoſition of God, and patiently and thankfully to await the iſſue of his decrees. The ſame God that fore-ſhewed Saul to Samuel, now points to him (See, this is the man,) and commands the Prophet to anoint him Governour over Iſrael: He, that told of Saul before he came, knew before he came into the world, what a man, what a King he would be; yet he chuſeth him out, and injoynes his inunction. It is one of the greateſt praiſes of Gods wiſdome, that he can turne the evill of men to his own glory. Advancement is not ever a ſigne of love either to the man, or to the place. It had been better for Saul, that his head had been euer dry: ſome God
B raiſeth up in judgement, that they may fall the more uneaſily; there are no men ſo miſerable, as thoſe that are great and evill.

It ſeemes that Samuel bore no great port in his out-ſide, for that Saul not diſcerning him, either by his habit, or attendants, comes to him, and askes him for the Seer; yet was Samuel as yet the Judge of Iſrael, the ſubſtitution of his Sonnes had not diſplaced himſelfe: There is an affable familiarity that becommeth Greatneſſe; It is not good for eminent perſons to ſtand alwaies upon the height of their ſtate, but ſo to behave themſelves, that as their ſociable carriage may not breed contempt, ſo their over-highneſſe may not breed a ſervile fearfulneſſe in their people.

How kindly doth Samuel entertain and invite Saul, yet it was he only that ſhould
C receive wrong by the future royalty of Saul? Who would not have looked that aged Samuel ſhould have emulated rather the glory of his young rivall, and have looked churliſhly upon the man that ſhould rob him of his authority? yet now, as if he came on purpoſe to gratifie him, he bids him to the feaſt, he honours him with the chiefe ſeat, hee reſerves a ſelect morſell for him, he tells him ingenuouſly the newes of his inſuing Soveraignty, (On whom is ſet the deſire of all Iſrael, is it not upon thee and thy fathers houſe?) Wiſe and holy men, as they are not ambitious of their owne burden, ſo they are not unwilling to be eaſed, when God pleaſeth to diſcharge them; neither can they envy thoſe whom God lifteth above their heads: They make an Idol of honour, that are troubled with their owne freedome, or grudge at the promotion of others.

D Doubtleſſe Saul was much amazed with this ſtrange ſalutation, and newes of the Prophet, and how modeſtly doth he put it off, as that, which was neither fit, nor likely, diſparaging his Tribe in reſpect of the reſt of Iſrael, his Fathers Family, in reſpect of the Tribe, and himſelfe in reſpect of his Fathers Family; neither did his humility ſtoop below the truth: For, as Benjamin was the youngeſt ſon of Iſrael, ſo he was now by much, the leaſt Tribe of Iſrael; They had not yet recovered that univerſall ſlaughter which they had received from the hands of their brethren, whereby a Tribe was almoſt loſt to Iſrael; yet even out of the remainder of Benjamin doth God chuſe the man, that ſhall command Iſrael; out of the rubbiſh of Benjamin doth God raiſe the Throne. That is not ever the beſt and fatteſt which God chooſeth, but that which God chooſeth is ever the fitteſt; the ſtrength or weakneſſe of meanes is
E neither ſpur nor bridle to the determinate choyces of God, yea rather he holds it the greateſt proofe of his freedome, and omnipotency, to advance the unlikelieſt. It was no hollow and fained excuſe, that Saul makes to put off that, which he would fain injoy, and to cauſe honour to follow him the more eagerly: It was the ſincere truth of his humility, that ſo dejected him under the hand of Gods Prophet. Faire beginnings are no ſound proofe of our proceedings and ending well: How often hath a baſhfull childhood ended in an impudency of youth, a ſtrict entrance in licenciouſneſſe, early forwardneſſe in Atheiſme? There might be a civill meekneſſe in Saul, true grace there was not in him; they that be good, beare more fruit in their age.

Saul had but five pence in his purſe to give the Prophet: The Prophet after much good cheere gives him the Kingdome, he beſtowes the oyle of royall conſecration on

on his head, the Kisses of homage upon his face, & sends him away rich in thoughts, and expectation; and now lest his astonishment should end in distrust, he settles his assurance, by forewarnings of those events, which he should find in his way: He tels him whom he shall meet, what they shall say, how himself shall be affected; that all these, and himself might be so many witnesses of his following Coronation; every word confirmed him. For well might he think, He that can foretell me the motions and words of others, cannot fail in mine; especially when (as Samuel had prophesied to him) he found himself to prophesie; his prophesying did enough foretell his Kingdome. No sooner did Samuel turn his back from Saul, but God gave him another heart, lifting up his thoughts and disposition to the pitch of a King: the calling of God never leaves a man unchanged, neither did God ever imploy any man in his service, whom he did not enable to the work he set him; especially those whom he raiseth up to the supply of his own place, and the representation of himself. It is no marvell if Princes excell the vulgar in gifts, no lesse then in dignity: Their Crowns and their hearts are both in one and the same hand; If God did not adde to their powers, as well as their honours, there would be no equality.

The Inauguration of Saul.

1 Sam. 10.

GOD hath secretly destined Saul to the Kingdome; it could not content Israel, that Samuel knew this, the lots must so decide the choyce, as if it had not bin predetermined; That God, which is ever constant to his owne decrees, makes the lots to finde him out, whom Samuel had anointed; If once we have notice of the will of God, we may be confident of the issue: There is no chance to the Almighty; even casuall things are no lesse necessary in their first cause, then the naturall. So farre did Saul trust the prediction, and oyle of Samuel, that he hides him among the stuffe: He knew where the lots would light before they were cast: This was but a modest declination of that honour which he saw must come; His very withdrawing shewed some expectation, why else should he have hid himselfe, rather then the other Israelites; yet could he not hope his subducing himself, could disappoint the purpose of God: He well knew, that he, which found out and designed his name amongst the thousands of Israel, would easily finde out his person in a Tent: When once we know Gods decree, in vaine shall we strive against it: Before we know it, it is indifferent for us to work to the likeliest.

I cannot blame Saul for hiding himself from a Kingdome, especially of Israel: Honor is heavy when it comes upon the best tearmes: How should it be otherwise when all mens cares are cast upon one? but most of all in a troubled estate? No man can put to Sea without danger, but he that lancheth forth in a tempest, can expect nothing but the hardest event; such was the condition of Israel: Their old enemy the Philistims were stilled with that fearfull thunder of God, as finding what it was to war against the Almighty. There were adversaries enough besides in their borders; It was but an hollow truce, that was betwixt Israel and their Heathenish neighbors; and Nahash was now at their gates. Well did Saul know the difference betweene a peacefull government, and the perillous and wearisome tumults of warre. The quietest Throne is full of cares, but the perplexed, of dangers. Cares and dangers drove Saul into this corner to hide his head from a Crown: These made him chuse rather to lie obscurely among the baggage of his Tent, then to sit gloriously in the Throne of State. This hiding could doe nothing but shew, that both he suspected lest he should be chosen, and desired he should not be chosen: That God from whom the hils and the rocks could not conceale him, brings him forth to the light, so much more longed for, as he was more unwilling to be seene; and more applauded, as he was more longed for.

Now then when Saul is drawn forth in the middest of the eager expectation of Israel, modesty and godlinesse shewed themselves in his face: The presse cannot hide

A hide him, whom the ſtuffe had hid; As if he had beene made to be ſeene, he overlookes all Iſrael in height of ſtature, for preſage of the eminence of his eſtate (from the ſhoulders upward was he higher then any of the people.) Iſrael ſees their lots are falne upon a noted man; one, whoſe perſon ſhewed, he was borne to be a King; and now all the people ſhout for joy, they have their longing, and applaud their owne happineſſe, and their Kings honor: How eaſie is it for us to miſtake our own eſtates? to rejoyce in that which we ſhall finde the juſt cauſe of our humiliation? The end of a thing is better then the beginning; the ſafeſt way is to reſerve our joy, till we have good proofe of the worthineſſe and fitneſſe of the object. What are we the better for having a bleſſing, if we know not how to uſe it? The office and obſervance of a King was uncouth to Iſrael: Samuel therefore informes the people of their mutuall
B duties, and writes them in a booke, and laies it up before the Lord; otherwiſe, novelty might have beene a warrant for their ignorance, and ignorance for neglect: there are reciprocall reſpects of Princes and people, which if they be not obſerved, government languiſheth into confuſion; theſe Samuel faithfully teacheth them. Though he may not be their Judge, yet he will be their Prophet; he will inſtruct, if he may not rule; yea he will inſtruct him that ſhall rule; there is no King abſolute, but he, that is the King of all gods: Earthly Monarchs muſt walk by a rule, which if they tranſgreſſe, they ſhal be accountable to him, that is higher then the higheſt, who hath deputed them. Not out of care of civility, ſo much as conſcience, muſt every Samuel labour to keep eaven terms betwixt Kings and Subjects, preſcribing juſt moderation to the one, to the other obedience and loyalty, which who ever endeavours
C to trouble, is none of the friends of God, or his Church.

The moſt and beſt applaud their new King, ſome wicked ones deſpiſed him, and ſaid, How ſhall he ſave us? It was not the might of his Parents, the goodlineſſe of his perſon, the priviledge of his lot, the fame of his propheſying, the panegyrick of Samuel, that could ſhield him from contempt, or win him the hearts of all: There was never yet any man, to whom ſome tooke not exceptions; It is not poſſible either to pleaſe or diſpleaſe all men, while ſome men are in love with vice, as deeply, as others with vertue, and ſome (as ill) diſlike vertue, if not for it ſelfe, yet for contradiction. They well ſaw, Saul choſe not himſelfe, they ſaw him worthy to have beene choſen, if the Election ſhould have been carried by voyces, and thoſe voyces by their eyes; they ſaw him unwilling to hold, or yeeld, when he was choſen: yet
D they will envy him: What fault could they find in him whom God had choſen? His parentage was equall, his perſon above them, his inward parts more above them then the outward; Malecontents will rather deviſe then want cauſes of flying out, and rather then faile, the univerſall approbation of others is ground enough of their diſlike. It is a vaine ambition of thoſe, that would be loved of all: The ſpirit of God when he enjoynes us peace, withall he addes, [if it be poſſible] and favour is more then peace; A mans comfort muſt be in himſelfe, the conſcience of deſerving well.

The neighbouring Ammonites could not but have heard of GODS fearfull vengeance upon the Philiſtims, and yet they will bee taking up the quarrell againſt Iſrael: Nahaſh comes up againſt Jabeſh Gilead: Nothing but grace can
E teach us to make uſe of others Judgements: Wicked men are not moved with ought, that falls beſide them; they truſt nothing but their own ſmart: What fearfull Judgements doth GOD execute every day? reſolute ſinners take no notice of them, and are growne ſo peremptory, as if God had never ſhewed diſlike of their wayes.

The Gileadites were not more baſe, then Nahaſh the Ammonite was cruell: The Gileadites would buy their peace with ſervility, Nahaſh would ſell them a ſervile peace for their right eyes. Iephta the Gileadite did yet ſtick in the ſtomack of Ammon, and now they think their revenge cannot be too bloudy: It is a wonder that he, which would offer ſo mercileſſe a condition to Iſrael, would yeeld to the motion of any delay; He meant nothing but ſhame and death to the Iſraelites, yet he condeſcends to a ſeven dayes reſpit: Perhaps his confidence made him thus careleſſe leſſe. Howſoever it was the reſtraint of God that gave this breath to Iſrael, and this opportunity to Sauls courage and victory: The enemies of Gods Church cannot be ſo malicious as they would, cannot approve themſelves ſo malicious, as they are; God ſo holds them in ſometimes, that a ſtander-by would think them favourable. The newes of Gileads diſtreſſe had ſoone filled and afflicted Iſrael, the people think of no remedy, but their pitty and teares: Evils are eaſily grieved for, not eaſily redreſſed: Onely Saul is more ſtirred with indignation then ſorrow; That God which put into him a ſpirit of propheſie, now puts into him a ſpirit of fortitude: He was before appointed to the Throne, not ſetled in the Throne; he followed the beaſts in the field, when he ſhould have commanded men. A

Now as one that would be a King no leſſe by merit, then election, he takes upon him, and performes the reſcue of Gilead; he aſſembles Iſrael, he leads them, he raiſeth the ſiege, breaks the troups, cuts the throats of the Ammonites. When God hath any exploit to performe, he raiſeth up the heart of ſome choſen Inſtrument with heroicall motions for the atchievement: When all hearts are cold and dead, it is a ſigne of intended deſtruction. B

This day hath made Saul a compleat King, and now the thankfull Iſraelites begin to enquire after thoſe diſcontented Mutiners, which had refuſed allegiance unto ſo worthy a Commander (Bring thoſe men, that we may ſlay them:) This ſedition had deſerved death, though Saul had been foiled at Gilead; but now his happy victory whets the people much more to a deſire of this juſt execution. Saul, to whom the injury was done, hinders the revenge, (There ſhall no man die this day, for to day the Lord hath ſaved Iſrael) that his fortitude might not goe beyond his mercy. How noble were theſe beginnings of Saul? His propheſie ſhewed him miraculouſly wiſe, his Battell and victory no leſſe valiant, his pardon of his Rebels, as mercifull: There was not more power ſhewed in overcomming the Ammonites, then in overcomming himſelfe, and the impotent malice of theſe mutinous Iſraelites. Now Iſrael ſees they have a King, that can both ſhed bloud, and ſpare it; that can ſhed the Ammonites bloud, and ſpare theirs: His mercy wins thoſe hearts, whom his valour could not. As in God, ſo in his Deputies, Mercy and Juſtice ſhould be inſeparable: whereſoever theſe two goe aſunder, government followes them into diſtraction, & ends in ruine. If it had beene a wrong offered to Samuel, the forbearance of the revenge had not been ſo commendable; although upon the day of ſo happy a deliverance, perhaps it had not been ſeaſonable: A man hath reaſon to be moſt bold with himſelf; It is no praiſe of mercy (ſince it is a fault in Juſtice) to remit another mans ſatisfaction, his owne he may. C D

EVery one can be a friend to him that proſpereth: By this victory hath Saul as well conquered the obſtinacy of his owne people: Now there is no Iſraelite that rejoyceth not in Sauls Kingdome. No ſooner have they done objecting to Saul, then Samuel begins to expoſtulate with them: The ſame day wherein they began to be pleaſed, God ſhewes himſelfe angry: All the paſſages of their proceedings offended him, he deferred to let them know it till now, that the Kingdome was ſetled, and their hearts lifted up: Now doth God coole their courage and joy, with a back-reckoning for their forwardneſſe. God will not let his people run away with the arrerages of their ſinnes, but when they leaſt think of it, calls them to an account: All this while was God angry with their rejection of Samuel; yet (as if there had been nothing but peace) he gives them a victory over their enemies, he gives way to their joy in their election; now he lets them know, that after their peace-offerings, he hath a quarrell with them. God may be angry enough with us, whiles we outwardly proſper: It is the wiſdome of God to take his beſt advantages; He ſuffers us to go on, till we ſhould come to enjoy E joy the fruit of our sinne, till we seeme past the danger, either of conscience or punishment; then (even when we begin to be past the feeling of our sin) we shall begin to feele his displeasure for our sins: This is only where he loves, where he would both forgive and reclaime; he hath now to doe with his Israel: But where he meanes utter vengeance, he lets men harden themselves to a reprobate senselesnesse, and make up their owne measure without contradiction, as purposing to reckon with them but once for ever.

Samuel had disswaded them before, he reproves them not, untill now: If he had thus bent himself against them, ere the setling of the election, he had troubled Israel in that, which God took occasion by their sin to establish; His opposition would have savoured of respects to himselfe, whom the wrong of this innovation chiefly concerned: Now therefore when they are sure of their King, and their King of them, when he hath set even termes betwixt them mutually, he lets them see, how they were at oddes with God: We must ever dislike sins, we may not ever shew it: Discretion in the choyce of seasons for reproving, is no lesse commendable and necessary, then zeale and faithfulnesse in reproving; Good Physitians use not to evacuate the body in extremities of heat or cold; Wise Mariners doe not hoise sayles in every winde.

First doth Samuel begin to cleare his owne innocence, ere he dare charge them with their sin: He that will cast a stone at an offender, must be free himselfe, otherwise he condemnes, and executes himselfe in another person: The conscience stops the mouth of the guilty man, and chokes him with that sin, which lyes in his owne breast, and having not come forth by a penitent confession, cannot find the way out in a reproofe, or if he doe reprove, he doth more shame himselfe, then reforme another. He that was the Judge of Israel, would not now judge himselfe, but would be judged by Israel; Whose Oxe have I taken? whose Asse have I taken? or to whom have I done wrong? No doubt, Samuel found himself guilty before God of many private infirmities, but for his publique carriage he appeales to men: A mans heart can best judge of himselfe; others can best judge of his actions. As another mans conscience and approbation cannot beare us out before God, so cannot our owne before men: For oft-times that action is censured by the beholders, as wrongfull, wherein we applaud our own justice. Happy is that man, that can be acquitted by himselfe in private, in publike by others, by God in both; standers by may see more: It is very safe for a man to look into himselfe by others eyes; in vaine shall a mans heart absolve him, that is condemned by his actions.

It was not so much the tryall of his carriage, that Samuel appealed for, as his justification; not for his owne comfort, so much as their conviction: His innocence hath not done him service enough, unlesse it shame them, and make them confesse themselves faulty. In so many yeares wherein Samuel judged Israel, it cannot be but many thousand causes passed his hands, wherein both parties could not possibly be pleased; yet so clear doth he find his heart, and hands, that he dare make the grieved part judges of his judgment: A good conscience will make a man undauntedly confident, and dare put him upon any triall; where his own heart strikes him not, it bids him challenge all the world, and take up all commers. How happy a thing is it for a man to be his own friend, and patron? He needs not to feare forraine broyles, that is at peace at home: Contrarily, he that hath a false and foule heart, lies at every mans mercy; lives slavishly, and is faine to dawb up a rotten peace with the basest conditions. Truth is not afraid of any light, and therefore dare suffer her wares to be caried from a dim shop-board unto the street doore: Perfect gold will be but the purer with trying, whereas falshood being a work of darknesse, loves darknesse, and therefore seeks where it may work closest.

This very appellation cleared Samuel, but the peoples attestation cleared him more: Innocency and uprightnesse becomes every man well, but most publike persons, who shall be else obnoxious to every offender. The Throne and the Pulpit (of all places) call for holinesse, no more for example of good, then for liberty of controlling evill: All Magistrates sweare to doe that, which Samuel protested he hath done; If their oath oath were so verified, as Samuels protestation, it were a shame for the State not to be happy: The sins of our Teachers are the teachers of sin; the sins of Governours doe both command, and countenance evill. This very acquiting of Samuel was the accusation of themselves: For how could it be but faulty to cast off a faultlesse Governor? If he had not taken away an Oxe, or an Asse from them, why do they take away his authority? They could not have thus cleared Saul at the end of his raigne; It was just with God, since they were weary of a just Ruler, to punish them with an unjust.

He that appealed to them for his own uprightnesse, durst not appeale to them for their own wickednesse, but appeales to Heaven from them. Men are commonly flatterers of their own cases: It must be a strong evidence that will make a sinner convicted in himselfe: Nature hath so many shifts to cozen it self in this spirituall verdict, that unlesse it be taken in the manner, it will hardly yeeld to a truth; either she will deny the fact, or the fault, or the measure; And now in this case they might seeme to have some faire pretences; For though Samuel was righteous, yet his sons were corrupt. To cut off all excuses therefore, Samuel appeales to God (the highest Judge) for his sentence of their sin, and dares trust to a miraculous conviction. It was now their Wheat-Harvest; the hot and dry aire of that climate did not wont to afford in that season so much moist vapour, as might raise a cloud either forraine, or thunder. He that knew God could, and would doe both these, without the help of second causes, puts the triall upon this issue. Had not Samuel before consulted with his Maker, and received warrant for his act, it had bin presumption and tempting of God, which was now a noble improvement of faith: Rather then Israel shall goe cleare away with a sin, God will accuse and arraigne them from heaven. No sooner hath Samuels voyce ceased, then Gods voyce begins: Every crack of thunder spake judgement against the rebellious Israelites, and every drop of rain, was a witnesse of their sin; and now they found they had displeased him, which ruleth in the Heaven, by rejecting the man that ruleth for him on Earth. The thundring voice of God, that had lately in their sight confounded the Philistims, they now understood to speak fearfull things against them. No marvell, If now they fell upon their knees, not to Saul whom they had chosen, but to Samuel, who being thus cast off by them, is thus countenanced in Heaven.

Sauls Sacrifice.

1 Sam. 13.

GOD never meant the Kingdome should either stay long in the Tribe of Benjamin, or remove suddenly from the person of Saul. Many yeares did Saul reigne over Israel; yet God computes him but two yeares a King: That is not accounted of God to be done, which is not lawfully done; when God, which chose Saul, rejected him, he was no more a King, but a Tyrant: Israel obeyed him still, but God makes no reckoning of him, as his Deputy, but as an Usurper.

Saul was of good yeares, when he was advanced to the Kingdome: His Son Jonathan, the first yeare of his Fathers Raigne, could lead a thousand Israelites into the field, and give a foyle to the Philistims: And now Israel could not think themselves lesse happy in their Prince, then in their King; Jonathan is the Heyre of his Fathers victory, as well as of his valour, and his estate. The Philistims were quiet after those first thunder-claps, all the time of Samuels government, now they begin to stir under Saul.

How utterly is Israel disappointed in their hopes? That security and protection, which they promised themselves in the name of a King, they found in a Prophet, failed of in a Warriour; They were more safe under the mantle, then under arms: both eminity and safeguard are from heaven, goodnesse hath been ever a stronger guard then valour: It is the surest policy alwaies to have peace with God.

We

A We find by the ſpoiles, that the Philiſtims had ſome battels with Iſrael which are not recorded: After the thunder had ſcared them into a peace, and reſtitution of all the bordering Cities, from Ekron to Gath, they had taken new heart, and ſo beſlaved Iſrael, that they had neither weapon nor Smith left amongſt them, yet even in this miſerable nakedneſſe of Iſrael, have they both fought, and overcome. Now might you have ſeen the unarmed Iſraelites marching with their Slings, and Ploughſtaves, and Hooks, and Forks, and other inſtruments of their husbandry, againſt a mighty and well furniſhed enemy, and returning laded both with Armes and Victory. No Armour is of proofe againſt the Almighty, neither is he unweaponed, that caries the revenge of God: There is the ſame diſadvantage in our ſpirituall conflicts; we are turned naked to principalities and powers; whilſt we goe under the conduct
B of the Prince of our peace, we cannot but be bold and victorious.

Vain men think to over-power God with munition and multitude: The Philiſtims are not any way more ſtrong, then in conceit: Thirty thouſand Chariots, ſixe thouſand Horſemen, Footmen like the ſand for number, makes them ſcorn Iſrael no leſſe, then Iſrael feares them. When I ſee the miraculous ſucceſſe, which had bleſſed the Iſraelites, in all their late conflicts with theſe very Philiſtims, with the Ammonites, I cannot but wonder, how they could feare: They, which in the time of their ſin found God to raiſe ſuch Trophees over their enemies, run now into Caves, and Rocks, and Pits, to hide them from the faces of men, when they found God reconciled, and themſelves penitent. No Iſraelite but hath ſome cowardly bloud in him: If we had no feare, faith would have no maſtery, yet theſe fearfull Iſraelites ſhall cut
C the throats of thoſe confident Philiſtims: Doubt and reſolution are not meet meaſures of our ſucceſſe: A preſumptuous confidence goes commonly bleeding home, when an humble feare returns in triumph. Feare drives thoſe Iſraelites, which dare ſhew their heads, out of the Caves unto Saul, and makes them cling unto their new King: How troubleſome were the beginnings of Sauls honour? Surely, if that man had not exceeded Iſrael no leſſe in courage, then in ſtature, he had now hid himſelfe in a Cave, which before hid himſelfe among the ſtuffe: But now, though the Iſraelites ran away from him, yet he ran not away from them: It was not any doubt of Sauls valour, that put his people to their heeles, it was the abſence of Samuel; If the Prophet had come up, Iſrael would never have run away from their King; Whiles they had a Samuel alone, they were never well till they had a Saul, now they have a
D Saul, they are as far from contentment, becauſe they want a Samuel; unleſſe both joyn together, they think there can be no ſafety. Where the Temporall and Spirituall State combine not together, there can follow nothing but diſtraction in the people: The Prophets receive and deliver the will of God, Kings execute it: The Prophets are directed by God, the people are directed by their Kings. Where men doe not ſee God before them in his Ordinances, their hearts cannot but faile them, both in their reſpects to their ſuperiours, and their courage in themſelves. Piety is the Mother of perfect ſubjection; As all authority is derived from heaven, ſo it is thence eſtabliſhed; Thoſe Governours that would command the hearts of men, muſt ſhew them God in their faces.

No Iſraelite can think himſelf ſafe without a Prophet: Saul had given them good E proofe of his fortitude, in his late victory over the Ammonites, but then Proclamation was made before the fight through all the Countrey, that every man ſhould come up after Saul and Samuel: If Samuel had not bin with Saul, they would rather have ventured the loſſe of their Oxen, then the hazard of themſelves. How much leſſe ſhould we preſume of any ſafety in our ſpirituall combats, when we have not a Prophet to lead us? It is all one (ſaving that it ſavours of more contempt) not to have Gods Seers, and not to uſe them: He can be no true Iſraelite, that is not diſtreſſed with the want of a Samuel.

As one that had learned to begin his rule in obedience, Saul ſtaies ſeven dayes in Gilgal, according to the Prophets direction, and ſtill he looks long for Samuel, which had promiſed his preſence; ſix daies he expects, and part of the ſeventh, yet Samuel is not come: The Philiſtims draw neere, the Iſraelites run away, Samuel comes not, they must fight, God must be supplicated, what should Saul doe? rather then God should want a sacrifice, and the people satisfaction, Saul will command that, which he knew Samuel would, if he were present, both command, and execute: It is not possible (thinks he) that God should be displeased with a sacrifice, he cannot but be displeased with indevotion: Why doe the people run from me, but for want of meanes to make God sure? What should Samuel rather wish, then that we should be godly? The act shall be the same, the onely difference shall be in the person: If Samuel be wanting to us, we will not be wanting to God; it is but an holy prevention to be devout unbidden: Upon this conceit he commands a sacrifice; Sauls sins make no great shew, yet are they still hainously taken, the impiety of them was more hidden, and inward from all eyes, but Gods. If Saul were among the Prophets before, will he now be among the Priests? Can there be any devotion in disobedience? O vain man! What can it availe thee to sacrifice to God against God? Hypocrites rest only in formalities; If the outward act be done, it sufficeth them, though the ground be distrust, the manner unreverence, the carriage presumption.

What then should Saul have done? Upon the trust of God and Samuel he should have staid out the last houre, and have secretly sacrificed himselfe, and his prayers unto that God, which loves Obedience above sacrifice. Our faith is most commendable in the last act; It is no praise to hold out, untill we be hard driven: Then, when we are forsaken of meanes, to live by faith in our God, is worthy of a Crown: God will have no worship of our devising, we may only do what he bids us, not bid what he commands not. Never did any true piety arise out of the corrupt puddle of mans brain; If it flow not from Heaven, it is odious to Heaven: What was it, that did thus taint the valour of Saul with this weakneſſe, but distrust? He saw some Israelites goe, he thought all would goe; he saw the Philistims come, he saw Samuel came not, his diffidence was guilty of his misdevotion: There is no sin, that hath not his ground from unbeleefe; This as it was the first infection of our pure nature, so is the true source of all corruption; man could not sin, if he distrusted not.

The sacrifice is no sooner ended, then Samuel is come: and why came he no sooner? He could not be a Seer, and not know how much he was lookt for, how troublesome and dangerous his absence must needs be; He, that could tell Saul, that he should propheſie, could tell, that he would sacrifice; yet he purposely forbeares to come, for the tryall of him, that must be the Champion of God. Samuel durst not have done thus, but by direction from his Master: It is the ordinary course of God to prove us by delaies, and to drive to exigents, that we may shew what we are: He that anointed Saul, might lawfully from God controll him: There must be discretion, there may not be partiality in our censures of the greatest: God makes difference of sins, none of persons; if we make difference of sins according to persons, we are unfaithfull both to God and man. Scarce is Saul warm in his Kingdome, when he hath even lost it. Samuels first words after the inauguration, are of Sauls rejection, and the choice and establishment of his Successor: It was ever Gods purpose to settle the Kingdome in Judah: He that took occasion by the peoples sin to raise up Saul in Benjamin, takes occasion by Sauls sin to establish the Crowne upon David. In humane probability the Kingdome was fixed upon Saul, and his more worthy Son: In Gods Decree it did but passe through the hands of Benjamin to Iudah. Besides trouble, how fickle are these earthly glories? Saul doubtlesse lookt upon Ionathan, as the Inheritour of his Crowne; and behold, ere his peaceable Possession, he hath lost it from himself: Our sins strip us not of our hopes in heaven only, but of our earthly blessings; The way to entaile a comfortable prosperity upon our Seed after us, is our conscionable obedience unto God.

IT is no wonder if Sauls courage were much cooled with the heavy newes of his rejection: After this he ſtaies under the Pomegranate tree in Gibeah; He ſtirres not towards the Gariſon of the Philiſtims: As Hope is the mother of Fortitude, ſo nothing doth more breed cowardlineſſe, then deſpaire: Every thing diſmayes that heart, which God hath put out of protection. Worthy Ionathan (which ſprung from Saul as ſome ſweet Impe growes out of a Crabſtock) is therefore full of valour, becauſe full of faith: He well knew, that he ſhould have nothing, but diſcouragements from his fathers feare; as rather chooſing therefore, to avoid all the blocks that might lye in the way, then to leap over them, he departs ſecretly without the diſmiſſion of his Father, or notice of the people; onely God leads him, and his Armour-bearer followes him. O admirable faith of Ionathan, whom neither the ſteepneſſe of Rocks, nor the multitude of enemies can diſſwade from ſo unlikely an aſſault! Is it poſſible, that two men, whereof one was weaponleſſe, ſhould dare to think of incountring ſo many thouſands? O Divine Power of Faith, that in all difficulties and attempts, makes a man more then men, and regards no more armies of men, then ſwarmes of flyes! There is no reſtraint to the Lord (ſaith he) to ſave with many, or by few: It was not ſo great newes, that Saul ſhould be amongſt the Prophets, as that ſuch a word ſhould come from the Son of Saul.

If his Father had had but ſo much Divinity, he had not ſacrificed: The ſtrength of his God, is the ground of his ſtrength in God; The queſtion is not, what Ionathan can doe, but what God can doe, whoſe power is not in the meanes, but in himſelfe: That mans faith is well underlaid, that uphols it ſelf by the Omnipotency of God; thus the Father of the faithfull built his aſſurance upon the power of the Almighty. But many things God can doe, which he will not doe; How knoweſt thou, Ionathan, that God will be as forward, as he is able, to give thee victory? For this (ſaith he) I have a watch-word from God, out of the mouthes of the Philiſtims: If they ſay, Come up, we will goe up; for God hath delivered them into our hands: If they ſay, Tarry, till we come to you, we will ſtand ſtill: Ionathan was too wiſe to truſt unto a caſuall preſage: There might be ſome far fetcht conjectures of the event from the word; We will come to you, was a threat of reſolution; Come you to us, was a challenge of feare; or perhaps, Come up to us, was a word of inſultation, from them, that truſted to the inacceſſiblenſſe of the place, and multitudes of men. Inſultation is from pride, pride argued a fall, but faith hath nothing to doe with probabilities, as that, which acknowledgeth no Argument, but demonſtration; If there had not been an inſtinct from God of this aſſured warrant of ſucceſſe, Ionathan had preſumed, in ſtead of beleeving, and had tempted that GOD, whom he profeſſed to glorifie by his truſt.

There can be no faith, where there is no promiſe, and where there is a promiſe, there can be no preſumption: Words are voluntary; The tongues of the Philiſtims were as free to ſay, Tarry, as Come: That God, in whom our very tongues move, overruled them ſo, as now they ſhall ſpeak that word, which ſhall cut their own throats: They knew no more harm in Come, then Tarry; both were alike ſafe for the ſound, for the ſenſe; but he, that put a ſignification of their ſlaughter in the one, not in the other, did put that word into their mouth, whereby they might invite their own deſtruction. The diſpoſition of our words are from the providence of the Almighty. God and our hearts have not alwaies the ſame meaning in our ſpeeches: In thoſe words, which we ſpeak at randome, or out of affectation, God hath a further drift of his own glory, and perhaps our judgement. If wicked men ſay, Our tongues are our owne, they could not ſay ſo, but from him, whom they defie in ſaying ſo, and who makes their tongue their executioner. A

No ſooner doth Ionathan heare this invitation, then he anſwers it: He, whoſe hands had learned never to faile his heart, puts himſelf upon his hands and knees to climb up into this danger: the exploit was not more difficult, then the way, the pain of the paſſage was equall to the perill of the enterpriſe; that his faith might equally triumph, over both: he doth not ſay, how ſhall I get up? much leſſe, which way ſhall I get down again? but as if the ground were levell, and the action dangerleſſe, he puts himſelf into the view of the Philiſtims: Faith is never ſo glorious, as when it hath moſt oppoſition, and will not ſee it: Reaſon looks ever to the meanes, Faith to the end; and in ſtead of conſulting, how to effect, reſolves what ſhall be effected. The way to heaven is more ſteep, more painfull: O God! how perillous a paſſage haſt thou appointed for thy labouring Pilgrims? If difficulties will diſcourage us, we ſhall but climbe to fall: When we are lifting up our foot to the laſt ſtep, there are the Philiſtims of death, of temptations, to grapple with; give us but faith, and turne us looſe to the ſpight either of Earth or Hell. B

Ionathan is now on the top of the hill, and now, as if he had an army at his heeles, he flyes upon the hoſt of the Philiſtims; his hands that might have bin weary with climbing, are immediately commanded to fight, and deal as many deaths as blowes, to the amazed enemy: He needes not walk farre for this execution; Himſelfe, and his Armour-bearer in one halfe acres ſpace have ſlaine twenty Philiſtims. It is not long ſince Ionathan ſmote their Gariſon in the hill of Geba, perhaps, from that time his name and preſence carryed terror in it; but ſure if the Philiſtims had not ſeene and felt more then a man in the face and hands of Ionathan, they had not ſo eaſily grovelled in death: The blowes and ſhrickes cannot but affect the next, who with a ghaſtly noiſe ran away from death, and affright their fellowes no leſſe then themſelves are affrighted. The clamour and feare runs on like fire in a traine, to the very formoſt ranks; Every man would flye, and thinks there is ſo much more cauſe of flight, for that his eares apprehend all, his eyes nothing: Each man thinks his fellow ſtands in his way, and therefore in ſtead of turning upon him which was the cauſe of their flight, they bend their ſwords upon thoſe whom they imagine to be the hinderers of their flight; and now a miraculous aſtoniſhment hath made the Philiſtims, Ionathans Champions, and Executioners; He followes, and kills thoſe which helped to kill others; and the more he killed, the more they feared, and fled, and the more they killed each other in the flight: and that feare it ſelf might prevent Ionathan in killing them, the Earth it ſelf trembles under them. Thus doth God at once ſtrike them with his owne hand, with Ionathans, with theirs; and makes them run away from life, whiles they would flie from an enemy. Where the Almighty purpoſes deſtruction to any people, he needs not call in forrain powers, he needs not any hands or weapons, but their own; He can make vaſt bodies die no other death, then their own waight: We cannot be ſure to be friends among our ſelves, whiles God is our enemy. C D

The Philiſtims flye faſt, but the newes of their flight over-runs them even unto Sauls Pomegranate Tree: The Watchmen diſcern afarre off, a flight and execution: ſearch is made, Ionathan is found miſſing, Saul will conſult with the Ark: Hypocrites while they have leiſure, will perhaps be holy: For ſome fits of devotion they cannot be bettered. But when the tumult encreaſed, Sauls piety decreaſes: It is now no ſeaſon to talk with a Prieſt; withdraw thine hand Ahaiah, the Ephod muſt give place to Armes: It is more time to fight then to pray; what needs he Gods guidance, when he ſees his way before him? He that before would needs ſacrifice ere he fought, will now in the other extreme, fight in a wilfull indevotion. Worldly minds regard holy duties no further, then may ſtand with their own carnall purpoſes. Very eaſie occaſions ſhall interrupt them in their religious intentions; like unto children which if a Bird doe but flye in their way, caſt their eye from their book. E

But if Saul ſerve not God in one kinde, he will ſerve him in another, if he honour him not by attending on the Ark, he will honour him by a vow: His negligence in the

A the one, is recompenced with the zeale in the other. All Iſrael is adjured not to eate any food untill the evening; Hypocriſie is ever masked with a blinde and thankleſſe zeale. To wait upon the Ark, and conſult with Gods Prieſt in all caſes of importance, was a direct commandement of God; To eate no food in the purſuit of their enemies was not commanded. Saul leaves that which he was bidden, and does that which he was not required. To eate no food all day was more difficult, then to attend an houre upon the Ark; The voluntary ſervices of Hypocrites are many times more painfull, then the duties enjoyned by God.

In what awe did all Iſrael ſtand of the Oath even of Saul? It was not their owne vow, but Sauls for them; yet comming into the wood, where they ſaw the Honey dropping, and found the meat as ready as their appetite; they dare not touch that ſuſtenance, and will rather endure famine, and fainting, then an indiſcreet curſe.
B Doubtleſſe God had brought thoſe Bees thither on purpoſe to try the conſtancy of Iſrael; Iſrael could not but think (that which Ionathan ſaid) that the vow was unadviſed and Injurious; yet they will rather die then violate it: How ſacred ſhould we hold the obligation of our owne vowes in things juſt and expedient, when the bond of anothers raſh vow is thus indiſſoluble.

There was a double miſchiefe followed upon Sauls oath, an abatement of the victory, and eating with the bloud: For, on the one ſide, the people were ſo faint that they were more likely to die, then kill; they could neither run, nor ſtrike in this emptineſſe; Neither hands nor feet can doe their office, when the ſtomack is neglected:
C On the other, an unmeet forbearance cauſes a ravenous repaſt: Hunger knowes neither choyce, nor order, nor meaſure: The one of theſe was a wrong to Iſrael, the other was a wrong done by Iſrael to God: Sauls zeale was guilty of both: A raſh vow is ſeldome ever free from inconvenience: The heart that hath unneceſſarily intangled it ſelf, drawes miſchiefe either upon it ſelf or others.

Ionathan was ignorant of his fathers adjuration, he knew no reaſon why he ſhould not refreſh himſelf in ſo profitable a ſervice, with a little taſte of Honey upon his Speare: Full well had he deſerved this unſought dainty; and now behold his Honey is turned into Gall: if it were ſweet in the mouth, it was bitter in the ſoule; if the eies of his body were enlightned, the light of Gods countenance was clouded by this act. After he heard of the oath, he pleads juſtly againſt it, the loſſe of ſo faire an opportunity of revenge, and the trouble of Iſrael; yet neither his reaſons againſt the D Oath, nor his ignorance of the Oath, can excuſe him from a ſin of ignorance in violating that, which firſt he knew not, and then knew unreaſonable. Now Sauls leiſure would ſerve him to ask counſell of God; As before Saul would not enquire, ſo now God will not anſwer: Well might Saul have found ſins enow of his owne, whereto to impute this ſilence: He hath grace enough to know that God was offended, and to gueſſe at the cauſe of his offence: Sooner will an Hypocrite finde out another mans ſin then his own; and now he ſweares more raſhly to puniſh with death, the breach of that, which he had ſworne raſhly. The lots were caſt, and Saul prayes for the deciſion; Ionathan is taken: Even the prayers of wicked men are ſometimes heard, although in juſtice, not in mercy: Saul himſelfe was puniſhed not a little, in the fall of this lot upon Ionathan; Surely Saul ſinned more in making this vow, then Ionathan in E breaking it unwittingly, and now the father ſmarts for the raſhneſſe of his double vow, by the unjuſt ſentence of death upon ſo worthy a ſon: God had never ſingled out Ionathan by his lot, if he had not bin diſpleaſed with his act: Vowes raſhly made may not be raſhly broken; If the thing we have vowed be not evill in it ſelf, or in the effect, we cannot violate it without evill. Ignorance cannot acquit, if it can abate our ſin. It is like, if Ionathan had heard his fathers adjuration, he had not tranſgreſſed; his abſence at the time of that Oath, cannot excuſe him from diſpleaſure: What ſhall become of thoſe, which may know the charge of their heavenly Father, and will not? which doe know his charge, and will not keep it? Affectation of ignorance, and willing diſobedience, is deſperate.

Death was too hard a cenſure for ſuch an unknowne offence: The cruell piety of Saul will revenge the breach of his own charge, ſo as he would be loth God ſhould avenge on himself the breach of his divine command. If Ionathan had not found better friends then his father, so noble a victory had beene recompenced with death; He that saved Israel from the Philistims, is saved by Israel from the hand of his Father: Saul hath sworn Ionathans death, the people contrarily swear his preservation; his Kingdome was not yet so absolute, that he could run away with so unmercifull a Justice; their Oath that savoured of disobedience, prevailed against his Oath that savoured too strong of cruelty: Neither doubt I, but Saul was secretly not displeased with this loving resistance: So long as his heart was not false to his Oath, he could not be sorry that Ionathan should live. TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, SIR Thomas Edmonds

KNIGHT, TREASVRER OF HIS MAJESTIES HOVSHOLD, AND OF HIS MOST Honourable privy Councell.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE;

After your long and happy acquaintance with other Courts, and Kingdomes, may it please you to compare with them the estate of old Israel; You shall finde the same hand swaying all Scepters, and you shall meet with such a proportion of dispositions, and occurrences, that you will say, men are still the same, if their names and faces differ: You shall finde Envy and Mutability ancient Courtiers: and shall confesse the Vices of men still alive, if themselves die; You shall see God still honouring those that honour him, and both rescuing Innocence, and crowning it. It is not for mee to anticipate your deeper and more more judicious Obſervations, Iam bold to dedicate this piece of my Labour to your Honour, in a thankefull acknowledgement of thoſe Noble reſpects, I have found from you, both in France, and at home. In lieu of all which, I can but pray for your happineſſe, and vow my ſelfe

Your Honours in all humble

obſervance,

Jos: HALL.

Contemplations.

SAUL and AGAG.

GOd holds it no derogation from his mercy to beare a quarrell long, where he hates: He, whose anger to the vessels of wrath, is everlasting, even in temporall judgement revengeth late: The sinnes of his owne children are no sooner done, and repented of, then forgotten; but the malicious sinnes of his enemies stick fast in an infinite displeasure. (I remember what Amalek did to Israel, how they laid wait for them by the way, as they came up from Egypt:) Alas, Lord, (might Amalek say) they were our forefathers, we never knew their faces, no not their names, the fact was so farre from our consent, that it is almost past the memory of our histories. It is not in the power of time to raze out any of the arrerages of God: we may lay up wrath for our posterity: Happy is that childe, whose progenitors are in heaven, he is left an inheritor of blessing together with estate, whereas wicked ancestors lose the thank of a rich patrimony, by the curse that attends it: He that thinks because punishment is deferred, that God hath forgiven, or forgot his offence, is unacquainted with justice, and knowes not, that time makes no difference in eternitie. 1 Sam. 15

The Amalekites were wicked Idolaters, and therefore could not want many present sins, which deserved their extirpation. That God, which had taken notice of all their offences, picks out this one noted sin of their forefathers, for revenge: Amongst all their indignities, this shall beare the name of their judgement: As in legal proceedings with malefactors, one inditement found, gives the stile of their condemnation. In the lives of those, which are notoriously wicked, God cannot look besides a sin, yet when he drawes to an execution, he fastens his sentence upon one evill as principall, others as accessaries, so as at the last, one sin which perhaps we make no account of, shall pay for all.

The paganish Idolatries of the Amalekites could not but be greater sinnes to God, then their hard measure to Israel, yet God sets this upon the file, whiles the rest are not recorded; Their superstitions might be of ignorance, this sinne was of malice: Malicious wickednesses of all others, as they are in greatest opposition to the goodnesse and mercy of God, shall be sure of the paiment of greatest vengeance. The detestation of God may be measured by his revenge (slay both man, and woman, both infant, and suckling, both Oxe, and Sheep, Camell, and Asse) not themselves onely, but every thing that drew life either from them, or for their use, must dye: When the the God of mercy ſpeaks ſuch bloudy words, the provocation muſt needs be vehement: ſins of infirmity doe but mutter; ſpightfull ſins cry loud for judgement in the eares of God: Prepenſed malice in courts of humane juſtice aggravates the murther, and ſharpens the ſentence of death. A

What then was this ſinne of Amalek, that is called unto this late reckoning? What? but their envious and unprovoked onſets upon the back of Iſrael, this was it, that God took ſo to heart, as that he not only remembers it now by Samuel, but he bids Iſrael ever to remember it, by Moſes: Remember how Amalek met thee by the way, and ſmote the hindmoſt of you, all that were feeble behinde thee, when thou waſt faint and weary. Beſides this, did Amalek meet Iſrael in a pitcht battell openly, in Rephidim; for that, God payed them in the preſent: The hand of Moſes lifted up on the Hill, ſlew them in the Valley: He therefore repeats not that quarrell; but the cowardly, and cruell attempts upon an impotent enemy, ſtick ſtill in the ſtomack of the Almighty: Oppreſſion and wrong upon eaven termes, are not ſo hainous unto God, as thoſe, that are upon manifeſt diſadvantage: In the one, there is an hazard of return: In the other, there is ever a tyrannous inſultation: God takes ſtill the weaker part, and will be ſure therefore to plague them, which ſeek to put injuries on the unable to reſiſt. B

This ſin of Amalek ſlept all the time of the Judges, thoſe governours were onely for reſcue and defence; now ſo ſoone as Iſrael hath a King, and that King is ſetled in peace, God gives charge to call them to account: It was that, which God had both threatned and ſworn, and now he chuſes out a fit ſeaſon for the execution; As we uſe to ſay of winter, the judgements of God doe never rot in the Sky, but ſhall fall (if late, yet) ſurely, yet ſeaſonably: There is ſmall comfort in the delay of vengeance, whiles we are ſure it ſhall loſe nothing in the way, by length of protraction. C

The Kenites were the off-ſprings of Hobad, or Iethro, father in law to Moſes; the affinity of him, to whom Iſrael owed their deliverance and being, was worthy of reſpect; but it was the mercy of that good and wiſe Midianite ſhewed unto Iſrael in the wilderneſſe, by his grave advice, chearfull gratulation, and aide, which won this gratefull forbearance of his poſterity: He that is not leſſe in mercy, then in juſtice, as he challenged Amaleks ſin of their ſucceeding generations, ſo he derives the recompence of Iethro's kindneſſe, unto his far-deſcended iſſue; Thoſe that were unborne many ages after Iethro's death, receive life from his duſt, and favour from his hoſpitality; The name of their dead grandfather ſaves them from the common deſtruction of their neighbours. The ſervices of our loue to Gods children are never thankleſſe; when we are dead and rotten, they ſhall live and procure bleſſings to thoſe, which never knew perhaps, nor heard of their progenitors: If we ſow good works, ſucceſſion ſhall reap them, and we ſhall be happy in making them ſo. D

The Kenites dwelt in the borders of Amalek, but in tents, (as did their iſſue the Rechabites) ſo as they might remove with eaſe: They are warned to ſhift their habitations, leſt they ſhould periſh with ill neighbours: It is the manner of God, firſt to ſeparate, before he judge, as a good husband weeds his corne, ere it be ripe for the ſickle; and goes to the fanne, ere he goe to the fire. When the Kenites pack up their fardels, it is time to expect judgement. Why ſhould not we imitate God, and ſeparate our ſelves that we may not be judged? ſeparate, not one Kenite from another, but every Kenite from among the Amalekites, elſe if we will needs live with Amalek, we cannot think much to die with him. E

The Kenites are no ſooner removed, then Saul falls upon the Amalekites: He deſtroyes all the people, but ſpares their King: The charge of God was univerſall, for man and beaſt: In the corruption of partiality, lightly the greateſt eſcape: Covetouſneſſe, or miſ-affection are commonly guilty of the impunity of thoſe, which are at once more eminent in dignity, and in offence: It is a ſhamefull hypocriſie to make our commodity the meaſure and rule of our execution of Gods command, and under pretence of godlineſſe to intend gaine; The unprofitable vulgar muſt die; Agag may yeeld a rich ranſome: The leane and feeble cattle, that would but ſpend ſtover, and dye alone, ſhall periſh by the ſword of Iſrael, the beſt may ſtock the grounds,

A grounds, and furnish the markets. O hypocrites, did God send you for gaine, or for revenge? Went you to be purveyours, or executioners? If you plead, that all those wealthy herds had been but lost, in a speedy death, think ye that he knew not this which commanded it? Can that be lost, which is devoted to the will of the owner, and Creator? Or can ye think to gain any thing by disobedience? That man can never either doe well, or fare well, which thinks, there can be more profit in any thing, then in his obedience to his Maker: Because Saul spared the best of the men, the people spared the best of the cattle, each is willing to favour other in the sin. The sins of the great command imitation, and doe as seldome goe without attendants as their persons.

Saul knew well, how much he had done amisse, and yet dare meet Samuel, and B can say, Blessed be thou of the Lord, I have fulfilled the Commandement of the Lord: His heart knew, that his tongue was as false, as his hands had been; and if his heart had not been more false then either of them, neither of them had been so grosse in their falshood: If hypocrisie were not either fooliſh, or impudent, she durst not shew her head to a Seer of God. Could Saul think, that Samuel knew of the asses that were lost, and did not know of the oxen and sheep, that were spared? Could he foretell his thoughts, when it was, and now not know of his open actions? Much lesse when we have to doe with God himself, should dissimulation presume either of safety or secresie. Can the God that made the heart not know it? Can he, that comprehends all things, be shut out of our close corners? Saul was otherwise crafty enough, yet herein his simplicity is palbable: Sin can besot even the wisest man, and there was never but folly in wickednesse.

C No man brags so much of holinesse, as he that wants it: True obedience is joyned ever with humility, and feare of unknown errours; Falshood is bold, and can say, I have fulfilled the Commandement of the Lord: If Saul had been truly obsequious and holy, he had made no noyse of it: A gracious heart is not a blab of his tongue, but rests and rejoyceth silently in the conscience of a secret goodnesse, those vessels yeeld most sound, that have the least liquor: Samuel had reason to beleeve the sheep, and oxen, above Saul; their bleating and lowing was a sufficient conviction of a denied and out-faced disobedience: God opened their mouthes to accuse Saul of their life, and his falshood; but, as sin is crafty, and never wanted a cloak, wherewith both to hide and deck it selfe; even this very rebellion is holy: First the act, if it it were D evill, was not mine but the peoples; and secondly, their intention makes it good; For these Flocks and Herds were preserved, not for gain, but for devotion: What needs this quarrell? If any gain by this act, it is the Lord thy God: His Altars shall smoke with these sacrifices; ye, that serve at them, shall fare so much the better; this godly thriftinesse looks for thanks rather then censure. If Saul had been in Samuels cloathes, perhaps this answer would have satisfied him: Surely, himselfe stands out in it, as that whereto he dares trust; and after he heares of Gods angry reproofe, he avowes, and doubles his hold of his innocency; as if the Commanders should not answer for the known sins of the people; as if our intentions could justifie us to God, against God. How much adoe is it to bring sinners upon their knees, and to make their tongues accuse their hands? But it is no halting with the maker of the heart: E He knew it was covetousnesse, and not piety, which was accessary to this forbearance; and if it had been as was pretended, he knew it was an odious impiety to raise devotion out of disobedience: Saul shall heare and finde, that he hath dealt no lesse wickedly in sparing an Agag, then in killing an innocent Israelite, in sparing these beasts for sacrifice, then in sacrificing beasts that had been uncleane. Why was sacrifice it self good, but because it was commanded? What difference was there betwixt slaughter and sacrifice, but obedience? To sacrifice disobediently, is wilfully to mock God in honouring him.

The rejection of Saul, and the choyce of David.

1 Sam. 15.

EVen when Saul had abandoned God in disobedience, he would not forgoe Samuel, yea though he reproved him; when he had forsaken the substance, yet he would maintain the formality; If he cannot hold the man, he will keep the pledge of his garment, such was the violence of Sauls desire, that he will rather rend Samuels coat, then part with his person. Little did Saul think, that he had in his hand the pawne of his owne rejection, that this act of kinde importunity should carry in it a presage of his judgement, yet so it did: This very rending of the coate was a reall prophesie, and did bode no lesse then the rending of the Kingdome from him, and his posterity: Wicked men, whiles they think by carnall meanes to make their peace, plunge themselves deeper into misery.

Any stander by would have said, what a good King is this? how dear is Gods Prophet unto him? how happy is Israel in such a Prince, as thus loves the messengers of God? Samuel, that saw the bottome of his hollow affection, rejects him, whom God had rejected; he was taught to look upon Saul, not as a King, but as an offender, and therefore refuses with no lesse vehemency, then Saul intreated: It was one thing, what he might doe, as a subject, another what he must doe as a Prophet: Now he knowes not Saul any otherwise, then as so much the greater trespasser as his place was higher; and therefore he doth no more spare his greatnesse, then the God against whom he sinned; Neither doth he countenance that man with his presence, on whom he sees God to frowne.

There needs no other Character of hypocrisie, then Saul, in the cariage of this one businesse with Agag and Samuel: First he obeyes God where there is no gain in disobedience; then he serves God by halves, and disobeyes, where the obedience might be losse: He gives God of the worst; he doth that in a colour, which might seeme answerable to the charge of God: He respects persons in the execution; He gives good words, when his deeds were evill; He protests his obedience against his conscience; He faces out his protestation against a reproofe; When he sees no remedy, he acknowledges the fact, denies the sin, yea he justifies the act by a profitable intention; When he can no longer maintain his innocence, he casts the blame from himselfe upon the people; He confesseth not, till the sinne be wrung from his mouth; He seekes his peace out of himselfe, and relies more upon anothers vertue, then his owne penitency; He would cloake his guiltinesse with the holinesse of anothers presence; He is more tormented with the danger and damage of his sinne, then with the offence; He cares to hold in with men, in what termes soever he stands with God; He fashionably serves that God, whom he hath not cared to reconcile by his repentance: No marvell if God cast him off, whose best was dissimulation.

Old Samuel is forced to doe a double execution, and that upon no lesse then two Kings: The one upon Saul, in dividing the Kingdome from him, who had divided himself from God; The other upon Agag, in dividing him in pieces, whom Saul should have divided. Those holy hands were not used to such sacrifices, yet did he never spill bloud more acceptably: If Saul had beene truly penitent, he had in a desire of satisfaction prevented the hand of Samuel in this slaughter; Now he coldly stands still, and suffers the weak hands of an aged Prophet to be imbrued with that bloud, which he was commanded to shed. If Saul might not sacrifice in the absence of Samuel, yet Samuel might kill in the presence of Saul: He was yet a Judge of Israel, although he suspended the execution: In Sauls neglect, this charge reverted to him; God loves just executions so well, that he will hardly take them ill at any hand.

I do not find, that the slaughter of Agag troubled Samuel; that other act of his severity

A veritie upon Saul, though it drew no bloud, yet ſtruck him in the ſtriking, and fetched tears from his eyes. Good Samuel mourned for him, that had not grace to mourne for himſelfe: No man in all Iſrael might ſeem to have ſo much reaſon to rejoyce in Sauls ruine, as Samuel, ſince that he knew him raiſed up in deſpight of his government; yet he mourns more for him, then he did for his ſons, for himſelfe: It grieved him to ſee the plant, which he had ſet in the garden of Iſrael, thus ſoon withered: It is an unnaturall ſenſeleſneſſe not to be affected with the dangers, with the ſins of our Governours: God did not blame this ſorrow, but moderated it; How long wilt thou mourne for Saul? It was not the affection he forbade, but the meaſure: In this is the difference betwixt good men and evill, that evill men mourne not for their owne ſins, good men doe ſo mourne for the ſins of others, that they will hard-
B ly be taken off.

If Samuel mourne becauſe Saul hath caſt away God by his ſin, he muſt ceaſe to mourne, becauſe God hath caſt away Saul from raigning over Iſrael, in his juſt puniſhment: A good heart hath learned to reſt it ſelf upon the Juſtice of Gods Decree, and forgets all earthly reſpects, when it looks up to heaven. So did God meane to ſhew his diſpleaſure againſt the perſon of Saul, that he would ſhew favour to Iſrael, he will not therefore bereave them of a King, but change him for a better: Either Saul had ſlandred his people, or elſe they were partners with him in the diſobedience: yet (becauſe it was their rulers fault, that they were not over-ruled) we do not hear of their ſmarting, any otherwiſe, then in the ſubjection to ſuch a King, as was not loy-
C all to God: The loſſe of Saul is their gain; the government of their firſt King was abortive, no marvell if it held not. Now was the maturitie of that State, and therefore God will bring them forth a kindly Monarchy ſetled where it ſhould: Kings are of Gods providing, it is good reaſon he ſhould make choice of his own deputies: but where goodneſſe meets with ſoveraignty, both his right, and his gift are doubled: If Kings were meerly from the earth, what needs a Prophet to be ſeen in the choice or inauguration? The hand of Samuel doth not now bear the Scepter to rule Iſrael, but it bears the horn for the anointing of him, that muſt rule: Saul was ſent to him, when the time was, to be anointed, but now, he is ſent to anoint David: Then Iſrael fought a King for themſelves, now God ſeeks a King for Iſrael: The Prophet is therefore directed to the houſe of Iſhai the Bethleemite, the grand-child of Ruth; now is the faithfull love of that good Moabiteſſe crowned with the honour of a Kingdome, in D the ſucceeding generation: God fetcht her out of Moab, to bring a King unto Iſrael: Whiles Orpah wants bread in her owne Countrey, Ruth is growne a great Lady in Bethleem, and is advanced to be great Grand-mother to the King of Iſrael. The retributions of God are bountifull; never any man forſook ought for his ſake, and complained of an hard bargaine.

Even the beſt of Gods Saints want not their infirmities: He that never replyed, when he was ſent to reprove the King, moveth doubts, when he is bidden to goe, and anoint his ſucceſſor. (How can I goe? If Saul hear it, he will kill me.) Perhaps deſire of full direction drew frō him this queſtion, but not without a mixture of diffidence; For the manner of doing it, doth not ſo much trouble him, as the ſucceſſe: It is not to be expected, that the moſt faithfull hearts ſhould be alwayes in an equal height of E reſolution. God doth not chide Samuel, but inſtruct him; He, which is Wiſdome it ſelfe, teacheth him to hide his counſels in an honeſt policy; (Take an Heifar with thee and ſay I am come to doe ſacrifice to the Lord.) This was to ſay true, not to ſay all: Truth may not be croſſed by denials, or equivocations, it may be concealed in a diſcreet ſilence: except in the caſe of an oath, no man is bound to ſpeak all he knows; we are not onely allowed, but commanded to be innocently Serpentine. There were doubtleſſe Heifars enow in Bethleem; Iſhai had both wealth and devotion enough to have beſtowed a Sacrifice upon God, and his Prophet: But to give a more perfect colour to his intention, Samuel muſt take an Heifar with him: The act it ſelfe was ſerious and neceſſary: There was no place, no time, wherein it was not fit for a Samuel to offer Peace-offerings unto God; but when a King ſhould be anointed, there was no leſſe then neceſſitie in this ſervice. Thoſe, which muſt repreſent God to the world, ought to be consecrated to that Majestie, whom they resemble, by publike devotions: Every important action requires a Sacrifice to blesse it, much more that act, which imports the whole Church, or Common-wealth. A

It was great news to see Samuel at Bethleem, he was no gadder abroad, none but necessary occasions could make him stir from Ramath: The Elders of the City therfore, welcome him with trembling, not for that they were afraid of him, but of themselves; they knew, that guest would not come to thē for familiarity, straight do they suspect, it was the purpose of some judgement, that drew him thither: Commest thou peaceably? It is a good thing to stand in awe of Gods Messengers, and to hold good terms with them upon all occasions: The Bethlemites are glad to hear of no other errand, but a Sacrifice; and now must they sanctifie themselves for so sacred a business: We may not presume to sacrifice unto God unsanctified, this were to mar an holy act, and make our selves more profane, by profaning that, which should be holy. B

All the Citizens sanctifie themselves, but Ishai and his sons were in a speciall fashion sanctified by Samuel. This businesse was most theirs, and all Israel in them; the more God hath to doe with us, the more holy should we be. With what desire did Samuel look upon the sonnes of Ishai, that he might see the face of the man whom God had chosen? And now, when Eliab the eldest son came forth, a man of a goodly presence, whose person seemed fit to succeed Saul, he thinks with himselfe, This choice is soon made, I have already espied the head, on which I must spend this holy Oile: This is the man, which hath both the priviledge of nature in his primogeniture, and of outward goodlinesse in proportion: Surely the Lords Anointed is before him. Even the holiest Prophet, when he goes without God, runs into error: The best judgment is subject to deceit: It is no trusting any mortall man, when he speaks of himself: Our eyes can be led by nothing but signs and appearances, and those have commonly in them either a true falshood, or uncertain truth. C

That which should have forewarned Samuel, deceived him; he had seen the proof of a goodly stature unanswerable to their hopes, and yet his eye erres in the shape: He, that judgeth by the inside both of our hearts and actions, checks Samuel in this misconceit: (Look not on his countenance, nor on the height of his stature, because I have refused him; for God seeth not as man seeth:) The King with whom God meant to satisfie the untimely desires of Israel, was chosen by his stature, but the King with whom God meant to please himself is chosen by the heart. All the seven sons of Ishai are presented to the Prophet, no one is omitted whom their father thought capable of any respect: If either Samuel or Ishai should have chosen, David should never have been King: His father thought him fit to keep sheep, his brethren fit to rule men, yet even David (the youngest sonne) is fetcht from the fold, and by the choice of God destined to the Throne: Nature, which is commonly partiall to her own, could not suggest ought to Ishai, to make him think David worthy to be remembred in any competition of honour, yet him hath God singled out to rule. D

God wil have his Wisdome magnified in the unlikelihoods of his election: Davids countenance was ingenuous, and beautiful, but if it had promised so much as Eliabs, or Aminadabs, he had not been in the fields, whiles his brethren were at the Sacrifice: If we doe altogether follow our eye, and suffer our selves to be guided by outward respects in our choice for God or our selves, we cannot but goe amisse. What do we think the brethren of David thought, when they saw the oyle powred upon his head? Surely (as they were envious enough) they had too much repined, if they had either fully apprehended the purpose of the Prophet, or else had not thought of some improbability in the successe: Either they understood not, or beleeved not, what God would doe with their brother; They saw him graced with Gods Spirit above his wont, but perhaps foresaw not, whither it tended: David (as no whit changed in his condition) returns to his sheep again, & with an humble admiration of Gods gracious respect to him, casts himself upon the wise and holy Decree of the Almighty, resigning himselfe to the disposition of those hands, which had chosen him; when suddenly a Messenger is sent from Saul to call him in all haste, to that Court, whereof he shall once be Master: The occasion is no lesse from God, then the event. E

DAVID called to the Court.

THat the Kingdome is (in the appointment of God) departed from Saul, it is his leaſt loſſe; Now the Spirit of God is alſo departed from him; One ſpirit is no ſooner gone, but another is come; both are from God: Even the worſt ſpirits have not onely permiſſion, but commiſſion from Heaven for the infliction of judgement. He that at firſt could hide himſelfe among the ſtuffe, that he might not be King, is now ſo tranſported with this glory, that he grows paſſionate with the thought of forgoing it: Satan takes vantage of his melancholick dejection, and turns this paſſion into frenzy. God will have even evill ſpirits work by means; A diſtempered body, and an unquiet mind are fit grounds for Satans vexation. Sauls Courtiers, as men that were more witty, then religious, adviſe him to Muſick: They knew the ſtrength of that skill in allaying the fury of paſſions, in cheering up the dejected ſpirits of their Maſter: This was done like ſome fond Chirurgian, that when the bone is out of joynt, layes ſome ſoupling Pulteſſes to the part, for the aſſwaging of the ach, in the meane time not caring to remedy the luxation.

If they had ſaid, Sir, you know this evill comes from that God whom you have offended, there can be no help but in reconcilement; how eaſie is it for the God of Spirits to take off Satan? Labour your peace with him by a ſerious humiliation; make means to Samuel to further the atonement; they had been wiſe Counſellors, divine Phiſitians; whereas now they doe but skin over the ſore, and leave it rankled at the bottome: The cure muſt ever proceed in the ſame ſteps with the diſeaſe, elſe in vain ſhall we ſeem to heale; There is no ſafety in the redreſſe of evils, but to ſtrike at the root. Yet ſince it is no better with Saul & his Courtiers, it is wel it is no worſe. I doe not heare either the Maſter, or ſervants ſay, This is an ill ſpirit, ſend for ſome Magitian, that may countermand him: There are forcible Enchantments for theſe ſpirituall vexations; If Samuel will not, there are Witches, that may give eaſe: But as one, that would rather be ill, then doe worſe, he contents himſelf to doe that, which was lawfull, if unſufficient. It is a ſhame to ſay, that he, whom God had rejected for his ſin, was yet a Saint to ſome that ſhould be Chriſtians, who care not how much they are beholding to the devil in their diſtreſſes, affecting to caſt out devils by Beelzebub: In caſes of loſſe, or ſickneſſe, they make Hell their refuge, and ſeek for patronage, but of an enemie: Here is a fearfull agreement; Satan ſeeks to them in his temptations, they in their conſultations ſeek to him, and now they have mutually found each other, if they ever part, it is a miracle.

David had lived obſcurely in his fathers houſe, his onely care and ambition was the welfare of the flock he tended, and now, whiles his father and his brothers neglected him as fit for nothing but the field, he is talked of at the Court: Some of Sauls followers had beene at Iſhai's houſe, and taken notice of Davids skill, and now that harp which he practiced for his private recreation, ſhall make him of a Shepheard a Courtier: The Muſick, that he meant only to himſelf and his ſheep, brings him before Kings: The Wiſedome of God thought fit to take this occaſion of acquainting David with that Court, which he ſhall once governe. It is good, that our education ſhould perfect our children in all thoſe commendable qualities, whereto they are diſpoſed: Little doe we know, what uſe God means to make of thoſe faculties, which we know not how to imploy. Where the Almighty purpoſes an advancement, obſcurity can be no prejudice; ſmall means ſhall ſet forward that, which God hath decreed.

Doubtleſſe, old Iſhai noted (not without admiration) the wonderfull accordance of Gods proceedings, that he, which was ſent for, out of the field to be anointed, ſhould now be ſent for out of the Countrey into the Court, and now he perceived, God was making way for the execution of that which he purpoſed; he attends the iſſue in ſilence, neither ſhall his hand faile to give furtherance to the project of God:

He therefore ſends his ſonne laden with a preſent to Saul: The ſame God which called David to the Court, welcomes him thither; His comelineſſe, valour, and skill have ſoone won him favour in the eyes of Saul. The giver of all graces hath ſo placed his favours, that the greateſt enemies of goodneſſe ſhall ſee ſomewhat in the holieſt men, which they ſhall affect, and for which they ſhall honour the perſons of them, whoſe vertues they diſlike; as contrarily the Saints on earth ſee ſomewhat to love even in the worſt creatures. A

No doubt David ſung to his harpe; his harp was not more ſweet then his ſong was holy: Thoſe Pſalms alone had been more powerfull to chaſe the evill ſpirit, then the Muſick was to calme paſſions; both together gave eaſe to Saul; and God gave this effect to both, becauſe he would have Saul train up his Succeſſor: This ſacred Muſick did not more diſpel Satan, then wanton muſick invites him; and more cheers him, then us: He playes and danceth at a filthy ſong, he ſings at an obſcene dance: Our ſin is his beſt paſtime, whereas Pſalmes, and Hymnes, and ſpirituall Songs are torments unto the Tempter, and Muſick to the Angels in Heaven, whoſe trade is to ſing Allelujahs in the Chore of glory. B

David and Goliah.

1. Sam. 17.

AFter the news of the Philiſtims Army, I heare no more mention of Sauls frenzy? Whether the noiſe of War diverted thoſe thoughtfull paſſions, whether God for his peoples ſake took off that evill ſpirit, leſt Iſrael might miſcary under a frantick Governour. Now David hath leiſure to returne to Bethleem: The glory of the Court cannot tranſport him to ambitious vanity; He had rather be his Fathers Shepherd, then Sauls Armour-bearer: All the magnificence and ſtate, which he ſaw, could not put his mouth out of the taſt of a retired ſimplicity; yea rather he loves his hooke the better, ſince he ſaw the Court; and now his brethren ſerve Saul in his ſtead. A good heart hath learnt to frame it ſelf unto all conditions, and can change eſtates without change of diſpoſition, riſing and falling according to occaſion: The worldly mind can riſe eaſily, but when it is once up, knowes not how to deſcend either with patience, or ſafety. C

Forty dayes together had the Philiſtims and Iſraelites faced each other, they pitched on two hils, one in the ſight of other, nothing but a Valley was betwixt them: Both ſtand upon defence and advantage; If they had not meant to fight, they had never drawn ſo neere; and if they had been eager of fight, a Valley could not have parted them: Actions of hazard require deliberation; not fury but diſcretion muſt be the guide of Warre. D

So had Ioſhua deſtroyed the Giantly Anakims out of the Land of Iſrael, that yet ſome were left in Azzah, Gath, and Aſhdod, both to ſhew Iſrael, what Adverſaries their forefathers found in Canaan, and whom they maſtered; as alſo that God might win glory to himſelf by theſe obſequent executions: Of that race was Goliah, whoſe heart was as high as his head, his ſtrength was anſwerable to his ſtature, his weapons anſwerable to his ſtrength, his pride exceeded all: Becauſe he ſaw his head higher, his armes ſtronger, his ſword and ſpeare bigger, his ſhield heavier then any Iſraelite, he defies the whole hoſt, and walking between the two Armies, braves all Iſrael with a challenge; (Why are ye come out to ſet your battaile in aray? Am not I a Philiſtim, and you ſervants to Saul? Chooſe you a man for you, and let him come down to me: give me a man that we may fight together.) Carnall hearts are carried away with preſumption of their own abilities, and not finding matches to themſelves in outward appearance, inſult over the impotency of inferiors; and as thoſe that can ſee no inviſible oppoſition, promiſe themſelves certainty of ſucceſſe: Inſolence and ſelfe-confidence argues the heart to be nothing, but a lumpe of proud fleſh. E

The firſt challenge of duell, that ever we finde, came out of the mouth of an uncircumciſed Philiſtim; yet was that in open war, and tended to the ſaving of many lives, by adventuring one or two; and whoſoever imitateth, nay ſurpaſſeth him in challenge

A challenge to private Duels, in the attempt partaketh of his uncircumcision, though he should overcome; and of his manner of punishment, if in such private combates he cast away his life. For of all such desperate prodigals we may say, that their heads are cut off by their owne sword, if not by their owne hand. We cannot challenge men, and not challenge God, who justly challengeth to himself both to take vengeance, and to give successe. The more Goliah challenges, and is unanswered, the more is he puft up in the pride of his owne power: And is there none of all Israel, that will answer this champion otherwise then with his heeles? Where is the courage of him that was higher then all Israel from the shoulders upward? The time was, when Nahash the Ammonite had made that tyrannous demand of the right eyes of the Gileadites, that Saul could aske unasked, What aileth the people to weepe? and could
B hew his oxen in pieces to raise the spirits of Israel, and now he stands still, and sees the host turne their back, and never so much as asks, What aileth the people to fly? The time was, when Saul slew forty thousand Philistims in one day, and perhaps Goliah was in that discomfiture, and now one Philistim is suffered by him to brave all Israel forty dayes. Whence is this difference? The spirit of God, (the spirit of fortitude) was now departed from him: Saul was not more above himselfe, when God was with him, then he is below others, now that he is left of God; Valour is not meerely of nature: Nature is ever like it selfe; by this rule, he that is once valiant, should never turne coward: But now we see the greatest spirits inconstant, and those, which have given good proofs of magnanimity, at other times, have bewrayed white livers unto their own reproach; He that is the God of hosts, gives and takes
C away mens hearts at his pleasure: Neither is it otherwise in our spirituall combats, sometimes the same soule dare challenge all the powers of darknesse, which otherwhiles gives ground to a temptation; We have no strength but what is given us, and if the author of all good gifts remit his hand for our humiliation, either we fight not or are foiled.

David hath now lien long enough close amongst his flock in the fields of Bethleem, God sees a time to send him to the pitcht field of Israel. Good old Ishai, that was doubtlesse joyfull to think, that he had afforded three sons to the wars of his King, is no lesse carefull of their welfare and provision; and who (amongst all the rest of his seven sons) shall be pickt out for this service, but his youngest son David, whose former and almost worne-out acquaintance in Court, and imployment un-
D der Saul seemed to fit him best for this errand: Early in the morning is David upon his way, yet not so early, as to leave his flock unprovided: If his fathers command dismisse him, yet will he stay, till he have trusted his sheep with a carefull keeper; we cannot be faithfull shepheards, if our spirituall charge be lesse deare unto us; if when necessity cals us from our flocks, we depute not those, which are vigilant and conscionable.

Ere Davids speed can bring him to the valley of Elah, both the Armies are on foot ready to joyne: He takes not this excuse to stay without, as a man daunted with the horror of war, but leaving his present with his servant, he thrusts himselfe into the thickest of the host, and salutes his brethren which were now thinking of nothing but killing or dying, when the proud champion of the Philistims comes stalking
E forth before all the troups, and renews this insolent challenge against Israel: David sees the man, and hears his defiance, and looks about him, to see what answer would be given, and when he espies nothing but pale faces and backs turned, he wonders, not so much, that one man should dare all Israel, as that all Israel should run from one man: Even when they fly from Goliah, they talk of the reward, that should be given to that encounter and victory, which they dare not undertake, so those which have not grace to beleeve, yet can say, There is glory laid up for the faithfull. Ever since his anointing, was David possessed with Gods Spirit, and thereby filled both with courage, and wisdome: The more strange doth it seeme to him, that all Israel should be thus dastardly: Those that are themselves eminent in any grace, cannot but wonder at the miserable defects of others, and the more shame they see in others imperfections, the more is their zeale in avoiding those errors in themselves.

Whiles

Whiles baſe hearts are moved by example, the want of example is encouragement enough for an heroycall mind: Therefore is David ready to undertake the quarrell, becauſe no man elſe dare doe it: His eyes ſparkled with holy anger, and his heart roſe up to his mouth, when he heard this proud challenger: (Who is this uncircumciſed Philiſtim, that he ſhould revile the hoſt of the living God?) Even ſo, O Saviour, when all the generations of men ran away affrighted from the powers of death and darkneſſe, thou alone haſt undertaken, and confounded them. A

Who ſhould offer to daunt the holy courage of David, but his owne brethren? The envious heart of Eliab conſtrues this forwardneſſe, as his own diſgrace: Shall I (thinkes he) be put downe by this puiſne? ſhall my fathers youngeſt ſonne dare to attempt that, which my ſtomach will not ſerve me to adventure? Now therefore he rates David for his preſumption; and inſtead of anſwering to the recompence of the victory, (which others were ready to give) he recompenceth the very inquiry of David with a check: It was for his brethrens ſake, that David came thither, and yet his very journey is caſt upon him by them, for a reproach; Wherefore cam'ſt thou downe hither? and when their bitterneſſe can meet with nothing elſe to ſhame him, his ſheep are caſt in his teeth: Is it for thee, an idle proud boy, to be medling with our martiall matters? doth not yonder Champion look, as if he were a fit match for thee? what makeſt thou of thy ſelfe, or what doſt thou think of us? ywis it were fitter for thee to be looking to thy ſheep, then looking at Goliah; the Wilderneſſe would become thee better then the field: Wherein art thou equall to any man thou ſeeſt, but in arrogancy and preſumption? The paſtures of Bethleem could not hold thee, but thou thoughtſt it a goodly matter to ſee the wars: I know thee, as if I were in thy boſome; This was thy thought, There is no glory to be got among fleeces, I will goe ſeeke it in armes; Now are my brethren winning honour in the troupes of Iſrael, whiles I am baſely tending on ſheepe, why ſhould not I be as forward as the beſt of them? This vanitie would make thee ſtraight of a ſhepheard, a ſoldier; and of a ſoldier, a champion; get thee home, fooliſh ſtripling to thy hooke, and thy harpe; let ſwords and ſpeares alone to thoſe, that know how to uſe them. B C

It is quarrell enough amongſt many to a good action, that it is not their owne; there is no enemy ſo ready, or ſo ſpightfull, as the domeſticall: The hatred of brethren is ſo much more, as their blood is neerer: The malice of ſtrangers is ſimple, but of a brother is mixt with envy: The more unnaturall any quality is, the more extreame it is; A cold wind from the ſouth is intolerable: Davids firſt victory is of himſelfe, next of his brother; He overcomes himſelfe in a patient forbearance of his brother, he overcomes the malicious rage of his brother with the mildneſſe of his anſwer: If David had wanted ſpirit, he had not beene troubled with the inſultation of a Philiſtim: If he had a ſpirit to match Goliah, how doth he ſo calmely receive the affront of a brother? What have I now done? Is there not a cauſe? That which would have ſtirred the choler of another, allayeth his: It was a brother, that wronged him, and that his eldeſt; neither was it time to quarrell with a brother, whiles the Philiſtims ſwords were drawne, and Goliah was challenging. O that theſe two motives could induce us to peace: If we have injury in our perſon, in our cauſe, it is from brethren, and the Philiſtims looke on: I am deceived, if this conqueſt were leſſe glorious, then the following: He is fit to be Gods Champion, that hath learned to be victor of himſelfe. D E

It is not this ſprinkling of cold water, that can quench the fire of Davids zeale, but ſtill his courage ſends up flames of deſire, ſtill he goes on to enquire, and to proffer: He, whom the regard of others envy can diſmay, ſhall never doe ought worthy of envy: Never man undertook any exploit of worth, and received not ſome diſcouragement in the way: This couragious motion of David, was not more ſcorned by his brother, then by the other Iſraelites applauded: The rumour flyes to the eares of the King, that there is a young man deſirous to encounter the Gyant: David is brought forth: Saul, when he heard of a Champion, that durſt goe into the liſts with Goliah, looked for one as much higher then himſelfe, as he was taller then the

A the reſt; he expected ſome ſterne face, and brawny arme; young and ruddy David is ſo farre below his thoughts, that he receives rather contempt, then thanks: His words were ſtout, his perſon was weak: Saul doth not more like his reſolution, then diſtruſt his ability: (Thou art not able to goe againſt this Philiſtim to fight with him; for thou art a boy, and he is a man of warre from his youth.) Even Saul ſeconds Eliab in the conceit of this diſparity, and if Eliab ſpake out of envy, Saul ſpeakes out of judgement; both judge (as they were judged of) by the ſtature: All this cannot weaken that heart, which receives his ſtrength from faith: Davids greateſt conflict is with his friends; The overcomming of their diſſwaſions, that he might fight, was more worke, then to overcome his enemy in fighting; He muſt firſt juſtifie his ſtrength to Saul, ere he may prove it upon Goliah: Valour is never made good but
B by tryall; He pleads the tryall of his puiſſance upon the Beare and the Lion, that he may have leave to prove it upon a worſe beaſt then they; Thy ſervant ſlew both the Lyon and the Beare, therefore this uncircumciſed Philiſtim ſhall be as one of them. Experience of good ſucceſſe is no ſmall comfort to the heart, this gives poſſibility and hope, but no certainty; Two things there were on which David built his confidence, on Goliahs ſinne, and Gods deliverance, (Seeing he hath railed on the hoſt of the living God: The Lord that delivered me out of the pawes of the Lyon and the Beare, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philiſtim.) Well did David know, that if this Philiſtims ſkin had been as hard as the braſſe of his ſhield, his ſin would make it penetrable by every ſtroke. After all brags of manhood he is impotent, that hath provoked God; Whiles other labour for outward fortification, happy and ſafe were we, if we could
C labour for innocence. He that hath found God preſent in one extremity, may truſt him in the next; Every ſenſible favour of the Almighty, invites both his gifts and our truſt.

Reſolution thus grounded, makes even Saul himſelfe confident; David ſhall have both his leave and his bleſſing; If David came to Saul, as a Shepheard, he ſhall goe toward Goliah as a Warriour; The attire of the King is not too rich for him that ſhall fight for his King and Countrey: Little did Saul think, that his helmet was now on that head, which ſhould once weare his crowne: Now that David was arrayed in the warlike habit of a King, and girded with his ſword, he lookt upon himſelfe, and thought this outſide glorious; but when he offred to walk, and found that the attire was not ſo ſtrong, as unweeldy, and that it might be more for ſhew, then uſe, he layes
D down theſe accouſtrements of honor, and as caring rather to be an homely victor, then a glorious ſpoile, he craves pardon to goe in no clothes, but his owne; he takes his ſtaffe inſtead of the ſpeare, his ſhepheards ſcrip inſtead of his brigandine, and inſtead of his ſword he takes his ſling, and inſtead of darts and javelins, he takes five ſmooth ſtones out of the brook: Let Sauls coat be never ſo rich, and his armor never ſo ſtrong, what is David the better, if they fit him not? It is not to be enquired how excellent any thing is, but how proper: Thoſe things which are helps to ſome, may be encombrances to others: An unmeet good may be as inconvenient, as an accuſtomed evill: If we could wiſh another mans honour, when we feele the weight of his cares, we ſhould be glad to be in our own coat.

Thoſe that depend upon the ſtrength of Faith, though they neglect not meanes,
E yet they are not curious in the proportion of outward meanes to the effect deſired: Where the heart is armed with an aſſured confidence, a ſling and a ſtone are weapons enow; to the unbeleeving no helps are ſufficient: Goliah, though he were preſumptuous enough, yet had one ſhield carried before him, another he carried on his ſhoulder; neither will his ſword alone content him, but he takes his ſpeare too. Davids armour is his plaine ſhepheards ruſſet, and the brooke yeelds him his artillery, and he knows, there is more ſafety in his cloth, then in the others braſſe; and more danger in his peebles, then the others ſpeare. Faith gives both heart and armes. The inward munition is ſo much more noble, becauſe it is of proofe for both ſoule and body: If we be furniſhed with this, how boldly ſhall we meet with the powers of darkneſſe, and goe away more then conquerors?

Neither did the quality of Davids weapons bewray more confidence, then the number number: If he will put his life and victory upon the ſtones of the brook, why doth he not fill his ſcrip full of them? why will he content himſelf with five? Had he been furniſhed with ſtore, the advantage of his nimbleneſſe might have given him hope; If one faile, that yet another might ſpeed: But now this paucity puts the diſpatch to a ſudden hazard, and he hath but five ſtones caſt either to death or victory; ſtill the fewer helps, the ſtronger faith: David had an inſtinct from God, that he ſhould overcome; he had not a particular direction, how he ſhould overcome. For had he been at firſt reſolved upon the ſling and ſtone, he had ſaved the labour of girding his ſword: It ſeemes, whiles they were addreſſing him to the combat, he made account of hand-blowes, now he is purpoſed rather to ſend, then bring death to his adverſary: In either, or both, he durſt truſt God with the ſucceſſe, and before-hand (through the conflict) ſaw the victory: It is ſufficient, that we know the iſſue of our fight: If our weapons and wards vary according to the occaſion given by God, that is nothing to the event; ſure we are, that if we reſiſt, we ſhall overcome, and if we overcome we ſhall be crowned. A B

When David appeared in the liſts to ſo unequall an adverſary, as many eyes were upon him, ſo in thoſe eyes, divers affections: The Iſraelites lookt upon him with pitty and feare, and each man thought, Alas, why is this comely ſtripling ſuffered to caſt away himſelf upon ſuch a monſter? why will they let him goe unarmed to ſuch an affray? Why will Saul hazard the honour of Iſrael on ſo unlikely an head? The Philiſtims, eſpecially their great Champion, lookt upon him with ſcorn, diſdaining ſo baſe a combatant; (Am I a dog, that thou comeſt to me with ſtaves?) What could be ſaid more fitly? Hadſt thou been any other then a dog (O Goliah) thou hadſt never opened thy foule mouth to barke againſt the hoſt of God, and the God of hoſts: If David had thought thee any other then a very dog, he had never come to thee with a ſtaffe and a ſtone. C

The laſt words, that ever the Philiſtim ſhall ſpeak, are curſes and brags; (Come to me and I will give thy fleſh unto the Fowls of the heaven, and the beaſts of the field.) Seldome ever was there a good end of oſtentation: Preſumption is at once the preſage, and cauſe of ruine: He is a weak adverſary that can be killed with words: That man which could not feare the Gyants hand, cannot feare his tongue: If words ſhall firſt encounter, the Philiſtim receives the firſt foil, and ſhall firſt let in death into his eare, ere it enter into his forehead: (Thou comeſt to me with a ſword, and a ſpeare, and a ſhield, but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of Hoſts, the God of the hoſt of Iſrael, whom thou haſt railed upon: This day ſhall the Lord cloſe thee in my hand, and I ſhall ſmite thee, and take thine head from thee.) Here is another ſtile, not of a boaſter, but of a Prophet: Now ſhall Goliah know, whence to expect his bane, even from the hands of a revenging God, that ſhall ſmite him by David, and now ſhall learn too late, what it is to meddle with an enemy, that goes under the inviſible protection of the Almighty. No ſooner hath David ſpoken, then his foot and hand ſecond his tongue: He runs to fight with the Philiſtim: It is a cold courage that ſtands onely upon defence: As a man, that ſaw no cauſe of fear, and was full of the ambition of victory, he flyes upon that monſter, and with a ſtone out of his bag ſmites him in the forehead: There was no part of Goliah, that was capable of that danger, but the face, and that piece of the face; the reſt was defenced with a brazen wall, which a weak ſling would have tryed to batter in vaine: what could Goliah feare to ſee an adverſary come to him without edge or point? And behold that one part hath God found out for the entrance of death: He that could have cauſed the ſtone to paſſe through the ſhield and breaſt-plate of Goliah, rather directs the ſtone to that part, whoſe nakedneſſe gave advantage: Where there is power or poſſibility of nature, God uſes not to work miracles, but chuſes the way that lyes moſt open to his purpoſes. D E

The vaſt forehead was a faire marke, but how eaſily might the ſling have miſſed it, if there had not been another hand in this caſt beſides Davids? He that guided David into this field, and raiſed his courage to this combat, guides the ſtone to his end, and lodges it in that ſeat of impudence: There now lyeth the great defier of Iſrael, groveling & grinning in death, and is not ſuffered to deal one blow for his life,

A and bites the unwelcome earth for indignation, that he dies by the hand of a Shepheard: Earth and Hell ſhare him betwixt them; ſuch is the end of inſolence, and preſumption. O God, what is fleſh and blood to thee, which canſt make a little peeble-ſtone ſtronger then a Gyant, and when thou wilt, by the weakeſt meanes canſt ſtrew thine enemies in the duſt? Where now are the two ſhields of Goliah, that they did not beare off this ſtroke of death? or wherefore ſerves that Weavers beame, but to ſtrike the earth in falling? or that ſword, but to behead his Maſter? What needed David load himſelf with an unneceſſary weapon? one ſword can ſerve both Goliah and him; If Goliah had a man to beare his ſhield, David had Goliah to bear his ſword, wherewith that proud blaſphemous head is ſevered from his ſhoulders: Nothing more honours God, then the turning of wicked mens forces againſt themſelves:
B There is none of his enemies, but caries with them their owne deſtruction. Thus didſt thou, O Son of David, foyle Sathan with his owne weapon; that, whereby he meant deſtruction to thee and us, vanquiſhed him through thy mighty power, and raiſed thee to that glorious triumph, and ſuperexaltation, wherein thou art, wherein we ſhall be with thee.

JONATHANS Love, and SAULS Envy.

C BEſides the diſcomfiture of the Philiſtims, Davids victory had a double iſſue; Ionathans Love, and Sauls Envy, which God ſo mixed, that the one was a remedy of the other: A good ſon makes amends for a wayward father: How precious was that ſtone that killed ſuch an enemy as Goliah, and purchaſed ſuch a friend as Ionathan? All Sauls Courtiers lookt upon David, none ſo affected him, none did match him but Ionathan: That true correſpondence, that was both in their faith and valour, hath knit their hearts: If David did ſet upon a Beare, a Lyon, a Giant; Ionathan had ſet upon a whole Hoſt, and prevailed: The ſame Spirit animated both, the ſame Faith incited both, the ſame Hand proſpered both: All Iſrael was not worth this paire of friends, ſo zealouſly confident, ſo happily victorious: Similitude of diſpoſitions and eſtates ties the faſteſt knots
D of affection: A wiſe ſoul hath piercing eies, and hath quickly diſcerned the likelineſſe of it ſelf in another; as we doe no ſooner look into the glaſſe or Water, but face anſwers to face; and where it ſees a perfect reſemblance of it ſelf, cannot chooſe but love it with the ſame affection, that it reflects upon it ſelfe. 1 Sam. 18

No man ſaw David that day, which had ſo much cauſe to diſ-affect him; none in all Iſrael ſhould be a loſer by Davids ſucceſſe, but Ionathan: Saul was ſure enough ſetled for his time, onely his Succeſſor ſhould forgoe all that, which David ſhould gain; ſo as none but David ſtands in Ionathans light, and yet all this cannot abate one jot, or dram of his love: Where God uniteth hearts, carnall reſpects are too weak to diſſever them, ſince that, which breaks off affection, muſt needs be ſtronger then that which conjoyneth it.

E Ionathan doth not deſire to ſmother his love by concealment, but profeſſes it in his cariage & actions: He puts off the Robe, that was upon him, & all his garments even to his Sword, and Bow, and Girdle, and gives them unto his new friend: It was perhaps not without a myſtery, that Sauls clothes fitted not David, but Ionathans fitted him, and theſe he is as glad to weare, as he was to be disburthened of the other: that there might be a perfect reſemblance, their bodies are ſuted, as well as their hearts: Now the beholders can ſay, there goes Ionathans other ſelf; If there be another body under thoſe clothes, there is the ſame ſoul. Now David hath caſt off his ruſſet coat, and his ſcrip, and is a Shepherd no more; he is ſuddenly become both a Courtier, and a Captain, and a Companion to the Prince; yet himſelf is not changed with his habit, with his condition: yea rather (as if his wiſdome had reſerved it ſelf for his exaltation) he ſo manageth a ſudden Greatneſſe, as that he winneth all hearts: Honour

ſhewes the man, and if there be any blemiſhes of imperfection, they will be ſeene in the man, that is inexpectedly lifted above his fellowes: He is out of the danger of folly, whom a ſpeedy advancement leaveth wiſe.

Ionathan loved David, the Souldiers honoured him, the Court favoured him, the people applauded him, onely Saul ſtomackt him, and therefore hated him, becauſe he was ſo happy in all beſides himſelfe: It had been a ſhame for all Iſrael, if they had not magnified their Champion: Sauls owne heart could not but tell him, that they did owe the glory of that day, and the ſafety of himſelfe and Iſrael, unto the ſling of David, who in one man ſlue all thoſe thouſands at a blow. It was enough for the puiſſant King of Iſrael, to follow the chaſe, and to kill them, whom David had put to flight; yet he, that could lend his clothes and his armour to this exploit, cannot abide to part with the honour of it to him, that had earned it ſo dearely: The holy Songs of David had not more quieted his ſpirits before, then now the thankfull Song of the Iſraelitiſh women vexes him: One little Ditty (of Saul hath ſlaine his thouſand, and David his ten thouſand) ſung unto the Timbrels of Iſrael, fetcht again that evill ſpirit, which Davids Muſique had expelled: Saul needed not the torment of a worſe ſpirit, then Envy. Oh the unreaſonableneſſe of this wicked paſſion! The women gave Saul more, and David leſſe, then he deſerved: For Saul alone could not kill a thouſand, and David in that one act of killing Goliah, ſlue in effect, all the Philiſtims that were ſlaine that day; and yet becauſe they give more to David then to himſelfe, he that ſhould have endited, and begun that Song of thankfulneſſe, repines and growes now as mad with envy, as he was before with griefe: Truth and Juſtice are no protection againſt Malice; Envy is blinde to all objects, ſave other mens happineſſe: If the eyes of men could be contained within their owne bounds, and not rove forth into compariſons, there could be no place for this vicious affection; but when they have once taken this lawleſſe ſcope to themſelves, they loſe the knowledge of home, and care only to be employed abroad in their own torment.

Never was Sauls breſt ſo fit a lodging for the evill ſpirit, as now, that it is dreſt up with envy: It is as impoſſible that Hell ſhould be free from Devils, as a malicious heart: Now doth the frantike King of Iſrael renew his old fits, and walks, and talks diſtractedly; He was mad with David, and who but David muſt be called to alay his madneſſe? Such was Davids wiſdome, he could not but know the termes, wherein he ſtood with Saul; yet in lieu of the harſh and diſcordous notes of his maſters envy, he returns pleaſing Muſique unto him: He can never be good Courtier, nor good man, that hath not learned to repay, if not injuries with thanks, yet evill with good. Whiles there was a Harp in Davids hand, there was a Speare in Sauls, wherewith he threatens death as the recompence of that ſweet melody: He ſaid (I will ſmite David through to the wall.) It is well for the innocent, that wicked men cannot keep their own counſell: God fetcheth their thoughts out of their mouthes, or their countenance for a ſeaſonable prevention, which elſe might proceed to ſecret execution: It was time for David to withdraw himſelf, his obedience did not tie him to be the mark of a furious maſter; he might eaſe Saul with his muſique, with his bloud he might not: Twice therefore doth he avoid the Preſence, not the Court, not the Service of Saul.

One would have thought rather, that David ſhould have beene affraid of Saul becauſe the Devill was ſo ſtrong with him, then that Saul ſhould be affraid of David, becauſe the Lord was with him; yet we finde all the feare in Saul of David, none in David of Saul: Hatred and feare are ordinary companions: David had wiſedome and faith to diſpell his feares, Saul had nothing but infidelity, and dejected, ſelfe-condemned, diſtempered thoughts, which muſt needs nouriſh them; yet Saul could not feare any hurt from David, whom he found ſo loyall and ſerviceable: He feares onely too much good unto David; and the envious feare is much more then the diſtruſtfull: now Davids preſence begins to be more diſpleaſing, then his muſique was ſweet; Deſpight it ſelfe had rather preferre him to a remote dignity, then endure him a neerer attendant: This promotion

A tion encreaseth Davids honour and love; and his love and honour aggravates Sauls hatred and feare.

Sauls madnesse hath not bereaved him of his craft: for perceiving how great David was grown in the reputation of Israel, he dares not offer any personall, or direct violence to him, but hires him into the jawes of a supposed death, by no lesse price, then his eldest Daughter, (Behold mine eldest daughter Merab: her will I give thee to wife, onely be a valiant Son to me, and fight the Lords Battels.) Could ever man speak more graciously, more holily? What could be more graciously offered by a King, then his eldest Daughter? What care could be more holy then of the Lords battels? yet never did Saul intend so much mischiefe to David, or so much unfaithfulnesse to God, as when he spake thus: There is never so much danger of the false-
B hearted, as when they make the faireſt weather: Sauls Speare bade David be gone, but his plausible words invite him to danger. This honour was due to David before, upon the compact of his victory: yet he, that twice enquired into the reward of that enterprize, before he undertooke it, never demanded it after that atchievement; neither had Saul the justice to offer it, as a recompence of so noble an exploit, but as a snare to an envied victory. Charity suspects not: David construes that, as an effect and argument of his Masters love, which was no other but a child of Envy, but a plot of mischiefe; and though he knew his own desert, and the justice of his claime to Merab; yet he in a sincere humility disparageth himself, and his Parentage with a Who am I?

As it was not the purpose of this modesty in David to reject, but to sollicite the
C proffered favour of Saul; so was it not in the power of this bashfull humiliation to turn back the edge of so keen an envy: It helps not that David makes himself meane, whiles others magnifie his worth: Whatsoever the colour was, Saul meant nothing to David but danger and death; and since all those Battles will not effect that which he desired, himself will not effect that which he promised: If he cannot kill David, he will disgrace him; Davids honour, was Sauls disease. It was not likely therefore, that Saul would adde unto that honour, whereof he was so sick already: Merab is given unto another; neither doe I heare David complain of so manifest an injustice: He knew, that the God whose battles he fought, had provided a due reward of his patience: If Merab faile, God hath a Michal in store for him, she is in love with David: his comelinesse and valour have so won her heart, that she now emulates the D affection of her Brother Ionathan: If she be the yonger Sister, yet she is more affectionate: Saul is glad of the newes, his Daughter could never live to doe him better service, then to be a new snare to his Adversary: She shall be therefore sacrificed to his envy, and her honest and sincere love shall be made a bait for her worthy and innocent Husband. (I will give him her, that she may be a snare unto him, that the hand of the Philistims may be against him:) The purpose of any favour is more then the value of it: Even the greatest honours may be given with an intent of destruction: Many a man is raised up for a fall. So forward is Saul in the match, that he sends spokes-men to sollicit David to that honour, which he hopes will prove the high-way to death: The dowry is set; An hundred fore-skins of the Philistims; not their heads, but their fore-skins, that this victory might be more ignominious; still thinking, why may E not one David miscary, as well as an hundred Philistims? And what doth Sauls envy all this while, but enhance Davids zeale, and valour, and glory? That good Captain little imagining that himself was the Philistim, whom Saul maligned, supererogates of his Master, and brings two hundred for one, and returnes home safe, and renowned; neither can Saul now fly off for shame: There is no remedy but David must be a son, where he was a rivall; and Saul must feed upon his own heart, since he cannot see Davids: Gods blessing graces equally together with mens malice, neither can they devise, which way to make us more happy, then by wishing us evill.

1 Sam. 19. 11.

THis advantage can Saul yet make of Davids promotion; that as his Adversary is raised higher, so he is drawne nearer to the opportunity of death: Now hath his envy cast off all shame; and since those crafty plots succeed not, he directly subornes Murtherers of his rivall: There is none in all the Court that is not set on to be an Executioner: Ionathan himselfe is sollicited to imbrue his hand in the bloud of his friend, of his Brother. Saul could not but see Ionathans cloathes on Davids back; he could not but know the league of their love; yet because he knew withall, how much the prosperity of David would prejudice Ionathan, he hoped to have found him his son in malice: Those that have the Jaundis see all things yellow; those which are overgrown with malicious passions, think all men like themselves.

I doe not heare of any reply that Ionathan made to his father when he gave him that bloudy charge; but he waits for a fit time to disswade him from so cruell an injustice: Wisdome had taught him to give way to rage, and in so hard an adventure to crave aid of opportunity: If we be not carefull to observe good moods when we deale with the passionate, we may exasperate in stead of reforming: Thus did Ionathan, who knowing how much better it is to be a good friend, then an ill son, had not onely disclosed that ill counsell, but when he found his father in the fields in a calmer temper, laboured to divert it: And so far doth the seasonable and pithy Oratory of Ionathan prevaile, that Saul is convinced of his wrong, and sweares, as God lives, David shall not dye; Indeed how could it be otherwise, upon the plea of Davids innocence, and well deservings? How could Saul say he should dye, whom he could accuse of nothing but faithfulnesse? Why should he designe him to death, which had given life to all Israel? Oft-times wicked mens judgements are forced to yeeld unto that truth against which their affections maintain a rebellion: Even the foulest hearts doe sometimes entertain good motions; like as on the contrary, the holiest soules give way sometimes to the suggestions of evill: The flashes of lightning may be discerned in the darkest Prisons. But if good thoughts looke into a wicked heart, they stay not there as those that like not their lodging, they are soone gone; Hardly any thing distinguishes betwixt good and evill, but continuance: The light that shines into an holy heart is constant, like that of the Sun, which keeps due times, and varies not his course for any of these sublunary occasions.

The Philistims Warres renue Davids victories, and Davids victory renues Sauls envy, and Sauls envy renues the plots of Davids death: Vowes and Oaths are forgotten: That evill spirit which vexes Saul hath found so much favour with him, as to win him to these bloudy machinations against an innocent; His owne hands shall first be imployed in this execution; The Speare, which hath twice before threatned death to David, shall now once againe goe upon that message: Wise David that knew the danger of an hollow friend, and reconciled enemy; and that found more cause to minde Sauls earnest, then his own play, gives way by his nimblenesse, to that deadly weapon, and resigning that stroke unto the wall, flies for his life. No man knowes how to be sure of an unconscionable man; If either goodnesse, or merit, or affinity, or reasons, or oaths could secure a man, David had bin safe; now if his heeles doe not more befriend him then all these, he is a dead man. No sooner is he gone then messengers are sped after him: It hath beene seldome seene that wickednesse wanted Executioners; Davids house is beset with Murderers, which watch at all his doores for the opportunity of bloud: Who can but wonder to see how God hath fetcht from the loynes of Saul a remedy for the malice of Sauls heart? His owne children are the onely meanes to crosse him in the sinne, and to preserve his guiltlesse Adversary; Michal hath more then notice of the plot, and with her subtill wit countermines her father, for the rescue of

A an Husband: She taking the benefit of the night lets David downe through a window; He is gone, and disappoints the ambushes of Saul. The messengers begin to be impatient of this delay, and now think it time to enquire after their Prisoner; She whiles them off, with the excuse of Davids sickness, (so as now her Husband had good leisure for his escape) and laies a Statue in his bed; Saul likes the newes of any evill befaln to David, but fearing he is not sick enough, sends to aide his disease: The messengers return, and rushing into the house with their swords drawn, after some harsh words to their imagined charge, surprize a sick Statue lying with a Pillow under his head; and now blush to see they have spent all their threats upon a senslesse stock; and made themselves ridiculous, whiles they would be serviceable.

B But how shall Michal answer this mockage unto her furious father? Hitherto she hath done like Davids wife; now she begins to be Sauls Daughter; (He said to me, Let me goe, or else I will kill thee.) She whose wit had delivered her Husband from the Sword of her Father, now turnes the edge of his Fathers wrath from her self to her Husband. His absence made her presume of his safety: If Michal had not bin of Sauls plot, he had never expostulated with her in those termes, Why hast thou let mine enemy escape? neither had she framed that answer, He said, Let me goe. I doe not finde any great store of religion in Michal, for both she had an Image in the house, and afterward mocked David for his devotion: yet Nature hath taught her to preferre a Husband to a Father; to elude a Father from whom she could not fly, to save an Husband, which durst not but fly from her: The bonds of matrimo-
C niall love are, and should be stronger then those of nature; Those respects are mutuall which God appointed in the first institution of Wedlock; That Husband and Wife should leave Father and Mother for each others sake. Treason is ever odious; but so much more in the Marriage-bed, by how much the obligations are deeper.

As she loved her Husband better then her Father, so she loved her self better then her husband; she saved her husband by a wile, and now she saves her self by a lye; and loses half the thank of her deliverance, by an officious slander: Her act was good, but she wants courage to maintain it; and therefore seekes to the weak shelter of untruth: Those that doe good offices, not out of conscience, but good nature or civility, if they meet an affront of danger, seldome come off cleanly,
D but are ready to catch at all excuses, though base, though injurious; because their grounds are not strong enough to beare them out in suffering for that, which they have well done.

Whither doth David fly, but to the Sanctuary of Samuel? He doth not (though he knew himself gracions with the Souldiers) raise forces, or take some strong Fort, and there stand upon his owne defence; and at defiance with his King: but he gets him to the Colledge of the Prophets, as a man that would seek the peaceable protection of the King of Heaven against the unjust fury of a King on earth: Only the wing of God shall hide him from that violence.

God intended to make David not a Warriour, and a King onely, but a Prophet too; As the field fitted him for the first, and the Court for the second, so Na-
E joth shall fit him for the third. Doubtlesse (such was Davids delight in holy meditations) he never spent his time so contentedly, as when he was retired to that divine Academy, and had so full freedome to enjoy God, and to satiate himself with heavenly exercises: The onely doubt is how Samuel can give harbour to a man fled from the anger of his Prince; wherein, the very persons of both give abundant satisfaction: for both Samuel knew the counsell of God, and durst doe nothing without it; and David was by Samuel anointed from God: This Unction was a mutuall Bond: Good reason had David to sue him, which had powred the Oyle on his head, for the hiding of that head which he had anointed; and good reason had Samuel to hide him, whom God by his meanes had chosen, from him whom God had by his sentence rejected; besides that, the cause deserved commiseration: Here was not a Malefactor running away from Justice, but an innocent avoyding Murder; not a Traitor countenanced againſt his Soveraigne, but the Deliverer of Iſrael harboured in a Sanctuary of Prophets till his peace might be made.

Even thither doth Saul ſend to apprehend David: All his rage did not incenſe him againſt Samuel as the Abettor of his Adverſary; Such an impreſſion of reverence had the perſon, and calling of the Prophet left in the minde of Saul, that he cannot think of lifting up his hand againſt him: The ſame God which did at the firſt put an awe of man in the fierceſt creatures, hath ſtamped in the cruelleſt hearts a reverent reſpect to his owne image in his Miniſters; ſo as even they that hate them, doe yet honour them.

Sauls meſſengers came to lay hold on David, God laies hold on them: No ſooner doe they ſee a company of Prophets buſie in thoſe divine Exerciſes, under the moderation of Samuel, then they are turned from Executioners to Prophets. It is good going up to Najoth, into the holy Aſſemblies; who knowes how we may be changed beſide our intention? Many one hath come into Gods Houſe to carp, or ſcoffe, or ſleepe, or gaze, that hath returned a Convert.

The ſame heart that was thus diſquieted with Davids happy ſucceſſe, is now vexed with the holineſſe of his other Servants. It angers him that Gods Spirit could finde no other time to ſeize upon his Agents, then when he had ſent them to kill: And now out of an indignation at this diſappointment, himſelfe will goe and be his owne Servant; His guilty ſoule findes it ſelfe out of the danger of being thus ſurprized; And behold Saul is no ſooner come within the ſmell of the ſmoak of Najoth, then he alſo propheſies; The ſame Spirit that, when he went firſt from Samuel, inabled him to propheſie, returnes in the ſame effect now that he was going (his laſt) unto Samuel: This was ſuch a grace as might well ſtand with rejection; an extraordinary gift of the ſpirit, but not ſanctifying: Many men have had their mouthes opened to propheſie unto others, whoſe hearts have bin deafe to God; But this (ſuch as it was) was far from Sauls purpoſe, who in ſtead of expoſtulating with Samuel, falls downe before him; and laying aſide his weapons, and his Robes, of a Tyrant proves (for the time) a Diſciple: All hearts are in the hand of their Maker; how eaſie is it for him that gave them their being to frame them to his own bent? Who can be affraid of malice, that knows what hooks God hath in the noſtrils of men and Devils? What charmes he hath for the moſt Serpentine hearts?

David and Ahim-elech.

1 Sam. 21.

WHo can ever judge of the Children by the Parents, that knowes Ionathan was the ſon of Saul? There was never a falſer heart then Sauls; there was never a truer friend then Ionathan; Neither the hope of a Kingdome, nor the frownes of a Father, nor the feare of death can remove him from his vowed amity: No ſon could be more officious, and dutifull to a good father; yet he laies downe nature at the foot of grace; and for the preſervation of his innocent Rivall for the Kingdome, croſſes the bloudy deſignes of his own Parent: David needs no other Counſellor, no other Advocate, no other Intelligencer then he: It is not in the power of Sauls unnaturall reproaches, or of his Speare, to make Ionathan any other then a friend, and patron of innocence: Even after all theſe difficulties, doth Ionathan ſhoot beyond David, that Saul may ſhoot ſhort of him, in vain are thoſe profeſſions of love, which are not anſwered with action; He is no true friend that (beſides talk) is not ready both to doe and ſuffer.

Saul is no whit the better for his propheſying; he no ſooner riſes up from before Samuel, then he purſues David. Wicked men are rather the worſe for thoſe tranſitory good motions they have received. If the ſwine be never ſo cleane waſhed, ſhe will wallow wallow againe: That we have good thoughts, it is no thank to us; that we anſwer them not, it is both our ſin and judgement.

David hath learned not to truſt theſe fits of devotion, but flies from Samuel to Ionathan, from Ionathan to Ahimelech; when he was hunted from the Prophet, he flies to the Prieſt, as one that knew juſtice and compaſſion ſhould dwell in thoſe breaſts which are conſecrated unto God.

The Ark and the Tabernacle were then ſeparated; The Ark was at Kiriathjearim, the Tabernacle at Nob; God was preſent with both: Whither ſhould David flie for ſuccour but to the Houſe of that God, which had anointed him?

Ahimelech was wont to ſee David attended with the troups of Iſrael, or with the Gallants of the Court; it ſeemes ſtrange therefore to him, to ſee ſo great a Peere and Champion of Iſrael come alone; Theſe are the alterations to which earthly Greatneſſe is ſubject; Not many daies are paſt, ſince no man was honoured at Court but Ionathan and David; now they are both for the time in diſgrace; Now dare not the Kings Son in Law, Brother to the Prince both in Love and Mariage, ſhew his head at the Court; nor any of thoſe that bowed to him, dare ſtir a foot with him; Princes are as the Sun, and great Subjects are like to Dials, if the Sun ſhine not on the Dial no man will look at it.

Even he that overcame the Beare, the Lyon, the Gyant, is overcome with feare: He that had cut off two hundred fore-skins of the Philiſtims, had not circumciſed his own heart of the weak paſſions that follow Diſtruſt; Now that he is hard driven, he practiſes to help himſelf with an unwarrantable ſhift: Who can look to paſſe this Pilgrimage without infirmities, when David diſſembleth to Ahimelech? A weak mans rules may be better then the beſt mans actions; God lets us ſee ſome blemiſhes in his holieſt Servants, that we may neither be too highly conceited of fleſh and bloud, nor too much dejected when we have bin miſcarryed into ſin. Hitherto hath David gone upright, now he begins to halt with the Prieſt of God; and under pretence of Sauls imployment, drawes that favour from Ahimelech, which ſhall afterwards coſt him his head.

What could Ahimelech have thought too deare for Gods Anointed, for Gods Champion? It is not like but that if David had ſincerely opened himſelfe to the Prieſt as he hath done to the Prophet, Ahimelech would have ſeconded Samuel in ſome ſecret and ſafe ſuccour of ſo unjuſt a diſtreſſe, whereas he is now by a falſe colour led to that kindneſſe which ſhall be prejudiciall to his life: Extremities of evill are commonly inconſiderate; either for that we have not leiſure to our thoughts, or perhaps (ſo as we may be perplexed) not thoughts to our leiſure: What would David have given afterwards to have redeemed this over-ſight?

Under this pretence he craves a double favour of Ahimelech; The one of bread for his ſuſtenance, the other of a Sword for his defence: There was no bread under the hands of the Prieſt but that which was conſecrated to God; and whereof none might taſt but the devoted Servants of the Altar; Even that which was with ſolemne dedication ſet upon the holy Tables before the face of God; a Sacramentall Bread preſented to God with Incenſe, figuring that true Bread that came down from Heaven; yet even this Bread might in caſe of neceſſity become common, and be given by Ahimelech, and received by David and his followers: Our Saviour himſelf juſtifies the act of both; Ceremonies muſt give place to ſubſtance; God will have Mercy and not Sacrifice; Charity is the ſumme and the end of the Law; That muſt be aimed at in all our actions; wherein it may fall out, that the way to keep the Law may be to break it; the intention may be kept, and the Letter violated; and it may be a dangerous tranſgreſſion of the Law to obſerve the words, and neglect the ſcope of God; That which would have diſpenſed with David for the ſubſtance of the act, would have much more diſpenſed with him for the circumſtance; The touch of their lawfull Wives had contracted a legall impurity, not a morall; That could have bin no ſufficient reaſon why in an urgent neceſſity they might not have partaked of the holy Bread: Ahimelech was no perfect Caſuiſt; theſe men might not famiſh, if they were ceremonially impure. But this queſtion bewrayed the care of Ahimelech in diſtributing ſtributing the holy Bread; There might be in theſe men a double incapacity, the one as they were Seculars, the other, as uncleane; he ſaw the one muſt be, he feared leſt the other ſhould be; as one that wiſhed as little indiſpoſition (as poſſible might be) in thoſe which ſhould be fed from Gods Table. A

It is ſtrange that David ſhould come to the Prieſt of God for a Sword; Who in all Iſrael was ſo unlikely to furniſh him with weapons, as a man of Peace, whoſe armour was only ſpirituall? Doubtleſſe David knew well where Goliahs Sword lay; as the noble reliqué of Gods victorious deliverance, dedicated to the ſame God, which won it; at this did that ſuit aime: None could be ſo fit for David, none could be ſo fit for it as David: Who could have ſo much right to that Sword, as he againſt whom it was drawn, and by whom it was taken? There was more in that Sword, then Metal, and form; David could never caſt his eie upon it, but he ſaw an undoubted monument of the mercifull protection of the Almighty; there was therefore more ſtrength in that Sword, then ſharpneſſe; neither was Davids arme ſo much ſtrengthened by it as his faith; nothing can overcome him, whiles he carries with him that aſſured ſigne of victory: It is good to take all occaſions of renuing the remembrance of Gods mercies to us, and our obligations to him. B

Doeg the Maſter of Sauls Herdmen (for he that went to ſeek his Fathers Aſſes before he was King, hath herds and droves now that he is a King) was now in the Court of the Tabernacle, upon ſome occaſion of devotion; Though an Iſraelite in profeſſion, he was an Edomite no leſſe in heart then in bloud; yet he hath ſome vow upon him, and not only comes up to Gods Houſe, but abides before the Lord. Hyporcites have equall acceſſe to the publike places, and meanes of Gods ſervice: Even he that knowes the heart, yet ſhuts his doores upon none; how much leſſe ſhould we dare to exclude any, which can onely judge of the heart by the face? C

Doeg may ſet his foot as far within the Tabernacle, as David, he ſees the paſſages betwixt him, and Ahimelech, and laies them up for an advantage; Whiles he ſhould have edified himſelf by thoſe holy ſervices, he carps at the Prieſt of God, and (after a lewd miſ-interpretation of his actions) of an attendant, proves an accuſer; To incur favour with an unjuſt Maſter, he informs againſt innocent Ahimelech; and makes that his act which was drawn from him by a cunning circumvention: When we ſee our Auditors before us, little do we know with what hearts they are there; nor, what uſe they will make of their pretended devotion: If many come in ſimplicity of heart to ſerve their God, ſome others may perhaps come to obſerve their Teachers, and to pick quarrels where none are; Onely God and the iſſue can diſtinguiſh betwixt a David, and a Doeg, when they are both in the Tabernacle. Honeſt Ahimelech could little ſuſpect that he now offered a Sacrifice for his Executioner; yea, for the Murtherer of all his Family: Oh the wiſe and deep judgements of the Almighty! God owed a revenge to the Houſe of Eli, and now by the delation of Doeg, he takes occaſion to pay it: It was juſt in God, which in Doeg was moſt unjuſt: Sauls cruelty and the treachery of Doeg do not loſe one dram of their guilt by the Counſell of God; neither doth the holy Counſell of God gather any blemiſh by their wickedneſſe; If it had pleaſed God to inflict death upon them ſooner without any pretence of occaſion, his Juſtice had bin cleare from all imputations; now if Saul and Doeg be in ſtead of a peſtilence or fever, who can cavill? The judgements of God are not open, but are alwaies juſt; He knowes how by one mans ſin to puniſh the ſin of another, and by both their ſins and puniſhments to glorifie himſelf. If his word ſleep, it ſhall not die; but after long intermiſſions breaks forth in thoſe effects which we had forgotten to look for, and ceaſed to feare. O Lord, thou art ſure when thou threatneſt, and juſt when thou judgeſt; Keep thou us from the ſentence of death, elſe in vain ſhall we labour to keep our ſelves from the execution. D E

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, AND MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD,

EARLE OF MONGOMERY, ONE OF THE GENTLEMEN OF HIS MAIESTIES Bed-chamber, and Knight of the most Honourable Order of the GARTER.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE;

AFter some unpleasing intermissions, I returne to that task of Contemplation, wherein only my soul findeth rest. If in other imployments I have indeavoured to serve God and his Church, yet in none (I must confesse) with equall contentment. Me thinks Controversie is not right in my way to heaven; however the importunity of an adversary may force me to fetch it in: If Truth oppressed by an erroneous Teacher cry (like a ravisht Virgin) for my aid, I betray it, if I releeve it not; when I have done, I returne gladly to these paths of Peace. The favour which my late Polemicall labour hath found (beyond merit) from the Learned, cannot divert my love to those wrangling Studies. How earnestly doth my heart rather wish an universall cessation of these Armes; that all the Professors of the dear Name of Christ might be be taken up with nothing but holy and peaceable thoughts of Devotion; the ſweetneſſe whereof hath ſo far affected me, that (if I might doe it without danger of miſ-conſtruction) I could begge even of an Enemy this leave to be happy. I have already given account to the World, of ſome expences of my houres this way, and here I bring more; which if ſome Reader may cenſure as poore, none can cenſure as unprofitable. I am bold to write them under your Honourable Name, whereto I am deeply obliged; that I may leave behind me this meane, but faithfull Teſtimony, of my humble thankefulneſſe to your Lordſhip, and your moſt honoured and vertuous Lady. The noble reſpects I have had from you both, deſerve my Prayers, and beſt ſervices, which ſhall never be wanting to you and yours.

From your Honours ſincerely devoted in all true duty,

JOS: HALL.

Contemplations.

SAUL in DAVIDS Cave.

IT was the ſtrange lot of David, that thoſe whom he purſued, preſerved him from thoſe whom he had preſerved; The Philiſtims whom David had newly ſmitten in Keilah, call off Saul from ſmiting David in the Wilderneſſe, when there was but an hillock betwixt him and death; Wicked purpoſes are eaſily checked, not eaſily broken off. Sauls Sword is ſcarce dry from the bloud of the Philiſtims, when it thirſts anew for the bloud of David; and now in a renewed chaſe, hunts him dry-foot through every wilderneſſe. The very deſart is too fair a refuge for innocence; The hils and rocks are ſearched in an angry jealouſie; the very wilde Goats of the mountains were not allowed to be companions for him, which had no fault but his vertue. Oh the ſeemingly-unequall diſtribution of theſe earthly things! Cruelty and oppreſſion raignes in a Palace, whiles goodneſſe lurks among the Rocks and Caves, and thinks it happineſſe enough to ſteale a life. 1 Sam. 24.

Like a dead man, David is fain to be hid under the earth, and ſeeks the comfort of protection in darkneſſe: and now the wiſe providence of God leads Saul to his enemy without bloud; He which before brought them within an hils diſtance without interview, brings them now both within one roofe; ſo as that whiles Saul ſeeks David and findes him not, he is found of David unſought. If Saul had known his own opportunities, how David and his men had interred themſelves, he had ſaved a treble labour, of chaſe, of execution, and buriall; for had he but ſtopt the mouth of that Cave, his enemies had laid themſelves down in their own Graves: The Wiſedome of God thinks fit to hide from evill men, and ſpirits, thoſe meanes and ſeaſons, which might be (if they had bin taken) moſt prejudiciall to his own: we had been oft foyled if Satan could but have knowne our hearts: ſometimes we lye open to evils, and happy it is for us that he onely knowes it, which pitties in ſtead of tempting us.

It is not long ſince Saul ſaid of David (lodged then in Keilah) God hath delivered him into mine hands, for he is ſhut in, ſeeing he is come into a city that hath gates, and bars; but now contrarily God delivers Saul (ere he was aware) into the hands of David, and without the help of gates and bars, hath incloſed him within the Valley of of death: How juſt is it with God, that thoſe who ſeek miſchiefe to others, finde it to themſelves; and even whiles they are ſpreading nets are enſnared; Their deliberate plotting of evill, is ſurprized with a ſudden judgement. A

How amazedly muſt David needs look, when he ſaw Saul enter into the Cave, where himſelf was? what is this (thinks he) which God hath done? Is this preſence purpoſed, or caſuall? is Saul here to purſue, or to tempt me? Where ſuddenly the action bewraies the intent, and tels David that Saul ſought ſecrecy and not him. The ſuperfluity of his maliciouſneſſe brought him into the Wilderneſſe, the neceſſity of nature led him into the Cave: Even thoſe actions wherein we place ſhame, are not exempted from a providence. The fingers of Davids followers itched to ſeize upon their Maſters enemy; & that they might not ſeem led ſo much by faction, as by faith, they urge David with a promiſe from God; The day is come whereof the Lord ſaid unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thine hand, and thou ſhalt doe to him, as it ſhall ſeem good to thee. This argument ſeemed to cary ſuch command with it, as that David not only may, but muſt embrue his hands in bloud, unleſſe he will be found wanting to God and himſelf; Thoſe temptations are moſt powerfull, which fetch their force from the pretence of a religious obedience: Whereas thoſe which are raiſed from arbitrary and private reſpects, admit of an eaſie diſpenſation. B

If there were ſuch a prediction, one clauſe of it was ambiguous; and they take it at the worſt. Thou ſhalt doe to him as ſhall ſeeme good to thee: That might not ſeeme good to him, which ſeemed evill to God. There is nothing more dangerous then to make conſtruction of Gods purpoſes out of eventuall appearances. If carnall probabilities might be the rule of our judgement, what could God ſeeme to intend other then Sauls death in offering him naked into the hands of thoſe whom he unjuſtly perſecuted? how could Davids ſouldiers think that God had ſent Saul thither on any other errand, then to fetch his bane? and if Saul could have ſeen his own danger, he had given himſelf for dead; for his heart guilty to his own bloudy deſires, could not but have expected the ſame meaſure which it meant: But wiſe and holy David not tranſported either with miſconceit of the event, or fury of paſſion, or ſolicitation of his followers, dares make no other uſe of this accident then the tryal of his loyalty, and the inducement of his peace; It had bin as eaſie for him to cut the throat of Saul as his garment; but now his coat only ſhall be the worſe, not his perſon; neither doth he in this maiming of a cloak ſeek his own revenge, but a monument of his innocence. Before Saul rent Samuels garment, now David cutteth Sauls; both were ſignificant; The rending of the one, ſignified the Kingdome torne out of thoſe unworthy hands; the cutting of the other, that the life of Saul might have bin as eaſily cut off. C D

Saul needs no other Monitor of his own danger, then what he weares. The garment of Saul was laid aſide, while he went to cover his feet; ſo as the cut of the garment did not threaten any touch of the body; yet even the violence offered to a remote garment ſtrikes the heart of David, which findes a preſent remorſe for harmfully touching that which did once touch the perſon of his Maſter: Tender conſciences are moved to regret at thoſe actions, which ſtrong hearts paſſe over with a careleſſe eaſe. It troubled not Saul to ſeek after the bloud of a righteous ſervant; there is no leſſe differences of conſciences then ſtomacks; ſome ſtomacks will digeſt the hardeſt meats, and turn over ſubſtances, not in their nature edible, whiles others ſurfet of the lighteſt food, and complain even of dainties: Every gracious heart is in ſome meaſure ſcrupulous, and findes more ſafety in feare, then in preſumption: And if it be ſo ſtrait as to curb it ſelf in from the liberty which it might take in things which are not unlawfull, how much leſſe will it dare to take ſcope unto evil? By how much that ſtate is better, where nothing is allowed, then where all things; by ſo much is the ſtrict and timorous conſcience better then the lawleſſe. There is good likelihood of that man which is any way ſcrupulous of his wayes; but he which makes no bones of his actions, is apparently hopeleſſe. E

Since Davids followers pleaded Gods teſtimony to him as a motive to bloud, David appeales the ſame God for his preſervation from bloud: The Lord keep me from

A from doing that thing to my Master the Lords Anointed; and now the good man hath work enough to defend both himself and his persecuter; himselfe, from the importunate necessity of doing violence, and his Master from suffering it. It was not more easie to rule his own hands, then difficult to rule a multitude; Davids troope consisted of Male-contents, all that were in distresse, in debt, in bitternesse of soule; were gathered to him: Many if never so well ordered are hard to command; a few if disorderly, more hard; many and disorderly, must needs be so much the hardest of all, that David never atchieved any victory like unto this, wherein he first overcame himselfe, then his soldiers.

And what was the charme, wherewith David allayed those raging spirits of his followers? No other but this; He is the Anointed of the Lord. That holy Oyle was
B the Antidote for his bloud; Saul did not lend David so impierceable an Armour, when he should encounter Goliah, as David now lent him in this plea of his unction. Which of all the discontented Out-lawes that lurked in that Cave, durst put forth his hand against Saul, when they once heard, He is the Lords anointed? Such an impression of awe hath the Divine Providence caused his Image to make in the hearts of men, as that it makes Traitors cowards; so as in stead of striking, they tremble; How much more lawlesse then the Out-lawes of Israel, are those professed Ring-leaders of Christianity; which teach and practise, and incourage, and reward, and canonize the violation of Majesty? It is not enough for those who are commanders of others to refraine their own hands from doing evill, but they must carefully prevent the iniquity of their heeles, else they shall be justly reputed to do that by others,
C which in their own persons they avoided; The lawes both of God and man presuppose us in some sort answerable for our charge: as taking it for granted, that we should not undertake those reynes, which we cannot mannage.

There was no reason David should lose the thanks of so noble a demonstration of his loyalty; whereto he trusts so much, that he dares call back the man by whom he was pursued; and make him judge whether that fact had not deserved a life. As his act, so his word and gesture imported nothing but humble obedience, neither was there more meeknesse then force in that seasonable perswasion, Wherein he lets Saul see the error of his credulity, the unjust slanders of maliciousnesse, the opportunity of his revenge, the proofe of his forbearance, the undeniable evidence of his innocence; and after a lowly disparagement of himself, appeales to God for judge-D ment, for protection.

So lively and feeling Oratory did Saul find in the lap of his garment, and the lips of David, that it is not in the power of his envy, or ill nature to hold out any longer: Is this thy voyce my son David, and Saul lift up his voyce and wept, and said; Thou art more righteous then I. He, whose Harp was wont to quiet the frenzy of Saul, hath now by his words calmed his fury; so that now he sheds teares in stead of bloud; and confesses his own wrong, and Davids integrity; And (as if he were new again entred into the bounds of Najoth in Ramath) he prayes, and propheſies good to him, whom he maliced for good; The Lord render thee good for that thou hast done to me this day, for now behold, I know that thou shalt be King.

There is no heart made of flesh, that sometime or other relents not; even flint and E marble, will in some weather stand on drops. I cannot think these teares and protestations fained. Doubtlesse Saul meant as he said, and passed through sensible fits of good and evill: Let no man think himselfe the better for good motions; the praise and benefit of those gusts is not in the receit, but the retention.

Who, that had seene this meeting, could but have thought that all had been sure on Davids side? What can secure us if not Teares, and Prayers, and Oathes? Doubtlesse Davids men which knew themselves obnoxious to Laws and Creditors, began to think of some new refuge, as making account this new peeced league would be everlasting, they looked when Saul would take David home to the Court, and dissolve his Army, and recompence that unjust persecution with just honour; when behold in the loose, Saul goes home, but David and his men goe up unto the hold. Wise David knows Saul not to be more kinde then untrusty; and therefore had rather ſeek ſafety in his hold, then in the hold of a hollow and unſteady friendſhip. Here are good words, but no ſecurity, which therefore an experienced man gives the hearing, but ſtands the while upon his own guard. No Charity bindes us to a truſt of thoſe, whom we have found faithleſſe: Credulity upon weak grounds after palpable diſappointments, is the Daughter of Folly: A man that is Weather-wiſe, though he finde an abatement of the ſtorm, yet will not ſtirre from under his ſhelter whiles he ſees it thick in the winde. Diſtruſt is the juſt gain of unfaithfulneſſe.

Nabal and Abigail.

1 Sam. 25

IF innocency could have ſecured from Sauls malice, David had not been perſecuted; and yet under that wicked King, aged Samuel dyes in his bed. That there might be no place for Envy, the good Prophet had retired himſelf to the Schooles. Yet he that hated David, for what he ſhould be, did no leſſe hate Samuel for what he had been. Even in the midſt of Sauls malignity, there remained in his heart impreſſions of awfulneſſe unto Samuel: he feared, where he loved not. The reſtraint of God curbeth the rage of his moſt violent enemies, ſo as they cannot doe their worſt. As good Husbands doe not put all their Corn to the Oven, but ſave ſome for ſeed, ſo doth God ever in the worſt of perſecutions.

Samuel is dead, David baniſhed, Saul tyranizeth, Iſrael hath good cauſe to mourn; it is no marvell if this lamentation be univerſall. There is no Iſraelite that feeleth not the loſſe of a Samuel. A good Prophet is the common Treaſure, wherein every gracious ſoule hath a ſhare. That man hath a dry heart, which can part with Gods Prophet without teares.

Nabal was according to his name, fooliſh; yet rich and mighty. Earthly poſſeſſions are not alwayes accompanied with wit and grace. Even the Line of faithfull Caleb will afford an ill-conditioned Nabal. Vertue is not like unto Lands, inheritable. All that is traduced with the ſeed, is either evill, or not good. Let no man brag with the Jews that he hath Abram to his father; God hath raiſed up of this ſtone a ſon to Caleb.

Abigail (which ſignifieth her fathers joy) had ſorrow enough to be matched with ſo unworthy an husband; If her father had meant ſhe ſhould have had joy in her ſelf, or in her life, he had not diſpoſed her to an husband (though rich yet) fond and wicked; It is like he maried her to the wealth, not to the man. Many a child is caſt away upon riches. Wealth in our matches ſhould be as ſome grains or ſcruples in the ballance ſuperadded to the gold of vertuous qualities, to weigh down the ſcales: when it is made the ſubſtance of the weight, and good qualities the appendance, there is but one earth poyſed with another; which, whereſoever it is done, it is a wonder, if either the children prove not the Parents ſorrow, or the Parents, theirs.

Nabals ſheep-ſhearing was famous; Three thouſand fleeces muſt needs require many hands; neither is any thing more plentifull commonly then a Churles Feaſt: What a world was this, that the Noble Champion and Reſcuer of Iſrael, Gods Anointed, is driven to ſend to a baſe Carle for victuals? It is no meaſuring of men by the depth of the purſe, by outward proſperity. Servants are oftentimes ſet on horſe-back, whiles Princes goe on foot. Our eſtimation muſt be led by their inward worth, which is not alterable by time, nor diminiſhed with externall conditions.

One ragge of a David is more worth, then the Ward-robes of a thouſand Nabals. Even the beſt deſervings may want. No man may be contemned for his neceſſity; perhaps he may be ſo much richer in grace, as he is poorer in eſtate, neither hath violence or caſualty more impoveriſhed a David, then his poverty hath enriched him. He, whoſe folly hath made himſelf miſerable, is juſtly rewarded with neglect; but he that ſuffers for good, deſerves ſo much more honour from others, as his diſtreſſe is more. Our compaſſion or reſpect muſt be ruled, according to the cauſe of anothers miſery.

A One good turn requires another; in ſome caſes, not hurting is meritorious: Hee that ſhould examine the qualities of Davids followers, muſt needs grant it worthy of a fee, that Nabals flocks lay untouched in Carmell; but more, that Davids Souldiers were Nabals Shepheards, yea the keepers of his Shepheards, gave them a juſt intereſt in that Sheep-ſhearing Feaſt, juſtly ſhould they have been ſet at the upper end of the Table. That Nabals Sheep were ſafe, he might thank his Shepheards; that his Shepheards were ſafe, he might thank Davids Souldiers: It is no ſmall benefit that we receive in a ſafe protection; well may we think our ſubſtance due, where we owe our ſelves. Yet this churliſh Nabal doth not onely give nothing to Davids Meſſengers, but which is worſe then nothing, ill words; Who is David, or who is the ſonne of Iſhai? There be many ſervants now adayes that breake away from their Maſters. David asked him bread, he giveth B him ſtones. All Iſrael knew and honoured their Deliverer: yet this Clown, to ſave his victuals, will needs make him a man, either of no merits or ill, either an obſcure man or a fugitive. Nothing is more cheap then good words; theſe Nabal might have given, and been never the poorer: If he had been reſolved to ſhut his hands in a feare of Sauls revenge, he might have ſo tempered his deniall, that the repulſe might have been free from offence: But now his foule-mouth doth not only deny, but revile. It ſhould have been Nabals glory, that his Tribe yeelded ſuch a Succeſſor to the Throne of Iſrael; now in all likelihood, his envy ſtirs him up to diſgrace that man, who ſurpaſſed him in honour and vertue, more then he was ſurpaſſed by him in wealth and eaſe; Many a one ſpeaks faire, that meanes ill, but when the C mouth ſpeaks foule, it argues a corrupt heart; If with Saint Iames his verball benefactors, we ſay onely, Depart in peace, warme your ſelves, fill your bellies, wee ſhall anſwer for hypocryticall uncharitableneſſe; but if we rate and curſe thoſe needy ſoules, whom we ought to relieve, we ſhall give a more fearfull account of a ſavage cruelty in trampling on thoſe whom God hath humbled. If healing with good words be juſtly puniſhable, what torment is there for thoſe that wound with evill?

David, which had all this while been in the Schoole of patience, hath now his leſſon to ſeek: He who hath happily digeſted all the railings and perſecutions of a wicked Maſter, cannot put off this affront of a Nabal; Nothing can aſſwage his choler, but bloud: How ſubject are the beſt of Gods Saints to weak paſſions, and if D we have the grace to ward an expected blow of temptation, how eaſily are we ſurprized with a ſudden foyle!

Wherefore ſerve theſe recorded weakneſſes of holy men, but to ſtrengthen us againſt the conſcience of our infirmities? Not that we ſhould take courage to imitate them in the evill, whereunto they have been miſcarryed; But we ſhould take heart to our ſelves, againſt the diſcouragement of our own evils.

The wiſdome of God hath ſo contrived it, that commonly (in Societies) good is mixed with evill, wicked Nabal hath in his houſe a wiſe and good Servant, a prudent and worthy Wife; That wiſe ſervant is carefull to advertiſe his Miſtreſſe of the danger; his prudent Miſtreſſe is carefull to prevent it.

The lives of all his family were now in hazard: ſhe dares not commit this E buſineſſe to the fidelity of a meſſenger, but forgetting her ſexe, puts her ſelfe into the errand; Her foot is not ſlow, her hand is not empty; According to the offence ſhe frames her ſatisfaction; Her Husband refuſed to give, ſhe brings a bountifull gift; Her Husband gave ill words, ſhe ſweetens them with a meek and humble deprecation; Her Husband could ſay, Who is David? ſhe falls at his feet; her Husband diſmiſſes Davids men empty, ſhe brings her Servants laden with proviſion; as if it had been onely meant to eaſe the repelled Meſſengers of the carriage, not to ſcant them of the required benevolence; No wit, no art could deviſe a more pithy and powerfull Oratory: As all ſatisfaction, ſo hers begins with a confeſſion; wherein ſhe deeply blameth the folly of her Husband: She could not have been a good Wife, if ſhe had not honoured her unworthy head; If a ſtranger ſhould have termed him foole in her hearing, he could not have gone away in peace: Now to ſave his life, ſhe is bold to acknowledge his folly: It is a good diſparagement that preſerveth. There is the ſame way to our peace in Heaven; the onely meanes to eſcape judgement, is to complain of our own vileneſſe; ſhe pleadeth her ignorance of the fact, and therein her freedome from the offence: ſhe humbly craveth acceptation of her preſent, with pardon of the fault; ſhe profeſſeth Davids honourable acts and merits; ſhe foretels his future ſucceſſe and glory; ſhe layes before him the happy peace of his ſoule, in refraining from innocent bloud. Davids breſt which could not, through the ſeeds of grace, grow to a ſtubbornneſſe in ill reſolutions, cannot but relent with theſe powerfull and ſeaſonable perſwaſions; and now in ſtead of revenge, he bleſſeth God for ſending Abigail to meet him; he bleſſeth Abigail for her counſell, he bleſſeth the counſell for ſo wholſome efficacy, and now rejoyceth more in being overcome with a wiſe and gracious advice, then he would have rejoyced in a revengefull victory.

A good heart is eaſily ſtayed from ſinning, and is glad when it findes occaſion to be croſſed in ill purpoſes; Thoſe ſecret checks which are raiſed within it ſelf, doe readily conſpire with all outward retentives; It never yeelded to a wicked motion, without much reluctation, and when it is overcome, it is but with halfe a conſent; whereas perverſe and obdurate Sinners, by reaſon they take full delight in evill, and have already in their conceit ſwallowed the pleaſure of ſinne, abide not to be reſiſted, running on headily, in thoſe wicked courſes they have propounded in ſpight of oppoſition; and if they be forcibly ſtopped in their way, they grow ſullen and mutinous. David had not only vowed, but deeply ſworn the death of Nabal, and all his Family, to the very Dogge that lay at his doore; yet now he praiſeth God, that hath given the occaſion and grace to violate it. Wicked Vowes are ill made, but worſe kept. Our tongue cannot tye us to commit ſin. Good men think themſelves happy, that ſince they had not the grace to deny ſinne, yet they had not the opportunity to accompliſh it. If Abigail had ſit ſtill at home, David had ſinned, and ſhe had dyed: Now her diſcreet admonition hath preſerved her from the ſword, and diverted him from bloud-ſhed. And now, what thanks, what benedictions hath ſhe for this ſeaſonable counſell? How ſhould it encourage us to admoniſh our brethren; to ſee that if we prevaile, we have bleſſings from them; if we prevaile not, we have yet bleſſings from God, and thanks of our owne hearts?

How neare was Nabal to a miſchiefe, and perceives it not? David was comming to the foot of the hill to cut his throat, while he was feaſting in his houſe without feare; Little doe ſinners know, how neare their jollity is to perdition. Many times judgement is at the threſhold, whiles drunkenneſſe and ſurfet are at the boord. Had he been any other then a Nabal, he had not ſate down to feaſt till he had been ſure of his peace with David; either not to expect danger, or not to cleare it, was ſottiſh; So fooliſh are carnall men, that give themſelves over to their pleaſures, whiles there are deadly quarrels depending againſt them in Heaven. There is nothing wherein wiſdome is more ſeen, then in the temperate uſe of proſperity. A Nabal cannot abound, but he muſt be drunk and ſurfet; Exceſſe is a true argument of folly: We uſe to ſay, that when drink is in, wit is out, but if wit were not out, drink would not be in.

It was no time to adviſe Nabal, while his reaſon was drowned in a deluge of wine. A beaſt or a ſtone is as capable of good counſell as a Drunkard. Oh that the nobleſt Creature ſhould ſo farre abaſe himſelf, as for a little liquor to loſe the uſe of thoſe faculties, whereby he is a Man! Thoſe that have to doe with drink or phrenzy, muſt be glad to watch times; So did Abigail, who the next morning preſents to her Husband, the view of his faults, of his danger; He then ſees how neare he was to death, and felt it not. That worldly mind is ſo apprehenſive of the death that ſhould have been, as that he dyes, to think that he had like to have dyed; Who would think a man could be ſo affected with a danger paſt, and yet ſo ſenſleſſe of a future, yea imminent? He that was yeſter-night as a beaſt, is now as a ſtone; he was then over-merry, now dead and lumpiſh; Carnall hearts are ever in extremities. If they be be once downe, their dejection is desperate, because they have no inward comfort to mitigate their sorrow. What difference there was betwixt the disposition of David and Nabal? How oft had David been in the Valley of the shadow of death, and feared no evill? Nabal is but once put in minde of a death that might have been, and is striken dead.

It is just with God, that they who live without grace, should die without comfort; neither can we expect better, while we goe on in our sins. The speech of Abigail smote Nabal into a qualm; that tongue had doubtlesse oft advised him well, and prevailed not; now, it occasions his death, whose reformation it could not effect; she meant nothing but his amendment: God meant to make that loving instrument the meanes of his revenge: she speaks, and God strikes; and within ten dayes, that swound ends in death. And now Nabal paies deare for his uncharitable reproach: for his riotous excesse: That God, which would not suffer David to right himself by his own Sword, takes the quarrell of his Servant into his owne hand. David hath now his ends without sin; rejoycing in the just executions of God, who would neither suffer him to sin in revenging, nor suffer his Adversaries to sin unrevenged.

Our loving God is more angry with the wrongs done to his servants, then themselves can be, and knowes how to punish that justly, which we could not undertake without wronging God, more then men have wronged us. He that saith, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, repaies oft-times when we have forgiven, when we have forgotten, and calls to reckoning after our discharges: It is dangerous offending any Favorite of him, whose displeasure and revenge is everlasting.

How far God looks beyond our purposes? Abigail came only to plead for an ill Husband; and now God makes this journey a preparation for a better: So that in one act, she preserved an ill Husband, and won a good one in the future: David well remembers her comely person, her wise speeches, her gracefull carriage; and now, when modesty found it seasonable, he sends to sue her which had been his Suppliant: she intreated for her Husband, David treats with her for his Wife; her request was to escape his Sword, he wisheth her to his bed; it was a faire suit to change a David for a Nabal; to become Davids Queene, in stead of Nabals Drudge; she that learned humility under so hard a Tutor, abaseth her selfe no lesse when David offers to advance her; (Let thine hand-maid be a Servant to wash the feet of the Servants of my Lord.) None are so fit to be great, as those that can stoop lowest: how could David be more happy in a Wife; he findes at once Piety, Wisdome, Humility, Faithfulnesse, Wealth, Beauty? How could Abigail be more happy in an Husband, then in the Prophet, the Champion, the Anointed of God? Those Marriages are well made, wherein Vertues are matched, and Happinesse is mutuall.

DAVID and ACHISH.

Good motions that fall into wicked hearts are like some sparks that fall from the flint and steele, into wet tinder; lightsome for the time, but soone out. After Sauls teares and protestations, yet he is now againe, in the wildernesse with three thousand men to hunt after innocent David: How invincible is the charity and loyalty of an honest heart? The same hand that spared Saul in the Cave, spares him sleeping in the field; The same hand that cut away the lap of his Masters garment, carryed away his Speare; that Speare, which might as well have carryed away the life of the owner, is onely borne away for a proofe of the fidelity of the bearer. Still Saul is strong, but David victorious, and triumphs over the malice of his persecutor; Yet still the victor flyeth from him whom he hath overcome. A man that sees how far Saul was transported with his rancorous envy, cannot but say, that he was never more mad then when he was ſober; For even after he had ſaid (Bleſſed art thou my ſon David, thou ſhalt doe great things and alſo prevaile;) yet ſtill he purſues him, whom he grants aſſured to prevaile; what is this but to reſolve to loſe his labour in ſinning, and in ſpight of himſelf to offend? How ſhamefull is our inequality of diſpoſition to good? We know we cannot miſſe of the reward of wel-doing, and yet doe it not; whiles wicked men caſt away their endeavours upon thoſe evill projects, whereof they are ſure to faile, ſin blinds the eyes and hardens the heart, and thruſts men into wilfull miſchiefes, how ever dangerous, how ever impoſſible; and never leaves them till it have brought them to utter confuſion. A

The overlong continuance of a tentation, may eaſily weary the beſt patience: and may attaine that by protraction, which it could never doe by violence; David himſelf at laſt begins to bend under this tryall; and reſolves ſo to flye from Saul, as he runs from the Church of God; and whiles he will avoid the malice of his Maſter, joynes himſelf with Gods enemies. The greateſt Saints upon earth, are not alwaies upon the ſame pitch of ſpirituall ſtrength; He that ſometimes ſaid (I will not be afraid of ten thouſands, now ſaies, I ſhall one day periſh by the hand of Saul.) He had wont to conſult with God, now he ſayes thus in his owne heart. How many evident experiments had David of Gods deliverances; how certain and cleare predictions of his future Kingdome; how infallible an earneſt was the holy Oyle, wherewith he was anointed, of the Crowne of Iſrael? And yet (David ſaid in his heart, (I ſhall now periſh one day by the hand of Saul:) The beſt faith is but like the twi-light, mixed with ſome degrees of darkneſſe, and infidelity; We doe utterly miſreckon the greateſt earthly holineſſe, if we exempt it from infirmities; It is not long, ſince David told Saul, that thoſe wicked enemies of his, which caſt him out from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord, did as good as bid him, Goe ſerve other gods; yet now is he gone from the inheritance of God, into the Land of the Philiſtims; That Saul might ſeek him no more, he hides himſelfe out of the liſts of the Church, where a good man would not look for him: Once before had David fled to this Achiſh, when he was glad to ſcrabble on the doores, and let his ſpittle fall upon his beard, in a ſemblance of madneſſe, that he might eſcape; yet now in a ſemblance of friendſhip, is he returned to ſave that life, which he was in danger to have loſt in Iſrael. Goliah the Champion of the Philiſtims, whom David ſlew, was of Gath; yet David dwels with Achiſh King of the Philiſtims in Gath; even amongſt them whoſe fore-skins he had preſented to Saul, by two hundreds at once, doth David chuſe to reſide for ſafety: Howſoever it was a weakneſſe in David, thus by his league of amity to ſtrengthen the enemies of God, yet doth not God take advantage of it for his overthrow, but gives him protection, even where his preſence offended; and gives him favour where himſelfe bore juſt hatred; Oh the infinite patience and mercy of our God, who doth good to us for our evill, and in the very act of our provocation upholdeth, yea, bleſſeth us with preſervation! B C D

Could Saul have rightly conſidered it, he had found it no ſmall loſſe and impayring to his Kingdome, that ſo valiant a Captaine, attended with ſixe hundred able Soldiers, and their Families, ſhould forſake his Land, and joyne with his enemies; yet he is not quiet till he have abandoned his own ſtrength: The world hath none ſo great enemy to a wicked man, as himſelf; his hands cannot be held from his own miſchiefe; he will needs make his friends, enemies; his enemies, victors; himſelfe, miſerable. E

David was too wiſe, to caſt himſelf into the hand of a Philiſtim King without aſſurance; What aſſurance could he have but promiſes? Thoſe, David had from Saul abundantly, and truſted them not; He dares truſt the fidelity of a Pagan; he dares not truſt the vowes of a King of Iſrael: There may be fidelity without the Church, an falſhood within: It need not be any newes to finde ſome Turks true, and ſome Chriſtians faithleſſe.

Even unwiſe men are taught by experience, how much more they who have wit to learne without it? David had well found, what it was to live in a Court; Hee therefore, whom envy drove from the Court of Iſrael, voluntarily declines the Philiſtim

A Philiſtim-Court; and ſues for a Country-habitation; It had not been poſſible for ſo noted a ſtranger, after ſo much Philiſtim-bloud-ſhed, to live long in ſuch an eminency, amongſt the preaſe of thoſe, whoſe ſonnes, or brothers, or fathers, or allies, he had ſlaughtered, without ſome perilous machination of his ruine: therefore he makes ſuite for an early remove: (For why ſhould thy ſervant dwell in the chiefe City of the Kingdome with thee?) Thoſe that would ſtand ſure, muſt not affect too much height, or conſpicuity: The tall Cèdars are moſt ſubject to windes and lightnings, whiles the ſhrubs of the Valleyes ſtand unmoved; Much greatneſſe doth but make a fairer mark for evill: There is true firmneſſe and ſafety in mediocrity.

How rarely is it ſeene, that a man loſeth by his modeſty? The change fell out well
B to David of Ziklag, for Gath; Now he hath a City of his own; All Iſrael, where he was anointed, afforded him not ſo much poſſeſſion: Now the City which was anciently aſſigned to Iudah, returnes to the juſt Owner: and is by this meanes entailed to the Crown of Davids Succeſſors. Beſides that, now might David live out of the ſight, and hearing of the Philiſtim-Idolatries, and enjoy God no leſſe in the wals of a Philiſtim-City, then in an Iſraelitiſh wilderneſſe; withall, an happy opportunity was now opened to his friends of Iſrael, to reſort unto his aid; the heads of the thouſands that were of Manaſſeh, and many valiant Captaines of the other Tribes, fell dayly to him, and raiſed his ſix hundred followers to an army, like the hoſt of God. The deſarts of Iſrael could never have yeelded David ſo great an advantage: That God whoſe the earth is, makes room for his own every where; and oft-times pro-
C videth them a forrain home, more kindly then the native: It is no matter for change of our ſoyle, ſo we change not our God; If we can every where acknowledge him, he will no where be wanting to us.

It was not for Gods Champion to be idle; no ſooner is he free from Sauls ſword, then he begins an offenſive warre againſt the Amalekites, Girzites, Geſhurites: He knew theſe Nations branded by God to deſtruction: neither could his encreaſing Army be maintained with a little: By one act therefore, he both revenges for God, and provides for his Hoſt. Had it not been for that old quarrell, which God had with this people, David could not be excuſed from a bloudy cruelty, in killing whole Countries, onely for the benefit of the ſpoyle: now his Soldiers were at once, Gods Executioners, and their own Forragers. The interwention of a command from the D Almighty, alters the ſtate of any act; and makes that worthy of praiſe, which elſe were no better then damnable. It is now Juſtice, which were otherwiſe Murder; The will of God is the rule of good; what need we enquire into other reaſons, of any act or determination, when we heare it comes from Heaven?

How many hundred yeares, had this brood of Canaanites lived ſecurely in their Country, ſince God commanded them to be rooted out, and now promiſed themſelves the certaineſt peace? The Philiſtims were their friends if not their Lords; The Iſraelites had their hands full, neither did they know any grudge betwixt them and their Neighbours, when ſuddenly the Sword of David cuts them off, and leaves none alive to tell the newes.

There is no ſafety in protraction; with men, delay cauſeth forgetfulneſſe, or abates
E the force of anger, as all violent motions are weakeſt at the furtheſt; but with him, to whom all times are preſent, what can be gained by prorogation? Alas, what can it availe any of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, that they have made a truce with Heaven and a league with Hell? Their day is comming, and is not the further off, becauſe they expect it not.

Miſerable were the ſtraits of David; while he was driven, not only to maintaine his Army by ſpoile, but to colour his ſpoile by a ſinfull diſſimulation; He tels Achiſh that he had been roving againſt the South of Judah, and the South of the Jerahmelites, and the South of the Kenites, either falſly, or doubtfully, ſo as he meant to deceive him, under whom he lived, and by whom he was truſted: If Achiſh were a Philiſtim, yet he was Davids friend, yea his Patron; and if he had been neither, it had not become David to befalſe. The infirmities of Gods children never appeare,

but

but in their extremities. It is hard for the beſt man, to ſay, how far he will be tempted. If a man will put himſelfe among Philiſtims, he cannot promiſe to come forth innocent.

How eaſily doe we beleeve that which we wiſh? The more credit Achiſh gives unto David, the more ſin it was to deceive him; and now the conceit of this ingagement, procures him a further ſervice. The Philiſtims are aſſembled to fight with Iſrael; Achiſh dares truſt David on his ſide; yea to keep his head for ever; neither can David doe any leſſe then promiſe his aid againſt his own fleſh: Never was David, in all his life, driven to ſo hard an exigent: never was he ſo extremely perplexed; For what ſhould he do now? To fight with Achiſh, he was tyed by promiſe, by merit; Not to fight againſt Iſrael, he was tied by his calling, by his unction: Not to fight for Achiſh, were to be unthankfull; To fight againſt Iſrael, were to be unnaturall; Oh what an inward battle muſt David needs have in his breaſt, when he thinks of this battle of Iſrael, and the Philiſtims! How doth he wiſh now that he had rather ſtood to the hazard of Sauls perſecution, then to have put himſelf upon the favour of Achiſh! He muſt fight on one ſide, and on whether ſide ſoever he ſhould fight, he could not avoid to be trecherous; a condition worſe then death, to an honeſt heart; which way he would have reſolved, if it had come to the execution, who can know ſince himſelf was doubtfull? either courſe had been no better then deſperate. How could the Iſraelites ever have received him for their King, who in the open field, had fought againſt them? And contrarily, if he would have fought againſt his friend, for his enemy; againſt Achiſh for Saul; he was now invironed with jealous Philiſtims; and might rather look for the puniſhment of his Treaſon, then the glory of a Victory.

His heart had led him into theſe ſtraits; the Lord findes way to lead him out: The ſuggeſtions of his enemies doe herein befriend him: The Princes of the Philiſtims (whether of envy, or ſuſpition) plead for Davids diſmiſſion, (Send this fellow back, that he may goe againe to his place, which thou haſt appointed him: and let him not go down to the battle, leſt he be an adverſary to us.) No Advocate could have ſaid more, himſelf durſt not have ſaid ſo much. Oh the wiſdome and goodneſſe of our God, that can raiſe up an Adverſary to deliver out of thoſe evils, which our friends cannot; That by the Sword of an enemy, can let out that Apoſtume, which no Phyſitian could tell how to cure: It would be wide with us ſometimes, if it were not for others malice.

There could not be a more juſt queſtion, then this of the Philiſtim Princes, What doe theſe Hebrewes here? An Iſraelite is out of his element, when he is in an Army of Philiſtims: The true ſervants of God are in their due places, when they are in oppoſition to his enemies. Profeſſion of hoſtility becomes them better then leagues of amity.

Yet Achiſh likes Davids converſation and preſence ſo well, that he profeſſeth himſelfe pleaſed with him, as with an Angel of God; How ſtrange is it to heare, that a Philiſtim ſhould delight in that holy man, whom an Iſraelite abhorres, and ſhould be loath to be quit of David, whom Saul hath expelled? Termes of civility be equally open to all religions, to all profeſſions: The common graces of Gods children, are able to attract love from the moſt obſtinate enemies of goodneſſe; If we affect them for by-reſpects of Valour, Wiſdome, Diſcourſe, Wit, it is their praiſe, not ours; But if for divine Grace and Religion, it is our praiſe with theirs.

Such now was Davids condition, that he muſt plead for that he feared, and argue againſt that which he deſired: (What have I done? and what haſt thou found in thy ſervant that I may not goe, and fight againſt the enemies of my Lord the King?) Never any newes could be more cordiall to him then this, of his diſmiſſion; yet muſt he ſeeme to ſtrive againſt it, with an importunate profeſſion of his forwardneſſe to that act, which he moſt deteſted.

One degree of Diſſimulation drawes on another; thoſe which have once given way to a faulty courſe, cannot eaſily, either ſtop or turn back; but are in a ſort forced to

A to second their ill beginnings, with worse proceedings. It is a dangerous and miserable thing, to cast our selves into those actions, which draw with them a necessity, either of offending, or miscarriage.

SAUL and the Witch of Endor.

EVen the worst men may sometimes make head against some sinnes. Saul 1 Sam. 28. hath expelled the Sorcerers out of the Land of Israel; and hath forbidden Magick upon pain of death. He that had no care to expell Satan
B out of his own heart, yet will seem to drive him out of his Kingdome. That we see wicked men oppose themselves to some sinnes, there is neither marvell nor comfort in it. No doubt Satan made sport at this Edict of Saul; what cares he to be banished in Sorcery, whiles he is entertained in malice? He knew and found Saul his, whiles he resisted; and smiled to yeeld thus far unto his Vassall: If we quit not all sins, he will be content we should either abandon or persecute some.

Where is no place for holy feare, there will be place for the servile; The graceless heart of Saul was astonied at the Philistims; yet was never moved at the frowns of that God whose anger sent them, nor of those sins of his which procured them. Those that cannot feare for love, shall tremble for feare: and how much better is
C awe then terror? prevention then confusion? There is nothing more lamentable then to see a man laugh when he should feare; God shall laugh, when such an ones feare commeth.

Extremity of distresse, will send even the prophanest man to God; like as the drowning man, reacheth out his hand to that bough, which he contemned whiles he stood safe on the bank: Saul now asketh counsell of the Lord; whose Prophet he hated, whose Priests he slew, whose Anointed he persecutes; Had Saul consulted with God when he should, this evill had not been, but now, if this evill had not been, he had not consulted with God; The thank of this Act is due, not to him, but to his affliction; A forced piety is thankelesse, unprofitable; God will not answer him neither by Dreames, nor by Urim, nor by Prophets. Why should God answer
D that man by Dreames, who had resisted him waking? Why should he answer him by Urim, that had slaine his Priests? Why should he answer him by Prophets, who hated the Father of the Prophets, rebelled against the word of the Prophets?

It is an unreasonable unequality to hope to finde God at our command, when we would not be at his; To look that God should regard our voyce in trouble, when we would not regard his in peace.

Unto what mad shifts are men driven by despaire? If God will not answer, Satan shall; (Saul said to his servants, Seek me a man that hath a familiar spirit.) If Saul had not known this course Deviliſh, why did he decree to banish it, to mulct it with death? yet now against the streame of his conscience, he will seek to those E whom he had condemned; There needs no other judge of Sauls act then himselfe; had he not before opposed this sin, he had not so hainously sinned in committing it; There cannot be a more fearfull signe of an heart given up to a reprobate sense, then to cast it self wilfully into those sins, which it hath proclaimed to detest. The declinations to evill are many times insensible, but when it breaks forth into such apparent effects, even others eyes may discerne it; What was Saul the better to fore-know the issue of his approaching battle? If this consultation could have strengthned him against his enemies, or promoted his victory, there might have been some colour for so foule an act; Now, what could he gain, but the satisfying of his bootlesse curiosity, in fore-seeing that, which he should not be able to avoid?

Foolish men give away their souls for nothing: The itch of impertinent and unprofitable profitable knowledge, hath been the hereditary diſeaſe of the ſonnes of Adam and Eve; How many have periſhed to know that which hath procured their periſhing? How ambitious ſhould we be to know thoſe things, the knowledge whereof is eternall Life! A

Many a lewd office are they put to, which ſerve wicked maſters; One while Sauls ſervants are ſent to kill innocent David; another while to ſhed the bloud of Gods Prieſts; and now they muſt goe ſeek for a Witch: It is no ſmall happineſſe to attend them, from whom we may receive precepts and examples of vertue.

Had Saul been good he had needed no diſguiſe; Honeſt actions never ſhame the doers; Now that he goeth about a ſinfull buſineſſe, he changeth himſelfe; he ſeeks the ſhelter of the night, he takes but two followers with him; It is true, that if Saul had come in the port of a King, the Witch had as much diſſembled her condition, as now he diſſembleth his; yet it was not onely deſire to ſpeed, but guiltineſſe that thus altred his habit; ſuch is the power of conſcience, that even thoſe who are moſt affected to evill, yet are aſhamed to be thought ſuch as they deſire to be. B

Saul needed another face to fit that tongue, which ſhould ſay, (Conjecture to me by the familiar ſpirit, and bring me up whom I ſhall name unto thee;) An obdurate heart can give way to any thing.

Notwithſtanding the peremptory edict of Saul, there are ſtill Witches in Iſrael; neither good Laws, nor carefull executions can purge the Church from Malefactors; There will ſtill be ſome that will jeopard their heads upon the groſſeſt ſins; No Garden can be ſo curiouſly tended, that there ſhould not be one Weed left in it; Yet ſo farre can good Statutes, and due inflictions of puniſhments upon offenders prevaile, that miſchievous perſons are glad to pull in their heads, and dare not do ill, but in diſguiſe and darkneſſe. It is no ſmall advantage of juſtice, that it affrights ſin, if it cannot be expelled; As contrarily wofull is the condition of that place, where is a publike profeſſion of wickedneſſe. C

The Witch was no leſſe crafty then wicked; ſhe had before (as is like) bribed Officers to eſcape enditement, to lurk in ſecrecy; and now ſhe will not work her feates without ſecurity; her ſuſpition projects the worſt; (Wherefore ſeekeſt thou to take me in a ſnare, to cauſe me to die?) Oh vain Sorcereſſe, that could be wary to avoid the puniſhment of Saul, careleſſe to avoid the judgement of God; Could we fore-think what our ſin would coſt us, we durſt not, but be innocent: This is a good and ſeaſonable anſwer for us, to make unto Satan, when he ſollicites us to evill (Wherefore ſeekeſt thou to take me in a ſnare, to cauſe me to die?) Nothing is more ſure then this intention in the tempter, then this event in the iſſue; Oh that we could but ſo much feare the eternall paines, as we doe the temporary, and be but ſo carefull to ſave our ſoules from torment, as our bodies. D

No ſooner hath Saul ſworne her ſafety, then ſhe addreſſeth her to her Sorcery; Hope of impunity drawes on ſin with boldneſſe; were it not for the deluſions of falſe promiſes, Satan ſhould have no Clients. Could Saul be ſo ignorant, as to think that Magick had power over Gods deceaſed Saints to raiſe them up; yea, to call them down from their reſt? Time was, when Saul was among the Prophets, And yet now, that he is in the impure lodge of Divels, how ſenſleſſe he is, to ſay, Bring me up Samuel? It is no rare thing to loſe even our wit and judgement together with graces; How juſtly are they given to ſottiſhneſſe, that have given themſelves over to ſin? E

The Sorcereſſe (it ſeemes) exerciſing her conjurations in a roome apart, is informed by her familiar, who it was that ſet her on work; ſhee can therefore finde time, in the midſt of her Exorciſmes, to bind the aſſurance of her own ſafety, by expoſtulation, (She cryed with a loud voice, why haſt thou deceived me, for thou art Saul?) The very name of Saul was an accuſation; Yet is he ſo farre from ſtriking his breaſt, that doubting leſt this feare of the Witch, ſhould interrupt the deſired work, he encourages her, whom he ſhould have condemned; (Be not affraid;) He that had more cauſe to feare, for his owne ſake, in an expectation of juſt judgement, cheares up her, that feared nothing but himſelfe: How ill doth it become us to give that counſell counsell to others, whereof we have more need and use in our own persons!

As one that had more care to satisfie his own curiosity, then her suspition, he asks, (What sawest thou?) Who would not have looked, that Sauls hair should have stared on his head, to heare of a spirit raised? His sin hath so hardened him, that he rather pleases himselfe in it, which hath nothing in it but horrour; So farre is Satan content to descend to the service of his servants, that he will approve his fained obedience to their very outward senses; What forme is so glorious, that he either cannot or dare not undertake? Here Gods ascend out of the Earth; Else-where Satan transformes him into an Angell of light; What wonder is it, that his wicked Instruments appeare like Saints in their hypocriticall dissimulation? If we will be judging by the appearance, we shall be sure to erre: No eye could distinguish betwixt the true Samuel, and a false spirit: Saul, who was well worthy to be deceived, seeing those gray haires, and that Mantle, inclines himself to the ground, and bowes himself: He that would not worship God in Samuel alive, now worships Samuel in Satan; and no marvell; Satan was now become his refuge in stead of God; his urim was darknesse, his Prophet a Ghost: Every one that consults with Satan, worships him, though he bow not, neither doth that evill spirit desire any other reverence, then to be sought unto.

How cunningly doth Satan resemble, not onely the habit and gesture, but the language of Samuel, Wherefore hast thou disquieted me? and wherefore dost thou aske of me, seeing the Lord is gone from thee, and is thine enemy? Nothing is more pleasing to that evill one, then to be solicited, yet in the person of Samuel, he can say, Why hast thou disquieted me? Had not the Lord been gone from Saul, he had never come to the Devilish Oracle of Endor, and yet the counterfeiting spirit can say, Why doest thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is gone from thee? Satan cares not how little he is known to be himself; he loves to passe under any forme, rather then his own.

The more holy the person is, the more carefully doth Satan act him, that by his stale he may ensnare us. In every motion it is good to try the spirits, whether they be of God; Good words are no meanes to distinguish a Prophet from a Devill; Samuel himselfe, while he was alive, could not have spoken more gravely, more severely, more divinely, then this evill ghost, For the Lord will rent thy Kingdome out of thy hand, and give it thy neighbour David, because thou obeyedst not the voyce of the Lord, nor executedst his fierce wrath upon the Amalekites, therefore hath the Lord done this unto thee this day: When the Devill himselfe puts on gravity and religion, who can marvell at the hypocrisie of men? Well may lewd men be good Preachers, when Satan himselfe can play the Prophet; Where are those ignorants that can think charitably of charms and spells, because they finde nothing in them, but good words? What Prophet could speak better words, then this Devil in Samuels Mantle? Neither is there at any time so much danger of that evill spirit, as when he speaks best.

I could wonder to heare Satan preach thus prophetically, if I did not know, that as he was once a good Angell, so he can still act what he was; Whiles Saul was in consultation of sparing Agag, we shall never finde that Satan would lay any block in his way: Yea then he was a prompt Orator, to induce him into that sinne; now that it is past and gone, he can lade Saul with fearfull denunciations of judgement: Till we have sinned, Satan is a parasite; when we have sinned he is a Tyrant: What cares he to flatter any more, when he hath what he would? Now his onely work is to terrifie, and confound, that he may enjoy what he hath won; How much better is it serving that Master, who when we are most dejected with the conscience of evill, heartens us with inward comfort, and speakes peace to the soule in the midst of tumult!

Ziklag ſpoiled and revenged.

1 Sam. 30.

HAd not the King of the Philiſtims ſent David away earely, his Wives and his people and ſubſtance, which he left at Ziklag, had been utterly loſt; Now Achiſh did not more pleaſure David in his entertainment, then in his diſmiſſion, Saul was not Davids enemy more in the perſecution of his perſon, then in the forbearance of Gods enemies; Behold, thus late doth David feele the ſmart of Sauls ſin, in ſparing the Amalekites: who, if Gods ſentence had been duly executed, had not now ſurvived, to annoy this parcell of Iſrael.

As in ſpirituall reſpects our ſinnes are alwayes hurtfull to our ſelves, ſo in temporall oft-times prejudiciall to poſterity; A wicked man deſerves ill of thoſe, he never lived to ſee.

I cannot marvell at the Amalekites aſſault made upon the Iſraelites of Ziklag: I cannot but marvell at their clemency: how juſt was it, that while David would give aid to the enemies of the Church, againſt Iſrael, the enemies of the Church ſhould riſe againſt David, in his peculiar charge of Iſrael: But whiles David roving againſt the Amalekites, not many dayes before, left neither man nor woman alive, how ſtrange is it, that the Amalekites invading and ſurprizing Ziklag, (in revenge) kill neither man nor woman? Shall we ſay that mercy is fled from the breaſts of Iſraelites, and reſts in Heathens? Or ſhall we rather aſcribe this to the gracious reſtraint of God, who having deſigned Amalek to the ſlaughter of Iſrael, and not Iſrael to the ſlaughter of Amalek, moved the hands of Iſrael, and held the hands of Amalek; This was that alone, that made the Heathens take up with an unbloudy revenge; burning onely the walls, and leading away the perſons. Iſrael croſſed the revealed will of God in ſparing Amalek; Amalek fulfills the ſecret will of God in ſparing Iſrael.

It was ſtill the lot of Amalek, to take Iſrael at all advantages; upon their firſt comming out of Egypt, when they were weary, weak, and unarmed, then did Amalek aſſault them; And now, when one part of Iſrael was in the field againſt the Philiſtims, another was gone with the Philiſtims againſt Iſrael; the Amalekites ſet upon the Coaſts of both; and go away laded with the ſpoile: No other is to be expected of our ſpirituall Adverſaries, who are ever readieſt to aſſaile, when we are the unreadieſt to defend.

It was a wofull ſpectacle for David and his Soldiers, upon their return to find ruines and aſhes in ſtead of houſes; and in ſtead of their Families, ſolitude; Their City was vaniſhed into ſmoke, their houſholds into captivity; neither could they know whom to accuſe, or where to enquire for redreſſe; whiles they made account that their home ſhould recompence their tedious journey with comfort, the miſerable deſolation of their home, doubles the diſcomfort of their journey; what remained there but teares and lamentations? They lifted up their voyces, and wept, till they could weep no more. Here was plenty of nothing but miſery and ſorrow. The heart of every Iſraelite was brim-full of griefe; Davids ran over; for beſides that his croſſe was the ſame with theirs, all theirs was his alone; each man lookt on his fellow as a partner of affliction, but every one lookt upon David as the cauſe of all their affliction; and (as common diſpleaſure is never but fruitfull of revenge) they all agree to ſtone him as the Author of their undoing, whom they followed all this while, as the hopefull meanes of their advancements.

Now Davids loſſe is his leaſt griefe; neither (as if every thing had conſpired to torment him) can he look beſides the aggravation of his ſorrow and danger; Saul and his Soldiers had hunted him out of Iſrael; the Philiſtim-Courtiers had hunted him from the favour of Achiſh; the Amalekites ſpoiled him in Ziklag; yet all theſe are eaſie Adverſaries in compariſon of his own; his own followers are ſo far from pitying his participation of the loſſe, that they are ready to kill him, becauſe they are

A are miserable with him. Oh the many and grievous perplexities of the man after Gods own heart! If all his train had joyned their best helps for the mitigation of his griefe, their Cordials had been too weak, but now the vexation that arises from their fury and malice, drowneth the sense of their losse, and were enough to distract the most resolute heart; Why should it be strange to us, that we meet with hard trials, when we see the deare Anointed of God thus plunged in evils?

What should the distressed sonne of Ishai now doe? Whither should he think to turn him? to goe back to Israel he durst not; to goe to Achish he might not; to abide amongst those waste heapes hee could not; or if there might have been harbour in those burnt walls, yet there could be no safety to remaine with those mutinous spirits. (But David comforted himself in the Lord his God;) oh happy and sure refuge
B of a faithfull soule! The earth yeelded him nothing, but matter of disconsolation and heavinesse; he lifts his eyes above the hils, whence commeth his salvation; It is no marvell that God remembreth David in all his troubles, since David in all his troubles did thus remember his God; he knew that though no mortall eye of reason, or sense could discerne any evasion from these intricate evils, yet that the eye of divine Providence had descryed it long before; and that though no humane power could make way for his safety, yet that the over-ruling hand of his God, could doe it with ease; His experience had assured him of the fidelity of his Guardian in Heaven; and therefore he comforted himselfe in the Lord his God.

In vain is comfort expected from God, if we consult not with him: Abiathar the C Priest is called for; David was not in the Court of Achish, without the Priest by his side; nor the Priest without the Ephod: Had these been left behinde in Ziklag, they had been miscarried with the rest, and David had now been hopelesse. How well it succeeds to the Great, when they take God with them in his Ministers, in his Ordinances? As contrarily, when these are laid by, as superfluous, there can be nothing but uncertainty of successe, or certainty of mischiefe. The presence of the Priest and Ephod, would have little availed him without their use; by them he askes counsell of the Lord in these straits. The mouth and eares of God, which were shut unto Saul, are open unto David; no sooner can he aske, then he receives answer; and the answer that he receives is full of courage and comfort: (Follow, for thou shalt surely overtake them, and recover all.) That God of truth never disappointed any mans trust. David now findes, that the eye which waited upon God was not sent away weeping.

D David therefore, and his men, are now upon their march after the Amalekites: It is no lingring when God bids us goe: They which had promised rest to their weary limbs, after their return from Achish, in their harbor of Ziklag, are glad to forget their hopes, and to put their stiffe joynts unto a new task of motion: It is no marvel, if two hundred of them were so over-tired with their former toile, that they were not able to passe over the river Besor. David was a true type of Christ. We follow him in these holy Wars, against the spirituall Amalekites; All of us are not of an equall strength. Some are caried by the vigor of their faith, thorow all difficulties; Others, after long pressure, are ready to languish in the way: Our Leader is not more strong then pittifull; neither doth he scornfully cashiere those, whose desires are hearty, whiles their
E abilities are unanswerable: How much more should our charity pardon the infirmities of our brethren, & allow them to sit by the stuffe, who cannot endure the march?

The same Providence which appointed David to follow the Amalekites, had also ordered an Egyptian to be cast behind them. This cast Servant, whom his cruell Master had left to faintnesse and famine, shall be used as the meanes of the recovery of the Israelites losse, and of the revenge of the Amalekites. Had not his Master neglected him, all these Rovers of Amalek had gone away with their life and booty: It is not safe to despise the meanest vassall upon earth. There is a mercy and care due to the most despicable peece of all humanity; wherein we cannot be wanting without the offence, without the punishment of God.

Charity distinguisheth an Israelite from an Amalekite. Davids followers are strangers to this Egyptian; an Amalekite was his Master; His Master leaves him to die (in the field) of sicknesse and hunger, these strangers relieved him: and ere they know whether they might by him receive any light in their purſuit, they refreſh his dying ſpirits with Bread and Water, with Figs and Raiſins; Neither can the haſte of their way bee any hinderance to their compaſſion: Hee hath no Iſraelitiſh bloud in him, that is utterly mercileſſe; Perhaps yet Davids followers might alſo, in the hope of ſome intelligence, ſhew kindneſſe to this forlorn Egyptian. Worldly wiſdome teacheth us, to ſow ſmall courteſies, where we may reap large Harveſts of recompence: No ſooner are his ſpirits recalled, then he requites his food with information. I cannot blame the Egyptian, that he was ſo eaſily induced to deſcry theſe unkinde Amalekites, to mercifull Iſraelites; thoſe that gave him over unto death, to the reſtorers of his life; much leſſe, that ere he would deſcry them, he requires an oath of ſecurity from ſo bad a maſter; Well doth he match death with ſuch a ſervitude: Wonderfull is the Providence of God, even over thoſe, that are not in the neareſt bonds, his own. Three daies, and three nights, had this poore Egyptian Slave lyen ſick and hunger-ſtarved in the fields, and looks for nothing but death, when God ſends him ſuccour from the hands of thoſe Iſraelites, whom he had helped to ſpoile, though not ſo much for his ſake, as for Iſraels, is this heatheniſh Stragler preſerved.

It pleaſes God to extend his common favours to all his creatures; but in miraculous preſervations, he hath ſtill wont to have reſpect to his owne. By this meanes therefore, are the Iſraelites brought to the ſight of their late ſpoilers; whom they finde ſcattered abroad, upon all the earth, eating and drinking, and dancing in triumph, for the great prey they had taken.

It was three daies at leaſt, ſince this gainfull forraging of Amalek; and now, ſeeing no feare of any purſuer, and promiſing themſelves ſafety, in ſo great and untraced a diſtance, they make themſelves merry with ſo rich and eaſie a victory; and now ſuddenly, when they began to think of enjoying the beauty & wealth they had gotten, the ſword of David was upon their throats. Deſtruction is never nearer, then when ſecurity hath chaſed away feare. With how ſad faces and hearts, had the Wives of David, and the other Captives of Iſrael, looked upon the triumphall Revels of Amalek; and what a change, doe we think, appeared in them, when they ſaw their happy and valiant Reſcuers, flying in upon their inſolent Victors, and making the death of the Amalekites, the ranſome of their captivity? They mourned even now at the dances of Amalek; now in the ſhriekes and death of Amalek, they ſhout and rejoyce: The mercy of our God forgets not to enterchange our ſorrowes with joy, and the joy of the wicked with ſorrow.

The Amalekites have paid a deare loane for the goods of Iſrael, which they now reſtore with their own lives; and now their ſpoile hath make David richer then he expected: that booty which they had ſwept from all other parts, accrewed to him.

Thoſe Iſraelites that could not goe on to fight for their ſhare, are come to meet their brethren with gratulation. How partiall are we wont to be to our own cauſes? Even very Iſraelites will be ready to fall out for matter of profit: where ſelf-love hath bred a quarrell, every man is ſubject to flatter his own caſe. It ſeemed plauſible and but juſt to the actors in this reſcue, that thoſe which had taken no part in the pain and hazard of the journey, ſhould receive no part of the commodity. It was favour enough for them to recover their wives and children, though they ſhared not in the goods. Wiſe and holy David (whoſe praiſe was no leſſe, to overcome his own in time of peace, then his enemies in war) calls his contending followers from Law to equity, and ſo orders the matter, that ſince the Plaintifes were detained not by will, but by neceſſity, and ſince their forced ſtay was uſefull in guarding the ſtuffe, they ſhould partake equally of the prey with their fellowes. A ſentence well beſeeming the juſtice of Gods Anointed. Thoſe that repreſent God upon earth, ſhould reſemble him in their proceedings. It is the juſt mercy of our God, to meaſure us by our wils, not by our abilities; to recompence us graciouſly, according to the truth of our deſires, and endeavours; and to account that performed by us, which he only letteth us from performing. It were wide with us, if ſometimes purpoſe did not ſupply actions. Whiles our heart faulteth not, we that through ſpirituall ſickneſſe are faine to abide by the ſtuffe, ſhall ſhare both in grace and glory with the Victors.

The

The death of Saul.

THe Witch of Endor had halfe ſlaine Saul before the Battle: it is juſt that they who conſult with Devils, ſhould goe away with diſcomfort: Hee hath eaten his laſt bread at the hand of a Sorcereſſe: and now neceſſity drawes him into that field, where he ſees nothing but deſpaire. Had not Saul beleeved the ill newes of the counterfeit Samuel, he had not beene ſtruck downe on the ground with words: Now his beleefe made him deſperate; Thoſe actions which are not ſuſtained by hope, muſt needs languiſh: and are onely promoted by outward compulſion: Whiles the minde is uncertain of ſucceſſe, it releeves it ſelf with the poſſibilities of good: in doubts there is a comfortable mixture: but when it is aſſured of the worſt event, it is utterly diſcouraged and dejected. It hath therefore pleaſed the wiſdome of God to hide from wicked men, his determination of their finall eſtate, that their remainders of hope, may hearten them to good. 1 Sam. 31. 2

In all likelihood one ſelf-ſame day, ſaw David a victor over the Amalekites, and Saul diſcomfited by the Philiſtims; How ſhould it be otherwiſe? David conſulted with God, and prevailed; Saul with the Witch of Endor, and periſheth. The end is commonly anſwerable to the way; It is an idle injuſtice when we doe ill, to look to ſpeed well. The ſlaughter of Saul and his ſons, was not in the firſt Scene of this Tragical field; that was rather reſerved by God, for the laſt act, that Sauls meaſure might be full: God is long ere he ſtrikes, but when he doth, it is to purpoſe; Firſt, Iſrael flees and falls downe wounded in Mount Gilboa; They had their part in Sauls ſin; they were actors in Davids perſecution: Juſtly therefore doe they ſuffer with him, whom they had ſeconded in offence. As it is hard to be good under an evil Prince, ſo it is as rare not to be enwrapped in his judgements: It was no ſmall addition to the anguiſh of Sauls death, to ſee his ſons dead, to ſee his people fleeing, and ſlain before him; They had ſinned in their King, and in them is their King puniſhed. The reſt were not ſo worthy of pitty; but whoſe heart would it not touch to ſee Ionathan, the good ſon of a wicked father, involved in the common deſtruction? Death is not partiall: All diſpoſitions, all merits are alike to it; if valour, if holineſſe, if ſincerity of heart could have beene any defence againſt mortality, Ionathan had ſurvived: Now by their wounds and death, no man can diſcern which is Ionathan; The ſoule only findes the difference, which the body admitteth not; Death is the common gate both to Heaven and Hell; we all paſſe that, ere our turning to either hand: The ſword of the Philiſtims fetcheth Ionathan through it with his fellowes: no ſooner is his foot over that threſhold, then God conducteth him to glory: The beſt cannot be happy but through their diſſolution; Now therefore hath Ionathan no cauſe of complaint, he is by the rude and cruell hand of a Philiſtim but removed to a better Kingdome then hee leaves to his brother; and at once is his death both a temporall affliction to the ſon of Saul, and an entrance of glory to the friend of David.

The Philiſtim-archers ſhot at randome: God directs their arrowes into the body of Saul: Leſt the diſcomfiture of his people, and the ſlaughter of his ſons ſhould not be griefe enough to him, he feeles himſelfe wounded, and ſees nothing before him but horrour and death; and now as a man forſaken of all hopes, he begges of his Armour-bearer that deaths-blow, which elſe he muſt (to the doubling of his indignation) receive from a Philiſtim. He begges this bloudy favour of his ſervant, and is denyed: Such an awfulneſſe hath God placed in Soveraignty, that no entreaty, no extremity, can move the hand againſt it: What metall are thoſe men made of, that can ſuggeſt or reſolve, and attempt the violation of Majeſty? Wicked men care more for the ſhame of the World, then the danger of their ſoules: Deſperate Saul will now ſupply his Armour-bearer; and as a man that bore armes againſt himſelf, he fals upon his own ſword. What if he had died by the weapon of a Philiſtim? So did his ſon Ionathan, and loſt no glory: Theſe conceits of diſreputation prevaile with carnall hearts above all ſpirituall reſpects; There is no greater murderer then vain-glory: Nothing more argues a heart void of grace, then to be tranſported by idle popularity into actions prejudiciall to the Soule. A

Evill examples, eſpecially of the great, never eſcaped imitation; the Armor-bearer of Saul followes his maſter: and dares do that to himſelfe, which to his King hee durſt not: as if their own Swords had been more familiar executioners, they yeelded unto them, what they grudged to their purſuers. From the beginning was Saul ever his owne enemy, neither did any hands hurt him but his owne: and now his death is ſutable to his life: his owne hand payes him the reward of all his wickedneſſe. The end of hypocrites, and envious men is commonly fearfull: Now is the bloud of Gods Prieſts, which Saul ſhed, and of David, which he would have ſhed, required, and requited. The evill ſpirit had ſaid the evening before, To morrow thou ſhalt be with me: and now Saul haſteth to make the Devill no Lyer: rather then faile, he gives himſelf his own Mittimus: Oh the wofull extremities of a deſpairing ſoule, plunging him ever into a greater miſchiefe to avoid the leſſe! He might have been a patient in anothers violence, and faultleſſe; now whiles he will needs act the Philiſtims part upon himſelfe, he lived and dyed a Murderer; The caſe is deadly, when the Priſoner breaks the Jaile, and will not ſtay for his delivery: and though we may not paſſe ſentence upon ſuch a ſoul, yet upon the fact we may: the ſoul may poſſibly repent in the parting, the act is haynous, and ſuch as without repentance, kills the ſoule. B

It was the next day, ere the Philiſtims knew how much they were victors; then finding the dead corps of Saul and his ſons, they begin their triumphs: the head of King Saul is cut off in lieu of Goliahs, and now all their Idol temples ring of their ſucceſſe; Fooliſh Philiſtims, if they had not been more beholding to Sauls ſins, then their gods, they had never caryed away the honour of thoſe Trophees: Inſtead of magnifying the juſtice of the true God, who puniſhed Saul with deſerved death, they magnifie the power of the falſe: Superſtition is extremely injurious to God: It is no better then Theft, to aſcribe unto the ſecond cauſes that honour which is due unto the firſt: but to give Gods glory to thoſe things which neither act, nor are, it is the higheſt degree of ſpirituall robbery. C

Saul was none of the beſt Kings: yet ſo impatient are his ſubjects of the indignity offred to his dead corps, that they will rather leave their owne bones amongſt the Philiſtims, then the carkaſſe of Saul. Such a cloſe relation there is betwixt a Prince and Subject, that the diſhonour of either is inſeparable from both: How willing ſhould wee bee to hazard our bodies or Subſtance for the vindication either of the perſon, or name of a good King, whiles he lives to the benefit of our protection? It is an unjuſt ingratitude in thoſe men, which can endure the diſgrace of them, under whoſe ſhelter they live; but how unnaturall is the villany of thoſe Miſcreants, that can bee content to bee actors in the capitall wrongs offered to Soveraigne authority? D

2 Sam. 1. It were a wonder, if after the death of a Prince, there ſhould want ſome Pickthank, to inſinuate himſelfe into his Succeſſor: An Amalekite youngman rides poſt to Ziklag to finde out David, whom even common rumour had notified for the anointed Heire to the Kingdome of Iſrael; to be the firſt Meſſenger of that newes, which he thought could be no other then acceptable, the death of Saul: and that the tidings might be ſo much more meritorious, he addes to the report, what he thinks might carry the greateſt retribution: In hope of reward, or honour, the man is content to bely himſelfe to David: It was not the Speare, but the Sword of Saul, that was the inſtrument of his death; neither could this ſtranger finde Saul, but dying, ſince the Armour-bearer of Saul ſaw him dead, ere he offered that violence to himſelfe; The hand of this Amalekite therefore was not guilty, his tongue was; Had not this Meſſenger meaſured Davids foot by his owne Laſt, he had forborne this peece of the newes; and not hoped to advantage himſelfe by this falſhood: Now he thinks; The tidings of a Kingdome cannot but pleaſe: None but Saul and Ionathan ſtood in Davids way; He cannot chuſe, but like to heare of E their

A their removall: Especially, since Saul did so tyrannously persecute his innocence. If I shall onely report the fact done by another, I shall goe away but with the recompence of a lucky Post; whereas, if I take upon me the action, I am the man, to whom David is beholden for the Kingdome: he cannot but honour and requite me, as the Author of his deliverance and happinesse. Worldly mindes think no man can be of any other, then their own dyet; and because they finde the respects of selfe-love, and private profit, so strongly prevailing with themselves, they cannot conceive, how these should be capable of a repulse from others.

How much was this Amalekite mocked of his hopes: whiles he imagined, that David would now triumph, and feast in the assured expectation of the Kingdome, and possession of the Crown of Israel, he findes him renting his clothes, and wringing his hands, and weeping, and mourning: as if all his comfort had been dead with Saul and Ionathan: and yet perhaps he thought, This sorrow of David is but fashionable, such as great heires make shew of in the fatall day they have longed for; These teares will be soone dry; the sight of a Crown will soone breed a succession of other passions: But this errour is soone corrected: For when David had entertained this Bearer, with a sad fast all the day, he cals him forth in the evening to execution. (How wast thou not afraid (saith he) to put forth thine hand to destroy the Anointed of the Lord?) Doubtlesse, the Amalekite made many faire pleas for himself, out of the grounds of his own report: Alas, Saul was before falne upon his owne Speare; It was but mercy to kill him, that was halfe dead, that he might dye the shorter: Besides, his intreaty and importunate prayers, moved me to hasten him C through those painfull gates of death: had I stricken him as an enemy, I had deserved the blow I had given; now I lent him the hand of a friend: why am I punished for obeying the voyce of a King? and for perfiting what himself begun, and could not finish: And if neither his own wound, nor mine, had dispatched him, the Philistims were at his heeles, ready to doe this same act with insultation, which I did in favour: and if my hand had not prevented him, where had been the Crown of Israel, which I now have here presented to thee? I could have delivered that to King Achish, and have been rewarded with honour: let me not die for an act well meant to thee, however construed by thee: But no pretence can make his own tale not deadly: (Thy bloud bee upon thine owne head, for thine owne mouth hath testified against thee, saying, I have slain the Lords Anointed.) It is a just supposition, that every man is D so great a Favourer of himself, that he will not mis-report his own actions, nor say the worst of himselfe: In matter of confession, men may without injury be taken at their words: If he did it, his fact was capitall; If he did it not, his lye: It is pitty any other recompence should befall those false flatterers, that can be content to father a sin, to get thanks. Every drop of royall bloud is sacred: For a man to say that hee hath shed it, is mortall. Of how farre different spirits from this of Davids, are those men, which suborn the death of Princes, and celebrate and canonize the Murtherers! Into their secret let not my soule come; my glory, bee thou not joyned to their Assembly.

Abner and Joab.

E 2 Sam. 2

HOw mercifull and seasonable are the provisions of God? Ziklag was now nothing but ruines and ashes: David might returne to the soile where it stood, to the roofes and walls he could not: No sooner is he disappointed of that harbour, then God provides him Cities of Hebron: Saul shall die to give him elbow-room: Now doth David find the comfort that his extremity sought in the Lord his God: Now are his clouds for a time passed over: and the Sun breaks gloriously forth: David shall raigne after his sufferings. So shall we, if we endure to the end, finde a Crown of Righteousnesse, which the Lord the Righteous Judge, shall give us at that day: But though David well knew that his head was long before anointed, and had heard Saul himself confidently avouching his Succeſſion: yet he will not ſtirre from the heaps of Ziklag till he have conſulted with the Lord: It did not content him, that he had Gods warrant for the Kingdome; but he muſt have his inſtructions for the taking poſſeſſion of it: How ſafe and happy is the man that is reſolved to do nothing without God? Neither will generalities of direction be ſufficient; even particular circumſtances muſt look for a word: ſtill is God a Pillar of fire, and cloud to the eye of every Iſraelite: neither may there be any motion or ſtay but from him; That action cannot but ſucceed, which proceeds upon ſo ſure a warrant. A

God ſends him to Hebron a City of Judah: Neither will David go up thither alone, but he takes with him all his men with their whole houſholds: they ſhall take ſuch part as himſelf: As they had ſhared with him in his miſery, ſo they ſhall now in his proſperity: Neither doth he take advantage of their late mutiny (which was yet freſh and green) to caſhiere thoſe unthankfull, and ungracious followers, but pardoning their ſecret rebellions, he makes them partakers of his good ſucceſſe. Thus doth our heavenly Leader (whom David prefigured) take us to raign with him who have ſuffered with him: paſſing by our manifold infirmities, as if they had not been, he removeth us from the Land of our baniſhment, and the aſhes of our forlorn Ziklag, to the Hebron of our Peace and glory: The expectation of this day muſt (as it did with Davids Soldiers) digeſt all our ſorrowes. B

Never any calling of God was ſo conſpicuous, as not to finde ſome Oppoſites: What Iſraelite did not know David appointed by God to the ſucceſſion of the Kingdome? Even the Amalekite, could carry the Crown to him as the true Owner: yet there wants not an Abner to reſiſt him, and the Title of an Iſhboſheth to colour his reſiſtance: If any of Sauls houſe could have made challenge to the Crown, it ſhould have been Mephiboſheth the ſon of Ionathan: Who, it ſeemes had too much of his Fathers bloud to be a Competitor with David: the queſtion is not, who may claim the moſt right, but who may beſt ſerve the faction; Neither was Iſhboſheth any other then Abners Stale. Saul could not have a fitter Courtier: whether in the imitation of his Maſters envy, or the ambition of ruling under a borrowed name, he ſtrongly oppoſed David: there are thoſe who ſtrive againſt their own hearts, to make a ſide, with whom conſcience is oppreſſed by affection: An ill quarrell once undertaken ſhall be maintained although with bloud: Now, not ſo much the bloud of Saul, as the ingagement of Abner makes the Warre. The ſonnes of Zeruiah ſtand faſt to David: It is much, how a man placeth his firſt intereſt: If Abner had been in Ioabs roome, when Sauls diſpleaſure drove David from the Court, or Ioab in Abners, theſe actions, theſe events had been changed with the perſons: It was the onely happineſſe of Ioab that he fell on the better ſide. C D

Both the Commanders under David and Iſhboſheth were equally cruell: both are ſo inured to bloud, that they make but a ſport of killing. Cuſtome makes ſin ſo familiar, that the horror of it, is to ſome turned into pleaſure. (Come let the young men play before us.) Abner is the Challenger, and ſpeeds thereafter: for though in the matches of Duell both ſides miſcarried, yet in the following conflict, Abner and his men are beaten: By the ſucceſſe of thoſe ſingle Combats no man knowes the better of the cauſe: Both ſides periſh, to ſhew, how little God liked either the offer, or the acceptation of ſuch a tryall; but when both did their beſt, God puniſheth the wrong part with diſcomfiture. E

Oh the miſery of civill diſſention! Iſrael and Judah were brethren. One carried the name of the Father, the other of the Sonne: Iudah was but a branch of Iſrael, Iſrael was the roote of Judah: yet Iſrael and Judah muſt fight, and kill each other; onely upon the quarrell of an ill Leaders ambition. The ſpeed of Aſahel was not greater then his courage: It was a minde fit for one of Davids worthies, to ſtrike at the head, to match himſelfe with the beſt: Hee was both ſwift and ſtrong: but the race is not to the ſwift, nor the battle to the ſtrong: If he had gone never ſo ſlowly, he might have overtaken death: now hee runs to fetch it. So little luſt had Abner to ſhed the bloud of a ſon of Zeruiah, that hee twice adviſes him to retreate from purſuing his own perill: Aſahels cauſe was ſo much better as Abners ſucceſſe: Many

A a one miſcarries in the raſh proſecution of a good quarrell, when the Abettors of the worſt part goe away with victory. Heate of zeale, ſometimes in the undiſcreet purſuit of a juſt Adverſary, proves mortall to the agent, prejudiciall to the ſervice.

Abner, whiles he kils, yet he flyes, and runs away from his owne death, whiles he inflicts it upon another: Davids followers had the better of the field and day; The Sun as unwilling to ſee any more Iſraelitiſh bloud ſhed by brethren, hath withdrawne himſelfe: and now both parts having got the advantage of an hill under them, have ſafe convenience of parley: Abner begins, and perſwades Ioab to ſurceaſe the fight (Shall the ſword devoure for ever? knoweſt thou not, that it will be bitterneſſe in the end? How long ſhall it be, ere thou bid the people returne from following their
B brethren?) It was his fault that the ſword devoured at all: and why was not the beginning of a civill War, bitterneſſe? Why did he call forth the people to skirmiſh, and invite them to death? Had Abner been on the winning hand, this motion had been thank-worthy: It is a noble diſpoſition in a Victor, to call for a ceſſation of Armes: whereas neceſſity wrings this ſuit from the over-maſtered. There cannot be a greater praiſe, to a valiant and wiſe Commander, then a propenſion to all juſt termes of peace: For warre as it is ſometimes neceſſary, ſo it is alwayes evill; and if fighting have any other end propoſed beſides peace, it proves murder. Abner ſhall finde himſelfe no leſſe overcome, by Ioab in clemency, then power; He ſayes not, I will not ſo eaſily leave the advantage of my victory: ſince the Dice of warre run on my ſide, I will follow the chance of my good ſucceſſe: Thou ſhouldeſt have con-
C ſidered of this before thy provocation: It is now too late, to move unto forbearance. But, as a man that meant to approve himſelf equally free from cowardiſe, in the beginning of the conflict, and from cruelty in the end; he profeſſeth his forwardneſſe to entertaine any pretence of ſheathing up the ſwords of Iſrael, and ſweares to Abner, that if it had not been for his proud irritation, the people had in the morning before ceaſed from that bloudy purſuit of their brethren. As it becomes publique perſons to be lovers of peace, ſo they muſt ſhew it upon all good occaſions: letting paſſe no opportunity of making ſpare of bloud.

Iſhboſheth was (it ſeemes) a man of no great ſpirits, for being no leſſe then forty yeares old, when his father went into his laſt field againſt the Philiſtims, he was content to ſtay at home; Abner hath put ambition into him; and hath eaſily raiſed
D him to the head of a faction, againſt the anointed Prince of Gods people. If this uſurped Crowne of Sauls Son, had any worth or glory in it, he cannot but acknowledge to owe it all unto Abner; yet how forward is unthankfull Iſhboſheth to receive a falſe ſuggeſtion againſt his chiefe Abettor: (Wherefore haſt thou gone in to my fathers Concubine?) He that made no conſcience of an unjuſt claime to the Crowne, and a maintenance of it with bloud, yet ſeemes ſcrupulous of a leſſe ſinne, that carryed in it the colour of a diſgrace; The touch of her, who had been honoured by his fathers bed, ſeemed an intolerable preſumption, and ſuch as could not be ſevered from his owne diſhonour: Self-love ſometimes borrowes the face of honeſt zeale. Thoſe, who out of true grounds diſlike ſins, doe hate them all indifferently, according to
E their hainouſneſſe; Hypocrites are partiall in their deteſtation, bewraying ever moſt bitterneſſe againſt thoſe offences, which may moſt prejudice their perſons and reputations.

It is as dangerous as unjuſt for Princes, to give both their eares and their heart to miſgrounded rumours of their innocent followers: This wrong hath ſtript Iſhboſheth of the Kingdome: Abner in the meane time cannot be excuſed from a trecherous inconſtancy: If Sauls ſon had no true Title to the Crown, why did he maintain it? If he had, why did he forſake the cauſe and perſon? Had Abner out of remorſe, for furthering a falſe claime, taken off his hand, I know not wherein he could be blamed except for not doing it ſooner: But now to withdraw his profeſſed allegeance, upon a private revenge, was to take a lewd leave of an ill action: If Iſhboſheth were his lawfull Prince, no injury could warrant a revolt: Even betwixt private perſons a return of wrongs is both uncharitable, and unjuſt, how ever this goe currant for the common

iuſtice of the World: how much more ſhould we learn from a ſupreme hand, to take hard meaſures with thanks? It had been Abners duty, to have given his King a peaceable and humble ſatisfaction, and not to flye out in a ſnuffe. If the ſpirit of the Ruler riſe up againſt thee, leave not thy place; for yeelding pacifieth great offences: now, his impatient falling, although to the right ſide, makes him no better then traiterouſly honeſt.

So ſoone as Abner had entertained a reſolution of his rebellion, he perſwades the Elders of Iſrael to accompany him in the change: and whence doth he fetch his main motive but from the Oracle of God? (The Lord hath ſpoken of David, ſaying, By the hand of my ſervant David, will I ſave my people Iſrael, out of the hand of the Philiſtims, and out of the hand of all their enemies;) Abner knew this full well before, yet then was well content to ſmother a known truth for his own turn, and now the publication of it may ſerve for his advantage, he wins the heart of Iſrael, by ſhewing Gods Charter for him, whom he had ſo long oppoſed: Hypocrites make uſe of God for their own purpoſes; & care only to make divine authority a colour for their own deſignes; No man ever heard Abner godly till now: neither had he been ſo at this time, if he had not intended a revengefull departure from Iſhboſheth: Nothing is more odious then to make Religion a ſtalking horſe to Policy.

Who can but glorifie God in his juſtice, when he ſees the bitter end of this treacherous diſſimulation? David may upon conſiderations of State, entertain his new Gueſt with a Feaſt; and well might he ſeeme to deſerve a welcome, that undertakes to bring all Iſrael to the league and homage of David: but God never meant to uſe ſo unworthy meanes, for ſo good a work. Ioab returns from purſuing a troup, and finding Abner diſmiſſed in peace and expectation of beneficiall return, followes him, and whether out of envy, at a new rivall of honour, or out of the revenge of Aſahel, he repaies him both diſſimulation and death. God doth moſt juſtly by Ioab, that which Ioab did for himſelfe moſt unjuſtly: I know not (ſetting the quarrell aſide) whether we can worthily blame Abner for the death of Aſahel, who would needs after faire warnings run himſelfe upon Abners Speare: yet this fact ſhall procure his paiment for worſe. Now is Iſhboſheths wrong revenged by an enemy; we may not alwaies meaſure the Juſtice of Gods proceedings, by preſent occaſions: He needs not make us acquainted, or aſk us leave when he will call for the arrerages of forgotten ſinnes.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY VERY GOOD LORD,

WILLIAM LORD BVRLEIGH,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE;

Here are but two Bookes wherein wee can reade God; The one is his Word, his Works the other: This is the bigger Volume, that the more exquiſite. The Characters of this are more large, but dim; of that, ſmaller, but clearer. Philoſophers have turned over this and erred; That, Divines and ſtudious Chriſtians, not without full and certaine information. In the Works of God we ſee the ſhadow, or footſteps of the Creator, in his Word we ſee the face of God in a glaſſe. Happineſſe conſiſts in the Viſion of that infinite Majeſty: and if wee bee perfectly happy above in ſeeing him face to face, our happineſſe is well forward below, in ſeeing the lively repreſentation of his face in the glaſſe of the the Scriptures. Wee cannot ſpend our eyes too much upon this Object: For me, the more I ſee, the more I am amazed, the more I am raviſhed with this glorious beauty. With the honeſt Lepers I cannot bee content to enjoy this happy ſight alone: there is but one way to every mans felicity. May it pleaſe your Lordſhip to take part with many your Peeres, in theſe my weake, but not unprofitable Contemplations; which ſhall hold themſelves not a little graced with your Honourable Name; Whereto, together with your right Noble and moſt Worthy Lady, I have gladly devoted my ſelfe, to bee

HONOVRABLE MY WILLIAM

Your Lordſhips in all

dutifull obſervance,

JOS: HALL.

THE FIFTEENTH BOOKE.

Uzzah, and the Arke removed.

THe houſe of Saul is quiet, the Philiſtims beaten, victory cannot end better then in devotion; David is no ſooner ſetled in his houſe at Jeruſalem, then he fetcheth God to be his gueſt there; the thouſands of Iſrael góe now in an holy march, to bring up the Ark of God, to the place of his reſt; The tumults of Warre afforded no opportunity of this ſervice; onely peace is a friend to Religion, neither is peace ever our friend, but when it is a ſervant of Piety; The uſe of Warre is not more pernicious to the body, then the abuſe of peace is to the ſoule; Alas, the Riot bred of our long eaſe, rather drives the Ark of God from us, ſo the ſtill ſedentary life, is ſubject to diſeaſes, and ſtanding waters putrifie. It may be juſt with God, to take away the bleſſing which we doe ſo much abuſe; and to ſcoure off our ruſt with bloudy Warre, &c. 2 Sam. 6.

The Ark of God had now many yeares, reſted in the obſcure lodge of Abinadab; without the honour of a Tabernacle. David will not endure himſelfe glorious, and the Ark of God contemptible; his firſt care is to provide a fit roome for God in the head of the Tribes, in his own City. The chiefe care of good Princes, muſt be the advancement of Religion; What ſhould the Deputies of God rather doe then honor him whom they repreſent? It was no good that Iſrael could learn of Philiſtims; Thoſe Pagans had ſent the Ark back in a new Cart; the Iſraelites ſaw God bleſſed that conduct, and now they practiſe it at home: But that which God will take from Philiſtims, he will not brooke from Iſrael: Aliens from God are no fit patterns for children: Divine inſtitution had made this a carriage for the Levites, not for oxen: Neither ſhould thoſe ſons of Abinadab have driven the Cart, but caried that ſacred burden. Gods buſineſſes muſt be done after his own formes, which if we doe with the beſt intentions alter, we preſume.

It is long ſince Iſrael ſaw ſo faire a day as this, wherein they went in this holy Triumph to fetch the Ark of God; Now their Warlike Trumpets are turned into Harps and Timbrels; and their hands inſtead of wielding the Sword and Speare, ſtrike upon thoſe muſicall ſtrings whereby they might expreſſe the joy of their hearts: Here was no noyſe but of mirth, no motion but pleaſant: Oh happy Iſ-rael that had a God to rejoyce in, that had this occasion of rejoycing in their God, and an heart that embraced this occasion. There is nothing but this wherein wee may not joy immoderately, unseasonably; this spirituall joy can never be either out of time, or out of measure: Let him that rejoyceth, rejoyce in the Lord. But now when the Israelites were in the midst of this Angel-like jollity, their hearts lifted up, their hands playing, their feet moving, their tongues singing and shouting, God sees good to strike them into a sudden dumpe by the death of Vzzah: They are scarce set into the tune, when God marres their Musique, by a fearfull judgement; and changes their mirth into astonishment, and confusion; There could not bee a more excellent work then this they were about; there could not bee more chearfull hearts in the performing of it, yet will the most holy God rather dash all this solemne service, then endure an act of presumption or infidelity. Abinadab had beene the faithfull Host of Gods Ark for the space of twenty yeares: even in the midst of the terrors of Israel, who were justly affrighted with the vengeance inflicted upon Beth-shemesh, did he give harbor unto it; Yet even the son of Abinadab is stricken dead, in the first departing of that blessed guest: The Sanctity of the Parent cannot beare out the sin of his Son: The Holy one of Israel will be sanctified in all that come neere him: He will be served like himselfe.

What then was the sin of Vzzah? What was the capitall crime, for which he so fearfully perished? That the Ark of God was committed to the Cart, it was not his device only, but the common act of many; That it was not caried on the shoulders of Levites, was no lesse the fault of Ahio, and the rest of their Brethren; only Vzzah is stricken: The rest sinned in negligence, he in presumption; the Ark of God shakes with the agitation of that carriage; he puts forth his hand to hold it steddy: Humane judgement would have found herein nothing haynous: God sees not with the eyes of men; None but the Priests should have dared to touch the Ark; It was enough for the Levites to touch the barres that carryed it: An unwarranted hand cannot so lightly touch the Ark, but he strikes the God that dwels in it: No marvell if God strike that man with death, that strikes him with Presumption; There was well-neere the same quarrell against the thousands of Bethshemesh, and against Vzzah; They dyed for looking into the Ark, he for touching it; lest Israel should grow into a contemptuous familiarity with this Testimony of Gods presence, he will hold them in awe with Judgments. The revenging hand of the Almighty, that upon the returne of the Ark staied at the house of Abinadab, upon the remove of the Ark begins there again: Where are those that think God will take up with a careless and slubbred service? He whose infinite mercy uses to passe by our sins of infirmity, punisheth yet severely our bold faults: If we cannot doe any thing in the degrees that he requireth; yet we must learn to do all things in the forme that he requireth; Doubtlesse Vzzah meant no otherwise then well, in putting forth his hand to stay the Ark; He knew the sacred Utensils that were in it, the Pot of Manna, the Tables of the Law, the Rod of Aaron, which might be wronged by that over-rough motion: to these he offers his aid, and is stricken dead: The best intention cannot excuse; much lesse warrant us in unlawfull actions: where we do ought in faith, it pleaseth our good God to wink at, and pitty our weaknesses; but if wee dare to present God with the wel-meant services of our own making, we run into the indignation of God; There is nothing more dangerous then to bee our owne carvers in matter of Devotion.

I marvell not if the countenance of David were suddenly changed, to see the pale face of death in one of the chiefe Actors in this holy Procession: Hee that had found God so favourable to him in actions of lesse worth, is troubled to see this successe of a businesse so heartily directed unto his God; and now he begins to looke thorow Vzzah at himselfe, and to say, (How shall the Arke of the Lord come to me?) Then onely shall we make a right use of the judgements of God upon others, when we shall feare them in our selves, and finding our sinnes at least equall, shall tremble at the expectation of the same deserved punishments. God intends not only revenge in his execution, but reformation; As good Princes regard not so much the smart of the

A the evill past, as the prevention of the future; which is never attained but when we make applications of Gods hand: and draw common causes out of Gods particular proceedings.

I doe not heare David say; Surely, this man is guilty of some secret sin, that the World knows not, God hath met with him, there is no danger to us, why should I be discouraged to see God just? we may goe on safely and prosper: But here his foot staies, and his hand fals from his Instrument, and his tongue is ready to taxe his own unworthinesse, (How shall the Ark of the Lord come unto me?) That heart is carnall and proud, that thinks any man worse then himself; Davids feare staies his progresse: Perhaps he might have proceeded with good successe, but he dares not venture, where he sees such a deadly check: It is better to be too fearfull, then too forward in
B those affaires, which doe immediately concerne God; As it is not good to refraine from holy businesses, so it is worse to doe them ill; Awfulnesse is a safe Interpreter of Gods secret actions, and a wise guide of ours.

THIS event hath holpen Obed-Edom to a gueſt he lookt not for, God shall now sojourne in the house of him, in whose heart he dwelt before by a strong faith: else the man durst not have undertaken to receive that dreadfull Arke, which David himselfe feared to harbour; Oh the courage of an honest and faithfull heart! Obed-Edom knew well enough what slaughter the Ark had made amongst the Philistims, and after that amongst the Bethshemites, and now he saw Vzzah lye dead before him, yet doth he not make any scruple of entertaining it, neither doth he say, My Neighbour Abinadab was a carefull and religious host to the Ark, and is now payed
C with the bloud of his son: how shall I hope to speed better? but he opens his doores with a bold chearfulnesse, and notwithstanding all those terrors, bids God welcome: Nothing can make God not amiable to his own; Even his very justice is lovely: Holy men know how to rejoyce in the Lord with trembling, and can feare without discouragement.

The God of heaven will not receive any thing from men on free-cost: he will pay liberally for his lodging, a plentifull blessing upon Obed-Edom, and all his household. It was an honour to that zealous Gittite, that the Ark should come under his roofe; yet God rewards that honour with benediction; Never man was a loser by true godlinesse. The house of Obed-Edom cannot this while want observation: the eyes of David, and all Israel were never off from it, to see how it fared with this en-
D tertainment. And now, when they finde nothing, but a gracious acceptation and sensible blessing, the good King of Israel takes new heart, and hastens to fetch the Arke into his royall City. The view of Gods favours upon the Godly, is no small encouragement to confidence and obedience: Doubtlesse, Obed-Edom was not free from some weaknesses; If the Lord should have taken the advantage of Judgement against him, what Israelites had not been disheartened from attending the Arke? Now David and Israel was not more affrighted with the vengeance upon Vzzah, then encouraged by the blessing of Obed-Edom: The wise God doth so order his just and mercifull proceedings, that the awfulnesse of men may be tempered with love. Now the sweet singer of Israel revives his holy Musicke; and addes both more E spirit and more pompe to so devout a businesse: I did not before heare of Trumpets, nor dancing, nor shouting, nor sacrifice, nor the linnen Ephod: The sense of Gods passed displeasure, doubles our care to please him, and our joy in his recovered approbation: we never make so much of our health as after sickenesse, nor never are so officious to our friend, as after an unkindnesse. In the first setting out of the Arke, Davids feare was at least an equall match to his joy; therefore after the first sixe paces he offered a sacrifice, both to pacifie God, and thank him: but now when they saw no signe of dislike, they did more freely let themselves loose to a fearlesse joy; and the body strove to expresse the holy affection of the soule; there was no limbe, no part that did not professe their mirth by motion, no noyse of voyce, or instrument wanted to assist their spirituall jollity; David led the way, dancing with all his might in his linnen Ephod: Vzzah was still in his eye, he durst not usurp upon a garment of Priests, but will borrow their colour to grace the solemnity, though he dare not the faſhion. White was ever the colour of joy, and Linnen was light for uſe, therefore he covers his Princely Robes with white linnen, and means to honor himſelf by his conformity to Gods Miniſters. Thoſe that think there is diſgrace in the Ephod, are far from the ſpirit of the man after Gods own heart: Neither can there be a greater argument of a foule ſoule, then a diſlike of the glorious calling of God: Barren Mical hath too many ſons that ſcorne the holy habit and exerciſes: ſhe looks through her window, and ſeeing the attire and geſtures of her deuout husband, deſpiſeth him in her heart, neither can ſhe conceale her contempt, but like Sauls Daughter caſts it proudly in his face (Oh how glorious was the King of Iſrael this day; which was uncovered this day in the eyes of the Maidens of his ſervants, as a foole uncovereth himſelf.) Worldly hearts can ſee nothing in actions of zeale but folly and madneſſe: Piety hath no reliſh to their palate but diſtaſtfull.

DAVIDS heart did never ſwell ſo much at any reproach, as this of his wife; his love was for the time loſt in his anger; and as a man impatient of no affront ſo much as in the way of his devotion, he returns a bitter check to his Mical; (It was before the Lord, which choſe me rather then thy Father, and all his houſe, &c.) Had not Mical twitted her Husband with the ſhame of his zeal, ſhe had not heard of the ſhamefull rejection of her father; now ſince ſhe will be forgetting whoſe Wife ſhe was, ſhe ſhall be put in mind whoſe Daughter ſhe was. Contumelies that are caſt upon us in the cauſes of God, may ſafely be repaied: If we be meale-mouthed in the ſcorns of Religion, we are not patient, but zeale-leſſe: Here we may not forbeare her, that lies in our boſome. If David had not loved Mical dearly, he had never ſtood upon thoſe points with Abner; He knew that if Abner came to him, the kingdome of Iſrael would accompany him, and yet he ſends him the charge of not ſeeing his face, except he brought Mical, Sauls Daughter with him; as if he would not regard the Crowne of Iſrael, whiles he wanted that Wife of his: Yet here he takes her up roundly, as if ſhe had been an enemy, not a partner of his bed. All relations are aloofe off, in compariſon of that betwixt God and the ſoul; He that loves Father, or Mother, or Wife, or Child, better then me (ſaith our Saviour) is not worthy of me. Even the higheſt delights of our hearts muſt be trampled upon, when they will ſtand out in rivality with God. Oh happy reſolution of the royall Prophet, and Propheticall King of Iſrael, (I will be yet more vile then thus, and will be low in mine own ſight:) he knew this very abaſement Heroicall; and that the onely way to true glory, is, not to be aſhamed of our loweſt humiliation unto God: Well might he promiſe himſelfe honour from thoſe, whoſe contempt ſhe had threatned; The hearts of men are not their owne, he that made them over-rules them, and inclines them to an honorable conceit of thoſe that honor their Maker; So as holy men have oft-times inward reverence, even where they have outward indignities. David came to bleſſe his houſe, Mical brings a curſe upon her ſelf: Her ſcorns ſhal make her childleſſe to the day of her death; Barrenneſſe was held in thoſe times none of the leaſt judgements; God doth ſo revenge Davids quarrell upon Mical, that her ſudden diſgrace ſhall be recompenced with perpetuall: She ſhal not be held worthy to bear a ſon, to him whom ſhe unjuſtly contemned; How juſt is it with God to provide whips for the backs of ſcorners? It is no marvell if thoſe that mock at goodneſſe, be plagued with continuall fruitleſneſſe.

Mephiboſheth and Ziba.

2 Sam. 9.

SOO ſoone as ever David can but breathe himſelf from the publike cares, he caſts back his thoughts to the deare remembrance of his Ionathan. Sauls ſervant is likely to give him the beſt intelligence of Sauls ſons; The queſtion is therefore moved to Ziba; Remaineth there none of the houſe of Saul? and leſt ſuſpition might conceale the remainders of an emulous line, in feare of revenge intended, he addes: On whom I may ſhew the mercy of God for Ionathans ſake? O friendſhip worthy of the Monuments of Eternity, fit only to requite him, whoſe love was more then the love of women: He doth not ſay,

Is

A Is there any of the house of Ionathan, but, of Saul; that for his friends sake he may shew favour to the Posterity of his Persecutor. Ionathans love could not be greater then Sauls malice, which also survived long in his issue; from whom David found a busie and stubborn rivalty for the Crown of Israel: yet as one that gladly buryed all the hostility of Sauls house in Ionathans grave, he askes, Is there any man left of Sauls house, that I may shew him mercy for Jonathans sake? It is true love, that over-living the person of a friend, will be inherited of his seed; but to love the posterity of an enemy in a friend, it is the miracle of friendship: The formall amity of the World is confined to a face: or to the possibility of recompence, languishing in the disability, and dying in the decease of the party affected: That love was ever false, that is not ever constant, and the most operative, when it cannot be either knowne
B or requited.

To cut off all unquiet competition for the Kingdome of Israel, the providence of God had so ordered, that there is none left of the house of Saul (besides the sons of his Concubines) save only young and lame Mephibosheth: so young, that he was but five yeares of age, when David entred upon the government of Israel; so lame, that if his age had fitted, his impotence had made him unfit for the Throne. Mephibosheth was not born a Creeple; it was an heedlesse Nurse that made him so: She hearing of the death of Saul and Ionathan, made such hast to flee, that her young Master was lamed with the fall: Iwis, there needed no such speed to run away from David; whose love pursues the hidden sonne of his brother Ionathan: How often doth our ignorant mistaking, cause us to run from our best friends, and to catch knocks and
C maimes of them that professe our protection?

Mephibosheth could not come otherwise then fearfully, into the presence of David, whom he knew so long, so spitefully opposed by the house of Saul: he could not be ignorant, that the fashion of the World is to build their owne security upon the bloud of the opposite faction; neither to think themselves safe, whiles any branch remaines springing out of that roote of their emulation: Seasonably doth David therefore first, expell all those unjust doubts, ere he administer his further cordials; (Feare not, for I will surely shew thee kindnesse, for Jonathan thy Fathers sake, and will restore thee all the fields of Saul thy Father, and thou shalt eate bread at my table continually.)

David can see neither Sauls bloud, nor lame legs in Mephibosheth, whiles he sees
D in him the features of his friend Ionathan; how much lesse shall the God of mercies regard our infirmities, or the corrupt bloud of our sinfull Progenitors, whiles he beholds us in the face of his Son, in whom he is well pleased.

Favours are wont so much more to affect us, as they are lesse expected by us; Mephibosheth as over-joyed with so comfortable a word, and confounded in himselfe at the remembrance of the contrary deservings of his Family, bowes himselfe to the earth, and sayes (What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead Dogge as I am?) I finde no defect of wit (though of limbs) in Mephibosheth, he knew himselfe the Grand-child of the King of Israel, the Sonne of Ionathan, the lawfull heire of both, yet in regard of his owne impotency, and the trespasse and E rejection of his house, he thus abaseth himselfe unto David; Humiliation is a right use of Gods affliction; What if he were borne great? If the sinne of his Grand-father hath lost his estate, and the hand of his Nurse hath deformed and disabled his person, he now forgets what he was, and cals himselfe worse then hee is, A dogge: Yet a living Dogge is better then a dead Lyon; there is dignity and comfort in life, Mephibosheth is therefore a dead dogge unto David. It is not for us to nourish the same spirits in our adverse estate, that we found in our highest prosperity; What use have wee made of Gods hand, if we be not the lower with our fall? God intends we should carry our crosse, not make a fire of it to warme us; It is no bearing up our sailes in a tempest. Good David cannot dis-esteeme Mephibosheth ever the more for disparaging himselfe: he loves and honours this humility in the Sonne of Ionathan; There is no more certaine way to glory and advancement, then a lowly dejection of our selves: He that made himselfe a Dogge, and therefore fit only to lye under the table, yea a dead Dogge, and therefore fit only for the ditch, is raiſed up to the table of a King; his ſeat ſhall be honourable, yea, royall; his fare delicious, his attendance noble. How much more will our gracious God lift up our heads, unto true honour before men and Angels, if we can be ſincerely humbled in his ſight? if we miſ-call our ſelves in the meanneſſe of our conceits to him, he gives us a new name, and ſets us at the table of his glory; It is contrary with God and men; if they reckon of us as we ſet our ſelves, he values us according to our abaſements. Like a Prince truly munificent and faithfull, David promiſes and performes at once; Ziba, Sauls ſervant, hath the charge given him, of the execution of that royall word; He ſhall be the Bayliffe of this great Husbandry of his Maſter Mephiboſheth; The Land of Saul, how ever forfeited, ſhall know no other Maſter then Sauls Grand-child. As yet, Sauls ſervant had ſped better then his Son: I read of twenty ſervants of Ziba, none of Mephiboſheth; Earthly poſſeſſions doe not alwaies admit of equall diviſions; The Wheele is now turned up; Mephiboſheth is a Prince, Ziba is his Officer; I cannot but pitty the condition of this good Son of Ionathan; Into ill hands did honeſt Mephiboſheth fall, firſt, of a careleſſe Nurſe, then of a treacherous ſervant; She maymed his body, he would have overthrowne his eſtate; After ſome yeares of eye-ſervice to Mephiboſheth, wicked Ziba intends to give him a worſe fall then his Nurſe. Never any Court was free from Detractors, from Delators; who if they ſee a man to be a Creeple, that he cannot goe to ſpeake for himſelfe, will be telling tales of him in the eares of the Great; ſuch an one was this prefidious Ziba; who taking the opportunity of Davids flight from his Sonne Abſalom, followes him with a faire preſent, and a falſe Tale, accuſing his impotent Maſter of a foule and traiterous ingratitude; labouring to tread upon his lame Lord to raiſe himſelfe to honour: True-hearted Mephiboſheth had as good a will as the beſt; if he could have commanded legs, he had not been left behinde David: now that he cannot goe with him, he will not be well without him, and therefore puts himſelfe to a wilfull and ſullen penance, for the abſence and danger of his King; he will not ſo much as put on cleane cloathes for the time, as he that could not have any joy in himſelfe, for the want of his Lord David: Unconſcionable Miſcreants care not how they collogue, whom they ſlander for a private advantage; Lewd Ziba comes with a gift in his hand, and a ſmooth Tale in his mouth; Oh Sir, you thought you had a Ionathan at home, but you will finde a Saul; It were pitty but he ſhould be ſet at your Table, that would ſit in your Throne; you thought Sauls Land would have contented Mephiboſheth, but he would have all yours; though he be lame, yet he would be climbing: would you have thought that this Creeple could be plotting for your Kingdome, now that you are gone aſide? Iſhboſheth will never die while Mephiboſheth lives: How did he now forget his impotence, and raiſed up his ſpirits in hope of a day; and durſt ſay, that now the time was come, wherein the Crown ſhould revert to Sauls true heire. Oh Viper: if a Serpent bite in ſecret when he is not charmed, no better is a Slanderer; Honeſt Mephiboſheth in good manners made a dead dogge of himſelf, when David offered him the favour of his board; but Ziba would make him a very Dog indeed, an ill natur'd Cur, that when David did thus kindly feed him at his own table, would not only bite his fingers, but flie at his throat.

But what ſhall we ſay to this? Neither earthly Soveraignty, nor holineſſe can exempt men from humane infirmity. Wiſe and good David hath now but one eare; and that miſ-led with credulity: His charity in beleeving Ziba, makes him uncharitable in diſtruſting, in cenſuring Mephiboſheth. The detractor hath not onely ſudden credit given him; but Sauls Land; Ionathans Son hath loſt (unheard) that inheritance which was given him unſought. Heare-ſay is no ſafe ground of any judgement; Ziba ſlanders, David beleeves, Mephiboſheth ſuffers.

Lies ſhall not alwaies proſper, God will not abide the truth to be ever oppreſſed; At laſt Ionathans lame Son ſhall be found as ſound in heart, as lame in his body; He whoſe ſoule was like his Father Ionathans ſoule, whoſe body was like to his Grandfather Sauls ſoul, meets David (as it is high time) upon his returne; beſtirs his tongue to

A to discharge himselfe of so foule a slander; The more horrible the crime had been, the more villanous was the unjust suggestion of it, and the more necessary was a just Apology; Sweetly therefore, and yet passionately doth he labour to greaten Davids favours to him; his owne obligations and vileness; shewing himselfe more affected with his wrong, then with his losse; welcomming David home with a thankfull neglect of himself, as not caring that Ziba had his substance, now that he had his King. David is satisfied, Mephibosheth restored to favour and lands; here are two kind hearts well met. David is full of satisfaction from Mephibosheth; Mephibosheth runs over with joy in David: David, like a gracious King, gives Mephibosheth (as before) Sauls Lands to halves with Ziba; Mephibosheth, like a King, gives all to Ziba for joy that God had given him David: All had been well if Ziba had fared worse: Pardon me
B O holy and glorious soule of a Prophet, of a King, after Gods owne heart; I must needs blame thee for mercy: A fault that the best and most generous natures are most subject to. It is pitty that so good a thing should doe hurt; yet we finde that the best, misused, is most dangerous: Who should be the patterne of Kings, but the King of God? Mercy is the goodliest Flower in his Crown; much more in theirs, but with a difference: Gods mercy is infinite, theirs limited: he sayes, I will have mercy on whom I will: they must say, I will have mercy on whom I should. And yet he, for all his infinite mercy, hath vessels of wrath, so must they; of whom his Justice hath said, Thine eye shall not spare them: A good man is pittifull to his beast, shall he therefore make much of Toads and Snakes? Oh that Ziba should go away with any possession, save of shame and sorrow, that he should be coupled with a Mephibosheth in a partnership
C of Estates: Oh that David had changed the word a little.

A division was due here indeed; but of Ziba's eares from his head, or his head from his shoulders, for going about so maliciously, to divide David from the Son of Ionathan: An Eye for an Eye, was Gods Rule; If that had been true, which Ziba suggested against Mephibosheth, he had been worthy to lose his head with his Lands: being false, it had been but reason, Ziba should have changed heads with Mephibosheth: Had not holy David himselfe beene so stung with the venemous tongues, that he cryes out in the bitternesse of his soule, What reward shall be given thee, O thou false tongue? Even sharp arrowes with hot burning coales; He that was so sensible of himselfe in Doegs wrong, doth he feele so little of Mephibosheth in Zibaes? Are these the Arrowes of Davids Quiver; are these his hot burning coales (Thou and Ziba
D divide?) He that had said, their tongue is a sharp sword, now that the sword of just revenge is in his hand, is this the blow he gives, Divide the possession? I know not whether, excesse, or want of mercy may prove most dangerous in the Great; the one discourages good intentions with feare; the other may encourage wicked practices through presumption; Those that are in eminent place must learn the mid-way betwixt both; so pardoning faults that they may not provoke them; so punishing them, that they may not dishearten vertuous and well-meant actions; they must learne to sing that absolute Ditty (whereof David had here forgotten one part) of Mercy and Judgement.

Hanun and Davids Ambassadours.

IT is not the meaning of Religion, to make men uncivill: If the King of Ammon were heathenish, yet his kindnesse may be acknowledged, may be returned by the King of Israel. I say not, but that perhaps David might maintain too strait a league with that forbidden Nation; A little friendship is enough to an Idolater; but even the savage Canibals may receive an answer of outward courtesie: If a very dog fawn upon us we stroake him on the head, and clap him on the side; much lesse is the common band of humanity untyed by Grace: Disparity in spirituall Professions, is no warrant for Ingratitude: He therefore whose good nature proclaimed to shew mercy to any branch of Sauls House,

2 Sam. 10

Houſe, for Ionathans ſake, will now alſo ſhew kindneſſe to Hanun, for the ſake of Nahaſh his father. A

It was the ſame Nahaſh that offered the cruell condition to the men of Jabeſh Gilead, of thruſting out their right eyes for the admiſſion into his covenant. He that was thus bloudy in his Deſignes againſt Iſrael, yet was kinde to David; perhaps for no cauſe ſo much as Sauls oppoſition; And yet even this favour is held worthy both of memory and retribution: Where we have the Acts of courteſie, it is not neceſſary we ſhould enter into a ſtrict examination of the grounds of it; whiles the benefit is ours, let the intention be their owne; What ever the hearts of men are, we muſt looke at their hands, and repay, not what they meant, but what they did.

Nahaſh is dead, David ſends Ambaſſadors to condole his loſſe, and to comfort his Son Hanun. No Ammonite but is ſadly affected with the death of a Father, though it gaine him a Kingdome: Even Eſau could ſay, the dayes of mourning for my Father will come; No earthly advantage can fill up the gap of nature: Thoſe children are worſe then Ammonites, that can think either gaine, or liberty, worthy to countervaile a parents loſſe. B

Carnall men are wont to meaſure anothers foot by their owne Laſt; their owne falſhood makes them unjuſtly ſuſpicious of others. The Princes of Ammon, becauſe they are guilty to their own hollowneſſe and doubleneſſe of heart, are ready ſo to judge of David and his Meſſengers, (Thinkeſt thou that David doth honor thy Father, that he hath ſent comforters unto thee? Hath not David rather ſent his owne ſervants to thee, to ſearch the City, and to ſpie it out, to overthrow it?) It is hard for a wicked heart to think well of any other; becauſe it can think none better then it ſelf, and knowes it ſelf evill: The freer a man is from vice himſelf, the more charitable he uſes to be unto others. C

Whatſoever David was particularly in his own perſon, it was ground enough of prejudice, that he was an Iſraelite; It was an hereditary and deep ſetled hatred, that the Ammonites had conceived againſt their brethren of Iſrael: neither can they forget that ſhamefull and fearfull foyle, which they received from the reſcuers of Iabeſh Gilead; and now ſtill doe they ſtomach at the name of Iſrael; Malice once conceived in worldly hearts, is not eaſily extinguiſhed, but upon all occaſions, is ready to break forth into a flame of revengefull actions.

Nothing can be more dangerous, then for young Princes to meet with ill Counſell in the entrance of their Government; for both then are they moſt prone to take it, and moſt difficultly recovered from it; if we be ſet out of our way in the beginning of our journey, we wander all the day; How happy is that State, where both the Counſellors are faithfull, to give only good advice; and the King wiſe to diſcerne good advice from evill: the young King of Ammon is eaſily drawn to beleeve his Peeres, and to miſtruſt the meſſengers; and having now in his conceit turned them into ſpyes, entertaines them with a ſcornfull diſgrace; he ſhaves off one halfe of their beards, and cuts off one halfe of their garments; expoſing them to the deriſion of all the beholders. The Iſraelites were forbidden either a ſhaven beard; or a ſhort garment; in deſpight, perhaps, of their Law theſe Embaſſadors are ſent away with both, certainly in a deſpight of their Maſter, and a ſcorn of their perſons. D E

King David is not a little ſenſible of the abuſe of his Meſſengers, and of himſelfe in them; Firſt, therefore he deſires to hide their ſhame, then to revenge it. Man hath but a double ornament of body, the one of nature, the other of Art; The naturall ornament is the haire, the artificiall is apparell; Davids Meſſengers are deformed in both; The one is eaſily ſupplied by a new ſuite, the other can onely be ſupplyed out of the Ward-robe of time, Tarry at Iericho till your beards bee growne. How eaſily had this deformity beene removed, if as Hanun had ſhaven one ſide of their faces, ſo they had ſhaven the other; what had this been but to reſemble their yonger age, or that other ſexe, in neither of which, doe we uſe to place any imagination of unbeſeeming; neither did there want ſome of their neighbour Nations, whoſe

A whose faces age it self had not wont to cover with this shade of hayre : But so respective is good David, and his wise Senatours, of their Country-formes ; that they shall by appointment rather tarry abroad, till time have wrought their conformity, then vary from the received fashions of their owne people. Alas, into what a licentious variety of strange disguises are we falne ? The glory of Attire is sought in novelty, in mis-shapennesse, in monstrousnesse : There is much latitude, much liberty in the use of these indifferent things ; but because we are free, we may not run wilde : and never thinke wee have scope enough, unlesse we out-run modesty.

It is lawfull for publike persons, to feele their own indignities, and to endeavour their revenge. Now David sends all the host of the mighty men to punish Ammon, B for so foule an abuse; Those that received the Messengers of his love with scorn and insolency, shall now be severely saluted with the Messenges of his wrath. It is just both with God and men, that they, who know not how to take favours aright, should smart with judgments. Kindnesse repulsed, breaks forth into indignation, how much more when it is repayed with an injurious affront ?

David cannot but feele his owne cheekes shaven, and his owne Coate cut, in his Embassadours ; they did but carry his person to Hanun ; neither can he therefore but appropriate to himselfe the kindnesse, or injury offered unto them : He that did so take to heart the cutting off but the lap of King Sauls Garment, when it was laid aside from him, how must he needs be affected with this disdainfull halving of his haire and Robes, in the person of his deputies ? The name of Embassadours hath
C been ever sacred, and by the universall Law of Nations, hath carryed in it sufficient protection, from all publike wrongs, neither hath it beene ever violated, without a revenge. Oh God, what shall we say to those notorious contempts which are daily cast upon thy spirituall Messengers? Is it possible thou shouldst not feele them, thou shouldst not avenge them? We are made a gazing stock to the world, to Angels and to men, we are despised and trodden down in the dust ; who hath beleeved our report, and to whom is the Arme of the Lord revealed ?

How obstinate are wicked men in their perverse resolutions! These foolish Ammonites had rather hire Syrians to maintaine a War against Israel in so foule a quarrell, besides the hazard of their owne lives, then confesse the errour of their jealous misconstruction.

D It is one of the mad principles of wickednesse, that it is a weaknesse to relent, and rather to Dye then yeeld; Even ill causes once undertaken, must be upheld although with bloud ; whereas the gracious heart finding his own mistaking, doth not onely remit of an ungrounded displeasure, but studies to be revenged of it self, and to give satisfaction to the offended.

The mercenary Syrians are drawn to venture their lives for a fee ; twenty thousand of them are hyred into the field against Israel ; Fond Pagans that know not the value of a man; their bloud cost them nothing, & they care not to sell it good cheap; How can we think those men have Soules, that esteeme a little white earth above themselves ? That never inquire into the Justice of the quarrell, but the rate of the E pay ; that can rifle for drams of silver, in the bowels of their owne flesh, and either kill or dye for a dayes wages ?

Ioab the wise Generall of Israel soone findes, where the strength of the battle lay, and so marshals his troups, that the choice of his men should encounter the vantgard of the Syrians. His brother Abishai leads the rest against the children of Ammon; with this covenant of mutuall assistance, (If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me; but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then will I come and help thee ;) It is an happy thing, when the Captaines of Gods people joyne together as brethren, and lend their hand to the ayde of each other against the common adversary. Concord in defence, or assault, is the way to victory ; as contrarily the division of the Leaders is the overthrow of the Army.

Set aside some particular actions, Ioab was a worthy Captaine, both for wisdome and valour. Who could either exhort or resolve better then he, (Be of good courage and let us play the men, for our people, and for the Cities of our God; and the Lord doe that which seemeth him good?) It is not either private glory or profit that whets his fortitude, but the reſpect to the cauſe of God and his people; that Souldier can never anſwer it to God, that ſtrikes not more as a Juſticer, then as an enemy; Neither doth he content himſelfe with his owne courage, but he animates others. The tongue of a Commander fights more then his hand; it is enough for private men to exerciſe what life and limbs they have; a good Leader muſt out of his own abundance, put life and ſpirits into all others; If a Lyon leade ſheep into the field, there is hope of victory: Laſtly, when he hath done his beſt, he reſolves to depend upon God for the iſſue: not truſting to his ſword, or his bow, but to the providence of the Almighty for ſucceſſe; as a man religiouſly awfull, and awfully confident, whiles there ſhould be no want in their owne endeavours: he knew well that the race was not to the ſwift, nor the battle to the ſtrong, therefore he lookes up above the hils whence commeth his ſalvation. All valour is cowardiſe to that which is built upon Religion.

and

I marvell not to ſee Ioab victorious, while he is thus godly; The Syrians flee before him like flocks of ſheep, the Ammonites follow them; The two ſonnes of Zeruiah have nothing to doe but to purſue and execute; The throates of the Ammonites are cut, for cutting the Beards and Coats of the Iſraelitiſh meſſengers; Neither doth this revenge end in the field; Rabba the royall City of Ammon is ſtrongly beleagured by Ioab; The City of waters (after well-neare a yeares ſiege) yeeldeth: the reſt can no longer hold; Now Ioab, as one that deſireth more to approve himſelfe, a loyall and a carefull ſubject, then a happy Generall, ſends to his Maſter David that he ſhould come perſonally, and encampe againſt the City, and take it; Leſt (ſaith he) I take it, and it be called after my name. Oh noble and imitable fidelity of a dutifull Servant, that preferres his Lord to himſelfe, and is ſo farre from ſtealing honour from his Maſters deſerts, that he willingly remits of his owne, to adde unto his. The Warre was not his; he was onely imployed by his Soveraigne; The ſame perſon that was wronged in the Ambaſſadors, revengeth by his Souldiers; The praiſe of the act ſhall (like Fountain-water) returne to the Sea, whence it originally came; To ſeek a mans own glory is not glory. Alas, how many are there, who being ſent to ſue for God, wooe for themſelves. Oh God, it is a fearfull thing to robbe thee of that which is deareſt to thee, Glory; which as thou wilt not give to any Creature, ſo much leſſe wilt thou endure that any Creature ſhould filch it from thee, and give it to himſelfe: Have thou the honour of all our actions, who giveſt a being to our actions and us, and in both haſt moſt juſtly regarded thine owne praiſe.

David with Bathſheba and Uriah.

2 Sam. 11.

With what unwillingneſſe, with what feare, doe I ſtill look upon the miſcarriage of the man after Gods owne heart? O holy Prophet, who can promiſe himſelf alwaies to ſtand, when he ſees thee faln, and maymed with the fall? Who can aſſure himſelf of an immunity from the fouleſt ſins, when he ſees thee offending ſo hainouſly, ſo bloudily? Let prophane eyes behold thee contentedly, as a patterne, as an excuſe of ſinning; I ſhall never look upon thee but through teares, as a wofull ſpectacle of humane infirmity.

Whiles Ioab and all Iſrael were buſie in the Warre againſt Ammon, in the ſiege of Rabbath, Satan finds time to lay ſiege to the ſecure heart of David. Who ever found David thus tempted, thus foyled in the daies of his buſie Wars? Now only doe I ſee the King of Iſrael, riſing from his bed in the evening; The time was, when he roſe up in the morning to his early devotion; when he brake his nightly reſt with publike cares, with the buſineſſe of the State; all that while he was innocent, he was holy; but now

A now that he wallowes in the bed of idlenesse, he is fit to invite tentation. The industrious man hath no leisure to sin. The idle hath neither leisure nor power to avoid sin; Exercise is not more wholesome for the body, then for the Soule; the remission whereof breeds matter of disease in both: The water that hath been heated, soonest freezeth; the most active spirit soonest tyreth with slacking; The Earth stands still, and is all dregges; the Heavens ever move, and are pure. We have no reason to complain of the assiduity of work; the toyle of action is answered by the benefit; If we did lesse, we should suffer more; Satan like an idle companion, if he find us busie, flyes back and sees it no time to entertaine vain purposes with us; Wee cannot please him better then by casting away our work, to hold chat with him; we cannot yeeld so farre, and be guiltlesse.

B Even Davids eyes have no sooner the sleep rubbed out of them, then they rove to wanton prospects; He walks upon his roofe, and sees Bathsheba washing her self, inquires after her, sends for her, sollicits her to uncleanesse. The same spirit that shut up his eyes in an unseasonable sleep, opens them upon an intising object; whiles sin hath such a Solliciter, it cannot want either meanes, or opportunity: I cannot think Bathsheba could be so immodest, as to wash her selfe openly, especially from her naturall uncleanesse; Lust is quick-sighted; David hath espyed her, where she could espie no beholder: His eyes recoyle upon his heart, and have smitten him with sinfull desire.

There can be no safety to that Soule, where the senses are let loose. He can never keep his covenant with God, that makes not a covenant with his eyes: It is an idle C presumption to think the outward man may be free, whiles the inward is safe: Hee is more then a man, whose heart is not led by his eyes; he is no regenerate man, whose eyes are not restrained by his heart.

Oh Bathsheba, how wert thou washed from thine uncleanesse, when thou yeeldedst to goe into an adulterous bed? never wert thou so foule, as now when thou wert new washed; The worst of Nature is cleanlinesse to the best of sin: thou hadst been cleane if thou hadst not washed; yet for thee, I know how to plead infirmity of sexe, and the importunity of a King; But what shall I say for thee, O thou royall Prophet, and Propheticall King of Israel; where shall I find ought to extenuate that crime, for which God himselfe hath noted thee? Did not thine holy Profession teach thee to abhorre such a sinne more then death? Was not thy Justice wont to D punish this sinne with no lesse then death? Did not thy very calling call thee to a protection and preservation of Justice, of Chastity in thy subjects? Didst thou want store of Wives of thine owne? Wert thou restrayned from taking more? Was there no beauty in Israel, but in a Subjects Marriage bed? Wert thou over-come by the vehement solicitations of an Adultéresse? Wert thou not the tempter, the Prosecutor of this uncleanesse? I should accuse thee deeply, if thou hadst not accused thy selfe; Nothing wanted to greaten thy sinne, or our wonder, and feare. O God, whither do we goe if thou stay us not? Who ever amongst the millions of thy Servants could finde himselfe furnished with stronger preservatives against sinne? Against whom could such a sinne finde lesse pretence of prevailing? Oh keep thou E us that presumptuous sinnes prevaile not over us; So onely shall we be free from great offences.

The suits of Kings are Imperative; Ambition did now prove a Bawd to Lust, Bathsheba yeeldeth to offend God, to dishonour her Husband, to clog and wound her owne Soule, to abuse her body: Dishonesty growes bold, when it is countenanced with greatnesse. Eminent persons had need be carefull of their demands; they sin by authority, that are sollicited by the mighty.

Had Bathsheba been mindfull of her Matrimoniall fidelity, perhaps, David had been soone checked in his inordinate desire; her facility furthers the sinne. The first motioner of evill is most faulty; but as in quarrels, so in offences, the second blow (which is the consent) makes the fray. Good Ioseph was moved to folly by his great and beautifull Mistris, this fire fell upon wet Tinder, and therefore soone went out.

Sinne

Sin is not acted alone; if but one party be wise, both escape. It is no excuse to say I was tempted, though by the great, though by the holy and learned; Almost all sinners are mis-led by that transformed Angell of light; The action is that we must regard, not the person; Let the mover be never so glorious, if he stirre us to evill, he must be entertained with defiance.

The GOD that knowes how to raise good out of evill, blesses an adulterous copulation with that encrease, which he denies to the chaste imbracements of honest Wedlock: Bathsheba hath conceived by David; and now at once conceives a sorrow and care how to smother the shame of her Conception; He that did the fact, must hide it.

Oh David, where is thy Repentance? Where is thy tenderness and compunction of heart? Where are those holy Meditations, which had wont to take up thy Soule? Alas, in stead of clearing thy sinne, thou labourest to cloake it; and spendest those thoughts in the concealing of thy wickednesse, which thou shouldest rather have bestowed in preventing it: The best of Gods children may not only be drenched in the waves of sin, but lye in them for the time, and perhaps sinke twice to the bottome; What hypocrite could have done worse, then study how to cover the face of his sin from the eyes of men, whiles he regarded not the sting of sin in his Soule?

As there are some acts, wherein the Hypocrite is a Saint, so there are some, wherein the greatest Saint upon Earth may be an Hypocrite; Saul did thus goe about to colour his sin, and is curst; The vessels of Mercy and Wrath, are not ever distinguishable by their actions. He makes the difference that will have mercy on whom he will, and whom he will, he hardeneth.

It is rare and hard to commit a single sinne; David hath abused the Wife of Vriah, now hee would abuse his person in causing him to father a false seed: That worthy Hittite is sent for from the Wars; and now after some cunning, and farre fetcht Questions, is dismissed to his house, not without a present of favour; David could not but imagine, that the beauty of his Bathsheba, must needs bee attractive enough to an Husband, whom long absence in Warres, had with-held all that while from so pleasing a Bed; neither could hee think, that since that face, and those breasts had power to allure himselfe to an unlawfull lust, it could be possible, that Vriah should not be invited by them, to an allowed and warrantable fruition.

That Davids heart might now the rather strike him, in comparing the chaste resolutions of his Servant, with his owne light incontinence; good Vriah sleeps at the doore of the Kings Palace, making choyce of a stonie Pillow, under the Canopy of Heaven, rather then the delicate Bed of her, whom he thought as honest, as he knew faire. The Arke (saith he) and Israel, and Iudah, dwell in Tents, and my Lord Ioab, and the Servants of my Lord, abide in the open Fields, shall I then go into my house to eate, and drink, and lye with my Wife? by thy life, and by the life of thy soule, I will not doe this thing.

Who can but be astonished at this change, to see a Souldier austere, and a Prophet wanton? And how doth that Souldiers austerity, shame the Prophets wantonnesse? Oh zealous and mortified Soul, worthy of a more faithfull Wife, of a more just Master, how didst thou over-look all base sensuality, and hatedst to be happy alone? Warre and Lust had wont to be reputed friends; thy brest is not more full of courage then chastity, and is so far from wandring after forbidden pleasures, that it refuseth lawfull.

There is a time to laugh and a time to mourne; a time to embrace, and a time to bee farre from embracing; even the best actions are not alwaies seasonable, much lesse the indifferent: Hee that ever takes liberty to doe what hee may, shall offend no lesse, then he that sometimes takes liberty to doe what he may not.

If any thing, the Arke of GOD is fittest to leade our tunes, according as that is eyther distressed, or prospereth, should we frame our mirth or mourning. To dwell

A dwell in seeled Houses, whiles the Temple lyes waste, is the ground of Gods just quarrell.

How shall we sing a Song of the Lord in a strange Land; if I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roofe of my mouth; yea, if I preferre not Hierusalem to my chiefe joy.

As every man is a limb of the Community, so must he be affected with the estate of the universall body, whether healthfull, or languishing; It did not more aggravate Davids sin, that whiles the Arke and Israel was in hazard and distresse, he could finde time to loose the reines to wanton desires, and actions, then it magnifies the religious zeale of Vriah, that he abandons comfort, till he see the Ark and Israel
B victorious.

Common dangers, or calamities must (like the rapt motion) carry our hearts contrary to the wayes of our private occasions. Hee that cannot be moved with words, shall be tryed with Wine: Vriah had equally protested against feasting at home, and society with his Wife; To the one, the authority of a King forceth him abroad, in hope that the excesse thereof shall force him to the other: It is like, that holy Captaine intended onely to yeeld so much obedience, as might consist with his course of austerity. But Wine is a mocker, when it goes plausibly in, no man can imagine how it will rage and tyrannize; he that receives that Traytor within his gates, shall too late complaine of surprizall. Like unto that ill spirit, it insinuates sweetly, but in the end it bites like a Serpent, and hurts like a Cockatrice. Even
C good Vriah is made drunk; the holiest soule may be overtaken; it is hard gain-saying, where a King begins an health to a subject; Where, oh where, will this wickednesse end? David will now procure the sinne of another, to hide his owne; Vriahs drunkennesse is more Davids offence, then his. It is weakly yeelded to of the one, which was wilfully intended of the other. The one was as the Sinner, the other as the Tempter.

Had not David knowne, that Wine was an inducement to Lust, hee had spared those superfluous Cups. Experience had taught him, that the eye debauched with Wine, will look upon strange women: The Drunkard may be any thing, save good. Yet in this the ayme failed; Grace is stronger then Wine: Whiles that withholds, in vaine shall the fury of the Grape attempt to carry Vriah to his owne Bed.
D Sober David is now worse then drunken Vriah. Had not the King of Israel been more intoxicate with sinne, then Vriah with drinke, he had not in a sober intemperance climbed up into that Bed, which the drunken temperance of Vriah refused.

If David had been but himself, how had he loved, how had he honoured this honest and religious zeale, in his so faithfull Servant; whom now he cruelly seekes to reward with death? That fact which Wine cannot hide, the Sword shall; Vriah shall beare his owne Mittimus unto Ioab; Put ye Vriah in the fore-front of the strength of the Battle, and recule back from him, that he may be smitten, and die. What is become of thee, O thou good spirit, that hadst wont to guide thy chosen Servant in his former wayes? Is not this the man, whom we lately saw so heart-smitten, for but cutting off
E the lap of the Garment of a wicked Master, that is now thus lavish of the bloud of a gracious and wel-deserving Servant? Could it be likely, that so worthy a Captain could fall alone? Could David have expiated this sin with his own bloud, it had beene but well spent; but to cover his sin with the innocent bloud of others, was a crime above astonishment.

Oh the deep deceitfulnesse of sinne! If the Devill should have come to David in the most lovely form of Bathsheba her self, and at the first should have directly and in plain termes, solicited him to murder his best Servant; I doubt not but he would have spat scorn in that face, on which he should otherwise have doted; now, by many cunning windings, Satan rises up to that tentation, and privailes: that shall be done for a colour of guiltinesse, whereof the soule would have hated to be immediately guilty: Even those, that finde a just horror, in leaping downe from some high Tower, yet may be perſwaded to deſcend by ſtayres to the bottome. Hee knowes not where he ſhall ſtay, that hath willingly ſlipt into a knowne wickednesse. A

How many doth an eminent offender draw with him into evill? It could not be, but that divers of the Attendants both of David and Bathſheba muſt be conſcious to that adultery: Great mens ſins are ſeldome ſecret; And now Ioab muſt be fetcht in, as accessary to the murder: How muſt this example needs harden Ioab againſt the conſcience of Abners bloud? whiles he cannot but think, David cannot avenge that in me, which he acteth himſelfe.

Honour is pretended to poore Vriah, death is meant. This man was one of the Worthies of David; their courage ſought glory in the difficulteſt exploits. That reputation had never beene purchaſed without attempts of equall danger; Had not the Leader and Followers of Vriah been more treacherous, then his Enemies were ſtrong, he had come off with Victory; Now he was not the firſt or laſt that periſhed by his friends. David hath forgotten, that himſelfe was in like ſort betrayed in his Maſters intention, upon the dowry of the Philiſtims fore-skins. I feare to aske, Who ever noted ſo foule a plot in Davids rejected Predeceſſor; Vriah muſt be the Meſſenger of his owne death, Ioab muſt bee a Traytor to his friend, the hoſt of God muſt ſhamefully turne their backs upon the Ammonites; all that Iſraelitiſh bloud muſt be ſhed, that murder muſt be ſeconded with diſſimulation, and all this to hide one adultery. O God, thou hadſt never ſuffered ſo deare a Favourite of thine to fall ſo fearfully, if thou hadſt not meant to make him an univerſall example to Mankinde of not preſuming, of not deſpairing: How can we preſume of not ſinning, or deſpaire for ſinning, when we finde ſo great a Saint thus fallen, thus riſen? B C

Nathan and David.

2 Sam. 12.

YEt Bathſheba mourned for the death of that Husband, whom ſhe had been drawne to diſhonour: How could ſhe beſtow teares enough upon that Funerall, whereof her ſin was the cauſe? If ſhe had but a ſuſpition of the plot of his death, the Fountaines of her eyes could not yeeld water enough to waſh off her Husbands bloud; Her ſin was more worthy of ſorrow, then her loſſe. If this griefe had been right placed, the hope of hiding her ſhame and the ambition to be a Queen had not ſo ſoone mitigated it; neither had ſhe upon any termes been drawn into the Bed of her husbands murtherer. Every gleame of earthly comfort can dry up the teares of worldly ſorrow. Bathſheba hath ſoon loſt her griefe at the Court; The remembrance of an Husband is buryed in the jollity and ſtate of a Princeſſe. David ſecurely enjoyes his ill-purchaſed love, and is content to exchange the conſcience of his ſinne, for the ſenſe of his pleaſure. But the juſt and holy God will not put it up ſo: he that hates ſinne ſo much the more, as the offender is more deare to him, will let David feele the bruiſe of his fall. If Gods beſt children have been ſometimes ſuffered to ſleep in a ſin, at laſt he hath awakened them in a fright. D

David was a Prophet of God, and yet he hath not only ſtept into thoſe foule ſins, but ſojournes with them; If any profeſſion or ſtate of life could have priviledged from ſinne; the Angels had not ſinned in Heaven, nor man in Paradiſe. Nathan the Prophet is ſent to the Prophet David, for reproofe, for conviction; Had it been any other mans caſe, none could have been more quick-ſighted then the Princely Prophet; in his owne he is ſo blinde, that God is faine to lend him others eyes. Even the Phyſitian himſelfe when he is ſick, ſends for the counſell of thoſe whom his health did mutually ayd with advice. Let no man think himſelf too good to learne: Teachers themſelves may be taught that in their owne particular, which in a generality they have often taught others; It is not onely ignorance that is to be removed, but miſ-affection. E

Who can preſcribe a juſt period to the beſt mans repentance? About ten moneths

A neths are passed since Davids sinne: in all which time I finde no newes of any serious compunction; It could not be, but some glances of remorse must needs have passed through his Soule long ere this; but a due and solemne contrition was not heard of, till Nathans message; and perhaps had been further adjourned, if that Monitor had been longer deferred; Alas, what long and dead sleepes may the holiest Soule take in fearfull sinnes! Were it not for thy mercy, O God, the best of us should end our spirituall Lethargy in sleepe of death.

It might have pleased God as easily to have sent Nathan to check David in his first purpose of sinning; So had his eyes beene restrained, Bathsheba honest, Vriah a live with honour; now the wisdome of the Almighty knew how to win more glory by the permission of so foule an evill, than by the prevention; yea, he knew how B by the permission of one sinne, to prevent millions; how many thousand had sinned in a vaine presumption on their own strength, if David had not thus offended? how many thousand had despaired in the conscience of their owne weaknesses, if these horrible sinnes had not received forgivenesse? It is happy for all times that we have so holy a Sinner, so sinfull a penitent. It matters not how bitter the Pill is, but how well wrapped; so cunningly hath Nathan conveyed this dose, that it begins to worke ere it be tasted: there is no one thing wherein is more use of wisedome, than the due contriving of reprehension, which in a discreet delivery helps the disease; in an unwise, destroyes Nature.

Had not Nathan beene used to the possession of Davids eare, this complaint had beene suspected. It well beseemes a King to take information by a Prophet. Whiles
C wise Nathan was querulously discoursing of the cruell rich man, that had forcibly taken away the only Lamb of his poor Neighbour, how willingly doth David listen to the Storie, and how sharply (even above law) doth he censure the fact? (As the Lord liveth, the man that hath doth this thing shall surely dye.) Full little did he thinke that he had pronounced sentence against himselfe; It had not beene so heavy if hee had knowne on whom it should have light; We have open eares and quick tongues to the vices of others; How severe Justicers wee can be to our very owne crimes in others persons? How flattering Parasites to anothers crime in our selves? The life of doctrine is in application; Nathan might have bin long enough in his narration, in his invective, ere David would have bin touched with his owne guiltinesse: but now that the Prophet brings the Word home to his bosome, he cannot but be affected. We D may take pleasure, to heare men speake in the Clouds, we never take profit till wee finde a propriety in the exhortation, or reproof; There was not more cunning in the Parable, than courage in the application (Thou art the man.) If David be a King, hee may not look, not to hear of his faults; Gods messages may be no other than unpartiall. It is a trecherous flattery in divine errands to regard greatnesse: If Prophets must be mannerly in the forme, yet in the matter of reproofe, resolute: The words are not their own; They are but the Heralds of the King of Heaven, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel.

How thunder-stricken doe we think David did now stand? How did the change of his colour bewray the confusion in his Soule; whiles his conscience said the same within, which the Prophet sounded in his eare? And now lest ought should be wan-E ting to his humiliation, all Gods former favours shall be laid before his eyes, by way of exprobration: He is worthy to be upbraided with mercies, that hath abused mercies unto wantonnesse; whiles we doe well, God gives and sayes nothing; when we doe ill, he layes his benefits in our dish, and casts them in our teeth, that our shame may be so much the more, by how much our obligations have beene greater. The blessings of God in our unworthy cariage, prove but the aggravations of sin, and additions to judgement.

I see all Gods children falling into sinne, some of them lying in sinne; none of them maintaining their sinne; David cannot have the heart, or the face to stand out against the message of God, but now as a man confounded, and condemned in himselfe, he cryes out in the bitternesse of a wounded Soule, (I have sinned against the Lord.) It was a short word, but passionate; and such as came from the bottome of a contrite heart; The greateſt griefes are not moſt verball: Saul confeſſed his ſin more largely, leſſe effectually; God cares not for phraſes, but for affections. The firſt piece of our amends to God for ſinning, is the acknowledgement of ſinne; He can doe little that in a juſt offence cannot accuſe himſelfe. If wee cannot be ſo good as we would, it is reaſon we ſhould doe God ſo much right, as to ſay, how evill we are. And why was not this done ſooner? It is ſtrange to ſee how eaſily ſin gets into the heart, how hardly it gets out of the mouth; Is it becauſe ſinne, like unto Satan, where it hath got poſſeſſion is deſirous to hold it; and knowes that it is fully ejected by a free confeſſion? or, becauſe in a guiltineſſe of deformity, it hides it ſelfe in the breſt where it is once entertained, and hates the light? or, becauſe the tongue is ſo fee'd with ſelfe-love, that it is loath to bee drawne unto any verdict againſt the heart or hands? or, is it out of an idle miſpriſion of ſhame, which whiles it ſhould be placed in offending, is miſplaced in diſcloſing of our offence? A B

However, ſure I am, that God hath need even of rackes to draw out confeſſions; and ſcarce in death it ſelfe, are we wrought to a diſcovery of our errours.

There is no one thing, wherein our folly ſhewes it ſelfe more than in theſe hurtfull concealments: Contrary to the proceedings of humane Juſtice, it is with God, Confeſſe and live; no ſooner can David ſay, I have ſinned, than Nathan inferres; The Lord alſo hath put away thy ſinne. He that hides his ſins ſhall not proſper, but he that confeſſeth and forſaketh them, ſhall finde mercy. Who would not accuſe himſelfe to be acquitted of God? O God, who would not tell his wickedneſſe to thee, that knoweſt it better than his owne heart, that his heart may bee eaſed of that wickedneſſe, which being not told, killeth? Since we have ſinned, why ſhould we be niggardly of that action, wherein wee may at once give glory to thee, and reliefe to our ſoules? C

David had ſworne in a zeale of Juſtice, that the rich Oppreſſor, for but taking his poore Neighbours Lambe, ſhould dye the death: God, by Nathan is more favourable to David, than to take him at his word: Thou ſhalt not dye: O the marvellous power of repentance! Beſides adultery, David had ſhed the blood of innocent Vriah: The ſtrict Law was Eye for Eye, Tooth for Tooth; He that ſmiteth with the Sword, ſhall periſh with the Sword: Yet as if a penitent confeſſion had diſpenſed with the rigour of juſtice, now God ſayes, Thou ſhalt not dye. David was the voice of the Law awarding death unto ſinne: Nathan was the voice of the Goſpel, awarding life unto the repentance for ſinne. Whatſoever the ſore be, never any ſoule applyed this remedie, and died; never any ſoule eſcaped death, that applyed it not. D

David himſelfe ſhall not dye for this fact: but his miſ-begotten childe ſhall dye for him; He that ſaid, The Lord hath put away thy ſinne, yet ſaid alſo, The ſword ſhall not depart from thine houſe.

The ſame mouth, with one breath, pronounces the ſentence both of Abſolution, and Death; Abſolution to the Perſon, Death to the Iſſue. Pardon may well ſtand with temporall afflictions. Where God hath forgiven, though he doth not puniſh, yet he may chaſtiſe, and that unto blood; neither doth he alwayes forbeare correction, where he remits revenge. So long as he ſmites us not as an angry Judge, we may endure to ſmart from him, as a loving Father.

Yet even this Rod did David deprecate with teares: How faine would he ſhake off ſo eaſie a load? The Childe is ſtricken; the Father faſts and prayes, and weepes, and lyes all night upon the earth, and abhorres the noiſe of comfort. That Childe, which was the fruit and monument of his odious adultery, whom he could never have looked upon without recognition of his ſinne, in whoſe face he could not but have ſtill read the records of his owne ſhame, is thus mourned for, thus ſued for; It is eaſie to obſerve that good man over-paſſionately affected to his Children. Who would not have thought, that David might have held himſelfe well appayd, that his ſoule eſcaped an eternall death, his body a violent, though God ſhould puniſh his ſinne, in that Childe, in whom he ſinned? yet even againſt this croſſe hee bends his Prayers, as if nothing had beene forgiven him. There is no Childe that would be ſcourged if he might eſcape for crying: No affliction is for the time o- E ther

A ther then grievous; neither is therefore yeelded unto, without ſome kind of reluctation. Far yet was it from the heart of David, to make any oppoſition to the will of God; he ſued, he ſtruggled not; There is no impatience in intreaties; He well knew, that the threats of temporall evils, ran commonly with a ſecret condition, and therefore might perhaps be avoided by humble importunity: if any means under Heaven can avert judgements, it is our Prayers.

God could not chuſe but like well the boldneſſe of Davids faith, who after the apprehenſion of ſo heavy a diſpleaſure, is ſo far from doubting of the forgiveneſſe of his ſin, that he dares become a Sutor unto God for his ſick childe. Sin doth not make us more ſtrange, then Faith confident.

But, it is not in the power of the ſtrongeſt Faith, to preſerve us from all afflictions;
B After all Davids prayers and tears, the Childe muſt dye. The carefull ſervants dare but whiſper this ſad news: They who had found their Maſter ſo averſe from the motion of comfort, in the ſickneſſe of the Childe, feared him uncapable of comfort in his death.

Suſpition is quick-witted; Every occaſion makes us miſdoubt that event, which we fear; This ſecrecy proclaims, that which they were ſo loath to utter; David perceives his Childe dead, and now he riſes up from the earth whereon he lay, and waſhes himſelf, and changeth his apparell, and goes firſt into Gods houſe to worſhip, and into his own to eat; now he refuſes no comfort, who before would take none; The iſſue of things doth more fully ſhew the will of God, then the prediction; God never did any thing, but what he would; he hath ſometimes foretold
C that for tryall, which his ſecret will intended not; he would foretell it, he would not effect it, becauſe he would therefore foretell it, that he might not effect it; His predictions of outward evils are not always abſolute, his actions are; David well ſees by the event, what the Decree of God was, concerning his Childe; which now he could not ſtrive againſt, without a vain impatience; Till we know the determinations of the Almighty, it is free for us to ſtrive in our prayers, to ſtrive with him, not againſt him; when once we know them, it is our duty to ſit down in a ſilent contentation.

(Whiles the Childe was yet alive, I faſted and wept, for I ſaid, who can tell whether the Lord will be gracious to me, that the Childe may live; but now he is dead, Wherefore ſhould I faſt? Can I bring him back again?)

D The grief that goes before an evill for remedy, can hardly be too much; but that which followes an evill, paſt remedy, cannot be too little: Even in the ſaddeſt accident, Death, we may yeeld ſomething to nature, nothing to impatience: immoderation of ſorrow, for loſſes paſt hope of recovery, is more ſullen, then uſefull; our ſtomack may be bewrayed by it, not our wiſdome.

Amnon and Tamar.

E IT is not poſſible that any word of God ſhould fall to the ground: 2 Sam. 12. 13
David is not more ſure of forgiveneſſe, then ſmart: Three main ſins paſſed him in this buſineſſe of Vriah; Adultery, Murder, Diſſimulation: for all which he receives preſent payment; for Adultery, in the deflowring of his Daughter Tamar; for Murder in the killing of his Son Amnon, for Diſſimulation, in the contriving of both. Yet all this was but the beginning of evils. Where the Father of the Family brings ſin home to the houſe, it is not eaſily ſwept out: Unlawfull Luſt propagates it ſelfe by example; How juſtly is David ſcourged by the ſin of his Sons, whom his Act taught to offend?

Maacha was the Daughter of an Heatheniſh King; By her; had David that beautifull, but unhappy Iſſue, Abſalom, and his no leſſe fair Siſter, Tamar: Perhaps, thus late doth David feel the puniſhment of that unfit choyce: I ſhould have marvelled, if ſo holy a man had not found croſſes in ſo unequall a match, either in his perſon, or at leaſt in his ſeed. A Beauty, if it be not well diſciplined, proves not a Friend, but a Traytor; three of Davids Children are undone by it at once, What elſe was guilty of Amnons inceſtuous love, Tamars raviſhment, Abſaloms pride? It is a bleſſing to be fair, yet ſuch a bleſſing, as if the ſoul anſwer not to the face, may lead to a curſe; How commonly have we ſeen the fouleſt ſoule dwell faireſt? It was no fault of Tamars that ſhe was beautifull; the Candle offends not in burning, the fooliſh flye offends in ſcorching it ſelf in the flame, yet it is no ſmall miſery to become a tentation unto another, and to be made but the occaſion of others ruine. Amnon is love-ſick of his ſiſter Tamar, and languiſhes of that unnaturall heat. Whither will not wanton luſt carry the inordinate minds of pampered and ungoverned youths? None but his half-ſiſter, will B pleaſe the eies of the young Prince of Iſrael: Ordinary pleaſures will not content thoſe whom the conceit of greatneſſe, youth, and eaſe, have let looſe to their appetite.

Perhaps yet, this unkindly flame, might in time, have gone out alone, had not there been a Ionadab, to blow theſe coales with ill counſell. It were ſtrange if great Princes ſhould want ſome Paraſiticall Followers, that are ready to feed their ill humors. Why art thou, the Kings ſon, ſo lean from day to day? As if it were unworthy the Heir of a King, to ſuffer either Law, or Conſcience, to ſtand in the way of his deſires: Wheras wiſe Princes know well, that their places give them no priviledge of ſinning but call them in rather to ſo much more ſtrictneſſe, as their example may be more prejudiciall.

Ionadab was the Couſin German of Amnon: Ill advice is ſo much more dangerous as the intereſt of the giver is more; Had he been a true friend, he had bent all the forces of his diſſwaſion, againſt the wicked motions of that ſinfull luſt; and had ſhewed the Prince of Iſrael how much thoſe lewd deſires provoked God, and blemiſhed himſelf; and had lent his hand to ſtrangle them in their firſt conception. There cannot be a more worthy improvement of friendſhip, then in a fervent oppoſition to the ſins of them, whom we profeſſe to love: No enemy can be ſo mortall to great Princes, as thoſe officious Clients, whoſe flattery ſooths them up in wickedneſſe: Theſe are Traytors to the Soul, and by a pleaſing violence kill the beſt part eternally.

How ready at hand is an evill ſuggeſtion? Good counſell is like unto Wel-water, that muſt be drawn up with a Pump, or Bucket; Ill counſell is like to Conduit-water; which if the cock be but turned, runs out alone; Ionadab hath ſoon projected how Amnon ſhall accompliſh his lawleſſe purpoſe. The way muſt be to fain himſelf ſick in body, whoſe mind was ſick of luſt; and under this pretence to procure the preſence of her, who had wounded, and only might cure him. D

The daily increaſing languor, and leanneſſe, and paleneſſe of love-ſick Amnon might well give colour to a Kerchiefe, and a pallet. Now is it ſoon told David that his eldeſt Son is caſt upon his ſick bed; there needs no ſuit for his viſitation; The carefull Father haſtens to his bed-ſide, not without doubts and fears: He that was lately ſo afflicted with the ſickneſſe of a Child that ſcarce lived to ſee the light, how ſenſible muſt we needs think he would be, of the indiſpoſition of his firſt-born Son, in the prime of his age and hopes? It is not given to any Prophet to fore-ſee all things. Happy had it been for David, if Amnon had been truly ſick, and ſick unto death; yet who could have perſwaded this paſſionate Father to have been content with this ſucceſſion of loſſes, this early loſſe of his Succeſſor: How glad is he to hear, that his Daughter Tamars skill might be likely to fit the dyet of ſo dear a patient. Conceit is wont to rule much both in ſickneſſe and in the cure. Tamar is ſent by her Father to the houſe of Amnon; Her hand only muſt dreſſe that Diſh, which may pleaſe the nice Palate of her ſick Brother. Even the Children of Kings, in thoſe homelyer Times, did not ſcorn to put their fingers, to ſome works of huſwifery: (She took floure and did knead it, and did make Cakes in his ſight, and did bake the Cakes, and took a Pan, and powred them out before him.) Had ſhee not E

A been sometimes used to such domestique imployments, shee had been now to seek; neither had this been required of her, but upon the knowledge of her skill: Shee doth not plead the impairing of her beauty by the scorching of the fire; nor thinks her hand too dainty for such mean services, but settles to the work, as one that had rather regard the necessities of her Brother, then her own state: Only pride and idlenesse hath banisht honest and thrifty diligence, out of the houses of the great.

This was not yet the Dish that Amnon longed for. It was the Cook, and not the Cates which that wanton eye affected. Unlawfull Acts seek for secrecy; The company is dismissed, Tamar only stayes; Good meaning suspects nothing; Whiles she presents the meat she had prepared, to her sick Brother, her self is made a prey
B to his outragious Lust. The modest Virgin intreats, and perswades in vain; shee layes before him the sin, the shame, the danger of the fact; and since none of these can prevail, fain would winne time by the suggesting of unpossible hopes; Nothing but violence can stay a resolved sinner; What he cannot by intreaty, he will have by force. If the Devill were not more strong in men, then nature, they would never seek pleasure in violence. Amnon hath no sooner fulfilled his beastly desires, then he hates Tamar more then he loved her. Inordinate lust never ends but in discontentment; Losse of spirits, and remorse of soul make the remembrance of that Act tedious, whose expectation promised delight. If we could see the back of sinfull pleasures, ere we behold their face, our hearts could not but be fore-stalled with a just detestation. Brutish Amnon, it was thy self whom thou shouldest have hated
C for this villany, not thine innocent sister; Both of you lay together, only one committed incest: What was she but a patient in that impotent fury of lust? How unjustly doe carnall men mis-place their affections? No man can say whether that love, or this hatred were more unreasonable: Fraud drew Tamar into the house of Amnon, force entertained her within, and drove her out. Fain would she have hid her shame where it was wrought, and may not be allowed it: That roofe under which she came with honour, and in obedience and love, may not be lent her for the time as a shelter of her ignominy. Never any savage could be more barbarous: Sechem had ravished Dinah, his offence did not make her odious; his affection so continued, that he is willing rather to draw bloud of himself and his people, then forgoe her whom he had abused; Amnon in one houre is in the excesse of love and
D hate; and is sick of her, for whom he was sick: Shee that lately kept the keyes of his heart, is now lockt out of his doors. Unruly passions runne ever into extremities, and are then best appayed, when they are furthest off from reason and moderation.

What could Amnon think, would be the event of so foul a fact, which as he had not the grace to prevent, so he hath not the care to conceal? If he lookt not so high as Heaven, what could he imagine would follow hereupon, but the displeasure of a Father, the danger of Law, the indignation of a Brother, the shame and outcryes of the World; All which he might have hoped to avoid by secresie, and plausible courses of satisfaction. It is the just judgement of God upon presumptuous offenders, that they lose their wit, together with their honesty; and are either so blin-
E ded, that they cannot fore-see the issue of their actions, or so besotted that they doe not regard it.

Poor Tamar can but bewail that which she could not keep, her Virginity, not lost, but torn from her by a cruell violence: She rends her Princely robe, and laid ashes on her head, and laments the shame of anothers sin; and lives more desolate then a widow, in the house of her brother Absalom.

In the mean time, what a corrosive must this news needs be to the heart of good David, whose fatherly command had out of love, cast his Daughter into the jaws of this Lion? What an insolent affront must he needs construe this, to be offered by a Son to a Father; that the Father should be made the Pander of his own Daughter to his Son? He that lay upon the ground weeping for, but the sicknesse of an Infant, how vexed doe we think he was with the villany of his Heir, with the ravishment of his

his Daughter, both of them worse then many deaths? What revenge can he think of for so hainous a crime lesse then death; & what lesse then death is it to him, to think of a revenge? Rape was by the Law of God, capitall; how much more, when it is seconded with incest? Anger was not punishment enough for so high an offence; Yet this is all that I hear of, from so indulgent a Father, saving that he makes up the rest with sorrow, punishing his Sons out-rage in himself; The better natured, and more gracious a man is, the more subject he is to the danger of an over-remisseness, & the excesse of favour and mercy: The milde injustice is no lesse perilous to the Common-wealth then the cruell.

If David (perhaps out of the conscience of his own late offence) will not punish this fact, his son Absalom shall: not out of any care of Justice, but in a desire of revenge. Two whole years, hath this slye Courtier smothered his indignation, and fained kindnesse; else his invitation of Amnon in speciall, had been suspected. Even gallant Absalom was a great Sheep-master; The bravery and magnificence of a Courtier must be built upon the grounds of frugality; David himselfe is bidden to this bloody Sheep-shearing; It was no otherwise meant, but that the Fathers eyes should be the witnesses of the Tragicall execution of one Son by another; Only Davids love kept him from that horrible spectacle. He is carefull not to be chargeable to that Son who cares not to overcharge his Fathers stomack with a Feast of Blood.

Amnon hath so quite forgot his sin, that he dares goe to feast in that house where Tamar was mourning; and suspects not the kindnesse of him whom he had deserved, of a Brother to make an enemy; nothing is more unsafe to be trusted, then the fair looks of a festred heart: Where true Charity or just satisfaction, have not wrought a sound reconciliation, malice doth but lurk for the opportunity of an advantage.

It was not for nothing that Absalom deferred his revenge; which is now so much more exquisite, as it is longer protracted: What could be more fearfull. then when Amnons heart was merry with Wine, to be suddenly stricken with death? As if this execution had been no lesse intended to the Soule, then to the body; How wickedly soever this was done by Absalom, yet how just was it with God, that he, who in two years impunity would finde no leisure of repentance, should now receive a punishment without possibility of Repentance?

O God, thou art righteous to reckon for those sinnes, which humane partiality or negligence hath omitted, and while thou punishest sin with sin, to punish sin with death; If either David had called Amnon to account for this villany, or Amnon had called himselfe, the revenge had not been so desperate; Happy is the man that by an unfained Repentance acquits his soul from his known evils, and improves the days of his peace to the prevention of future vengeance; which if it be not done, the hand of God shall as surely overtake us in judgement, as the hand of Satan hath overtaken us in miscariage unto sin.

Absaloms return and conspiracie.

2 Sam. 14, 15

ONE Act of injustice draws on another; The injustice of David, in not punishing the rape of Amnon, procures the injustice of Absalom in punishing Amnon with murder: That which the Father should have justly revenged, and did not; the Sonne revenges unjustly. The rape of a Sister was no lesse worthy of death then the Murder of a Brother; Yea, this latter sin was therefore the lesse, because that brother was worthy of death, though by another hand; whereas that Sister was guilty of nothing but modest beauty: yet he that knew this Rape passed over (two whole years) with impunity, dares not trust the mercy of a Father, in the pardon of his Murder; but for three years hides his head in the Court of his Grand-father, the King of Gesshur. Doubtlesse, that Heathenish Prince gave him a kind welcome, for so meritorious a revenge of the dishonour done to his own loyns.

No

A No man can tell, how Abſalom ſhould have ſped from the hands of his otherwiſe over-indulgent Father, if he had been apprehended in the heat of the fact. Even the largeſt love may be over-ſtrained, and may give a fall in the breaking; Theſe fearfull effects of lenity, might perhaps have whetted the ſeverity of David to ſhut up theſe out-rages in blood; Now this diſpleaſure was weakned with age: Time and thoughts have digeſted this hard morſell; Davids heart told him, that his hands had a ſhare in this offence, that Abſalom did but give that ſtroke, which himſelfe had wrongfully forborn; that the unrecoverable loſſe of one Sonne, would be but wofully relieved with the loſſe of another; Hee therefore, that in the newes of the deceaſed Infant could change his clothes, and waſh himſelfe, and cheere up his ſpirits, with the reſolution of, I ſhall goe to him, he ſhall not returne to me, comforts himſelfe concerning
B Amnon; and begins to long for Abſalom.

Thoſe three yeares baniſhment ſeemed not ſo much a puniſhment to the Son, as to the Father; Now David begins to forgive himſelfe; yet out of his wiſedome, ſo inclines to favour, that he conceales it; and yet ſo conceales it, that it may be deſcryed by a cunning eie; If he had caſt out no glances of affection, there had bin no hopes for his Abſalom: If he had made profeſſion of love after ſo foule an act, there had bin no ſafety for others; now he lets fall ſo much ſecret grace, as may both hold up Abſalom in the life of his hopes; and not hearten the preſumption of others.

Good eyes ſee light thorow the ſmalleſt chinke; The wit of Ioab hath ſoone diſcerned Davids reſerved affection; and knowes how to ſerve him in that which he would, and would not accompliſh: and now deviſes how to bring into the light, that
C birth of Deſire, whereof he knew David was both big, and aſhamed. A woman of Tekoa, (that Sex hath been ever held more apt for wiles) is ſuborned to perſonate a mourner, and to ſay that, by way of Parable, which in plaine termes would have ſounded too harſhly; and now whiles ſhe lamentably layes forth the loſſe and danger of her Sonnes, ſhe ſhewes David his owne; and whiles ſhe moves compaſſion to her pretended Iſſue, ſhe winnes David to a pity of himſelfe, and a favourable ſentence for Abſalom. We love our ſelves better than others, but we ſee others better than our ſelves; who ſo would perfectly know his own caſe, let him view it in anothers perſon.

Parables ſped well with David; One drew him to repent of his owne ſinne: another, to remit Abſaloms puniſhment; And now, as glad to heare this Plea, and willing to be perſwaded unto that, which if he durſt, he would have ſought for; he gratifies
D Ioab with the grant of that ſuit, which Ioab more gratified him in ſuing for; Goe bring againe the young man Abſalom.

How glad is Ioab, that he hath light upon one Act, for which the Sunne, both ſetting and riſing, ſhould ſhine upon him? and now he ſpeeds to Geſhur, to fetch backe Abſalom to Jeruſalem: he may bring the long baniſhed Prince to the Citie; but to the Court he may not bring him. (Let him turne to his owne houſe, and let him not ſee my face.)

The good King hath ſo ſmarted with mercy, that now he is reſolved upon auſterity; and will relent but by degrees; It is enough for Abſalom that he lives, and may now breathe in his native ayre; Davids face is no object for the eyes of Murtherers: What a Dearling this Son was to his Father, appeares in that, after an unnaturall and
E barbarous rebellion, paſſionate David wiſhes to have changed lives with him; yet now, whiles his bowels yearned, his brow frowned; The face may not be ſeene, where the heart is ſet.

The beſt of Gods Saints may be blinded with affection; but when they ſhall once ſee their errors, they are carefull to correct them. Wherefore ſerves the power of Grace, but to ſubdue the inſolencies of nature? It is the wiſedome of Parents, as to hide their hearts from their beſt children, ſo to hide their countenances from the ungracious: Fleſhly reſpects may not abate their rigour to the ill deſerving. For the Child to ſee all his Fathers love, it is enough to make him wanton, and of wanton wicked: For a wicked Child, to ſee any of his Fathers love, it emboldens him in evill, and drawes on others.

Abſaloms houſe is made his Priſon; Juſtly is he confined to the place which hee had had ſtained with blood. Two yeares doth he live in Jeruſalem, without the happineſſe of his fathers ſight; It was enough for David and him to ſee the ſmoke of each others Chimnies. In the meane time, how impatient is Abſalom of this abſence? He ſends for Ioab, the Soliciter of his returne; So hard an hand, doth wiſe and holy David carry over his reduced Sonne, that his friendly Interceſſor, Ioab, dares not viſit him.

He, that afterwards kindled that ſeditious fire over all Iſrael, ſets fire now on the field of Ioab; whom love cannot draw to him, feare and anger ſhall; Continued diſpleaſure hath made Abſalom deſperate; Five yeares are paſſed ſince he ſaw the face of his Father; and now is he no leſſe weary of his life, than of this delay; (Wherefore am I come downe from Geſhur? It had beene better for me, to have beene there ſtill: Now therefore let me ſee the Kings face, and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill me.) Either baniſhment, or death, ſeemed as tolerable to him, as the debarring of his Fathers ſight.

What a torment ſhall it be to the wicked, to be ſhut out for ever, from the preſence of a God, without all poſſible hopes of recovery? This was but a Father of the fleſh, by whom, if Abſalom lived at firſt, yet in him he lived not, yea, not without him onely, but againſt him that Son found he could live; God is the Father of Spirits, in whom we ſo live, that without him can be no life, no being; to be ever excluded from him, in whom we live and are, what can it be but an eternall dying, an eternall periſhing? If in thy preſence, O God, be the fulneſſe of joy, in thine abſence, muſt needs be the fulneſſe of horror and torment; Hide not thy face from us, O Lord, but ſhew us the light of thy countenance, that we may live, and praiſe thee.

Even the fire of Ioabs field, warmed the heart of David, whiles it gave him proofe of the heat of Abſaloms filiall affection. As a man therefore inwardly weary of ſo long diſpleaſure, at laſt he receives Abſalom to his ſight, to his favour; and ſeales his pardon with a kiſſe: Naturall parents know not how to retaine an everlaſting anger towards the fruit of their loynes; How much leſſe ſhall the God of mercies, bee unreconciliably diſpleaſed with his owne; and ſuffer his wrath to burne like fire that cannot be quenched? He will not alwayes chide, neither will he keepe his anger for ever; His wrath endureth but a moment, in his favour is life; weeping may endure for a Night, but joy commeth in the Morning.

Abſalom is now as great as faire; Beauty and Greatneſſe make him proud; Pride workes his ruine; Great ſpirits will not reſt content with a moderate proſperity: Ere two yeares be run out, Abſalom runnes out into a deſperate plot of rebellion; None but his owne Father was above him in Iſrael; None was ſo likely, in humane expectation, to ſucceed his Father; If his ambition could but have contained it ſelfe for a few yeares, (as David was now neere his period) dutifull cariage might have procured that by ſucceſſion, which now he ſought by force. An aſpiring minde is ever impatient, and holds Time it ſelfe an enemy, if it thruſt it ſelfe importunately betwixt the hopes and fruition: Ambition is never but in travell, and can finde no intermiſſion of painfull throwes, till ſhe have brought forth her abortive Deſires: How happy were we, if our affectation could be ſo eager of ſpirituall and heavenly promotions; Oh that my Soule could finde it ſelfe ſo reſtleſſe, till it feele the weight of that Crowne of Glory.

Outward pompe, and unwonted ſhewes of Magnificence, are wont much to affect the light mindes of the vulgar. Abſalom therefore to the incomparable comelineſſe of his perſon, addes the unuſuall ſtate of a more than Princely Equipage. His Charets rattle, and his Horſes trample proudly in the Streets; Fifty Foot-men run before their glittering Maſter: Jeruſalem rings of their glorious Prince; and is ready to adore theſe continuall Triumphs of Peace. Exceſſe & Novelty of expenſive Bravery and Oſtentation in publike perſons, gives juſt cauſe to ſuſpect either vanity, or a plot; True-hearted David can miſdoubt nothing in him, to whom he had both given life, and forgiven this. Love conſtrued all this, as meant to the honour of a Fathers Court, to the expreſſion of joy and thankfulneſſe for his reconcilement: The eyes & tongues of men are thus taken up: Now hath Abſalom laid ſnares for their hearts alſo:

He

A He riſes early, and ſtands beſide the way of the gate: Ambition is no niggard of her pains; ſeldome ever is good meaning ſo induſtrious; The more he ſhined in Beauty and Royall Attendance, ſo much more glory it was to neglect himſelf, and to prefer the care of Juſtice to his own caſe: Neither is Abſalom more painfull then plauſible; his eare is open to all Plaintives, all Petitioners: there is no cauſe which he flatters not, See, thy matters are good and right; his hand flatters every commer with a ſalutation, his lips with a kiſſe. All men, all matters are ſoothed ſaving the ſtate and government; the cenſure of that is no leſſe deep, then the applauſe of all others, (There is none deputed of the King to heare thee.) What inſinuations could be more powerfull? No Muſick can be ſo ſweet to the eares of the unſtable multitude, as to hear well of themſelves, ill of their Governours: Abſalom needs not to wiſh himſelf upon the Bench:
B Every man ſaies, Oh, what a curious Prince is Abſolom: What a juſt and carefull Ruler would Abſalom be? How happy were we, if we might be judged by Abſalom? Thoſe qualities which are wont ſingle to grace others, have conſpired to meet in Abſalom; Goodlineſſe of Perſon, Magnificence of State, gracious Affability, unwearied Diligence, Humility in Greatneſſe, feeling Pitty, love of Juſtice, care of the Commonwealth; The World hath not ſo compleat a Prince as Abſalom: Thus the hearts of the people are not won, but ſtoln by a cloſe Traytor from their lawfully Anointed Soveraign. Over-faire ſhewes are a juſt Argument of unſoundneſſe; no naturall Face hath ſo cleare a White and Red, as the painted: Nothing wants now but a cloak of Religion, to perfect the Treachery of that ungracious Son, who carried Peace in his Name, War, in his heart: and how eaſily is that put on? Abſalom hath an holy Vow
C to be paid in Hebron! The devout man had made it long ſince, whiles he was exiled in Syria, and now he haſts to perform it, (If the Lord ſhall bring me back again to Ieruſalem, then will I ſerve the Lord;) wicked Hypocrites care not to play with God, that they may mock men. The more deformed any act is, the fairer Viſor it ſtill ſeeketh.

How glad is the good old King, that he is bleſſed with ſo godly a Sonne; whom he diſmiſſeth laden with his cauſleſſe bleſſings? What truſt is there in fleſh and bloud, when David is not ſafe from his own Loynes? The Conſpiracy is now fully forged, there lacked nothing but this gilt of Piety to win favour and value in all eyes; and now it is a wonder, that but two hundred honeſt Citizens go up with Abſalom from Jeruſalem: The true-hearted lye moſt open to Credulity: How eaſie it is to beguile harmleſſe intentions? The name of Davids Sonne carries them againſt
D the Father of Abſalom, and now theſe ſimple Iſraelites, are unwittingly made loyall Rebels. Their hearts are free from a plot, and they meane nothing but fidelity in the attendance of a Traytor. How many thouſands are thus ignorantly miſled into the traine of Errour? Their ſimplicity is as worthy of pitty, as their miſguidance of indignation. Thoſe that will ſuffer themſelves to be carried with ſemblances of truth and Faithfulneſſe, muſt needs be as farre from ſafety, as innocence.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE AND TRVLY NOBLE LORD,

FRANCIS Lord RUSSEL, Baron of Thornhaugh, all increase of Honour and Happinesse.

RIGHT HONOURABLE,

You shall not need to impute it to any other reason besides your vertues, that I have presumed to shroud this peece of my Labours under your Noble Patronage. The world hath taken just notice how much the Gospell is graced by your reall profession; whom neither Honor hath made overlie, nor wealth lavish, nor charge miserable, nor greatnesse licentious Goe on happily in these safe and gainfull steps of goodnesse; and still honor the God that hath honoured you; In the mean time, accept from my unworthy hands these poore Meditations more high for their subject, then mean for their Author: Wherein Shimeies curses shall teach you how unable either greatnesse, or innocence is to beare off the blowes of ill tongues; & how basenes ever molds it self according to the advantage of times. Achitophels depth compared with his end shall shew how witlesse and insensate craft is, when it strives against honesty; and how justly are they forsaken of their reason, that have abandoned God; The blood of Absalom and Sheba proclaime the inevitable revenge of rebellion, which neither in woods nor walls can finde safetie. The late famine of Israel for the forgotten violence offered to the Gibeonites, ſhewes what note God takes of our oathes; and what ſure vengeance of their violation: Davids muſter ſeconded with the plague of Iſrael teaches, how highly God may be offended with ſinnes of the leaſt appearance, how ſevere to his owne, how merciſull to that ſeverity. If theſe my thoughts ſhall be approved beneficiall to any ſoule, I am rich. I ſhall vow my prayers to their ſucceſſe, and to the happineſſe of your honourable Family, both in the root and branches; Whereto I am in all

Humble Duty devoted.

Shimei cursing.

With an heavy heart, and a covered head, and a weeping eye, and bare feet, is David gone away from Hierusalem; never did hee with more joy come up to this City, then now hee left it with sorrow: how could he do otherwise, whom the insurrection of his owne Sonne drove out from his house, from his throne, from the Arke of God? and now, when the depth of this griefe deserved nothing but compassion, the foule mouth of Shimei entertaines David with curses: There is no small cruelty in the picking out of a time for mischiefe; That word would scarce gall at one season, which at another killeth. The same shaft flying with the winde pierces deep, which against it, can hardly find strength to stick upright. The valour, and justice of children condemns it for injuriously cowardly to strike their adversary when he is once down. It is the murder of the tongue to insult upon those, whom God hath humbled, and to draw blood of that backe, which is yet blew from the hand of the Almighty. If Shimei had not presumed upon Davids dejection, he durst not have been thus bold; now he that perhaps durst not have lookt at one of those Worthies single, defies them all at once, and doth both cast, and speak stones against David, and all his army. The malice of base spirits sometimes caries them further, then the courage of the valiant. 2. Sam. 16.

In all the time of Davids prosperity, we heard no news of Shimei; his silence and colourable obedience made him passe for a great subject; yet all that while was his heart unsound and trayterous. Peace and good successe hides many a false heart (like as the Snow-drift covers an heap of dung) which once melting away, descryes the rottennes that lay within: Honor and welfare are but flattering glasses of mens affections: adversity will not deceive us, but will make a true report as of our own powers, so of the disposition of others.

He that smiled on David in his throne, curseth him in his flight: if there be any quarrels, any exceptions to be taken against a man, let him look to have them layd in his dish when he fares the hardest. This practise have wicked men learnt of their master, to take the utmost advantages of our afflictions; He that suffers had need to be double armed, both against paine and censure.

Every word of Shimei was a slaunder; He that tooke Sauls speare from his head, and and repented to have but cut the lap of his garment, is reproched as a man of blood: The man after Gods owne heart is branded for a man of Belial. He that was ſent for out of the fields to be anointed, is taxed for an uſurper: If Davids hand were ſtained with blood, yet not of Sauls Houſe; It was his ſervant, not his maſter that bled by him; yet is the blood of the Lords anointed caſt in Davids teeth, by the ſpight of a falſe tongue. Did we not ſee David (after all the proofes of his humble loyalty) ſhedding the blood of that Amalekite, who did but ſay he ſhed Sauls? Did we not heare him lament paſſionately for the death of ſo ill a maſter, chiding the mountaines of Gilboa on which he fel, & angerly wiſhing that no dew might fall where that blood was poured out; and charged the daughters of Iſrael to weep over Saul, who had cloathed them in ſcarlet? Did we not heare and ſee him inquiring for any remainder of the Houſe of Saul, that he might ſhew him the kindneſſe of God? Did we not ſee him honouring lame Mephiboſheth with a princely ſeat at his owne table? Did we not ſee him revenging the blood of his rivall Iſhboſheth, upon the heads of Rechab and Baanah? What could any living man have done more to wipe off theſe bloody aſperſions? Yet is not a Shimei aſhamed to charge innocent David with all the blood of the Houſe of Saul. A B

How is it likely this clamorous wretch had ſecretly traduced the name of David, all the time of his government, that dares thus accuſe him to his face, before all the mighty men of Iſrael, who were witneſſes of the contrary? The greater the perſon is, the more open do his actions lie to miſ-interpretation, and cenſure. Every tongue ſpeakes partially according to the intereſt he hath in the cauſe, or the patient. It is not poſſible that eminent perſons ſhould be free from imputations; Innocence can no more protect them, then power. C

If the patience of David can digeſt this indignity, his traine cannot; their fingers could not but itch to returne iron for ſtones. If Shimei raile on David, Abiſhai railes on Shimei, Shimei is of Sauls Family, Abiſhai of Davids; each ſpeakes for his own: Abiſhai moſt juſtly bends his tongue againſt Shimei, as Shimei againſt David moſt unjuſtly: Had Shimei been any other then a dog, he had never ſo rudely barked at an harmeleſſe paſſenger, neither could he deſerve leſſe then the loſſe of that head which had uttered ſuch blaſphemies againſt Gods anointed: The zeale of Abiſhai doth but plead for juſtice, and is checked; What have I to doe with you ye ſonnes of Zeruiah? David ſaid not ſo much to his reviler, as to his abettor: He well ſaw that a revenge was juſt, but not ſeaſonable; he found the preſent a fit time to ſuffer wrongs, not to right them: he therefore gives way rather meekly to his owne humiliation, then to the puniſhment of another: There are ſeaſons wherein lawfull motions are not fit to be cheriſhed; Anger doth not become a mourner; One paſſion at once is enough for the ſoule. Unadviſed zeale may be more prejudiciall, then a cold remiſneſſe. D

What if the Lord for the correction of his ſervant, have ſaid unto Shimei, Curſe David; yet is Shimeis curſe no leſſe worthy of Abiſhaies ſword; the ſinne of Shimeis curſe was his owne, the ſmart of the curſe was Gods; God wils that, as Davids chaſtiſement, which he hates as Shimeies wickedneſſe; that lewd tongue moved from God, it moved lewdly from Satan. Wicked men are never the freer from guilt, or puniſhment, for that hand which the holy God hath in their offenſive actions; Yet David can ſay, Let him alone, and let him curſe, for the Lord hath bidden him; as meaning to give a reaſon of his own patience, rather then Shimeies impunity: The iſſue ſhewed how well David could diſtinguiſh betwixt the act of God, and of a traitor; how he could both kiſſe the rod, and burne it: There can be none ſo ſtrong motive of our meek ſubmiſſion to evills, as the acknowledgement of their originall, He that can ſee the hand of God ſtriking him by the hand or tongue of an enemy, ſhall more awe the firſt mover of his harme, then maligne the inſtrument. Even whiles David laments the rebellion of his ſon, he gaines by it; and makes that the argument of his patience, which was the exerciſe of it. Behold, my ſon which came forth of my bowels ſeeketh my life; how much more now may this Benjamite do it? The wickedneſſe of an Abſalom may rob his father of comfort, but ſhall helpe to adde to his fathers goodneſſe. It is the advantage of great croſſes, that they ſwallow up the leſſe; one mans ſin cannot be excuſed by E anothers,

A anothers, the lesser by the greater; If Absalom be a traytor, Shimei may not curse and rebell: But the passion conceived from the indignity of a stranger may be abated by the harder measure of our own; If we can therefore suffer because we have suffered, we have profited by our affliction. A weake heart faints with every addition of succeeding trouble; the strong recollects it selfe, and is growne so skilfull, that it beares off one mischiefe with another.

It is not either the unnaturall insurrection of Absalom, nor the unjust curses of Shimei that can put David quite out of heart; It may be that the Lord will looke on mine affliction, & will requite good for his cursing, this day. So well was David acquainted with the proceedings of God, that he knew cherishing was ever wont to follow stripes, after vehement evacuation, cordials; after a darke night, the cleare light of the mor-
B ning; Hope therefore doth not onely uphold, but cheare up his heart, in the midst of his sorrow; If we can looke beyond the cloud of our affliction, and see the Sun-shine of comfort on the other side of it, we cannot be so discouraged with the presence of evil, as heartned with the issue; As on the contrary, let a man be never so merry within, and see paine and miserie waiting for him at the doore, his expectation of evill shall easily daunt all the sense of his pleasure; the retributions of temporall favours go but by peradventures; (It may be the Lord will look on mine affliction;) of eternal, are certain and infallible: If we suffer, we shall raigne; why should not the assurance of raigning make us triumph in suffering?

Davids patience drawes on the insolence of Shimei. Evill natures grow presumptu-
C ous upon forbearance: In good dispositions, injury unanswered growes weary of it selfe, and dyes in a voluntary remorse; but in those dogged stomachs, which are onely capable of the restraints of feare, the silent digestion of a former wrong provokes a second; Mercy had need to be guided with wisdome, lest it prove cruell to it selfe.

Oh the base minds of inconstant Time-servers! Stay but a while, till the wheel be a little turned, you shall see humble Shimei fall downe on his face before David, in his return over Jordan; now his submission shall equall his former rudenesse, his prayers shall requite his curses; his teares make amends for his stones, Let not my Lord impute iniquity unto me; neither doe thou remember that which thy servant did perversly, the day that my Lord the King went out of Ierusalem, that the King should take it to heart; for thy servant doth know that I have sinned; Falsehearted Shimei, had Absalom prospered, thou
D hadst not sinned, thou hadst not repented; then hadst thou bragged of thine insulta-tion over his miseries, whose pardon thou now beggest with teares. The changes of worldly minds are thankelesse, since they are neither wrought out of conscience nor love, but onely by slavish feare of just punishment.

David could say no more to testifie his sorrow (for his hainous sins against God) to Nathan, then Shimei saies of himselfe to David; whereto may be added the advantage of a voluntary confession in this offender, which in David was extorted by the reproofe of a Prophet: yet is Davids confession seriously penitent, Shimeis craftily hypocriticall: Those alterations are justly suspected, which are shaped according to the times and outward occasions: the true penitent looks onely at God and his sin, and is changed when all other things are themselves.

Great offences had need of answerable satisfaction; As Shimei was the onely man
E of the house of Benjamin that came forth and cursed David in his flight, so is he the first man (even before those of the House of Ioseph, though nearer in situation) that comes to meet David in his returne with prayers and gratulations: Notorious offenders may not think to sit downe with the taske of ordinary services; The retributions of their obedience must be proportionable to their crimes.

ACHITOPHEL.

SO soone as David heard of Achitophels hand in that conspiracie, he fals to his prayers, O Lord, I pray thee turn the counsell of Achitophel into foolishnesse; The knowne wisdome of his revolted counsellor made him a dangerous and dread- 2 Sam. 15

dreadfull adversary: Great parts mis-imployed cannot but prove most mischievous: when wickednesse is armed with wit, and power, none but a God can defeat it; when we are matched with a strong and subtile enemy, it is high time (if ever) to be devout; If the bounty of God have thought good to furnish his creatures with powers to warre against himselfe, his wisdome knowes how to turne the abuse of those powers to the shame of the owners, and the glory of the giver.

Oh the policy of this Machiavell of Israel, no lesse deep then hell it selfe! Go in to thy fathers concubines, which he hath left to keep the house; and when all Israel shall heare that thou art abhorred of thy Father, the hands of all that are with thee shall be strong. The first care must be to secure the faction: There can be no safety in siding with a doubtfull rebell: if Absalom be a traytor, yet he is a Son, Nature may returne to it selfe; Absalom may relent, David may remit; where then are we that have helpt to promote the conspiracy? the danger is ours, whiles this breach may be peeced; There is no way but to ingage Absalom in some further act, uncapable of forgivenesse; Besides the throne, let him violate the bed of his Father; unto his treason let him adde an incest, no lesse unnaturall; now shall the world see that Absalom neither hopes nor cares for the reconciliation of a father; Our quarel can never have any safe end but victory; the hope whereof depends upon the resolution of our followers; they cannot be resolute, but upon the unpardonable wickednes of their Leader: Neither can this villany be shamefull enough, if it be secret. The closeneſſe of evill argues feare, or modesty; neither of which can beseeme him that would be a successefull traytor: Set up a Tent on the top of the house, and let all Israel be witnesses of thy sin, and thy Fathers shame: Ordinary crimes are for vulgar offenders; Let Absalom sin eminently; and do that which may make the world at once to blush, and wonder.

Who would ever have thought that Achitophel had lived at Court, at the Councel-table of a David? Who would thinke that mouth had ever spoken well? Yet had he been no other then as the Oracle of God to the Religious Court of Israel; even whiles he was not wise enough to be good: Policy and grace are not alwaies lodged under one roofe: This man whiles he was one of Davids deep Counsellors, was one of Davids fooles that said in their hearts, There is no God; else he could not have hoped to make good an evill with worse, to build the successe of treason upon incest.

Prophane hearts doe so contrive the plots of their wickednesse, as if there were no over-ruling power to crosse their designes, or to revenge them: He that fits in heaven laughs them to scorne, and so far gives way to their sins, as their sins may prove plagues unto themselves.

These two Sons of David met with pestilent counsell; Amnon is advised to incest with his Sister; Absalom is advised to incest with his Fathers Concubines: That by Ionadab, this by Achitophel: Both prevaile: It is as easie at least to take ill counsell, as to give it: Pronesse to villany in the great, cannot want either projectors to devise, or parasites to execute the most odious sins.

The Tent is spread (lest it should not be conspicuous enough) on the top of the house. The act is done, in the sight of all Israel: The filthinesse of the sin was not so great, as the impudency of the manner. When the Prophet Nathan came with that heavy message of reproofe, and menace to David, after his sin with Bathsheba, he could say from God, Behold I will raise up evill against thee, out of thine owne house, and will take thy Wives before thine eyes, & give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lie with thy wives in the sight of this Sunne: For thou didst it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before this Sunne. The counsell of Achitophel, and the lust of Absalom, have fulfilled the judgment of God. Oh the wisdome of the Almightie, that can use the worst evils, well; and most justly make the sins of men his executioners!

It was the sin of Ruben that he defiled his Fathers bed; yet not in the same height of lewdnesse: what Ruben did in a youthfull wantonnesse, Absalom did in a malicious despight: Ruben sinned with one, Absalom with ten; Ruben secretly, Absalom in the open eyes of heaven and earth; yet old Iacob could say of Ruben, Thou shalt not excell, thy dignity is gone; whiles Achitophel sayes to Absalom, Thy dignity shall arise from incest; Climbe up to thy Fathers bed, if thou wilt sit in his throne; If Achitophel were a politician,

A tician, Iacob was a Prophet; if the one ſpake from carnall ſenſe, the other from divine revelation. Certainely to ſin is not the way to proſper; what ever vaine fooles promiſe to themſelves, there is no wiſdome, nor underſtanding, nor counſell againſt the Lord.

After the rebellion is ſecured for continuance, the next care is that it may end in victory; this alſo hath the working head of Achitophel projected. Wit and experience told him, that in theſe caſes of aſſault, celerity uſes to bring forth the happieſt diſpatch: whereas protraction is no ſmall advantage to the defendant. Let me (ſaith he) chooſe out now twelve thouſand men, and I will up, and follow after David this night; and I will come upon him while he is weary and weake-handed. No advice could be more pernitious: For, beſides the wearineſſe and unreadineſſe of David, and his army, the ſpirits
B of that worthy Leader were daunted, and dejected with ſorrow, and offered way to the violence of a ſudden aſſault. The field had been halfe won ere any blow ſtricken. Achitophel could not have been reputed ſo wiſe, if he had not learn'd the due proportion betwixt actions and times: He that obſerveth every wind ſhall never ſow; but he that obſerves no wind at all, ſhall never reape.

The likelieſt devices do not alwaies ſucceed; The God that had appointed to eſtabliſh Davids throne, and determined Salomon to his ſucceſſion, finds meanes to croſſe the plot of Achitophel by a leſſe probable advice: Huſhai was not ſent back for nothing; where God hath in his ſecret will decreed any event, he inclines the wills of men to approve that which may promote his owne purpoſes; Neither had Huſhai ſo deep an head, neither was his counſell ſo ſure, as that of Achitophel, yet his tongue
C ſhall refell Achitophel, and divert Abſalom: The pretences were fairer, though the grounds were unſound: Firſt, to ſweeten his oppoſition, he yeelds the praiſe of wiſdome to his adverſary in all other counſels, that he may have leave to deny it in this: His very cõtradictiõ in the preſent inſinuates a general allowance. Then, he ſuggeſts certaine apparent truthes concerning Davids valour, and skill, to give countenance to the inferences of his improbabilities. Laſtly, he cunningly feeds the proud humor of Abſalom, in magnifying the power and extent of his commands, and ends in the glorious boaſts of his fore-promiſed victory; as it is with faces, ſo with counſell, that is faire that pleaſeth. He that gives the utterance to words, gives alſe their ſpeed: Favour both of ſpeech and men is not ever according to deſert, but according to fore-ordination: The tongue of Huſhai, and the heart of Abſalom is guided by a power
D above their owne; Huſhai ſhall therefore prevaile with Abſalom, that the treaſon of Abſalom may not prevaile; He that worketh all in all things, ſo diſpoſeth of wicked men and ſpirits, that whiles they doe moſt oppoſe his revealed will, they execute his ſecret; and whiles they thinke moſt to pleaſe, they overthrow themſelves.

When Abſalom firſt met Huſhai returned to Hieruſalem; he upbraided him pleaſantly with the ſcoffe of his profeſſed friendſhip to David; Is this thy kindneſſe to thy friend? Sometimes there is more truth in the mouth then in the heart, more in jeſt then in earneſt; Huſhai was a friend, his ſtay was his kindnes; and now he hath done that for which he was left at Hieruſalem, diſappointed Achitophel, preſerved David; Neither did his kindneſſe to his friend reſt here, but (as one that was juſtly jealous of him with whom he was allowed to temporize) he miſtruſts the approbation of Abſa-
E lom; and not daring to put the life of his Maſter upon ſuch an hazard, he gives charge to Zadok and Abiathar, of this intelligence unto David: we cannot be too ſuſpicious when we have to doe with thoſe that are faithleſſe: We cannot be too curious of the ſafety of good Princes.

Huſhai feares not to deſcry the ſecrets of Abſaloms counſell; to betray a traytor is no other then a commendable worke: Zadok and Abiathar are faſt within the gates of Jeruſalem; their Sons lay pupoſely abroad in the fields; this meſſage that concerned no leſſe then the life of David, and the whole kingdome of Iſrael, muſt be truſted with a Maid: Sometimes it pleaſeth the wiſdome of God, who hath the variety of heaven and earth before him, to ſingle out weak inſtruments for great ſervices: and they ſhall ſerve his turn, as well as the beſt: No counſellor of State could have made this dipatch more effectuall: Ionathan and Ahimaaz are ſent, deſcried, purſued, preſerved:

ſerved: The fidelity of a Maid inſtructed them in their meſſage, the ſubtilty of a woman ſaved their lives. At the Well of Rogel they received their meſſage, in the Well of Bahurim was their life ſaved: The ſudden wit of a woman hath choked the mouth of her Well with dryed corne, that it might not bewray the meſſengers: & now David heares ſafely of his danger, and prevents it: and though weary with travell, and laden with ſorrow, he muſt ſpend the night in his remove. Gods promiſes of his deliverance, & the confirmation of his kingdom may not make him neglect the means of his ſafety: If he be faithfull, we may not be careleſſe; ſince our diligence and care are appointed for the factors of that divine providence; The acts of God muſt abate nothing of ours; rather muſt we labour, by doing that which he requireth, to further that which he decreeth.

There are thoſe that have great wits for the publike, none for themſelves: Such was Achitophel, who whiles he had power to governe a State, could not tell how to rule his owne paſſions: Never till now doe we find his counſell balked, neither was it now rejected as ill, only Huſhaies was allowed for better: he can live no longer now that he is beaten at his owne weapon: this alone is cauſe enough to ſaddle his Aſſe, and to goe home and put the halter about his owne necke. Pride cauſes men both to miſ-interpret diſgraces, and to over-rate them: Now is Davids prayer heard, Achitophels counſell is turned into fooliſhneſſe: Deſperate Achitophel, what if thou be not the wiſeſt man of al Iſrael? Even thoſe that have not attained to the higheſt pitch of wiſdome, have found contentment in a mediocrity: what if thy counſell were deſpiſed? A wiſe man knows to live happily in ſpight of an unjuſt contempt: what madnes is this, to revenge another mans reputation upon thy ſelfe? And whiles thou ſtriveſt for the higheſt roome of wiſdome, to run into the groſſeſt extremity of folly? Worldly wiſdome is no protection from ſhame and ruine. How eaſily may a man, though naturally wiſe, be made weary of life? A little paine, a little ſhame, a little loſſe, a ſmal affront can ſoone rob a man of all comfort, and cauſe his owne hands to rob him of himſelfe: If there be not higher reſpects then the world can yeeld, to mainetaine us in being, it ſhould be a miracle if indignation did not kil more then diſeaſe: now, that God by whoſe appointment we live here, for his moſt wiſe and holy purpoſes, hath found meanes to make life ſweet, and death terrible.

What a mixture do we find here of wiſdome and madneſſe? Achitophel will needs hang himſelfe; there is madneſſe; He will yet ſet his houſe in order; there is an act of wiſdome: And could it be poſſible that he, who was ſo wiſe as to ſet his houſe in order, ſhould be ſo mad as to hang himſelfe? That he ſhould be carefull to order his houſe, who regarded not to order his impotent paſſions? That he ſhould care for his houſe, who cared not for either body or ſoule? How vaine it is for a man to be wiſe, if he be not wiſe in God? How proſperous are the cares of idle worldlings, that prefer all other things to themſelves, and whiles they looke at what they have in their cofers, forget what they have in their breaſts.

The death of Abſalom.

2 Sam. 18.

THE ſame God that raiſed enmity to David from his owne loynes, procured him favour from forainers; Strangers ſhall relieve him, whom his own ſon perſecutes; Here is not a loſſe, but an exchange of love: Had Abſalom been a ſon of Ammon, and Shobi a ſon of David, David had found no cauſe of complaint: If God take with one hand, he gives with another: whiles that divine bounty ſerves us in, good meat, though not in our owne diſhes, we have good reaſon to be thankfull: No ſooner is David come to Mehanaim, then Barzillai, Machir, and Shobi refreſh him with proviſiõs. Who ever ſaw any child of God left utterly deſtitute? Whoſoever be the meſſenger of our aid, we know whence he comes; Heaven ſhall want power, and earth meanes, before any of the houſhold of faith ſhall want maintenance.

He that formerly was forced to imploy his armes for his defence againſt a tyrannous

A nous father in law, muſt now buckle them on againſt an unnaturall ſon: Now therefore he muſters his men, and ordaines his Commanders, and marſhals his troupes, and, ſince their loyall importunity will not allow the hazard of his perſon, hee at once incourages them by his eye, and reſtraines them with his tongue, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom, for my ſake: How unreaſonably favourable are the wars of a father? O holy David, what meanes this il-placed love, this unjuſt mercy: Deale gently with a Traytor? but of all traytors with a ſon? of all Sons with an Abſalom, the graceleſſe darling of ſo good a father; and all this for my ſake, whoſe Crowne, whoſe blood he hunts after? For whoſe ſake ſhould Abſalom be purſued, if he muſt be forborne for thine? He was ſtill courteous to thy followers, affable to ſutors, plauſible to all Iſrael, onely to thee he is cruell: Wherefore are thoſe armes if the cauſe of the
B quarrell muſt be a motive of mercy: yet thou ſayeſt, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom, for my ſake: Even in the holieſt Parents, nature may be guilty of an injurious tenderneſſe, of a bloody indulgence.

Or, whether ſhall we not rather thinke this was done in type of that unmeaſurable mercy of the true King, and redeemer of Iſrael, who prayed for his perſecutors, for his murderers; and, even whiles they were at once ſcorning and killing him, could ſay, Father forgive them, for they know not what they do? If we be ſonnes, we are ungracious, we are rebellious, yet ſtill is our heavenly Father thus compaſſionately regardfull of us: David was not ſure of his ſucceſſe; there was great inequality in the number; Abſaloms forces were more then double to his; It might have come to the contrary iſſue, that David ſhould have been forced to ſay, Deale gently
C with the Father of Abſalom; but in a ſuppoſition of that victory, which onely the goodneſſe of his cauſe bid him hope for, hee ſaith, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom. As for us, we are never but under mercy; our God needs no advantages to ſweepe us from the earth, any moment; yet he continues that life, and thoſe powers to us, whereby we provoke him, and bids his Angels deale kindly with us, and beare us in their armes, whiles we lift up our hands, and bend our tongues againſt Heaven. O mercy, paſt the comprehenſion of all finite ſpirits, and onely to be conceived by him whoſe it is: never more reſembled by any earthly affection then by this of his Deputy and Type, Deale gently with the young man Abſalom, for my ſake.

The battle is joyned; Davids followers are but an handfull to Abſaloms. How eaſi-
D ly may the fickle multitude be tranſported to the wrong ſide? What they wanted in abettors, is ſupplied in the cauſe. Unnaturall ambition drawes the ſword of Abſalom; Davids, a neceſſary and a juſt defence. They that in ſimplicity of heart followed Abſalom, cannot in malice of heart, perſecute the father of Abſalom: with what courage could any Iſraelite draw his ſword againſt a David? or on the other ſide, who can want courage to fight for a righteous Soveraigne, and father, againſt the conſpiracy of a wicked ſon? The God of Hoſts, with whom it is all one to ſave with many or with few, takes part with juſtice, and lets Iſrael feele what it is to beare armes for a traiterous Uſurper. The ſword devours twenty thouſand of them, & the wood devours more then the ſword; It muſt needs be a very univerſall rebellion, wherein ſo E many periſhed. What vertue or merits can aſſure the hearts of the vulgar, when ſo gracious a Prince finds ſo many revolters? Let no man looke to proſper by rebellion; the very thickets, and ſtakes, & pits, and wild beaſts of the woods ſhall conſpire to the puniſhment of traytors; Amongſt the reſt, ſee how a fatall Oke hath ſingled out the ringleader of this hatefull inſurrection; and will at once ſerve for his hangman, & gallowes; by one of thoſe ſpreading armes ſnatching him away to ſpeady execution. Abſalom was comely, and he knew it well enough; His haire was no ſmall peece of his beauty, nor matter of his pride: It was his wont to cut it once a yeare; not for that it was too long, but too heavy; his heart would have borne it longer, if his neck had not complained; And now the juſtice of God hath platted an halter of thoſe locks: Thoſe treſſes had formerly hang'd looſely diſheveld on his ſhoulders, now he hangs by thē; He had wont to weigh his haire, & was proud to find it ſo heavy, now his haire poiſeth the weight of his body, and makes his burden his torment: It is no marvell if his owne haire turn'd traytor to him, who durſt riſe up againſt his father. That part which is miſ-uſed by man to ſin, is commonly imployed by God to revenge; The revenge that it worketh for God, makes amends for the offence, whereto it is drawne againſt God; The very beaſt whereon Abſalom ſat, as weary to beare ſo unnatnrall a burden, reſignes over his load to the tree of Juſtice; There hangs Abſalom between heaven and earth, as one that was hated and abandoned both of earth and heaven: As if God meant to preſcribe this puniſhment for Traytors, Abſalom, Achitophel, and Iudas dye all one death: So let them periſh that dare lift up their hand againſt Gods Anointed. A

The honeſt ſouldier ſees Abſalom hanging in the Oke, and dares not touch him; his hands were held with the charge of David, Beware that none touch the young man Abſalom; Ioab, upon that intelligence, ſees him, and ſmites him, with no leſſe then three darts. What the ſouldier forbore in obedience, the Captaine doth in zeale: not fearing to prefer his Soverains ſafety, to his command; and more tendring the life of a King, and peace of his Country, then the weake affection of a father. I dare not ſit Judge betwixt this zeale and that obedience, betwixt the Captaine & the Souldier; the one was a good ſubject, the other a good Patriot: the one loved the King, the other loved David; and out of love diſobeyed; the one meant as wel as the other ſped: As if God meant to fulfill the charge of his Anointed, without any blame of his ſubjects, it pleaſed him to execute that immediate revenge upon the rebell, which would have diſpatcht him without hand or dart: Only the Mule & the Oke conſpired to this execution; but that death would have required more leaſure, then it was ſafe for Iſrael to give; and ſtill life would give hope of reſcue: to cut off all feares, Ioab lends the Oke three darts to help forward ſo needfull a worke of Juſtice: All Iſrael did not afford ſo firme a friend to Abſalom, as Ioab had beene; who but Ioab had ſuborned the witty widow of Tekoah, to ſue for the recalling of Abſalom, from his three yeares exile? Who but he went to fetch him from Geſhur to Jeruſalem? Who but he fetcht him from his houſe at Jeruſalem (whereto he had been two yeares confined) to the face, to the lips of David? Yet now he that was his ſolicitor for the Kings favor, is his executioner againſt the Kings charge: With honeſt hearts all reſpects either of bloud or friendſhip ceaſe in the caſe of Treaſon; well hath Ioab forgotten himſelfe to be a friend to him who had forgotten himſelfe to be a ſonne. Even civilly, the King is our common father, our Country our common mother; Nature hath no private relations which ſhould not gladly give place to theſe. He is neither father, nor ſon, nor brother, nor friend, that conſpires againſt the common parent: Well doth he who ſpake parables for his Maſters ſon, now ſpeake darts to his Kings enemy; and pierces that heart which was falſe to ſo great a father: Thoſe darts are ſeconded by Ioabs followers; each man tries his weapon upon ſo faire a marke. One death is not enough for Abſalom; he is at once hanged, ſhot, mangled, ſtoned: Juſtly was he lift up to the Oke, who had lift up himſelfe againſt his father, and Soveraine; Juſtly is he pierced with darts, who had pierced his fathers heart with ſo many ſorrowes; Juſtly is he mangled, who hath diſmembred and divided all Iſrael; Iuſtly is he ſtoned, who hath not onely curſed, but purſued his owne parent. B C D

Now Ioab ſounds the retreat; and calls off his eager troupes from execution; however he knew what his rebellious Country men had deſerved in following an Abſalom: Wiſe Commanders know how to put a difference betwixt the heads of a faction, and the miſ-guided multitude; & can pity the one, whiles they take revenge on the other. E

So did Abſalom eſteeme himſelfe, that hee thought it would bee a wrong to the world to want the memoriall of ſo goodly a perſon. God had denied him ſons; How juſt it was that he ſhould want a ſon, who had robd his father of a ſon, who would have robd himſalfe of a father, his father of a Kingdome? It had been pity ſo poiſonous a plant ſhould have been fruitfull; His pride ſhall ſupply nature, he reares up a ſtately pillar in the Kings dale, and calls it by his owne name, that he might live in dead ſtones, who could not ſurvive in living iſſue: and now, behold this curious pile ends in a rude heap, which ſpeaks no language but the ſhame of that carcaſſe which it covers: Heare this ye glorious fooles, that care not to perpetuate any memory of your your selves to the world, but of ill deserving greatnesse, the best of this affectation is vanity; the worst, infamy and dishonour: whereas the memoriall of the just shall be blessed; and if his humility shall refuse an Epitaph, and chuse to hide himselfe under the bare earth, God himselfe shall ingrave his name upon the pillar of eternity.

There now lies Absalom in the pit, under a thousand grave-stones, in every of which is written his everlasting reproach: well might this heape over-live that pillar, for when that ceased to be a pillar it began to be a heap, neither will it cease to be a monument of Absaloms shame, whiles there are stones to be found upon earth: Even at this day very Pagans and Pilgrims that passe that way, cast each man a stone unto that heape, and are wont to say in a solemne execration, Cursed be the paricide Absalom, and cursed be all unjust persecutors of their parents, for ever: Fasten your eyes upon this wofull spectacle, O all ye rebellious and ungracious children, wch rise up against the loynes and thighs from which ye fell: and know that it is the least part of your punishment, that your carcasses rot in the earth, and your name in ignominy; these do but shadow out those eternall sufferings, of your soules, for your foule and unnaturall disobedience.

Absalom is dead, who shall report it to his Father? Surely Ioab was not so much afraid of the fact, as of the message: There are busie spirits that love to cary newes, though thankleſſe, though purposeleſſe: such as Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok, who importunately thrust himselfe into this service: wise Ioab, who well saw, how unwelcome tydings must be the burden of the first post, dissuades him in vaine: he knew David too well, to imploy a friend to that errand. An Ethiopian servant was a fitter bearer of such a message, then the son of the Priest. The entertainment of the person doth so follow the quality of the news, that David could argue afar off, He is a good man, he commeth with good tydings. Oh how welcome deserve those messengers to be that bring us the glad tydings of salvation, that assure us of the foyle of all spirituall enemies, and tell us of nothing but victories, and Crownes, and Kingdomes! If we thinke not their feet beautifull, our hearts are foule with infidelity, and secure worldlinesse.

So wise is Ahimaaz grown by Ioabs intimation, that though he out-went Cushi in his pace, he suffers Cushi to out-goe him in his tale, cunningly suppressing that part, which he knew must be most necessarily delivered, and unpleasingly received.

As our care is wont to be where our love is; Davids first word is not, how fares the Host, but how fares the young man Absalom: Like a wise and faithfull messenger, Cushi answers by an honest insinuatiō, The enemies of my Lord the King & all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is; implying both what was done, and, why David should approve it being done; How is the good King thunder-strooke, with that word of his Black-more? who, as if he were at once bereaved of all comfort, and cared not to live, but in the name of Absalom, goes and weepes and cryes out, O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom, Would God I had died for thee; O Absalom my son, my son. What is this we heare? that he whose life Israel valued at ten thousand of theirs, should be exchanged with a traytors? that a good King whose life was sought, should wish to lay it down for the preservation of his murderer? The best men have not wont to bee the least passionate; But what shall wesay to that love of thine, O Saviour, who hast said of us wretched traytors, not, Would God I had died for you; But I will dye, I doe dye, I have dyed for you? Oh love, like thy selfe, infinite, incomprehensible, whereat the Angels of Heaven stand yet amazed; wherewith thy Saints are ravished, Turne away thine eyes from me, for they overcome me; Oh thou that dwellest in the Gardens, the companions hearken to thy voice: cause us to heare it; that wee may in our measure answer thy love, and enjoy it for ever.

Shebaes Rebellion.

2 Sam. 12

IT was the doome which God paſſed upon the man after his owne heart by the mouth of Nathan; that the ſword ſhould never depart from his houſe, for the blood of Vriah: After that wound healed by remiſſion, yet this ſcarre remaines; Abſalom is no ſooner caſt downe into the pit, then Sheba the ſon of Bichri is up in armes; If David be not plagued, yet he ſhall be corrected; Firſt by the rod of a Sonne, then of a ſubject: He had lift up his hand againſt a faithfull ſubject; now a faithleſſe dares to lift up his hand againſt him. Malice like ſome hereditary ſickneſſe runs in a blood: Saul, and Shimei, and Sheba were all of an houſe: That ancient grudge was not yet dead: The fire of the houſe of Iemini was but raked up, never throughly out; and now, that which did but ſmoake in Shimei, flames in Sheba: Although even through this chaſtiſement it is not hard to diſcerne a Type of that perpetuall ſucceſſion of enmity, which ſhould be raiſed againſt the true King of Iſrael. O Son of David, when didſt thou ever want enemies? How wert thou deſigned by thine eternall Father, for a ſigne that ſhould be ſpoken againſt? How did the Gentiles rage, and the people imagine vain things? The Kings of the earth aſſembled, and the Rulers came together againſt thee? Yea, how doe the ſubjects of thine owne kingdome daily conſpire againſt thee? Even now whiles thou enjoyeſt peace, and glory at thy fathers right hand, as ſoone ſhalt thou want friends, as enemies upon earth.

No eye of any traytor could eſpie a juſt quarrell in the government of David, yet Sheba blowes the trumpet of rebellion; and whiles Iſrael and Iudah are ſtriving who ſhould have the greateſt part in their re-eſtabliſhed Soveraigne, he ſticks not to ſay, We have no part in David, neither have we inheritance in the ſon of Iſhai; and whiles he ſayes, Every man to his tents O Iſrael, he cals every man to his owne; So in proclaiming a liberty from a juſt and loyall ſubjection, he invites Iſrael to the bondage of an Uſurper.

That a lewd conſpirator ſhould breathe Treaſon it is no wonder; but is it not wonder and ſhame, that upon every mutinous blaſt, Iſrael ſhould turne Traytor to Gods anointed? It was their late expoſtulation with David, why their brethren the men of Iudah ſhould have ſtolne him from them; now might David more juſtly expoſtulate, why a rebell of their brethren ſhould have ſtolne them from him: As nothing is more unſtable then the multitude, ſo nothing is more ſubject to diſtaſtes, then Soveraignty; for as weak minds ſeek pleaſure in change; ſo every light conceit of irritation ſeemes ſufficient colour of change: Such as the falſe diſpoſitions of the vulgar are, love cannot be ſecurity enough for Princes, without the awfulneſſe of power; What hold can there be of popularity, when the ſame hands that even now fought for David to be all theirs, now fight againſt him, under the ſon of Bichri, as none of theirs? As Beeswhē they are once up in a ſwarme, are ready to light upon every bough, ſo the Iſraelites being ſtir'd by the late cōmotion of Abſalom, are apt to follow every Sheba: It is unſafe for any ſtate, that the multitude ſhould once know the way to an inſurrection; the leaſt track in this kind is eaſily made a path. Yet, if Iſrael rebell, Iudah continues faithful; neither ſhall the ſon of David ever be left deſtitute of ſome true ſubjects in the worſt of Apoſtaſies: He that could cōmand al hearts, will ever be followed by ſome; God had rather glorifie himſelfe by a remnant.

Great Commanders muſt have active thoughts; David is not ſo taken up with the embroiled affaires of his ſtate, as not to intend domeſtick juſtice: His ten concubines, which were ſhameleſly defiled by his inceſtuous ſon, are condemned to ward, and widowhood. Had not that conſtupration been partly violent, their puniſhment had not been ſo eaſie, had it not alſo been partly voluntary, they had not been ſo much puniſhed: But how much ſoever the act did partake of either force, or will, juſtly are they ſequeſtred from Davids bed: Abſalom was not more unnaturall in his rebellio, then in his luſt: If now David ſhould have returned to his own bed, he had ſeconded the inceſt:

A ceſt: How much more worthy of ſeparation are they, who have ſtayned the mariage bed with their wilfull ſin?

Amaſa was one of the witneſſes, and abettors of Abſalons filthineſſe, yet is he (out of policy) received to favour and imployment, whiles the concubines ſuffer: Great men yeeld many times to thoſe things, out of reaſons of State, which if they were private perſons could not be eaſily put over: It is no ſmall wiſdome to ingage a new reconciled friend, that he may be confirmed by his owne act: Therefore is Amaſa commanded to leavy the forces of Iudah: Ioab after many great merits and atchievements lies ruſting in neglect: he that was ſo intire with David as to be of his counſell for Vriahs blood; and ſo firme to David as to lead all his battels againſt the houſe of Saul, the Ammonites, the Aramites, Abſalom; is now caſhierd, & muſt yeeld his place
B to a ſtranger late an enemy: Who knowes not that this ſon of Zerviah had ſhed the blood of war in peace? But if the blood of Abſalō had not been louder then the blood of Abner, I feare this change had not been; Now Ioab ſmarteth for a loyall diſobedience; How ſlippery are the ſtations of earthly honors, and ſubject to continuall mutability? Happy are they who are in favour with him, in whom there is no ſhadow of change.

Where men are commonly moſt ambitious to pleaſe with their firſt imployments, Amaſa ſlackens his pace; The leaſt delay in matters of rebellion is perilous, may be irrecoverable; The ſons of Zerviah are not ſullen, Abiſhai is ſent, Ioab goes unſent to the purſuit of Sheba. Amaſa was in their way; whom no quarrell but their envy had made of a brother an enemy: Had the heart of Amaſa been privy to any cauſe of C grudg, he had ſuſpected the Kiſſe of Ioab; now his innocent eyes look to the lips, not to the hand of his ſecret enemy: The lips were ſmooth, Art thou in health my brother? the hand was bloody, which ſmote him under the fift rib; That unhappy hand knew well this way unto death; which with one wound hath let out the ſoules of two great Captaines, Abner and Amaſa; both they were ſmitten by Ioab, both under the fift ribbe, both under a pretence of friendſhip. There is no enmity ſo dangerous as that which comes masked with love; Open hoſtility cals us to our guard; but there is no fence againſt a truſted trecherie: Wee need not bee bidden to avoid an enemy, but who would runne away from a friend? Thus ſpiritually deales the world with our ſoules; it kiſſes us, and ſtabs us at once: If it did not embrace us with one hand, it could not murther us with the other; Onely, God, deliver us from the danger
D of our truſt, and we ſhall be ſafe.

Ioab is gone, and leaves Amaſa wallowing in blood; That ſpectacle cannot but ſtay all paſſengers: The death of great perſons drawes ever many eyes: Each man ſayes, Is not this my Lord Amaſa? Wherefore do we go to fight, whiles our Generall lyes in the duſt? What a ſad preſage is this of our owne miſcariage? The wit of Ioabs followers hath therefore ſoon both removed Amaſa out of the way, and covered him, not regarding ſo much the loſſe, as the eye-ſore of Iſrael. Thus wicked Politicks care not ſo much for the commiſſion of villany, as for the notice: Smothered evils are as not done; If oppreſſions, if murder, if treaſons may be hid from view, the obdured heart of the offender complaines not of remorſe.

Bloody Ioab, with what face, with what heart canſt thou purſue a Traytor to thy
E King, whiles thou thy ſelf art ſo foul a Traytor to thy friend, to thy cozen german, and (in ſo unſeaſonable a ſlaughter) to thy Soveraigne, whoſe cauſe thou profeſſeſt to revenge? If Amaſa were now, in an act of loyalty, juſtly (on Gods part) payd for the arrerages of his late rebellion, yet that it ſhould be done by thy hand, then and thus, it was flagitiouſly cruell: Yet, behold, Ioab runs away ſecurely with the fact, haſting to plague that in another, whereof himſelfe was no leſſe guilty; So vaſt are the gorges of ſome conſciences, that they can ſwallow the greateſt crimes, and finde no ſtraine in the paſſage.

It is poſſible for a man to be faithful to ſome one perſon, & perfidious to al others; I do not find Ioab other then firme and loyall to David, in the midſt of all his private falſhoods, whoſe juſt quarrell he purſues againſt Sheba, through all the Tribes of Iſrael. None of all the ſtrong Forts of revolted Iſrael can hide the Rebell from the zeale of his revenge: The City of Abel lends harbour to that conſpirator, whom all Iſrael would, and cannot protect. Ioab caſt up a Mount againſt it, and having invironed it with a ſiege begins to worke upon the wall; and now, after long chaſe, is in hand to dig out that Vermine, which had earthed himſelfe in this borough of Bethmaacha. Had not the City been ſtrong and populous, Sheba had not caſt himſelfe for ſuccour within thoſe wals; yet of all the inhabitants, I ſee not any one man move for the preſervation of their whole body: Onely a woman undertakes to treat with Ioab, for their ſafety: Theſe men whoſe ſpirits were great enough to maintaine a Traytor againſt a mighty King, ſcorne not to give way to the wiſdome of a Matron; There is no reaſon that ſexe ſhould diſparage, where the vertue & merit is no leſſe then maſculine: Surely the ſoule acknowledgeth no ſexe, neither is varied according to the outward frame; How oft have we known female hearts in the breaſts of Men, and contrarily manly powers in the weaker veſſels? It is injurious to meaſure the act by the perſon, and not rather to eſteeme the perſon for the act. A B

She, with no leſſe prudence then courage, challengeth Ioab for the violence of his aſſault; and lays to him that law which he could not be an Iſraelite and diſavow; the Law of the God of peace; whoſe charge it was, that when they ſhould come neere to a City to fight againſt it, they ſhould offer it peace; and if this tender muſt be made to forainers, how much more to brethren? So as they muſt inquire of Abel, ere they battered it: War is the exteame act of vindicative juſtice; neither doth God ever approve it for any other then a deſperate remedy; and if it have any other end then peace, it turnes into publike murder. It is therefore an inhumane cruelty to ſhed blood where we have not profered faire conditions of peace: The refuſall whereof is juſtly puniſhed with the ſword of revenge. B C

Ioab was a man of blood, yet when the wiſe woman of Abel charged him with going about to deſtroy a mother in Iſrael; and ſwallowing up the inheritance of the Lord, with what vehemency doth he deprecate that challenge, God forbid, God forbid it me, that I ſhould devoure, or deſtroy it? Although that City with the reſt had ingaged it ſelfe in Shebaes ſedition, yet how zeal ouſly doth Ioab remove from himſelfe the ſuſpition of an intended vaſtation? How fearefull ſhall their anſwer be, who upon the quarrell of their own ambition have not ſpared to waſte whole Tribes of the Iſrael of God? It was not the faſhion of Davids Captains to aſſault any City ere they ſummond it; here they did: There be ſome things that in the very fact cary their own conviction. So did Abel in the entertaining, and abetting a known conſpirator; Ioab challengeth them for the offence, & requires no other ſatisfaction then the head of Sheba: This Matron had not deſerved the name of Wiſe, and faithfull in Iſrael, if ſhe had not both apprehended the juſtice of the condition, and commended it to her Citizens; whom ſhe had eaſily perſwaded to ſpare their own heads, in not ſparing a Traytors: It had been pity thoſe wals ſhould have ſtood if they had been too high to throw a Traytors head over. C D

Spiritually, the caſe is ours: Every mans breaſt is as a City incloſed: Every ſin is a Traitor, that lurks within thoſe wals; God cals to us for Shebaes head; neither hath he any quarrell to our perſon, but for our ſin: If we love the head of our Traytor, above the life of our Soule, we ſhall juſtly periſh in the vengeance: we cannot be more willing to part with our ſin, then our mercifull God is to withdraw his judgements. D E

Now is Ioab returned with ſucceſſe, and hopes by Shebaes head to pay the price of Amaſaes blood: David hates the murder, entertaines the man, defers the revenge; Ioab had made himſelfe ſo great, ſo neceſſary, that David may neither miſſe nor puniſh him: Policy led the King to connive at that which his heart abhorred; I dare not cõmend that wiſdom which holds the hands of Princes from doing Juſtice. Great men have ever held it a point of worldly ſtate, not alwaies to pay where they have beene conſcious to a debt of either favour, or puniſhment; but to make Time their ſervant for both: Salomon ſhall once defray the arrerages of his father: In the meane time Ioab commands and proſpers; and David is faine to ſmile on that face, whereon he hath in his ſecret deſtination written the characters of Death. E

The Gibeonites revenged.

THE raigne of David was moſt troubleſome towards the ſhutting up; wherein both warre and famine conſpire to afflict him: Almoſt forty yeares had he ſate in the throne of Iſrael, with competency, if not abundance of all things; now at laſt are his people viſited with a long dearth; we are not at firſt ſenſible of common evills: Three yeares drought and ſcarcity are gone over ere David conſults with God, concerning the occaſion of the judgement, now he found it high time to ſeek the face of the Lord; The continuance of an affliction ſends us to God, & calls upon us to ask for a reckoning; whereas like men ſtrucken in their ſleepe, a ſudden blow cannot make us to finde our ſelves; but rather aſtoniſheth, then teacheth us. 2 Sam. 21

David was himſelf a Prophet of God, yet had not the Lord all this while acquainted him with the grounds of his proceedings againſt Iſrael; this ſecret was hid from him, till he conſulted with the Urim; Ordinary meanes ſhall reveale that to him, which no viſion had deſcried: And if God will have Prophets to have recourſe unto the Prieſts, for the notice of his will; how much more muſt the people? Even thoſe that are inwardeſt with God, muſt have uſe of the Ephod.

Juſtly it is preſuppoſed by David that there was never judgment from God, where hath not been a provocation frō men; therefore when he ſees the plague, he inquires for the ſin. Never man ſmarted cauſleſly from the hand of divine juſtice; Oh that when we ſuffer, we could aske what we have done, and could guide our repentance to the roote of our evils.

That God whoſe counſels are ſecret, even where his actions are open, will not be cloſe to his Prophet, to his Prieſt: without inquiry we ſhall know nothing; upon inquiry nothing ſhall be concealed from us that is fit for us to know.

Who can chooſe but wonder at once, both at Davids ſlackneſſe in conſulting with God, and Gods ſpeed in anſwering ſo ſlow a demand? He that ſo well knew the way to Gods Oracle, ſuffers Iſrael to be three yeares pinched with famine, ere he askes why they ſuffer; Even the beſt hearts may be overtaken with dulneſſe in holy duties; But oh the marvellous mercy of God, that takes not the advātage of our weakneſſes. Davids queſtion is not more ſlow, then his anſwer is ſpeedy, It is for Saul, and for his bloody houſe, becauſe he ſlew the Gibeonites. Iſrael was full of ſins, beſides thoſe of Sauls houſe; Sauls houſe was full of ſins, beſides thoſe of blood: Much blood was ſhed by them beſides that of the Gibeonites; yet the juſtice of God ſingles out this one ſin of violence offered to the Gibeonites (contrary to the league made by Ioſhua, ſome foure hundred yeares before) for the occaſion of this late vengeance. Where the cauſes of offence are infinite, it is juſt with God to pitch upon ſome; it is mercifull not to puniſh for all: Welneer forty yeares are paſt betwixt the commiſſion of the ſin, and the reckoning for it; It is a vaine hope that is raiſed from the delay of judgement: No time can be any prejudice to the Ancient of dayes: When we have forgotten our ſins, when the world hath forgotten us, hee ſues us afreſh for our arerages. The ſlaughter of the Gibeonites was the ſin not of the preſent, but rather the former generation; and now poſterity payes for their forefathers: Even we men hold it not unjuſt to ſue the heires and executors of our debtors; Eternall payments God uſes onely to require of the perſon, temporary oft-times of ſucceſſion.

As Saul was higher by the head and ſhoulders then the reſt of Iſrael, both in ſtature and dignity, ſo were his ſins more conſpicuous then thoſe of the vulgar. The eminence of the perſon makes the offence more remarkable to the eyes both of God and men.

Neither Saul nor Iſrael were faultleſſe in other kinds, yet God fixes the eye of his revenge upon the maſſacre of the Gibeonites. Every ſin hath a tongue, but that of blood over-cryes and drowns the reſt. He who is mercy it ſelfe abhorres cruelty in his creature above all other inordinateneſſe; That holy ſoule which was heavy preſſed with the weight of an hainous adultery, yet cryes out, Deliver me from blood, O God,

God, the God of my ſalvation, and my tongue ſhall joyfully ſing of thy righteouſneſſe. A

If God would take account of blood, he might have entred the action upon the blood of Vriah ſpilt by David; or (if he would rather inſiſt in Sauls houſe) upon the blood of Abimelech the Prieſt, and foureſcore and five perſons that did weare a linnen Ephod; but it pleaſed the wiſdome and juſtice of the Almighty rather to call for the blood of the Gibeonites, though drudges of Iſrael, and a remnant of Amorites. Why this? There was a perjury attending upon this ſlaughter; It was an ancient Oath wherein the Princes of the congregatiō had bound themſelves (upon Ioſhua's league) to the Gibeonites, that they would ſuffer them to live; an oath extorted by fraud, but ſolemne by no leſſe name, then the Lord God of Iſrael; Saul will now thus late, either not acknowledge it, or not keep it: out of his zeale therefore to the children of Iſrael, & Iudah, he roots out ſome of the Gibeonites, whether in a zeal of revenge of their B firſt impoſture, or in a zeale of inlarging the poſſeſſions of Iſrael, or in a zeal of executing Gods charge upon the brood of Canaanites; he that ſpared Agag whom hee ſhould have ſmitten, ſmites the Gibeonites whom he ſhould have ſpared: Zeale and good intention is no excuſe, much leſſe a warrant for evill: God holds it an high indignity that his name ſhould be ſworne by, and violated. Length of time cannot diſpenſe with our oathes, with our vowes: The vowes and oathes of others may bind us, how much more our owne?

There was a famine in Iſrael; a naturall man would have aſcribed it unto the drought; & that drought perhaps to ſome conſtellations; David knows to look higher, and ſees a divine hand ſcourging Iſrael for ſome great offence, and over-ruling C thoſe ſecond cauſes to his moſt juſt executions. Even the moſt quick-ſighted worldling is pore-blind to ſpirituall objects, and the weakeſt eyes of the regenerate pierce the heavens and eſpie God in all earthly occurrences.

So well was David acquainted with Gods proceedings, that he knew the removal of the judgement muſt begin at the ſatisfaction of the wronged. At once therefore doth he pray unto God, and treat with the Gibeonites; What ſhall I doe for you, and wherewith ſhall I make the atonement, that I may bleſſe the inheritance of the Lord? In vaine ſhould David (though a Prophet) bleſſe Iſrael, if the Gibeonites did not bleſſe them: Injuries done us on earth give us power in heaven; The oppreſſor is in no mans mercy, but his whom he hath trampled upon.

Little did the Gibeonites think that God had ſo taken to heart their wrongs, that for their ſakes all Iſrael ſhould ſuffer. Even when we think not of it, is the righteous D
Judge avenging our unrighteous vexations; Our hard meaſures cannot be hid from him, his returnes are hid from us; It is ſufficient for us, that God can be no more neglective, then ignorant of our ſufferings. It is now in the power of theſe deſpiſed Hivites to make their owne termes with Iſrael; Neither Silver, nor Gold will favour with them toward their ſatisfaction; nothing can expiate the blood of their fathers, but the blood of ſeven ſons of their deceaſed perſecutor; Here was no other then a juſt retaliation; Saul had puniſhed in them the offence of their predeceſſors, they will now revenge Sauls ſin in his children; The meaſure wee mete unto others, is with much equity re-meaſured unto our ſelves: Every death would not content them of Sauls ſons, but a curſed and ignominious, hanging on the Tree; Neither would that death content them unleſſe their owne hands might be the executioners; Neither E would any place ſerve for the execution but Gibeah, the Court of Saul; neither would they doe any of this for the wreaking of their owne fury, but for the appeaſing of Gods wrath, We will hang them up unto the Lord in Gibeah of Saul.

David might not refuſe the condition: he muſt deliver, they muſt execute: He chooſes out ſeven of the ſons, and grand children of Saul; That houſe had raiſed long an unjuſt perſecution againſt David, now God payes it upon another ſcore. Davids love and oath to Ionathan, preſerves lame Mephiboſheth: How much more ſhall the Father of all mercies do good unto the children of the faithfull, for the covenant made with their Parents?

The five ſonnes of Adriel the Meholathite, Davids ancient rivall in his firſt love, which were borne to him by Merab, Sauls Daughter, and brought up by her barren

ſiſter

A sister Michol the wife of David, are yeelded up to death; Merab was after a promise of marriage to David, unjustly given away by Saul, to Adriel; Michol seemes to abet the match in breeding the children; now in one act (not of Davids seeking) the wrong is thus late avenged upon Saul, Adriel, Merab, Michol, the children: It is a dangerous matter to offer injury to any of Gods faithfull ones; If their meeknesse have easily remitted it, their God will not passe it over without a severe retribution.

These five together with two sons of Rizpah, Sauls Concubine, are hanged up at once before the Lord, yea and before the eyes of the world; No place but an Hil wil serve for this execution; The acts of justice as they are intended for example, so they should be done in that eminent fashion that may make them both most instructive, & most terrifying; Unwarrantable courses of private revenge seek to hide their heads
B in secresie; the beautifull face of Iustice both affects the light and becomes it.

It was the generall charge of Gods Law that no corps should remaine all night upon the gibbet; The Almighty hath power to dispense with his own command; so doubtlesse he did in this extraordinary case; these carcasses did not defile, but expiate. Sorrowful! Rizpah spreads her a Tent of Sackcloth upon the Rock, for a sad attendance upon those sons of her womb; Death might bereave her of them, not thē of her love; This spectacle was not more grievous to her, then pleasing to God, and happy to Israel. Now the clouds drop fatnesse, and the earth runs forth into plenty. The Gibeonites are satisfied, God reconciled, Israel relieved.

How blessed a thing is it for any Nation that justice is unpartially executed even upon the mighty. A few drops of blood have procured large showers from Heaven.
C A few carcasses are a rich compost to the earth; The drought and dearth remove away with the breath of those pledges of the offender: Iudgement cannot tyrannize where justice raignes: as contrarily, there can be no peace where blood cryes unheard, unregarded.

The numbring of the people.

ISrael was growne wanton and mutinous: God puls them downe first by the sword, then by famine, now by pestilence. Oh the wondrous, and yet just waies of the Almighty! Because Israel hath sinned, therefore
D David shall sinne, that Israel may be punished: Because God is angry with Israel, therefore David shall anger him more, and strike himselfe in Israel, and Israel through himselfe. 2 Sam. 24.

The spirit of God else-where ascribes this motion to Satan, which here it attributes to God: Both had their hand in the worke; God by permission, Satan by suggestion; God as a Iudge, Satan as an enemy: God as in a just punishment for sin, Satan as in an act of sin: God in a wise ordination of it to good; Satan in a malicious intent of confusion. Thus at once God moved, and Satan moved: Neither is it any excuse to Satan or David, that God moved: neither is it any blemish to God, that Satā moved: The rulers sin is a punishment to a wicked people: though they had many sinnes of their owne, whereon God might have grounded a Iudgement, yet as before he had
E punisht them with dearth for Sauls sin, so now he will not punish them with plague, but for Davids sin: If God were not angry with a people, he would not give up their governours to such evils as whereby he is provoked to vengeance; and if their governours be thus given up, the people cannot be safe: The body drownes not whiles the head is above the water; when that once sinkes, death is neere: Iustly therefore are we charged to make prayers and supplications, as for all, so especially for those that are in eminent authority; when we pray for our selves, we pray not alwaies for them, but we cannot pray for them, and not pray for our selves; the publique weale is not comprised in the private, but the private in the publique.

What then was Davids sin? He will needs have Israel and Iuda numbred: Surely there is no malignity in numbers; Neither is it unfit for a Prince to know his owne strength; this is not the first time that Israel had gone under a reckoning: The act offends offends not, but the miſ-affection; the ſame thing had bin commendably done out of a Princely providence, which now through the curioſity, pride, miſ-confidence of the doer, proves hainouſly vicious; Thoſe actiõs which are in themſelves indifferẽt, receive either their life, or their bane from the intentions of the agent: Moſes numbreth the people with thankes, David with diſpleaſure: Thoſe ſins which carry the ſmootheſt foreheads and have the moſt honeſt appearances, may more provoke the wrath of God, then thoſe that beare the moſt abomination in their faces. How many thouſand wickednesſes paſſed through the hands of Iſrael, which we men would rather have branded out for judgement then this of Davids? The righteous Iudge of the world cenſures ſins, not by their ill lookes, but by their foule hearts.

Who can but wonder to ſee Ioab the Saint, and David the treſpaſſer? No Prophet could ſpeake better then that man of blood; The Lord thy God increaſe the people an hundred fold more then they be, and that the eyes of my Lord the King may ſee it; but why doth my Lord the King deſire this thing? There is no man ſo lewd as not to be ſomtimes in good moods, as not to diſlike ſome evill: cõtrarily no man on earth can be ſo holy, as not ſometimes to overlaſh: It were pity that either Ioab or David ſhould be tryed by every act; How commonly have we ſeen thoſe men ready to give good advice to others for the avoiding of ſome ſins, who in more groſſe outrages have not had grace to counſell their own hearts? The ſame man that had deſerved death from David for his treacherous cruelty, diſſwades David from an act that caried but a ſuſpition of evill; It is not ſo much to be regarded who it is that admoniſheth us, as what he brings; Good counſell is never the worſe for the foule cariage, there are ſome diſhes that we may eat even from ſluttiſh hands.

The purpoſe of ſin in a faithfull man is odious, much more the reſolution: Notwithſtanding Ioabs diſcreet admonition; David will hold on his courſe; and wil know the number of the people, only that he may know it; Ioab and the Captaines addreſſe themſelves to the worke: In things which are not in themſelves evill, it is not for ſubjects to diſpute, but to obey; That which authority may ſin in commanding, is done of the inferiour, not with ſafety onely, but with praiſe. Nine months and twenty dayes is this generall muſter in hand; at laſt the number is brought in: Iſrael is found eight hundred thouſand ſtrong, Iudah five hundred thouſand; the ordinary companies which ſerved by courſe for the royall guard (foure and twenty thouſand each moneth) needed not to be reckoned; the addition of them with their ſeveral Captaines raiſes the ſumme of Iſrael to the rate of eleven hundred thouſand. A power able to puffe up a carnall heart; but how can an heart that is more then fleſh truſt to an arme of fleſh? Oh holy David whither hath a glorious vanity tranſported thee? Thou which once didſt ſing ſo ſweetly, Put not your truſt in Princes, nor in the ſon of man, for there is no help in him. His breath departeth, and he returneth to his earth, then his thoughts periſh. Bleſſed is he that hath the God of Iacob for his help, whoſe hope is in the Lord his God; How canſt thou now ſtoop to ſo unſafe and unworthy a confidence.

As ſome ſtomackful horſe that will not be ſtopt in his career with the ſharpeſt bit, but runs on headily till he come to ſome wall or ditch, and there ſtands ſtill and trembles; ſo did David: all the diſſwaſions of Ioab could not reſtraine him from his intended courſe; almoſt ten months doth hee run on impetuouſly, in a way of his owne, rough & dangerous, at laſt his heart ſmites him; the conſcience of his offence, and the feare of judgement hath fetcht him upõ his knees, O Lord I have ſinned exceedingly in that I have done; therefore now, Lord, I beſeech thee take away the treſpaſſe of thy ſervant, for I have done very fooliſhly. It is poſſible for a ſin not to bait onely, but to ſojourne in the holieſt ſoul: but though it ſojourn there as a ſtranger, it ſhall not dwel there as an owner; the renewed heart after ſome rovings of error wil once (ere overlong) returne home to it ſelfe, and fall out with that ill guide, wherewith it was miſled, and with it ſelfe for being miſled; and now it is reſolved into teares, and breathes forth nothing but ſighes, and confeſſions and deprecations.

Here needed no Nathan by a parobolicall circumlocution to fetch in David to a ſight and acknowledgement of his ſin; the heart of the penitent ſupplyed the Prophet; no other tongue could ſmite him ſo deep as his owne thoughts: But though his his reines chaſtiſed him in the night, yet his Seer ſcourges him in the morning, Thus ſaith the Lord, I offer thee three things, chooſe the which of them I ſhall doe unto thee. But what ſhall we ſay to this? When upon the Prophets reproofe for an adultery cloaked with murder, David did but ſay, I have ſinned, it was preſently returned, God hath put away thy ſinne; neither did any ſmart follow, but the death of a miſ-begotten infant; and now when he voluntarily reproveth himſelfe for both a needleſſe muſter, and ſought for pardon unbidden with great humiliation, God ſends him the three terrible ſcourges, Famine, Sword, or Peſtilence, that he may chooſe with which of them he had rather to bleed; he ſhall have the favour of an election, not of a remiſſion. God is more angred with a ſpirituall, and immediate affront offered to his Majeſty, in our pride, and falſe confidence in earthly things, then with a fleſhly crime though hainouſly ſeconded.

It was an hard and woful choice, of three yeares famine added to three fore-paſt; or of three monethes flight from the ſword of an enemy, or three daies peſtilence; The Almighty that hath fore-determined his judgement, referres it to Davids will as fully, as if it were utterly undetermined; God had reſolved, yet David may chooſe; That infinite wiſdome hath foreſeene the very will of his creature; which whiles it freely inclines it ſelfe to what it had rather, unwittingly wills that which was fore-appointed in heaven.

We do well beleeve thee, O David, that thou wert in a wonderfull ſtrait; this very liberty is no other then fetters; Thou needſt not have famine, thou needſt not have the ſword, thou needſt not have peſtilence; one of them thou muſt have; There is miſery in all, there is miſery in any; thou and thy people can die but once; and once they muſt dye, either by famine, warre, or peſtilence. Oh God, how vainely do we hope to paſſe over our ſins with impunity, when all the favour that David and Iſrael can receive is to chooſe their bane?

Yet behold, neither ſins, nor threates, nor feares can bereave a true penitent of his faith, Let us fall now into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great. There can be no evill of puniſhment wherein God hath not a hand; there could be no famine, no ſword without him; but ſome evills are more immediate from a divine ſtroke; ſuch was that plague into which David is unwillingly willing to fall. He had his choiſe of dayes, moneths, yeares in the ſame number; and though the ſhortneſſe of time prefixed to the threatned peſtilence might ſeem to offer ſome advantage for the leading of his election, yet God meant (and David knew it) herein to proportion the difference of time to the violence of the plague, neither ſhould any fewer periſh by ſo few dayes peſtilence, then by ſo many yeares famine: The wealthieſt might avoid the dearth, the ſwifteſt might run away from the ſword, no man could promiſe himſelfe ſafety from that peſtilence: In likelihood Gods Angell would rather ſtrike the moſt guilty; How ever therefore David might well looke to be inwrapped in the common deſtruction, yet he rather chooſeth to fall into that mercy which he had abuſed, and to ſuffer from that juſtice which he had provoked; Let us now fall into the hands of the Lord.

Humble confeſſions, and devout penance cannot alwaies avert temporall judgements; Gods Angell is abroad, and within that ſhort compaſſe of time ſweepes away ſeventy thouſand Iſraelites; David was proud of the number of his ſubjects; now they are abated, that he may ſee cauſe of humiliation in the matter of his glory; In what we have offended, we commonly ſmart: Theſe thouſands of Iſrael were not ſo innocent, that they ſhould onely periſh for Davids ſinne: Their ſins were the motives both of this ſin, and puniſhment; beſides the reſpect of Davids offence, they die for themſelves.

It was no ordinarie peſtilence that was thus ſuddenly and univerſally mortal; Cõmon eyes ſaw the botch, & the markes, ſaw not the Angell; Davids clearer ſight hath eſpied him (after that killing peragration through the Tribes of Iſrael) ſhaking his ſword over Ieruſalem, and hovering over Mount Sion; and now he who doubtleſſe had ſpent thoſe three diſmall dayes in the ſaddeſt contrition, humbly caſts himſelfe down at the feet of the avenger, and layes himſelfe ready for the fatall ſtroke of juſtice; ſtice, It was more terrour that God intended in the viſible ſhape of his Angell, and deeper humiliation; and what he meant, he wrought; Never ſoule could be more dejected, more anguiſhed with the ſenſe of a judgement; in the bitterneſſe whereof he cryes out, Behold I have ſinned, yea I have done wickedly; But theſe ſheep what have they done: Let thine hand, I pray thee, be againſt me, and againſt my fathers houſe. The better any man is, the more ſenſible he is of his owne wretchednesſe: Many of thoſe Sheep were Wolves to David; What had they done? They had done that which was the occaſion of Davids ſin, and the cauſe of their owne puniſhment; But that gracious penitent knew his owne ſin, he knew not theirs; and therefore can ſay, I have ſinned, What have they done? It is ſafe accuſing where we may be boldeſt, and are beſt acquainted, our ſelves. A

Oh the admirable charitie of David, that would have ingroſſed the plague to himſelfe, and his houſe, from the reſt of Iſrael; and ſues to interpoſe himſelfe betwixt his people and the vengeance; He that had put himſelf upon the pawes of the Beare, and Lyon, for the reſcue of his Sheep, will now caſt himſelfe upon the ſword of the Angell, for the preſervation of Iſrael: There was hope in thoſe conflicts; in this yeeldance there could be nothing but death. Thus didſt thou, O Son of David, the true and great Shepheard of thy Church, offer thy ſelfe to death for them who had their hands in thy bloud, who both procured thy death and deſerved their own. Here he offered himſelfe that had ſinned for thoſe whom he profeſſed to have not done evill; thou that didſt no ſin, vouchſafedſt to offer thy ſelfe for us that were all ſin; He offered and eſcaped, thou offeredſt, and diedſt; and by thy death we live, and are freed from everlaſting deſtruction. B

But O Father of all mercies, how little pleaſure doeſt thou take in the bloud of ſinners? it was thine owne pity that inhibited the Deſtroyer: Ere David could ſee the Angell thou hadſt reſtrained him; It is ſufficient, hold now thy hand: If thy compaſſion did not both withhold and abridge thy judgements, what place were there for us out of hell. C

How eaſie and juſt had it been for God to have made the ſhutting up of that third evening red with bloud? his goodneſſe repents of the ſlaughter; and cals for that Sacrifice wherewith he will be appeaſed: An altar muſt be built in the threſhing floore of Araunah the Jebuſite; Lo, in that very Hill where the Angell held the ſword of Abraham from killing his Son, doth God now hold the Sword of the Angell from killing his people; Upon this very ground ſhall the Temple after ſtand; here ſhal be the holy Altar, which ſhall ſend up the acceptable oblations of Gods people in ſucceeding generations. D

O God, what was the threſhing-floore of a Jebuſite to thee above all other ſoiles? What vertue, what merit was in this earth? As in places ſo in perſons, it is not to be heeded what they are, but what thou wilt; That is worthieſt which thou pleaſeſt to accept.

Rich and bountifull Araunah is ready to meet David in ſo holy a motion; & munificently offers his Sion for the place, his Oxen for the Sacrifice, his Carts, & Ploughs, and other Utenſils of his Husbandry for the wood: Two franke hearts are well met; David would buy, Araunah would give; The Jebuſite would not ſell, David will not take: Since it was for God, and to David, Araunah is loth to bargaine: Since it was for God, David wiſheth to pay deare, I will not offer burnt-offerings to the Lord my God, of that which doth coſt me nothing: Heroicall ſpirits doe well become eminent perſons; He that knew it was better to give then to receive, would not receive but give: There can be no devotion in a niggardly heart: As unto dainty palates, ſo to the Godly ſoule, that taſtes ſweeteſt, that coſts moſt: Nothing is deare enough for the Creator of all things It is an heartleſſe piety of thoſe baſe-minded Chriſtians, that care onely to ſerve God good cheap. TO MY WORTHILY MVCH HONOVRED FRIEND, SIR HENRY MILDMAY Knight, Master of the Jewell-house; All Grace and Peace.

SIR,

Besides all private obligations, your very name challengeth from me all due services of love, and honour; If I have received mercy to beare any fruit, next under heaven, I may thanke the stocke wherein I was ymped; which was set by no other then the happy hand of your Right Honorable Grandfather; How have I so long forborn the publike Testimony of my just gratulations, and thankfull respects to so true an heire of his noble vertues. Pardon mee that I pay this debt so late; and accept of this parcell of my well-meant labours: wherein you shall see Salomon both in his rising and setting: his rising hopefull and glorious, his declination fearefull: You shall see the proofes of his early graces; of mercy in sparing Adonijah, and Abiathar; of justice, in punishing that rivall of his, with Joab, and Shimei: of wisdome, in his award betwixt the two Harlots, and the administration of his Court, and State: of piety, in building and hallowing the Temple; all dashed in his fall, repayred in his repentance. I have no cause to misdoubt either the acceptation or use of these my high-pitched thoughts: which together with your selfe, and your worthy and vertuous Lady, I humbly commend to the care and blessing of the Highest; who am bound by your worth and merits to be ever

Yours sincerely and thankfully devoted in all observance,

JOS. HALL.

Adonijah Defeated.

1. Kings 1.5.

DAVID had not ſo carefully husbanded his yeares as to maintain a vigorous age; hewas therefore what through warres, what with ſorowes, what with ſickneſſe, decrepit betimes; by that time hee was ſeventy yeares old, his naturall heat was ſo waſted, that his clothes could not warme him; how many have wee knowne of more ſtrength at more age? The holyeſt ſoule dwels not in an impregnable fort; If the revenging Angel ſpared David, yet age and death will not ſpare him; Neither his new altar, nor his coſtly ſacrifice can be of force againſt decay of nature; Nothing but death can prevent the weakneſſes of age.

None can blame a people if when they have a good King, they are deſirous to hold him; Davids ſervants and ſubjects have commended unto his bed a faire young Virgin; not for the heat of luſt, but of life; that by this meanes they might make an outward ſupply of fuell for that vitall fire which was wel-neere extinguiſhed with age.

As it is in the market, or the ſtage, ſo it is in our life; One goes in, another comes out, when David was withering, Adonijah was in his bloſſome; That ſonne, as he was next to Abſalom both in the beauty of his body, & the time of his birth, ſo was he too like him in practice; He alſo taking advantage of his fathers infirmity, will be carving himſelfe of the Kingdome of Iſrael; That he might no whit vary from his patterne, he gets him alſo Chariots and Horſemen, and fifty men to runne before him: Theſe two, Abſalom and Adonijah, were the darlings of their father; Their father had not diſpleaſed them from their childhood, therefore they both diſpleaſed him in his age; Thoſe children had need to be very gracious, that are not marred with pampering; It is more then God owes us, if we receive comfort in thoſe children whom we have over-loved; The indulgence of parents at laſt payes them home in croſſes.

It is true that Adonijah was Davids eldeſt ſon now remaining, & therefore might ſeeme to challenge the juſteſt title to the crown; But the Kingdome of Iſrael (in ſo late an erection) had not yet knowne the right of ſucceſſion: God himſelfe that had ordained the government, was as yet the immediate Elector; He fetcht Saul from among the ſtuffe, and David from the Sheepfold; and had now appointed Salomon from the ferule, to the Scepter. A

And if Adonijah (which is unlike) had not knowne this, yet it had been his part to have taken his father whith him in this claime of his ſucceſſion; & not ſo to prevent a brother, that he ſhould ſhoulder out a father; and not ſo violently to preoccupate the throne, that he ſhould rather be a rebell, then an heire.

As Abſolom, ſo Adonijah wants not furtherers in this uſurpation, whether ſpiritual, or temporall; Ioab the Generall, and Abiathar the Prieſt give both counſell, and aid to ſo unſeaſonable a challenge; Theſe two had been firme to David in all his troubles, in all inſurrections; yet now finding him faſtened to the bed of age, and death, they ſhew themſelves thus ſlippery in the looſe: Outward happineſſe and friendſhip are not knowne till our laſt act; in the impotency of either our revenge or recompence, it will eaſily appeare who loved us for our ſelves, who for their owne ends. B

Had not Adonijah knowne that Salomon was deſigned to the Kingdome both by God, and David, he had never invited all the reſt of the Kings ſonnes, his brethren, and left out Salomon; who was otherwiſe the moſt unlikely to have been his rivall in his honour; all the reſt were elder then he; and might therefore have had more pretence for their competition; Doubtleſſe the Court of Iſrael could not but know, that immediately upon the birth of Salomon, God ſent him by Nathan the Prophet, a name and meſſage of love; neither was it for nothing that God called him Iedidiah; and fore-promiſed him the honor of building an houſe to his Name; and (in returne of ſo glorious a ſervice) the eſtabliſhment of the throne of his Kingdome over Iſrael for ever: Notwithſtanding all which, Adonijah backed by the ſtrength of a Ioab, and the gravity of an Abiathar, will underworke Salomon, and juſtle into the not-yet-vacant ſeat of his father David. Vaine men, whiles like proud and yet brittle clay, they will be knocking their ſides againſt the ſolid, and eternall decree of God, breake themſelves in peeces. C

I doe not finde that Adonijah ſent any meſſage of threats or unkindneſſe to Zadock the Prieſt, or Nathan the Prophet, or Benaiah the ſonne of Iehoiada, and the other Worthies; only he invited them not to his feaſt with the Kings ſonnes, and ſervants; Sometimes a very omiſſion is an affront, and a menace. They well knew that ſince they were not called as gueſts, they were counted as enemies; Ceremonies of courteſie, though they be in themſelves ſlight, and arbitrary, yet the neglect of them in ſome caſes may undergoe a dangerous conſtruction. D

Nathan was the man by whom God had ſent that errand of grace to David, concerning Salomon, aſſuring him both to reigne, and proſper; yet now when Adonijahs plot was thus on foot, he doth not ſit ſtill and depend upon the iſſue of Gods decree, but he beſtirres him in the buſineſſe, and conſults with Bathſheba how at once to ſave their lives, and to advance Salomon, and defeat Adonijah; Gods pre-determination includes the meanes as well as the end; the ſame providence that had ordained a Crowne to Salomon, a repulſe to Adonijah, preſervation to Bathſheba and Nathan, had fore-appointed the wiſe and induſtrious indeavours of the Prophet to bring about his juſt, and holy purpoſes; If we would not have God wanting to us, we muſt not be wanting to our ſelves: Even when we know what God hath meant to us, we may not be negligent. E

The Prophets of God did not look for revelation in all their affaires, in ſome things they were left to the counſell of their owne hearts; the policie of Nathan was of uſe as well as his prophecie: that alone hath turned the ſtreame into the right channell: Nothing could be more wiſely contrived then the ſending in of Bathſheba to David, with ſo ſeaſonable and forcible an expoſtulation, and the ſeconding of hers with his owne.

Though luſt were dead in David, yet the reſpects of his old matrimonial love lived ſtill; the very preſence of Bathſheba pleaded ſtrongly; but her ſpeech more; the time was when his affectiõ oſtonded in exceſſe towards her being then anothers, he cannot

now

A now neglect her being his own; & if either his age, or the remorse of his old offence should have set him off, yet she knew his oath was sure; My Lord thou swarest by the Lord thy God unto thine handmaid, saying, Assuredly Salomon thy son shall reign after me, & he shall sit upon my throne; His word had been firme, but his oath was inviolable; we are engaged if we have promised, but if we have sworne, we are bound.

Neither heaven nor earth have any grieves for that man that can shake off the fetters of an oath; for he cares not for that God whom he dares invoke to a falshood; and he that cares not for God will not care for man.

Ere Bathsheba can be over the threshold, Nathan (upon compact) is knocking at the doore. Gods Prophet was never but welcome to the bed-chamber of King David: In a seeming strangenesse he fals upon the same suit, upon the same complaint with
B Bathsheba: Honest policies doe not mis-become the holiest Prophets; Shee might seeme to speake as a woman, as a mother, out of passion; the word of a Prophet could not be mis-doubted: He therefore that had formerly brought to David that chiding and bloody message concerning Bathsheba, comes now to David to sue for the life and honour of Bathsheba; and he that was sent from God (to David) to bring the newes of a gracious promise of favour unto Salomon, comes now to challenge the execution of it from the hands of a father; and he whose place freed him from suspition of a faction, complaines of the insolent demeanure and proclamation of Adonijah; what he began with an humble obeysance, shutting up in a lowly and loving expostulation, Is this thing done by my Lord the King, and thou hast not shewed thy servant who should sit on the Throne of my Lord the King after him? As Nathan was of Gods
C Counsell unto David, so was he of Davids Counsell both to God, and the State; As God therefore upon all occasions told Nathan what he meant to doe with David, so had David wont to tell Nathan what he meant to doe in his holy and most important civill affaires. There are cases wherein it is not unfit for Gods Prophets to meddle with matters of State. It is no disparagement to religious Princes to impart their counsels unto them, who can requite them with the counsels of God.

That wood which a single iron could not rive, is soone splitted with a double wedge; The seasonable importunity of Bathsheba and Nathan, thus seconding each other, hath so wrought upon David, that now his love to Adonijah gives place to indignation, nature to an holy fidelity; & now he renewes his ancient oath to Bathsheba with a passionate solemnity: As the Lord liveth who hath redeemed my soule out
D of all adversity, even as I sware unto thee by the Lord God of Israel, saying, Assuredly Salomon thy sonne shall reigne after me, and he shall sit upon my throne in my stead, so will I certainly doe this day: In the decay of Davids body I finde not his intellective powers any whit impaired: As one therefore that from his bed could with a perfect (if weake) hand stere the government of Israel, he gives wise and full directions for the inauguration of Salomon: Zadock the Priest, and Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine receive his grave and Princely charge for the cariage of that so weighty a businesse. They are commanded to take with them the royall guard, to set Salomon upon his fathers Mule, to cary him downe in state to Gihon, to anoint him with the holy oyle of the Tabernacle, to sound the trumpets and proclaime him in the streets, to bring him back with triumph and magnificence to the Court, and to set him in E the royall Throne with all the due ceremonies of Coronation.

How pleasing was this command to them who in Salomons glory saw their owne safety? Benaiah applauds it, and not fearing a fathers envy, in Davids presence wisheth Salomons throne exalted above his: The people are ravished with the joy of so hopefull a succession, and breake the earth, and fill the heaven with the noise of their Musick and shouting.

Salomons guests had now at last better cheare then Adonijahs, whose feast (as al wicked mens) ended in horror; no sooner are their bellies ful of meat, then their eares are full of the sound of those trumpets, which at once proclaime Salomons triumph, and their confusion: Ever after the meale is ended comes the reckoning: God could as eafily have prevented this jollity as marred it: But he willingly suffers vaine men to please themselves for a time in the conceited successe of their owne projects, that afterwards terwards their disappointment may be so much the more grievous; No doubt, at this feast there was many a health drunken to Adonijah, many a confident boast of their prospering designe; many a scorn of the despised faction of Salomon; & now for their last dish, is served up astonishment, and fearefull expectation of a just revenge. Ionathan the son of Abiathar the Priest, brings the newes of Salomons solemne and joyfull enthronization; now all hearts are cold, all faces pale; and every man hath but life enough to run away; How suddenly is this braving troupe dispersed? Adonijah their new Prince flyes to the hornes of the Altar, as distrusting all hopes of life, save the Sanctity of the place, and the mercy of his rivall.

So doth the wise and just God befoole proud and insolent sinners in those secret plots, wherein they hope to undermine the true son of David, the Prince of Peace; he suffers them to lay their heads together, and to feast themselves in a jocond security, and promise of successe; at last, when they are at the height of their joyes, and hopes, he confounds all their devices, & layes them open to the scorne of the world, and to the anguish of their owne guilty hearts.

Davids end, and Salomons beginning.

IT well became Salomon to begin his reigne in peace. Adonijah receives pardon upon his good behaviour, and findes the Throne of Salomon, as safe as the Altar. David lives to see a wise sonne warme in his seat; and now he that had yeelded to succession, yeelds to nature. Many good counsels had David given his Heire; now hee summes them up in his end. Dying words are wont to be weightiest; The Soule when it is entring into glory breathes nothing but divine. I goe the way of all the earth. How well is that Princely heart content to subscribe to the conditions of humane mortality; as one that knew Soveraignty doth not reach to the affaires of nature? Though a King, he neither expects, nor desires an immunity from dissolution; making no account to goe in any other then the common track, to the universall home of mankinde, the house of age? Whither should earth but to earth? and why should we grudge to doe that, which all doe? Be thou strong therefore, and shew thy selfe a man; Even when his spirit was going out, he puts spirit into his Son; Age puts life into youth, and the dying animates the vigorous: Hee had well found that strength was requisite to government, that he had need to be no lesse then a man that should rule over men; If greatnesse should never receive any opposition, yet those worlds of cares, and businesses that attend the chaire of State, are able to over-lay any meane powers. A weak man may obey, none but the strong can governe. Graceless courage were but the whetstone of tyranny; Take heed therefore to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walk in his wayes, and to keep his Statutes. The best legacy that David bequeathes to his heire, is the care of piety; himselfe had found the sweetnesse of a good conscience, and now he commends it to his Successor. If there bee any thing that in our desires of the prosperous condition of our children, takes place of goodnesse, our hearts are not upright. Here was the father a King, charging the King his sonne to keepe the Statutes of the King of Kings; as one that knew greatnesse could neither exempt from obedience, nor priviledge sin; as one that knew the least deviation in the greatest and highest Orbe, is both most sensible, and most dangerous: Neither would hee have his sonne to look for any prosperity, save onely from well-doing: That happinesse is built upon sand or Ice, which is raised upon any foundation besides vertue. If Salomon were wise, David was good; and if old Salomon had well remembred the counsell of old David, he had not so foully mis-caried.

After the precepts of piety, follow those of justice; distributing in a due recompence, as revenge to Ioab and Shimei, so favour to the house of Barzillai. The bloodinesse of Ioab had lain long upon Davids heart: the hideous noise of those treacherous murders, as it had pierced heaven, so it still filled the eares of David He could abhorre the villany, though he could not revenge it; What he cannot pay he will owe.

A owe, and approve himselfe at last a faithfull debter: now hee will defray it by the hand of Salomon. The slaughter was of Abner, and Amasa, David appropriates it; Thou knowest what Ioab did to me: The Soveraigne is smitten in the subject; Neither is it other then just, that the arraignement of meane malefactors runs in the stile of wrong to the Kings Crowne and dignity. How much more dost thou, O Sonne of David, take to thy selfe those insolencies which are done to thy poorest subjects, servants, sonnes, members here upon earth? No Saul can touch a Christian here below, but thou feelest it in heaven, and complainest.

But what shall we thinke of this? David was a man of Warre, Salomon a King of Peace, yet David refers this revenge to Salomon: How just it was that he who shed the blood of warre in peace, and put the blood of war upon his girdle that was about
B his loynes, should have his blood shed in peace, by a Prince of peace; Peace is fittest to rectifie the outrages of War: Or whether is not this done in type of that divine administration, wherein thou, O Father of heaven, hast committed all judgement unto thine eternall Sonne? Thou who couldst immediately either plague, or absolve sinners, wilt doe neither but by the hand of a Mediator.

Salomon learned betimes what his ripenesse taught afterwards, Take away the wicked from the King, and his Throne shall be established in righteousnesse; Cruel Ioab, & malicious Shimei, must be therefore upon the first opportunity removed. The one lay open to present justice, for abetting the conspiracie of Adonijah, neither needs the help of time for a new advantage; The other went under the protection of an oath from David, and therefore must be fetcht in upon a new challenge. The hoare head
C of both must be brought to the grave with blood, else Davids head could not bee brought to his grave in peace: Due punishment of malefactors is the debt of authority: If that holy King have runne into arrerages; yet as one that hates and feares to breake the banke, he gives order to his paymaster; It shall be defrayed, if not by him, yet for him.

Generous natures cannot be unthankfull: Barzillai had shewed David some kindnesse in his extremity; and now the good man will have posterity to inherit the thankes. How much more bountifull is the Father of Mercies, in the remuneration of our poore unworthy services? Even successions of generations shall fare the better for one good parent.

D The dying words and thoughts of the man after Gods own heart did not confine themselves to the straites of these particular charges, but inlarged themselves to the care of Gods publike service; As good men are best at last, David did never so busily and carefully marshall the affaires of God, as when he was fixed to the bed of his age and death. Then did he lode his sonne Salomon with the charge of building the house of God; then did he lay before the eyes of his son the modell and patterne of that whole sacred worke, whereof if Salomon bare the name, yet David no lesse merits it: He now gives the platforme of the Courts and buildings; He gives the gold and silver for that holy use; an hundred thousand talents of gold, a thousand thousand talents of silver; besides brasse and yron passing weight; He weighes out those precious metalls for their severall designements; Every future vessell is laid out already in his poise, if not in his forme; He excites the Princes of Israel to their assi-
E stance, in so high a worke; He takes notice of their bountifull offerings; He numbers up the Levites for the publique services, and sets them their taskes. He appoints the Singers, and other musitians to their stations; the Porters to the gates that should be; And now when he hath set all things in a desired order, and forwardnesse, he shuts up with a zealous blessing of his Salomon, and his people, and sleepes with his fathers. Oh blessed soule, how quiet a possession hast thou now taken (after so many tumults) of a better Crowne! Thou that hast prepared all things for the house of thy God, how happily art thou now welcomed to that house of his, not made with hands, eternall in the heavens! Who now shall envy unto good Princes the honour of overseeing the businesses of God, and his Chruch; when David was thus punctuall in these divine provisions? What feare can be of usurpation where they have so glorious a predesint?

Now

Now is Salomon the ſecond time crowned King of Iſrael, and now in his owne right (as formerly in his fathers) ſits peaceably upon the Throne of the Lord; His awe and power come on faſter then his yeares; Envie and ambition where it is once kindled, may ſooner be hid in the aſhes, then quite put out; Adonijah yet hangs after his old hopes; He remembers how ſweet he found the name of a King, and now hath laid a new plot for the ſetting up of his crackt title: He would make the bed a ſtep to the throne; His old cõplies are ſure enough: His part would gather much ſtrength, if he might enjoy Abiſhag the relect of his father, to wife; If it were not the Iewiſh faſhion (as is pretended) that a Kings widow ſhould marry none but a King; yet certainly the power both of the alliance, and friendſhip of a Queen muſt needs not a little advance his purpoſe: The crafty rivall dare not either move the ſuit to Salomon, or effect the mariage without him; but would cunningly undermine the ſon by the ſuit of that mother, whoſe ſuit had undermined him. The weaker veſſels are commonly uſed in the moſt dangerous ſuggeſtions of evill.

Bathſheba was ſo wiſe a woman that ſome of her counſels are canonized for divine, yet ſhe ſaw not the depth of this drift of Adonijah; therefore ſhe both entertaines the ſuit, and moves it: But what ever were the intent of the ſuiter, could ſhe chooſe but ſee the unlawfulneſſe of ſo inceſtuous a match? It is not long ſince ſhe ſaw her late husband David abominating the bed of thoſe his Concubines, that had been touched by his ſonne Abſalom; and can ſhe hold it lawfull that his ſon Adonijah ſhould climb up to the bed of his fathers wife? Sometimes even the beſt eyes are dimme and diſcern not thoſe things which are obvious to weaker ſights: or whether did not Bathſheba well ſee the foulneſſe of the ſuit, and yet in compaſſion of Adonijahs late repulſe (wherein ſhe was the chiefe agent) and in a deſire to make him amends for the loſſe of the Kingdome, ſhe yeelds even thus to gratifie him. It is an injurious weakneſſe to be drawne upon any by-reſpects to the furtherance of faulty ſuits, of unlawfull actions.

No ſooner doth Bathſheba come in place, then Salomon her ſonne riſes from his chaire of State, and meets her and bowes to her, and ſets her on his right hand; as not ſo remembring himſelfe to be a King, that he ſhould forget he was a ſonne. No outward dignity can take away the rights and obligations of nature; Had Bathſheba been as meane as Salomon was mighty, ſhe had caried away this honour from a gratious ſonne: Yet for all theſe due complements Bathſheba goes away with a deniall; Reverence ſhe ſhall have, ſhe ſhall not have a condeſcent.

In the acts of Magiſtracie, all regards of naturall relations muſt give way; That which ſhe propounded as a ſmall requeſt, is now, after a generall and confuſed ingagement, rejected as unreaſonable. It were pity wee ſhould bee heard in all our ſuits. Bathſheba makes a petition againſt her ſelfe, and knowes it not; her ſafety and life depends upon Salomons reigne, yet ſhe unwittingly moves for the advancement of Adonijah.

Salomon was too dutifull to check his mother, and too wiſe to yeeld to her: In unfit ſupplications we are moſt heard when we are repelled. Thus doth our God many times anſwer our prayers with mercifull denialls: and moſt bleſſeth us in croſſing our deſires.

Wiſe Salomon doth not finde himſelfe perplexed with the ſcruple of his promiſe; he that had ſaid, Aſk on, for I will not ſay thee nay, can now ſweare, God do ſo to me and more alſo, if Adonijah have not ſpoken this word againſt his own life. His promiſe was according to his ſuppoſition; his ſuppoſition was of no other then of a ſuit, honeſt, reaſonable, expedient; now he holds himſelf free from that grant, wherein there was at once both ſin and danger: No man can be intangled with generall words againſt his owne juſt and honeſt intentions.

The policies of wicked men befoole them at laſt; this interceſſion hath undone Adonijah, and in ſtead of the Throne haſtens his grave: The ſword of Benaiah puts an end to that dangerous rivality. Ioab and Abiathar ſtill held Champerty with Adonijah; Their hand was both in the claime of his Kingdome, and in the ſuit of Abiſhag; There are crimes wherein there are no acceſſories, ſuch is this of treaſon. Abiathar may

A may thanke his burden that he lives; Had he not borne the Arke of the Lord before David, he had not now caried his head upon his shoulders; Had he not been afflicted with David, he had perished with Adonijah; now though he were, in his owne merit, a man of death, yet he shall survive his partners, Get thee to Anathoth unto thine owne fields. The Priesthood of Abiathar, as it aggravated his crime, so it shall preserve his life: Such honor have good Princes given to the Ministers of the Sanctuary, that their very coate hath been defence enough against the sword of justice, how much more should it be of proofe against the contempt of base persons?

Besides his function, respect is had to his sufferings; The father and brethren of Abiathar were slaine for Davids sake, therefore for Davids sake Abiathar (though worthy of death) shall live; He had been now a dead man, if he had not been formerly afB flicted; Thus doth our good God deale with us; by the rod he prevents the sword, & therefore will not condemne us for our sins, because we have suffered. If Abiathar do not forfait his life, yet his office he shal, he must change Jerusalem for Anathoth, and the Priesthood for a retired privacie. It was fourescore yeares agoe since the sentence of judgement was denounced against the house of Eli; now doth it come to execution; This just quarrel against Abiathar (the last of that line) shall make good the threatned judgement: The wickednesse of Elies house was neither purged by sacrifice, nor obliterated by time: If God pay slowly, yet he payes sure: Delay of most certaine punishment is neither any hinderance to his justice, nor any comfort to our miseries.

C The execution of Joab, and Shimei.

Abiathar shall live though he serve not; It is in the power of Princes to remit (at least) those punishments which attend the breach of humane Lawes: good reason they should have power to dispence with the wrongs done to their own persons. The newes of Adonijahs death, and Abiathars removall cannot but affright Ioab; who now runs to Gibeon, & takes sanctuary in the Tabernacle of God; all his hope of defence is in the hornes of the Altar. Fond Ioab, hadst thou formerly sought for counsell from the Tabernacle, thou hadst not now needed to seek to it for refuge; if thy devotions had not been wanting to that Altar, D thou hadst not needed it for a shelter: It is the fashion of our fooliish presumption to look for protection, where we have not cared to yeeld obedience. 1 King. 2

Even a Ioab clings fast to Gods Altar in his extremity, which in his ruffe and welfare he regarded not; The worst men would be glad to make use of Gods ordinances, for their advantage; Necessity will drive the most profane and lawlesse man to God; But what doe these bloody hands touching the holy Altar of God? Miserable Ioab, what help canst thou expect from that sacred pile? Those hornes that were sprinkled with the blood of beasts, abhorre to be touched by the blood of men; that Altar was for the expiation of sin by blood; not for the protection of the sin of blood. If Adonijah fled thither and escaped, it is murder that pursues thee more then conspiracie; God hath no sanctuary for a wilfull Homicide.

E Yea such respect doth Benaiah give to that holy place, that his sword is unwilling to touch him that touches the Altar: Those hornes shall put off death for the time, and give protraction of the execution, though not preservation of life; How sweet is life even to those who have been prodigal of the blood of others, that Ioab shifts thus to hold it but some few houres? Benaiah returnes with Ioabs answer, in stead of his head; Nay, but I will dye here; as not daring to unsheath his sword against a man sheltered in Gods tabernacle, without a new commission. Young Salomon is so well acquainted with the Law of God, in such a case, that he sticks not at the sentence: hee knew that God had enacted, If a man came presumptuously upon his Neighbour, to slay him with guile, thou shalt take him from mine Altar, that he may dy: He knew Ioabs murders had not been more presumptuous, then guilefull; and therefore he sends Benaiah to take away the offender, both from God, and men, from the Altar, and the world.

No

No ſubject had merited more then Ioab; When proclamation was made in Iſrael, that whoever ſhould ſmite the Jebuſites firſt, he ſhould be the Chiefe and Captaine; Ioab was the man: When David built ſome part of Jeruſalem, Ioab built the reſt; ſo as Jeruſalem owes it ſelfe to Ioab, both for recovery, and reparation; No man held ſo cloſe to David; no man was more intent to the weale of Iſrael, none ſo ſucceſſeful in victories; yet now he is cald to reckon for his old ſinnes, and muſt repay blood to Amaſa, and Abner: It is not in the power of all our deſerts to buy off one ſinne, either with God or man: where life is ſo deeply forfaited, it admits of no redemption.

The honeſt ſimplicity of thoſe times knew not of any infamy in the execution of juſtice. Benaiah, who was the great Marſhall under Salomon, thinkes not his fingers defiled with that fatall ſtroke. It is a fooliſh niceneſſe to put more ſhame in the doing of juſtice, then in the violating of it.

In one act Salomon hath approved himſelfe both a good Magiſtrate, and a good ſonne, fulfilling at once the will of a father and the charge of God, concluding upon this juſt execution, that, upon David, and upon his ſeed, and upon his houſe, and upon his Throne, there ſhall be peace for ever from the Lord; and inferring, that without this there could have been no peace.

Blood is a reſtleſſe ſuitor, and will not leave clamoring for judgement, till the mouth be ſtopped with revenge. In this caſe favour to the offender is cruelty to the favourer.

Now hath Ioab paid all his arrerages by the ſword of Benaiah; there is no ſuit againſt his corps; that hath the honor of a buriall fit for a Peere of Iſrael, for the neer cozen to the King. Death puts an end to all quarrels: Salomon ſtrikes off the ſkore, when God is ſatisfied: The revenge that ſurvives death and will not bee ſhut up in the Coffin, is barbarous, and unbeſeeming true Iſraelites.

Onely Shimei remaines upon the file, his courſe is next, yet ſo, as that it ſhall be in his owne liberty to haſten his end; Upon Davids remiſſion, Shimei dwels ſecurely in Bahurim, a town of the Tribe of Benjamin; Doubtleſſe, when he ſaw ſo round juſtice done upon Adonijah, and Ioab, his guilty heart could not think Salomons meſſage portended ought but his execution; and now he cannot but be well pleaſed with ſo eaſie conditions, of dwelling at Ieruſalem, and not paſſing over the brook Kidron; What more delightfull place could he chuſe to live in, then that City, which was the glory of the whole earth? What more pleaſing bounds could he wiſh then the ſweet banks of Kidron? Ieruſalem could be no priſon to him, whiles it was a Paradiſe to his betters, and if he had a deſire to take freſh ayre, he had the ſpace of ſix furlongs to walke from the city to the brooke. He could not complaine to be ſo delectably confined: And beſides, thrice every yeare hee might be ſure to ſee all his friends without ſtirring his foot.

Wiſe Salomon whiles he cared to ſeeme not too ſevere an exactor of that, which his father had remitted, prudently layes inſenſible twigs for ſo foule an offender. Beſides the old grudge, no doubt Salomon ſaw cauſe to ſuſpect the fidelity of Shimei; as a man who was ever knowne to be hollow to the houſe of David, the obſcurity of a Country life would eaſily afford him more ſafe opportunities of ſecret miſchief; Many eyes ſhall watch him in the city; he cannot look out unſeen, he cannot whiſper unheard: Upon no other termes ſhall he enjoy his life, which the leaſt ſtraying ſhall forfait.

Shimei feeles no paine in this reſtraint; How many Nobles of Iſrael doe that for pleaſure, which he doth upon command? Three yeares hath he lived within compaſſe limited both by Salomons charge & his own oath: It was ſtill in his power (notwithſtanding Davids Caveat) to have laid downe his hoare-head in the grave, without blood: The juſt God infatuates thoſe whom he meanes to plague: Two of Shimeis ſervants are fled to Gath; & now he ſaddles his Aſſe & is gone to fetch them backe; Either (he thinkes) this word of Salomon is forgotten, or in the multitude of greater affaires not heeded; or this ſo ſmall an occurrence will not come to his eare: Coveteouſneſſe and preſumption of impunity are the deſtruction of many a ſoule; Shimei ſeekes his ſervants, and loſes himſelfe; How many are there who cry out of this folly and

A and yet imitate it: These earthly things either are our servants or should be; how commonly doe we see men run out of the bounds, set by Gods Law, to hunt after them, till their soules incurre a fearefull judgement?

Princes have thousands of eyes & eares: If Shimei wil for more secresie sadle his own Asse, and take (as is like) the benefit of night, for his passage; his journey cannot be hid from Salomon. How warie had those men need to be that are obnoxious? Without delay is Shimei complained of, convented, charged with violation both of the oath of God, and the injunction of Salomon; and that all these might appeare to be but an occasion of that punishment, whose cause was more remote, now is all that old venom laid before him, which his malice had long since spit at Gods anointed: Thou knowest all the wickednesse, whereto thine heart is privy, that thou didst to David my father.

Had this old tally been stricken off; yet could not Shimei have pleaded ought for
B his life: For, had he said; Let not my Lord the King be thus mortally displeased for so small an offence: Who ever died for passing over Kidron? What man is the worse for my harmelesse journey? It had soon been returned. If the act be small, yet the circūstances are deadly: The commands of Soveraigne authority make the sleightest duties weighty; If the journey be harmelesse, yet not the disobedience. It is not for subjects to poise the Princes charge in the scales of their weake constructions; but they must suppose it ever to be of such importance, as is pretended by the Commander: Besides the precept, here was a mutuall adjuration; Shimei swore not to goe; Salomon swore his death if he went; the one oath must be revenged, the other must be kept: If Shimei were false in offending, Salomon will be just in punishing. Now therefore, that which Abishai the son of Zerviah wished to have done in the greennesse of the C wound, and was repelled; after long festering Benaiah is commanded to doe: The stones that Shimei threw at David struck not so deep, as Benaiahs sword; The tongue that cursed the Lords anointed hath paid the head to boot. Vengeance against rebels may sleep, it cannot die: A sure, if late, judgement attends those that dare lift up either the hand or tongue against the sacred persons of Gods vice-gerents. How much lesse will the God of heaven suffer unrevenged the insolencies, and blasphemies against his owne divine Majesty? It is a fearefull word, He should not be just if hee should hold these guiltlesse.

After so many messages and proofes of grace, Salomon begins doubtfully both for his match, and for his devotion: If Pharaohs daughter were not a Proselyte, his earely choyce was (besides unwarrantable) dangerous: The high places not onely stood, but were frequented, both by the people, and King; I doe not finde David climbing up those mis-hallowed hills, in an affection of the variety of Altars; Salomon doth so, and yet loves the Lord, and is loved of God againe: Such is the mercy of our God, that he will not suffer our wel-meant weaknesses to bereave us of his favours: he rather pities, then plagues us for the infirmities of upright hearts. 1. Kin. 3d

E Gibeon was well worthy to be the chiefe, yea the onely high place; There was the allowed Altar of God, there was the Tabernacle, though (as then) severed from the Arke, thither did young Salomon go up; and, as desiring to begin his raigne with God, there he offers no lesse then a thousand sacrifices.

Salomon worships God by day; God appeares to Salomon by night; Well may we looke to enjoy God, when we have served him; The night cannot but be happy whose day hath been holy.

It was no unusuall course with God to reveale himself unto his servants by dreams; So did he here to Salomon; who saw more with his eies shut, then ever they could see open, even him that was invisible: The good King had offered unto God a thousand burnt sacrifices, and now God offered him his option, Ask what I shall give thee: He whose the beasts are on a thousand mountaines graciously accepts a small returne of his owne. It ſtands not with the munificence of a bountifull God to be indebted to his creature, we cannot give him ought unrecompenced: There is no way wherein we can be ſo liberall to our ſelves, as by giving to the poſſeſſor of all things. And art thou ſtill, O God, leſſe free unto us thy meaner ſervants under the Goſpell? Haſt thou not ſaid, What ſoever yee ſhall aske the Father in my name, it ſhall be given you? Only give us grace not to be wanting unto thee, and we know thou canſt not ſuffer any thing to be wanting unto us.

The night followes the temper of the day; and the heart ſo uſeth to ſleepe, as it wakes: Had not the thoughts of Salomon been intent upon wiſdome by day, he had not made it his ſuit in his dreame: There needs no leiſure of deliberation: The heart was ſo fore-ſtalled with the love, and admiration of wiſdome, that not abiding the leaſt motion of a competition, it faſtens on that grace it had longed for: Give unto thy ſervant an underſtanding heart, to judge thy people. Had not Salomon been wiſe before, he had not knowne the worth of wiſdome, he had not preferred it in his deſires; The dung-hill cockes of the World cannot know the price of this pearle; thoſe that have it, know that all other excellencies are but traſh, & rubbiſh unto it. Salomon was a great King, and ſaw that he had power enough, but withall, he found that royalty, without wiſdome, was no other then eminent diſhonour; There is no trade of life whereto there belongs not a peculiar wiſdome; without which there is nothing but a tedious unprofitableneſſe; much more to the higheſt, and buſieſt vocation, the regiment of men: As God hath no reaſon to give his beſt favours unasked; ſo hath he no will to with-hold them where they are asked.

Hee that in his cradle had the title of Beloved of God, is now beloved more in the throne for the love and deſire of wiſdome; this ſoile could never have born this fruit alone; Salomon could not ſo much as have dreamed of wiſdome, if God had not put it into him; and now God takes the ſuit ſo well, as if he were beholden to his creature for wiſhing the beſt to it ſelfe: and becauſe Salomon hath asked what he ſhould, hee ſhall now receive both what he asked, and what he asked not: Riches and honor ſhall be given him into the match. So doth God love a good choyce, that he recompenſes it with over-giving: Could we but firſt ſeek the Kingdome of God and his righteouſneſſe, all theſe earthly things ſhould be ſuper-added to us; Had Salomon made wealth his boon, he had failed both of riches and wiſdome; now he askes the beſt, and ſpeeds of all; They are in a faire way of happineſſe that can pray well; It was no diſ-comfort to Salomon, that he awaked and found it a dreame; for he knew this dreame was divine, and oracular; and he already found in his firſt waking, the reall performance of what was promiſed him ſleeping: Such illumination did he ſenſibly finde in all the roomes of his heart, as if God had now given him a new ſoul: No marvell if Salomon now returning from the Tabernacle to the Arke, teſtified his joy and thankfulneſſe by burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, and publike feaſtings; The heart that hath found in it ſelfe the lively teſtimonies of Gods preſence, and favour, cannot containe it ſelfe from outward expreſſions.

God likes not to have his gifts lie dead where he hath conferred them; Iſrael ſhall ſoon witneſſe they have a King enlightened from heaven; in whom wiſdome did not ſtay for heires, did not admit of any parallel in his predeceſſors. The all-wiſe God wil find occaſions to draw forth thoſe graces to uſe and light, which he hath beſtowed on man; Two Harlots come before young Salomon with a difficult plea; It is not like, the Princes eare was the firſt that heard this complaint; there was a ſubordinate courſe of juſtice for the determination of theſe meaner incidences: the hardneſſe of this deciſion brought the matter, through all the bēches of inferior judicature, to the Tribunal of Salomon; The very Iſraelitiſh Harlots were not ſo unnatural as ſome now adayes that counterfeit honeſty; Theſe ſtrive for the fruit of their womb, ours to put them off; One ſon is yet alive, two mothers contend for him. The children were alike for feature, for age, the mothers were alike for reputation: here can be no evidence from others eyes; Whether's now is the living Child, and whether's is the dead? Had Salomon gone about to wring forth the truth by tortures, he had perhaps plagued the innocent, and added paine to the miſery of her loſſe; the weaker had been guilty, and

A the more able to beare, had carried away both the child and the victory: The countenance of either of the mothers bewrayed an equality of passion; Sorrow possessed the one, for the sonne she had lost; and the other, for the sonne she was in danger to leese: Both were equally peremptory, and importunate in their claime; It is in vain to thinke that the true part can be discerned by the vehemence of their challenge: Falshood is oft-times more clamorous then truth; No witnesses can be produced; They two dwelt apart under one roofe: and if some neighbours have seene the children at their birth, and circumcision, yet how little difference, how much change is there in the favour of Infants? how doth death alter more confirmed lines?

The impossibility of proofe makes the guilty more confident, more impudent; the true mother pleads that her child was taken away at midnight by the other; but B in her sleep; she saw it not, she felt it not: and if all her senses could have witnessed it, yet, here was but the affirmation of the one, against the deniall of the other, which in persons alike credible doe but counterpoise. What is there now to lead the Judge, since there is nothing either in the act, or circumstances, or persons, or plea, or evidence that might sway the sentence? Salomon wel saw that when all outward proofes failed, there was an inward affection, which if it could be fetcht out, would certainly bewray the true mother; he knew sorrow might more easily be dissembled then naturall love; both sorrowed for their owne, both could not love, one, as theirs: To draw forth then this true proofe of motherhood, Salomon cals for a sword: Doubtlesse, some of the wiser hearers smiled upon each other; and thought in themselves, What, will the young King cut these knotty causes in peeces? Will he divide Justice C with edge tooles? will he smite at hazard before conviction? The actions of wise Princes are ridles to vulgar constructions; neither is it for the shallow capacities of the multitude to fadome the deep projects of Soveraigne authority: That sword which had served for execution, shall now serve for tryall; Divide ye the living child in twain, and give the one halfe to the one, & the other halfe to the other; Oh divine oracle of Justice, commanding that which it would not have done, that it might finde out that which could not be discovered! Neither God, nor his Deputies may be so taken at their words, as if they alwaies intended their commands for action, and not sometimes for probation.

This sword hath already pierced the breast of the true mother; and divided her heart with feare, and griefe at so killing a sentence: There needs no other racke to D discover nature; and now she thinks, wo is me that came for justice, and am answered with cruelty; Divide ye the living child? Alas, what hath that poore infant offended? that it survives, and is sued for? How much lesse miserable had I been, that my childe had been smothered in my sleep, then mangled before mine eyes? If a dead carcasse could have satisfied me, I needed not to have complained: What a wofull condition am I falne into, who am accused to have been the death of my supposed childe already, and now shall be the death of my owne? If there were no losse of my childe, yet how can I endure this torment of mine owne bowels? How can I live to see this part of my selfe sprawling under that bloody sword? And whiles she thinkes thus, she sues to that suspected mercy of her just Judge, Oh my Lord, give her the living child, & slay him not: as thinking, if he live he shall but change a mother; if he die, his mother lo- E seth a son; whiles he lives, it shall be my comfort that I have a son, though I may not call him so: dying, he perisheth to both; it is better he should live to wrong a mother, then to neither: Contrarily her envious competitor, as holding her selfe well satisfied that her neighbour should be as childlesse, as her selfe, can say, Let it be neither mine nor thine, but divide it; Well might Salomon, and every hearer conclude, that either she was no mother, or a monster, that could be content with the murder of her childe; and that if she could have been the true mother, and yet have desired the blood of her infant, she had been as worthy to have been stript of her childe for so foule unnaturalnes, as the other had been worthy to enjoy him for her honest compassiō. Not more justly then wisely therefore doth Salomon trace the true mother by the footsteps of love, & pity; & adjudgeth the child to those bowels that had yerned at his danger.

Even in morality it is thus also: Truth as it is one, so it loves intireneſſe; falshood, diviſion: Satan that hath no right to the heart, would be content with a peece of it: God that made it all, will have either the whole, or none: The erroneous Church ſtrives with the true, for the living childe of ſaving doctrine; each claimes it for her owne; Hereſie, conſcious of her owne injuſtice, could be content to goe away with a leg, or an arme of ſound principles, as hoping to make up the reſt with her owne mixtures: Truth cannot abide to part with a joynt, and will rather endure to leeſe all by violence, then a peece through a willing connivency.

The Temple.

1 King. 5. 17. IT is a weake and injurious cenſure that taxeth Salomons ſlacknes in founding the houſe of God: Great bodies muſt have but ſlow motions; He was wiſe that ſaid, the matters muſt be al prepared without, ere we build within: And if David have laid ready a great part of the metals & timber, yet many a tree muſt be felled and ſquared, & many a ſtone hewn and poliſhed, ere this foundation could be laid; neither could thoſe large Cedars be cut, ſawne, ſeaſoned in one yeare: Foure yeares are ſoone gone in ſo vaſt a preparation: David had not been ſo intire a friend to Hiram, if Hiram had not been a friend to God: Salomons wiſdome hath taught him to make uſe of ſo good a neighbour, of a fathers friend; he knew that the Tyrians skill was not given them for nothing; Not Jewes onely, but Gentiles muſt have their hand in building the Temple of God; Onely Jewes medled with the Tabernacle, but the Temple is not built without the aide of Gentiles; They, together with us, make up the Church of God.

Even Pagans have their arts from heaven; how juſtly may we improve their graces to the ſervice of the God of heaven? if their be a Tyrian that can work more curiouſly in gold, in ſilver, in braſſe, in iron, in purple, and blew ſilke, then an Iſraelite, why ſhould not he be imployed about the Temple? their heatheniſme is their owne; their skill is their Makers: Many a one workes for the Church of God, that yet hath no part in it.

Salomon raiſes a tribute for the worke; not of money, but of men: Thirty thouſand Iſraelites are levied for the ſervice; yet not continuedly, but with intermiſſion, their labour is more generous, and leſſe preſſing: it is enough if they keep their courſes one moneth in Lebanon, two at home; ſo as ever ten thouſand work, whiles twenty thouſand breathe. So favourable is God to his creature, that he requires us not to be over-toyled in the workes of his owne ſervice. Due reſpirations are requiſite in the holieſt acts. The maine ſtreſſe of the worke lies upon Proſelytes; whoſe both number, and paines was herein more then the Natives: An hundred and fifty thouſand of them are imployed in bearing burthens, in hewing ſtones; beſides their three thouſand three hundred over-ſeers: Now were the deſpiſed Gibeonites of good uſe, and in vaine doth Iſrael wiſh that the zeale of Saul had not robbed them of ſo ſerviceable drudges.

There is no man ſo meane but may be ſome way uſefull to the Houſe of God; Thoſe that cannot work in gold, and ſilver, and ſilke, yet may cut and hew; and thoſe that cannot do neither, yet may cary burthens: Even the ſervices that are more homely, are not leſſe neceſſary: Who can diſ-hearten himſelfe in the conſcience of his owne inſufficiency, when he ſees, God can as well ſerve himſelfe of his labour, as of his skill?

The Temple is framed in Lebanon, and ſet up in Sion; neither hammer nor axe was heard in that holy ſtructure; There was nothing but noiſe in Lebanon, nothing in Sion but ſilence and peace. What ever tumults are abroad, it is fit there ſhould be all quietneſſe and ſweet concord in the Church; Oh God, that the axes of ſchiſme, or the hammers of furious contentions ſhould be heard within thy Sanctuary! Thine houſe is not built with blowes, with blowes it is beaten downe: Oh knit the hearts of thy ſervants together in the unity of the ſpirit, and the bond of peace; that we may minde

A minde and ſpeake the ſame things, that thou who art the God of peace, maiſt take pleaſure to dwell under the quiet rooſe of our hearts.

Now is the foundation laid, and the wals riſing of that glorious fabrick, which all Nations admired, and all times have celebrated; Even thoſe ſtones which were laid in the Baſe of the building were not ragged and rude, but hewne and coſtly: the part that lyes covered with earth from the eyes of all beholders, is no leſſe precious, then thoſe that are more conſpicuous: God is not all for the eye, he pleaſeth himſelfe with the hidden value of the living ſtones of his ſpirituall Temple; How many noble graces of his ſervants have been buried in obſcurity; not diſcerned ſo much as by their owne eyes? which yet as he gave, ſo he crowneth: Hypocrites regard nothing but ſhew, God nothing but truth.

B The matter of ſo goodly a frame ſtrives with the proportion, whether ſhall more excell: Here was nothing but white Marble without; nothing but Cedar and Gold within: upon the hill of Sion ſtands that glittering and ſnowy pile, which both inviteth and dazeleth the eyes of paſſengers afarre off; ſo much more precious within, as Cedar is better then ſtone, gold then Cedar; No baſe thing goes to the making up of Gods Houſe: If Satan may have a dwelling, he cares not though he patch it up of the rubbiſh of ſtone, or rotten ſticks, or droſſe of metals: God will admit of nothing that is not pure and exquiſite; His Church conſiſts of none but the faithfull, his habitation is in no heart but the gracious.

The faſhion was no other then that of the Tabernacle; onely this was more coſtly, more large, more fixed; God was the ſame that dwelt in both, he varied not; the C ſame myſtery was in both; Onely it was fit there ſhould be a proportion betwixt the worke and the builder: The Tabernacle was erected in a popular eſtate, the Temple in a Monarchy; it was fit this ſhould favour of the munificence of a King, as that of the zeale of a multitude; That was erected in the flitting condition of Iſrael in the deſert: this, in their ſetled reſidence in the promiſed Land: it was fit therefore that ſhould be framed for motion, this for reſt. Both of them were diſtinguiſhed into three remarkable diviſions, whereof each was more noble, more reſerved then other.

But what doe we bend our eyes upon ſtone, and wood, and metals? God would never have taken pleaſure in theſe dead materials for their owne ſakes, if they had not had a further intendment: Me thinkes I ſee foure Temples in this one. It is but D one in matter, as the God that dwels in it is but one: three yet more, in reſemblance: according to diviſion of them in whom it pleaſeth God to inhabite: For where ever God dwels, there is his Temple; Oh God thou vouchſafeſt to dwell in the beleeving heart; as we thy ſilly creatures have our being in thee, ſo thou the Creator of heaven and earth haſt thy dwelling in us. The heaven of heavens is not able to contain thee, and yet thou diſdaineſt not to dwell in the ſtrait lodgings of our renewed ſoule. So then, becauſe Gods children are many, and thoſe many divided in reſpect of themſelves, though united in their head, therefore this Temple which is but one in collection as God is one, is manifold in the diſtribution, as the Saints are many; each man bearing about him a little ſhrine of this infinite Majeſty: And for that the moſt generall diviſion of the Saints is in their place and eſtate; ſome ſtrugling, and toyling in E this earthly warfare, others triumphing in heavenly glory; therefore hath God two other, more univerſal Temples; One, the Church of his Saints on earth; the other, the higheſt heaven of his Saints glorified. In all theſe, O God, thou dwelleſt for ever, and this materiall houſe of thine is a cleere repreſentation of theſe three ſpirituall; Elſe what were a Temple made with hands unto the God of ſpirits? And though one of theſe was a true type of all, yet how are they all exceeded each by other? This of ſtone, though moſt rich and coſtly, yet what is it to the living Temple of the holy Ghoſt, which is our body? What is the Temple of this body of ours, to the Temple of Chriſts body, which is his Church? And what is the Temple of Gods Church on earth, to that which triumpheth glorioufly in heaven?

How eaſily doe we ſee all theſe in this one viſible Temple: which as it had three diſtinctions of roomes; the Porch, the Holy-place, the Holy of Holies, ſo is each of them answered spiritually: In the Porch we finde the regenerate soule entring into the blessed society of the Church: In the holy place, the Communion of the true visible Church on earth, selected from the world: In the Holy of Holies (whereinto the high-Priest entred once a yeare) the glorious heaven, into which our true high-Priest, Christ Iesus, entred once for all to make an atonement betwixt God and man. In all these what a meet correspondence there is both in proportion, matter, situation?

In proportion; The same rule that skilfull carvers observe in the cutting out of the perfect statue of a man, that the height be thrice the breadth, and the breadth one third of the height, was likewise duely observed in the fabrick of the Temple: whose length was double to the height, & treble to the breadth, as being sixety cubits long, thirty high, and twenty broad; How exquisite a symmetry hast thou ordained (O God) betwixt the faithfull heart, and thy Church on earth, with that in heaven: how accurate in each of these, in all their powers and parts compared wich other? So hath God ordered the beleeving soule, that it hath neither too much shortnesse of grace, nor too much height of cõceit, nor too much breadth of passion; So hath he ordered his visible Church, that there is a necessary inequality, without any disproportion; an height of government, a length of extent, a breadth of jurisdiction duely answerable to each other; So hath he ordered his triumphant Church above, that it hath a length of eternity, answered with an height of perfection, and a breadth of incomprehensible glory.

In matter; All was here of the best; The wood was precious, sweet, lasting: The stones beautifull, costly, insensible of age; The gold pure and glittering: So are the graces of Gods children, excellent in their nature, deare in their acceptation, eternal in their use: So are the ordinances of God in his Church, holy, comfortable, irrefragable. So is the perfection of his glorified Saints incomparable, unconceivable.

In situation; The outer parts were here more common, the inward more holy, and peculiarly reserved: I finde one Court of the Temple open to the uncleane, to the uncircumcised: within that, another, open onely to the Israelites; and of them, to the cleane; within that, yet another, proper onely to the Priests and Levites; where was the Brazen Altar for sacrifice, and the Brazen Sea for washings: The eyes of the Laitie might follow their oblations in hither, their feet might not.

Yet more, in the covered roomes of the Temple, there is, whither the Priests only may enter, not the Levites; there is, whither the high Priest onely may enter, not his brethren.

It is thus in every renewed man, the individual temple of God; the outward parts are allowed common to God and the world, the inwardest and secretest, which is the heart, is reserved onely for the God that made it. It is thus in the Church visible, the false and foule hearted hypocrite hath accesse to the holy ordinances of God, and treads in his courts; onely the true Christian hath intire and private conversation with the holy One of Israel: He onely is admitted into the Holy of Holies, and enters within the glorious vaile of heaven.

If from the wals we looke unto the furniture: What is the Altar whereon our sacrifices of prayer and praises are offered to the Almighty, but a contrite heart? What the golden candlestickes, but the illumined understanding, wherein the light of the knowledge of God, and his divine will shineth for ever? What the Tables of Shew-bread, but the sanctified memory, which keepeth the bread of life continually? Yea if we shall presume so farre as to enter into the very closet of Gods Oracle; even there, O God, doe we finde our unworthy hearts so honoured by thee, that they are made the very Arke, wherein thy Royall law, and the pot of thy heavenly Manna is kept for ever; and from whose propitiatory, shaded with the wings of thy glorious Angels, thou giveſt thy gracious Testimonies of thy good Spirit, witnessing with ours, that we are the children of thee the living God.

Behold, if Salomon built a Temple unto thee, thou hast built a Temple unto thy selfe in us. We are not only through thy grace living stones in thy Temple, but living Temples in thy Sion: Oh doe thou ever dwell in this thine house, and in this thy house

A house let us ever serve thee: Wherefore else hast thou a Temple, but for thy presence with us, and for our worshipping of thee? The time was, when, as thy people, so thy selfe, didst lodge in flitting Tents, ever shifting, ever moving; thence thou thoughtest best to sojourne both in Shilo, and the roofe of Obed Edom; After that, thou condescendedst to settle thine abode with men, and wouldst dwell in an house of thine owne, at thy Jerusalem. So didst thou in the beginning lodge with our first Parents in a Tent; sojourne with Israel under the Law; and now makest a constant residence under the Gospell, in the hearts of thy chosen children; from whence thou wilt remove no more; they shall remove from the world, from themselves, thou shalt not remove from them.

Wheresoever thou art, O God, thou art worthy of adoration; Since thou ever wilt dwell in us, be thou ever worshipped in us: Let the Altars of our cleane hearts send
B up ever to thee the sweetest perfumed smoakes of our holy meditations and faithfull prayers, and cheerfull thanksgivings: Let the pure lights of our faith, and godly conversation shine ever before thee, and men, and never be put out: let the bread of life stand ever ready upon the pure, and precious tables of our hearts. Locke up thy Law, and thy Manna within us; and speake comfortably to us from thy Mercy-seat. Suffer nothing to enter in hither that is uncleane: Sanctifie us unto thy selfe, and be thou sanctified in us.

Salomon, and the Queene of Sheba.

C GOD hath no use of the dark lanternes of secret, and reserved perfections; We our selves doe not light up Candles to put them under bushels. The great lights whether of heaven or earth, are not intended to obscuritie; but as to give light unto others, so to be seen themselves; Dan and Beersheba were too strait bounds for the fame of Salomon; which now hath flown over all lands and seas, and raised the world to an admiration of his more then humane wisdome. Even so, O thou everlasting King of Peace, thy name is great among the Gentiles; There is no speech nor language where the report of thee is not heard; The sound of thee is gone forth through all the earth; Thy name is an ointment poured out, therefore the virgins
D love thee. 1 King. 10

No doubt, many from all coasts came to learn and wonder; none with so much note as this noble daughter of Cham: Who her selfe deserves the next wonder to him whom she came to heare, and admire; That a woman, a Princesse, a rich and great Queene, should travell from the remotest South, from Saba, a region famous for the greatest delicacies of nature, to learne wisdome, is a matchlesse example. We know Merchants that venture to either Indies for wealth; Others we know daily to crosse the seas for wanton curiosity: Some few Philosophers we have known to have gone farre for learning; and amongst Princes it is no unusuall thing to send their Ambassadors to far distant Kingdomes, for transaction of businesses, either of State, or com-
E merce; but that a royall Lady should in person undertake and overcome so tedious a journey, onely to observe, and inquire into the mysteries of nature, art, religion, is a thing past both parallel, and imitation; Why doe we thinke any labour great, or any way long, to heare a greater then Salomon? How justly shall the Queene of the South rise up in judgment, and condemne us, who may heare wisdome crying in our streets and neglect her?

Certainly so wealthy a Queene, and so great a lover of wisdome could not want great scholars at home: them she had first opposed with her enigmaticall demands; and now finding her selfe unsatisfied, she takes her selfe to this Oracle of God, It is a good thing to doubt, better to be resolved: The minde that never doubts shall learne nothing; the minde that ever doubts shall never profit by learning: Our doubts onely serve to stirre us up to seeke truth; our resolutions settle us in the truth we have found. There were no pleasure in resolutions if we had not been formerly troubled with with doubts; There were nothing but discomfort and disquietnesse in doubts, if it were not for the hope of resolution: It is not safe to suffer doubts to dwel too long upon the heart; there may be good use of them as passengers, dangerous as inmates: Happy are we if we can finde a Salomon to remove them.

Fame as it is alwayes a blab, so oft-times a lyer. The wise Princesse found cause to distrust so uncertain an informer: whose reports are still either doubtful, or fabulous; and like windes, or streames, increase in passing: If very great things were not spoken of Salomon, fame should have wronged him; and if but just rumours were spread of his wisdome, there needed much credulity to beleeve them. This great Queene would not suffer her selfe to be led by the eares; but comes in person to examine the truth of foraine relations. How much more unsafe is it in the most important businesses of our soules, to trust the opinions and reports of others? Those eares and eyes are ill bestowed that doe not serve to choose and judge for their owners.

When we come to a rich treasure, we need not be bidden to carry away what we are able. This wise Lady as she came far for knowledge, so finding the plenty of this veine, she would not depart without her full load: there was nothing wherein she would leave her selfe unsatisfied: she knew that she could not every day meet with a Salomon; and therefore she makes her best use of so learned a master: Now she empties her heart of all her doubts; and fils it with instruction. It is not good neglecting the opportunities of furnishing our soules with profitable, with saving knowledge. There is much wisdome in moving a question well, though there be more in assoiling it: What use doe we make of Salomons Teacher, if sitting at the feete of Christ we leave our hearts either ignorant, or perplexed?

As if the errand of this wealthy Queene had been to buy wisdome, she came with her Camels laden with gold, and precious stones, and rich odours: Though to a mighty King she will not come to schoole empty-handed: If she came to fetch an invaluable treasure, she findes it reason to give thankes unto him that kept it. As he is a foole that hath a price in his hand to get wisdome, and wants an heart: So is he unthankfull that hath an heart to get wisdome, & hath no price in his hand; A price not countervailable to what he seekes, but retributory to him of whom he seekes. How shamefull is it to come alwayes with close hands to them that teach us the great mysteries of salvation?

Expectation is no better then a kinde enemy to good deserts: We leese those objects which we over-look. Many had been admired if they had not been over-much befriended by fame; who now in our judgement are cast as much below their ranke, as they were fore-imagined above it. This disadvantage had wise Salomon with this stranger, whom rumour had bid to look for incredible excellencies; yet so wonderfull were the graces of Salomon, that they overcame the highest expectation, and the liberallest beliefe: So as when she saw the architecture of his buildings, the provisions of his tables, the order of his attendants, the religion of his sacrifices, she confessed both her unjust incredulity in not beleeving the report of his wisdome, and the injurie of report, in understanding it. I beleeved not the words till I came, and mine eyes had seene it, and lo the one halfe was not told me. Her eyes were more sure informers then her eares. She did not so much heare as see Salomons wisdome in these reall effects. His answers did not so much demonstrate it, as his prudent governement. There are some whose speeches are witty, whiles their cariage is weake; whose deeds are incongruities, whiles their words are Apothegms. It is not worth the name of wisedome that may be heard onely, and not seene: Good discourse is but the froth of wisdome; the pure and solid substance of it is in well framed actions; if we know these things, happy are we if we doe them.

And if this great person admired the wisdome, and buildings, the domesticke order of Salomon, and chiefely his stately ascent into the House of the Lord; how should our soules be taken up with wonder at thee, O thou true son of David, and Prince of everlasting peace, who receivedst the spirit not by measure? who hast built this glorious house, not made with hands, even the heaven of heavens? whose infinite providence hath sweetly disposed of all the family of thy creatures, both in heaven and earth:

A earth; and who lastly didst ascend up on high, and ledst captivity captive, and gavest gifts to men?

So well had this studious Ladie profited by the Lectures of that exquisite Master; that now she envies, she magnifies none but them who may live within the ayre of Salomons wisdome: Happy are the men, and happy are thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and that heare thy wisdome. As if shee could have beene content to have changed her Throne for the footstoole of Salomon. It is not easie to conceive how great a blessing it is to live under those lips, which do both preserve knowledge and utter it: If we were not glutted with good counsell, we should find no relish in any worldly contentment in comparison thereof: But, he that is full despiseth an hony-combe.

She, whom her own experience had taught how happy a thing it is to have a skil-
B full Pilot sitting at the sterne of the State, blesseth Israel for Salomon, blessed God for Israel, blesseth Salomon and Israel mutually in each other; Blessed be the Lord thy God which delighteth in thee, to set thee on the Throne of Israel. Because the Lord loved Israel for ever, therefore made he thee King to doe judgment and justice. It was not more Salomons advancement to be King of Israel, then it was the advancement of Israel to be governed by a Salomon. There is no earthly proofe of Gods love to any Nation comparable to the substitution of a wise and pious governour: to him we owe our peace, our life, and which is deservedly dearer, the life of our soules, the Gospel. But, oh God how much hast thou loved thine Israel for ever, in that thou hast set over it that righteous branch of Iesse, whose name is Wonderfull, Counseller, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace: In whose dayes Iudah shall be saved, and Israel
C shall dwell safely? Sing O heaven, and rejoyce O earth, and breake forth into singing, O mountaines, for God hath comforted his people, and will have everlasting mercy upon his afflicted.

The Queene of Sheba did not bring her gold and precious stones to looke on, or to re-carie, but to give to a wealthier then her selfe. She gives therefore to Salomon an hundred & twenty talents of gold, besides costly stones and odours. He that made silver in Hierusalem as stones, is yet richly presented on all hands. The rivers still runne into the Sea; To him that hath shall be given: How should we bring unto thee O thou King of Heaven, the purest gold of thine owne graces, the sweetest odours of our obediences? Was not this withall a type of that homage which should bee done unto thee, O Saviour, by the heads of the Nations? The Kings of Tarshish and D the Iles bring presents: the Kings of Sheba and Saba bring gifts; yea all Kings shall worship thee, all Nations shall serve thee. They cannot enrich themselves but by giving unto hee.

It could not stand with Salomons magnificence to receive rich courtesies without a returne: The greater the person was, the greater was the obligation of requitall; The gifts of meane persons are taken but as tributes of duty; it is dishonourable to take from equals, and not to retribute: There was not therefore more freedome in her gift, then in her receite: Her owne will was the measure of both; She gave what she would, she received what soever she would aske; And shee had little profited by Salomons schoole, if she had not learned to aske the best: She returnes therefore
E more richly ladē then she came: she gave to Salomon as a thankfull Client of wisdom; Salomon returnes to her as a munificent Patrone, according to the liberality of a King. We shall be sure to be gainers by whatsoever we give unto thee, O thou God of wisdome and peace: Oh that we could come from the remote regions of our infidelity, and worldlinesse, to learne wisdome of thee, who both teachest and givest it abundantly, without upbraiding, without grudging; and could bring with us the poore presents of our faithfull desires, and sincere services: how wouldst thou receive us with a gracious acceptation, and send us away laden with present comfort, with eternall glory?

Salomons

Salomons defection.

1 King. 11.

SInce the first man Adam, the world hath not yeelded either so great an example of wisdome, or so fearefull an example of apostasie as Salomon: What humane knowledge Adam had in the perfection of nature by creation, Salomon had by infusion; both fully, both from one fountaine: If Adam called all creatures by their names, Salomon spake from the Cedars of Lebanon, to the mosse that springs out of the wall; and besides these vegetables there was no Beast, nor Fowle, nor Fish, nor creeping thing that escaped his discourse. Both fell, both fell by one meanes; as Adam, so might Salomon have said; The woman deceived me: It is true indeed, that Adam fell as all; Salomon as one; yet so as that this one is the patterne of the frailty of all. If knowledge could have given an immunity from sin, both had stood. Affections are those feet of the soule, on which it either stands, or fals; Salomon loved many outlandish women: I wonder not if the wise King mis-caried; Every word hath bane enough for a man: Women, many women, outlandish, idolatrous, & those not onely had, but doted on; Sexe, multitude, nation, condition, all conspired to the ruine of a Salomon: If one woman undid all mankinde, what marvell is it if many women undid one? yet had those many been the daughters of Israel, they had tempted him onely to lust; not to mis-devotion; now they were of those Nations, whereof the Lord had said to the children of Israel, Go not ye in to them, nor let them come in to you, for surely they will turne your hearts after their gods; to them did Salomon joyne in love; who can marvell if they dis-joyned his heart from God. Satan hath found this bait to take so well, that he never changed it since he crept into Paradise. How many have we knowne whose heads have been broken with their owne rib?

In the first world the sonnes of God saw the daughters of men, and tooke them wives of all they liked; they multiplied not children, but iniquities: Balaam knew well if the dames of Moab could make the Israelites wantons, they should soone make them Idolaters: All lyes open where the covenant is not both made with the eye, and kept.

It was the charge of God to the Kings of Israel before they were, that they should not multiply Wives. Salomon hath gone beyond the stakes of the Law, & now is ready to leese himselfe amongst a thousand bed-fellowes; Who so laies the reines in the neck of his carnall appetite, cannot promise where he will rest. Oh Salomon, where was thy wisdome, whiles thine affections runne away with thee into so wilde a voluptuousnesse? What bootes it thee to discourse of all things, whiles thou mis-knoweſt thy selfe? The perfections of speculation doe not argue the inward powers of selfe-government; The eye may be cleare, whiles the hand is palsied. It is not so much to be heeded how the soule is informed, as how it is disciplined; The light of knowledge doth well, but the due order of the affections doth better: Never any meer man since the first, knew so much as Salomon, many that have known lesse have had more command of themselves: A competent estate well husbanded, is better then a vast patrimony neglected.

There can be no safety to that soule where is not a strait curbe upon our desires: If our lusts be not held under as slaves, they will rule as tyrants. Nothing can prevent the extremity of our mis-cariage but early and strong denials of our concupiscence: Had Salomon done thus, delicacie and lawlesse greatnesse had not led him into these bogs of intemperance.

The wayes of youth are steepe and slippery, wherein as it is easie to fall, so it is commonly relieved with pity; but the wanton inordinations of age are not more unseasonable then odious; yet behold Salomons yonger yeares were studious, and innocent, his over-hastened age was licencious and mis-governed; For, when Salomon was old, his wives turned away his heart after other gods: If any age can secure us from the danger of a spirituall fall, it is our last; and if any mans old age might secure him, it

A was Salomon; the beloved of God, the Oracle, the miracle of wisdome. Who would have looked but that the blossomes of so hopefull a spring, should have yeelded a goodly and pleasant fruit, in the Autumne of age? yet behold even Salomons old age vicious. There is no time wherein we can be safe, whiles we carry this body of sin about us: Youth is impetuous, mid-age stubborne, old age weake, all dangerous: Say not now; The fury of my youthfull flashes is over, I shall henceforth finde my heart calme and impregnable; whiles thou seest old Salomon doting upon his Concubines, yea upon their Idolatry.

It is no presuming upon time, or meanes, or strength: how many have begun and proceeded well, who yet have shamed themselves in their last stage? If God uphold us not, we cannot stand: If God uphold us, we cannot fal; when we are at the strongest
B it is the best to be weake in our selves; and when at our weakest, strong in him, in whom we can doe all things.

I cannot yet think so hard of Salomon, that he would project his person to Ashteroth the goddesse of the Sidonians, or Milchom the Idol of the Ammonites, or Chemosh the abomination of Moab: He that knew all things from the shrub to the Cedar, could not be ignorant that these statues were but stocks, or stones, or metals, and the powers resembled by them, Devils. It is not like he could be so insensate to adore such Deities; but so farre was the uxorious King blinded with affection, that he gave not passage onely to the Idolatry of his heathenish wives, but furtherance.

So did he dote upon their persons, that he humored them in their sins: Their act is therefore his, because his eyes winckt at it; his hand advanced it: He that built a
C Temple to the living God, for himselfe & Israel in Sion, built a Temple to Chemosh in the mount of Scandall, for his mistresses of Moab, in the very face of Gods House: No hill about Jerusalem was free from a Chappell of Devils: Each of his dames had their Puppets, their Altars, their incense; Because Salomon feeds them in their superstition, he drawes the sinne home to himselfe, and is branded for what he should have forbidden. Even our very permission appropriates crimes to us: Wee need no more guiltinesse of any sinne, then our willing toleration.

Who can but yearne, and feare to see the wofull wracke of so rich and goodly a vessell? O Salomon, wert not thou he whose yonger yeares God honoured with a message and stile of love? To whom God twice appeared; and in a gracious vision renewed the covenant of his favour? Whom he singled out from all the generation
D of men to be the founder of that glorious Temple, which was no lesse cleerely the Type of heaven, then thou wert of Christ the Son of the everliving God? Wert not thou that deep Sea of wisdome which God ordained to send forth rivers and fountaines of all divine, and humane knowledge to all Nations, to all ages? Wert not thou one of those select Secretaries, whose hand it pleased the Almighty to imploy in three peeces of the divine monuments of sacred Scriptures? Which of us dares ever hope to aspire unto thy graces? Which of us can promise to secure our selves from thy ruines? We fall, O God, we fall to the lowest hell, if thou prevent us not, if thou sustaine us not; Vphold thou me according to thy Word that I may live, and let me not be ashamed of my hope. Order my steps in thy word, & let not any iniquity have dominiō over me. All our weaknesse is in our selves, all our strength is in thee. O God, be thou strong
E in our weaknesse, that our weake knees may be ever steddy in thy strength.

But in the midst of the horror of this spectacle (able to affright all the sons of men) behold some glimpse of comfort: was it of Salomon that David his father prophesied; Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast downe: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand: If sensible grace, yet finall mercy was not taken from that beloved of God; In the hardest of this winter, the sap was gone downe to the root, though it shewed not in the branches: Even whiles Salomon removed, that word stood fast, He shall bee my sonne, and I will be his father. He that foresaw his sinne, threatned and limited his correction, If he breake my statutes, and keep not my commandements, then will I visit his transgression with a rod, and his iniquity with stripes; Nevertheless my loving kindnesse will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulnesse to faile; My Covenant will I not breake; nor alter the thing that is gone out of my mouth; Behold the favour of God

doth

doth not depend upon Salomons obedience: If Salomon ſhall ſuffer his faithfulneſſe to faile towards his God; God will not requite him with the failing of his faithfulneſſe to Salomon: If Salomon breake his Covenant with God; God will not breake his Covenant with the father of Salomon, with the ſonne of David: He ſhall ſmart, he ſhall not periſh. Oh gratious word of the God of all mercies, able to give ſtrength to the languiſhing, comfort to the deſpairing, to the dying life! What ſoever we are, thou wilt be ſtill thy ſelfe, O holy One of Iſrael, true to thy Covenant, conſtant to thy Decree; The ſinnes of thy choſen can neither fruſtrate thy counſell, nor out-ſtrip thy mercies. A

Now I ſee Salomon of a wanton lover, a grave Preacher of mortification; I ſee him quenching thoſe inordinate flames with the teares of his repeetance. Me thinkes I heare him ſighing deeply betwixt every word of that his ſolemne penance, which he would needs enjoyne himſelfe before all the world. I have applyed my heart to know the wickedneſſe of folly, even the fooliſhneſſe of madneſſe; and I finde more bitter then death the woman whoſe heart is as nets and ſnares; and her hands as bands: Who ſo pleaſeth God ſhall be delivered from her, but the ſinner ſhall be taken by her. B

Salomon was taken as a ſinner, delivered as a penitent. His ſoule eſcaped as a bird out of the ſnare of the fowlers; the ſnare was broken, and he delivered: It is good for us that he was both taken, and delivered; Taken, that we might not preſume; and that we might not deſpaire, delivered. He ſinned, that we might not ſinne; he recovered, that we may not ſinke under our ſinne.

But, oh the juſtice of God inſeparable from his mercy! Salomons ſinne ſhall not eſcape the rod of men; Rather then ſo wiſe an offender ſhall want enemies, God ſhall raiſe up three adverſaries unto Salomon; Hadad the Edomite, Rezon the King of Aram, Ieroboam the ſonne of Nebat; whereof two were foraine, one domeſticall: Nothing but love and peace founded in the name of Salomon; nothing elſe was found in his reigne, whiles he held in good termes with his God: But when once hee fell foule with his Maker, all things began to be troubled. There are whips laid up againſt the time of Salomons fore-ſeen offence, which are now brought forth for his correction. On purpoſe was Hadad the ſonne of the King of Edom hid in a corner of Egypt from the ſword of David and Ioab, that he might be reſerved for a ſcourge to the exorbitant ſonne of David: God would have us make account that our peace ends with our innocence: The ſame ſinne that ſets debate betwixt God and us, armes the creatures againſt us: It were pity we ſhould bee at any quiet, whiles we are falne out with the God of peace. TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE IAMES LORD HAYE, BARON OF SALEY, Viſcount Doncaſter, Earle of Carlile, one of the Lords of his Majeſties moſt Honourable Privie Councell.

Right Honourable:

I Cannot but thus gratulate to you your happy return from your many & noble imployments; which have made you ſome yeares a ſtranger at home, and ſo renowned abroad, that all the better parts of Europe know and honour your name, no leſſe, then if you had been born theirs: Neither is any of them ſo ſavage, as not to ſay, when they heare mention of your worth, that Vertue is a thouſand Eſcuchions. If now your ſhort breathing-time may allow your Lordſhip the freedome of quiet and holy thoughts, caſt your eyes upon Iſrael and Iudah, upon the Kings and Prophets of both, in ſuch beneficiall variety as prophane Hiſtory ſhall promiſe in vaine. Your Lordſhip ſhall ſee Rehoboam following Salomon in nothing but his ſeat, and his fall; as much more wilfull then his Father, as leſſe wiſe; all head, no heart; loſing thoſe ten Tribes with a churliſh breath, whom hee would (and might not) recover with blood; Jeroboam as crafty, as wicked; plotting a revolt, creating a religion to his ſtate, marring Iſraelites to make ſubjects, branded in his name, ſmitten in his hand, in his loynes. You ſhall ſee a faithfull meſſenger of God, after miraculous proofe of his courage, fidelity, power, good nature, paying deare for a little circumſtance of credulous diſobedience: The Lyon is ſent to call for his blood, as the price of his forbidden harbour: You ſhall ſee the blind Prophet deſcrying the diſguiſe of a Queene, the judgement of the King, the removall of a Prince, too good for Jeroboams heire. You ſhall ſee the right ſtock of royal ſucceſſion flouriſhing in Aſa, whiles that true heire of David (though not without ſome blemiſhes of infirmity) inherits a perfect heart; purges his Kingdome of Sodomy, of Idolatry, not balking ſin even where he honoured nature. You ſhall ſee the wonder of Prophets, Elijah, opening and ſhutting heaven, as his private cheſt; catored for by the Ravens, nor leſſe miraculouſly catoring for the Sareptan, conteſting with Ahab, confronting the Baalites, ſpeaking both fire and water (from heaven) in one evening; meekly laquaying his Soveraigne, weakly flying from Iezebel, fed ſupernaturally by Angels, hid in the Rock of Horeb, confirmed by thoſe dreadfull apparitions, that had confounded ſome other; caſting his mantle upō his homely ſucceſſor, and by the touch of that garment, turning him from a ploughman, to a Prophet. But what do I with-hold your Lordſhip in the bare heads of this inſuing diſcourſe? In all theſe your piercing eyes ſhall eaſily ſee beyond mine, & make my thoughts but a ſtation for a further diſcovery. Your Lordſhips obſervation hath ſtudied men, more then bookes; here it ſhall ſtudy God, more then men; That of bookes hath made you full, that of men judicious, this of God ſhall make you holy and happy: Hitherto ſhall ever tend the wiſhes and endeavours of

in all faithfull obſervance,

REHOBOAM.

WHo would not but have looked that seven hundred wives, & three hundred concubines, should have furnished Salomons Palace with choyce of heires, and have peopled Israel with royall issue? and now behold, Salomon hath by all these but one Son, and him by an Ammonitesse: Many a poore man hath an house-full of children by one wife; whiles this great King hath but one son by many house-fulls of wives: Fertility is not from the meanes, but from the author: It was for Salomon that David sung of old, Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord, and the fruit of the wombe is his reward: How oft doth God deny this heritage of heyres, where he gives the largest heritage of lands; and gives most of these living possessions, where he gives least of the dead? that his blessings may be acknowledged free unto both; entailed upon neither. 1 King. 11 12

As the greatest persons cannot give themselves children, so the wisest cannot give their children wisdome: Was it not of Rehoboam that Salomon said; I hated all my labour which I had taken under the Sunne, because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me; and who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a foole: Yet he shall rule over all my labour, wherein I have laboured, and shewed my selfe wise under the Sunne? All Israel found that Salomons wit was not propagated: Many a foole hath had a wiser sonne, then this wisest father: Amongst many sonnes it is no newes to finde some one defective: Salomon hath but one son, and he no miracle of wisdome: God gives purposely so eminent an instance, to teach men to looke up to heaven, both for heires and graces.

Salomon was both the King of Israel, and the father of Rehoboam, when he was scarce out of his childhood; Rehoboam enters into the Kingdome at a ripe age; yet Salomon was the man, and Rehoboam the childe: Age is no just measure of wisdome: There are beardlesse sages, and gray-headed children: Not the ancient are wise, but the wise is ancient. Israel wanted not for thousands that were wiser then Rehoboam: Yet because they knew him to be the sonne of Salomon, no man makes question of his government: In the case of succession into Kingdomes we may not looke into the qualities of the person, but into the right. So secure is Salomon of the peoples fidelity to Davids seed, that he followes not his fathers example in setting his sonne by him, in his owne throne: here was no danger of a rivality to enforce it; no eminency in the son to merit it; It sufficeth him to know that no bond can be surer then the naturall allegeance of subjects: I doe not finde that the following Kings stood upon the confirmation of their people; but as those that knew the way to their throne, ascended their steps without aid; As yet the soveraignty of Davids house was greene, and unsetled; Israel therefore doth not now come to attend Rehoboam, but Rehoboam goes up to meet Israel. They come not to his Ierusalem, but he goes to their Shechem: To Shechem were all Israel come to make him King, If loyalty drew them together, why not rather to Ierusalem? there the majesty of his fathers Temple, the magnificence of his palace, the very stones in those walls, (besides the strength of his Guard) had pleaded strongly for their subjection; Shechem had been many wayes fatall, was every way incommodious: It is an infinite help or disadvantage that arises from circumstances; the very place puts Israel in minde of a rebellion: There Abimelec had raised up his trecherous usurpation over, and against his brethren: There Gaal against Abimelec: There was Ioseph sold by his brethren: As if the very soile had been stained with perfidiousnesse. The time is no lesse ill chosen; Rehoboam had ill counsell ere he bewrayed it: For had he speedily called up Israel, before Ieroboam could have been sent for out of Egypt, he had found the way cleere: A little delay may leese a great deale of opportunity: What shall we say of both, but that misery is led in, by infatuation?

Had not Israel been somewhat prediſposed to a mutiny, they had never sent into Egypt for such a spokesman as Ieroboam; a fugitive, a traytor to Salomon; long had that crafty conspirator lurked in a forraine Court: The alliances of Princes are not ever necessary bonds of friendship: The brother in law of Salomon harbours this snake in his bosome, and gives that heat, which is repaied with a sting to the posterity of so neer an allye: And now Salomons death calls him back to his native soile. That Israel would entertaine a rebell, it was an ill signe: worse yet, that they will countenance him; worst of all, that they would imploy him: Nothing doth more bewray evill intentions, then the choyce of vicious Agents: Those that meane well will not hazard either the successe, or credit of their actions upon offensive instruments: None but the sluttish will wipe their faces with foule clothes. Upright hearts would have said, as David did to God, so to his Anointed: Doe not I hate them that hate thee? Yea I hate them with a perfect hatred. Ieroboams head had been a fit present to have been tendered unto their new King: and now in stead thereof they tender themselves to Ieroboam, as the head of their faction.

Had not Rehoboam wanted spirits, he had first (after Salomons example) done justice to his fathers traytor, and then have treated of mercy towards his subjects: The people soone found the weaknesse of their new Soveraigne, else they durst not have spoken to him by so obnoxious a tongue: Thy father made our yoake grievous, make thou it lighter and we will serve thee; Doubtlesse the crafty head of Ieroboam was in this suit, which his mouth uttered in the name of Israel; nothing could have been more subtill: It seemed a promise, it was a threat; that which seemed a supplicatiō was a complaint: humility was but a vaile of discontentment; One hand held a paper, the other a sword: Had they said, Free us from Tributes, the capitulation had beene grosse, and strongly savouring of sedition: now they say Ease us, they professe his power to impose, and their willingnesse to yeeld; onely craving favour in the weight of the imposition: If Rehoboam yeeld, he blemishes his father; if he deny, he indangers his Kingdome: His wilfulnesse shall seeme worthily to abandon his scepter, if he stick at so unreasonable a suit: Surely Israel came with a purpose to cavill: Ieroboam had secretly troubled these waters, that he might fish more gainfully: One male-content is enough to embroile a whole Kingdome.

How harshly must it needs sound in the eares of Rehoboam, that the first word he heares from his people, is a querulous challenge of his fathers government: Thy father made our yoake grievous: For ought I see, the suggestion was not more spightfull then unjust: where was the weight of this yoke, the toyle of the services? Here were none of the turmoiles of warre; no traynings, marchings, encampings, entrenchings, watchings, minings, sieges, fortifications; none of that tedious world of worke that attends hostility; Salomon had not his name for nought: All was calme during that long raigne: and if they had payed deare for their peace, they had no cause to complaine of an hard match; The warlike times of Saul and David had exhausted their blood together with their substance; what ingratitude was this to cry out of ease? Yea but that peace brought forth costly and laborious buildings: Gods house, and the

Kings,

A Kings, the walls of Jeruſalem, Hazar, Megiddo, and Gezer, the Cities of ſtore, the Cities of defence, could not riſe without many a ſhoulder: True, but not of any Iſraelites; The remainders of Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Iebuſites, were put to all the drudgery of theſe great workes; the taskes of Iſrael were eaſie, and ingenuous; free from ſervility, free frō painfulneſſe. But the charge was theirs, whoſe-ſoever was the labour: The diet of ſo endleſſe a retiuue, the attendance of his Seraglio, the purveyance for his forty thouſand ſtables, the coſt of his ſacrifices, muſt needs weigh heavy; certainly, if it had layne on none but his owne. But wherefore went Salomons Navy every three yeares to Ophir? to what uſe ſerved the ſix hundred threeſcore and ſix Talents of Gold, that came in one yeare to his Exchequer? Wherefore ſerved the large tributes of foraine nations? How did he make ſilver to be in Jeruſalem as
B ſtones, if the exactions were ſo preſſive? The multitude is ever prone to picke quarrels with their Governors; and whom they feared alive, to cenſure dead; The benefits of ſo quiet and happy a raigne are paſt over in ſilence; the grievances are recounted with clamor: Who can hope that merit or greatneſſe can ſhield him from obloquie, when Salomon is traduced to his owne loynes?

The propoſition of Iſrael puts Rehoboam to a deliberation; Depart ye for three daies; then come againe to me: I heare no other word of his that argued wiſdome; Not to give ſudden reſolutions in caſes of importance was a point that might well beſeeme the ſon of Salomon: I wonder that he who had ſo much wit as to call for leiſure in his anſwer, ſhould ſhew ſo little wit in the improving of that leiſure, in the returne of that anſwer: Who cannot but hope well to ſee the gray heads of Salamons ſecret
C Counſell called to Rehoboams Cabinet? As Counſellors, as ancient, as Salamons, they cannot chooſe but ſee the beſt, the ſafeſt courſe for their new Soveraigne: They had learned of their old Maſter, that a ſoft anſwer appeaſeth wrath; wiſely therefore doe they adviſe him, If thou wilt be a ſervant to this people this day, and ſpeak good words to them, they will be thy ſervants for ever: It was an eaſie condition; with one mouthfull of a breath to purchaſe an everlaſting homage: with one gentle motion of his tongue, to bind all peoples hearts to his allegeance for ever. Yet (as if the motion had been unfit) a new Counſell Table is called: well might this people ſay; What will not Rehoboam grudge us, if he think much to give good words for a Kingdome? There is not more wiſdome in taking variety of advice, where the matter is doubtfull, then
D folly, when it is plaine: The young heads are conſulted; This very change argues weakneſſe. Some reaſon might be pleaded for paſſing from the younger Counſell to the aged; none, for the contrary: Age brings experience; and, it is a ſhame, if with the ancient be not wiſdome: Youth is commonly raſh, heady, inſolent, ungoverned, wedded to will, led by humor, a rebell to reaſon, a ſubject to paſſion, fitter to execute then to adviſe: Green wood is ever ſhrinking and warping, whereas the well-ſeaſoning hold a conſtant firmneſſe: Many a life, many a ſoule, many a flouriſhing ſtate hath been ruined by undiſciplined Monitors: Such were theſe of Rehoboam; whoſe great ſtomach tells them that this conditionating of Subjects, was no other then an affront to their new Maſter, and ſuggeſts to them, how unfit it is for Majeſty to brooke ſo ſawcy a treaty: how requiſite and Princely, to cruſh this preſumption in the egge: As ſcorning therefore to be braved by the baſe Vulgar, they put words
E of greatneſſe and terror in their new Prince. My little finger ſhall be thicker then my fathers loynes; My father made your yoake heavy, I will adde to your yoake; My father hath chaſtiſed you with whips, I will chaſtiſe you with Scorpions. The very words have ſtings. Now muſt Iſrael needs thinke, How cruell will this mans hand bee, when he thus drawes blood with his tongue? Men are not wont to ſpeake out their worſt who can endure the hopes of him that promiſeth tyranny? There can be no good uſe of an indefinite profeſſion of rigour and ſeverity; Feare is an unſafe guardian of any ſtate, much leſſe of an unſetled. Which was yet worſe, not the ſins of Iſrael were threatned, nor their purſes, but their perſons; neither had they deſired a remiſſion of juſtice, but of exactions; and now they heare of nothing but burdens, and ſcourges, and Scorpions.

Here was a Prince and people well met, I do not find them ſenſible of ought, ſave their their owne profit; They do not say, Religion was corrupted in the shutting up of thy fathers dayes; Idolatry found the free favour of Priests, and Temples, and sacrifices: Begin thy raigne with God; purge the Church, demolish those piles of abomination: abandon those Idol-mongers, restore devotion to her purity: They are all for their penny, for their ease: He on the other side, is all for his will, for an imperious Soveraignty; without any regard either of their reformation or satisfaction: They were worthy of load that cared for nothing but their backs; and he worthy of such subjects, who professed to affect their misery and torment.

Who would not but have looked any whither for the cause of this evill, rather then to heaven? yet, the holy God challenges it to himselfe: The cause was from the Lord, that he might performe this saying by Abijah the Shilonite to Ieroboam: As sinne is a punishment of sinne, it is a part of justice: The holy One of Israel doth not abhorre to use even the grossest sins to his owne just purposes; whiles our wils are free to our owne choice, his decrees are as necessary, as just; Israel had forsaken the Lord, and worshipped Ashtaroth, the goddesse of the Zidonians, and Chemosh, and Milchom: God owes them and Salomon a whipping; The frowardnesse of Rehoboam shall pay it them; I see Ieroboams plot, the peoples insolence, the young mens misadvice, the Princes unreasonable austerity, meeting together (through the wise Providence of the Almighty) unwittingly to accomplish his most just decree: All these might have done otherwise for any force that was offered to their will; all would no more doe otherwise, then if there had been no predetermination in heaven; that God may be magnified in his wisdome, and justice, whiles man wittingly perisheth in his folly.

That three daies expectation had warmed these smoaking Israelites, and made them ready for a combustion: upon so peremptory a resolution of rigour, the flame bursts out, which all the waters of the Well of Bethlehem could never quench: The furious multitude flyes out into a desperate revolt; What portion have we in David? neither have we inheritance in the Son of Ieſſe: To your Tents O Iſrael; now, ſee to thine own houſe David.

How durst these seditious mouthes mention David in defiance? One would have thought that very name had been able to have tempered their furie, & to have contained them within the limits of obedience: It was the father of Rehoboam, and the son of David that had led Israel into Idolatry: Salomon hath drawne contempt upon his father and upon the son: If Israel have cast off their God, is it marvell that they shake off his Anointed? Irreligion is the way to disobedience: There can be no true subjection but out of conscience: They cannot make conscience of civil duties, who make none of divine.

In vaine shall Rehoboam hope to prevaile by his Officer, when himselfe is rejected: The persons of Princes carry in them characters of Majesty; when their presence workes not, how should that message? If Adoram sollicit the people too late with good words, they answer him with stones. Nothing is more untractable & violent, then an inraged multitude; It was time for Rehoboam to betake himselfe to his Charet; hee saw those stones were throwne at him, in his Adoram: As the messenger suffers for his Master, so the Master suffers in his messenger: Had Rehoboam been in Adoram's clothes, this death had been his: Onely flight can deliver him from those that might have beene subjects: Jerusalem must be his refuge against the conspiracy of Shechem.

Blessed be God for lawfull government: Even a mutinous body cannot want an head: If the rebellious Israelites have cast off their true Soveraigne, they must choose a false; Ieroboam the son of Nebat must be the man: He had need be skilfull and sit sure, that shall back the horse which hath cast his Rider: Israel could not have any where met with more craft and courage, then they found in this Leader.

Rehoboam returnes to Ierusalem lighter by a crown then he went forth; Iudah and Benjamin stick still fast to their loyalty: the example of a generall rebellion cannot make them unfaithfull to the house of David: God will ever reserve a remnant free from the common contagion: Those Tribes, to approve their valour, no lesse then their their fidelity, will fight against their brethren for their Prince; and will hazard their lives to reduce the crowne to the son of Salomon: An hundred and foureſcore thouſand of them are up in armes, ready to force Iſrael to their denied ſubjection: No noiſe ſounded on both parts but military; no man thought of any thing but blood; when ſuddenly God ſends his Prophet to forbid the battle: Shemaiah comes with a meſſage of ceſſation: Ye ſhall not go up, nor fight againſt your brethren, the children of Iſrael, returne every man to his houſe, for this thing is from me, ſaith the Lord: The word of one ſilly Prophet diſmiſſes theſe mighty armies: He that would not lay down the threats of his rigour, upon the advice of his ancient Counſellors, will lay downe his ſword, upon the word of a Seer: Shall wee envy, or ſhame to ſee how much the Prophets of the old Teſtament could doe; how little thoſe of the new? If our commiſſion be no leſſe from the ſame God, the difference of ſucceſſe cannot goe away unrevenged.

There was yet ſome grace in Rehoboam, that hee would not ſpurne againſt that which God challenged as his owne worke. Some Godleſſe Ruffian would have ſaid, Whoſoever is the Author, I will be revenged on the inſtruments: Rehoboam hath learned this leſſon of his Grandfather. I held my peace, becauſe thou Lord haſt done it: If he might ſtrive with the multitude, he knew it was no ſtriving with his Maker: quietly therefore doth he lay downe his armes, not daring after that prohibition, to ſeek the recovery of his kingdome by blood.

Where Gods purpoſes are hid from us, wee muſt take the faireſt wayes of all lawfull remedies; but where God hath revealed his determinations, wee muſt ſit down in an humble ſubmiſſion; our ſtruggling may aggravate, cannot redreſſe our miſeries.

JEROBOAM.

AS there was no publike and univerſall conflict betwixt the ten Tribes, and the two, ſo no peace: Either King found reaſon to fortifie the borders of his owne territories: Shechem was worthy to be deare to Ieroboam, a City as of old ſeaſoned with many treaſons, ſo now auſpicious to his new uſurpation. The civill defection was ſoone followed by the ſpirituall: As there are neere reſpects betwixt God, and his Anointed, ſo there is great affinity betwixt Treaſon and Idolatry: there is a connexion betwixt, Feare God, and Honor the King; and no leſſe betwixt the neglects of both: In vaine ſhall a man looke for faith in a miſ-religious heart. 1 King 12 13

Next to Achitophel, I do not find that Iſrael yeelded a craftier head then Ieroboams, ſo hath he plotted this conſpiracie, that (what ever fall) there is no place for a challenge, not his owne intruſion, but Iſraels Election hath raiſed him to their Throne: neither is his cunning leſſe in holding a ſtolne Scepter: Thus he thinkes in himſelfe: If Iſrael have made me their King; it is but a pang of diſcontentment; theſe violent thoughts will not laſt alwaies: ſudden fits have commonly ſudden recoveries; their returne to their loyalty ſhall forfeit my head together with my Crown: They cannot returne to God, and hold off from their lawfull Soveraigne; They cannot returne to Jeruſalem, and keep off from God, from their loyalty: Thrice a yeare wil their devotion call them up thither; beſides the exigence of their frequent vowes: How can they be mine, whiles that glorious Temple is in their eye; whiles the magnificence of the royall Palace of David and Salomon, ſhall admoniſh them of their native allegeance; whiles (beſides the ſollicitation of their brethren) the Prieſts and Levites ſhal preach to them the neceſſity of their due obedience, and the abomination of their ſacrifices in their wilfull diſobedience; whiles they ſhall (by their preſence) put themſelves upon the mercy, or juſtice of their lawfull, and forſaken Prince: Either therefore I muſt divert them from Jeruſalem, or elſe I cannot live and raigne. It is no diverting them by a direct reſtraint; ſuch prohibition would both endanger their utter diſtaſte, and whet their deſire to more eagerneſſe: I may change Religion, I may not inhibit inhibit it; so the people have a God, it sufficeth them: they shall have so much formality as may content them: their zeale is not so sharpe, but they can be well pleased with ease: I will profer them both a more compendious, and more plausible worship: Jerusalem shall be supplied within mine owne borders: naturally men love to see the objects of their devotion, I will therefore feed their eyes with two golden representations of their God, nearer home; and what can be more proper then those, which Aaron deviled of old to humor Israel?

Upon this pestilent ground, Ieroboam sets up two calves in Dan and Bethel, & perswades the people; It is too much for you to go up to Ierusalem, behold thy Gods O Israel which brought thee out of the Land of Egypt. Oh the mischiefe that comes of wicked infidelity! It was Gods Prophet that had rent Ieroboams garment into twelve pieces, and had given ten of them to him, in token of his sharing the ten Tribes; who with the same breath also told him that the cause of this distraction was their Idolatry: Yet now will he institute an Idolatrous service for the holding together of them, whom their Idolatry had rent from their true Soveraigne to him: He sayes not; God hath promised me this Kingdome, God hath conferd it, God shall finde meanes to maintaine his owne act; I will obey him, let him dispose of me: The God of Israel is wise and powerfull enough, to fetch about his owne designes: But, (as if the devices of men were stronger then Gods providence, and ordination) he will be working out his owne ends by prophane policies: Ieroboam being borne an Israelite, and bred in the Court of a Salomon; could not but know the expresse charge of God against the making of Images, against the erecting of any rivall altars, to that of Jerusalem; yet now that he sees both these may availe much to the advancing of his ambitious project, he sets up those Images, those Altars: Wicked men care not to make bold with God in cases of their owne commoditie: If the Lawes of their Maker lye in the way of their profit or promotion, they either spurne them out, or tread upon them at pleasure: Aspiring minds will know no God but honor: Israel sojourned in Egypt, and brought home a golden calfe: Ieroboam sojournes there, and brought home two; It is hard to dwell in Egypt untainted; not to savour of the sins of the place we live in, is no lesse strange, then for wholesome liquor tunned up in a musty vessell, not to smell of the caske: The best body may be infected in a contagious ayre: Let him beware of Egypt that would be free from Idolatry.

No sooner are Ieroboams calves up, then Israel is down on their knees: their worship followes immediately upon the erection: How easily is the unstable vulgar caried into whatsoever religion of authority? The weather-cock will looke which way soever the wind blowes: It is no marvell if his Subjects be brutish, who hath made a calfe his God.

Every accessary to sin is filthy, but the first authors of sin are abominable: How is Ieroboam branded in every of these sacred leaves? How doe all ages ring of his fact, with the accent of dishonour, and indignation; Ieroboam the son of Nebat, that made Israel to sin? It was a shame for Israel that it could be made to sin by a Ieroboam: but, O cursed name of Ieroboam that would draw Israel to sin! The followers and abettors of evill are worthy of torment, but no hell is too deepe for the leaders of publique wickednesse.

Religion is cloathed with many requisite circumstances: As a new King would have a new god; so that new god must have new Temples, Altars, Services, Priests, Solemnities: All these hath Ieroboam instituted; All these hath he cast in the same mold with his golden calves: False devotion doth not more crosse, then imitate the true. Satan is no lesse a counterfeit then an enemy of God: He knows it more easie to adulterate religion, then to abolish it.

That which God ordained for the avoidance of Idolatry, is made the occasion of it; a limitation of his holy services to Jerusalem: How mischievously do wicked men pervert the wholesome institutions of God to their sin, to their bane!

Ieroboam could not be ignorant how fearefully this very act was revenged upon Israel in the wildernesse; yet he dares renew it in Dan and Bethel: No example of judgement can affright wilfull offenders.

It

A It is not the metal that makes their gods, but the worſhip, the ſacrifices. What ſacrifices could there be without Prieſts? No religion could ever want ſacred Maſters of Divine ceremonies: Gods Clergy was ſelect and honourable; branches of the holy ſtemme of Aaron, Ieroboam rakes up his Prieſts out of the channell of the multitude; all Tribes, all perſons were good enough for his ſpurious devotion; Leaden Prieſts are well fitted to golden Deities. Religion receives either much honour, or blemiſh, by the quality of thoſe that ſerve at her Altars: We are not worthy to profeſſe our ſelves ſervants of the True God, if we doe not hold his ſervice worthy of the beſt.

Ieroboams calves muſt have ſacrifices, muſt have ſolemne feſtivities; though in a day and moneth of his owne deviſing: In vaine ſhall we pretend to worſhip a god, if we grudge him the juſt dayes, and rites of his worſhip.

B It is ſtrange that he who thought the dregs of the vulgar good enough for that Prieſthood, would grace thoſe gods by acting their Prieſt himſelfe: and yet behold where the new King of Iſrael ſtands before his new Altar, with a Scepter in one hand and a Cenſer in the other, ready to ſacrifice to his new gods; when the man of God comes from Iuda, with a meſſage of judgement: Oh deſperate condition of Iſrael, that was ſo far gone with impiety, that it yeelded not one faithfull monitor to Ieroboam! The time was, that the erecting of but a new altar (for memory, for monument) on the other ſide of Iordan, bred a challenge to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſes; and had coſt much Iſraelitiſh blood, if the quarrelled Tribes had not given a ſeaſonable and pious ſatisfaction; and now, lo, how the ſtronger ſtomach of degenerated Iſrael can digeſt new Altars, new Temples, new gods: What a difference there is betwixt a Church and Kingdome newly breathing from affliction, and ſetled upon the
C lees of a miſ-uſed peace?

But oh the patience, and mercy of our longſuffering God, that will not ſtrike a very Ieroboam unwarned! Iudgement hovers over the heads of ſinners, ere it light: if Iſrael afford not a bold reprover of Ieroboam, Iuda ſhall: When the King of Iſrael is in all the height both of his State, and ſuperſtition, honouring his ſolemne day with his richeſt devotion, ſteps forth a Prophet of God, and interrupts that glorious ſervice, with a loud inclamation of judgement. Doubtleſſe the man wanted not wit to know what diſpleaſure, what danger muſt needs follow ſo unwelcome a meſſage: yet dares he (upon the commiſſion of God) doe this affront to an Idolatrous King, in the midſt of all his awfull magnificence. The Prophets of God goe upon many a D thankleſſe errand: He is no meſſenger for God that either knowes, or feares the faces of men.

It was the Altar, not the perſon of Ieroboam, which the Prophet thus threatens; Yet not the ſtones are ſtricken, but the founder, in both their appehenſions: So deare are the devices of our owne braines to us, as if they were incorporated into our ſelves; There is no oppoſition whereof we are ſo ſenſible, as that of religion.

That the royall Altar ſhould be thus polluted by dead mens bones, and the blood of the Prieſts; was not more unpleaſing, then that all this ſhould be done by a childe of the houſe of David; for Ieroboam well ſaw that the throne & the altar muſt ſtand, or fall together; that a ſon of David could not have ſuch power over the Altar, with-
E out an utter ſubverſion of the government, of the ſucceſſion; therefore is he thus galled with this comminatory prediction: The rebellious people who had ſaid, What portion have we in David, heare now, that David will perforce have a portion in them, and might well ſee, what beaſts they had made themſelves, in worſhipping the image of a beaſt; and ſacrificing to ſuch a god, as could not preſerve his owne Altar from violation and ruine.

All this while I doe not ſee this zealous Prophet laying his hand to the demolition of this Idolatrous Altar; or threatning a knife to the Author of this depravation of religion; Only his tongue ſmites both, not with foule, but ſharpe words, of menace not of reproach: It was for Ioſias a King, to ſhed the blood of thoſe ſacrificers, to deface thoſe Altars: Prophets are for the tongue, Princes for the hand; Prophets muſt onely denounce judgment, Princes execute.

Future things are present to the Eternall: It was some two hundred and sixty yeares ere this prophecy should be fulfilled; yet the man of God speaks of it as now in acting. What are some Centuries of yeares to the Ancient of dayes? How slow, and yet how sure is the pace of Gods revenge? It is not in the power of time to frustrate Gods determinations; There is no lesse justice, nor severity in a delayed punishment. A

What a perfect Record there is of all names in the roll of Heaven; before they be, after they are past? what ever seeming contingency there is in their imposition, yet they fall under the certainty of a decree, and are better knowne in heaven, ere they be, then on earth whiles they are. He that knowes what names we shall have, before we or the world have a being, doth not oft reveale this peece of his knowledge to his creature; here he doth, naming the man that should be two hundred yeares after; for more assurance of the event, that Israel may say, this man speakes from a God who knowes what shall be. There cannot be a more sure evidence of a true Godhead, then the foreknowledge of those things, whose causes have yet no hope of being; But because the proofe of this prediction was no more certaine, then remote; a present demonstration shall convince the future; The Altar shall rend in peeces, the ashes shall be scattered: How amazedly must the seduced Israelites needes looke upon this miracle; and why doe they not think with themselves; whiles these stones rend, why are our hearts whole? Of what an over-ruling power is the God whom we have forsaken, that can thus teare the Altars of his corrivals? How shall we stand before his vengeance, when the very stones break at the word of his Prophet? Perhaps, some beholders were thus affected: but Ieroboam, whom it most concerned, in stead of bowing his knees for humiliation, stretcheth forth his hand for revenge, and cryes, Lay hold on him. Resolute wickednesse is impatient of a reproofe, and in stead of yeelding to the voice of God, rebelleth: Just and discreet reprehension doth not more reforme some sinners, then exasperate others. B C

How easie it is for God to coole the courage of proud Ieroboam? The hand which his rage stretches out, dryes up, and cannot be pulled back againe: and now stands the King of Israel like some anticke statue, in a posture of impotent endeavour: so disabled to the hurt of the Prophet, that he cannot command that peece of himselfe; What are the great potentates of the world, in the powerfull hand of the Almighty? Tyrants cannot be so harmefull as they are malicious.

The strongest heart may be brought down with affliction; Now the stout stomach of Ieroboam is fallen to an humble deprecation, Intreat now the face of the Lord thy God, and pray for me, that my hand may be restored me againe. It must needes bee a great straight that could drive a proud heart to begge mercy, where he bent his persecution: so doth Ieroboam, holding it no scorne to be beholding to an enemy: In extremities, the worst men can bee content to sue for favour, where they have spent their malice. D

It well becomes the Prophets of God to be merciful: I doe not see this Seer to stand upon termes of exprobration, and overly contestations with Ieroboam, to say, Thine intentions to me were cruell; Had thine hand prevailed, I should have sued to thee in vaine: Continue ever a spectacle of the fearefull justice of thy Maker, whom thou hast provoked by thine Idolatry, whom thou wouldst have smitten in my persecution: but he meekly sues for Ieroboams release: and (that God might abundantly magnifie both his power and mercy) is heard and answered with successe: We doe no whit favour of heaven, if we have not learned to doe good for evill. E

When both winde and Sunne, the blasts of judgement, and the beames of favour met together to worke upon Ieroboam, who would not looke that hee should have cast off his cumbrous, and mis-beseeming cloake of his Idolatry; and have said, Lord thou hast stricken me in justice, thou hast healed me in mercy; I will provoke thee no more; This hand which thou hast restored shall bee consecrated to thee in pulling downe these bold abominations? Yet now, behold he goes on in his old courses, and, as if God had neither done him good nor evill, lives, and dyes idolatrous: No stone is more hard or insensate then a sinfull heart: The changes of judgement and mercy doe but obdure it, in stead of meltings.

The

The seduced Prophet.

1 King. 13

IEroboams hand is amended, his soule is not; that continues still dry, and inflexible; yet whiles he is unthankfull to the Author of his recovery, he is thankfull to the instrument: he kindely invites the Prophet, whom he had threatned, and will remunerate him whom he endeavoured to punish: The worst men may be sensible of bodilie favours: Civill respects may well stand with gracelesnesse: Many a one would be liberall of their purses, if they might be allowed to be niggardly of their obedience.

As God, so his Prophet cares not for these waste courtesies, where he sees maine duties neglected: More pietie would have done well, with lesse complement: The man of God returnes a blunt and peremptory deniall to so bounteous an offer: If thou wilt give me halfe thine house, I will not goe in with thee, neither will I eat bread or drinke water in this place. Kindnesse is more safely done to an Idolater, then taken from him; that which is done to him obligeth him, that which is taken from him obligeth us: his obligation to us may be occasion of his good, our obligation to him may occasion our hurt; the surest way is to keep aloofe from the infectiously wicked.

The Prophet is not uncivill, to reject the favour of a Prince without some reason: He yeelds no reason of his refusall but the command of his God: God hath charged him, Eate no bread, nor drinke no water, nor turne againe by the same way that thou camest: It is not for a Prophet to plead humane, or carnall grounds for the actions of his function: He may not move but upon a divine warrant: would this Seer have lookt with the eyes of flesh and blood, he might have found many arguments of his yeeldance. He is a King that invites me; his reward, by enriching me, may benefit many: and who knowes how much my further conversation may prevaile to reform him? how can he be but well prepared for good counsell by a miraculous cure? how gainfully should my receit of a temporll courtesie be exchanged with a spirituall to him? all Israel will follow him either in Idolatry, or reformation; which way can be devised of doing so great service to God and the Church, as by reclaiming him? what can yeeld so great likelihood of his reclamation, as the opportunity of my further entireneſse with him? But the Prophet dares not argue cases, where he had a command; what ever become of Ieroboam, and Israel, God must be obeyed; Neither profit, nor hopes may carie us crosse to the word of our Maker. How safe had this Seer been, if he had kept him ever upon this sure ward; which he no sooner leaves, then he miscaries.

So deeply doth God detest Idolatry, that he forbids his Prophet to eat the bread, to drinke the water of a people infected with this sinne; yea to tread in those very steps which their feet have touched. If this inhibition were personall, yet the grounds of it are common. No pestilence should be more shunned then the conversation of the mis-religious, or openly scandalous: It is no thanke to us if their familiarity doe not enfeoffe us of their wickednesse.

I know not what to thinke of an old Prophet that dwels in Bethel, within the aire of Ieroboams Idol, within the noise of his sacrifices; that lives where the man of God dares not eate; that permitted his sonnes to be present at that Idolatrous service: If he were a Prophet of God, what did he now in Bethel? why did he winke at the sin of Ieroboam? what needed a Seer to come out of Iudah, for the reproofe of that sinne, which was acted under his nose? why did he lye? why did his family partake with Idolaters? If he were not a Prophet of God; how had he true visions, how had he true messages from God? why did he second the menacing word of that Prophet, whom he seduced? why did he desire that his owne bones might be honoured with his Sepulcher? Doubtlesse he was a Prophet of God, but corrupt, restly, vicious: Prophecy doth not alwayes presuppose sanctification; many a one hath had visions from God, who shall never enjoy the vision of God. A very Balaam in his extasies, hath so cleare a Revelation of the Messiah to come, as scarce ever any of the holiest Prophets; yea, his his very Asse hath both her mouth miraculously opened, and her eyes; to see and notifie that Angell, which was hid from her Master: Yea, Satan himselfe sometimes receives notice from God of his future actions, which else that evill Spirit could neither foretell, nor foresee. These kindes of graces are both rare, and common: rare, in that they are seldome given to any: common, in that they are indifferently given to the evill, and to the good: A little holinesse is worth much illumination.

Whether out of envy, to heare that said by the Seer of Iuda, which he either knew not or smothered; to heare that done by another, which he could not have effected, and could not choose but admire: or whether out of desire to make tryall of the fidelity of so powerfull a Messenger, the old Prophet hastens to overtake, to recal that man of God, who had so defyed his Bethel; whom he finds sitting faint & weary under an Oake, in the way; taking the benefit of that shade which he hated to receive from those contagious groves that he had left behind him: His habit easily bewrayed him, to a man of his owne trade: neither doth his tongue spare to professe himself. The old Prophet of Bethel invites him to returne, to a repast: and is answered with the same words, wherewith Ieroboams offer was repelled; The man of God varies not a syllable from his message: It concernes us to take good heed of our charge, when we goe on Gods errand. A deniall doth but invite the importunate; what hee cannot doe by entreaty, the old man tries to doe by perswasion, I am a Prophet also as thou art, and an Angel spake to me, by the word of the Lord, saying, Bring him back with thee into thine house, that he may eat bread, and drinke water: There is no tentation so dangerous, as that which comes shrouded under a vaile of holinesse, and pretends authoritie of God himselfe: Ieroboam threatens, the Prophet stands undaunted; Ieroboam fawnes, and promises, the Prophet holds constant, now comes a gray-headed Seer and pleads a counter-message from God, the Prophet yeelds and transgresses. Satan may affright us as a fiend, but he seduces us as an Angel of light.

Who would have lookt for a lyer under hoary haires, and an holy mantle? who would not have trusted that gravity, when there was no colour of any gaine in the untruth? Nothing is so apt to deceive as the faireſt semblances, as the sweeteſt words. We cannot erre if we beleeve not the speech for the person, but the person for the speech: Well might this man of God thinke, an aged man, a Prophet, an old Prophet will not (sure) bely God unto a Prophet; No man will forge a lye, but for an advantage; What can this man gaine by this match, but the entertainment of an unprofitable guest? Perhaps though God will not allow me to feast with Ieroboam, yet pitying my faintnesse, he may allow me to eat with a Prophet: Perhaps now that I have approved my fidelity in refusing the bread of Bethel, God thinks good to send me a gracious release of that strict charge: Why should I think that Gods revelations are not as free to others, as to me? and if this Prophet have received a countermand from an Angell of God, how shall I not disobey God, if I doe not follow him?

Upon this ground he returnes with this deceitfull host, and when the meat was now in his mouth, receives the true message of death, frō the same lips that brought him the false message of his invitation; Thus saith the Lord, for as much as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord, and hast not kept the commandement of the Lord thy God, but camest back and hast eaten bread, and drunk water in the place forbidden thee, thy carkasse shall not come to the Sepulcher of thy fathers. Oh wofull Prophet, when he looks on his host he sees his executioner, whiles he is feeding of his body, he heares of his carkasse; at the table, he heares of his denied Sepulcher; and all this, for eating and drinking where he was forbidden by God, though bidden as from God: The violation of the least charge of a God is mortall: No pretences can warrant the transgression of a divine command: A word from God is pleaded on both sides: The one was received immediately from God, the other related mediately by man: One the Prophet was sure of, the other was questionable: A sure word of God may not be left for an uncertaine: An expresse charge of the Almighty admitteth not of any check: His wil is but one, as himselfe is; and therefore it is out of the danger of contradiction.

Me thinks I see the man of God change countenance at this sharpe sauce of his pleasing morsels; his face before-hand is died with the paleneſse of death: me thinks I

hear e

A heare him urging many unkinde expoſtulations with his injurious hoſt: who yet diſmiſſes him better provided for the eaſe of his journey, then he found him. Perhaps this officiouſneſſe was out of deſire to make ſome amends for this late ſeducement. It is a poore recompence when he hath betrayed his life, and wronged the ſoule, to caſt ſome courteſies upon the body.

The old Bethelite that had taken paines to come, and fetch the man of God into ſin, will not now goe back with him to accompany his departure: Doubtleſſe he was afraid to be inwrapped in the judgement, which he ſaw hanged over that obnoxious head: Thus the miſchievous guides of wickedneſſe leave a man, when they have led him to his bane; as familiar Devils forſake their Witches, when they have brought them once into fetters.

B The man of God returnes alone, carefull (no doubt) and penſive for his offence, when a Lyon out of the wood meets him, aſſaults him, kils him: Oh the juſt and ſevere judgements of the Almighty, who hath brought this fierce beaſt out of his wilde ranges, into the high way, to bee the executioner of his offending ſervant! Doubtleſſe this Prophet was a man of great holineſſe, of ſingular fidelity, elſe he durſt not have been Gods Herald to carry a meſſage of defiance to Ieroboam, King of Iſrael, in the midſt of his royall magnificence; yet now, for varying from but a circumſtance of Gods command (though upon the ſuggeſtion of a divine warrant) is given for a prey to the Lyon: Our intereſt in God, is ſo farre from excuſing our ſin, that it aggravates it; Of all others the ſin of a Prophet ſhall not paſſe unrevenged.

The very wild beaſts are led by a providence; Their wiſe and powerfull Creator
C knowes how to ſerve himſelfe of them. The Lions guard one Prophet, kill another, according to the commiſſion received from their Maker: What ſinner can hope to eſcape unpuniſhed, when every creature of God is ready to be an avenger of evill? The beaſts of the field were made to ſerve us, we to ſerve our Creator: When we forſake our homage to him that made us, it is no marvell if the beaſts forget their duty to us, and deale with us not as Maſters, but as rebels: When an holy man buyes ſo dearely ſuch a ſleight frailty, of a credulous miſtaking; what ſhall become of our hainous and preſumptuous ſinnes?

I cannot think but this Prophet died in the favour of God, though by the teeth of the Lion; His life was forfeited for example, his ſoule was ſafe: Yea his very carkaſſe was left, though torne, yet faire after thoſe deadly graſpes; as if God had ſaid, I will
D onely take thy breath from thee, as the penalty of thy diſobedience; a Lion ſhall doe that which an apoplexie, or fever might doe: I owe thee no further revenge then may be ſatisfied with thy blood.

Violent events doe not alwaies argue the anger of God; even death it ſelfe is, to his ſervants, a fatherly caſtigation.

But oh the unſearchable wayes of the Almighty! The man of God ſinnes, and dies ſpeedily: the lying Prophet that ſeduced him, ſurvives; Yea wicked Ieroboam enjoyes his Idolatry, and treads upon the grave of his reprover! There is neither favour in the delay of ſtripes, nor diſpleaſure in the haſt; Rather whom God loves, he chaſtiſes, as ſharply, ſo ſpeedily; whiles the reſt proſper to condemnation: Even the rod of a loving father may draw blood: How much happier is it for us that we die now, to live
E for ever, then that we live a while, to die ever?

Had this Lion ſet upon the Prophet for hunger, why did he not devoure as well as kill him? Why did he not rather kill the beaſt then the man? ſince we know the nature of the Lion ſuch, that he is not wont to aſſail man, ſave in the extreme want of other prey. Certainly the ſame power that imployed thoſe fangs, reſtrained them, that the world might ſee, it was not appetite that provoked the beaſt to this violence, but the over-ruling command of God: Even ſo, O Lord, thy powerfull hand is over that roaring Lyon, that goes about continually, ſeeking whom he may devoure; thine hand with-holds him, that though he may ſhed the blood of thine Elect, yet he cannot hurt their ſoules; and whiles he doth thoſe things which thou permitteſt, and ordereſt to thy juſt ends, yet he cannot doe leſſer things, which hee deſireth, and thou permitteſt not.

The fierce beast stands by the carkasse; as to avow his owne act, & to tel who sent him: so to preserve that body, which he hath slaine: Oh wonderfull worke of God! the Executioner is turned Guardian: and (as the officer of the Highest) commands all other creatures to stand aloofe from his charge: & commands the fearefull Asse, that brought this burthen thither, not to stirre thence, but stand ready prest, to recary it to the Sepulcher: & now, when he hath sufficiently witnessed to all passengers; that this act was not done upon his own hunger, but upon the quarel of his Maker, he delivers up his charge to that old Prophet; who was no lesse guilty of this blood then himself.

This old Seducer hath so much truth, as both to give a right Commentary upon Gods intention, in this act, for the terrour of the disobedient; and to give his voice to the certainty of that future judgement, which his late gueſt had threatned to Israel: (sometimes it pleaseth the wisdome of God to expresse and justifie himselfe even by the tongues of faulty instruments.) Withall he hath so much faith and courage, as to fetch that carcasse from the Lyon; so much pity and compassion, as to weep for the man of God, to interre him in his owne Sepulcher; so much love, as to wish himselfe joyned in death, to that body, which he had hastened unto death: It is hard to find a man absolutely wicked: Some grace will bewray it selfe in the most forsaken brests.

It is a cruel courtesie to kill a man, and then to help him to his grave; to betray a man with our breath, and then to bedew him with our teares: The Prophet had needed no such friend, if he had not met with such an enemy: The mercies of the wicked are cruell.

Jeroboams Wife.

1 King. 14.

IT is no measuring of Gods favour by the line of outward welfare: Ieroboam the Idolatrous usurper of Israel prospers better, then the true heirs of David; He lives to see three successions in the throne of Iudah; Thus the Ivy lives, when the Oak is dead. Yet could not that mis-gottē crown of his, keep his head alwaies from aching: He hath his crosses too: God whips sometimes more then his own: His enemies smart from him, as wel as his children: his children in love, his enemies in judgement: Not simply the rod argues love, but the temper of the hand, that weelds it, and the back that feels it: First Ieroboams hand was stricken, now his Sonne: Abijah the eldest, the best son of Ieroboam, is smitten with sickneſse: As children are but the pieces of their Parents in another skin, so Parents are no lesse stricken in their children, then in their natural lims; Ieroboam doth not more feele his arme, then his sonne: not wicked men onely, but beasts may have naturall affections: It is no thanke to any creature, to love his owne.

Nature wrought in Ieroboam, not grace: He is enough troubled with his sons disease, no whit bettered: I would have heard him say; God followes me with his afflictions, it is for mine impiety: what other measure can I expect from his Justice? Whiles mine Idols stand, how can I look that mine house should prosper? I wil turn from my wickednes, O God, turne thou from thy wrath; These thoughts were too good for that obdured heart: his son is sick, he is sorrowfull; but (as an amazed man seeks to go forth at the wrong door) his distraction sends him to a false help: He thinks not of God, he thinks of his Prophet: He thinks of the Prophet that had foretold him he should be a King; he thinks not of the God of that Prophet who made him a King: It is the property of a carnall heart to confine both his Obligations, and his hopes to the means, neglecting the Author of good. Vaine is the repect that is given to the servant, where the Master is contemned.

Extremity draws Ieroboams thoughts to the Prophet; whom elſe he had not cared to remember. The King of Israel had Divines enough of his own: Elſe he must needs have thought them miserable gods that were not worth a Prophet: And besides, there was an old prophet (if he yet survived) dwelling within the smoak of his palace, whose visions had been too well approved: why should Ieroboam send so farre to an Abijah? Certainly, his heart despised those base priests of his high places, neither could hee trust

A trust either to the gods, or the Clergy of his owne making: His conscience rests upon the fidelity of that man, whose doctrine he had forsaken: How did this Idolater strive against his owne heart, whiles he inwardly despised those, whom he professed to honour; and inwardly honoured them, whom he professed to despise? Wicked breasts are false to themselves, neither trusting to their owne choyce; nor making choyce of that, which they may dare to trust. They will set a good face upon their secretly unpleasing sins, and had rather be selfe-condemned, then wise and penitent: As for that old Seer, it is like Ieroboam knew his skill, but doubted of his sincerity; that man was too much his neighbour to be good: Abijahs truth had been tryed in a case of his owne: He whose word was found just in the prediction of his Kingdome, was well worthy of credit in the newes of his son: Experience is a great encouragement of our trust: It is a good matter to be faithfull; this loadstone of our fidelity shal draw to us even hearts of iron, and hold them to our reliance: As contrarily deceit doth both argue, & make a bankrupt; who can trust where he is disappointed? O God; so oft, so ever, have we found thee true in all thy promises, in all thy performances, that if wee doe not seek thee, if we doe not trust thee in the sequell, we are worthy of our losse, worthy of thy desertions.

Yet I do not see that Ieroboam sends to the Prophet for his aid, but for intelligence: Curiosity is guilty of this message, and not devotion; he cals not for the prayers, not for the benediction of that holy man, but for meer information of the event. He wel saw what the prayers of a Prophet could do: That which cured his hand, might it not have cured his son? Yet he that said to a man of God, Intreat the face of the Lord thy God, that he may restore my hand: sayes not now in his message, to Abijah, Intreat thy God to restore my Son: Sinne makes such a strangenesse betwixt God and man, that the guilty heart either thinkes not of suing to God, or feares it: What a poore contentment it was to foreknow that evill which he could not avoid, and whose notice could but hasten his misery? Yet, thus fond is our restlesse curiosity, that it seekes ease in the drawing on of torment: He is worthy of sorrow that will not stay till it comes to him, but goes to fetch it.

Whom doth Ieroboam send on this message, but his wife, and how but disguised? Why her, and why thus? Neither durst he trust this errand with another, nor with her in her own form: It was a secret that Ieroboam sends to a Prophet of God; none might know it but his own bosome, and she that lay in it; if this had been noised in Israel, the example had been dangerous: Who would not have said, the King is glad to leave his counterfeit deities: and seek to the true: Why should we adhere to them whom he forsakes? As the message must not be known to the people: so shee that beares it must not be known to the Prophet, her name, her habit must be changed: she must put off her robes, and put on a russet coat; she must put off the Queene, and put on the peasant: in stead of her Scepter, she must take up a basket, and go a masked pilgrimage to Shiloh: Oh the fondnes of vaine men that thinke to juggle with the Almighty, and to hide their counsels from that all-seeing eye! If this change of habit were necessary at Bethel, yet what needs it at Shiloh; though she would hide her face from her subjects, yet why should she not pull off her muffler, and shew her selfe to the Prophet? Certainly, what policy began, guiltinesse must continue: Well might she think, there can be no good answer expected of the wife of Ieroboam; my presence will do no lesse, then solicit a reproofe: No Prophet can speake well to the consort of a founder of Idolatry; I may perhaps heare good as another, though as my selfe I can look for nothing, but tydings of evill: Wicked hearts know they deserve ill at Gods hands, and therefore they doe all they can to avoid the eyes of his displeased justice and if they cannot do it by colours of dissimulation, they will do it by imploration of shelter, ; they shall say to the Rocks, Fall on us, and cover us.

But oh the grosse folly mixt with the craft of wickednes! could Ieroboam think that the Prophet could know the event of his sons disease, and did he thinke that he could not know the disguise of his Wife? the one was present, the other future; this was but wrapt in a clout, that event was wrapt up in the cousel of God. Yet this politick head presumes that the greater shall be revealed, where the lesser shall be hid: There was never never wicked man that was not infatuate, and in nothing more then in thoſe things wherein he hoped moſt to tranſcend the reach of others.

Abijah ſhunning the iniquity of the times, was retired to a ſolitary corner of Shiloh; no place could be too private for an honeſt Prophet, in ſo extreme depravednes. Yet even there doth the King of Iſrael take notice of his recluſion, and ſends his wife to that poore cell, laden with preſents; preſents that diſſembled their bearer: had ſhe offered jewels, or gold, her greatneſſe had been ſuſpected: now ſhe brings loaves and cracknels, and hony, her hand anſwers her back: She gives as ſhe ſeemes, not as ſhe is: Something ſhe muſt give, even when ſhe acts the pooreſt client.

The Prophets of God were not wont to have empty viſitations: they who hated bribes, yet refuſed not tokens of gratitude: Yea the God of heaven who neither needs our goods, nor is capable of our gratifications, yet would have no man to come to him gift-leſſe: Wo to thoſe ſacrilegious hands, that in ſtead of bringing to the Prophets cary from them.

Ieroboam was a bad man, yet, as he had a towardly ſon, ſo he had an obedient wife, elſe ſhe had not wanted excuſes to turne off both the journey, & the diſguiſe; againſt the diſguiſe ſhe had pleaded the unbeſeemingneſſe for her perſon and ſtate; againſt the journey, the perils of ſo long and ſolitary a walk; perhaps a Lyon might be in the way; the Lyon that tore the Prophet in pieces; perhaps robbers; or if not they, perhaps her chaſtity might be in danger: an unguarded ſolitarineſſe in the weaker ſexe might be a provocation to ſome forced uncleaneſs: ſhe caſt off all theſe ſhifting projections of fear, according to the wil of her husband, ſhe changes her raiment: ſhe ſets upon the journey, and overcomes it: What needed this diſguiſe to an old Prophet whoſe dim eyes were ſet with age? All cloathes, all faces were alike to a blind Seer: The viſions of Abijah were inward; neither was his bodily ſight more dusky, then the eyes of his mind were cleare & piercing: It was not the common light of men wherby he ſaw, but divine illumination; things abſent, things future, were no leſſe obvious to thoſe ſpirituall beames, then preſent things are to us: Ere the quicke eyes of that great Lady can diſcern him, he hath eſpied her; & as ſoone as he heares the ſound of her feet, ſhe heares from him the ſound of her name, Come in thou wife of Jeroboam: How God laughes in heaven at the frivolous fetches of crafty politicians, and when they think themſelves moſt ſure, ſhames them with a detection, with a defeat? What an idlenes it is for fooliſh hypocrites to hope they can dãce in a net unſeen of heaven.

Never before was this Queen troubled to heare of her ſelfe; now ſhe is: her very name ſtruck her with aſtoniſhment; and prepares her for the aſſured horrour of following judgements, I am ſent to thee with heavy tydings; Goe tell Jeroboam: Thus ſaith the Lord God of Iſrael, Could this Lady leſſe wonder at the mercy of this ſtile of God, then trẽble at the ſequel of his juſtice? Lo Iſrael hath forſakẽ God, yet God ſtil owns Iſrael. Iſrael had gone a whoring, yet God hath not divorced her: O the infinit goodnes of our long ſuffering God, whom our fouleſt ſins cannot rob of his compaſſions!

By how much dearer Iſrael was to God, ſo much more odious is Ieroboam that hath marred Iſrael: Terrible is that venegance which God thunders againſt him by his Prophet, whoſe paſſionate meſſage upbraids him with his promotions, chargeth him with his ſins, and laſtly denounceth his judgements: No mouth was fitter to caſt this royalty in the teeth of Ieroboam, then that, by which it was firſt foretold, fore-promiſed: Every circumſtance of the advancement aggravates the ſin, I exalted thee: Thou couldeſt not riſe to honour alone. I exalted thee from among the people: not from the Peers; thy rank was but common, before this riſe: I exalted thee from among the people to be a Prince; ſubordinate height was not enough for thee, no ſeat would ſerve thee but a throne; Yea to be a Prince of my people Iſrael: No Nation was for thee, but my choſen one; none but my royall inheritance: Neither did I raiſe thee into a vacant throne: a forlorne and forſaken Principality might be thankleſſe: but I rent the Kingdome away from another for thy ſake, yea from what other but the grandchilde of David? out of his hands did I wreſt the Scepter, to give it into thine. Oh what high favours doth God ſometimes caſt away upon unworthy ſubjects? How do his abuſed bounties double both their ſinne and judgement?

The

A The ſinnes of his Prince were no leſſe eminent then his obligations, therefore his judgements ſhall be no leſſe eminent then his ſinnes: How bitterly doth God expreſſe that, which ſhall be more bitter in the execution: Behold I will bring evill upon the houſe of Jeroboam, and will cut off from Jeroboam, him that piſſeth againſt the wall; and him that is ſhut up, and left in Iſrael, and will take away the remnant of the houſe of Jeroboam, as a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone: Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the City ſhall the dogs eate, and him that dieth in the field, ſhall the fowles of the ayre eate: Oh heavy loade that this diſguiſed Princeſſe muſt carry to her Husband; but becauſe theſe evils, though grievous, yet might be remote; therefore for a preſent hanſell of vengeance, ſhe is diſmiſſed with the ſad tydings of the death of her ſonne; When thy feet enter into the City, the Childe ſhall dye: It is heavy newes for a mother that ſhe B muſt leeſe her ſonne, but worſe yet that ſhe may not ſee him: In theſe caſes of our finall departures, our preſence gives ſome mitigation to our griefe: might ſhe but have cloſed the eyes, and have received the laſt breath of her dying ſonne, the loſſe had been more tolerable: I know not how our perſonall farewell eaſes our heart even whiles it increaſes our paſſion; but now ſhe ſhall no more ſee, nor be ſeen of her Abijah: She ſhall no ſooner be in the City, then he ſhall be out of the world: Yet, more to perfect her ſorrow, ſhee heares that in him alone there is found ſome good; the reſt of her iſſue, are graceleſſe; ſhe muſt leeſe the good, and hold the graceleſſe; he ſhall die to afflict her, they ſhall live to afflict her.

Yet what a mixture is here of ſeverity and favour in one act? favour to the ſonne, ſeverity to the father: Severity to the father, that he muſt leeſe ſuch a ſonne, favour C to the ſonne that he ſhall be taken from ſuch a father: Ieroboam is wicked, and therefore he ſhall not enjoy an Abijah; Abijah hath ſome good things, therefore he ſhall be removed from the danger of the depravation of Ieroboam: Sometimes God ſtrikes in favour, but more often forbeares out of ſeverity: The beſt are fitteſt for heaven; the earth is fitteſt for the worſt; this is the region of ſinne, and miſery; that of immortality: It is no argument of diſ-favour to be taken early from a well-led life; as not of approbation to age in ſinne.

As the ſoule of Abijah is favoured in the removal, ſo is his body with a buriall; he ſhall have alone both teares and tomb; all the reſt of his brethren ſhall have no grave but dogs and fowles; no ſorrow but for their life: Though the carkaſſe be inſenſible of any poſition, yet honeſt Sepulture is a bleſſing: it is fit the body ſhould bee D duely reſpected on earth, whoſe ſoule is glorious in heaven.

ASA.

THe two houſes of Judah, & Iſrael, grow up now together in an ambitious rivality; this ſplitted plant branches out ſo ſeverally, as if it had forgotten that ever it was joyned in the root: The throne of David oft changeth the poſſeſſors; and more camplaineth of their iniquity, then their remove: Abijam inherits the ſins of his father Rehoboam, no leſſe then his Crown: & ſo ſpends his three yeares, as if he had been no whit a kin to his E grandfathers vertues. It is no news that grace is not traduced, whiles vice is: Therefore is his reigne ſhort becauſe it was wicked: It was a ſad caſe when both the Kings of Judah and Iſrael (though enemies) yet conſpired in ſinne: Rehoboam (like his father Salomon) began graciouſly, but fell to Idolatry: as he followed his father; ſo his ſon, ſo his people followed him. Oh, what a face of a Church was here, when Iſrael worſhipped Ieroboams calves, when Judah buſlt them high places, and Images, & groves on every high Hill, and under every greene tree! On both hands GOD is forſaken, his Temple neglected, his worſhip adulterate; and this, not for ſome ſhort brunt, but during the ſucceſſion of two Kings: For, after the firſt three yeares Rehoboam changed his fathers Religion (as his ſhields) from gold to braſſe; the reſt of his ſeventeene yeares were ledde in impiety: His ſonne Abijam trod in the ſame mirie ſteps, and Judah with them both: If there were any (doubtleſſe there were some)

ſome) faithfull hearts, yet remaining in both Kingdomes, during theſe heavy times, what a corroſive it muſt needs have been to them, to ſee ſo deplored and miſerable a deprivation.

There was no viſible Church upon earth, but here; and this what a one? Oh GOD, how low doſt thon ſometimes ſuffer thine owne flocke to bee driven? What wofull wanes, and eclipſes haſt thou ordained for this heavenly body? Yet at laſt, an Aſa ſhall ariſe from the loynes, from the grave of Abijam: he ſhall revive David and reforme Iudah: The gloomy times of corruption ſhall not laſt alwayes: The light of truth and peace ſhall at length breake out, and bleſſe the ſad hearts of the righteous.

It is a wonder how Aſa ſhould be good, of the ſeed of Abijam, of the ſoyle of Maachah, both wicked, both Idolatrous; God would have us ſee that grace is from heaven, neither needs the helpes of theſe earthly conveyances: Should not the children of good parents ſometimes be evill, and the children of evill parents, good; vertue would ſeeme naturall, and the giver would leeſe his thankes. Thus we have ſeen a faire flower ſpring out of dung; and a well-fruited tree riſe out of a ſowre ſtocke: Education hath no leſſe power to corrupt, then nature; It is therefore the juſt praiſe of Aſa that being trained up under an Idolatrous Maachah, he maintained his piety; As contrarily, it is a ſhame for thoſe that have been bred up in the precepts and examples of vertue and godlineſſe, to fall off to lewdneſſe, or ſuperſtition. There are foure principall monuments of Aſaes vertue, as ſo many rich ſtones in his Diadem: He tooke away Sodomy, and Idols out of Iudah; Who cannot wonder more that he found them there, then that he removed them? What a ſtrange incongruity is this; Sodom in Jeruſalem? Idols in Judah? Surely debauched profeſſion proves deſperate; Admit the Idols, yee cannot doubt of the Sodomy; If they have changed the glory of the uncorruptible God, into an Image, made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and foure-footed beaſts, and creeping things, it is no marvell, if God give them up to uncleanneſſe through the luſts of their owne hearts, to diſhonour their own bodies, betweene themſelves; If they changed the truth of God into a lye, and worſhipped and ſerved the creature more then the Creator, who is bleſſed for ever, no marvell, if God give them to vile affections, to change the naturall uſe into that which is againſt nature; burning in luſt one towards another, men with men working that which is unſeemly.

Contrarily, admit the Sodomy, yee cannot doubt of the Idols; unnaturall beaſtlineſſe in manners, is puniſhed juſtly with a ſottage dotage in religion; bodily pollution with ſpirituall: How ſhould the ſoule care to be chaſte, that keepes a ſtewes in the body? Aſa begins with the baniſhment of both; ſcouring Iudah of this double uncleanneſſe: In vaine ſhould he have hoped to reſtore God to his Kingdome, whiles theſe abominations inhabited it; It is juſtly the maine care of worthy, and religious Princes, to cleare their Coaſts of the fouleſt ſinnes: Oh the unpartiall zeale of Aſa! There were Idols that challenged a prerogative of favour; The Idols that his father had made, all theſe he defaces; the name of a father cannot protect an Idoll: The duty to his Parent cannot win him to a liking, to a forbearance of his miſdevotion: Yea, ſo much the more doth the heart of Aſa riſe againſt theſe puppets, for that they were the ſinne, the ſhame of his father: Did there want (thinke we) ſome Courtier of his Fathers retinue, to ſay; Sir, favour the memory of him that begot you; you cannot demoliſh theſe ſtatues, without the diſhonour of the Erector: Hide your diſlike at the leaſt; It will be your glory to lay your finger upon this blot of your fathers reputation: If you liſt not to allow his act, yet winke at it: The godly zeale of Aſa turnes the deafe eare to theſe monitors, and lets them ſee that he doth not more honor a father, then hate an Idoll; No deareneſſe of perſon ſhould take off the edge of our deteſtation of the ſinne. Nature is worthy of forgetfulneſſe, and contempt, in oppoſition to the God of Nature: Upon the ſame ground, as hee removed the Idols of his father Abijam, ſo for Idols he removed his Grand-mother Maachah; ſhe would not be removed from her obſcene Idols, ſhe is therefore removed from the ſtation of her honor: That Princeſſe had aged both in her regency; and ſuperſtition:

Under

A Under her rod was Asa brought up; and schooled in the rudiments of her Idolatry; whom she could not infect, she hoped to over-awe; so, as if Asa will not follow her gods, yet shee presumes that shee may retaine her owne: Doubtlesse, no meanes were neglected for her reclamation; none would prevaile: Religious Asa gathers up himselfe, and begins to remember that he is a King, though a sonne: that she, though a mother, yet is a subject: that her eminence could not but countenance Idolatry, that her greatnesse suppressed religion: which he should in vaine hope to reforme, whiles her superstition swayed: forgetting therefore the challenges of nature, the awe of infancy, the custome of reverence, he strips her of that command, which he saw prejudiciall to his Maker; All respects of flesh and blood must be trampled on, for God: Could that long-setled Idolatry want abettors? Questionlesse, some or other would say; This was the religion of your father Abijam, this of your Grand-father Rehoboam, this of the latter dayes of your wife and great Grand-father Salomon, B this of your Grand-mother Maachah, this of your great Grand-mother Naamah, why should it not be yours? Why should you suspect either the wisdom, or piety, or salvation of so many Predecessors? Good Asa had learned to contemne prescription against a direct law: He had the grace to know it was no measuring truth by so moderne antiquity; his eyes scorning to look so low, raise up themselves to the uncorrupt times of Salomon, to David, to Samuel, to the Iudges, to Iosua, to Moses, to the Patriarks, to Noah, to the religious founders of the first world, to the first father of mankinde; to Paradise, to Heaven: In comparison of these, Maachahs god cannot overlook yesterday; the ancienteſt error is but a novice, to Truth; And if never any example could be pleaded for purity of religion; it is enough that the precept is C expresse: He knew what God said in Sinai, and wrote in the Tables: Thou shalt not make to thy selfe any graven image, nor any similitude, Thou shalt not bow downe to them nor worship them: If all the world had been an Idolater, ever since that word was given he knew how little that precedent could availe for disobedience: Practice must bee corrected by law, and not the law yeeld to practice: Maachah therefore goes downe from her seat; her Idols from their grove; shee to retirednesse, they to the fire, and from thence to the water: Wofull deities that could both burne, and drowne.

Neither did the zeale of Asa more magnifie it selfe in these privative acts of weeding out the corruptions of Religion, then in the positive acts of an holy plantation; in the falling of those Idolatrous shrines, the Temple of God flourishes; That doth D he furnish with those sacred treasures, which were dedicated by himselfe, by his Progenitors; Like the true sonne of David, he would not serve God cost-free: Rehoboam turned Salomons gold into brasse: Asa turnes Rehoboams brasse into gold: Some of these vessels (it seemes) Abijam (Asaes father) had dedicated to God; but after his vow, inquired; yea with-held them: Asa like a good sonne, payes his fathers debts, and his owne. It is a good signe of a well-meant devotion, when wee can abide it chargeable; as contrarily in the affaires of God, a niggardly hand argues a cold, and hollow heart.

All these were noble and excellent acts, the extirpation of Sodomie, the demolition of Idols, the removal of Maachah, the bounteous contribution to the Temple; E but that which gives true life unto all these, is a sound root: Asaes heart was perfect with the Lord all his dayes; No lesse laudable workes then these have proceeded from Hypocrisie; which whiles they have caried away applause from men, have lost their thankes with God: All Asaes gold was but drosse to his pure intentions.

But oh what great and many infirmities may consist with uprightnesse? what allayes of imperfection will there be found in the most refined soule? Foure no small faults are found in true-hearted Asa: First the high places stood still, unremoved; What high places? There were some dedicated to the worship of false gods; these Asa tooke away: There were some misdevoted to the worship of the true God; these hee lets stand; There was grosse Idolatry in the former; there was a weake will-worship in the latter; whiles he opposes impiety, hee winkes at mistakings, yet even the variety of altars was forbidden by an expresse charge from God, who had confined confined his service to the Temple: with one breath doth God report both these; The high places were not removed, yet nevertheless Asaes heart was perfect. God will not see weaknesses, where he sees truth: How pleasing a thing is sincerity, that in favour thereof the mercy of our just God digests many an errour? Oh God, let our hearts goe upright, though our feet slide, the fall cannot (through thy grace) be deadly: how ever it may shame, or paine us.

Besides, to confront his rivall of Israel, Baasha, this religious King of Iudah, fetches in Benhadad the King of Syria into Gods inheritance, upon too deare a rate; the breach of his league, the expilation of the Temple. All the wealth wherewith Asa had endowed the house of the Lord, was little enough to hire an Edomite, to betray his fidelity, and to invade Israel: Leagues may be made with Infidels; not at such a price, upon such termes; There can be no warrant for a wilfull subornation of perfidiousnesse: In these cases of outward things, the mercy of God dispenseth with our true necessities, not with the affected: O Asa where was thy piety, whiles thou robbest God, to corrupt an Infidell for the slaughter of Israelites? O Princes, where is your piety, whiles you hire Turkes to the slaughter of Christians? to the spoile of Gods Church?

Yet (which was worse) Asa doth not onely imploy the Syrian, but relies on him, relies not on God; A confidence lesse sinfull cost his Grandfather David deare: And when Hanani Gods Seer, the Herald of heaven, came to denounce warre against him for these sinnes, Asa in stead of penitence, breakes into choler: Fury sparkles in those eyes, which should have gushed out with water; Those lippes that should have called for mercy, command revenge; How ill doe these two agree, The heart of David, the tongue of Ieroboam? That holy Grandfather of his would not have done so; when Gods messenger reproved him for sinne, hee condemned it, and himselfe for it; I see his teares, I doe not heare his threats: It ill becomes a faithfull heart to rage, where it should sorrow; and in stead of submission, to persecute: Sometimes no difference appeares betwixt a sonne of David, and the sonne of Nebat: Any man may doe ill, but to defend it, to outface it, is for rebels; yet even upright Asa imprisons the Prophet, and crushes his gainsayers. It were pitie that the best man should be judged by every of his actions, and not by all; The course of our life must either allow or condemne us, not these sudden eruptions.

As the life, so the Death bed of Asa wanted not infirmities; Long and prosperous had his raigne been; now after fourty yeares health and happinesse, he that imprisoned the Prophet, is imprisoned in his bed; There is more paine in those fetters which God put upon Asa, then those which Asa puts upon Hanani: And now, behold, he that in his warre seekes to Benhadad, not to God, in his sicknesse seekes not to God, but to Physitians: We cannot easily put upon God a greater wrong, then the alienation of our trust: Earthly meanes are for use, not for confidence; We may, we must imploy them; we may not rely upon them: Well may God challenge our trust, as his peculiar, which if we cast upon any creature, we deifie it: Whence have herbes, and drugges, and Physitians, their being, and efficacie, but from that divine hand? No marvell then if Asaes gout strucke to his heart, and his feet caried him to his grave, since his heart was miscaried for the cure of his feet, to an injurious misconfidence in the meanes, with neglect of his Maker.

Elijah with the Sareptan.

1 Kin. 17.

WHo should be match't with Moses in the hill of Tabor, but Elijah? Surely next after Moses, there was never any Prophet of the old Testament more glorious then he: None more glorious, none more obscure; The other Prophets are not mentioned without the name of their Parent, for the mutuall honour both of the father, and the sonne; Elijah, (as if he had been a sonne of the earth) comes forth with

A with the bare mention of the place of his birth. Meanneſſe of deſcent is no block in Gods way to the moſt honourable vocations; It matters not whoſe ſon he be whom God will grace with his ſervice: In the greateſt honors that humane nature is capable of, God forgets our parents: As when we ſhal be raiſed up to a glorious life, there ſhal be no reſpect had to the loyns whence wee came, ſo it is proportionally in theſe ſpirituall advancements.

Theſe times were fit for an Elijah, an Elijah was fit for them. The eminenteſt prophet is reſerved for the corrupteſt age; Iſrael had never ſuch a King as Ahab, for impiety, never ſo miraculous a Prophet as Elijah. This Elijah is addreſſed to this A- hab. The God of ſpirits knows how to proportion men to the occaſions, and to raiſe up to himſelfe ſuch witneſſes, as may be moſt able to convince the world. A B mild Moſes was for the low eſtate of afflicted Iſrael, mild of ſpirit, but mighty in wonders; mild of ſpirit, becauſe he had to doe with a perſecuted, and yet a techy, and perverſe people, mighty in wonders, becauſe he had to doe with a Pharaoh. A grave and holy Samuel was for the quiet conſiſtence of Iſrael; A fiery ſpirited Eli- jah was for the deſperateſt declination of Iſrael: and if in the late times of the depraved condition of his Church, God have raiſed up ſome ſpirits that have been more warme, and ſtirring, then thoſe of common mould, we cannot cenſure the choyce, when we ſee the ſervice.

The firſt word that we heare from Elijah, is an oath, and a threat to Ahab, to Iſ-rael: As the Lord God of Iſrael liveth, before whom I ſtand, there ſhall not be dew, nor raine, theſe yeares but according to my word: He comes in like a Tempeſt, who went out in a
C whirl-winde; Doubtleſſe he had ſpoken faire, and peaceable invitations to Iſrael (though we heare them not;) This was but the ſtorme which followed his repulſe, their obſtinacy; After many ſolicitations, and warnings, Iſrael is ſtriken by the ſame tongue that had prayed for it; Elijah dares avouch theſe judgements to their Head, to Ahab: I doe not ſo much wonder at the boldnes of Elijah, as at his power; yea who ſees his power, can no whit wonder at his boldnes: How could he be but bold to the face of a man, who was thus powerfull with God? As if God had lent him the keys of heaven to ſhut it up, and open it at pleaſure; he can ſay, There ſhall be neither dew, nor raine theſe yeers but according to my word. O God how farre it hath pleaſed thee to communicate thy ſelfe to a weak man? What Angell could ever ſay thus? Thy hand, O Lord is not ſhortened; Why art thou not thus marveilous in the miniſters of D thy Goſpell? Is it for that their miracles were ours? Is it for that thou would'ſt have us live by faith, not by ſenſe? Is it for that our taske is ſpirituall, and therefore more abſtracted from bodily helps? we cannot command the Sun with Ioſhua, nor the Thunder with Samuel, nor the rain with Elijah; It ſhall content us if we can fixe the Sun of righteouſneſſe in the ſoule, if we can thunder out the judgments of God againſt ſin, if wee can water the earthen hearts of men with the former, and latter raine of heavenly doctrine.

Elijahs mantle cannot make him forget his fleſh, whiles he knows himſelfe a Prophet, he remembers to be a man; he doth not therefore arrogate his power, as his own, but publiſheth it as his Maſters; This reſtraint muſt be according to his word; and that word was from an higher mouth, then his: He ſpake from him by whom he E ſware, whoſe word was ſure as his life; and therefore he durſt ſay, As the Lord liveth there ſhall be no raine. Man onely can denounce what God will execute; which when it is once revealed, can no more faile, then the Almighty himſelfe.

He that had this intereſt & power in heaven, what needed he flee from an earthly purſuit? Could his prayers reſtraine the clouds, and not hold the hands of fleſh and blood? Yet behold Elijah muſt flee from Ahab, and hide him by the brooke Cherith; the wiſedome of God doth not thinke fit ſo to make a beaten path of miracles, as that he will not walke beſide it; He wil have our owne indeavours concurre to our preſervation; Elijah wanted neither courage of heart, nor ſtrength of hand, and yet he muſt truſt to his feet for ſafety; How much more lawfull is it for our impotence to flee from perſecution? even that God ſends him to hide his head, who could as eaſily have protected, as nouriſhed him: Hee that wilfully ſtands ſtill to latch dangers, tempteth God inſtead of truſting him.

The Prophet muſt be gone, not without order taken for his purveiance; Oh the ſtrange Cators for Elijah, I have commanded the Ravens to feed thee there; I know not whether had beene more miraculous, to preſerve him without meat, or to provide meat by ſuch mouthes: The Raven, a devouring and ravenous fowle, that uſes to ſnatch away meat frō others, brings it to him: he that could have fed Elijah by Angels, will feed him by Ravens; There was then in Iſrael an hoſpitall Obadiah, that kept a ſecret Table in two ſeverall Caves, for an hundred prophets of God; There were ſeven thouſand faithfull Iſraelites (in ſpight of the Devill) who had never bowed knee to Baal; Doubtleſſe, any of theſe would have had a trencher ready for Elijah, and have thought himſelfe happy to have defrauded his owne maw, for ſo noble a Prophet; God rather chuſes to make uſe of the moſt unlikely fowles of the ayre, than their bounty that he might give both to his Prophet, and us a pregnant proofe of his abſolute command over all his creatures, and winne our truſt in all extremities. Who can make queſtion of the proviſions of God, when he ſees the very Ravens ſhall forget their owne hunger, and purvey for Elijah? O God, thou that provideſt meat for the fowles of the ayre, wilt make the fowles of the ayre provide meat for man, rather then this dependance on thee ſhall be diſappointed; Oh let not our faith be wanting to thee, thy care can never be wanting to us.

Elijah might have lived for the time with bread and water, neither had his fare beene worſe then his fellows in the caves of Obadiah; but the munificence of God will have his meales better furniſhed; The Ravens ſhall bring him both bread, and fleſh, twice in the day; It is not for a perſecuted Prophet to long after delicates; God gives order for competency, not for wantonneſſe; Not out of the dainty compoſitions in Iezebels kitchen, not out of the pleaſant wines in her cellar, would God provide for Elijah, but the Ravens ſhall bring him plaine, and homely victuals, and the river ſhal afford him drink; If we have wherewith to ſuſtaine nature (though not to pamper it) wee owe thanks to the giver; Thoſe of Gods family may not be curious, not diſdainfull: Ill doth it become a ſervant of the Higheſt, to be a ſlave to his palate. Doubtleſſe, one bit from the mouth of the Raven was more pleaſing to Elijah, then a whole Table-full of Ahab: Nothing is more comfortable to Gods children, then to ſee the ſenſible demonſtrations of the divine care, and providence.

The brooke Cherith cannot laſt always; that ſtreame ſhal not for Elijahs ſake be exempted from the univerſall exſiccation; yea the Prophet himſelfe feels the ſmart of this drought, which he had denounced; It is no unuſual thing with God to ſuffer his own deare children to be inwrapped in the common calamities of offenders: He makes difference in the uſe, and iſſue of their ſtripes, not in the infliction; The corne is cut downe with the weeds, but to a better purpoſe.

When the brook failes, God hath a Zarephath for Elijah; In ſtead of the Ravens a Widow ſhall there feed him; yea her ſelfe by him: Who can enough wonder at the pitch of this ſelective providence of the Almighty? Zarephath was a town of Sidon, and therefore without the pale of the Church; Poverty was the beſt of this Widow, ſhe was a Pagan by birth, heatheniſhly ſuperſtitious by inſtitution; Many Widowes were in Iſrael in the dayes of Elijah when the heaven was ſhut up three yeares, and ſix months, when great famine was throughout all the Land, but unto none of them was Elias ſent, ſave unto this Sarepta, a City of Sidon, unto a woman that was a Widow; He that firſt fed the Prophet by the mouth of uncleane fowles, will now feed him by the hand of an Heatheniſh Hoſteſſe; His only command ſanctifies thoſe creatures which by a generall charge were legally impure.

There were other birds beſides Ravens, other Widowes beſides this Sareptan; none but the Ravens, none but the Sareptan ſhall nouriſh Elijah. Gods choice is not led in the ſtring of humane reaſons, his holy wil is the guide, and the ground of all his elections. It is not in him that wils, nor in him that runs, but in God that ſhews mercy.

The Prophet follows the call of his God; the ſame hand that brought him to the gate of Sarepta, led alſo this poore Widow out of her doores, ſhe ſhall then goe to ſeeke

A seeke her ſtickes, when ſhe ſhall be found of Elijah; ſhe thought of her hearth, ſhe thought not of a Prophet; when the man of God cals to her, Fetch me a little water (I pray thee) in a veſſell, that I may drinke. It was no eaſie ſuit in ſo droughty a ſeaſon; and yet, at the firſt ſight, the Prophet dares ſecond it with a greater; Bring me a morſell of bread in thine hand; That long drought had made every drop, every crum precious; yet the Prophet is emboldned by the charge of God to call for both water and bread; He had found the Ravens ſo officious, that he cannot make doubt of the Sareptan: ſhe ſticks not at the water, ſhe would not ſtick at the bread, if neceſſity had not preſſed her; As the Lord thy God liveth, I have not a cake, but a handfull of meale in a barrell, and a little oyle in a cruſe, and behold I am gathering two ſtickes, that I may goe in and dreſſe it for me and my ſon, that we may eat it and dye.

B If ſhe knew not the man, how did ſhe know his God? and if ſhe knew not the God of Elijah, how did ſhe ſweare by him? Certainly though ſhe were without the bounds of Iſrael, yet ſhe was within the borders; ſo much ſhe had gained by her neighbourhood, to know an Iſraelite, a Prophet by his habit; to know the onely living God was the God of the Prophet, the God of Iſrael; & if this had not been, yet it is no marvell if the widow knew Elijah, ſince the Ravens knew him. It was high time for the Prophet to viſit the Sareptan; poore ſoule, ſhe was now making her laſt meale, after one meane morſell ſhe was yeelding her ſelfe over to death: How opportunely hath God provided ſuccours to our diſtreſſes? It is his glory to help at a pinch, to begin where we have given over: that our reliefe might be ſo much the more welcome, by how much it is leſſe look't for.

C But oh, what a tryall is this of the faith of a weake Proſelyte, if ſhe were ſo much? Feare not, go do as thou haſt ſaid, but make me thereof a little cake firſt, and bring it to me, and after make for thee, and thy ſon. For, thus ſaith the God of Iſrael, The barrel of meale ſhal not waſt, nor the cruſe of oyle faile till the day that God ſend raine upon the earth: She muſt go ſpend upon a ſtranger part of that little ſhe hath, in hope of more which ſhe hath not, which ſhe may have; ſhe muſt part with her preſent food, which ſhe ſaw, in truſt of future which ſhe could not ſee; ſhe muſt rob her ſenſe in the excerciſe of her beleef, & ſhorten her life in being upō the hope of a protraction of it, in promiſe; ſhe muſt beleeve God wil miraculouſly increaſe what ſhe hath yeelded to conſume; ſhe muſt firſt feed the ſtranger with her laſt victuals, and then after her ſelf, and her ſonne: Some ſharpe dame would have taken up the Prophet, and have ſent him a-

D way with an angry repulſe: Bold Iſraelite, there is no reaſō in this requeſt; wert thou a friend, or a brother, with what face couldſt thou require to pull my laſt bit out of my mouth? Had I ſuperfluity of proviſion, thou mighteſt hope for this effect of my charity; now, that I have but one morſell for my ſelfe, and my ſonne, this is an injurious importunity; what can induce thee to thinke thy life (an unknowne traveller) ſhould be more deare to me then my ſons, then my own? How uncivill is this motion that I ſhould firſt make proviſion for thee, in this dying extremity? It had bin too much to have begged my laſt ſcraps; thou telleſt me the meale ſhall not waſte, nor the oile faile; how ſhall I beleeve thee? Let me ſee that done, before thou eateſt; In vaine ſhould I challenge thee when the remainder of my poore ſtore is conſumed; If thou canſt ſo eaſily multiply victuals, how is it that thou wanteſt? Do that before-

E hand, wch thou promiſeſt ſhall be afterwards performed, there will be no need of my little. But this good Sareptan was wrought by God not to miſtruſt a Prophet; ſhee will do what he bids, and hope for what he promiſes; ſhe wil live by faith rather thē by ſenſe, and give away the preſent, in the confidence of a future remuneration; firſt, ſhe bakes Elijahs cake, then her own; not grudging to ſee her laſt morſels go downe anothers throat, whiles her ſelfe was famiſhing. How hard precepts doth God lay where he intends bounty Had! not God meant her preſervation, he had ſuffered her to eat her laſt cake alone, without any interpellatiō; now the mercy of the Almighty purpoſing as well this miraculous favour to her, as to his Prophet, requires of her this task, which fleſh and blood would have thought unreaſonable. So we are wont to put hard queſtions to thoſe ſchollers, whom we would promote to higher formes. So in all atchievements the difficulty of the enterpriſe makes way for the glory of the actor.

Happy was it for this widow, that she did not shut her hand to the man of God; that she was no niggard of her last handfull; Never corne or olive did so increase in growing, as here in consuming; This barrell, this cruse of hers had no bottome; the barrell of meale wasted not, the cruse of oile failed not; Behold, not getting, not saving is the way to abundance, but giving. The mercy of God crownes our beneficence with the blessing of store; who can feare want by a mercifull liberality, when he sees the Sareptan had famished, if she had not given, and by giving abounded? With what thankful devotion must this woman every day needs look upon her barrell, & cruse, wherein she saw the mercy of God renewed to her continually? Doubtlesse her soule was no lesse fed by faith, then her body with this supernaturall provision. How welcome a guest must Elijah needs be to this widow, that gave her life and her sons to her, for his board? yea, that in wofull famine gave her and her son their board for his house roome.

The dearth thus overcome, the mother looks hopefully upon her onely son, promising her selfe much joy in his life and prosperity, when an unexpected sickneſſe surpriseth him, and doth that which the famine but threatned: When can we hold our selves secure from evills? No sooner is one of these Sergeants compounded withall then we are arested by another.

How ready we are to mistake the grounds of our afflictions, and to cast them upon false causes; The passionate mother cannot find whither to impute the death of her son, but to the presence of Elijah: to whom she comes distracted with perplexity, not without an unkind challenge of him, from whom she had received both that life she had lost, and that she had; What have I to doe with thee, O thou man of God; Art thou come to me to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?

As if her son could not have died if Elijah had not been her guest; when as her son had dyed, but for him; why should she thinke that the Prophet had saved him from the famine, to kill him with sickneſſe? As if God had not been free in his actions; and must needs strike by the same hands, by which he preserved; She had the grace to know that her affliction was for her sin; yet was so unwise, to imagine the arerages of her iniquities had not bin called for, if Elijah had not been the remembrancer; He who had appeased God towards her, is suspected to have incensed him; This wrongfull misconstruction was enough to move any patience; Elijah was of an hot spirit; yet his holineſſe kept him from fury; This challenge rather increased the zeale of his prayer, then stirred his choler to the offendent: He takes the dead child out of his mothers bosome, and laies him upon his own bed, and cries unto the Lord; Oh Lord my God, hast thou brought evil also upon the Widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son? Instead of chiding the Sareptan, out of the fervency of his soul, he humbly expostulates with his God: His onely remedy is in his prayer; that which shut heaven for raine, must open it for life. Every word inforceth; First he pleads his interest in God, Oh Lord my God; then the quality of the patient; a Widow, and therefore, both most distressed with the losse, & most peculiar to the charge of the Almighty. Then, his interest as in God, so in this patient, with whom I sojourne: as if the stroke were given to himself, through her sides: and lastly, the quality of the punishment, By slaying her son, the onely comfort of her life; and in all these implying the scandall, that must needs arise from this event, where ever it should be noised, to the name of his God, to his owne; when it should be said: Lo how Elijahs entertainment is rewarded; Surely the Prophet is either impotent or unthankfull.

Neither doth his tongue move thus only; Thrice doth he stretch himself upon the dead body; as if he could wish to infuse of his owne life into the child; and so often cals to his God for the restitution of that soule: What can Elijah aske to be denyed? The Lord heard the voice of the Prophet, the soule of the child came into him againe, and he revived: What miracle is impossible to faithfull prayers! There cannot be more difference betwixt Elijahs devotion, and ours, then betwixt supernaturall and ordinary acts; If he therefore obtained miraculous favours by his prayers, do we doubt of those which are within the sphere of nature, & use? What could we want, if we did not slacke to ply heaven with our prayers?

Certainly

Certainly Elijah had not beene premonished of this ſudden ſickneſs, and death of the child; He who knew the remote affaires of the world, might not know what God would doe within his owne roofe, the greateſt Prophet muſt content himſelfe with ſo much of Gods counſell, as he wil pleaſe to reveale, and he wil ſometimes reveale the great ſecrets, and conceale the leſſe, to make good both his owne liberty, and mans humiliation. So much more unexpected as the ſtroke was, ſo much more welcome is the cure; How joyfully doth the man of God take the reviv'd child into his armes and preſente him to his mother? How doth his heart leap within him, at this proofe of Gods favour to him, mercy to the widow, power to the child.

What life and joy did now ſhew it ſelfe in the face of that amazed mother, when ſhee ſaw again the eyes of her ſon fixed upon hers; when ſhe felt his fleſh warm, his motions vitall? Now ſhe can ſay to Elijah, by this I know that thou art a man of God, and that the word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth; Did ſhe not til now know this? Had ſhe not ſaid before, What have I to doe with thee O thou man of God? Were not her cruſe, & her barrel ſufficient proofes of his divine commiſſion? Doubteleſſe what her meale and oyle had aſſured her of, the death of her ſon made her to doube; and now reviving did re-aſcertaine. Even the ſtrongeſt faith ſometimes ſtaggereth, and needeth new acts of heavenly ſupportation; the end of miracles is confirmation of truth; It ſeemes, had this widows ſonne continued dead, her beleefe had been buried in his grave notwithſtanding her meale and her oyle, her ſoule had languiſhed: The mercy of God is faine to provide new helps for our infirmities, and graciouſly condeſcends to our owne tearmes, that he may work out our faith and ſalvation.

Elijah with the Baalites.

THree years and an halfe, did Iſrael lie gaſping under a parching drought and miſerable famine: No creature was ſo odious to them as Elijah, to whom they aſcribed all their miſery Me thinks I heare how they railed on, and curſe the Prophet. How much envy muſt the ſervants of God undergoe for their maſter? Nothing but the tongue was Elijahs, the hand was Gods; the prophet did but ſay what God would do: I doe not ſee them fal out with their ſins, that had deſerved the judgment, but with the meſſenger that denounced it; Baal had no fewer ſervants then if there had beene both raine, and plenty: Elijah ſafely ſpends this ſtorme under the lee of Sarepta: Some three yeares hath he lyen cloſe in that obſcure corner, and lived upon the barrell, & cruſe which he had multiplied: At laſt God cals him forth, Go ſhew thy ſelfe to Ahab, and I wil ſend raine upon the earth; no raine muſt fall til Elijah were ſeen of Ahab; He carried away the clouds with him, he muſt bring them again: The King, the people of Iſrael, ſhal be witneſſes that God wil make good the word, the oath of his Prophet: Should the rain have falne in Elijahs abſence, who could have knowne it was by his procurement? God holds the credit of his meſſengers percious, & neglects nothing that may grace them in the eyes of the world; Not the neceſſity of ſeven thouſand religious Iſralites could crack the word of one Elijah; There is nothing wherin God is more tender, then in approving the veracity of himſelfe in his miniſters. 1 King. 18

Lewd Ahab hath an holy Steward: As his name was, ſo was he, a ſervant of God while his Maſter was a ſlave to Baal. He that reſerved ſeven thouſand in the Kingdome of Iſrael, hath reſerved an Obadiah in the court of Iſrael: and by him, hath reſerved them: Neither is it likely there had been ſo many free hearts in the Country, if Religion had not been ſecretly backed in the Court: It is a great happineſſe when God gives favour, and honor to the Vertuous. Elijah did not lie more cloſe in Sarepta, then Obadiah did in the Court: He could not have done ſo much ſervice to the Church, if he had not been as ſecret, as good; Policy and religion doas well together as they do ill aſunder: The Dove without the Serpent is eaſily caught, the ſerpent without the Dove ſtings deadly; Religion without policy is too ſimple to be ſafe safe: Policy without Religion, is too subtile to be good; Their match makes themselves secure, and many happy. A

Oh degenerated estate of Israel, any thing was now lawfull there saving piety: It is well if Gods Prophets can find an hole to hide their heads in: They must needs be hard driven when fifty of them are faine to croud together into one Cave; There they had both shade & repast: Good Obadiah hazards his own life to preserve theirs, and spends himselfe in that extreame dearth, upon their necessary diet; Bread & water was more now, then other whiles wine, and delicates; Whether shall we wonder more at the mercy of God in reserving an hundred Prophets, or in thus sustaining them being reserved; When did God ever leave his Israel unfurnished of some Prophets? when did he leave his Prophets unprovided of some Obadiah? How worthy art thou, O Lord, to be trusted with thine owne charge: whiles there are men upon earth, or birds in the ayre, or Angels in heaven, thy messengers cannot want provision. B

Goodnesse carryes away trust, where it cannot have imitation. Ahab divides with Obadiah the survey of the whole land; They two set their owne eyes on work, for the search of water, of pasture, to preserve the horses and mules alive: Oh the poore and vaine cares of Ahab: He casts to kill the Prophet, to save the cattle; he never seekes to save his own soule, to destroy Idolatry; he takes thought for grasse, none for mercy: carnall hearts are ever either grovelling on the earth, or delving into it, no more regarding God, or their souls, then if they either were not, or were worthlesse.

Elijah heares of the progresse, and offers himselfe to the view of them both; Here was wisedome in this courage: First, he presents himselfe to Obadiah, ere he will be seene of Ahab; that Ahab might upon the report of so discreet an informer, digest the expectation of his meeting: Then he takes the opportunity of Ahabs presence, when he might be sure Iezebel was away. C

Obadiah meets the Prophet, knows him, and (as if he had seen God in him) fals on his face to him, whom he knew his master persecuted: Though a great Peere, he had learned to honor a Prophet. No respect was too much for the president of that sacred colledge: To the poore Boarder of the Sareptan, here was no lesse, then a prostration; and, My Lord Elijah, from the great High Steward of Israel: Those that are truly gracious cannot be niggardly of their observances to the messengers of God. D

Elijah receives the reverence, returnes a charge: Go tell my Lord, behold, Elijah is here; Obadiah finds this load too heavy, neither is he more striken with the boldnesse, then with the unkindnesse of this command: boldnesse in respect of Elijah; unkindnesse in respect of himselfe: For, thus he thinks, If Elijah do come to Ahab, he dyes; If he doe not come, I dye, If it be knowne that I met him, and brought him not, it is death: if I say that he will come voluntarily, and God shall alter his intentions, it is death: How unhappy a man am I, that must be either Elijahs executioner; or my own? were Ahabs displeasure but smoaking, I might hope to quench it, but now that the flame of it hath broken forth to the notice, to the search of all the Kingdomes and Nations round about, it may consume me, I cannot extinguish it: This message were for an enemy of Elijah; for a client of Baal: As for me I have well approved my true devotion to God, my love to his Prophets: What have I done, that I should be singled out either to kill Elijah, or to be killed for him? many a hard plunge must that man needs be driven to, who would hold his conscience together with the service, and favour of a Tyrant: It is an happy thing to serve a just master, there is no danger, no stayne in such obedience. E

But, when the Prophet binds his resolution with an oath, and clears the heart of Obadiah from all fears, from all suspitions, the good man dares be the messenger of that, which he saw was decreed in heaven: Doubtlesse Ahab startled to heare of Elijah comming to meet him; as one that did not more hate, then feare the Prophet. Well might he think, thus long, thus far have I sought Elijah, Elijah would not come to seeke me, but vnder a sure guard, and with some strange commission: his coorse mantle

A mantle hath the advantage of my robe and Scepter: if I can command a peece of the earth, I see he can command heaven. The edge of his revenge is taken off with a doubtfull expectation of the issue: and now when Elijah offers himselfe to the eys of Ahab, He who durst not strike, yet durst challenge the Prophet, Art thou he that troubleth Israel? Ieroboams hand was still in Ahabs thoughts; he holds it not so safe to smite as to expostulate: He, that was the head of Israel, speaks out that which was in the heart of all his people, that Elijah was the cause of all their sorrow: Alas, what hath the righteous Prophet done? He taxed their sin, he foretold the judgements; he deserved it not, he inflicted it not? yet he smarts, and they are guilty: As if some fond people should accuse the Herald or the Trumpet as the cause of their warre; or as if some ignorant peasant, when he sees his fowles bathing in his pond, should cry out
B of them as the causes of foule weather.

Oh the heroical Spirit of Elijah! he stands alone amids all the traine of Ahab, and dares not onely repell this charge, but retort it, I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy fathers house, in that ye have forsaken the Commandements of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim. No earthly glory can daunt him who hath the cleare and heartning visions of God: This holy Seer discerns the true cause of our sufferings to be our sinnes: Foolish men are plagued for their offences; and it is no small part of their plague that they see it not; The onely common disturber of men, Families, Cities, Kingdoms, Worlds, is sin; There is no such Traytor to any State, as the wilfully wicked; the quietest and most plausible offender is secretly seditious, and stirreth quarrels in heaven.

C The true messengers of God carry authority even where they are maligned: Elijah doth at once reprove the King, and require of him the improvement of his power in gathering all Israel to Carmel, in fetching thither all the prophets of Baal. Baal was rich in Israel, whiles God was poor; Whiles God hath but one hundred Prophets hid closely in Obadiahs caves, Baal hath eight hundred & fifty; foure hundred and fifty dispersed over the villages & townes of Israel, foure hundred at the Court; Gods Prophets are glad of bread & water, whiles the foure hundred Trencher Prophets of Iezebel feed on her dainties: They lurke in caves, whiles these Lord it in the pleasantest groves. Outward prosperity is a false note of truth: All these with all Israel, doth Elijah require Ahab to summon unto Carmel. It is in the power of Kings to command the Assembly of the Prophets; The Prophet sues to the Prince for the D indiction of this Synod: They are injurious to Soveraignty who arrogate this power to none but spirituall hands. How is it that Ahab is as ready to performe this charge as Elijah to move it? I dare answer for his heart, that it was not drawn with love: Was it out of the sense of one judgment, and feare of another? he smarted with the dearth and drought, & well thinks Elijah would not be so round with him for nothing: Was it out of an expectation of some miraculous exploit which the Prophet would do in the sight of al Israel? Or, was it out of the over-ruling power of the Almighty? The heart of Kings is in the hands of God, and he turnes it which way soever he pleaseth.

Israel is met together, Elijah rates them, not so much for their superstition, as for their unsetledness, and irresolution: One Israelite serves God, another Baal; yea the E same Israelite perhaps serves both God and Baal. How long halt yee betweene two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him: Nothing is more odious to God then a prophane neutrality in maine oppositions of religion: To go upright in a wrong way, is a lesse eye-sore to God, then to halt betwixt right and wrong; The spirit wisheth that the Laodecean were either hot or cold; either temper would better be borne, thē neither, then both: In reconcileable differences nothing is more safe then indifferency both of practice & opinion; but in cases of so necessary hostility, as betwixt God, and Baal, he that is on neither side, is the deadliest enemy to both: Lesse hatefull are they to God that serve him not at all, then they that serve him with a rivall.

Whether out of guiltinesse, or feare, or uncertainty, Israel is silent; yet whiles their mouth was shut, their eyes were open: It was a faire motion of Elijah, I am onely remaining meaning a Prophet of the Lord, Baals Prophets are foure hundred and fifty: Let them choose one bullocke, let me choose another, Their devotion shal be combined, mine single: The God that consumes the sacrifice by fire from heaven, let him be God. Israel cannot but approve it; the Prophets of Baal cannot refuse it; they had the appearance of the advantage, in their number, in the favour of King and people. Oh strange disputation, wherein the argument which must bee used is fire; the place whence it must be fecht, heaven; the mood and figure, devotion; the conclusion, death to be overcome.

Had not Elijah, by divine instinct, been assured of the event, he durst not have put religion upon such hazard: That God commanded him this trial, who meant confusion to the authors of Idolatry, victory to the truth: His terror shal be approved both by fire and by water; first by fire, then by water: There was no lesse terror in the fire then mercy in the raine: It was fit they should first be humbled by his terrors, that they might be made capable of his mercy: and by both, might be wonne to repentance. Thus still the fears of the law make way for the influences of grace, neither do those sweet and heavenly dews descend upon the soule, till way be made for them by the terrible flashes of the law.

Justly doth Elijah urge this triall: Gods sacrifices were used to none but heavenly fires; whereas the base and earthly religion of the heathen contented it selfe with grosse and naturall flames.

The Prophets of Baal durst not (though with faint and guilty hearts) but imbrace the condition; they dresse their bullocke, and lay it ready upon the wood; and send out their cries to Baal from morning untill mid-day; O Baal heare us: What a yelling was here, of foure hundred and fifty throats tearing the skies for an answer? What leaping was here upon the altar, as if they would have climbed up to fetch that fire, which would not come downe alone? Mount Carmel might give an Eccho to their voice; heaven gave none; In vain do they roare out, and weary themselves in imploring a dumb and deafe deity; Grave & austere Elijah holds it not too light to flout their zealous devotion; he laughs at their tears, and playes upon their earnest; Cry aloud, for he is a God, either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is traveling, or he is sleeping, and must be awaked.

Scornes and taunts are the best answers for serious Idolatry; Holinesse will beare us out in disdainfull scoffes, & bitternes against wilfull superstition; No lesse in the indignation at these insulting frumps, then zeale of their owne safety, and reputation, do these Idolatrous Prophets now rent their throats with inclamations, and that they may assure the beholders, they were not in jest, they cut and slash themselves, with knives, and lancers, and solicit the fire with their blood; How much painfulnes there is in mis-religion? I doe not find that the true God ever required or accepted the self-tortures of his servants; He loves true inward mortification of our corruptions, he lovs the subduing of our spiritual insurrections, by due exercise of severe restraint; he takes no pleasure in our blood, in our carcasses: they mistake God that think to please him by destroying that nature, which he hath made; and measure truth by rigour of outward extremities; Elijah drew no blood of himselfe, the Priests of Baal did: How faine would the Devil (whom these Idolaters adored) have answered the suit of his suppliants? What would that ambitious spirit have given, that as he was cast down from heaven like lightening, so now he might have fain downe in that forme upon his altar?

God forbids it: All the powers of darknes can no more shew one flash of fire in the ayre, then avoid the unquencheable fire in hel: How easie were it for the power of the Almighty to cut short all the tyrannicall usurpations of that wicked one, if his wisdome and justice did not find the permission thereof usefull to his holy Purposes.

These Idolaters now towards evening, grew so much more vehement, as they were more hopelesse; and at last, when neither their shrikes, nor their wounds, nor their mad motions could prevaile, they sit down hoarse and weary; tormenting themselves afresh with their despaires, and with the feares of bitter successe of their adversarie; when Elijah cals the people to him, (the witnesses of his sincere proceedings) and taking

A taking the opportunity both of the time, (the juſt houre of the evening ſacrifice) and of the place, a ruined altar of God, now by him repaired, convinces Iſrael with his miracle, and more cuts theſe Baalites with envy, then they had cut themſelves with their lancers.

O holy Propher, why didſt thou not ſave this labor? what needed theſe unſeaſonable reparations? Was there not an altar, was there not a ſacrifice ready prepared to thine hand? that which the Prophets of Baal had addreſſed, ſtood ſtill waiting for that fire from thee, which the founders threatned in vaine: the ſtones were not more impure, either for their touch, or their intentiõs: yet ſuch was thy deteſtatiõ of Idolatry, that thou abhorredſt to meddle with ought, which their wickedneſſe had defiled: Even that altar, whoſe ruines thou didſt thus repaire, was miſerected though to the name B of the True God; yet didſt thou find it better to make up the breaches of that altar, which was miſ-conſecrated to the ſervice of thy God, then to make uſe of that pile, which was Idolatrouſly devoted to a falſe god: It cannot be but ſafe to keep aloofe from participation with Idolaters, even in thoſe things which not onely in nature, but in uſe are uncleane.

Elijah layes twelve ſtones in his repaired altar, according to the number of the Tribes of the ſons of Jacob: Alas ten of theſe were perverted to Baal. The Prophet regards not their preſent Apoſtaſie; he regards the ancient covenant, that was made with their father Iſrael; he regards their firſt ſtation, to which he would reduce thẽ: he knew that the unworthineſſe of Iſrael could not make God forgetfull: he would by this monument put Iſrael in mind of their owne degeneration, and forgetfulnes, C He imploies thoſe many hands for the making a large trench round about the altar; and cauſes it to be filled with thoſe precious remainders of water, which the people would have grudged to their own mouthes; neither would eaſily have parted with, but (as thoſe that poure down a pailfull into a drie pump) in the hope of fetching more. The altar, the trench is full: A barrell full is poured out for each of the Tribes, that every Tribe might be afterwards repleniſhed. Ahab and Iſrael are no leſſe ful of expectation; and now, vvhen Gods appointed houre of the evening ſacrifice vvas come, Elijah comes confidently to his altar, and looking up into heaven ſaies, Lord God of Abraham, Iſaac, and Iſrael, Let it be knowne this day, that thou art God in Iſrael, and that I am thy Servant, and that I have done all theſe things at thy word: Heare me, O Lord, heare me, that this people may know that thou art the Lord God, and that thou haſt turned D their hearts backe againe.

The Baalites prayers were not more tedious, then Elijahs vvas ſhort; and yet more pithy then ſhort; charging God with the care of his covenant, of his truth, of his glory. It vvas Elijah that ſpake loud; Oh ſtrong cries of faith, that pierce the heavens, & irreſiſtibly make their way to the throne of grace: Iſrael ſhal wel ſee that Elijahs God whõ they have forſakẽ, is neither talking, nor purſuing, nor travelling, nor ſleeping: Inſtantly, the fire of the Lord fals from heaven, and conſumes the burnt ſacrifice, the vvood, the ſtones, the duſt, & licks up the water that vvas in the trench: With vvhat terror muſt Ahab and Iſrael needs ſee this fire rolling downe out of the skie, and alighting vvith ſuch fury ſo neere their heads; heads no leſſe fit for this flame then the ſacrifice of Elijah: Well might they have thought, How eaſily might this fire E have dilated it ſelfe, and have conſumed our bodies, as well as the wood and ſtone, and have lickt up our bloud, as well as that water? I know not whether they had the grace to acknowledge the mercy of God; they could doe no leſſe then confeſſe his power, The Lord is God, The Lord is God.

The iron was now hot with this heavenly fire: Elijah ſtayes not till it coole again, but ſtrikes immediately: Take the Prophets of Baal, let not one of them eſcape. This wager was for life: Had they prevailed in procuring this fire, and Elijah failed of effect; his head had beene forfeited unto them: now in the contrary ſucceſſe, their are loſt to him. Let no man complain that thoſe holy hands were bloudy: This ſacrifice was no leſſe pleaſing to God, then that other. Both the man and the act were extraordinary, and led by a peculiar inſtinct: Neither doth the Prophet this without the aſſent of the ſupreme Magiſtrate, who was now ſo affected with this miraculous worke, that he

he could not in the heat of that conviction, but allow the justice of such a sentence. Far be it from us to accuse Gods commands or executions of cruelty: It was the ancient and peremptory charge of God, that the authors of Idolatry and seduction should dye the death; no eye, no hand might spare them: The Prophet doth but move the performance of that Law, which Israel could not without sin have omitted: It is a mercifull and thankworthy severity to rid the world of the Ring-leaders of wickednesse. A

Elijah running before Ahab, flying from Jezebel.

1 Kin. 18, 19

THeare no newes of the foure hundred Prophets of the Groves: They lie close under the wing of Jezebel, under their pleasing shades: neither wil be suffered to undergo the danger of this tryall; the carkeises of their fellowes help to fill up the halfe-dry channell of Kishon: Justice is no sooner done, then Ahab heares newes of mercy from Elijah: Get thee up, eat and drink, for there is a sound of abundance of raine: Their meeting was not more harsh, then their parting was friendly: It seemes Ahab had spent all that day fasting in an eager attendance of those conflicting Prophets: It must needs bee late, ere the execution could be done: Elijahs part began not till the evening: So farre must the King of Israel be from taking thought for the massacre of those foure hundred and fifty Baalites; that now, he may go eat his bread with joy, and drink his wine with a chearfull heart: for God accepteth this worke, and testifies it in the noyse of much raine: Every drop of that Idolatrous blood was answered with a showre of raine, with a streame of water, and plenty poured downe in every showre: A sensible blessing followes the unpartiall strokes of severe justice: Nothing is more cruel then an unjust piety. B C

No eares but Elijahs could as yet perceive a sound of raine; the clouds were not yet gathered, the vapours were not yet risen, yet Elijah heares that which shall bee: Those that are of Gods Counsell can discerne either favours or judgements afarre off, the slacke apprehensions of carnall hearts make them hard to be beleeve that, as future, which the quick and refined senses of the faithfull receive, as present.

Ahab goes up to his repast; Elijah goes up to his prayers: That day had been painful to him, the vehemency of his spirit draws him to a neglect of his body: The holy man climbes up to the top of Carmel, that now he may talke with his God alone: neither is he sooner ascended, then he casts himself down upon the earth: He bowes his knees to God, and bowes his face down to his knees: by this humble posture acknowledging his awfull respects to that Majesty which he implored: We cannot prostrate our bodies, or soules, too low to that infinitely glorious Deity, who is the Creator of both. D

His thoughts were more high then his body was low: what he said we know not, we know that what he said opened the heavens, that for three yeares and a half had bin shut up: God had said before, I will send raine upon the earth; yet Elijah must pray for what God did promise; The promises of the Almighty do not discharge our prayers, but suppose them; he will do what he undertakes, but we must sue for that which we would have him do: Our petitions are included in the decrees, in the ingagements of God. E

The Prophet had newly seene and caused the fire to descend immediately out of heaven, he doth not look the water should doe so; he knew that the raine must come from the clouds, and that the clouds must arise from vapours, and those vapours frō the Sea, thence doth he expect them: But as not willing that the thoughts of his fixed devotion should be distracted, he doth not go himselfe, onely sends his servant to bring him the newes of his successe. At the first sight nothing appeares: Seven times must he walke to that prospect; and not till his last view can discerne ought: All that while is the Prophet in his prayers, neither is any whit dasted with that delay: Hope holds up the head of our holy desires, and perseverance crowns it: If we receive not an

A an answer to our suits at the sixth motion, we may not be out of countenance, but must try the seventh: At last a little cloud arises out of the Sea, of an hand breadth. So many, so fervent prayers cannot but pul water out of heaven as wel as fire: Those sighs reflect upon the earth, and from the earth reflect upon heaven, from heaven rebound upon the Sea, and raise vapours up thence to heaven again: If we find that our prayers are heard for the substance, we may not cavill at the quantity: Even an hand-broad cloud contents Elijah, and fils his heart full of joy and thankfulnes: He knew wel this meteor was not at the biggest, it was newly born of the womb of the waters, & in some minutes of age must grow to a large stature: stay but a while, and Heaven is covered with it: From how smal beginnings have greater matters risen? It is no otherwise in all the gracious proceedings of God with the soule; scarce sensi-
B ble are those first works of his Spirit in the heart, which grow up at last to the wonder of men, and applause of Angels.

Well did Elijah know that God who is perfection it selfe, would not defile his hand with an inchoate and scanted favour, as one therefore that fore-saw the face of heaven over-spread with this cloudy spot, he sends to Ahab to hasten his Chariot, that the raine stop him not: It is long since Ahab feared this let; never was the news of a danger more welcome: Doubtlesse the King of Israel whiles he was at his diet, lookt long for Elijahs promised showres; where is the raine whose sound the Prophet heard? how is it that his ears were so much quicker then our eyes? We saw his fire to our terror, how gladly would we see his Waters? When now the servant of Elijah brings him news from heaven, that the clouds were setting forward, and
C (if he hastened not) would be before him: The wind arises, the clouds gather, the skie thickens, Ahab betakes him to his Charet; Elijah girds up his loynes, and runnes before him: Surely the Prophet could not want the offer of more ease in his passage; but he will be for the time Ahabs lacquey, that the King and all Israel may see his humility no lesse then his power, & may confesse that the glory of those miracles hath not made him insolent. He knew that his very sight was monitory: neither could Ahabs mind be beside the miraculous works of God, whiles his eye was upon Elijah: neither could the Kings heart be otherwise then well-affected towards the Prophet, whiles he saw that himselfe and all Israel, had received a new Life by his procurement. But what news was here for Iezebel? Certainely Ahab
D minced nothing of the report of all those astonishing accidents: If but to salve up his owne honour, in the death of those Baalites, he made the best of Eliahs merits; he told of his challenge, conflict, victory, of the fire that fel downe from heaven, of the conviction of Israel, of the unavoidable execution of the Prophets, of the prediction and fal of those happy showers, and lastly of Elijahs officious attendance. Who would not have expected that Iezebel should have said; It is no striving, no dallying with the Almighty: No reasonable creature can doubt, after so prodigious a decision; God hath wonneus from Heaven, he must possesse us: Iustly are our seducers perished; None but the God that can command fire and water shal be ours; There is no Prophet but his: but she contrarily, in stead of relenting, rageth; and sends a message of death to Elijah, So let the gods doe to me, and more also, if I make not thy life, as the life of one of them by to morrow about this time: Neither scourges, nor
E favours can work any thing with the obstinately wicked; All evill hearts are not equally dis-affected to good: Ahab and Iezebel were both bad enough, yet Ahab yeelds to that work of GOD, which Iezebel stubbornly opposeth: Ahab melts with that water, with that fire, wherwith Iezebel is harden'd, Ahab was bashfully, Iezebel audaciously impious; The weaker sex is ever most commonly stronger in passion, and more vehemently carryed with the sway of their desires, whether to good or evill: She sweares, and stamps at that whereat shee should have trembled. Shee swears by those gods of hers, which were not able to save their Prophets, that shee will kill the propher of God, who had scorned her gods, and slaine her Prophets.

It is well that Iezebel could not keepe counsell: Her threat preserved him whom she had meant to kill: The wisedome and power of God could have found evasions evasions for his Prophet, in her greatest secresie: but now, he needs no other meanes of rescue, but her owne lips: She is no lesse vaine, then the Gods she sweares by: in spight of her fury, and her oath, and her gods, Elijah shal live: At once shal she find her selfe frustrate, & forsworn. Shee is now ready to bite her tongue, to eat her hart for anger, at the disappointment of her cruel Vow. It were no living for godly men if the hands of Tyrants were allowed to be as bloody as their hearts. Men and Devils are under the restraint of the Almighty, neither are their designes more lavish then their executions short. A

Holy Elijah flees from his life; we heare not of the command of God, but wee would willingly presuppose it: So divine a Prophet should doe nothing without God: His heeles were no new refuge; As no where safe within the tenne Tribes, he flees to Beersheba, in the territories of Iudah; as not there safe from the machinations of Iezebel, he flees alone (one days journey) into the wildernesse; there he sits him downe under a Juniper Tree, and (as weary of life, no lesse then of his way) wishes to rise no more. It is enough now, O Lord, take away my life, for I am not better then my fathers: O strange and uncouth mutation! What is this wee heare? Elijah fainting and giving up? that heroicall spirit dejected, and prostrate? He that durst say to Ahabs face, It is thou, and thy fathers house that troubleth Israel, he that could raise the dead, open and shut the heavens, fetch downe both fire, and water with his prayers, he that durst chide and contest with all Israel, that durst kill the foure hundred and fifty Baalits, with the sword, doth he shrinke at the frownes and threats of a woman? doth he wish to be rid of his life because he fear'd to lose it? Who can expect an undaunted constancy from flesh and blood, when Elijah failes? The strongest and holiest Saint upon earth is subject to some qualmes of feare, and infirmity: To be always and unchangeably good, is proper onely to the glorious Spirits in heaven: Thus the wise and holy God will have his power perfited in our weaknesse: It is in vaine for us whiles we carry this flesh about us, to hope for so exact health, as not to be cast downe sometimes with fits of spirituall distemper. It is no new thing for holy men to wish for death: Who can either marvel at, or blame the desire of advantage? For the weary traveller to long for rest, the prisoner for liberty, the banished for home, it is so naturall, that the contrary disposition were monstrous: The benefit of the change is a just motive to our appetition: but to call for death out of a satiety of life, out of an impatience of suffering, is a weaknesse unbeseeming a Saint: It is not enough O Elijah, God hath more worke yet for thee: thy God hath more honoured thee, then thy fathers, and thou shalt live to honour him. B C D

Toyle and sorrow have lulled the Prophet asleepe, under his Juniper tree; that wholsome shade was well chosen, for his repose: whiles death was called for, the couzen of death comes unbidden: The Angel of God waits on him in that hard lodging: no wildernesse is too solitary for the attendance of those blessed spirits: As he is guarded, so is he awaked by that Messenger of GOD, and stirred up from his rest, to his repast; whiles he slept, his breakfast is made ready for him, by those spirituall hands; There was a cake baked on the coales, and a cruse of water at his head: Oh the never ceasing care and providence of the Almighty, not to bee barred by any place, by any condition, when meanes are wanting to us, when wee are wanting to our selves, when to God, even then doth he follow us with his mercy and cast favours upon us, beyond, against expectation What variey of purveyance doth he make for his servant? One while the Ravens, then the Sareptan, now the Angel shal be his Cator: none of them without a miracle. Those other provided for him waking, this sleeping: O GOD, the eye of thy providence is not dimmer, the hand of thy power is not shorter; onely teach thou us to serve thee, to trust thee. E

Needs must the Prophet eate, and drinke, and sleepe with much comfort, whiles he saw that he had such a guardian, attendance, purveyour; and now the second time is he raised, by that happy touch, to his meale, and his way: Arise and eate, because the journey is too great for thee. What needed he to travell further, sith that divine

A divine power could as well protect him in the Wilderneſſe, as in Horeb? what needed he to eate, ſince he that meant to ſuſtaine him forty dayes with one meale, might as well have ſuſtained him without it? God is a moſt free Agent, neither will he be tyed to the termes of humane regularities: It is enough that he knowes and approves the reaſons of his owne choyce and commands: once in forty dayes and nights ſhall Elijah eat, to teach us what God can doe with little meanes; and but once, to teach us what he can doe without meanes: once ſhall the Prophet eate, Man lives by bread, and but once, Man lives not by bread onely, but by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God: Moſes, Elijah, our Saviour, faſted each of them forty dayes, and forty nights: the three great faſters met gloriouſly in Tabor: I doe not find where God ever honoured any man for feaſting: It is abſtinence, not fulneſſe, that makes a man
B capable of heavenly viſions, of divine glory.

The journey was not of it ſelfe ſo long; the Prophet tooke thoſe wayes, thoſe houres which his heart gave him: In the very ſame Mount where Moſes firſt ſaw God, ſhall Elijah ſee him: one and the ſame cave (as is very probable) was the receptacle to both: It could not be but a great confirmation of Elijah, to renue the ſight of thoſe ſenſible monuments of Gods favour, and protection, to his faithfull predeceſſor. Moſes came to ſee God in the buſh of Horeb: God came to finde Elijah in the Cave of Horeb: What doeſt thou here Elijah? The place was directed by a providence, not by a command: Hee is hid ſure enough from Jezebel: hee cannot bee hid from the all-ſeeing eye of God. Whither ſhall I goe from thy Spirit? or whither ſhall I flye from thy preſence? If I aſcend up into Heaven, thou art there; If I make my bed in Hell, behold thou art there: If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the utmoſt
C parts of the Sea, even there ſhall thine hand finde me, and thy right hand ſhall hold me: Twice hath God propounded the ſame queſtion to Elijah: Once in the heart, once in the mouth of the Cave: Twice doth the Prophet anſwer, in the ſame words: Had the firſt anſwer ſatisfied, the queſtion had not beene re-demanded. Now, that ſullen anſwer which Elijah gave in the darkeneſſe of the Cave is challenged into the Light, not without an awfull preface. The Lord firſt paſſeth by him with the terrible demonſtrations of his power. A great and ſtrong winde rent the Mountaines, and brake the Rockes in pieces: The tearing blaſt was from God, God was not in it: So was he in it, as in his other extraordinary workes; not ſo in it, as by it to impart himſelfe to Elijah: it was the Uſher not the cariage of God: After the D winde, came an Earth-quake, more fearefull then it: That did but move the ayre, this the earth; that beat upon ſome prominences of earth, this ſhooke it from the Center. After the earth-quake came a fire more fearefull then either. The other affected the eare, the feeling: but this lets in horror into the ſoule, by the eye, the quickeſt and moſt apprehenſive of the ſenſes. Elijah ſhall ſee Gods mighty power in the earth, aire, fire, before he heare him in the ſoft voice: all theſe are but boiſtrous harbingers of a meek, and ſtill word: In that God was; Behold, in that gentle and milde breath there was omnipotency; there was but powerfulneſſe in thoſe fierce repreſentations: There is not alwayes the greateſt efficacy where is the greateſt noiſe: God loves to make way for himſelfe by terrour, but he conveyes himſelfe to us in ſweetneſſe: It is happy for us if after the guſts and flaſhes of the Law, we have heard the ſoft
E voice of Evangelicall mercy.

In this very mount, with the ſame horror God had delivered his Law to Moſes and Iſrael: It is no marvell if Elijah wrapt his face in his mantle: His Obedience drawes him forth to the mouth of the Cave, his feare ſtill hides his head: Had there not beene much courage in the Prophets faith, he had not ſtood out theſe affrightfull fore-runners of the divine preſence, though with his face covered: The very Angels do no leſſe, before that al-glorious Majeſty, then vaile themſelves with their wings: Farre be it from us once to thinke of that infinite, and omnipotent Deity, without an humble awfulneſſe.

Feare changes not the tenour of Elijahs anſwer: He hath not left one word behinde him in the Cave: I have beene very jealous for the Lord God of Hoſts, becauſe the children of Iſrael have forſaken thy Covenant, throwne downe thine Altars, and ſlaine thy Prophets with the ſword, and I, even I onely, am left, and they ſeeke my life to take it away. I heare not a direct anſwer from the Prophet to the demand of God: then he had ſaid, I runne away from the threats of Iezebel, and here I hide my head from her malicious purſuit: His guiltineſſe would not let him ſpeake out all: Hee had rather ſay, I have been jealous for the Lord God of Hoſts, then, I was fearefull of Iezebel: Wee are all willing to make the beſt of our owne caſe: but what he wants of his owne accuſation, he ſpends upon the complaint of Iſrael. Neither doth he more bemone himſelfe, then exclaime againſt them, as Apoſtates from Gods Covenant, violaters of his Altars, murtherers of his Prophets: It muſt needs be a deſperate condition of Iſrael, that drives Elijah to indict them before the throne of God: That tongue of his was uſed to plead for them, to ſue for their pardon, it could not be but a forceable wickedneſſe, that makes it their accuſer. Thoſe Idolatrous Iſraelites were well forward to reformation: The fire and raine from heaven at the prayers of Elijah had wonne them to a ſcorne of Baal; onely the violence of Iezebel turned the ſtream, and now they are reſetled in impiety, & perſecute him for an enemy, whom they almoſt adored for a benefactor; otherwiſe, Elijah had not complained of what they had beene: Who would thinke it? Iezebel can doe more then Elijah: No miracle is ſo prevalent with the vulgar, as the ſway of authority, whether to good or evill.

Thou art deceived, O Elijah, thou art not left alone; neither is all Iſrael tainted: God hath children and Prophets in Iſrael, though thou ſee them not; thoſe cleare eyes of the Seer diſcerne not the ſecret ſtory of God: they lookt not into Obadiahs Caves, they lookt not into the cloſets of the religious Iſraelites; he that ſees the heart can ſay, I have left me ſeven thouſand in Iſrael, al the knees which have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth which hath not kiſſed him: According to the faſhion of the wealthy, God pleaſeth himſelfe in hidden treaſures; it is enough that his own eyes behold his riches: Never did he, never will he leave himſelfe unfurniſhed with holy clients, in the midſt of the fouleſt depravations of his Church: the ſight of his faithfull ones hath ſometimes been loſt, never the being: Doe your worſt, O yee Gates of Hell, God will have his owne: He that could have more, will have ſome: that foundation is ſure, God knoweth who are his.

It was a true cordiall for Elijahs ſolitarineſſe, that he had ſeven thouſand inviſible abettors; neither is it a ſmall comfort to our weakneſſe to have companions in good: for the wickedneſſe of Iſrael God hath another receit; the oyle of royall and propheticall unction; Elijah muſt anoint Hazael King of Syria, Iehu King of Iſrael, Eliſha for his ſucceſſor: All theſe ſhall revenge the quarrels of God, and him; one ſhall begin, the other ſhall proſecute, the third ſhall perfect the vengeance upon Iſrael.

A Prophet ſhall avenge the wrongs done to a prophet: Eliſha is found, not in his ſtudy, but in the field; not with a book in his hand, but a plough: His father Shaphat was a rich farmer in Abel-Meholah, himſelfe was a good husband, not trained in the ſchools of the Prophets, but in the thrifty trade of tillage: and behold, this was the man whom God wil pick out of all Iſrael for a Prophet; God ſeeth not as man ſeeth; Neither doth he chooſe men before they are fit, but therefore he fits them, becauſe he hath choſen them; his call is above all earthly inſtitution.

I heare not of ought that Elijah ſaid: Onely he caſts his cloake upon Eliſha in the paſſage; That mantle, that act was vocall: Together with this ſigne, Gods inſtinct teacheth this amazed ſonne of Shaphat that he was deſigned to an higher worke, to breake up the fallow grounds of Iſrael, by his propheticall function: Hee findes a ſtrange vertue in that Robe; and (as if his heart were changed with that habit) forgets his teame, and runnes after Elijah; and ſues for the leave of a farewell to his parents, ere he had any but a dumbe command to follow; The ſecret call of God offers an inward force to the heart, and inſenſibly draws us beyond the power of our reſiſtance; Grace is no enemy to good nature; Well may the reſpects to our earthly parents ſtand with our duties to our Father in heaven. I doe not ſee Eliſha wring his hands and deplore his condition, that he ſhall leave the

A the world, and follow a Prophet, but for the joy of that change, hee makes a feast: those Oxen, those utensils of husbandry whereon his former labours had beene bestowed, shall now be gladly devoted to the celebration of that happy day, wherein hee is honoured with so blessed an imployment; If with desire, if with cheerfulnesse we doe not enter into the workes of our heavenly Master, they are not like to prosper in our hands: He is not worthy of this spirituall station, who holds not the service of God his highest, his richest preferment.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE EDWARD LORD DENNY, BARON OF Waltham, my bountifull and dearely Honoured Patron.

Right Honourable:

NOne can challenge ſo much right in theſe Meditations, as your Lordſhip, under whoſe happy ſhade they received their firſt conception: Vnder this Juniper of yours, have I (not drivē by force, but drawn by pleaſure) ſlept thus long, ſweetly, ſafely; & have received theſe Angelicall touches: How juſtly may your Lordſhip claime the fruits of your owne favours? Your carefull ſtudies in the book of God, are fit to be exemplary; which have ſoenriched you, that your Teacher ſhall gaine. In this reach of divine thoughts, you ſhall ſee Benhadads inſolence taken down by Ahabs victory, an humble (though Idolatrous) Iſraelite carying it from an inſulting Pagan: You ſhall ſee in Ahab the impotent paſſions of greatnes; in Naboth bleeding honeſty; in Jezebel bloody hypocriſie, cruell craft plotting from hell, pretending from heaven: You ſhall ſee the wofull ſucceſſe of an unjuſt mercy; Ahab forfaiting what he gave, killed by him whom he ſhould have killed; you ſhall ſee reſolute Michaiah oppoſing the mercenary Synode of Prophets, a beaten victor, an impriſoned freeman: You ſhall ſee Ahaziah falling through his grate; Elijah climbing up his Mount, mounting up to his glory; fetching fire from heaven, fetcht by a fiery charet to heaven. Eliſha the heire of his mantle, of his ſpirit, no leſſe leſſe marvellous in his beneficences, in his revenges. What doe I foretell all? Me thinkes I feele my ſelfe too like an Italian hoſt, thus to meet your Lordſhip on the way, and to promiſe before hand your fare and entertainment: Let it pleaſe your Lordſhip rather to ſee and allow your cheare : Indeed the feaſt is Gods, and not mine, wherein ſtore ſtrives with delicacy : If my cookery hurt it not, it is enough : Through your hands I commend it to the world, as I doe your Lordſhip, and my Honourable good Lady, to the gracious protection of the Almighty, juſtly vowing my ſelfe

Your Lordſhips in all faithfull obſervance for ever to command,

Jos. Hall.

Contemplations.

AHAB and BENHADAD.

THere is nothing more dangerous for any State, then to call in forein powers, for the suppressing of an home-bred enemy; the remedy hath oft in this case, proved worse then the disease. Asa King of Iudah implores the aid of Benhadad the Syrian, against Baasha King of Israel. That stranger hath good colour to set his foot in some out-skirt-townes of Israel; and now these serve him but for the hansell of more; Such sweetnesse doth that Edomite find in the soile of Israel, that his ambition will not take up with lesse then all; He that entred as a Friend, will proceed as a Conqueror; and now aimes at no lesse then Samaria it selfe, the heart, the head of the ten Tribes: there was no cause to hope for better successe of so perfidious a League with an Infidell: Who can looke for other then warre when he sees Ahab and Iezebel in the Throne, Israel in the groves and temples of Baalim? The ambition of Benhadad was not so much guilty of this warre, as the Idolatry of that wicked nation; How can they expect peace from earth, who doe wilfully fight against heaven? Rather will the God of Hosts arme the brute, the senseless creatures against Israel, then he will suffer their defiance unrevenged. Ahab and Benhadad are well matched, an Idolatrous Israelite, with a paganish Idumæan; well may God plague each with other, who meanes vengeance to them both. Ahab findes himselfe hard pressed with the siege; and therefore is glad to enter into treaties of peace; Benhadad knowes his owne strength, and offers insolent conditions, Thy silver and thy gold is mine, thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest are mine. It is a fearefull thing to be in the mercy of an enemy; In case of hostility might will carve for it selfe: Ahab now after the division of Iudah, was but halfe a King; Benhadad had two and thirty Kings to attend him; What equality was in this opposition? Wisely doth Ahab therefore, as a reed in a tempest, stoop to this violent charge of so potent an enemy: My Lord, O King, according to thy saying I am thine, and all that I have: It is not for the over-powred to capitulate; Weakenesse may not argue but yeeld. Tyranny is but drawne on by submission; and where it finds feare, and dejection, insulteth. Benhadad not content with the soveraignty of Ahab's goods, calls for the possessions; Ahab had offered the Dominion, with reservation of his subordinate interest: he will be a tributary, so he may be an owner: Benhadad imperiously besides the command, calls for the propriety; and suffers not the King of Israel to enjoy those things at all, which he would enjoy but under the favour of that predominancy. Over-strained subjection turnes desperate, if conditions be imposed worse then death, there needs no long disputation of the remedy; The Elders of Israel (whose share was proportionably in this danger) hearten Ahab to a deniall: which yet comes out so fearefully, as that it appeares rather extorted by the peremptory peremptory indignation of the people, then proceeding out of any generosity of his Spirit: Neither doth he say, I will not, but, I may not, The proud Syrian (who would have taken it in foule scorn to be denied, though he had sent for all the heads of Israel) snuffes up the winde like the wild Asse in the Wildernesse, and brags, and threats, and sweares, The gods doe so to me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfulls for all the people that follow me: Not the men, not the goods onely of Samaria shall be caryed away captive, but the very earth whereon it stands; and this, with how much ease? No Souldier shall need to be charged with more then an handfull, to make a valley where the mother City of Israel once stood: Oh vaine boaster! In whom I know not whether pride or folly be more eminent: Victory is to be atchived, not to be sworne: future events are no matter of an oath; Thy gods (if they had beene) might have beene called as witnesses of thy intentions, not of that successe, whereof thou wouldst be the Author without them: Thy gods can doe nothing to thee, nothing for thee, nothing for themselves; all thine Aramites shall not cary away one corne of sand out of Israel, except it bee upon the soles of their feet, in their shamefull flight; It is well, if they can cary back those skins that they brought thither: Let not him that girdeth on his harnesse boast himselfe as he that putteth it off: There is no cause to feare that man that trusts in himselfe. Man may cast the dice of war, but the disposition of them is of the Lord.

Ahab was lewd, but Benhadad was insolent; If therefore Ahab shall be scourged with the rod of Benhadads feare; Benhadad shall be smitten with the sword of Ahabs revenge; Of all things God will not endure a presumptuous, and selfe-confident Vaunter, after Eijahs flight and complaint, yet a Prophet is addressed to Ahab; Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou seene all this great multitude? behold I will deliver it into thine hand, this day, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. Who can wonder enough at this unweariable mercy of God? After the fire and raine fetcht miraculously from Heaven, Ahab had promised much, performed nothing, yet againe will God blesse and solicit him with victory; One of those Prophets whom he persecuted to death shall comfort his dejection with the newes of deliverance and triumph: Had this great worke beene wrought without premonition; either chance, or Baal, or the golden calves had caryed away the thankes: Before-hand therefore shall Ahab know both the Author and the meanes of his victory; God for the Auther, the two hundred thirty two young men of the Princes for the meanes; What are these for the Vantgard, and seven thousand Israelits for the maine battell, against the troups of three and thirty Kings and as many centuries of Syrians, as Israel had single souldiers? An equality of number had taken away the wonder of the event; but now, the God of hoasts will be confessed in this issue, not the valour of men; How indifferēt it is with thee, O Lord, to save by many, or by few; to destroy many or few? A world is no more to thee then a man; how easie is it for thee to enable us to be more then Conquerors over Principalities & Powers: to subdue spirituall wickednesses to flesh and blood? Through thee wee can doe great things, yea we can doe all things through thee that strengthenest us; Let not us want faith, we are sure there can be no want in thy power or mercy.

There was nothing in Benhadads pavilions but drink, and surfet, and jolity; as if wine should make way for blood; Security is the certain usher of destruction: we never have so much cause to feare as when we feare nothing. This handfull of Israel dares look out (upon the Prophets assurance) to the vast hoast of Benhadad: It is enough for that proud Pagan to sit still, and command amongst his cups: To defile their fingers with the blood of so few, seemed no mastery; that act would be inglorious on the part of the Victors: More easie might they bring in three heads of dead enemies then one alive: Imperiously enough therefore doth this boaster out of his chaire of state and ease, command, Whether they be come out for peace, take them alive; or whether they be come out for warr, take them alive; There needs no more, but, Take them, this field is won with a word. Oh the vaine and ignorant presumptions of wretched men, that will be reckoning without, against their Maker.

Every Israelite kills his man, the Syrians flee, and cannot runne away from death:

Benhadad

A Benhadad and his Kings, are more beholding to their horſes, than to their gods, or themſelves for life and ſafety, elſe they had been either taken or ſlaine, by thoſe, whom they commanded to be taken.

How eaſie is it for him that made the heart, to fill it with terror, and conſternation, even where no feare is? Thoſe whom God hath deſtined to ſlaughter, he will ſmite, neither needs he any other enemy or executioner, then what he findes in their owne boſome: We are not the maſters of our owne courage, or feares; both are put into us by that over-ruling power that created us. Stay now, O ſtay, thou great King of Syria, and take with thee thoſe forgotten handfulls of the duſt of Iſrael: Thy gods will doe ſo to thee, and more alſo, if thy followers returne without their vowed burden: Learne now of the deſpiſed King of Iſrael, from henceforth not to ſound the
B triumph before the battell, not to boaſt thy ſelfe in the girding on of thy harneſſe, as in the putting off.

I heare not of either the publique thankſgiving, or amendment of Ahab. Neither danger nor victory can change him from himſelf: Benhadad & he, though enemies, agree in unrepentance; the one is no more moved with mercy, then the other with judgement: Neither is God any changeling in his proceedings towards both; his judgement ſhall ſtill follow the Syrian, his mercy Iſrael: mercy, both in fore-warning and redelivering Ahab; Judgement in overthrowing Benhadad. The Prophet of God comes againe, & both foretels the intended re-encounter of the Syrian, and adviſes the care, and preparation of Iſrael: Goe ſtrengthen thy ſelfe, and mark, and ſee what thou doeſt, for, at the returne of the yeare, the King of Syria will come up againſt thee: God
C purpoſeth the deliverance of Iſrael, yet may not they neglect their fortifications; The mercifull intentions of God towards them may not make them careleſſe; The induſtry and courage of the Iſraelites fall within the decree of their victory; ſecurity is the bane of good ſucceſſe; It is no contemning of a foyled enemy, the ſhame of a former diſgrace and miſcarriage, whets his valor, & ſharpens it to revenge: No power is ſo dreadfull, as that which is recollected from an overthrow.

The hoſtility againſt the Iſrael of God may ſleep, but will hardly dye. If the Aramites ſit ſtil, it is but til they be fully ready for an aſſault; time will ſhew that their ceſſation was only for their advantage; neither is it otherwiſe with our ſpiritual adverſaries: ſometimes their onſets are intermitted; they tempt not alwaies, they alwayes hate us: their forbearance is not out of favour, but attendance of opportunity; happy are we, if out of a ſuſpition of their ſilence, we can as buſily prepare for their
D reſiſtance, as they doe for our impugnation.

As it is a ſhame to be beaten, ſo yet the ſhame is leſſe, by how much the victor is greater; to mitigate the griefe, & indignation of Benhadads foile, his paraſites aſcribe it to gods, not to men; an humane power could no more have vanquiſh't him, then a divine power could by him be reſiſted; Their gods are gods of the hills; ignorant Syrians, that name Gods, & confine them, varying their deities according to ſituations! They ſaw that Samaria (whence they were repelled) ſtood upon the hill of Shemer; They ſaw the temple of Ieruſalem ſtood upon mount Sion; they knew it uſuall with the Iſraelites to ſacrifice in their high places, and perhaps they had heard of Elijahs altar, uppon mount Carmel; and now they ſottiſhly meaſure the effects of the power
E by the place of the worſhip; as if he that was omnipotent on the hill, were impotent in the Valley; What doltiſh conceits doth blind Paganiſme frame to it ſelfe of a Godhead? As they have many gods, ſo finite; every Region, every hill, every dale, every ſtreame hath their ſeverall gods, and each ſo knows his own bounds, that hee dares not offer to incroach upon the other; or, if he doe, abuyes it with loſſe: Who would think that ſo groſſe blockiſhneſſe ſhould finde harbour in a reaſonable ſoule? A man doth not alter with his ſtation; He that wraſtled ſtrongly upon the hil loſeth not his force in the plaine; all places find him alike active, alike valourous; yet theſe barbarous Aramites ſhame not to imagine that of God, which they would bluſh to affirme of their owne champions. Superſtition infatuates the heart out of meaſure; neither is there any fancy ſo abſurd or monſtrous, which credulous infidelity is not ready to entertaine with applauſe.

In

In how high ſcorne doth God take it to be thus baſely undervalued by rude heathen? This very miſ-opinion concerning the God of Iſrael ſhall coſt the Syrians a ſhamefull and perfect deſtruction; They may call a Counſell of War, and lay their heads together and change their Kings into Captaines, and their hills into valleyes, but they ſhall finde more graves in the plaines, then in the mountaines; This very miſ-priſon of God ſhall make Ahab (though he were more lewd) victorious; An hundred thouſand Syrians ſhall fall in one day, by thoſe few hands of Iſrael; And a dead wall in Aphek (to whoſe ſhelter they fled) ſhall revenge God upon the reſt that remained; The ſtones in the wall ſhall rather turne executioners, then a blaſphemous Aramite ſhall eſcape unrevenged. So much doth the jealous God hate to be robd of his glory, even by ignorant Pagans, whoſe tongues might ſeeme no ſlander. That proud head of Benhadad, that ſpoke ſuch big words of the duſt of Iſrael, & ſwore by his gods, that he would kill and conquer, is now glad to hide it ſelfe in a blinde hole of Aphek; and now in ſtead of queſtioning the power of the God of Iſrael, is glad to heare of the mercy of the Kings of Iſrael; Behold, now, we have heard that the Kings of the houſe of Iſrael are mercifull Kings; Let us, I pray thee, put ſackcloth on our loines, and ropes on our heads; and goe out to the King of Iſrael, peradventure he will ſave thy life.

There can be no more powerfull attractive of humble ſubmiſſion, then the intimation and conceit of mercy; We do at once feare, and hate the inexorable; This is it, O Lord, that allures us to thy throne of grace, the knowledge of the grace of that throne; with thee is mercy and plenteous redemption; thine hand is open before our mouths, before our hearts; If we did not ſee thee ſmile upon ſuiters, we durſt not preſſe to thy footſtoole; Behold now we know that the King of heaven, the God of Iſrael, is a mercifull God; Let us put Sackcloth upon our loines, and ſtrew aſhes upon our heads, & go meet the Lord God of Iſrael, that he may ſave our ſouls.

How well doth this habit become inſolent, and blaſphemous Benhadad and his follower? a rope, and ſack-cloth? A rope for a crowne, ſack-cloth for a robe; Neither is there leſſe change in the tongue, Thy ſervant Benhadad ſaith, I pray thee let me live. Even now the King of Iſrael ſaid to Benhadad, My Lord ô King, I am thine: Tell my Lord the King, all that thou didſt ſend for to thy ſervant, I will doe: Now Benhadad ſends to the King of Iſrael, Thy ſervant Benhadad ſaid, I pray thee let me live: He that was ere while a Lord & King, is now a ſervant; and he that was a ſervant to the King of Syria, is now his Lord: he that would blow away all Iſrael in duſt, is now glad to beg for his own life at the doore of a deſpiſed enemy; no courage is ſo haughty, which the God of Hoſts cannot eaſily bring under; what are men or Devils in thoſe Almighty hands?

The greater the dejection was, the ſtronger was the motive of commiſeration; That halter pleaded for life, and that plea but for a life, ſtirred the bowels for favour: How readily did Ahab ſee in Benhadads ſudden miſery the image of the inſtability of al humane things? and relents at the view of ſo deepe and paſſionate a ſubmiſſiō: Had not Benhadad ſaid, Thy ſervant, Ahab, had never ſaid, My brother; ſeldome ever was there loſſe in humility, how much leſſe can we feare diſparagement, in the annihilating of our ſelves, before that infinite Majeſty? the drowning man ſnatches at every twig; It is no marvell if the meſſengers of Benhadad catcht haſtily at that laſt of grace and hold it faſt, Thy Brother Benhadad; Favours are wont to draw on each other: Kindneſſes breed on themſelves; neither need we any other perſwaſion to beneficence, then from our own acts. Ahab cals for the King of Syria, ſets him in his own Charet; treats with him of an eaſie (yet firme) league, gives him both his life, and his Kingdome. Neither is the Crowne of Syria ſooner loſt, then recovered; Onely he that came a free Prince, returnes tributary: Onely his traine is clipt too ſhort for his wings; an hundred twenty ſeven thouſand Syrians are abated of his Guard, homeward. Blaſphemy hath eſcaped too well, Ahab hath at once peace with Benhadad, warre with God; God proclaims it by his Herald, one of the ſonnes of the Prophets; not yet in his own forme, but diſguiſed, both in faſhion, and complaint; It was a ſtrange ſuit of a Prophet, Smite me I pray thee; Many a Prophet was ſmitten, and would not; never any but this wiſhed to be ſmitten; The reſt of his fellowes lowes were glad to say, Save mee; this onely sayes, Smite mee; His honest neighbour out of love and reverence, forbears to strike; there are too many (thinks he) that smite the Prophets, Though I refraine; What wrong hast thou done that I should repay with blows; hadest thou sued for a favour, I could not have denyed thee, now thou sueſt for thine hurt, the denyall is a favour; Thus he thought; but Charity cannot excuse disobedience; Had the man of God called for blows (upon his own head) the refusall had been just and thank-worthy; But now that he sayes, In the word of the Lord, Smite me, this kindnesse is deadly: Because thou hast not obeyed the voyce of the Lord, behold, assoone as thou art departed from me a Lion shall slay thee; It is not for us to examine the charges of the Almighty; be they never so harsh, or improbable, (if they be once knowne for his) there is no way but obedience, or death. Not to smite a Prophet, when God commands, is no lesse sinne, then to smite a Prophet, when God forbids; It is the divine precept or prohibition, that either makes or aggravates an evill; And if the Israelite be thus revenged, that smote not a Prophet what shall become of Ahab that smote not Benhadad? Every man is not thus indulgent; an easie request will gaine blows to a Prophet from the next hand; yea, and a wound in smiting. I know not whether it were an harder taske for the Prophet to require a wound, then for a well-meaning Israelite to give it; Both must be done; The Prophet hath what he would, what he must will, a sight of his owne blood, and now disguised herewith, and with ashes upon his face, he way-layes the King of Israel, and sadly complaines of himselfe in a reall parable, for dismissing a Syrian prisoner delivered to his hands, upon no lesse charge then his life: and soon receives sentence of death, from his owne mouth: Well was that wound bestowed that struck Ahabs soule through the flesh of the Prophet: The disguise is removed; The King sees not a Souldier but a Seer, and now finds that he hath unawares passed sentence upon himselfe. There needs no other doome then from the lips of the offender: Thus sayth the Lord, because thou hast let goe out of thy hand, a man whom I appointed to utter destruction, therefore thy life shall goe for his life, and thy people for his people: Had not Ahab known the will of God concerning Benhadad, that had been mercy to an enemy, which was now cruelty to himselfe, to Israel: His eares had heard of the blasphemies of that wicked tongue: His eyes had seene God go before him, in the example of that revenge; No Prince can strike so deep into his state, as in not striking: In private favour there may be publique unmercifulnesse.

Ahab and Naboth.

NAboth had a faire Vineyard; It had been better for him to have had none; His vineyard yeelded him the bitter grapes of death. Many a one hath been sold to death by his lands & goods; wealth hath been a snare, as to the soule, so to the life; Why doe we call those goods, which are many times the bane of the owner? Naboths Vineyard lay neere to the Court of Iezebel; it had been better for him, it had been planted in the wilderneſse; Doubtlesse this vicinity made it more commodious to the possessor; but more envious and unsafe: It was now the perpetuall object of an evill eye, and stirred those desires, which could neither be well denyed, nor satisfied: Eminency is still joyned with perill, obscurity with peace; There can be no worse annoyance to an inheritance, then the greatnesse of an evill neighbourhood: Naboths vines stood too neere the smoake of Iezebels chimneys; too much within the prospect of Ahabs window; Now lately had the King of Israel been twice victorious over the Syrians no sooner is he returned home then he is overcome with evill desires; The foyle he gave was not worse then that hee tooke: There is more true glory in the conquest of our lusts, then in all the bloody Trophees; in vaine shall Ahab boast of subduing a forrain enemy, whiles he is subdued by a domesticke enemy within his own breſt; Opportunity and Convenience is guilty of many a theft: Had not this ground lyen 1 King. 21

ſo faire, Ahab had not beene tempted: His eye lets in this evill gueſt into the ſoule, which now dares come forth at the mouth; Give mee thy vineyard, that I may have it for a garden of herbs, becauſe it is neere to my houſe, and I will give thee a better Vineyard for it, or if it ſeeme good to thee, I will give thee the worth of it in money; Yet had Ahab ſo much civility, and juſtice, that he would not wring Naboths patrimony out of his hand by force, but requires it upon a faire compoſition, whether of price, or of exchange: His government was vicious, not tyrannicall; Propriety of goods was inviolably maintained by him; No leſſe was Naboth allowed to claime a right in his Vineyard then Ahab in his palace; This we owe to lawfull Soverainty to call ought our owne, and well worthy is this priviledge to be repaid with all humble & loyall reſpects. The motion of Ahab (had it beene to any other then an Iſralite) had been as juſt, equall, reaſonable, as the repulſe had been rude, churliſh, inhumaine. It is fit that Princes ſhould receive due ſatisfactiō in the juſt demands, not only of their neceſſities, but convenience, and pleaſure; well may they challeng this retribution to the benefit of our common peace, and protection; if there be any ſweetneſſe in our vineyards, any ſtrength in our fields, we may thanke their ſcepters; Juſtly may they expect from us the cōmoditie, the delight of their habitation; and if we gladly yeeld not to their full elbow-roome, both of ſite & proviſion, we can be no other then ingratefull; Yet dares not Naboth give any other anſwer to ſo plauſible a motion, then, The Lord forbid it me, that I ſhould give thee the inheritance of my Fathers: The honeſt Iſraelite ſaw violence in this ingenuity; There are no ſtronger commands, then the requeſts of the great, It is wel that Ahab wil not wreſt away this patrimony, it is not well that he deſired it; The land was not ſo much ſtood upon, as the law; One earth might be as good as another, and mony equivolent to eyther: The Lord had forbidden to alien their inheritance: Naboth did not feare loſſe, but ſinne: What Naboth might not lawfully doe, Ahab might not lawfully require: It pleaſed God to be very punctuall, and cautelous, both in the diſtinctiō, and preſervation of the intireneſſe of theſe Jewiſh inheritances: Nothing but extreame neceſſity might warrant a ſale of land, and that, but for a time; if not ſooner, yet at the Jubile, it muſt revert to the firſt owner: It was not without a comfortable ſignification, that whoſoever had once his part in the land of Promiſe, could never loſe it; Certainly Ahab could not but know this divine reſtrictiō, yet doubts not to ſay, Give me thy vineyard; The uncontionable wil know no other law but their profit, their pleaſure. A lawleſſe greatneſs hates all limitations, and abides not to heare men ſhould need any other warrant but will.

Naboth dares not be thus tractable; How gladly would he be quit of his inheritance, if God would acquit him from the ſin? Not out of wilfulneſſe, but obedience, doth this faithfull Iſraelite hold off frō this demand of his Soveraine; not daring to pleaſe an earthly King with offending the heavenly: When Princes command lawfull things, God commands by them; when unlawfull, they command againſt God; paſſive obedience we muſt give, active we may not; we follow them as ſubordinate, not as oppoſite to the higheſt.

Who cannot but ſee and pity the ſtraites of honeſt Naboth: Ahab requires what God forbids; he muſt fall out either with his God, or his King: Conſcience caries him againſt policy; and he reſolved not to ſin, that he might be gracious. For a world he may not give his Vineyard: Thoſe who are themſelves godleſſe, thinke the holy care of others but idly ſcrupulous: The King of Iſrael could not chuſe but ſee that onely Gods prohibition lay in the way of his deſignes, not the ſtomacke of a froward ſubject; yet he goes away into his houſe heavy and diſpleaſed; and caſts himſelfe downe upon his bed, turnes away his face, and refuſes his meat; Hee hath taken a ſurfet of Naboths grapes which marres his appetite, and threats his life: How ill can great hearts indure to bee croſſed, though upon the moſt reaſonable and juſt grounds; Ahabs place call'd him to the Guardenſhip of Gods Law; and now his heart is ready to breake, that this parcell of that Law may not be broken: No marvell if hee made not dainty to tranſgreſſe a locall ſtatute of God, who did ſo ſhamefully violate the eternall Law of both Tables.

I know not whether the ſpleen, or the gal of Ahab be more affected, Whether more of

A of anger, or griefe, I cannot say; but sick he is & keeps his bed, and balks his meat, as if he should die of no other death, then the salads that he would have had: O the impotent passion and insatiable desires of Covetousnesse! Ahab is Lord and King of all the territories of Israel; Naboth is the owner of one poore Vineyard; Ahab cannot injoy Israel, if Naboth injoy his Vineyard; Besides Samaria, Ahab was the great Lord Paramount of Damascus and all Syria, the victor of him that was attended with two and thirty Kings; Naboth was a plaine townsman of Jezreel, the good husband of a little Vineyard; Whether is the wealthier? I doe not heare Naboth wish for any thing of Ahabs, I heare Ahab wishing (not without indignation of a repulse) for somewhat from Naboth: Riches and poverty, is no more in the heart then in the hand; He is wealthy that is contented, he is poore that wanteth more: Oh rich Naboth, that carest not for all the large possessions of Ahab; so thou maiest be the Lord of thine owne Vineyard; Oh miserable Ahab, that carest not for thine own possessions whiles thou mayest not be the Lord of Naboths Vineyard.

He that caused the disease sends him a Physitian; Satan knew of old how to make use of such helpers: Iezebel comes to Ahabs bed side, and casts cold water in his face, and puts into him spirits of her owne extracting: Dost thou now governe the Kingdome of Israel? Arise, eat bread, and let thine heart be merry, I will give thee the Vineyard of Naboth. Ahab wanted neither wit, nor wickednesse; Yet is he in both, a very novice to this Zidonian dame. There needs no other Devill, than Iezebel, whether to project evill, or to worke it: She chides the pusillanimity of her dejected husband, and perswades him his rule cannot be free, unlesse it be licentious; that there should be no
C bounds for soveraignty, but will: Already hath she contrived to have by fraud and force, what was denied to intreaty; Nothing needs but the name, but the seale of Ahab. let her alone with the rest: How present are the wits of the weaker sex for the devising of wickednesse? She frames a letter in Ahabs name, to the Senatours of Jezreel wherein she requires them to proclaime a fast, to suborne two false witnesses against Naboth, to charge him with blasphemy against God and the King, to stone him to death; A ready payment for a rich Vineyard: Whose indignation riseth not, to heare Iezebel name a fast? The great contemners of the most important Lawes of God, yet can be content to make use of some divine, both statutes, & customes, for their own advantage: She knew the Israelites had so much remainder of grace, as to hold blasphemy worthy of death; She knew their manner was to expiate those crying sins
D with publike humiliatiō; She knew that two witnesses at least must cast the offender; all these she urges to her own purpose. There is no mischiefe so deviliſh, as that wch is cloked with piety: Simulatiō of holinesse doubleth a villany; This murder had not been halfe so foule, if it had not bin thus masked with a religious observatiō; Besides devotion, what a faire pretence of legality is here? Blasphemy against God and his Anointed may not passe unrevenged; The offender is cōvented before the sad & severe bench of Magistracy; the justice of Israel allowes not to condemn an absent, an unheard malefactor; Witnesses come forth, and agree in the intentatiō of the crime; the Judges rend their garments, and strike their brests as grieved, not more for the sin, than the punishment; their very countenance must say, Naboth should not die, if his offence did not force our justice, and now, he is no good subject, no true Israelite, that hath not a stone for Naboth.

E Iezebel knew well to whom she wrote; Had not those letters falne upon the times of a wofull degeneration of Israel, they had received no lesse strong denials from the Elders, than Ahab had from Naboth; God forbid that the Senate of Iezreel should forge a perjury, belie trueth, condemne innocency, brooke corruption: Command just things, we are ready to die in the zeale of our obedience, we dare not imbrue our hands in the blood of an innocent.

But she knew whom she had engaged; whom she had marred by making cōscious. It were strange if they who can countenance evil with greatnes, should want factors for the unjustest designes. Miserable is that people whose Rulers (instead of punishing) plot, and incourage wickednesse; when a distillation of evil falls from the head upon the lungs of any State, there must needs follow a deadly consumption.

Yet, perhaps there wanted not ſome color of pretence for this proceeding; they could not but heare, that ſome words had paſſed betwixt the King and Naboth; Haply it was ſuggeſted, that Naboth had ſecretly over-laſhed into ſaucy and contemptuous terms to his Soveraigne, ſuch as neither might be well borne, nor yet (by reaſon of their privacy) legally convinced; the bench of Iezreel ſhould but ſupply a forme to the juſt matter, and deſert of condemnation; What was it for thē to give their hand to this obſcure midwifery of Juſtice? it is enough that their King is an accuſer and witneſſe of that wrong, which only their ſentence can formally revenge. All this cannot waſh their hands from the guilt of blood; if juſtice be blind, in reſpect of partiality, ſhe may not be blind in reſpect of the grounds of execution; Had Naboth beene a blaſphemer, or a traitor, yet theſe men were no better then murtherers; What difference is there betwixt the ſtroke of Magiſtracie, and of man-ſlaughter, but due conviction? B

Wickedneſſe never ſpake out of a throne, and complained of the defect of inſtruments; Naboth was (it ſeems) ſtrictly conſcionable, his fellow Citizens looſe, & lawleſſe; they are glad to have gottē ſuch an opportunity of his diſpatch: no clauſe of Ahabs letter is not obſerved; A faſt is warned, the city is aſſembled, Naboth is cōvented, accuſed, confronted, ſentenced, ſtoned. His Vineyard is eſcheated to the Crowne, Ahab takes ſpeedy and quiet poſſeſſion. How ſtill doth God ſit in heaven, and look upon the complots of treachery & villanies, as if they did not concern him: The ſucceſſe ſo anſwers their deſires, as if both heaven and earth were their friends. It is the plague, which ſeemes the felicity of ſinners, to ſpeed well in their lewd enterpriſes; No reckoning is brought in the midſt of the meale, the end payes for all: Whiles Ahab is rejoycing in his new garden-plot, and promiſing himſelfe contentment in this commodious enlargement, in comes Elijah, ſent from God with an errand of vengeance. Methinks, I ſee how the Kings countenance changed; with what agaſt eyes, and pale cheeks, he lookt upon that unwlecome Prophet: Little pleaſure tooke he in his proſpect, whiles it was clogged with ſuch a gueſt: yet his tongue begins firſt, Haſt thou found me, O mine enemy? Great is the power of conſcience; upon the laſt meeting (for ought we know) Ahab and Elijah parted friends; The Prophet had lacquayed his coach, and took a peaceable leave at this townes end; now Ahabs heart told him (neither needed any other meſſenger) that God, and his Prophet were falne out with him; His cōtinuing Idolatry, now ſecōded with blood, bids him look for nothing but frownes from heaven; A guilty heart can never be at peace: Had not Ahab knowne how ill he had deſerved of God, he had never ſaluted his Prophet by the name of an enemy; Hee had never beene troubled to be found by Elijah, if his owne breſt had not found him out for an enemy to God: Much good may thy vineyard do thee, O thou King of Iſrael, many faire flowers, and ſavoury herbes may thy new garden yeeld thee; pleaſe thy ſelfe with thy Iezebel, in the triumph over the carcaſſe of a ſcrupulous ſubject; let me rather die with Naboth, then rejoyce with thee: His turn is over, thine is to come: The ſtones that overwhelmed innocent Naboth, were nothing to thoſe that ſmite thee; Haſt thou killed, & alſo taken poſſeſſion? thus ſaith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, ſhall dogs lick thy blood, even thine. What meaneſt thou, O Elijah, to charge this murder upon Ahab? He kept his Chamber, Iezebel wrote the Elders condemned, the people ſtoned; yet thou ſayeſt, Haſt thou killed? Well did Ahab know that Iezebel could not give this vineyard with drie hands; yet was he content to wink at vvhat ſhe ſhould do: He but ſits ſtill whiles Iezebel works: Only his Signet is ſuffred to walke for the ſealing of this unknowne purchaſe: Thoſe that are truſted with authority, may offend no leſſe in connivency, or neglect, thē others in act, in participation: Not only command, conſent, countenance, but very permiſſion feoffes publike perſons in thoſe ſins, which they might, and will not prevent. God loves to puniſh by retaliation: Naboth and Ahab ſhal both bleed; Naboth by the ſtones of the Jezreelites; Ahab by the ſhafts of the Aramites; The dogs ſhall taſt of the blood of both: What Ahab hath done in cruelty, he ſhall ſuffer in juſtice: The caſe and the end make the difference happy on Naboths ſide, on Ahabs wofull; Naboth bleeds as a Martyr; Ahab as a murtherer: What ever is

Ahabs

A Ahabs conditiō, Naboth changes a vineyard on earth, for a Kingdome in heaven. Never any wicked man gained by the persecution of an innocent: Never any innocent man was a loser by suffering from the wicked.

Neither was this judgement personall but hereditary: I will take away thy posterity; and will make thine house like the house of Ieroboam: Him that dyeth of Ahab in the City, the dogs shall eat; and him that dieth in the field, shall the fowls of the ayre eat: Ahab shall not need to take thought for the traducing of this ill gotten inheritance; God hath taken order for his heyres; whom his sin hath made no lesse the heyres of his curse, then of his body: Their fathers cruelty to Naboth hath made thē together with their mother Iezebel, dogs-meat. The revenge of God doth at last make amends for the delay; Whether now is Naboths vineyard payed for?

The man that had sold himselfe to worke wickednesse, yet rues the bargaine. I do not heare Ahab (as bad as he was) revile or threaten the Prophet, but he rends his cloathes, and weares & lies in sack cloth, & fasts, & walks softly: Who that had seen Ahab would not have deemed him a true penitent? All this was the visor of sorrow, not the face; or if the face, but the heart; or if the sorrow of the heart, yet not the repentance: A sorrow for the judgement, not repentance for the sin: The very devils howle to be tormented; Griefe is not ever a signe of grace; Ahab rends his cloathes, he did not rend his heart; he puts on sack-cloth, not amendment; he lies in sack-cloth, but he lies in his Idolatry; he walks softly, he walks not sincerely; worldly sorrow causeth death; Happy is that griefe for which the soule is the holier.

Yet what is this I see? This very shadow of repentance caries away mercy; It is no small mercy to defer an evill; Even Ahabs humiliation shal prorogue the judgment, such as the penitence was, such shal be the reward; a temporary reward of a temporary penitence; As Ahab might be thus sorrowfull, and never the better; so hee may be thus favoured, and never the happier; Oh God, how graciously art thou ready to reward a found and holy repentance, who art thus indulgent to a carnall and servile dejection?

Ahab and Michaiah: or, The death of Ahab.

WHō would have look't to have heard any more of the wars of the Syrians with Israel, after so great a slaughter, after so firme a league, a league not of peace only but of Brotherhood? The haltars, the sack-cloth of Benhadads followers were worne out, as of use, so of memory, and now they are changed for Iron and steele. It is but three yeares that this peace lasts; and now that warre begins which shal make an end of Ahab; The King of Israel rues his unjust mercy; according to the word of the Prophet, that gift of a life, was but an exchange; Because Ahab gave Benhadad his life, Benhadad shall take Ahabs; Hee must forfeit in himself what he hath givē to another. There can be no better fruit of too much kindnesse to Infidels; It was one Article of the league betwixt Ahab & his brother Benhadad, that there should be a speedy restitutiō of al the Israelitish Cities; The rest are yeelded, only Ramoth Gilead is held back, unthankfully, injuriously; He that begged but his life receives his Kingdome, and now rests not content with his own bounds; Justly doth Ahab challenge his owne, justly doth he move a war to recover his owne from a perfidious tributary; the lawfulnesse of actions may not be judged by the events, but by the grounds; the wise and holy arbiter of the world knowes why many times the better cause hath the worse successe; Many a just businesse is crossed, for a punishment to the agent. 1 Kin. 22

Yet Israel and Judah were now peeced in friendship; Iehoshaphat the good King of Judah had made affinity with Ahab the Idolatrous King of Israel: and besides a personal visitation, joynes his forces with his new Kinsman, against an old confederate:

Judah had called in Syria against Israel; and now Israel cals in Judah against Syria: Thus rather should it be: It is fit that the more pure Church should joyne with the more corrupt, against a common Paganish enemy. A

Iehoshaphat hath match't with Ahab; not with a divorce of his devotion. Hee will fight, not without God, Inquire I pray thee at the word of the Lord, to day: Had he done thus sooner, I feare Athaliah had never called him father: This motion was news in Israel; It was wont to be said, Inquire of Baal: The good King of Judah will bring Religion into fashion in the Court of Israel; Ahab had inquired of his Counsellors, What needed he be so devout as to inquire of his Prophets? Onely Iehoshaphats presence made him thus godly: It is an happy thing to converse with the vertuous: their counsell and example cannot but leave some tincture behinde them of a good profession, if not of piety: Those that are truly religious dare not but take God with them in all their affaires; with him they can be as valiant, as timorous without him. B

Ahab had Clergy enough, such as it was: Foure hundred prophets of the groves were reserved frō appearing to Elijahs challenge; these are now consulted by Ahab: they live to betray the life of him who saved theirs. These care not so much to inquire what God would say, as what Ahab would have them say; they saw which way the Kings heart vvas bent, that vvay they bent their tongues: Goe up, for the Lord shall deliver it into the hands of the King: False Prophets care onely to please; a plausible falshood passes vvith them above an harsh truth. Had they seen Ahab fearefull, they had said, Peace, Peace; now they see him resolute, war and victory: It is a fearefull presage of ruine when the Prophets conspire in assentation.

Their number, consent confidence hath easily won credit with Ahab: We do all willingly beleeve what we wish; Iehoshaphat is not so soone satisfied: These prophets were (it is like) obtruded to him (a stranger) for the true Prophets of the true God: The judicious King sees cause to suspect thē, and now perceiving at what altars they served, hates to rest in their testimony: Is there not here a Prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him? One single Prophet speaking from the oracles of God, is more worth than foure hundred Baalites; Truth may not ever be measured by the poll; It is not number but weight that must cary it in a Councel of Prophets; A solid Verity in one mouth is worthy to preponderate light falshood in a thousand. C

Even King Ahab (as bad as he was) kept tale of his prophets; and could give account of one that was missing: There is yet one man (Michaiah the son of Imlah) by whom we may inquire of the Lord; but I hate him, for he doth not prophecy good concerning me, but evill. It is very probable that Michaiah was that disguised Prophet, who brought to Ahab the fearefull message of displeasure, and death, for dismissing Benhadad, for which he was ever since fast in prison, deepe in disgrace; Oh corrupt heart of selfe-condemned Ahab! if Michaiah spake true to thee, how was it evill? if others said false, how was it good? & if Michaiah spake frō the Lord, why dost thou hate him? This hath wont to be the ancient lot of Truth, censure and hatred; Censure of the message, hatred of the bearer. To carnall eares the message is evill, if unpleasing; and if plausible, good; If it be sweet, it cannot be poison; if bitter, it cannot be wholesome: The distemper of the receiver is guilty of this mis-conceit; In it selfe every truth as it is good, so amiable; every falshood loathsome, as evill; A sicke palate cryes out of the tast of those liquors, which are wel allowed of the healthful. It is a signe of a good state of the soule, when every vendure can receive his proper judgement. D E

Wise and good Iehoshaphat dissvvades Ahab from so hard an opinion, and sees cause so much more to urge the consultation of Michaiah, by how much he findes him more unpleasing; The King of Israel to satisfie the importunity of so great, and deare an Allie, sends an Officer for Michaiah; He knew well (belike) where to finde him, within those foure walls, where unjust cruelty had disposed of that innocent Seer; Out of the obscurity of the prison, is the poore Prophet fetcht in the light of so glorious a Confessiō of two Kings, who thought this Convocation of Prophets not unworthy of their greatest representation of State and Majesty; There he finds Zedekiah, the leader of that false crue, not speaking only, but acting his prediction; Signes were no lesse used by the Prophets, then words: this arch-flatterer hath made him

hornes

A hornes of iron, the horne is forcible, the iron irresistible, by an irresistible force shall Ahab push the Syrians; as if there were more certainty in this mans hands thē in his tongue: If this son of Chenaanah had not had a forehead of brasse for impudēcy & a heart of Lead for flexibleneſſe to humors, & times, he had never deviſed theſe horns of iron, wherewith his King was goared untoblood: How ſoever, it is enough for him that he is beleeved, that he is ſeconded: Al the great inqueſt of theſe Prophets gave up their verdict by this foreman, not one of foure hundred diſſented: Unanimity of opinion in the greateſt Eccleſiaſticall aſſemblies is not ever an argument of truth: There may be as common, and as firme agreement in error.

The meſſenger that came for Michaiah, like a carnall friend, ſets him in a way of favor: tels him what the reſt ſaid, how they pleaſed: how unſafe it would be for him B to vary, how beneficiall to aſſent: Thoſe that adore earthly greatneſſe, thinke every man ſhould dote upon their Idols, and hold no tearms too high for their ambitious purchaſes. Faithfull Michaiah ſcornes the motion, he knows the price of the word, and contemnes it; As the Lord liveth, what the Lord ſaith unto me, that will I ſpeak. Neither feares, nor favours, can tempt the holily reſolute: They can trample upon dangers, or honors, with a careleſſe foot; and whether they be ſmiled or frowned on by the great, dare not either alter, or conceale their errand.

The queſtion is moved to Michaiah, He at firſt ſo yeelds, that he cōtradicts, yeelds in words, contradicts in pronunciation; The ſyllables are for them, the ſound againſt them: Ironies deny ſtrongeſt in affirming; and now being preſſed home, he tels them C that God had ſhewed him thoſe ſheep of Iſrael ſhould ere long, by this means, want their Shepheard; The very reſemblance, to a good Prince, had beene affective; The ſheep is an helpleſſe creature, not able either to guard or guide it ſelf; al the ſafety, all the direction of it, is from the keeper; without whom, every curre chaſes and wearies it, every track ſeduceth it; Such ſhall Iſrael ſoone be, if Ahab be ruled by his prophets; The King of Iſrael doth not beleeve, but quarrell; not at himſelfe, who had deſerved evill, but at the Prophet, who foreſignified it, and is more carefull that the King of Juda ſhould marke how true he had foretold concerning the Prophet, then how the Prophet had foretold concerning him.

Bold Michaiah (as no whit diſcouraged with the unjuſt checks of greatnes) doubles his prediction, and by a ſecond viſion particularizeth the meanes of this dangerous errour. Whiles the two kings ſate majeſtically in their Thrones, he tels them of a more glorious Throne, then theirs, whereō he ſaw the King of Gods ſitting: Whiles they were cōpaſſed with ſome hundreds of prophets and thouſands of Subjects, and D Souldiers, he tels them of al the hoſt of heavē, attending that other Throne. Whiles they were deliberating of a war, he tels them of a God of heaven juſtly decreeing the judgement of a deadly deception to Ahab: The decree of the Higheſt is not more plainely revealed, thē expreſſed parabolically. The wiſe & holy God is repreſented, after the manner of men, conſulting of that ruine, which he intended to the wicked King of Iſrael; That increated and infinite wiſdome, needs not the advice of any finite, and created powers, to direct him, needs not the aſſent and aid of any ſpirit for his execution; much leſſe of an evil one: yet here an evil ſpirit is brought in (by way of viſion mixt with parable) profering the ſervice of his lie, accepted, imployed, ſucceſſefull: Theſe figures are not voyd of truth: The action and event is reduced to E a decree; the decree is ſhadowed out by the reſemblance of humane proceedings: All evil motions, and counſels are originally from that malignant Spirit: That evil ſpirit could have no power over men, but by the permiſſiō, by the decree of the Almighty: That Almighty, as he is no Author of ſin, ſo he ordinates all evill to good: It is good that is juſt, it is good that one ſin ſhould be puniſhed by another: Satan is herein no other then the executioner of that God, who is as farre from infuſing evill as from not revenging it. Now Ahab ſees the ground of that applauſed conſent of his rabble of prophets; one evill ſpirit hath no leſſe deceived them, then they their maſter, he is one, therefore he agrees with himſelfe; he is evill, therefore both he and they agree in deceit.

Oh the noble and undaunted ſpirit of Michaiah: neither the thrones of the Kings, nor not the number of the Prophets could abate one word of his true (though displeasing) message; The King of Israel shal heare, that he is mis-led by lyers, they by a devill: Surely Iehoshaphat cannot but wonder at so unequall a contentiō: to see one silly Prophet affronting foure hundred; with whom lest cōfidence should carry it, behold Zedekiah more bold, more zealous: If Michaiah have given him (with his fellowes) the lye, he gives Michaiah the fist: before these two great Guardians of peace, and justice, swaggering Zedekiah smites Michaiah on the face; & with the blow expostulates; Which way went the spirit of the Lord from me, to speake unto thee? For a Prophet to smite a Prophet, in the face of two Kings, was intolerably insolent; the act was much unbeseeming the person, more the presence; Prophets may reprove, they may not strike; It was enough for Ahab to punish with the hand; no weapon was for Zedekiah, but his tongue; neither could this rude presumption have been well taken, if malice had not made magistracy insensibly of this usurpation; Ahab was well content to see that hated mouth beaten by any hand. It is no new condition of Gods faithful messengers to smart for saying truth. Falshood doth not more bewray it self in any thing then in blowes; Truth suffers, whiles errour persecutes; None are more ready to boast of the Spirit of God, then those that have the least; As in vessels, the full are silent. A

Innocent Michaiah, neither defends, nor complaines; It would have well beseemed the religious King of Judah, to have spoken in the cause of the dumbe, to have checked insolent Zedekiah; He is content to give way to this tide of peremptory, and generall opposition: The helples Prophet stands alone, yet layes about him with his tongue, Behold, thou shalt see in that day, when thou shalt go into an inner chamber, and hide thy self. Now the proud Baalite shewed himselfe too much; ere long he shall be glad to lurke unseene; his hornes of iron cannot beare off his danger. The sonne of Ahab cannot chuse but, in the zeale of revenging his fathers deadly seducement, call for that false head of Zedekiah: In vaine shall that Impostor seeke to hide himselfe from justice: But, in the meane while, he goes away with honour, Michaiah with censure. Take Michaiah, and cary him backe to Amon, the Governour of the City, and to Ioash the Kings sonne; and say, Thus saith the King, Put this fellow in prison, and feed him with bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, until I come in peace. B C

An hard doome of Truth; The Jayle for his lodging; coorse bread and water for his food, shall but reserve Michaiah for a further revenge. The returne of Ahab shall be the bane of the Prophet: Was not this he that advised Benhadad, not to boast in the putting on his Armour, as in the ungirding it; and doth he now promise himselfe peace and victory, before he buckle it on? No warning will dissuade the wilfull; So assured doth Ahab make himselfe of successe, that he threats ere he goe, what he will doe when he returnes in peace: How justly doth God deride the misreckonings of proud and fooliish men; If Ahab had no other sinnes, his very confidence shall defeat him; yet the Prophet cannot be overcome in his resolution; hee knows his grounds cannot deceive him, and dare therefore cast the credit of his function upon this issue: If thou returne at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee: And hee said, Hearken, O people, every one of you; Let him never bee called a Prophet, that dare not trust his God: This was no adventure therefore of reputation, or life; since hee knew whom he beleeved, the event was no lesse sure, then if it had beene past: Hee is no God that is not constant to himselfe: Hath hee spoken, and shall he not performe? What hold have we for our soules, but his eternall word? The being of God is not more sure, then his promises, then his sentences of judgement. Well may we appeale the testimonie of the world in both: if there bee not plagues for the wicked; if there be not rewards for the righteous; God hath not spoken by us. D E

Not Ahab onely, but good Jehoshaphat is caried with the multitude; Their forces are joyned against Ramoth: The King of Israel doth not so trust his Prophets, that he dares trust himselfe in his owne cloathes: Thus shall hee elude Michaiahs threat, I wis, the judgement of God, the Syrian shafts cannot finde him out in this unsuspected

A ſuſpected diſguiſe: How fondly do vaine men imagine to ſhift off the juſt revenges of the Almighty?

The King of Syria gives charge to his Captaines to fight againſt none, but the King of Iſrael; Thus doth the unthankfull Infidel repay the mercy of his late victor; Ill was the Snake ſaved, that requites the favour of his life, with a ſting; Thus ſtill the greateſt are the faireſt marke to envious eyes. By how much more eminent any man is in the Iſrael of God, ſo many more, and more dangerous enemies muſt he expect; Both earth and hell conſpire in their oppoſition to the worthieſt. Thoſe who are advanced above others, have ſo much more need of the guard, both of their own vigilancy, and others prayers. Iehoſhapat had like to have payd dear for his love;
B He is purſued, for him, in vvhoſe amitie he offended; His cryes deliver him; his cries, not to his purſuers, but to his God; whoſe mercy takes not advantage of our infirmity, but reſcues us from thoſe evils, vvhich vve vvilfully provoke: It is Ahab againſt whom, not the Syrians only, but God himſelfe intends this quarrell; The enemy is taken off from Iehoſhaphat; Oh the juſt and mighty hand of that divine providence, vvhich directeth all our actions to his owne ends; vvhich takes order vvhere every ſhaft ſhall light; and guides the arrow of the ſtrong Archer, into the joynts of Ahabs harneſſe; It was ſhot at a venture, fals by a deſtiny; and there fals vvhere it may carie death to an hidden debtor; In all actions both voluntary and caſual, thy wil O God, ſhall be done by us, with what ever intentions. Little did the Syrian know whom he had ſtriken, no more then the arrow wherewith he ſtroke; An inviſible hand diſpoſed of both, to the puniſhment of Ahab, to the vindication of Michaiah; How worthily, O God, art thou to be adored in thy juſtice, and wiſdome, to be feared in thy
C judgments! Too late doth Ahab now think of the faire warnings of Michaiah, which he unwiſely cõtemned; of the painfull flatteries of Zedekiah, which he ſtubbornly beleeved; That guilty blood of his runs downe out of his vvound, into the midſt of his charet, and payes Naboth his arrerages: O Ahab, vvhat art thou the better for thine Ivory houſe, vvhiles thou haſt a blacke ſoule? What comfort haſt thou now, in thoſe flattering prophets, vvhich tickled thine eares, and ſecured thee of victories? What joy is it to thee now, that thou waſt great? Who had not rather be Michaiah in the Jayle, then Ahab in the Charet? Wicked men have the advantage of the way, godly men of the end: The Charet is waſhed in the poole of Samaria, the dogges come to claime their due: they licke up the blood of the King of Iſrael: The tongues of D thoſe brute creatures ſhall make good the tongue of Gods Prophet: Michaiah is juſtified, Naboth is revenged, the Baalites confounded, Ahab judged: Righteous art thou O God in all thy wayes, and holy in all thy works.

Ahaziah ſicke, and Elijah revenged.

AHaziah ſucceeded his father Ahab, both in his Throne, and in his ſinne: Who could looke for better iſſue of thoſe loines, of thoſe examples? God followes him with a double judgement; of the revolt of Moab, and of his owne ſickneſſe: All the reigne of Ahab, had Moab beene a quiet Tributarie; and furniſhed Iſrael with rich flocks, and fleeces; now their
E ſubjection dies with that warlike King, and wil not be inherited: This rebellion took advantage, as from the weaker ſpirits, ſo from the ſickly body of Ahaziah, whoſe diſeaſe was not natural, but caſual: walking in his Palace of Samaria, ſome grate in the floore of his Chamber, breaks under him, and gives way to a fall, whereby he is bruiſed, and languiſheth. The ſame hand that guided Ahabs ſhaft, cracks Ahaziahs latteſſe: How infinite variety of plagues hath the juſt God for obſtinate ſinners? whether in the field or in the chamber, he knows to find them out: How feareleſſly did Ahaziah walke on his wonted pavement? The Lord hath laid a trappe for him, whereinto, whiles he thinks leaſt, he fals irrecoverably: No place is ſafe for the man that is at variance with God.

2 Kin. 1.

The body of Ahaziah was not more ſicke, then his ſoule was graceleſſe: None

but

but chance was his enemy, none but the God of Ekron must be his friend: He lookes not up to the Omnipotent hand of divine justice for the disease, or of mercy for the remedy: An Idol is his refuge, whether for cure or intelligence: We heare not till now of Baal-zebub: this new God of flies is (perhaps) of his making, who now is a suter to his own erection: Al these heathen Deities were but a devill, with change of appellations; the influence of that evill spirit deluded those miserable clients; else, there was no fly so impotent as that outside of the god of Ekron: Who would think that any Israelite could so farre dote upon a stock, a Fiend? Time gathered much credit to this Idol; in so much as the Jewes afterwards stiled Beel-zebub, the Prince of all the regions of darknesse: Ahaziah is the first that brings his Oracle in request, and payes him the tribute of his devotion: He sends messengers, and sayes, Goe inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, whether I shall recover of this disease: The message was either idle, or wicked: idle, if he sent it to a stock; if to a devill, both idle and wicked. What can the most intelligent spirits know of future things, but what they see either in their causes, or in the light of participation. What a madnesse was it in Ahaziah to seeke to the posterne, whiles the fore-gate stood open? Could those evill spirits truly foretell events no way pre-existent, yet they might not, without sinne, be consulted: the evill of their nature debarres all the benefits of their information: If not as intelligencers, much lesse may they be sought to, as gods: who cannot blush to heare and see, that even the very Evangelicall Israel should yeeld Pilgrims to the shrines of darknesse? How many, after this cleer light of the Gospell, in their losses, in their sicknesses, send to these infernal Oracles, and damn themselves wilfully, in a vaine curiosity: The message of the jealous God intercepts them, with a just disdaine, as here by Elijah, Is it not because there is not a God in Israel, that yee goe to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? What can be a greater disparagement to the True God, then to be neglected, thē to stand aside, and see us make love to an hellish rival? were there no God in Israel, in heaven, what could we doe other; what worse? This affront of what ever Ahaziah cannot escape without a revenge: Therefore thus saith the Lord; Thou shalt not come downe from that bed, on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. It is an high indignitie to the True God, not to be sought to in our necessities; but so to be cashiered from our devotions, as to have a false god thrust in his roome, is such a scorne, as it is well if it can escape with one death: Let now the famous god of Ekron take off that brand of feared mortality, which the living God hath set upon Ahaziah: Let Baal-zebub make good some better news to his distressed suppliant: Rather the King of Israel is himselfe (without his repentance) hasting to Betel-zebub. This errand is soone done; The messengers are returned, ere they goe: Not a little were they amazed to heare their secret message from anothers mouth; neither could chuse but thinke, Hee that can tell what Ahaziah said, what he thought, can foretell how he shall speed: Wee have met with a greater God then we went to seeke; what need we inquire for another answer? With this conceit, with this report, they returne to their sicke Lord, and astonish him with so short, so sad a relation: No marvell if the King inquired curiously of the habit, and fashion of the man, that could know this, that durst say this: They describe him a man (whether of an hairy skin, or of rough, course, careless attire; thus drest, thus girded: Ahaziah readily apprehends it to be Elijah, the old friend of his father Ahab, of his mother Iezebel: More then once had he seen him (an unwelcome guest) in the Court of Israel: The times had beene such, that the Prophet could not at once speake true, and please: Nothing but reproofes and menaces sounded from the mouth of Elijah, Michaiah and he were still as welcome to the eyes of that guilty Prince, as the Syrian arrow was into his flesh: Too well therefore had Ahaziah noted that querulous Seer, and now is not a little troubled to see himself (in succession) haunted with that bold and ill-boding spirit.

Behold the true sonne of Iezebel, the anguish of his disease, the expectation of death cannot take off the edge of his persecution of Elijah: It is against his will that his death-bed is not bloody: Had Ahaziah meant any other then a cruell violence to Elijah, he had sent a peaceable messenger, to call him to the Court, he had not sent a Captaine,

A Captaine, with a band of Souldiers to fetch him: the inſtruments which he uſeth, cary revenge in their face: If he had not thought Elijah more thē a man, what needed a band of fifty to apprehend one? and if he did thinke him ſuch, why would he ſend to apprehend him by fifty? Surely Ahaziah knew of old how miraculous a Prophet Elijah was: what power that man had over all their baſe Deities: what command of the Elements, of the heavens: and yet hee ſends to attach him. It is a ſtrange thing to ſee how wilfully, godleſs men ſtrive againſt the ſtreame of their own hearts: hating that which they know good, fighting againſt that which they know divine. What a groſſe diſagreement is in the meſſage of this Iſraelitiſh Captaine? Thou man of God, the King hath ſaid, Come downe; If hee were a man of God, how hath hee offended? and if he have juſtly offended the Anointed of God, how is he a man of God? And if he be a man of God, and have not offended, why ſhould he come down
B to puniſhment? Here is a kind confeſſion, with a falſe heart, with bloody hands: The world is full of thoſe windy courteſies, reall cruelties: Deadly mallice lurkes under faire complements, and whiles it flatters, killeth. The Prophet hides not himſelfe from the purſuit of Ahaziah; rather he ſits where hee may bee moſt conſpicuous, on the top of an Hill: this band knowes well where to find him; and climbs up, in the ſight of Elijah, for his erreſt: The ſteepneſſe of the aſſent (when they drew neere to the higheſt reach) yeelded a cōvenience, both of reſpiratiō and parle: thence doth the Captaine imperiouſly call down the Prophet. Who would not tremble at the dreadfull anſwer of Elijah, If I be a man of God, then let fire came downe from Heaven and conſume thee, and thy fifty: What ſhall we ſay? That a Prophet is revengefull, that Souldiers ſuffer whiles a Prophet ſtrikes; that a Princes command is anſwered with imprecation, words with fire; that an unarmed Seer ſhould kill one and fifty
C at a blow? There are few trackes of Elijah that are ordinarie, and fit for common feet: His actions are more for wonder, then for precedent: Not in his own defence would the Prophet have been the death of ſo many, if God had not by a peculiar inſtinct made him an inſtrument of this juſt vengence. The divine juſtice finds it meet to doe this for the terrour of Iſrael, that he might teach them, what it was to contemne, to perſecute a Prophet; that they might learne to feare him whom they had forſaken, and confeſſe that heaven was ſenſible of their inſolencies, and impieties: If not as viſibly, yet as certainly doth God puniſh the violations of his ordinances, the affronts offered to his meſſengers, ſtill and ever: Not ever with the ſame ſpeed: ſome-
D time, the puniſhment overtakes the act: ſometimes dogs it a farre off, and ſeizeth upon the offender, whē his crime is forgotten: Here, no ſooner is the word out of Elijahs mouth then the fire is out of Heaven. Oh the wonderfull power of a Prophet! There ſits Elijah in his coorſe Mantle, on the top of the Hill, and cōmands the heavens, and they obey him; Let fire fall downe from heaven; He needs no more but ſay what hee would have done: The fire fals down, as before upon the ſacrifice in Carmel, ſo now upon the Souldiers of Ahaziah: What is man in the hands of his Maker? One flaſh of lightning hath conſumed this one and fifty. And if all the hoſts of Iſrael, yea of the world, had beene in their roomes, there had needed no other force. What madneſſe is it for him whoſe breath is in his noſthrils to contend with the Almighty? The time was, when two zealous Diſciples would faine have imitated this
E fiery revenge of Elijah, and where repelled with a checke; The very place puts them in minde of the judgement; Not farre from Samaria was this done by Elijah, and wiſht to be done by his Diſciples; So churliſh a rejection of a Saviour ſeemed no leſſe hainous, then the endeavour of apprehending a Prophet; Lord, wilt thou that wee command fire to come downe from heaven, and conſume them, as Elias did. The world yeelded but one Elias: that which was zeale in him, might be fury in another; the leaſt variatiō of circumſtance may make an example dangerous; preſently therefore doe they heare, Ye know not of what ſpirit ye are: It is the calling that varies the ſpirit; Elijah was Gods Miniſter for the execution of ſo ſevere a judgement; they were but the Servants of their own impotent anger; there was fire in their breſts, which God never kindled; farre was it from the Saviour of men, to ſecond their earthly fire, with his heavenly; Hee came indeed to ſend fire upon earth; but to warme, warme, not to burne; and if to burne, not the persons of men, but their corruptions: How much more safe is it for us to follow the meek Prophet of the New Testament then that fervent Prophet of the Old: Let the matter of our prayers be the sweet dewes of mercy, not the fires of vengeance. A

Would not any man have thought Ahaziah sufficiently warned by so terrible a judgment: Could he chuse but say, It is no medling with a man that can speak lightening and death: what he hath said concerning mee, is too well approved by what he hath done to my messengers; Gods hand is with him; mine shall not be against him: yet, now, behold, the rage of Ahaziah is so much the more kindled by this fire from heaven; and a more resolute Captain, with a second band, is sent to fetch Elijah to death; This man is in hast; and commands not onely his descent, but his speed; Come downe quickly: The charge implies a threat; Elijah must looke for force, if hee yeeld not: There needs no other weapon for defence, for offence, then the same tongue, the same breath: God hath fire enough for all the troops of Ahaziah. Immediately, doth a sudden flame break out of heaven, and consume this forward Leader, and his bold followers: It is a just presage and desert of ruine, not to be warned: Worthily are they made examples, that will not take them. B

What marble, or flint is harder then a wicked heart? As if Ahaziah would despightfully spit in the face of heaven, and wrestle a fall with the Almighty, he will needs yet againe set a third captaine upon so desperate an imployment: How hot a service must this Commander needs think himselfe put upon? Who can but pity his straits? There is death before him, death behind him: If he goe not, the Kings wrath is the messenger of death: if he goe, the Prophets tongue is the executioner of death; Many a hard taske will follow the service of a Prince wedded to his passion, divorced from God; Unwillingly, doubtlesse, and fearefully doth this Captain climb up the Hill, to scale that impregnable Fort; But now, when he comes neere to the assault, the battery that he layes to it, is his prayers; his surest fight is upon his knees: Hee went up, and came, and fell upon his knees, before Elijah, and besought him, and said unto him, O man of God, I pray thee, let my life, and the life of these fifty thy servants, bee precious in thy sight: he confesses the judgement that befell his predecessors; the monuments of their destruction were in his eye, and the terror of it, in his heart; of an enemy therefore he is become a suppliant, & sues not so much for the Prophets yeeldance, as for his own life: this was the way to offer violence to the Prophet of God, to the God of that Prophet, even humble supplications; We must deprecate that evill, which we would avoid: if we would force blessings, we must intreat them. There is nothing to be gotten from God by strong hand; any thing by suit; The life of the Captaine is preserved; Elijah is by the Angell commanded to goe downe with him speedily, fearlesly. The Prophet casts not with himselfe; What safety can there be in this journey? I shall put my self into the hands of rude Souldiers, and by them into the hands of an inraged King; if he did not eagerly thirst after my blood, he had never sought it, with so much losse; But, so soon as he had a charge from the Angell, he walks down resolutely, and (as it were) dares the dangers of so great an hostility; He knew that the same God who had fought for him, upon the hill, would not leave him in the Valley; he knew that the Angell which bade him goe, was guard enough against a world of enemies. Faith knowes not how to feare; and can as easily contemne the suggestion of perills, as infidelity can raise them. C D E

The Prophet lookes boldly upon the Court, which doubtlesse was not a little disaffected to him, and comes confidently into the bed-chamber of Ahaziah; and sticks not to speak over the same words to his head, which he had sent him not long since by his first messengers; Not one syllable wil the Prophet abate of his errand; it is not for an Herald of heaven to be out of countenance; or to mince ought of the most killing messages of his God.

Whether the inexpected confidence both of the man, and of the speech amazed the sick King of Israel, or whether the feare of some present judgment (wherewith he might suspect Elijah to come armed upon any act of violence that should bee offered

A offered) over-awed him; or whether now at laſt, upon the ſight and hearing of this man of God, the Kings heart began to relent, and checke it ſelfe for that ſinne, for which hee was iuſtly reproved, I know not; but ſure I am, the Prophet goes away untouched, neither the furious purpoſes of Ahaziah, nor the exaſperations of a Iezebel can hurt that Prophet, whom God hath intended to a fiery Chariot: The hearts of Kings are not their owne: Subjects are not ſo much in their hands, as they are in their Makers: how eaſily can God tame the fierceneſſe of any creature, and in the midſt of their moſt heady careere, ſtop them on the ſudden, and fetch them upon the knees of their humble ſubmiſſion? It is good truſting God with the events of his owne commands; who can at pleaſure either avert evills, or improve them to good.

B According to the word of the Prophet, Ahaziah dies: not two whole yeares doth hee ſit in the Throne of Iſrael; which he now muſt yeeld (in the want of children) to his brother. Wickedneſſe ſhortens his reigne; he had too much of Ahab, and Iezebel, to expect the bleſſing, either of length, or proſperity of government: As alwayes in the other, ſo oft-times in this world doth God teſtify his anger to wicked men: Some live long, that they may aggravate their judgement; others die ſoon, that they may haſten it.

The Rapture of ELIJAH.

C LOng and happily hath Elijah fought the wars of his God; and now after his noble, and glorious victories, God will ſend him a chariot of Triumph: Not ſuddenly would God ſnatch away his Prophet without warning, without expectation; but acquaints him before-hand with the determination of his glory. How full of heavenly joy was the ſoule of Elijah, whiles he fore-knew, and lookt for this inſtant happineſſe? With what contempt did he caſt his eyes upon that earth, which he was now preſently to leave? With what raviſhment of an inward pleaſure did he look upon that heaven which he was to enjoy? For a meet farewell to the earth, Elijah will goe viſit the ſchooles of the Prophets before his departure: Theſe were in his way: Of any part of the earth they were neareſt unto heaven: In an holy progreſſe therefore he walkes his laſt round, from Gilgal (neare Jordan) to Bethel frō Bethel, to Jericho, from Jericho to D Jordan againe. In al theſe ſacred Colleges of Divines, he meant to leave the legacy of his love, counſel, confirmation, bleſſing. How happy a thing it is, whiles we are upon earth to improve our time and gifts to the beſt behooſe of Gods Church? and after the aſſurance of our own bleſſedneſſe, to help others to the ſame heaven? But, O God, who can but wonder at the courſe of thy wiſe and powerfull adminiſtrations? Even in the midſt of the degeneration, and Idolatries of Iſrael haſt thou reſerved to thy ſelfe whole ſocieties of holy Prophets; and out of thoſe ſinfull & revolted Tribes, haſt raiſed the two great miracles of Prophets, Elijah & Eliſha, in an immediate ſucceſſion: Judah it ſelf under a religious Jehoſhaphat, yeelded not ſo eminent & cleerely illuminated ſpirits: The mercy of our provident God wil neither be confined nor excluded: neither confined to the places of publike profeſſion, nor E excluded from the depraved Congregations of his own people; where he hath loved, he cannot eaſily be eſtranged: Rather, where ſin abounds, his grace aboundeth much more; and raiſeth ſo much ſtronger helpes, as he ſees the dangers greater.

Happy was Eliſha in the attendance of ſo gracious a Maſter, and the more happy that he knowes it: Faine would Elijah ſhake him off at Gilgal, if not there, at Bethel, if not yet there, at Jericho. A private meſſage (on which Elijah muſt go alone) is pretended, from the Lord: whether ſhall we ſay the Prophet did this for the tryall of the conſtant affection of his carefull and diligent ſervant; or, that it was concealed from Elijah that his departure was revealed to Eliſha: Perhaps he that knew of his own reception into heaven, did not know what witneſſes would be allowed that miraculous act: and now his humble modeſty affected a ſilent and un-noted paſſage; Even Eliſha knew ſomething that was hid frō his Maſter, now upon the threſhold of heaven: No meere creature was ever made of the whole counſell of the Higheſt: Some things have been diſcloſed to babes & novices, that have been cloſed up to the moſt wiſe & judicious: In natural ſpeculations the greater wit, and deeper judgement ſtill caries it; but in the revelations of God, the favour of his choice ſwaies all, not the power of our apprehenſion: The Maſter may both command and intreat his ſervants ſtay, in vaine: Eliſha muſt be pardoned this holy and zealous diſobedience, As the Lord liveth, and as thy ſoule liveth, I will not leave thee: His Maſter may be withdrawn from him, he wil not be withdrawn from his Maſter. He knew that the bleſſing was at the parting; and if he had diligently attended all his life, and now ſlacked in the laſt act, he had loſt the reward of his ſervice. The evening praiſes the day, and the chiefe grace of the theater is in the laſt Scene: Be faithfull to the death, and I will give thee a Crowne of life. B

That Elijah ſhould be tranſlated, & what day he ſhould be tranſlated, God would have no ſecret: The ſonnes of the Prophets at Bethel, at Jericho, both know it, & ask Eliſha if he knew it not: Knoweſt thou that the Lord will take away thy Maſter from thy head this day? and he anſwered, Yea, I know it, hold yee your peace. How familiarly doe theſe Prophets inter-know one another? How kindly doe they communicate their viſions? Seldome ever was any knowledge given to keep, but to impart: The grace of this rich Jewell is loſt in concealement. The removall of an Elijah is ſo important a buſines, that it is not fit to be done without noiſe: Many ſhal have their ſhare in his loſſe: he muſt be miſſed on the ſudden: it was meet therefore that the world ſhould know his rapture ſhould be divine and glorious. I doe not finde where the day of any naturall death is notified to ſo many: by how much more wonder there was in this Aſſumption, by ſo much more ſhall it be fore-revealed. It is enough for ordinary occurrents to be known by their event: ſupernaturall things have need of premonition, that mens hearts may be both prepared for their receit, and confirmed in their certainty. Thrice was Eliſha intreated, thrice hath he denied to ſtay behind his now-departing Maſter; on whom both his eyes and his thoughts are ſo fixed, that he cannot give allowance ſo much as to the interpellation of a queſtion of his fellow-Prophets: Together therefore are this wonderfull paire come to the laſt ſtage of their ſeparation, the bankes of Jordan. Thoſe that vvere not admitted to be attendants of the journey, yet will not be debarred from being ſpectators of ſo marvellous an iſſue. Fifty men of the ſonnes of the Prophets, vvent and ſtood to view afarre off; I marvell there vvere no more: How could any ſon of the Prophets ſtay within the Colledge vvals that day: when he knew what was meant to Elijah? Perhaps, though they knew that to be the Prophets laſt day; yet they might thinke his diſparition ſhould be ſudden, and inſenſible; beſides, they found how much hee affected ſecrecy in this intended departure: yet the fifty Prophets of Jericho vvill make proofe of their eyes, and with much intention aſſay vvho ſhall have the laſt ſight of Elijah. Miracles are not purpoſed to ſilence and obſcutity: God will not vvork vvonders vvithout vvitneſſes; ſince he doth them on purpoſe to win glory to his name, his end were fruſtrate without their notice. Even ſo, O Saviour, when thou hadſt raiſed thy ſelfe from the dead, thou wouldſt be ſeen of more then five hundred brethren at once; and when thou wouldſt raiſe up thy glorified body from earth into Heaven, thou didſt not aſcend from ſome cloſe valley, but from the Mount of Olives; not in the night, not alone, but in the cleare day, in the view of many eyes; which were ſo fixed upon that point of thine heaven that they could ſcarce be removed by the check of Angels. C D E

Jordan muſt be croſſed by Elijah in his way to heaven: There muſt be a meet parallel betwixt the two great Prophets, that ſhall meet Chriſt upon Tabor; Moſes and Elias; Both received viſions on Horeb, to both God appeared there in fire, and other formes of terrour; both were ſent to Kings, one to Pharaoh, the other to Ahab: Both prepared miraculous Tables, the one of Quailes and Manna in the Deſert, the other of meale and oyle in Sarepta: Both opened heaven, the one for that nouriſhing dew, the other for thoſe refreſhing ſhowers: Both revenged Idolatries with the ſword, the

A the one upon the worshippers of the golden Calfe, the other upon the foure hundred Baalites: Both quenched the drought of Israel, the one out of the Rock, the other out of the Cloud: both divided the waters, the one of the Red Sea, the other of Iordan; Both of them are forewarned of their departure: Both must be fetcht away beyond Iordan; The body of Elijah is translated, the body of Moses is hid: What Moses doth by his Rod, Elijah doth by his Mantle; with that he smites the Waters, and they (as fearing the divine power which wrought with the Prophet) run away from him, and stand on heapes, leaving the dry channell for the passage of those awfull feet: It is not long since he mulcted them with a generall exsiccation: now he onely bids them stand aside, and give way to his last walke; that he might with dry feet mount up into the celestiall chariot.

B The waters doe not now first obey him: they know that Mantle of old, which hath oft given laws to their falling, rising, standing: they are past over; and now when Elijah findes himselfe treading on his last earth, he profers a munificent boone to his faithfull servant, Ask what I shall doe for thee before I am taken from thee. I doe not heare him say, Aske of me when I am gone, in my glorified condition, I shall be more able to bestead thee, but, aske before I go. We have a communion with the Saints departed not a commerce: when they are inabled to doe more for us, they are lesse apt to be sollicited by us. It is a safe suing where we are sure that we are heard. Had not Elijah received a peculiar instinct for this profer, he had not been thus liberall: It were presumption to be bountifull on anothers cost, without leave of the owner: The mercy of our good God allowes his favourites not onely to receive, but to

C give: not onely to receive for themselves, but to convey blessings to others: What can that man want that is befriended of the faithfull?

Elisha needes not goe farre to seek for a suit; It was in his heart, in his mouth: Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me. Every Prophet must be a sonne to Elijah; but Elisha would be his heire, and craves the happy right of his primogeniture, the double share to his brethren. It was not wealth, nor safety, nor ease, nor honour that Elisha cares for; the world lies open before him, he may take his choice: the rest he contemneth, nothing will serve him but a large measure of his Masters spirit: No carnall thought was guilty of this sacred ambition: Affectation of eminence was too base a conceit to fall into that man of God: He saw that the times needed strong convictions, he saw that he could not otherwise weild the succession to such a Ma-

D ster, therefore he sues for a double portion of spirit: the spirit of prophecy to foreknow, the spirit of power to worke: We cannot be too covetous, too ambitious of spirituall gifts, such especially as may enable us to win most advantage to God in our vocations. Our wishes are the true touch-stone of our estate; such as we wish to be, we are: worldly hearts affect earthly things, spirituall divine: we cannot better know what we are indeed, then by what we would be.

Elijah acknowledges the difficulty, and promises the grant of so great a request; suspended yet upon the condition of Elishaes eye-sight. If thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be. What are the eyes to the furniture of the soule? What power is there in those visive beames to draw down a double portion of Elijahs spirit? God doth not alwaies look at efficacy & merit in the conditions of our actions, but at the freedome of his own appointments: The E eye was onely to be imployed as the servant of the heart, that the desires might be so much more intended with the sight: Vehemence is the way to speed both in earth and in Heaven. If but the eye-lids of Elisha fall, if his thoughts slacken, his hopes are dashed; There must be fixednesse and vigilance, in those that desire double graces.

Elijah was going on, and talking, when the Charet of heaven came to fetch him; Surely, had not that conference been needfull and divine, it had given way to meditation: and Elijah had been taken up rather from his knees, then from his feet. There can bee no better posture, or state, for the messenger of our dissolution to finde us in, then in a diligent prosecution of our calling. The busie attendance of our holy vocation is no lesse pleasing to God then an immediate devotion: Happy is the ſervant whom the maſter (when hee comes) ſhall finde ſo doing. A

Oh the ſingular glory of Elijah! What mortall creature ever had this honour to be viſibly fetched by the Angels of God to his heavē? Every ſoul of the elect is attended and caried to bleſſedneſſe by thoſe inviſible meſſengers, but, what fleſh and blood was ever graced with ſuch a convoy? There are three bodily Inhabitants of Heaven, Henoch, Elijah, our Saviour Chriſt. The firſt before the law, the ſecond under the Law, the third under the Goſpell; All three in a ſeverall forme of tranſlation: Our bleſſed Saviour raiſed himſelfe to and above the heavens, by his own immediate power: he aſcended as the Son, they as ſervāts: he as God, they as creatures: Elijah aſcended by the viſible miniſtery of Angels Henoch inſenſibly: Wherefore O God haſt thou done thus, but to give us a taſte of what ſhall be? to let us ſee that heaven was never ſhut to the faithfull: to give us aſſurance of the future glorification of this mortall and corruptible part? B

Even thus, O Saviour, when thou ſhalt deſcend from heaven with a ſhout, with the voice of an Archangell, and with the trumpet of God, we that are alive and remain, ſhal be caught up together with the raiſed bodies of thy Saints, into the clouds to meet thee in the aire, to dwell with thee in glory.

Many forms have thoſe celeſtiall ſpirits taken to themſelves in their apparitions to men: but of al other, moſt often hath the Almighty made his meſſengers a flame of fire: never more properly then here: How had the ſpirit of God kindled the hot fires of zeale in the breſt of Elijah? How had this Prophet thrice, commanded fire from heaven to earth? How fitly now at laſt doe theſe Seraphicall fires carie him from earth to heaven? C

What doe we ſee in this rapture of Elijah, but violence and terrour, whirlewinde and fire? two of thoſe fearefull repreſentations which the Prophet had in the Rocke of Horeb: never any man entred into glory with eaſe: Even the moſt favourable change hath ſome equivalency to a natural diſſolutiō. Although doubtleſſe to Elijah this fire had a light ſomneſſe & reſplendance, not terrour: this whirlwinde had ſpeed, not violence: Thus haſt thou, O Saviour, bidden us when the Elements ſhal be diſſolved, and the heavens ſhal be flaming about our eares, to lift up our heads with joy, becauſe our redemption draweth nigh. Come death, come fire, come whirlewinde, they are worthy to be welcome that ſhall carie us to immortality.

This arreption was ſudden, yet Eliſha ſees both the Charet, and the horſes, and the aſcent, and cries to his now-changed Maſter, between heaven and earth, My father, my father, the charet of Iſrael, and the horſemen thereof. Shaphat of Abel-meholah hath yeelded this title to Elijah, the naturall father of Eliſha, to the ſpirituall; neither of them may be neglected, but, after the yoke of oxen killed at the farewell, we heare of no more greetings, no more bewailings of his bodily parent; and now that Elijah is taken from him, he cries out like a diſtreſſed Orphane, My father, my father, and when he hath loſt the ſight of him, he rends his clothes in peeces according to the faſhion of the moſt paſſionate mourners: that Eliſha ſees his maſter halfe way in heaven, cannot take away the ſorrow of his loſſe: The departure of a faithful Prophet of God is worthy of our lamentation: Neither is it private affection that muſt ſway our griefe, but reſpects to the publike: Eliſha ſaies not onely, My father, but the charet and horſmen of Iſrael. That we have forgone a father, ſhould not ſo much trouble us, as that Iſrael hath loſt his guard. Certainely, the view of this heavenly charet and horſes that came for Elijah, puts Eliſha in mind of that charet and horſemen, which Elijah was to Iſrael. Theſe were Gods charets, Elijah was theirs: Gods charet and theirs are upon the ſame wheeles mounted into heavē: No forces are ſo ſtrong as the ſpiritual, the prayers of an Elijah are more powerfull, then all the Armies of fleſh: The firſt thing that this Seer diſcernes, after the ſeparation of his Maſter, is, the nakedneſſe of Iſrael in his loſſe. If we muſter Souldiers, and leeſe zealous Prophets, it is but a wofull exchange. D E

Elijahs Mantle fals from him in the riſing, there was no uſe of that, whither he was

A was going; there was, whence he was taken: Elisha justly takes up this deare monument of his glorified master: A good supply for his rent garments: This was it wch (in presage of his future right) Elijah invested him withal, upon the first sight, whē he was ploughing with the twelve yoke of oxen; now it fals from heaven to his possession: I doe not see him adore so precious a relique, I see him take it up, cast it about him: Pensive and Masterlesse doth he now come back to the bankes of Iordan, whose streame he must passe in his return to the schooles of the Prophets. Erewhile he saw what way that river gave to the Mantle of Elijah, he knew that power was not in the cloth, but in the Spirit of him that wore it: to try therefore whether he were no lesse the heire of that spirit, then of that garment, he took the Mantle of Elijah and smote the waters, and said, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? Elisha doth not expostulate, and challenge, but pray; As if he had said, Lord God, it was thy promise

B to me by my departed master, that if I should see him in his last passage, a double portion of his Spirit should be upon me: I followed him with my eyes in that fire, and whirlewinde; now therefore, O God, make good thy gracious Word to thy servant; shew some token upon me for good; make this the first proofe of the miraculous power wherewith thou shalt indue me: Let Iordan give the same way to me as it gave to my master. Immediately the streame (as acknowledging the same Mantle, though in another hand) divides it selfe, and yeelds passage to the successor of Elijah.

The fifty sons of the Prophets having been afar off witnesses of these admirable events, do well see that Elijah (though translated in body) hath yet left his Spirit behind him; they meet Elisha, & bow themselves to the ground before him: It

C was not the outside of Elijah which they had wont to stoope unto, with so much veneration, it was his Spirit; which since they now find in another subject, they entertaine with equall reverence. No envy, no emulation raiseth up their stomackes against Elijahs servant, but where they see eminent graces they are willingly prostrate. Those that are truly gracious, doe no lesse rejoice in the riches of others gifts, then humbly under-value their owne. These men were trained up in the schooles of the Prophets, Elisha at the plough and cart, yet now they stand not upon tearms of their worth, and his meanneſse, but meekly fal down before him whom God wil honour. It is not to be regarded who the man is, but whom God would make him. The more unlikely the means is, the more is the glory of the workman: It is the praise of an holy ingenuity to magnifie the graces of God where ever it finds them.

These young prophets are no lesse full of zeal, then reverence; zeale to Elijah,

D reverence to Elisha: They see Elijah caried up in the ayre; they knew this was not the first time of his supernaturall removall; Imagining it therefore possible that the Spirit of God had cast him upon some remote mountaine, or valley, they profer the labour of their servants to seek him: In some things even professed Seers are blind: Could they think God would send such a Charet and horses for a lesse voyage then heaven?

Elisha (knowing his master beyond all the sphere of mortality) forbids them: Good wil makes them unmannerly, their importunity urges him til he is ashamed; not his approbation but their vehemence caries at last a condescent: Else he might perhaps have seemed enviously unwilling to fetch backe so admired a Master: and

E loth to foregoe that mantle. Some things may be yeelded for the redeeming of our own vexation, and avoidance of others mis-construction, which out of true judgement we see no cause to affect.

The messengers tyred with three daies search, turn backe as wise as they went: some men are best satisfied, when they have wearied themselvs in their own waies: nothing will teach them wit, but disappointments. Their painefull errour leades them to a right conceit of Elijahs happier transportation: Those that would find Elijah, let them aspire to the heavenly Paradise: Let them follow the high steps of his sincere faithfulneſse, strong patience, undaunted cgurage, fervent zeale: shortly let them walk in the waies of his holy and constant obedience: at last God shal send the fiery Charet of death to fetch them up to that heaven of heavens, where the shall triumph in everlasting joyes.

Elisha { Healing the Waters. / Cursing the Children. / Relieving the Kings.

2 Kgs. 2. and 3 &c

IT is good making use of a Prophet whiles we have him. Elisha stayed some while at Iericho; The Citizens resort to him with a common suit: Their structure was not more pleasant, then their waters unwholsome, B and their soyle by those corrupt waters: They sue to Elisha for the remedie. Why had they not all this while, made their moane to Elijah? Was it that they were more awed with his greater austerity? Or was it that they met not with so fit an opportunity of his commoration amongst them? It was told them what power Elisha had exercised upon the waters of Iordan, and now they ply him for theirs: Examples of beneficence easily move us to a request, and expectation of favours.

What ailed the waters of Iericho? Surely, originally they were not ill affected: No men could be so foolish as to build a city, where neither earth nor water were useful. Meere prospect could not carie men to the neglect of health, & profit. Hiel the Bethelite would never have reedified it with dāger of a curse, so lately as in the C daies of Ahab, if it had been of old notorious for so foule an annoyance: Not therefore the ancient malediction of Iosua, not the neighbourhood of that noysome lake of Sodome, was guilty of this disease of the soyle, and waters, but the late sins of the inhabitants. He turneth the rivers into a wilderneſſe, and water-ſprings into a dry ground, a fruitfull land into barrenneſſe, for the wickedneſſe of them that dwell therein: How oft have vve seene the same field both full & famishing? Hovv oft the same vvaters both safe, & by someirruption or nevv tincture hurtful? Hovvsoever naturall causes may concurre; heaven and earth, and ayre, and vvaters follovv the temper of our soules, of our lives, and are therefore indisposed because vve are so: Iericho began novv to make it self capable of a better state, since it vvas novv become a receptacle of Prophets: Elisha is vvilling to gratifie his hosts; it is reason that any place D should fare the better for the presence of Divines. The medicine is more strange then the disease. Bring me a new Cruſe, and put ſalt therein: Why a Cruse? why new? why Salt in that new Cruse? How should Salt make water potable? Or if there were any such vertue in it, what could a Cruse-full doe to a whole current? Or, if that measure were sufficient, what was the age of the Cruse to the force of the Salt? Yet Elisha cals for Salt in a new Cruse. God (who wrought this by his Prophet) is a free agent; as he will not bind his power to meanes; so will he by his power bind unlikely meanes to performe his will.

Naturall proprieties have no place in miraculous workes: No lesse easie is it for God to work by contrary, then subordinate powers.

The Prophet doth not cast the Salt into the channel, but into the spring of the E waters; if the fountain be redressed, the streames cannot be faulty; as contrarily, the purity and soundnesse of the stream avails nothing to the redresse of the fountain: Reformation must begin at the well-head of the abuse: The order of beeing is a good guide to the method of amending. Vertue doth not run backward: Had Elisha cast the Salt into the brookes and ditches, the remedy must have striven against the streame, to reach up to the spring: now it is but one labour to cure the fountain. Our heart is a Well of bitter and venomous water, our actions are the streames: In vaine shall we cleanse our hands, whiles our hearts are evill.

The Cruse and the Salt must be their own: The act must be his, the power Gods: He cast the Salt into the ſpring, and said; Thus ſaith the Lord, I have healed theſe waters; there ſhall not be from thence any more death, or barrenneſſe. Farre was it from Elisha to ch allenge

A challenge ought to himselfe: Before, when he should divide the waters of Iordan, he did not say, where is the power of Elisha, but, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? & now, when he should cure the waters of Iericho, he saies not, thus saith Elisha, but, thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters. How carefull is the man of God that no part of Gods glory should stick to his own fingers. Iericho shall know to whom they owe the blessing, that they may duly returne the thanks. Elisha professes he can doe no more of himselfe then that Salt, then that Cruse; only God shall work by him, by it: and what ever that Almighty hand undertakes, cannot faile, yea is already done: neither doth he say, I will heale, but, I have healed: Even so, O God, if thou cast into the fountaine of our hearts, but one Cruse-full of the Salt of thy Spirit, we are whole, no thought can passe between the receit and the remedy.

As the generall visitor of the Schooles of the Prophets, Elisha passeth from Ie-
B richo to that other Colledge at Bethel. Bethel was a place of strange composition: there was at once the golden Calfe of Ieroboam; and the Schoole of God: true religion and Idolatry found a free harbour within those walls: I doe not marvell that Gods Prophets would plant there; there was the most need of their presence, where they found the spring-head of corruption: Physitians are of most use where diseases doe abound: As he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the City, and mocked him, and said to him, Goe up thou bald-head, Goe up thou bald-head. Even the very boys of Bethel have learned to scoffe at a Prophet; The spight of their Idolatrous parents is easily propagated; Children are such as their institution,
C but Infancy is led altogether by imitation, it hath neither words nor actions, infused by others; If it have good or ill language, it is but borrowed; and the shame or thank is due to those that lent it them.

What was it that these ill-taught children upbraided to the Prophet, but a sleight naturall defect; not worthy the name of a blemish, the want of a little haire; at the best a comely excrement, no part of the body; Had there been deformity in that smoothnesse of the head, which some great wits have honoured with praises, a faultlesse and remedilesse eye-sore had been no fit matter for a taunt: How small occasions will be taken to disgrace a Prophet? If they could have said ought worse, Elisha had not heard of this; God had crowned that head with honor which the Bethelitish children loaded with scorne. Who would have thought the rude termes
D of waggish boyes worthy of any thing but neglect? Elisha looks at them with severe brows, and (like the heire of him that cald downe fire upon the two Captaines and their fifties) curses them in the name of the Lord; Two she-beares out of the Wood hasten to be his executioners, and teare two and forty of them in peeces. O fearefull example of divine Justice! This was not the revenge of an angry Prophet, it was the punishment of a righteous Judge: God and his Seer lookt through these children, at the parents, at all Israel; he would punish the parents mis-nurturing their children, (to the contemptuous usage of a Prophet) with the death of those children, which they had mis-taught: He would teach Israel what it was to mis-use a Prophet: & if he would not indure these contumelies unreven-
E ged in the mouths of children, what vengeance was enough for aged persecutors?

Doubtlesse some of the children escaped to tell the newes of their fellowes, what lamentation doe we think there was in the streets of Bethel? how did the distressed mothers wring their hands for this wofull orbation? And now when they came forth to fetch the remnants of their own flesh, what a sad spectacle it was to finde the fields strawed with those mangled carkasses? It is an unprofitable sorrow that followes a judgement; Had these Parents beene as careful to train up their children in good discipline, and to correct their disorders, as they are now passionate in bemoaning their losse, this slaughter had never been: In vain doe we look for good of those children whose education we have neglected: In vain doe we grieve for those miscariages, which our care might have prevented.

Elisha knew the successe, yet doth he not balke the City of Bethel: Doe we not wonder that the furious impatience of those parents, whom the curse of Elisha robbed of their children, did not [illegible]ke forth to some malicious practice against the Prophet?

Prophet? Would we not think the Prophet might misdoubt some hard measure from those exasperated Citizens? There lay this way; he followes God, without feare of men; as well knowing that either they durst not, or they could not act violence, they knew there were Beares in the wood, and fires in heaven, & if their malice would have ventured above their courage, they could have no more power over Elisha in the streets, then those hungry beasts had in the way. Whither dare not a Prophet goe when God cals him? Having visited the schooles of the Prophets, Elisha retires to mount Carmel, and after some holy solitarinesse, returnes to the City of Samaria: He can never be a profitable Seer, that is either alwaies or never alone: Carmel shall fit him for Samaria, contemplation for action: That mother City of Israel must needs afford him most work: Yet is the throne of Ahaziah succeeded by a brother lesse ill then himselfe, then the parents of both: Ahabs impiety hath not a perfect heire of Iehoram: That Son of his hates his Baal, though he keepes his calves. Even into the most wicked families it pleaseth God to cast his most powerful restraints, that all are not equally vicious: It is no newes to see lewd men make scruple of some sins: The world were not to live in, if all sins were affected by all. It is no thank to Ahab and Iezebel that their sonne is no Baalite: As no good is traduced from Parents, so not al evill; There is an almighty hand that stops the foule current of nature, at his pleasure: No Idolater can say, that his child shal not be a convert.

The affinity betwixt the houses of Israel and Iudah, holds good in succession; Iehoram inherits the friendship, the aid of Iehoshaphat: whose counsell (as is most likely) had cured him of that Baalisme. It was a good warre whereto he solicites the good King of Iudah. The King of Moab (who had been an ancient tributary from the daies of David) falls now from his homage, & refuses to pay his hundred thousand Lambs, an hundred thousand Rammes with fleeces, to the King of Israel. The backes of Israel can ill misse the wool of Moab, they wil put on iron to recover their cloth. Iehoshaphat had been once well chid, well frighted for joyning with Ahab against Aram; yet doth he not stick now againe to come into the field with Iehoram against Moab. The cause is more favourable, lesse dangerous; Baal is cast downe: The Images of the false Gods are gone, though the false Images of the true God stand still; beside, this rebellious Moab had joyned with the Syrians formerly against Iudah, so as Iehoshaphat is interessed in the revenge.

After resolution of the end, wisely doe these Kings deliberate of the way. It is agreed to passe through Edom; That Kingdome was annexed to the Crowne of Iudah; well might Iehoshaphat make bold with his owne: It was (it seemes) a match farre about in the measure of the way, but nearest to their purpose: the passage would be thus more easie if the passage were more tedious: The three Kings of Israel, Iudah, Edom, together with their Armies, are upon foot. They are no sooner come into the parching wildes of Edom, then they are ready to die for thirst; If the channels were farre off, yet the waters were further; the scorching beames of the Sun have dried them up; and have left those rivers more fit for walke, then entertainment: What are the greatest Monarchs of the world, if they want but water to their mouthes? What can their Crownes, and Plumes, and rich armes availe them, when they are abridged but of that which is the drink of beasts? With dry tongues and lips, doe they now confer of their common misery: Iehoram deplores the calamity into which they were falne, but Iehoshaphat askes for a Prophet: Every man can bewaile a misery, every man cannot finde the way out of it: still yet I heare good Iehoshaphat speak too late: He should have inquired for a Prophet ere he had gone forth; so had he avoided these straits: Not to consult at all with God, is Iehorams sin; to consult late, is Iehoshaphats; the former is atheous carelessenesse, the latter, forgetfull over-sight: The best man may slacken good duties, the worst contemnes them.

Not without some specialty from God doth Elisha follow the campe: Else, that had been no Element for a Prophet: Little did the good King of Iudah think that God was so neere him: Purposely was this holy Seer sent for the succour of Iehoshaphat, and his faithfull followers, when they were so far from dreaming of their delivery, that they knew not of a danger: It would be wide with the best men, if the eye

A eye of divine providence were not open upon them, when the eye of their care is shut towards it? How well did Elisha in the wars? The strongest squadron of Israel was within that breast: A rumour of proofe had not so much safety & protection as his Mantle: Though the King of Israel would take no notice of the Prophet, yet one of his Courtiers did. Here is Elisha the son of Shaphat, which powred water on the hands of Elijah. This followe of Iehoram knowes Elisha by his own name, by his fathers, by his masters: The Court of Israel was profane, and Idolatrous enough, yet even there Gods Prophet had both knowledg & honor: His very service to Elijah was enough to fetch him reverence: It is better to be an attendant of some man, then to be attended by many: That he had powred water on Elijahs hands was insinuation enough, that he could powre out water for those three Kings: The three Kings walked down (by the motion of Iehoshaphat) to the man of God: It was newes to see three Kings going downe to the servant of him, who ranne before the charet of Ahab. Religion and needfull have both of them much power of humiliation, I know not whether more: Either zeale or need will make a Prophet honored.

How sharply dares the man of God to chide his Soveraigne, the King of Israel? The liberty of the Prophets was no lesse singular, then their calling: He that would borrow their tongue, must shew their commission: As God reproved Kings for their sakes, so did not they sticke to reprove Kings for his sake. Thus much freedome they must leave to their successors, that we may not spare the vices of them, whose persons we must spare.

Justly is Iehoram turned off to the Prophets of his father, and the Prophets of his mother. It is our right and equall, that those which we have made the comfort, and stay of our peace, should be the refuge of our extremity: If our prosperity have made us forget our God, how worthily shall our death-bed be choaked with this exprobration? Neither would the case beare an Apology, nor the time an expostulation: Iehoram cannot excuse, he can complain; he finds that now three Kings, three kingdomes are at the mercy of one Prophet, it was time for him to speak faire; nothing soundes from him but lamentations and intreaties: Nay, for the Lord hath called these three Kings together to deliver them into the hand of Moab. Iehoram hath so much grace as to confesse the impotency of those he had trusted, and the power of that God whom he had neglected: Every sinner cannot see, and acknowledge the hand of God in his [illegible]. Already hath the distressed Prince gained something by his misery. None complaines so much as he, none feeles so much as he; All the rest suffer for him, and therefore he suffers in them all.

The man of God who welsees the insufficiency of Iehorams humiliation, layes on yet more load: As the Lord liveth before whom I stand, Surely, were it not that I regard the presence of Iehoshaphat the King of Iudah, I would not looke toward thee, nor see thee; Behold the fearfull Spirit of Elijah, the sister was not more bold with the father, then the servant was with the Sonne: Elisha was a subject, and a Prophet; He must say that as a Prophet, which he ought not as a subject: As a Prophet he would not have looked at him, whom as a subject he would have bowed to: It is one thing when God speaks by him another, when he speaks of himselfe, that it might wel appeare his [illegible] could watch his honour of Soveraignty, Iehoshaphat goes away with that respect which Iehoram missed; No lesse doth God & his Prophet regard religious sincerity, then they abhorre Idolatry, & profaneness: What shall not be done for a Iehoshaphat? For his sake shall those two other Princes, and their vast Armies live and prevaile? Edom and Israel, whether single or conjoyned, had perished by the drought of the desart, by the sword of Moab; One Iehoshaphat gives them both life and victory: Is it not the power of one good man to oblige a world, were it but that (though unfelt) favours from the presence of the righteous; Next to heare good is it happy to converse with them that are so: if we be not bettered by their example, we are blest by their protection.

Who wonders not to heare a Prophet call for a Minstrell, in the middest of that mournful distresse of Israel & Iehoram? Who would not have expected his Charge of teares and prayers, rather then of Musick? How unseasonable are songs to an heavy heart?

heart? It was not for their eares, it was for his owne bosome, that Elisha called for Musick: that his spirits after their zealous agitation, might be sweetly composed, and put into a meet temper, for receiving the calme visions of God: Perhaps it was some holy Levite, that followed the Campe of Iehosophat, whose minstrelsie was required for so sacred a purpose: None but a quiet breast is capable of divine Revelations; Nothing is more powerfull to settle a troubled heart then a melodious harmony; The Spirit of Prophecy was not the more invited, the Prophets Spirit was the better disposed, by pleasing sounds: the same God that will reveale his will to the Prophet, suggests this demand; Bring me a Minstrell; How many say thus when they would put God from them? Profane mirth, wanton musicke debauches the soule, and makes no lesse roome for the unclean spirit, then spirituall melody doth for the Divine. A

No prophet had ever the Spirit at command; The hand of the Minstrel can doe nothing without the hand of the Lord: Whiles the Musick sounds in the eare, God speakes to the heart of Elisha. Thus saith the Lord, Make this valley full of ditches; Ye shall not see winde, neither shall ye see raine, yet that valley shall be full of water, &c. To see winde, and raine in the height of that drought, would have seemed as wonderful, as pleasing; but, to see abundance of water, without winde or raine, was yet more miraculous; I know not how the sight of the means abates our admiration of the effect; Where no causes can be found out, we are forced to confesse omnipotency; Elijah relieved Israel with water, but it was out of the cloudes, and those clouds rose from the sea; but whence Elisha shal fetch it, is not more marvellous then secret. B

All that evening, all that night must the faith of Israel and Iudah be exercised with expectation; At the houre of the morning sacrifice no sooner did the blood of that Oblation gush forth, then the streames of waters gushed forth into their new channells, and filled the Country with a refreshing moisture: Elijah fetcht downe his fire, at the houre of the evening sacrifice: Elisha fetcht up his water, at the houre of the morning sacrifice: God gives respect to his owne houres, for the encouragement of our observation: If his wisdome hath set us any peculiar times, wee cannot keepe them without a blessing: The devotions of all true Jewes (all the world over) were in that houre combined; How seasonably doth the wisdome of God pick out that instant, wherein he might at once answer both Elishaes prophecie, and his peoples prayers. C

The Prophet hath assured the Kings, not of water onely, but of victory; Moab heares of enemies, and is addressed to warre; Their own error shall cut their throats; they rise soone enough to beguile themselves; the beames of the rising Sun glistering upon those vaporous, and unexpected waters, caried in the eies of some Moabites a semblance of blood; a few eyes were enough to fill al eares with a false noise; the deceived sense miscarries the imagination; This is blood, the Kings are surely slain, and they have smitten one another; now therefore, Moab, to the spoile: Civill broyles give just advantage to a common enemy; Therefore must the Camps be spoiled, because the Kings have smitten each other. Those that shall be deceived, are given over to credulity; The Moabites doe not examine either the conceit, or the report; but flie in, confusedly, upon the Campe of Israel; whom they find, too late, to have no enemies but themselves; As if death would not have hastened enough to them, they come to fetch it; they come to challenge it; It seizeth upon them unavoidably; they are smitten, their Cities razed, their Lands marred, their Wells stopped, their trees felled; as if God meant to wast them but once. D

No onsets are so furious as the last assaults of the desperate: the King of Moab now hopelesse of recovery; would be glad to shut up with a pleasing revenge, with seven hundred resolute followers, he rushes into the battaile, towards the King of Edom; as if he would bid death welcome, might he but carie with him that despighted neighbour; & now, mad with the repulse, he returnes: & whether as angry with his destiny, or as barbarously affecting to win his cruel gods with so dear a sacrifice he offers them with his own hand the blood of his eldest son in the sight of Israel, and sends him up in smoake to those hellish Deities. O prodigious act, whether of E rage,

A rage, or of devotion! What an hand hath Satan over his miserable vassals? What marvell is it to see men sacrifice their soules in an unfelt oblation, to these plausible tempters, when their own flesh and blood hath not been spared? There is no Tyrant to the Prince of darknesse.

Elisha with the Shunamite.

B THE holy Prophets under the old Testament, did not abhorre the marriage bed; they did not think themselves too pure for an institution of their Maker; The distressed widow of one of the sonnes of the Prophets comes to Elijah to bemoane her conditiō; Her husband is dead, and dead in debt. Death hath no sooner seized on him, then her two sonnes (the remaining comfort of her life) are to be seized on, by his creditors, for bond-men: How thick did the miseries of this poor afflicted woman light upon her; Her husband is lost, her estate clogged with debts, her children ready to be taken for slaves: Her husband was a religious, and worthy man; he paid his debts to Nature, he could not to his Creditors; they are cruell, and rake in the scarce-closed wound of her sorrow, passing an arrest, worse then death, upon her sonnes: Widowhood, poverty, servitude have conspired to make her perfectly miserable. Vertue and goodnesse can pay no debts; The holiest man may be deepe in arrerages, and breake the banke: Not through lavishnesse, and riot of expence: (Religion teaches us to moderate our hands, to spend within the proportion of our estate) but through either iniquity of times, or evill casualties. Ahab and Jezebel were lately in the Throne, who can marvell that a Prophet was in debt? It was well that any good man might have his breath free, though his estate were not: wilfully to over-lash our ability, cannot stand with wisdome, & good government; but no providence can guard us from crosses; Holinesse is no more defence against debt, then against death: Grace can keep us from unthriftinesse, not from want. Whither doth the Prophets widow come to bewaile her case, but to Elisha? Every one would be sensible of her affliction, or if they would pity, yet could not releeve her, Elisha could do both; Into his eare doth she unload her griefes. It is no small point of wisdome to know where to plant our Lamentation; otherwise, in stead of comfort, we may meet with scorne and insultation.

D None can so freely compassionate the hard termes of a Prophet as an Elisha; Hee findes that she is not querulously impatient, expressing her sorrow without murmuring, and discontentment; making a loving, and honorable mention of that husband, who had left her distressed; readily therefore doth he incline to her succour: What shall I doe for thee? Tell me what hast thou in thy house? Elisha, when he heares of her debt, askes of her substance; Had her house been furnished with any valuable commodity, the Prophet implies the necessity of selling it for satisfaction; Our own abundance can ill stand with our engagement to others; It is great injustice for us to be full of others purses: It is not our own which we owe to another. What is it other then a plausible stealth to feed our riot with the want of the owner? He that E could multiply her substance, could know it; God & his Prophet loves to heare our necessities out of our own mouthes (Thine hand-maide hath not any thing in the house save a pot of oyle.) It is neither newes nor shame for a Prophet to be poore; Grief & want perhaps hastened his end; both of them are left for the dowry of his carefull widow: She had complained, if there had been any possibility of remedy, at home; bashfulnesse had stopt her mouth thus long, and should have done yet longer, if the exigence of her childrens servitude had not opened it; No want is so worthy of reliefe, as that which is loatheſt to come forth. Then he said, Goe borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbours, even empty vessels, borrow not a few; and when thou art come in, thou shalt shut the doore upon thee, and upon thy sons, and shalt poure out into all those vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full. 2 Kin. 4

She that owed much, and had nothing, yet must borrow more, that she may pay pay all: Poverty had not ſo diſcredited her with her neighbours, that they ſhould doubt to lend her thoſe veſſels empty, which they had grudged full: Her want was too well knowne; it could not but ſeeme ſtrange to the neighbours, to ſee this poore widow ſo buſily peſtring her houſe with empty tubs; which they knew ſhee had nothing to fill; they knew well enough ſhe had neither field nor vineyard, nor orchard, and therefore muſt needs marvell at ſuch unprofitable diligence: If their curioſity would be inquiring after her intentions, ſhee is commanded ſecrecy. The doores muſt be ſhut upon her ſelfe, and her ſonnes; whiles the oyle is increaſing; No eye ſhall ſee the miracle in working, enow ſhall ſee it once wrought; This act was no leſſe a proof of her faith, then an improvement of her eſtate; it was an exerciſe of her devotion, as well as of her diligence; it was fit her doores ſhould be ſhut, whiles her heart and lips were opened in an holy invocation; Out of one ſmall Jarre was powred out ſo much oyle, as by miraculous multiplication filled all that empty caske: Scarce had that pot any bottome: At leaſt the bottome that it had, was to be meaſured by the brims of all thoſe veſſels; this was ſo deepe, as they were high; Could they have held more, this pot had not been empty: Even ſo the bounty of our God gives grace, & glory, according to the capacity of the receiver; when he ceaſeth to infuſe, it is for want of roome in the heart that takes it in; Could we hold more, O God, thou wouldeſt give more; If there be any defect, it is in our veſſels, not in thy beneficence; How did the heart of this poore widow runne over, as with wonder, ſo with joy and thankfulneſſe to ſee ſuch a river of oyle riſe out of ſo ſmall a ſpring; to ſee all her veſſels ſwimming full with ſo beneficiall a liquor; Juſtly is ſhe affected with this ſight, ſhe is not tranſported from her duty; I doe not ſee her run forth into the ſtreet, and proclaime her ſtore, nor calling in her neighbours, whether to admire or bargaine; I ſee her running to the Prophets doore, and gratefully acknowledging the favour, and humbly depending on his directions, as not daring to diſpoſe of that, which was ſo wondrouſly given her, without the advice of him, by whoſe powerfull meanes ſhe had received it; her owne reaſon might have ſufficiently ſuggeſted what to doe; ſhe dares not truſt it, but conſults with the Oracle of God; If we would walk ſurely, we muſt doe nothing without a word; Every action, every motion muſt have a warrant; We can no more erre with this guide, then not erre without him.

The Prophet ſets her in a right way; Goe ſell the oyle, and pay the debt, and live, thou, and thy children, on the reſt; The firſt care is of her debts, the next, of her maintenance, It ſhould be groſſe injuſtice to raiſe meanes for her ſelfe, and her charge, ere ſhe have diſcharged the arrerages of her husband; None of the oyle was hers, till her creditors were ſatiſfied; all was hers that remained; It is but ſtealth to enjoy a borrowed ſubſtance; Whiles ſhe had nothing, it was no ſin to owe; but when once her veſſels were full, ſhe could not have been guiltleſſe, if ſhe had not paid, before ſhe ſtored. God and his Prophets were bountifull; after the debts paid, they provide not onely againſt the thraldome of her charge, but againſt the want. It is the juſt care of a religious heart to defend the widow and children of a Prophet from diſtreſſe and penury.

Behold the true ſervant, and ſucceſſor of Elijah; What he did to the Sareptan widow, this did to the widow of a Prophet; That increaſe of oyle was by degrees, this at once; both equally miraculous; this, ſo much more charitable, as it leſſe concerned himſelfe.

He that gives kindneſſes, doth by turnes receive them; Eliſha hath relieved a poore woman, is releeved by a rich. The Shunamite, a religious and wealthy matron, invites him to her houſe, and now after the firſt entertainment, finding his occaſions to call him to a frequent paſſage, that way, moves her husband to ſet up, & furniſh a lodging for the man of God; It was his holineſſe that made her deſirous of ſuch a gueſt; Well might ſhe hope that ſuch an Inmate would pay a bleſſing for his houſe-rent: Oh happy Shunamite that might make her ſelfe the Hoſteſſe of Eliſha! As no leſſe dutiful then godly, ſhe imparts her deſire to her husband, whom her ſute hath drawne to a partnerſhip in this holy hoſpitality; Bleſſed of God is that man, whoſe

A whole bed yeelds him an help to heaven. The good Shunamite desires not to harbour Elisha in one of her wonted lodgings, she sollicites her husband to build him a chamber on the wal apart: she knew the tumult of a large family unfit for the quiet meditations of a Prophet: retiredness is most meet for the thoughts of a Seer: Neither would she bring him to bare walls, but sets ready for him a bed, a table, a stoole, and a Candlestick, and what ever necessary utensils for his entertainment: The Prophet doth not affect delicacy, she takes care to provide for his convenience; Those that are truly pious, and devout, think their houses and their hands cannot be too open to the messengers of God; & are most glad to exchange their earthly commodities for the others spirituall. Superfluity should not fal within the care of a Prophet, necessity must, he that could provide oyle for the widow, could have provided all needfull helpes for himselfe: What roome had there been for the charity and beneficence of others, if the Prophet should have alwaies maintained himselfe out of power?

B

The holy man is so farre sociable as not to neglect the friendly offer of so kind a benefactor: Gladly doth he take up his new lodging: and, as well pleased with so quiet a repose, and careful attendance, he sends his servant Gehezi with the message of his thanks, with a treaty of retribution: Behold, thou hast beene carefull for us, with all this care: What is to be done for thee? Wouldest thou be spoken for to the King, or to the Captain of the Host? An ingenuous disposition cannot receive favours without thoughts of returne: A wise debtor is desirous to retribute in some kinde, as may be most acceptable to his obligers: without this discretion, we may offer such requitals, as may seeme goodly to us, to our friends, worthlesse: Every one can choose best for himselfe; Elisha therefore (who had never been wanting in spirituall duties to so hospitall a friend) gives the Shunamite the election of her suit, for temporall recompence also; No man can be a loser by his favour to a Prophet. It is a good hearing that an Elisha is in such grace at the Court, that he can promise himself accesse to the King, in a friends suit: It was not ever thus; the time was, when his Master heard, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? Now the late miracle which Elisha wrought in gratifying the three Kings, with water, and victory, hath endeared him to the King of Israel; and now, Who but Elisha? Even that rough mantle finds respect amongst those silkes, and tissues: As bad as Iehoram was, yet he honored the man of God; He that could not prevail with an Idolatrous King, in a spirituall reformation, would carry a civil suit; Neither doth the Prophet in a sullen discontentment, fly off from the Court, because he foūd his labours unprofitable, but stil holds good termes with that Prince, whom he cannot reclaim, & wil make use notwithstanding of his countenance in matters, whether of courtesie, or justice; We may not cast off our due respects even to faulty authority; but must still submit and persist, where we are repelled: Not to his own advancement doth Elisha desire to improve the Kings favour, but to the behoofe, to the relieſe of others; If the Shunamite have businesse at the Court, she shall need no other Solicitor, there cannot be a better office, nor more beseeming a Prophet, then to speake in the cause of the dumbe, to befriend the oppressed, to win greatnesse unto the protection of innocence.

D

The good matron needs no shelter of the great; I dwell among mine owne people, as if she said; The courtesie is not small in it selfe, but not usefull to me; I live here quietly in a contented obscurity, out of the reach either of the glories, or cares of a Court free from wrongs, free frō envies: Not so high, as to provoke an evil eye; not so low, as to be trodden on; I have neither feares, nor ambitions; my neighbours are my friends; my friends are my protectors; & (if I should be so unhappy, as to be the subject of maine injuries) would not stick to be mine Advocates; This favour is for those that either affect greatnesse, or groane under oppressions; I doe neither, for I live among my owne people. O Shunamite, thou shalt not escape envy! Who can hear of thine happy condition, and not say, Why am not I thus? If the world afford any perfect contentment, it is in a middle estate, equally distant from penury, from excesse; it is in a calme freedome, a secure tranquillity, a sweet fruition of our selvs, of ours; But what hold is there of these earthly things? How long is the Shunamite thus blessed with peace: stay but a while, you shal see her come on her knees to the King of Israel, pitifully complaining that she was stripped of house, and land: and now Gehezi is fain to doe that good office for her, which was not accepted from his master. Those that stand fastest upon earth have but slippery footing: no man can say that he shall not need friends. A

Modesty sealed up the lips of the good Shunamite: she was ashamed to confesse her longing: Gehezi easily guessed that her barrennesse could not but be her affliction; shee was childlesse, her husband old: Elisha gratifies her with the newes of a sonne: About this season according to the time of life, thou shalt embrace a sonne: How liberal is God by his Prophet, in giving beyond her requests: not seldome doth his bounty over-reach our thoughts, and meet us with those benefits, which wee thought too good for us to aske. Greatnesse and inexpectation makes the blessing seeme incredible, Nay, my Lord, thou man of God, doe not lie to thine hand-maid: We are never sure enough of what we desire: We are not more hard to beleeve, then loth to distrust beneficial events: She wel knew the Prophets holinesse could not stand with wilful falshood; perhaps she might think it spoken by way of tryall, not of serious affirmation; as unwilling therefore that it should not be, and willing to heare that pleasing word seconded, she saies, Doe not lie to thine hand-maid. Promises are made good, not by iteration, but by the effect; The Shunamite conceives, and bears a son, at the set season: How glad a mother she was, those know best, that have mourned under the discomfort of a sad sterility. The child growes up, and is now able to find out his father in the field, amongst his Reapers: His father now grew young again with the pleasure of his sight; and more joyed in this spring of his hopes, then in all the crops of his harvest; But what stability is there in these earthly delights? The hot beames of the Sunne beat upon that head which too much care had made tender, & delicate; The child complaines to his father, of his paine; Oh that grace could teach us, what nature teaches Infants, in all our troubles to bemoane our selves to our heavenly father! He sends him to his mother; upon her lap, about noone, the child dies; as if he would return his soul into that bosome, from which it was derived to him; The good Shunamite hath lost her sonne, her faith she had not lost; Passion hath not robbed her of her wisdome; As not distracted with an accident so sudden, so sorrowfull, she laies her dead child upon the Prophets bed, she locks the doore; she hides her griefe, lest that consternation might hinder her designe; she hastens to her husband, and (as not daring to be other then officious in so distress-full an occasion) acquaints him with her journey, (though not with the cause) requires of him both attendance and conveyance; she posts to mount Carmel; she cannot so soone find out the man of God, as he hath found her; He sees her afarre off, and like a thankfull guest, sends his servant hastily to meet her, to inquire of the health of her selfe, her husband, her childe; Her errand was not to Gehezi, it was to Elisha; no messenger shall interrupt her; no eare shall receive her complaint but the Prophets. Down she fals passionately at his feet, and, forgetting the fashion of her bashfull strangenesse, layes hold of them, whether in an humble veneration of his person, or in a fervent desire of satisfaction. Gehezi, who well knew how uncouth, how unfit this gesture of salutation was for his master, offers to remove her, and admonisheth her of her distance; The mercifull Prophet easily apprehends that no ordinary occasion could so transport a grave, and well governed matrone; as therefore pitying her unknowne passion, he bids, Let her alone, for her soul is vexed within her, and the Lord hath hid it from mee, and hath not told mee. If extremity of griefe have made her unmannerly, wise and holy Elisha knowes not how to pardon it; He dares not adde sorrow to the afflicted; hee can better beare an unseemlinesse in her greeting, then cruelty in her molestation. Great was the familiarity that the Prophet had with his God; and as friends are wont mutually to impart their counsells to each other, so had the Lord done to him; Elisha was not idle on mount Carmel; What was it that he saw not from thence? Not heaven onely, but the vvorld vvas before him, yet the Shunamites losse is concealed from him: neither doth he shame to confesse it; Oft times those that know B C A D E greater

A greater matters may yet be ignorant of the lesse: It is no disparagement to any finite creature not to know something. By her mouth will God tell the Prophet, what by vision he had not; Then she said, Did I desire a sonne of my Lord? Did I not say, doe not deceive me? Deep sorrow is sparing of words; The expostulation could not be more short, more quick, more pithy: Had I begged a sonne, perhaps my importunity might have been yeelded to, in anger; Too much desire is justly punished with losse. It is no marvell if what we wring from God, prosper not; This favour to me was of thine own motion; Thy suit, O Elisha, made me a mother: Couldst thou intend to torment me with a blessing? How much more easie had the want of a sonne been, then the mis-carriage? Barrennesse then orbation? Was there no other end of my having a son, then that I might lose him? O man of God, let me not complain of
B a cruell kindnesse; thy prayers gave me a son, let thy prayers restore him; let not my dutifull respects to thee be repaid with an aggravation of misery; give not thine handmaid cause to wish that I were but so unhappy as thou foundest me; Oh woful fruitfulnesse, if I must now say, That I had a sonne!

I know not whether the mother, or the Prophet were more afflicted, the Prophet for the mothers sake, or the mother for her owne; Not a word of reply doe we heare from the mouth of Elisha, his breath is onely spent in the remedy; Hee sends his servant with all speed, to lay his staffe upon the face of the child, charging him to avoide all the delayes of the way: Had not the Prophet supposed that staffe of his able to beate away death, why did he send it? and if upon that supposition he sent it, how was it that it failed of effect? was this act done out of humane conceit, not
C out of instinct from God? Or did the want of the mothers faith hinder the successe of that cure? She not regarding the staffe, or the man, holds fast to Elisha: No hopes of his message can loose her fingers: As the Lord liveth, and as thy soule liveth, I will not leave thee: She imagined that the servant, the staffe might be severed from Elisha, she knew that where ever the Prophet was, there was power; It is good relying on those helpes that cannot faile us.

Merit and importunity have drawn Elisha from Carmel to Shunem: He findes his lodging taken up by that pale carkasse; he shuts his doore, & falls to his prayers; this staffe of his (what ever became of the other) was long enough (he knew) to reach up to heaven to knocke at those gates, yea to wrench them open; He applies his body to those cold and senselesse limbs; By the fervour of his soule he reduces
D that soule, by the heat of his body he educeth warmth out of that corps: The child neeseth seven times, and as if his spirit had been but hid for the time, not departed, it fals to work afresh; the eyes looke up, the lippes and hands move; The mother is called in to receive a new life, in her twice-given sonne: she comes in, full of joy, full of wonder, and bowes her selfe to the ground, and fals downe before those feet, which she had so boldly laid hold of in Carmel. Oh strong faith of the Shunamite that could not be discouraged with the seizure, and continuance of death; raising up her heart still to an expectation of that life, which to the eyes of nature had beene impossible, irrevocable: Oh infinite goodnesse of the Almighty, that would not suffer such faith to be frustrate, that would rather reverse the lawes of nature, in returning a gueſt from heaven, and raising a corps from death, than the confidence of a
E beleeving heart should be disappointed.

How true an heire is Elisha of his master, not in his graces only, but in his actions? Both of them divided the waters of Iordan, the one as his last act, the other as his first: Elijahs curse was the death of the Captaines, and their troups; Elishaes curse was the death of the children: Elijah rebuked Ahab to his face; Elisha Iehoram: Elijah supplied the drought of Israel by raine from heaven; Elisha supplied the drought of the three Kings by waters gushing out of the earth; Elijah increased the oyle of the Sareptan; Elisha increased the oyle of the Prophets widow: Elijah rayſed from death the Sareptans son; Elisha the Shunamites: Both of them had one mantle, one spirit; both of them climbed up one Carmel, one heaven.

Elisha with Naaman.

OF the full showers of grace which fell upon Israel & Judah, yet some drops did light upon their neighbours: If Israel be the worse for her neereneſſe to Syria, Syria is the better for the vicinity of Israel. Amongſt the worſt of Gods enemies ſome are ſingled out for mercy. Naaman was a great Warriour, an honorable Courtier, yet a Leper; no diſeaſe incident to the body is ſo naſty, ſo loathſome, as Leproſie: Greatneſſe can ſecure no man from the moſt odious and weariſome condition; how little pleaſure did this Syrian Peere take, to be ſtooped to by others, whiles he hated to ſee himſelfe: Even thoſe that honoured him, avoided him; neither was he other then abhorred of thoſe that flattered him, yea his hand could not [illegible] to his mouth without his owne deteſtation; the baſeſt ſlave of Syria would not change skins with him, if he might have his honour to boot. Thus hath the wiſe God thought meet to ſauce the valour, dignity, renown, victories, of the famous Generall of the Syrians. Seldome ever was any man ſerved with ſimple favours; Theſe compoſitions make both our croſſes tolerable, and our bleſſings wholeſome.

The body of Naaman was not more tainted with his lepry, then his ſoul was tainted with Rimmon; and beſides his Idolatry, he was a profeſſed enemy to Israel, and ſucceſſeful in his enmity: How far doth God fetch about his purpoſes? The leproſie, the hoſtility of Naaman ſhall be the occaſions of his ſalvation; That leproſie ſhall make his ſoul ſound; That hoſtility ſhall adopt him a ſon of God; In ſome proſperous in-rodes, that the Syrians under Naamans conduct have made into the land of Israel, a little maid is taken captive; ſhe ſhall attend on Naamans wife; and ſhall ſuggeſt to her miſtreſſe the miraculous cures of Eliſha. A ſmal chink may ſerve to let in much light; Her report findes credit in the Court, and begets both a letter from the King and a journey of his Peere; whiles the Syrians thought of nothing but their booty, they bring happineſſe to the houſe of Naaman; The captivity of a poore Hebrew girle is a means to make the greateſt Lord of Syria, a ſubject to God; It is good to acquaint our children with the workes of God, with the praiſes of his Prophets. Little doe we know how they may improve this knowledge, and whither they may cary it; perhaps the remoteſt Nations may light their candle at their coale: Even the weakeſt intimatiõs may not be neglected: A child, a ſervant, a ſtrãger may ſay that, which we may bleſſe God to have heard: How well did it become the mouth of an Iſraelite to extoll a Propher; to wiſh the cure of her maſter, though an Aramite; to adviſe that journey, unto the man of God, by whom both body and ſoul might be cured: True Religion teacheth us pious and charitable reſpects to our Governours, though Aliens from the Common-wealth of God.

No man that I heare blames the credulity of Naaman; upon no other ground doth the King of Syria ſend his chiefe Peere, with his letters to the King of Iſrael; from his hands requiring the Cure: The Syrian ſuppoſed, that what ever a ſubject could doe, a Soveraigne might command; that ſuch a Prophet could neither be out of the knowledge, nor out of the obedience to his Prince; never did he dreame of any exemption, but imagining Jehoram to be no leſſe a King of Prophets, then of people, and Eliſha no leſſe a ſubject, then a Seer, he writes, Now when this letter is come to thee, behold, I have herewith ſent Naaman my ſervant to thee, that thou maiſt recover him of his leproſie. Great is the power of Princes; every mans hand is theirs, whether for skill, or for ſtrength: Beſides the eminency of their own gifts, all the ſubordinate excellencies of their ſubjects, are no leſſe at their ſervice, then if they were inherent in their perſons: Great men are wanting to their own perfections, if they do not both know, and exerciſe the graces of their inferiors.

The King of Iſrael cannot read the letter without amazement of heart, without rending of garments, & ſaies; Am I God, to kil & to make alive, that this man ſends to me, to recover a man of his leproſie? Wherefore conſider, & ſee, I pray you, how he ſeeketh a quarrell

A rell against me? If God have vouchsafed to call Kings, Gods; it well becomes Kings to call themselves, men; & to confesse the distance wherein they stand to their Maker: Man may kil, man cannot kil and make alive, yea of himself he can doe neither: with God, a Worme, or a fly may kill a man; without God no potentate can doe it: much lesse can any created power both kill, and revive: since to restore life is more then to bereave it, more then to continue it, more then to give it: And if leprosie be a death, what humane power can either inflict, or cure it? It is a trouble to a wel-affected heart to receive impossible commands: To require that of an inferiour which is proper to the highest, is a derogation from that supreame power whose property it is: Had Iehoram been truly religious, the injury done to his Maker in this motion, (as he tooke it) had more afflicted him, then the danger of his own quarrell.

B Belike, Elisha was not in the thoughts of the King of Israel: He might have heard that this Prophet had made alive one, whom he killed not: Himselfe with the two other Kings had been eye-witnesses of what Elisha could doe: yet now, the Calves of Dan and Bethel have so often taken up his heart, that there is no roome for the memory of Elisha, whom he sued to in his extremity, now his prosperity hath forgotten: Carnall hearts (when need drives them) can thinke of GOD, and his Prophet, when their turne is served, can as utterly neglect them, as if they were not.

Yet [illegible] neglect, & forgetfulnesse: He listens what is done at the Court, and finding the distresse of his Soveraigne, profers that service, which should have been required; Wherefore hast thou rent thy cloathes? Let him come now to mee, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel. It was no small fright, from
C which Elisha delivers his King: Iehoram was in awe of the Syrians, ever since their late victory, wherein his father Ahab was slaine, Israel and Judah discomfited: nothing was more dreadfull to him then the frownes of these Aramites: The quarrell which he suspected to be hatched by them, is cleared by Elisha: their Leper shall be healed; both they, and Israel shall know they have neglected a God, whose Prophet can doe wonders: Many eyes, doubtlesse, are fastened upon the issue of this message. But what state is this that Elisha takes upon him; he doth not say, I will come to him; but, Let him come now to mee: The three Kings came downe once to his Tent, it is no marvell, if he prevent not the journey of a Syrian Courtier: It well beseemes him that will be a suter for favour, to be obsequi-
D ous: We may not stand upon tearmes of our labour, or dignity, where we expect a benefit: Naaman comes richly attended with his troupes of servants and horses, and waits in his Charet at the doore of a Prophet: I doe not heare Elisha call him in; for though he were great, yet he was leprous: neither doe I see Elisha come forth to him, and receive him with such outward courtesies, as might be fit for an honourable stranger; for in those rich cloathes the Prophet saw an Aramite; and perhaps some tincture of the late-shed blood of Israel: Rather, that he might make a perfect triall of the humility of that man, whom he meanes to gratifie, and honor, after some short attendance at his door, he sends his servant with a message to that Peer, who could not but think the meanest of his retinue, a better man than Gehezies Master.

What could the Prophet have done other to the Lacquy of Naamans man? He E that would be a meet subject of mercy, must be throughly abased in his owne conceit: and must be willingly pliable to all the conditions of his humiliation: Yet, had the message caried in it either respect to the person, or probability of effect, it could not have been unwelcome, but now it sounded of nothing, but sullennesse, and unlikelihood: Goe, and wash in Iordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come againe to thee, & thou shalt be cleane: What wise man could take this for any other then a meer scorne, and mockery? Goe, wash: Alas, what can water doe? It can cleanse from filthinesse, not from leprosie: And why in Iordan? What differs that from other streames? & why just seven times? What vertue is either in that channel, or in that number? Naaman can no more put off nature then leprosie: In what a chafe did he fling away from the prophets doore, and saies, Am I comne thus far to fetch a flout from an Israelite? Is this the issue both of my journey, and the Letters of my King? Could this Prophet find no man to play upon, but Naaman? Had he meant seriously, why did he think himself too good to come forth unto me? Why did he not touch me with his hand, & blesse me with his prayers, & cure me with his blessing? Is my misery fit for his derision? If water could doe it, what needed I to come so farre for this remedy? Have I not oft done thus in vain? Have we not better streams at home, then any Israel can afford? Are not Abana and Pharphar, Rivers of Damascus, better then all the waters of Israel? Folly and Pride strive for place in a naturall heart; and it is hard to say whether is more predominant. Folly in measuring the power of Gods ordinances by the rule of humane discourse and ordinary event: pride, in a scornefull valuation of the institutions of God, in comparison of our own devices. Abana and Pharphar, two for one: Rivers, not waters; of Damascus, a stately City, and incomparable: Are they not? Who dares deny it? Better, not as good; then the waters, not the Rivers; all the waters, Iordan, and al the rest; of Israel, a beggerly Region to Damascus. No where shall we find a truer patterne of the disposition of Nature; how she is altogether led by sense, & reason; how she fondly judges of all objects by the appearance; how she acquaints her selfonly with the common rode of Gods proceedings; how she sticks to her own principles, how she misconstrues the intentions of God, how she over-conceits her own, how she disdaines the mean conditions of others, how she upbraids her opposites with the proud comparison of her own priviledges.

Nature is never but like herselfe: No marvel if carnall minds despise the foolishnesse of preaching, the simplicity of Sacraments, the homelinesse of ceremonies, the seeming inefficacy of censures: These men looke upon Iordan with Syrian eyes; One drop of whose water set apart by divine ordination, hath more vertue, then all the streames of Abana, and Pharphar.

It is a good matter for a man to be attended with wise & faithful followers: Many a one hath had better counsell from his heeles, then from his elbowes: Naamans servants were his best friends: they came to him, and spake to him, and said, My Father, If the Prophet had bid thee doe some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it? How much rather then, when he saith to thee? Wash, and be cleane? These men were servants not of the humour, but of the profit of their master: Some servile Spirits would have cared onely to sooth up, not to benefit their Governour, and would have encouraged his rage, by their own: Sir, will you take this at the hand of a base fellow? was ever man thus flouted? Will you let him carie it away thus? Is any harmelesse anger sufficient revenge for such an insolence? Give us leave at least to pul him out by the eares, and force him to doe that by violence, which he would not doe out of good manners. Let our fingers teach this sawcy Prophet what it is to offer an affrõt to a Prince of Syria: But these men loved more their masters health, then his passiõ; & had rather therefore to advise, then flatter: to draw him to good, then follow him to evil: Since it was a Prophet from whom he received this prescription, they perswade him not to despise it; intimating there could be no fault in the sleightnesse of the receit, so long as there was no defect of power in the commãder; that the vertue of the cure should be in his obedience, not in the nature of the remedy: They perswade, and prevaile. Next to the Prophet Naaman may thank his servants that he is not a Leper. He goes down (upon their entreaty) and dips seven times in Iordan, his flesh riseth, his Leprosy vanisheth: Not the unjust fury and techinesse of the patient shall crosse the cure: lest whiles God is severe, the Prophet should be discredited. Long enough might Naaman have washed there in vaine, if Elisha had not sent him: Many a Leper hath bathed in that stream, & hath come forth no lesse impure: It is the word, the ordinance of the Almighty which puts efficacy into those means which of themselvs are both impotent and improbable: What can our Font doe to the washing away of sin? If Gods institution shal put vertue into our Iordan it shall scoure off the spirituall leprosies of our hearts; and shall more cure the soule, then cleanse the face.

How joyfull is Naaman to see this change of his skin, in this renovatiõ of his flesh,

of

A of his life: Never did his heart find such warmth of inward gladnesse, as in this streame.

Upon the sight of his recovery, he doth not poste home to the Court, or to his family, to cal for witnesses, for partners of his joy; but thankfully returns to the Prophet, by whose meanes he received this mercy: He comes back with more contentment then he parted with rage: Now will the man of God be seen of that recovered Syrian, whom he would not see leprous; His presence shall be yeelded to the gratulation which was not yeelded to the suit: purposely did Elisha forbeare before, that he might share no part of the praise of this work with his Maker; that God might be so much more magnified, as the meanes were more weake and despicable. The miracle hath his due work. First, doth Naaman acknowledge the God that
B wrought it; then the Prophet, by whom he wrought it: Behold, now I know there is no God in all the earth, but in Israel. O happy Syrian, that was at once cured of his leprosie, and his mis-prison of God: Naaman was to wise, too think that either the water had cured him, or the man: he saw a divine power working in both: such as he vainly sought from his heathen Deities: with the heart therefore he beleeves, with the mouth he confesses.

Whiles he is thus thankful to the author of his cure, he is not unmindful of the instrument. Now therefore, I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant. Naaman came richly furnished with ten talents of silver, six thousand peeces of gold, ten changes of raiment: All these and many more would the Syrian Peere have gladly given to be delivered from so noysome a disease: no marvel if he importunately offer some part
C of them to the Prophet, now that he is delivered; some testimony of thankfulnesse did well, where all earthly recompence was too short: The hands of this man were no lesse full of thanks, then his mouth. Dry and barren professions of our obligations where is power to requite, are unfit for noble and ingenuous spirits.

Naaman is not more franke in offering his gratuity, then Elisha vehement in refusing it, As the Lord liveth, before whō I stand, I wil receive none. Not that he thought the Syrian gold impure: Not that he thought it unlawfull to take up a gift, where he hath laid downe a benefit: But the Prophet wil remit of Naamans purse, that he may win of his soul: The man of God would have his new Convert see cause to be more enamoured of true piety; wch teacheth her Clients to contemne those worldly riches and glories, which base worldlings adore: and would have him think, that
D these miraculous powers are so far transcending the valuatiō of al earthly pelf, that those glittering treasures are worthy of nothing, but contempt, in respect thereof: Hence is it, that he who refused not the Shunamites table, and stoole, & candlestick, will not take Naamans present: there is much use of godly discretion in directing us when to open, when to shut our hands!

He that will not be allowed to give, desires yet to take it: Shall there not, I pray thee, be given to thy servant two mules load of earth? For thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt-offering, nor sacrifice to other gods, but unto the Lord. Israelitish mold lay open to his cariage, without leave of Elisha: but Naaman regards not to take it, unlesse it may be given him, and given him by the Prophets hand: Wel did
E this Syrian find that the man of God had given a supernaturall vertue to the water of Israel, and therefore supposed he might give the like to his earth: Neither would any earth serve him but Elishaes; else the mold of Israel had been more properly craved of the King then the Prophet of Israel.

Doubtlesse it was devotion that moved this suit: The Syrian saw God had a propriety in Israel, and imagines that he will be best pleased with his owne; On the sudden was Naaman halfe a Proselyte, still here was a weak knowledge with strong intentions: He will sacrifice to the Lord; but where? in Syria, not in Hierusalem: Not the mold, but the Alter is that God respects; which he hath allowed no where but in his chosē Sion. This honest Syrian wil be removing God home to his Country; he should have resolved to remove his home, to God; And though he vows to offer no sacrifice to any other God, yet he craves leave to offer an outward courtesie to Rimmon; though not for the Idols sake, yet for his Masters: In this thing

the Lord pardon thy ſervant, that when my maſter goeth into the houſe of Rimmon, to worſhip there, and he leaneth on my hand, and I bow my ſelfe in the houſe of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy ſervant in this thing. Naaman goes away reſolute to profeſſe himſelf an Iſraelite for Religion; all the Syrian Court ſhall know that he ſacrifices upon Iſraelitiſh earth, to the God of Iſrael: they ſhall heare him proteſt to have neither heart, nor knee for Rimmon: If he muſt goe into the houſe of that Idoll, it ſhall be as a ſervant, not as a ſuppliant; his duty to his Maſter ſhal cary him, not his devotiō to his Maſters god; If his maſter goe to worſhip there, not he, neither doth he ſay, When I bow my ſelfe to the Image of Rimmon, but, in the houſe: he ſhall bow, to be leaned upon, not to adore; yet had not Naaman thought this a fault, he had not craved a pardon; his heart told him that a perfect convert ſhould not have abidd the roof, the ſight, the ayre of Rimmon; that his obſervance of an earthly maſter ſhould not draw him to the ſemblance of an act of outward obſervance to the rivall of his maſter in Heaven, that a ſincere deteſtation of Idolatry could not ſtand with ſo unſeaſonable a courteſie.

Farre therefore is Naaman from being a patterne, ſave of weakneſſe; ſince he is yet more then halfe a Syrian, ſince he willingly accuſes himſelfe, and in ſtead of defending, deprecates his offence; It is not for us to expect a full ſtature in the cradle of converſion. As nature, ſo grace rises by many degrees, to perfection; Leproſie was in Naaman cured at once, not corruption.

The Prophet, as glad to ſee him but thus forward, diſmiſſes him with a civill valediction; had an Iſraelite made this ſuit, he had been anſwered, with a check; thus much from a Syrian was worthy a kind farewell; They are parted.

Gehezi cannot thus take his leave; his heart is made up in the rich cheſts of Naaman, and now he goes to fetch it; The Prophet and his man had not looked with the ſame eyes upon the Syrian treaſure; the one with the eye of contempt, the other with the eye of admiration, and covetous deſire. The diſpoſition of the maſter may not be meaſured by the mind, by the act of his ſervant; Holy Eliſha may be attended by a falſe Gehezi: No examples, no counſells will prevaile with ſome hearts; who would not have thought that the follower of Eliſha could be no other then a Saint? yet, after the view of all thoſe miracles, this man is a mirrour of worldlineſſe. He thinkes his maſter either too ſimple, or too kind, to refuſe ſo juſt a preſent from a Syrian; himſelfe will be more wiſe, more frugall; De ure haſtens his pace, he doth not goe, but run after his booty; Naaman ſees him, and as true nobleneſſe is ever courteous, alights from his Charet, to meet him; The great Lord of Syria comes forth of his Coach to ſalute a Prophets ſervant: not fearing that he can humble himſelf over-much to one of Eliſha's family: He greets Gehezi with the ſame word wherewith he lately was dimitted by his maſter, Is it peace? So ſodden a meſſenger might ſeeme to argue ſome change. He ſoone receives from the breathleſſe bearer newes of his maſters health, and requeſt: All is well, my maſter hath ſent me, ſaying, Behold, even now there be come to me from mount Ephraim, two young men of the ſonnes of the Prophets: Give me, I pray thee, a talent of ſilver, and two changes of garments. Had Gehezi craved a reward in his owne name calling for the fee of the Prophets ſervant, as the gaine, ſo the offence had been the leſſe; now reaching at a greater ſumme, he belies his Maſter, robs Naaman, burdens his owne ſoule. What a ſound tale hath the craft of Gehezi deviſed? Of the number, the place, the quality, the age of his Maſters gueſts? That he might ſet a fair colour upon that pretended requeſt: ſo proportioning the value of his demand, as might both enrich himſelf and yet well ſtand with the moderation of his maſter. Love of money can never keep good quarter with honeſty, with innocence: Covetouſneſſe never lodged in the heart alone; If it find not, it will breed wickedneſſe. What a mint of fraud there is in a worldly beaſt? How readily can it coine ſubtile falſhood for an advantage?

How thankfully liberall was this noble Syrian; Gehezi could not be more eager in taking then he was in giving; As glad of ſo happy an occaſiō of leaving any peece of his treaſure behind him, he forces two talents upon the ſervant of Eliſha: and bindes

A binds them in two bags, and laies them upon two of his own servants; his owne trayne shall yeeld Porters to Gehezi: Cheerefulnesse is the just praise of our beneficence: Bountifull mindes are as zealous in over-paying good turnes, as the niggardly are in scanting retributions.

What projects doe we think Gehezi had all the way? How did he please himselfe with the waking dreames of purchases, of traffique, of [illegible] and now, when they are come to the tower, he gladly disburthens, & dismisses the two Syrian attendants, and hides their load, & wipes his mouth, & stands boldly before that Master, whom he had so foully abused: Oh Gehezi! where didst thou think God was this while? Couldst thou thus long poure water upon the hands of Elisha, and be either ignorant, or regardlesse of that undeceivable eye of providence, which was ever fixed upon thy hands, thy tongue, thy heart? Couldst thou thus hope to blind the eyes of a Seer? Heare then thy inditement, thy sentence, from him, whom thou thoughtest to have mocked with thy concealement, Whence comest thou Gehezi? Thy servant went no whither. He that had begun a lye to Naaman, ends it to his Master: who so lets his tongue once loose to a wilfull untruth, soon growes impudent in multiplying falsehoods. Of what metal is the forehead of that man, that dares lye to a Prophet? What is this, but to [illegible] senses? Went not my heart with thee when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee? Didst thou not till now know, O Gehezi, that Prophets have spirituall eyes, which are not confined to bodily prospects?

Didst thou not know, that their hearts were often, where they were not? Didst thou not know that thy secretest waies were over-looked by invisible witnesses? Heare then and be convinced. Haber thou wentest, thus thou saidst, thus thou didst, thus thou speedst. What answer was now here but confusion? Miserable Gehezi, how didst thou stand pale and trembling before the dreadfull tribunall of thy severe Master, looking for the wofull sentence of some grievous judgement for so hainous an offence? Is this a time to receive money, & to receive garments, and (which thou hadst already purchased in thy conceit) Olive-yards, & Vine-yards, and Sheep, and Oxen, and Men-servants, and maid-servants? Did my mouth refuse, that thy hands might take? Was I so carefull to win honour to my God, & credit to my profession, by denying these Syrian presents, that thou mightst dash both in receiving them? Was there no way to enrich thy self, but by belying thy Master, by disparaging this holy function of the Prophets of a new convert? Since thou wouldst needs therefore take part of Naamans treasure, thou shalt part with him in his Leprosie, The leprosie of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever. Oh heavy talents of Gehezi! Oh the horror of this D one unchangeable suit, which shall never be but loathsomely white, noysomely uncleane! How much better had been a light purse, and an homely coat, with a sound body, a cleane soul! Too late doth that wretched man now finde, that he hath loaded himself with a curse, that he hath clad himself with shame! His sin shal be read ever in his face, in his seed; all passengers, all posterities shall now say, Behold the characters of Gehezies covetousnesse, fraud, sacriledge! The act overtakes the word, He went out of his presence a Leper as white as snow. It is a wofull exchange that Gehezi hath made with Naaman; Naaman came a Leper, returned a Disciple; Gehezi came a Disciple, returned a Leper: Naaman left behind both his disease and mony, Gehezi takes up both his mony and his disease: Now shall Gehezi never look upon himself, E but he shal think of Naaman whose skin is transferred upo him with those Talents; and shall weare out the rest of his daies in shame, and pain, and sorrow: His teares may wash off the guilt of his sin, shall not (like another Jordan) wash off his Leprosie, that shall ever remain as an hereditary monument of divine severity. This son of the Prophets shall more loud and lively preach the Justice of God by his face, then others by their tongue. Happy was it for him, if whiles his skin was snow-white with Leprosie, his humble soul were washed white as snow with the water of true repentance.

Elisha

Eliſha raiſing the Iron; blinding the Aſſyrians.

2. Kin. 6.

THere was no loſſe of Gehezi; when he was gone, the Prophets increaſed: an ill man in the Church, is but like ſome ſhrubby tree in a Garden, whoſe ſhade keeps better plants from growing: A blank doth better in a roome, then an ill filling: The view of Gods juſt judgements doth rather draw clients unto him, then alienate them: The Kings of Iſrael had ſucceeded in Idolatry, and hate of ſincere Religion; yet the Prophets multiply: Perſecution enlargeth the bounds of the Church. Theſe very tempeſtuous ſhowers bring up flowers and hearbs in abundance. There would have been neither ſo many, nor ſo zealous Prophets in the languiſhment of peace: Beſides, what marvell is it, if the immediate ſucceſſion of two ſuch noble Leaders, as Elijah and Eliſha, eſtabliſhed and augmented Religion, and bred multitudes of Prophets? Rather who can marvell, upon the knowledge of all their miracles, that all Iſrael did not propheſie? It is a good hearing, that the Prophets want elbow-roome; out of their ſtore, not out of the envy of neighbours, or incompetency of proviſion: Where viſion failes, the people periſh, they are are bleſſed, where it abounds.

When they found themſelves ſtraitned, they did not preſume to carve for themſelves, but they craved the leave, the counſell of Eliſha: Let us goe, we pray thee, unto Iordan, and take thence every man a beame, and let us make us a place where we may dwell. And he ſaid, Go ye. It well becomes the Sons of the Prophets, to enterpriſe nothing without the allowance of their Superiours. Here was a building towards, none of the curiouſeſt: I doe not ſee them making meanes for the procurement of ſome cunning artificers, nor for the conquiſition of ſome coſtly marbles, & Cedars, but every man ſhall hew, and ſquare, and frame his own beame. No nice termes were ſtood upon by theſe ſons of the Prophets. Their thoughts were fixed upon the perfection of a ſpirituall building: As an homely roofe may ſerve them, ſo their own hands ſhall raiſe it. The fingers of theſe contemplative men did not ſcorne the Axe, and Mallet, and Cheſell: It was better being there then in Obadiahs Cave; and they that dwell now contentedly under rude ſtickes, will not refuſe the ſquared ſtones, and poliſhed contignations of better times. They ſhall be ill teachers of others, that have not learned both to want, and to abound.

The Maſter of this ſacred Society, Eliſha, is not ſtately, nor auſtere: he gives not only paſſage to this motiō of his Collegiates, but aſſiſtance. It was fit the ſons of the Prophets ſhould have convenience of dwelling, though not pomp, not coſtlineſſe. They fall to their work; No man goes ſlackly about the building of his own houſe: One of them more regarding the tree then the toole, lets falls the head of the Ax into the river: Poore men are ſenſible of ſmall loſſes: He makes his moan to Eliſha, Alas Maſter, for it was borrowed, Had the Axe been his own, the trouble had been the leſſe to forgoe it; therefore doth the miſcariage afflict him becauſe it was of a borrowed Ax. Honeſt mindes are more careful of what they have by loane then by propriety: In lending there is a truſt, which a good heart cannot diſappoint without vexation. Alas poore novices of the Prophet, they would be building, and were not worth their axes: if they would give their labor, they muſt borrow their inſtrumēts.

Their wealth was ſpirituall: Outward poverty may well ſtand with inward riches: He is rich, not that hath the world, but that can contemne it.

Eliſha loves and cheriſhes this juſt ſimplicity; rather will he work a miracle, than a borrowed axe ſhall not be reſtored: It might eaſily be imagined, he that could raiſe up the iron out of the bottome of the water, could tell where it fell in; yet even that powerfull hand calls for direction: In this one point, the ſonne of the Prophet knowes more then Eliſha: The notice of particularities is neither fit for a creature, nor communicable: ameane man may beſt know his own caſe: This Novice better knowes where his ax fell, then his maſter: his maſter knowes better how to get it out, then he. There is no reaſon to be given of ſupernaturall actions. The Prophet

A phet borrowes an axe to cut an helve for the lost axe: Why did he not make use of that handle which had cast the head? Did he hold it unworthy of respect, for that it had abandoned the metal wherewith it was trusted? Or did he make choice of a new stick, that the miracle might be more clear & unquestionable? Divine power goes a contrary way to Art: We first would have procured the head of the axe, and then would have fitted it with a helve: Elisha fits the head to the helve, and causeth the wood, which was light and knew not how to sink, to fetch up the iron, which was heavy, and naturally uncapable of supernatatiō. Whether the metal were stripped of the naturall waight by the same power which gave it being; or whether, retaining the wonted poise, it was raised up by some spirituall operation; I enquire not Only I see it swim like corke upon the streame of Iordan, and move towards the
B hand that lost it. What creature is not willing to put off the properties of nature at the command of the God of nature? O God how easie is it for thee, when this hard and heavy heart of mine is sunke down into the mud of the world, to fetch it up againe by thy mighty Word, and cause it to float upon the streames of life, and to see the face of heaven again.

Yet still doe the sides of Israel complaine of the thornes of Aram; The children of Ahab rue their fathers unjust mercy: From an enemy, it is no making question whether of strength or wyle: The King of Syria consults with his servants, where to encampe for his greatest advantage; their opinion is not more required, then their secresie. Elisha is a thousand scouts: He sends word to the King of Israel of the projects, of the removes of his enemy. More then once had Iehoram saved both his life,
C and his Hoast, by these close admonitions. It is well that in some thing yet a Prophet may be obeyed. What strange State service was this which Elisha did, besides the spirituall? The King, the people of Israel owe themselves, and their safety to a despised Prophet. The man of God knew, and felt them Idolaters, yet how carefull and vigilant is he for their rescue? If they were bad, yet they were his owvn: If they vvere bad, yet not al; God had his number amongst their vvorst: If they vvere bad, yet the Syrians were vvorse. The Israelites mis-vvorshipped the true God, the Syrians vvorshipped a false. That (if it vvere possible) he might vvin them, he will preserve them; and if they vvill needs be vvanting to God, yet Elisha vvill not be wanting to them; their impiety shall not make him undutifull.

D There cannot be a juster cause of displeasure, then the disclosing of those secret counsels, vvhich are laid up in our eare, in our breast. The King of Syria, not vvithout reason, stomacks this supposed treachery. What Prince can bear, that an adverse povver should have a party, a Pensionary in his ovvn Court? Hovv famous vvas Elisha even in forain Regions? Besides Naaman, others of the Syrian Nobility take notice of the miraculous faculties of this Prophet of Israel; He is accused for this secret intelligence. No words can escape him, though spoken in the bed-chamber. O Syrian, whosoever thou wert, thou saidst not enough: if thy [illegible] but whisper in thine eare, if he smother his words within his own lips, if he do but speak within his own bosome, Elisha knows it from an infallible information. What counsel is it O God, that can be hid from thee? what counsel is it that thou wilt hide from thy Seer? Even this very word that accuseth the Prophet, is known to the accused. He
E heares this tale vvhiles it is in telling; he heares the plot for his apprehension. Hovv ill do the projects of vvicked men hang together? They that confesse Elisha knows their secretest vvords, do yet confer to take him. There are spies upon him, whose espials have moved their anger, & admiratiō. He is descryed to be in Dothan a smal tovvn of Manasses; A vvhole Army is sent thither to surprise him: The opportunity of the night is chosen for the exploit. There shalbe no wāt either in the nūber, or valour, or secresie of these conspired troops: & novv vvhen they have fully girt in the village vvith a strong & exquisite sieg, they make thēselvs sure of Elisha, & please thēselvs to think hovv they have incaged the miserable Prophet, hovv they should take him at unawares in his bed, in the midst of a secure dream: how they should cary him fetter'd to their King; what thāks they should have for so welcō a prisoner.

The successor of Gehezi riseth early in the morning, & sees al the City encompas-

sed with a fearefull hoast, of foot, horse, charets. His eyes could meet with nothing but woods of pikes, and wals of harnesse, and lustre of metals; & now he runs in affrighted to his Master: Alas, my master what shall we doe? He had day enough to see they were enemies that environed them, to see himselfe helplesse, & desperate; and hath onely so much life left in him as to lament himselfe to the partner of his misery. He cannot flee from his new Master, if he would; he runs to him with a wofull clamour, Alas, my Master, what shall we doe?

Oh the undaunted courage of faith! Elisha sees all this, and sits in his chamber so secure, as if these had onely beene the guard of Israel, for his safe protection. It is an hard precept that he gives his servant, Feare not: As wel might he have bid him, not to see, when he saw, as not to feare, when he saw so dreadfull a spectacle: The operations of the senses are no lesse certaine, then those of the affections, where the objects are no lesse proper: But the taske is easie if the next word may find beleefe, [For there are moe with us, then with them.] Multitude, & other outward probabilities doe both lead the confidence of natural hearts, and fixe it. It is for none but a David to say, I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against mee round about. Flesh and blood riseth, and falleth, according to the proportion of the strength, or weakenesse of apparent meanes.

Elishaes man lookt about him, yet his Master praies, Lord open his eys that they may see. Naturally we see not, whiles we doe see: Every thing is so seene, as it is. Bodily eyes discerne bodily objects, onely spirituall can see the things of God: Some men want both eyes & light. Elishaes servant had eyes, wanted illumination: No sooner were his eyes open, then he saw the mountain ful of horses, & charets of fire round about Elisha. They were there before, (neither doth Elisha pray that those troupes may be gathered, but that they may be seene) not till now were they descryed. Invisible armies guard the servants of God, whiles they seeme most forsaken of earthly aide, most exposed to certaine dangers: If the eyes of our faith be as open as those of our sense, to see Angels as wel as Syrians, we cannot be appalled with the most unequall tearmes of hostility. Those blessed Spirits are ready either to rescue our bodies, or to cary up our soules to blessednesse; whither ever shall be injoyned by their Maker: there is just comfort in both, in either.

Both those Charets that came to fetch Elijah, & those that came to defend Elisha, were fiery: God is not lesse lovely to his own, in the midst of his judgements, then he is terrible to his enemies, in the demonstration of his mercies. Thus guarded, it is no marvell if Elisha dare walk forth into the midst of the Syrians. Not one of those heavenly Presidiaries struck a stroke for the Prophet; neither doth hee require their blowes, onely he turnes his prayer to his God, and saies, Smite this people, I pray thee, with blindnesse. With no other then deadly intentions did these Aramites come down to Elisha, yet doth not he say, Smite them with the Sword, but, Smite them with blindnesse: All the evil he wisheth to them, is their repentance; There was no way to see their error, but by blindnesse. He that prayed for the opening of his Servants eyes, to see his safe-guard, praies for the blinding of his enemies, that they might not see to doe hurt.

As the eyes of Elishaes servant were so shut, that they saw not the Angels, when they saw the Syrians: so the eyes of the Syrians shall be likewise shut, that when they see the man, they shal not see the Prophet. To al other objects their eyes are cleare, onely to Elisha they shall be blind, blind not through darknesse, but through misknowledge: They shall see, and mistake both the person and place. He that made the senses, can either hold, or delude them at pleasure: How easily can he offer to the sight other representations, then those which arise from the visible matter, and make the heart to beleeve them?

Justly now might Elisha say, This is not the way, neither is this the City, wherein Elisha shall be descryed. He was in Dothan, but not as Elisha, he shall not be found but in Samaria; neither can they have any guide to him, but himselfe. No sooner are they come into the streets of Samaria, then their eyes have leave to know both the place & the Prophet. The first sight they have of themselvs, is in the trap of Israel, in the jawes

A jawes of death: those ſtately Palaces, which they now wonder at unwillingly, carry no reſemblance to them, but of their graves: Every Iſraelite ſeemes an executioner, every houſe a Jayle, every beame a Gibbet: And now they looke upon Eliſha transformed from their guide, to their common murderer, with horror and paleneſſe: It is moſt juſt with God to intangle the plotters of wickednesſe, in their owne ſnare.

How glad is a mortall enemy to ſnatch at all advantages of revenge? Never did the King of Iſrael ſee a more pleaſing ſight, then ſo many Syrian throats at his mercy: and as loth to loſe ſo faire a day, (as if his fingers itched to be dip't in blood) he ſaies, My father, ſhall I ſmite, ſhall I ſmite them? The repetition argued deſire, the compellation, reverence: Not without allowance of a Prophet, would the King of Iſrael lay his hand upon an enemy, ſo miraculouſly trained home: His heart was ſtil foule with
B idolatry, yet would he not taint his hand with forbidden blood: Hypocriſie will be ſtill ſcrupulous in ſomething, and in ſome awfull reſtraints is a perfect counterfeit of conſcience.

The charitable Prophet ſoone gives an angry prohibition of ſlaughter; Thou ſhalt not ſmite them: Wouldſt thou ſmite thoſe whom thou haſt taken captive, with thy ſword, and with thy bow? As if he ſaid, Theſe are Gods captives, not thine; and if they were thine own, their blood could not be ſhed without cruelty: though in the hot chaſes of war, executions may be juſtifiable; yet in the coolneſſe of deliberation, it can be no other then inhumane, to take thoſe lives which have been yeelded to mercy: But here, thy bow and thy ſword are guiltleſſe of the ſucceſſe; only a ſtrange providence of the Almighty hath caſt them into thine hands, whom neither thy force, nor thy
C fraud could have compaſſed: If it be victory thou aimeſt at, overcome them with kindneſſe: Set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink: Oh noble revēge of Eliſha, to feaſt his perſecutors! To provide a Table for theſe, who had provided a grave for him: Theſe Syrians came to Dothan ful of bloody purpoſes to Eliſha: he ſends them from Samaria full of good cheare, and jollity. Thus, thus ſhould a Prophet puniſh his purſuers: No vengeance but this is heroicall, and fit for Chriſtian imitation: If thine enemy hunger, give him bread to eat, if he thirſt, give him water to drink: For thou ſhalt heap coales of fire upon his head; and the Lord ſhall reward thee: Be not overcome with evil, but overcome evill with good.

The King of Iſrael hath done that by his feaſt, which he could not have done by his ſword; The bands of Syria will no more come by way of ambuſh, or incurſion,
D into the bounds of Iſrael. Never did a charitable act goe away without the retribution of a bleſſing. In doing ſome good to our enemies, we doe moſt good to our ſelves; God cannot but love in us this imitation of his mercy, who bids his Sun ſhine, and his rain fall where he is moſt provoked; and that love is never fruitleſſe.

The Famine of Samaria releeved.

NOt many good turnes are written in Marble; ſoone have theſe Syrians forgotten the mercifull beneficence of Iſrael: After the forbearance of E ſome hoſtile inroade, all the forces of Syria are muſtered againſt Iſheram: That very Samaria which had releeved the diſtreſſed Aramites, is by the Aramites beſieged, and is afamiſhed by thoſe, whom it had fed. The famine within the walls was more terrible then the ſword without. Their worſt enemy was ſhut within; and could not be diſlodged of their owne bowels: Whither hath the Idolatry of Iſrael brought them? Before, they had been ſcourged with war, with drought, with dearth, as with ſingle cord; they remain incorrigible, and now God twiſts two of theſe bloody laſhes together, and galls them even to death: there needs no other executioners then their own mawes. Thoſe things which in their nature were not edible, (at leaſt, to an Iſraelite) were now both deare, and dainty, the Aſſe was (beſides the untoothſomneſſe) an impure creature: that which the law of Ceremonies had made uncleane, the law of neceſſity had made delicate and precious: the bones of ſo carrion an head could not be picked for leſſe then foure hundred peeces of silver: neither was this scarcity of victuals only, but of all other necessaries for humane use; that the belly might not complaine alone, the whole man was equally pinched. A

The King of Israel is neither exempted from the judgment, nor yet yeelds under it: He walks upon the walls of his Samaria, to over-see the Watches set, the Engines ready, the Guards changed, together with the posture of the enemy; when a woman cryes to him out of the City, Help my Lord, O King: Next to God what refuge have we in all our necessities, but his Anointed? Earthly Soveraignty can aid us in the case of the injustice of men, but what can it doe against the judgements of God? If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I help thee? out of the barn-floor, or out of the wine-presse? Even the greatest powers must stoop to afflictions in themselves; how should they be able to prevent them in others? To sue for aid where is an utter impotence of redresse, is but to upbraid the weaknesse, and aggravate the misery of those whom we implore. Iehoram mistakes the suit: The suppliant calls to him for a woful peece of justice: Two mothers have agreed to eat their sons; the one hath yeelded hers to be boyled and eaten; the other, after she hath taken her part of so prodigious a bargain, with-draws her child, and hides him from the knife; hunger and envy make the Plaintiffe importunate; and now she craves the benefit of Royall Justice. She that made the first motion, with-holds her part of the bargaine, and flyes from that promisse, whose trust had made this mother childlesse. Oh the direfull effects of famine, that turnes off all respects of nature, and gives no place to horror, causing the tender mother to lay her hands, yea, her teeth upon the fruit of her own body; and to receive that into her stomack, which she hath brought forth of her wombe: What should Iehoram doe? The match was monstrous: The challenge was just, yet unnaturall: This complainant had purchased one halfe of the living childe, by the one half of hers, dead. The mother of the surviving Infant is pressed by covenant, by hunger; restrained by nature. To force a mother to deliver up her childe to voluntary slaughter, had been cruel: To force a debter to pay a confessed arrerage, seemed but equal: If the remaining child be not dressed for food, this mother of the devoured child is both robbed, and affamished: If he be, innocent blood is shed by authority. It is no marvell if the question astonished the Judge; not so much for the difficulty of the demand, as the horror of the occasion; to what lamentable distresse did Iehoram find his people driven? Not without cause did the King of Israel rend his garments, and shew his sackcloth; wel might he see his people branded with that ancient curse w^ch God had denounced against the rebellious: The Lord shall bring a Nation against thee of a fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young; And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates; And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons, and of thy daughters: The tender and delicate woman, her eyes shal be evill towards her young one that commeth out from between her feet, and toward the children which she shall beare: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege & straitnesse. He mournes for the plague, he mournes not for the cause of this plague, his sin, and theirs: I find his sorrow, I find not his repentance. The worst man may grieve for his smart, only the good heart grieves for his offence; In stead of being penitent, Iehoram is furious, and turnes his rage from his sins, against the Prophet; God doe so to me and more also, if the head of Elisha, the son of Shaphat, shall stand on him this day: Alas, what hath the righteous done? Perhaps Elisha (that we may imagine some colours of this displeasure) fore-threatned this judgement; but they deserved it: perhaps he might have averted it by his prayers; their unrepentance disabled him: Perhaps he perswaded Iehoram to hold out the siege; though through much hardnesse: he fore-saw the deliverance. In all this how hath Elisha forfeited his head? All Israel did not afford an head so guiltlesse, as this that was destined to slaughter. This is the fashion of the world; the lewd blames the innocent, and will revenge their own sins upon others uprightnesse. B C D E

In the midst of all this sad estate of Samaria, and these stormes of Iehoram, the Prophet sits quietly in his own house, amongst his holy Consorts; bewailing no doubt both the sins, and misery of their people; and prophetically conferring of the issue; when

A when suddenly God reveales to him the bloody intent, and message of Iehoram, and he at once reveals it to his fellows. See yee how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head. Oh the unimitable liberty of a Prophet! The same God that shewed him his danger, suggested his words; He may be bold, where we must be awfull: Still is Naboths blood laid in Iehorams dish. The foule fact of Ahab blemisheth his Posterity, and now when the son threats violence to the innocent, murder is objected to him as hereditary.

He that fore-saw his own perill, provides for his safety; [Shut the doore and hold him fast at the doore.] No man is bound to tender his throat to an unjust stroke: This bloody commission was prevented by a propheticall fore-sight: The same eye that saw the executioner comming to smite him, saw also the King hasting after him, to

B stay the blow: The Prophet had been no other then guilty of his own blood, if he had not reserved himself a while, for the refcue of authority: Oh the inconstancy of carnall hearts! It was not long since Iehoram could say to Elisha, My father, shall I smite them? now he is ready to smite him as an enemy, whom he honoured as a father: Yet even his lips had no sooner given sentence of death against the Prophet, then his feet flie to see it: It should seem that Elisha, upon the challenges & expostulations of Iehoram, neglecting a second time a perswasive message to the King of Israel, yet a while to wait patiently upon God for his deliverance: The discontented Prince flies out in an unpatient rage, Behold this evill is of the Lord, what should I wait for the Lord any longer? Oh the desperate resolutions of impatient minds! They have stinted God both for his time and his measure, if he exceed either, they either turne their backs

C upon him, or fly in his face: The position was true, the inference deadly: All that evill was of the Lord; they deserved it; he sent it: What then? It should have beene therefore argued, He that sent it, can remove it: I will wait upon his mercy, under whose justice I suffer: Impatience and distrust shall but aggravate my judgement: It is the Lord, let him doe what he will: But now to despaire because God is just, to defie mercy because it lingers, to reject God for correction, it is a presumptuous madnesse, an impious pettishnesse.

Yet in spight of all these provocations both of King, and people, Elisha hath good newes for Iehoram: Thus saith the Lord, To morrow about this time shall a measure of fine flowre be sold for a Shekel, and two measures of Barly for a Shekel in the gate of Samaria: Miserable Israel now sees an end of this hard triall; One dayes patience shall

D free them both of siege, and famine. Gods deliverances may over-stay our expectation, not the due period of his own counsels. Oh infinite mercy, when man sayes, No longer, God sayes, To morrow: As if he would condescend where he might judge; and would please them who deserved nothing but punishment. The word seemed not more comfortable, then incredible: A Lord on whose hand the King leaned, answered the man of God, and said, Behold, if the Lord would make windowes in heaven, might this thing be? Prophecies, before they be fulfilled, are riddles; no spirit can areed them, but that by which they are delivered. It is a foolish and injurious infidelity to question a possibility, where we know the message is Gods: How easie is it for that omnipotent hand to effect those things, which surpasse all the reach of humane conceit? Had God intended a miraculous multiplication, was it not as easie for him to in-

E crease the corn or meale of Samaria, as the widowes oyle? was it not as easie for him to give plenty of victuals without opening the windows of heaven, as to give plenty of water without wind or rain? The Almighty hates to be distrusted: This Peer of Israel shall rue his unbeleef; Behold, thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof: The sight shall be yeelded for conviction, the fruition shall be denied for punishment: Well is that man worthy to want the benefit which he would not beleeve: Who can pity to see infidelity excluded from the blessings of earth, from the glory of heaven?

How strange a choice doth God make of the intelligencers of so happy a change: Foure Lepers sit at the entring of the Gate, they see nothing but death before them, famine within the wals, the enemy, without: The election is wofull, at last they resolve upon the lesser evill, Famine is worse then the Syrian; In the famine there is certainty of perishing; amongst the Syrians, hazzard: Perhaps the enemy may have some pity, hunger hath none: and, were the death equally certain, it were more easie to die by the sword, then by famine: upon this deliberation they come down into the Syrian campe, to find either speed of mercy, or dispatch. Their hunger would not give them respight till morning: By twi-light are they faine upon the uttermost tents: Behold, there was no man; They marvell at the silence, and solitude, they look, and listen; the noyse of their own feet affrighted thē; their guilty hearts supplied the Syrians; and expected fearfully those which were as fearefully fled: How easily can the Almighty confound the power of the strong, the policy of the wise? God puts a Panick terror into the hearts of the proud Syrians; he makes them heare a noise of charets, and a noise of horses, even the noise of a great hoast; They say one to other, Loe the King of Israel hath hired against us the Kings of the Hittites, and the Kings of the Egyptians, to come upon us: they arise therefore in a confused rout, and leaving all their substance behind them, flee for their lives. Not long before, Elishaes servant saw charets and horses, but heard none; Now, these Syrians hear charets and horses, but see none. That sight comforted his heart, this sound dismaied theirs: The Israelites heard no noyse within the wals, the Lepers heard no noise without the gates; Only the Syrians heard this noise in their camp: What a scorn doth God put upon these presumptuous Aramites? He will not vouchsafe to use any substantiall stratagem against them; nothing but an empty sound shall scatter them, and send them home empty of substance, laded with shame, half-dead with fear; the very horses that might have hastened their flight, are left tyed in their Tents; their very garments are a burden; all is left behind, save their very bodies, and those breathlesse for speed.

Doubtlesse these Syrians knew well to what miserable exigents the incloséd Israelites were brought by their siege; and now made full account to sack, and ransack their Samaria; already had they divided, and swallowed the prey; when suddenly God puts them into a ridiculous confusion; and sends them to seek safety in their heeles; no booty is now in price with them but their life, and happy is he that can run fastest. Thus the Almighty laughs at the designes of insolent men, and shuts up their counsels in shame.

The feare of the foure Lepers began now to give way to security; they fill their bellies, and hide their treasures, and passe from one Tent to another, in a fastidious choice of the best commodities; they who ere-while would have held it happinesse enough to have been blessed with a crust, now wantonly rove for dainties, and from necessity leap into excesse.

How far self-love caries us in all our actions, even to the neglect of the publike? Not till their own bellies, and hands, and eyes were filled, did these Lepers think of imparting this newes to Israel: at last, when themselves are glutted, they begin to remember the hunger of their brethren, and now they find roome for remorse, We doe not well, this day is a day of good tydings, and we hold our peace. Nature teaches us that it is an injury to ingrosse blessings; and so to mind the private, as if we had no relation to a community; we are worthy to be shut out of the City-gates for Lepers, if the respects to the publike good doe not over-sway us in all our desires, in all our demeanure, and well may we with these covetous Lepers feare a mischiefe upon our selves, if we shall wilfully conceale blessings from others.

The conscience of this wrong and danger sends back the Lepers into the City; they call to the Porters, & soon transmit the newes to the Kings household; The King of Israel complaines not to have his sleep broken with such intelligence; He ariseth in the night, and not contemning good newes, though brought by Lepers, consults with his servants of the businesse.

We cannot be too jealous of the intentions of an enemy; Iehoram wisely suspects this slight of the Syrians to be but simulatory, and politick, only to draw Israel out of their City, for the spoile of both. There may be more perill in the back of an enemy, then in his face: the cruellest slaughters have been in retiring; easily therefore is the King perswaded to adventure some few for-lorn Scouts for further assurance. The word of Elisha is out of his head, out of his heart, else there had been no place for this

A this doubt: Timorous hearts never think themselves sure; those that have no faith, had need of much sense.

Those few horses that remaine, are sent forth for discovery, they find nothing but monuments of frightfulnesse, pledges of security. Now Israel dares issue forth to the prey; There (as if the Syrians had come thither to inrich them) they find granaries, wardrobes, treasures, and what ever may serve either for use or ostentation: Every Israelite goes away filled, laden, wearyed with the wealthy spoile.

As scarcity breeds dearth, so plenty cheapnesse. To day a measure of fine flower is lower rated, then yesterday of dung.

The distrustfull Peere of Israel sees this abundance according to the word of the Prophet, but enjoyes it not: he sees this plenty can come in at the gate, though the
B windowes of heaven be not open. The gate is his charge: the affamished Israelites presse in upon him, and beare him downe in the throng: Extreme hunger hath no respect to greatnesse. Nor their rudenesse but his owne unbelief hath trampled him under feet. He that abates the power of God by his distrust, disabled worthily to the succors of the multitude: Faith exalts a man above his sphere; Infidelity depresses him into the dust, into Hell:

He that believes not is condemned already.

Contemplations UPON THE HISTORICALL PART OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE MONARCH,

CHARLES,

By the Grace of God King of Great Britaine, Fraince and Ireland, Defender of the FAITH, &c.

My Great Soveraigne Lord And Master.

May it please your MAIESTIE;

NOw at last (thanks be to my good God) I have finished the long task of my Meditations upon the Historicall part of the Old Testament; A Worke which I foresaw must be the issue both of time, and thoughts: It presumed to intitle it self at first, to your Gracious name, in succession to your immortall Brothers; and now, it brings to your Royall hands a due account of a happy dispatch.

Besides mine own publique ingagement, the incouragements of many worthy Divines, both at home, and abroad, drew me on, in this measure, though busie labour; and made me beleeve the service would not be of more pain, then use.

I

I humbly preſent it to your Majeſty; not fearing to ſay, A that in regard of the ſubject, it is not ſo fit for any eyes as Princely; For what doth it elſe but comment upon that, which God hath thought good to ſay of Kings; what they have done, what they ſhould have done; how they ſped in good, in evill? Certainly there can be none ſuch miror of Princes under heaven, as this, which God hath made for the faces of his Deputies on earth. Neither can the eies of Sove- B raign Greatneſſe be better taken up then with this ſacred reflection. If my defects have not been notorious, the matter ſhall enough commend the work; which together with the unworthy Author, humbly caſts it ſelf at the feet of your Majeſty, with the beſt vowes of fidelity and obſervance, from him, that prides himſelfe in nothing more, then in the ſtyle of

Your Majeſties

moſt faithfully

devoted Servant,

Jos: Hall.

Contemplations.

The Shunamite ſuing to Jehoram; Eliſha conferring with Hazael.

HOw royally hath Eliſha paid the Shunamite for his lodging? To him already ſhe owes the life of her ſonne, both given, and reſtored; and now again (after ſo many yeares, as might well have worne out the memory of ſo ſmall a courteſie) her ſelf, her ſonne, her family owe their lives to ſo thankfull a gueſt. That table, and bed, and ſtoole, and candleſticke was well beſtowed: That candleſticke repaid her the light of her future life and condition, that table the meanes of maintenance, that ſtoole a ſeat of ſafe abode, that bed a quiet reſt from the common calamities of her nation: He is a niggard to himſelfe, that ſcants his beneficence to a Prophet, whoſe very cold water ſhall not goe unrewarded. Elijah preſerved the Sareptan from famine; Eliſha the Shunamite; he, by proviſion of oyle and meale; this, by premonition: Ariſe, and goe, thou and thine houſhold, and ſojourne whereſoever thou canſt ſojourne. The Sareptan was poore, and driven to extreames, therefore the Prophet provides for her, from hand to mouth: The Shunamite was wealthy, and therefore the Prophet ſends her to provide for her ſelfe: The ſame goodneſſe that relieves our neceſſity, leaves our competency to the hand of our own counſell; in the one, he will make uſe of his own power; in the other, of our providence. 2 King. 8

The very Prophet adviſes this holy Client to leave the bounds of the Church, & to ſeek life, where ſhe ſhould not find Religion: Extremity is for the time a juſt diſpenſation with ſome common rules of our outward demeanure and motions, even from better to worſe. All Iſrael and Iudah ſhall be affamiſhed; The body can be preſerved no where, but where the ſoule ſhall want; Sometimes the conveniences of the ſoule muſt yeeld to bodily neceſſities. Wantonneſſe and curioſity can finde no advantage from that which is done out of the power of need.

It is a long famine that ſhall afflict Iſrael; He upon whom the ſpirit of Elijah was doubled, doubled the judgement inflicted by his Maſter; Three years and an halfe did Iſrael gaſpe under the drought of Elijah; ſeven yeares dearth ſhall it ſuffer under Eliſha. The trials of God are many times not more grievous for their ſharpneſſe, then for their continuance.

This ſcarcity ſhall not come alone; God ſhall call for it: what ever be the ſecond cauſe, he is the firſt. The executioners of the Almighty (ſuch are his judgements) ſtand ready waiting upon his juſt Throne; and doe no ſooner receive the watchword, then they fly upon the world, and plague it for sinne; Only the cry of our sinnes moves God to call for vengeance: And if God once call, it must come; How oft, how earnestly are we called to repentance, and stirre not? The messengers of Gods wrath flie forth at the least beck; and fulfill the will of his revenge upon those, whose obedience would not fulfill the will of his command.

After so many proofes of fidelity the Shunamite cannot distrust the Prophet; not staying therefore to be convicted by the event, shee removes her family into the Land of the Philistins: No nation was more opposite to Israel, none more worthily odious; yet, there doth the Shunamite seek and find shelter. Even the shade of those trees that are unwholsome, may keep us from a storme; Every where will God find room for his own. The fields of Philistins flourish, while the soyle of Israel yeelds nothing but weeds and barrennesse: Not that Israel was more guilty, but that the sinne of Israel is more intolerable. The offers of grace are so many aggravations of wickednesse: In equall offences those doe justly smart more, who are more obliged. No pestilence is so contagious as that which hath taken the purest aire.

These Philistine neighbours would never have endured themselves to be pestered with forrainers, especially Israelites, whom they hated (besides Religion) for their usurpation: neither were they in all likelihood pressed with multitude: The rest of Israel were fed on with hopes; presuming upon the amends of the next harvest, till their want grew desperate, and irremediable; only the forewarned Shunamite prevents the mischief; now she finds what it is to have a Prophet her friend: Happy are those soules that upon all occasions consult with Gods Seers; they shall be freed from the plagues, wherein the secure blindnesse of others is heedlesly overtaken.

Seven yeares had this Shunamite sojourned in Palestine, now shee returnes to her own, and is excluded: She that found harbour among Philistims, findes oppression and violence among Israelites: Those of her kindred, taking advantage of her absence, had shared her possessions. How oft doth it fall out, that the worst enemies of a man are those of his own house? All went by contraries with this Shunamite; In the famine she had enough, in the common plenty she was scanted; Philistines were kind unto her, Israelites cruell: Both our feares, and our hopes do not seldome dissappoint us; It is safe trusting to that stay which can never fail us, who can easily provide us both of friendship in Palestine, and of justice in Israel. We may not judge of the Religion by particular actions; A very Philistine may be mercifull, when an Israelite is unjust; The person may be faulty, when the profession is holy.

It was not long since the Prophet made that friendly offer to the Shunamite, out of the desire of a thankfull requitall; What is to be done for thee? wouldest thou bee spoken for to the King, or to the Captain of the Host? and she answered; I dwell among my brethren. Little did she then think of this injurious measure; else she might have said; I dwell among mine enemies, I dwell among robbers. It is like they were then friendly, who were now cruell, and oppressive; There is no trust to be reposed in flesh and blood: How should their favours be constant, who are in their nature, and disposition, variable? It is the surest way to rely on him, who is ever like himself; the measure of whose love is eternity.

Whither should the Shunamite go to complain of her wrong, but to the Court? There is no other refuge of the oppressed, but publike authority: All Justice is derived from Soveraignty: Kings are not called Gods for nothing; They doe both sentence and execute for the Almighty.

Doubtlesse, now the poore Shunamite, thought of the courteous proffer of Elisha; and missing a friend at the Court, is glad to be the presenter of her own petition.

How happily doth God contrive all events for the good of his! This suppliant shall fall upon that instant for her suit, when the King shall be talking with Gehezi; when Gehezi shall be talking of her to the King; the words of Gehezi, the thoughts of the King, the desires of the Shunamite shall be all drawn together by the wise providence of God into the center of one moment, that his oppressed servant might receive a speedy justice. Oh the infinite wisdome, power, mercy of our God, that insensibly

A sensibly orders all our wayes, as to his own holy purposes, so to our best advantage.

What doth Iehoram the King talking with Gehezi the Lepet? That very presence was an eyesore.

But if the cohabitation with the infectious were forbidden, yet not the conference. Certainly, I begin to think of some goodnesse in both these: Had there not been some goodnesse in Iehoram, he had not taken pleasure to heare, even from a leprous mouth, the miraculous acts and praises of Gods Prophet; Had there not been some goodnesse in Gehezi, he had not after so fearfull an infliction of judgement, thus ingenuously recounted the praises of his severe Master; he that told that dearebought lie to the Prophet, tells now all truths of the Prophet, to the King: Perhaps
B his leprosie had made him cleane; If so; Happy was it for him that his forehead was white with the disease, if his soule became hereupon white with repentance. But we may well know that the desire, or report of historicall Truths, doth not alwaies argue grace. Still Iehoram, after the inquiry of the Prophets miracles, continues his Idolatry; He that was curious to hearken after the wonders of Elisha, is not carefull to follow his doctrine; Therefore are Gehezi and the Shunamite met before him, that he may be convicted, who will not be reformed: Why was it else that the presence of the persons should thus inexpectedly make good the relation, if God had not meant the inexcusablenes of Iehoram, whiles he must needs say within himself; Thus potent is the Prophet of that God, whom I obey not; Were not Elishas the true
C God, how could he work such wonders? And if he be the true God, why is he not mine? But what? Shall I change Ahabs God for Iehoshaphats? No; I cannot deny the miracles, I will not admit of the Author: Let Elisha be powerfull, I will be constant. O wretched Iehoram, how much better had it been for thee never to have seen the face of Gehezi, and the sonne of the Shunamite, then to goe away unmoved with the vengeance of leprosie in the one, with the mercifull resuscitation of the other? Therefore is thy judgement fearfully aggravated, because thou wouldst not yeeld to what thou couldst not oppose. Had not Ahabs obdurateneese been propagated to his son, so powerfull demonstrations of divine power could not have been uneffectuall. Wicked hearts are so much worse by how much God is better; This anvile is the harder by being continually beaten upon, whether with judgements or mercy.

D Yet this good use will God have made of this report, and this presence, that the poor Shunamite shall have justice; That sonne, whose life was restored, shall have his inheritance revived; His estate shall fare the better for Elishaes miracles: How much more will our mercifull God second his own blessings, when the favours of unjust men are therefore drawne to us, because we have been the subjects of divine beneficence?

It was a large, and full award, that this occurrence drew from the King; Restore all that was hers, and all the fruits of the field, since the day that she left the land, even untill now. Not the present possession only is given her, but the arerages.

Nothing hinders, but that outward justice may stand with grosse Idolatry. The Widow may thanke Elisha for this; His miracle wrought still, and puts this new life in her dead estate; his absence did that for the preservation of life, which his
E presence did for the restoring it from death. Shee that was so ready to expostulate with the man of God, upon the losse of her son, might perhaps have been as ready to impute the losse of her estate to his advice; Now, that for his sake she is enriched with her owne, how doth she blesse God for so happy a guest? When we have forgotten our own good turnes, God remembers and crowns them: Let us doe good to all whiles we have time, but especially to the household of faith.

Could Israel have been sensible of their own condition, it was no small unhappinesse to lose the presence of Elisha: Whether, for the Idolatries, or for the famine of Israel, the Prophet is gone into Syria; No doubt Naaman welcomd him thither; and now would force upon him thanks for his cure, which the man of God would not receive at home.

How famous is he now grown that was taken from the Teame? His name is not confined to his own Nation; forrain countries take notice of it; and Kings are glad to listen after him; and woo him with presents: Benhadad the King of Syria, whose counsells he had detected, rejoyceth to heare of his presence; and now, as having forgotten that he had sent a whole Host, to besiege the Prophet in Dothan, sends an honourable messenger to him, laden with the burden of forty Camels, to consult with this Oracle, concerning his sicknesse, and recovery. A

This Syrian belike in distresse dares not trust to his own gods; but having had good proofe of the power of the God of Israel, both in Naamans cure, and in the miraculous defeats of his greatest forces, is glad to send to that servant of God, whom he had persecuted. Wicked men are not the same in health and in sicknesse: their affliction is worthy of the thankes, if they be well minded; not themselves.

Doubtlesse the errand of Benhadad was not only to enquire of the issue of his disease, but to require the Prayers of the Prophet for a good issue: Even the worst man doth so love himselfe, that he can be content to make a beneficiall use of those instruments, whose goodnesse he hateth. B

Hazael the chiefe Peere of Syria is designed to this message; The wealth of his present strives with the humility of his cariage, and speech: Thy son Benhadad King of Syria hath sent me to thee, saying, Shall I recover of this disease? Not long since, Iehoram King of Israel had said to Elisha, My father, shall I smite them? and now Benhadad King of Syria, sayes, My father, shall I recover: Loe how this poore Meholathite hath Kings to his sonnes: How great is the honour of Gods Prophets with Pagans, with Princes? Who can be but confounded to see Evangelicall Prophets despised by the meanest Christians!

C

It is more then a single answer that the Prophet returnes to this message: One answer he gives to Benhadad, that sent it; another he gives to Hazael, that brings it: That to Benhadad, is, Thou maist surely recover? That to Hazael, The Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die: What shall we say then? Is there a lye, or an equivocation in the holy mouth of the Prophet? God forbid: It is one thing what shall be the nature and issue of the disease; Another thing what may outwardly befall the person of Benhadad: The question is moved of the former, whereto the answer is direct; The disease is not mortall; But withall an intimation is given to the bearer, of an event beyond the reach of his demand; which he may know, but either needs not, or may not returne: The Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die; by another means, though not by the disease.

The Seer of God descries more in Hazael, then he could see in himselfe; he fixes his eyes therefore stedfastly in the Syrians face, as one that in those lines read the bloody story of his life.

Hazael blushes, Elisha weeps; The intention of those eies did not so much amaze Hazael, as the teares; As yet he was not guilty to himselfe of any wrong that might straine out this juyce of sorrow: Why weepeth my Lord?

The Prophet feares not to foretell Hazael all the villanies which he should once doe to Israel; How he should fire their forts, and kill their young men, and rip the mothers, and dash their children. I marvell not now at the teares of those eyes which foresaw this miserable vastation of the inheritance of God; The very mention whereof is abhorred of the future author: What is thy servant a dog, that I should do this great thing? They are savage cruelties whereof thou speakest; It were more fit for me to weep that thou shouldst repute me so brutish; I should no lesse condemne my selfe for a beast, if I could suspect my own degeneration so farre. Wicked men are caried into those heights of impietie, which they could not in their good mood have possibly beleeved; Nature is subject to favourable opinions of it self; & will rather mistrust a Prophet of God, then her own good disposition: How many from honest beginnings, have risen to incredible licentiousnesse, whose lives are now such, that it were as hard for a man to beleeve they had ever been good, as to have perswaded them once they should prove so desperately ill. E

To give some overture unto Hazael of the opportunity of this ensuing mischiefe; the Prophet foretells him from God, that he shall be the King of Syria.

He

A He that ſhewes the event, doth not appoint the meanes; Farre was it from the ſpirit of Gods Prophet to ſet, or encourage a treaſon: whiles he ſaid therefore, Thou ſhalt be king of Syria; he ſaid not, Goe home, and kill thy Maſter: The wicked ambition of Hazael drawes this damnable concluſion out of holy premiſes; and now having fed the hopes of his Soveraigne with the expectation of recovery: the next day he ſmothers his Maſter. The impotent deſire of rule brookes no delay: Had not Hazael been graceleſly cruell, after he had received this prediction of the Seer, he ſhould have patiently awaited for the crown of Syria, till lawfull meanes had ſet it upon his head; now, he will by a cloſe execution make way to the throne; A wet cloth hath ſtopt the mouth of his ſick Soveraigne; No noyſe is heard; the carkaſſe is faire; who can complain of any thing but the diſeaſe?

B O Hazael, thou ſhalt not thus eaſily ſtop the mouth of thine own conſcience; that ſhall call thee Traytor, even in thy chaire of State; and ſhall check all thy royall triumphes, with, Thou haſt founded thy throne in blood; I am deceived, if this wet cloth ſhall not wipe thy lips in thy jollieſt feaſts, and make thy beſt morſels unſavoury: Soveraignty is painfull upon the faireſt termes; but upon treachery, and murder, tormenting: Wofull is the caſe of that man whoſe publike cares are aggravated with private guiltineſſe; and happy is he, that can enjoy a little with the peace of an honeſt heart.

Jehu with Jehoram and Jezebel.

YEt Hazael began his cruelty with loſſe: Ramoth Gilead is won from him; Iehoram the ſon hath recovered that, which Ahab his father attempted in vaine; That City was deare-bought of Iſrael; it coſt the life of Ahab, the blood of Iehoram; Thoſe wounds were healed with victory; The King tends his health at Iezreel, whiles the Captaines were enjoying, and ſeconding their ſucceſſe at Ramoth. 2 King. 9.

D Old Eliſha hath neither cottage nor foot of land, yet ſitting in an obſcure corner he gives order for Kingdomes; Not by way of authority, (this uſurpation had been to elſe proud, then unjuſt) but by way of meſſage, from the God of kings; Even a mean Herauld may goe on a great errand: The Prophets of the Goſpell have nothing to doe but with ſpirituall Kingdomes; To beat down the Kingdomes of ſin and Satan, to tranſlate ſoules to the Kingdome of heaven.

He that rayſed the life of the Shunamites ſonne, muſt ſtoop to age; That block lies in his way to Iehu; The aged Prophet imployes a ſpeedier meſſenger, who muſt alſo gird up his loynes, for haſte: No common pace will ſerve us when we goe on Gods meſſage; The very loſſe of minutes may be unrecoverable. This great Seer of God well ſaw a preſent concurrence of all opportunities: The Captaines of the Hoſt were then readily combined for this exploit: The army was on foot; Iehoram abſent; a ſmall delay might have troubled the work; the diſperſion of the Captaines, E and Hoſt, or the preſence of the King, might either have defeated, or ſlacked the diſpatch: He is prodigall of his ſucceſſe, that is ſlow in his execution.

The directions of Eliſha to the young Prophet, are full, and punctuall; whither to go; what to carrie; what to do, where to doe it; what to ſay, what ſpeed to make, in his act, in his returne: In the buſineſſes of God, it matters not how little is left to our diſcretion; There is no important buſineſſe of the Almighty, wherein his precepts are not ſtrict, and expreſſe; Look how much more ſpecialty there is in the charge of God, ſo much more danger is in the violation.

The young Prophet is curiouſly obedient; in his haſte; in his obſervation and carriage: and finding Iehu, according to Eliſhaes prediction, ſet amongſt the Captaines of the Hoſt, he ſingles him forth, by a reverent compellation; I have an errand to thee, O Captaine; Might not the Prophet have ſtayed till the table had riſen, and then have followed Iehu to his lodging? Surely, the wisdom of God hath purposely pitcht upon this season, that the publike view of a sacred messenger, and the hastie evocation of so noted a person, to such a secrecie, might prepare the hearts of those Commanders of Israel, to the expectation of some great designe. A

The inmost room is but close enough for this act; Ere many houres, all Israel shall know that, which yet may not be trusted with one eye; The goodnesse of God makes wise provision for the safety of his messengers, and whiles he imploies their service, prevents their dangers.

But how is it that of all the Kings of the ten tribes, none was ever anointed but Iehu? Is it for that the God, who would not countenance the erection of that usurped throne, would countenance the alteration? Or is it, that by this visible testimony of divine ordination, the courage of the Israelitish Captaines might be raised up to second the high and bold attempt of him, whom they saw destined from heaven to rule? B

Together with the oile of this unction, here was a charge of revenge; A revenge of the blood of the Prophets, upon Iezebel; of wickednesse and Idolatry, upon Ahab: neither was the extirpation of this lewd family fore-prophesied onely to Iehu, but injoyned.

Elijah foretold, and the world expected some fearfull account of the abominable cruelties, & impieties of that accursed house; Now it is called for, when it seemed forgotten: Ahab shall have no posteritie, Iezebel shall have no tombe, but the dogs. This wofull doome is committed to Iehues execution.

Oh the sure, though patient, justice of the Almighty: not onely Ahab and Iezebel had been bloody, and idolatrous, but Israel was drawne into the partnership of their crimes; All these shall share in the judgement: Elijahs complaint in the cave now receives this late answer, Hazael shall plague Israel; Iehu shall plague the house of Ahab and Iezebel, Elishaes servant thus seconds Elishaes Master: When wickednesse is ripe in the field, God will not let it sheed to grow againe, and cuts it down by a iust, and seasonable vengeance: Ahabs drouping under the threat hath put off the judgement from his own dayes; now it comes, and sweeps away his wife, his sonnes, and falls heavie upon his subjects. Please your selves, O ye vain sinners, in the slow pace of vengeance; it will be neither lesse certaine, nor more easie for the delay; rather worse to pay for that leisure in the extremity. C

The Prophet hath done his errand, and is gone. Iehu returnes to his fellowes, with his head not more wet with oile, then buried with thoughts: no doubt, his face bewrayed some inward tumults, and distractions of imagination; neither seemed he to return the same he went out. They aske therefore, Is all well? Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee? The Prophets of God were to these idolatrous Israelites, like comets; who were never seen without the portendment of a mischiefe: When the priests of their Baal were quietly sacrificing, all was well, but now when a Prophet of God comes in sight, their guiltinesse askes, Is all well? All would be well but for their sins; they feare not these, they feare their reprover. D

Israel was come to a good passe, when the Prophets of God went with them for mad men: Oh ye Baalitish Ruffians, whither hath your impiety and profanenesse caried you, that ye should thus blaspheme the servants of the living God? Ye that runne on madding after vaine Idols, taxe the sober guides of true worship, for madnesse. Thus it becomes the godlesse enemies of truth, the heralds of our patience, to mis-call our innocence, to revile our most holy profession: What wonder is it that Gods messenger are mad men unto those, to whom the wisdome of God is foolishnesse? E

The message was not delivered to Iehu for a concealment, but for publication: Silence could not effect the word that was told him; common notice must; Yee know the man, and his communication: The habit showes you the man, the calling showes you his errand: Even Prophets were distinguished by their cloathes; Their mantle was not the common weare; why should not this sacred vocation be known by a peculiar attire? These Captaines had not called him a mad-man,

A it they had not knowne him a Prophet: By the man therefore they might guesse at his message; Prophets doe not use to appeare, but upon serious errands, whether of reproofe, or of prediction.

Nice civilities of denials were not then known to the world; They said, It is false, tell us now: Amongst these Captaines no combat, no unkindnesse followes upon a word so rudely familiar.

Jehu needs not tell them that the man was a Prophet; he tells them the prophecie of the man; what he had said, what he had done.

Their eies had no sooner seene the oile; their eares had no sooner heard, Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee King over Israel, then they rise from their seates, as rapt with a tempest, and are hurled into armes; So doe they haste to proclaime Jehu, that they scarce stay to snatch up their garments, which they had perhaps left behinde them for speed, had they not meant with these rich abilliments to garnish a state for their new Soveraine. To whom having now erected an extemporall Throne, they doe by the sound of Trumpets give the stile of Royaltie, Jehu is King.

So much credit hath that mad fellow with these gallants of Israel, that upon his word they will presently adventure their lives, and change the Crowne. God gives a secret authority to his despised servants; so as they which hate their person, yet reverence their truth: Even very scorners cannot but beleeve them; If when the Prophets of the Gospell tell us of a spirituall Kingdome, they be distrusted of those which professe to observe them, how shamefull is the disproportion? how just shall their judgement be?

Yet I cannot say whether meer obedience to the Prophet, or perfect dislikes of Jehoram, or perfect respects to Jehu, drew the Captains of Israel; The will of God may be done thankfully, when fulfilling the substance, we faile of the intention, and erre in circumstance.

Surely Jehu is conscious of this sudden Inauguration; This new Princedome yet reaches no further then the sound of the trumpets; Jehu is no lesse subtile, then valiant, he knowes that the noise of this late Treason might worke a busie, and dangerous relishance; therefore gives out that no messenger of the newes may ever set up personall execution, [illegible] to be sent to surprise Jehoram in the palace of Jezreel. The meer tending his late words, or secretly feasting his friends, and dreaming of nothing lesse then danger, [illegible] might be seen, and felt at once. Secrecie is the safest gard of any designe; oftentimes projects are either frustrated, or made needlesly difficult.

Neither is Jehu more close, then swift; That very trumpet with the same winde sounds his march, from the top of the staires, he stops down into his chariot. That man meanes to speed, who can be at once reserved in his counsels, and resolute, and quick in his performances.

[illegible] could not carry the [illegible] and unseasonable visitation of the [illegible] child of Jehoshaphat, were it not that he was degenerate into the family of [illegible] King of Judah is come to visit Jehoram King of Israel, the knowledge of [illegible] received wounds both drawn thither this kinde ill-matched allies. He who was partaker of the warr, cannot but be a witnesse of the wounds.

The two Kings see in the height of their complement, and entertainements, when the watch-man of the Tower of Jezreel espies a troupe, afarre off. For ought was known, there was nothing but peace in all the Land of Israel, and Judah was now so combined with it, that both their Kings were feasting under one roof; yet in the midst of this supposed safety, the watch-tower is not unfurnished with heedy eies. No security of peace can free wise governours from a carefull suspition of what may come, and a providence against the worst. Even whiles wee know of no enemies, the watch-tower of our Intelligence may not be empty.

In vaine are dangers fore-seene, if they bee not premonished; It is all one to have a blinde and a mute watch-man; This speakes what hee sees, I see a company.

Doubtlesse

divided

Doubtlesse Ieboram however now full of thoughts: neither knew he what construction to put upon that approaching troupe; Perhaps, the Syrians the while, may have recovered Ramoth, and chased the garrison of Israel; neither can he imagine whether these should be hostile victors or vanquished subjects, or conspiring rebels. Every way this rout was dreadfull. Oh Ieboram, thou begloſt thy ſtates ſake; Hadſt thou been afraid to provoke the God of Iſrael, thine innocencie had yeelded no roome to theſe terrors.

An horſeman is diſpatcht to diſcover the meaning of this deſigned concourſe: He meets them, and inquires of peace; but receives a ſhort anſwer [illegible] with peace turn thee behind me? A ſecond is addreſſed, with the ſame [illegible] attend the train of Iehu inſtead of returning; Indeed it is not for private perſons to hope to reſolve the publike affaires, when they are grown to an height of diſorder, and from thence to a ripeneſſe of miſ-cariage: Sooner may a well meaning man hurt himſelfe, then redreſſe the common danger.

Theſe meſſengers were now within the mercy of a multitude, had they but endeavoured to retire, they had periſhed as wilfully, as vainly: Whoſoever will bee ſtriving againſt the torrent of a juſt judgement, muſt needs be carried down in the ſtream: Sometimes there is as much wiſdome in yeelding, as courage in reſiſtance.

Had this troupe been far off, the watchman could not have [illegible] the arrivall of the meſſengers, their turning behinde, the manner of the [illegible] Iehu was a noted Captain; his cariage and motion was obſerved more full of fire, then his fellowes; The driving is like Iehues for he driveth furiously. God makes choice of fit inſtruments, as of mercy, ſo of revenge; Theſe ſpirits were needfull for ſo tragicall a ſcene, as was now preparing in Iſrael.

Ieboram and Ahaziah, as netled with this forced patience of expectation, can no longer keep their ſeats, but will needs haſten their charets, and fetch that coſtly ſatisfaction, which would not be ſent, but given.

They are infatuated, which ſhall periſh: otherwiſe Ieboram had been warned enough by the forceable retention of his meſſengers, to expect none but an enemie. A friend, or a ſubject could not have been unwilling to be known, to be look't for: Now, forgetting his wounds, he will goe to fetch death.

Yet when he ſees Iehu, whom he left a ſubject, hopes ſtrive with his doubts, Is it peace, Iehu? what may be the reaſon of this ſudden journey? Is the army foiled by the Syrians? Is Ramoth recovered? or hath the flight of the enemy left thee no further work? or is ſome other ill newes guilty of thy haſte? What means this unwiſhed preſence, and return?

There needs no ſtay for an anſwer; the very face of Iehu, and thoſe ſparkling eyes of his ſpake fury, and death to Ieboram; which yet his tongue angerly ſeconds: What peace, ſo long as the whordomes of thy mother Iezebel, and her witchcrafts are ſo many?

Wicked Tyrant, what ſpeakeſt thou of peace with men, when thou haſt thus long waged war with the Almighty? That curſed mother of thine hath nurſed thee with blood, and trained thee up in abominable Idolatries.

Thou art not more hers, then her ſinne is thine; thou art polluted with her ſpirituall whoredomes, and inchanted with her helliſh witchcrafts: Now that juſt God whom thou, and thy parents have ſo hainouſly deſpited, ſends thee by mee this [illegible] meſſage of his vengeance; Which whiles hee ſpake, his hand is drawing up that deadly arrow, which ſhall cure the former wounds with a worſe.

Too late now doth wretched Ieboram turn his charet, and flee, and crie Treaſon, O Ahaziah, There was treaſon before, O Ieboram; thy treaſon againſt the Majeſty of God, is now revenged by the treaſon of Iehu againſt thee.

That fatall ſhaft, notwithſtanding the ſwift pace of both the charets, is directed to the heart of Ieboram; there is no erring of thoſe feathers which are guided by the hand of deſtinie.

How

How just are the rewards of God! It was in the field of Naboth, whereon [illegible] with him; There were they called to him for blood. And now this very carriage terrifieth that Prophesie, which we heard from the mouth of Eliah, in that very place, touching the bloud of Ahab; and is carefull to perform it. [illegible] when he heard the message of Elisha, that his hands should do it; now, upon the accomplishing the word of a Prophet, he gives charge to bury the Corpse, that the bleeding carkasse of Iehoram should be cast upon the very plot of Naboth. Oh Naboths blood well paid for! [illegible] shall adde to the composition. Oh graves of Saints dearely [illegible] ged!

What a relentlesse thing is hatred! the death of the father [illegible] son! Iehu rides after Iehoram, takes him with an arrow, and repays their blood to Naboth and his sonnes upon him. Not only Ahab but [illegible] that cruell Iezabel, but the sonne also; effectuall inheritance of the vineyard intended to his heires, that by bleeding his pretended offence; and how not only Ahab forfeits his blood to the field, but his son Iehoram also! Face doth not more answer to face, then [illegible] to sin.

It was time for [illegible] King of Iudah, to flee: Nay it had been many [illegible] before to have fled from the sinnes, yea from the house of Ahab. That bread is fearefull which God hath upon him; He did evil in the sight of the Lord, as did the house of Ahab, for hee was the sonne in law of the house of Ahab, as the Prophet often guilty of consanguinity. The house of good Iehoshaphat is [illegible] with the light of the sun.

Now he payes for his kinde alliance, accompanying the sonne of Ahab in his [illegible] whom he consorted with, in the Idolatry: Young Ahaziah was [illegible] but in his dayes, when the mid-night cry of Athaliah is required from him. Nothing is more dangerous then to be [illegible] in a wicked family; this relation [illegible] draweth in a fatall horde of sin and punishment.

Who would not have looked that Iezebel hearing of this bloody end of her son, and pursuit of her allie; and the fearefull proceedings of this professed conspiracie, should have put her selfe into sackcloth and ashes; and now finding no [illegible] either of defence, or escape, should have cast her selfe into such a posture of [illegible] as might have moved the compassion of Iehu? Her proud heart could not suddenly learn to stoope: rather she retcheth to her high spirit; and instead of humbling her soule by repentance, and addressing her self for an imminent death, she [illegible] her old carkasse, and paints her wrinkled face, and seems thus vainly hopes to daunt the courage of an usurper, by the sudden beames of a fayre face; she looks out, and thinks to fright him with the challenge of a traitor, whilst either mercy or justice could not be avoided: Extremity findes us such, or our peace leaves us. Our last thoughts are spent upon that we care most for; those that have regarded their face more then their soule, in their latter end are more taken up with desire of seeming faire, then being happy: It is no marvell if an heart obdured with the custome of sinne shut up gracelesly. Counterfeit beauty agrees well with inward uncleanneſſe.

Iehues resolution was too strongly setled to be removed with a painted face, or an opprobrious tongue; Hee lookes up to the window, and sayes, Who is on my side, Who? There want not those every where, which will be ready to observe prevailing greatnesse: Two or three Eunuchs looke out; hee bids them, Throw her downe: They instantly lay hold on their lately adored Mistris, and notwithstanding all her [illegible] and prayers, cast her down headlong into the street.

What heed is to be taken of the deep professed services of hollow-hearted followers; All this while they have humbly with smiles, and officious devotions fawned upon their great Queene; now upon the call of a prosperous enemie they forget get their reſpects, her royaltie; and caſt her down, as willing executioners, into the jawes of a fearfull death: It is hard for greatneſſe to know them whom it may truſt: Perhaps the faireſt ſemblance is from the falſeſt heart; It was a juſt plague of God upon wicked Iezebel, that ſhee was inwardly hated of her owne; Hee whoſe ſervants ſhee perſecuted, raiſed up enemies to her from her own elbow. A

Thus muſt pride fall; Inſolent, idolatrous, cruell Iezebel beſprinkles the walls, and pavement with her blood; and now thoſe braines that deviſed miſchief againſt the ſervants of God, are ſtrawed upon the ſtones; and ſhe that inſulted upon the Prophets, is trampled upon by the horſes heeles: The wicked is kept for the day of deſtruction, and ſhall be brought forth to the day of wrath. Job 21.

Death puts an end commonly to the higheſt diſpleaſure. He that was ſevere in the execution of the living, is mercifull in the ſepulture of the dead; Go ſee now this curſed woman and burie her, for ſhe is a Kings daughter; She that upbraided Iehu with the name of Zimri, ſhall bee interred by Iehu as Omries daughter in law, as a Sydonian Princeſſe; Somewhat muſt be yeelded to humanity; ſomewhat to State. B

The dogs have prevented Iehu in this purpoſe, and have given her a living tombe, more ignoble then the worſt of the earth; Only the ſcull, hands, and feet of that vaniſhed carkaſſe yet remain; The ſcull which was the roof of all her wicked devices, the hands and feet which were the executioners; theſe ſhall remaine as the monuments of thoſe ſhamefull exequies: that future times ſeeing theſe fragments of a body, might ſay, the dogges were worthy of the reſt; Thus Iezebel is turned to dung, and dogges-meat, Elijah is verified, Naboth is revenged, Iezreel is purged, Iehu is zealous, and in all, God is juſt. C

Jehu killing the ſons of Ahab, and the Prieſts of Baal.

THere were two prime Cities of the Ten Tribes, which were the ſet Courts of the Kingdome of Iſrael; Samaria and Iezreel; The chief palace of the Kingdome was Iezreel, the mother City of the Kingdome, was Samaria; Iehu is poſſeſſed of the one, without any ſword drawn againſt him, Iezreel willingly changes the maſter, yeelding it ſelfe to the victor of two Kings, to the avenger of Iezebel; the next care is Samaria; Either policy, or force ſhall fetch in that head of the Tribes. 2 Kings 10. D

The plentifull iſſue of Princes is no ſmall aſſurance to the people; Ahab had ſonnes enough to furniſh the Thrones of all the neighbour nations, to maintain the hopes of ſucceſſion, to all times; How ſecure did he think the perpetuation of his poſterity, when he ſaw ſeventy ſonnes from his own loyns? Neither was this Royall iſſue truſted, either to weak walls, or to one roof; but to the ſtrong bulwarkes of Samaria, and therein to the ſeverall guards of the chief Peeres; It was the wiſe care of their parents not to have them obnoxious to the danger of a common miſ-cariage, or, of thoſe emulations which wait upon the cloyednesſe of an undivided converſation; but to order their ſeparation ſo, as one may reſcue other from the perill of aſſault, as one may reſpect other out of a familiar ſtrangeneſſe: Had Ahab and Iezebel been as wiſe for their ſoules, as they were for their ſeed, both had proſpered. E

Iehu is yet but in his firſt act; If all the ſonnes of Ahab bleed not, the prophecy is unanſwered; There ſhall be no need of his ſword, his penne ſhall work all this ſlaughter. He writes a challenge to Samaria, and therein to the guardians of the ſonnes of Ahab; daring them out of the confidence in their defenced City, in their charets, and horſes, in their aſſociats and armes, to ſet up the beſt of their maſters masters sonnes, on his fathers throne, and to fight for his succession.

All the Governours of Ahabs children conspire in one common feare; no doubt there wanted not in that numerous brood of Kings, some great spirits that (if at least they attained to the notice of this designe) longed for a revenge, and suggested counsels of resolution to their cowardly guardians: Shall an audacious usurper runne thus away with the Crowne of Israel? Shall the blood of Iezabel bee thus traiterously spilt, thus wilfully forgotten? O Israelites, can you be so base, as to be ruled by my fathers servant? Where are the merits of Ahab, and Iehoram? What is become of the loyall courage of Israel? Doubtlesse, yee shall not want able Seconds to your valour; Doe yee think the royall and potent alliances of our mother Iezebel; and the remaining heires of Iudah, can draw back their hands from your aide? Will they endure to swallow so cruell an indignity? Stir up your astonished fortitude, O yee Nobles of Israel; redeeme your blemished honour, revenge this treacherous conspirator, and establish the right of the wronged heires of your Soveraigne. But as warme cloathes to a dead man, so are the motions of valour to a fearfull heart: Behold two Kings stood not before him, how then shall we stand?

Feare affrights it selfe rather then it will want bugs of terror: It is true: Two Kings fell before Iehu; but, two Kings unarmed, unguarded; Had not the surprizall of Iehu taken advantage of the unsuspitious nakednesse of these two Princes, his victory had not been thus successefull, thus easie. Halfe one of those two Kings, upon advertisement and preparation, had abated the fury of that hot Leader. It is the fashion of feare to represent unto us alwaies the worst, in every event: not looking at the inequality of the advantages, but the misery of the successe: as contrarily it is the guise of faith, and valour, by the good issue of one enterprise to raise up the heart to an expectation and assurance of more.

These mens hearts are dead with their Kings, neither dare entertaine the hope of a safe and prosperous resistance, but basely return, We are thy servants, and will do all that thou shalt bid us, we will not make any King; doe thou that which is good in thine eyes.

Well may Iehu think, these men which are thus disloyall to their charge, cannot be faithfull to me; It is their feare that drawes them to this observation: Were they not cowards, they would not be traitors to their Princes, subjects to me: I may use their hands, but I will not trust them: It is a thankelesse obedience that is grounded upon feare; there can be no true fidelity without love, and reverence. Neither is it other betwixt God and us; if out of a dread of hell we be officious, who shall thank us for these respects to our selves?

As one that had tasted already the sweetnesse of a resolute expedition; Iehu writes back instantly, If yee bee mine, and if ye will hearken unto my voyce, take yee the heads of the men your Masters sonnes, and come to me to Iezreel to morrow this time. Valiant Iehu was so well acquainted with the nature of feare, that he well knew this passion once grown desperate, would be ready to swallow all conditions: so farre therefore doth his wisdome improve it, as to make these Peeres his executioners; who presently upon the receit of his charge turne cruell, and by a joynt consent fetch off the seventy heads of those Princes, whom they undertooke to guard, whom they had flattered with the hopes of greater honour.

No doubt, but amongst so many sonnes of Ahab, some had so demeaned themselves, that they had won zealous professions of love from their guardians: Except perhaps death stole upon them in sleep, what tears, what intreaties, what conjurations must here needs have been?

What have wee done, O yee Peers of Israel, that might deserve this bloody measure? We are the sonnes of Ahab, therefore have ye hitherto professed to observe us; what change is this? why should that which hath hitherto kept you loyall, now make you cruell? Is this the reward of the long peaceable government of our father? are these the Trophees of Ahabs victories against Benhadad, Iehoram rams against Hazael? If we may not raigne, yet at least, let us live: Or if we must die, why will your hands be imbrued in that blood, which yee had wont to terme royall, and sacred? Why will ye of Tutors turn murtherers? All pleas are in vaine to them that are dasfoed with their own feares. Perhaps these expostulations might have fetched some dewes of pity from the eyes, and kisses from the lips of these unfaithfull Tutors, but cannot prevent the stroke of death: These Crocodiles weep upon those, whom they must kill: and if their own sonnes had beene in the place of Ahabs, doubtlesse they had been sacrificed to the will of an usurper, to the parents safety: It is all relying upon timorous natures; upon every occasion those crazy steeds will break, and runne into our hands. How worthy were Ahab and Iezebel of such friends? They had been ever false to God, how should men be true to them? They had sold themselves to work wickednesse, and now they are requited with a mercenary fidelity: for a few lines have these men sold all the heads of Ahabs posterity: could ever the policy of Iezebel have reacht so farre, as to suspect the possibility of the extirpation of so ample an issue in one night, by the hands of her truest subjects?

Now she that by her letter sent to the Elders of Iezreel, shed the blood of Naboth and his sonnes, hath the blood of all her sonnes shed by a letter sent from Iezreel to the Elders of Samaria. At last, God will be sure to come out of the debt of wicked sinners, and will pay them with that coyne, which is both most proper, and least lookt for.

Early in the morning, in that gate of Iezreel where Ahab had passed many an unjust sentence, is presented unto Iehu, the fearfull pledge of his soveraignty, seventy gastly heads of the sonnes of Ahab.

Some carnall eye that had seen so many young and smooth faces besmeared with blood, would have melted into compassion, bemoaning their harmlesse age, their untimely end. It is not for the justice of God to stand at the barre of our corrupted judgement. Except we include some grandchildren of Ahab within this number, none of these died before they were seasoned with horrible Idolatry; or if they had: they were in the loynes of Ahab when he sold himselfe to work wickednesse; and now it is just with God to punish Ahabs wickednesse in this fruit of his loynes. The holy severity of God in the revenge of sinne sometimes goes so far that our ignorance is ready to mistake it for cruelty.

The wonder and horror of those two heaps hath easily drawne together the people of Iezreel: Iehu meets them in that seat of publike judgement; and finding much amazednesse and passionate confusion in their faces, he cleares them, and sends them to the true originall of these sudden and astonishing massacres.

However his own conspiracy, and the cowardly treachery of the Princes of Israel had beene (not without their hainous sinne) the visible meanes of this judgement, yet hee directs their eyes to an higher authority; the just decree of the Almighty, manifested by his servant Elijah; who even by the willing sins of men can most wisely, most hostilely fetch about his most righteous and blessed purposes.

If the Peeres of Samaria out of a base feare, if Iehu out of an ambition of raigning, shed the foule blood of Ahabs posterity; the sinne is their own, but in the mean time the act is no other then what the infinite justice of God would justly work by their mis-intentions. Let these Israelites but look up from earth to heaven, these tragicall changes cannot trouble them; thither Iehu sends them: wiping off the envy of all this blood, by the warrant of the divine preordination: In obedience whereunto he sends after these heires of Ahab, all his kinsfolks, favorites, priests that remained in Iezreel: and now having cleared these coasts, he hastes to Samaria: whom should he meet with, in the way, but the brethren of Ahaziah King of Iudah? they are going to visit their cozens the sonnes of Ahab: This young troupe was thinking of nothing but jollity, and courtly entertainment, when they meet with death: So suddenly, so secretly had Iehu dispatched these bold executions, that these Princes could imagine no cause of suspition:

How

A How could they think it might be dangerous to bee knowne for the brethren of Ahaziah, or friends to the brethren of Iehoram? The just providence of the Almighty hath brought all this covey under one net; Iehu thinks it not safe to let goe so many avengers of Ahaziahs bloud; so many corrivals of his Soveraignty. The unhappy affinity of Iehoshaphat with Ahab is no lesse guilty of this slaughter, then Iehues ambition; This match by the inoculation of one bud, hath tainted all the sap of the house of Iudah. The two and forty brethren of Ahaziah are therefore sent after the seventy Sonnes of Ahab; that they may overtake them in death, whom they came to visit; God will much lesse brook Idolatry from the loynes of a Iehoshaphat: Our entireness with wicked men scoffes us both in their sinnes and judgements.

B Doubtlesse, many Israelites that were devoted to the family and allies of Ahab, lookt (what they durst) awry at this cõmon effusion of royall bloud, yet in the worst of the depravednesse of Israel, there were some which both drouped under the deplored Idolatry of the times, and congratulated to Iehu this severe vindication of Gods power: Amongst the rest, Ionadab the son of Rechab was most eminent. That man was by lineall derived from Iethro, a Midianite by nation, but incorporated into Israel; a man, whose piety and strict conversation did both teach, and shame those of the Tribe to which he was joyned; He was the author of an austere rule of civility to his posterity; to whom he debarred the use of wine, cities, possessions; This old and rough friend of Iehu (out of his moving habitations) meets him, and applauds his zeale; He that allowed not wine to his seed, allowes the bloud of Ahabs seed poured out, by the hand of Iehu; He that shun'd the city, is carried in Iehues charet to the palace of Samaria.

C How easily might Iehu have been deceived? Many a one professes uprightnesse, who yet is all guile: Ionadabs carriage hath been such, that his word merits trust: It is a blessing upon the plaine-hearted, that they can be beleeved. Honest Ionadab is admitted to the honour of Iehues seat; and called (instead of many) to witnesse the zeale of the new anointed King of Israel.

Whiles Iehu had to doe with Kings, his cunning and his courage held equall pace together; but now that he is to deale with idolatrous Priests, his wile goes alone, and prevailes: Hee calls the people together, and dissembling his intentions, sayes, Ahab served Baal a little, but Iehu shall serve him much: Now therefore
D call unto mee all the Prophets of Baal, all his servants, and all his priests, let none bee wanting: for I have a great sacrifice to do to Baal: whosoever shall be wanting, he shall not live.

What a dead paleness was there now in the faces of those few true-hearted Israelites, that looked for an happy restauration of the Religion of God? How could they choose but think; Alas, how are we fallen from our hopes? Is this the change we lookt for? was it only ambition that hath set this edge upon the sword of Iehu? It was not the person of Ahab that we disliked, but the sins: If those must still succeed, what have we gained: Wo be to us, if only the author of our misery be changed, not the condition, not the cause of our misery.

On the other side, what insultations and triumphs sounded every where of the E joyfull Baalites? What glorying of the truth of their profession, because of the successe? what scorns of their dejected opposites? what exprobrations of the disappointed hopes, and predictions of their adverse Prophets? what promises to themselves of a perpetuity of Baalisme? How did the dispersed priests of Baal now flock together, and applaud each others happinesse, and magnifie the devotions of their new Soveraigne? Never had that Idoll so glorious a day as this for the pompe of his service; Before, he was adored singlely in corners, now solemne sacrifices shall bee offered to him by all his clients, in the great Temple of the mother City of Israel. I can commend the zeal of Iehu, I cannot commend the fraud of Iehu; We may come to our end even by crooked wayes: He that bad him to smite for him, did not bid him to lie for him: Falsehood, though it be but tentative, is neither needed, nor approved by the God of truth: If policy have allowed officious untruths, Religion never.

By this device, the house of Baal is well furnished, well filled; not one of his Chemarim either might, or would be absent: not one of those which were present, might be unrobed: False Gods have ever affected to imitate the true. Even Baal hath Temples, Altars, Priests, vestments: All religions have allotted peculiar habits to their highest devotions. Those vestments which they mis-called sacred, are brought forth, and put on for the glory of this service.

Iehu and Ionadab are first carefull that this separation be exact, they search and see that no servant of the Lord be crept into that throng: What should a religious Israelite do in the Temple of Baal? Were any such there, he had deserved their smart, who would partake with their worship; but if curiosity should have drawne any thither, the mercy of Iehu seeks his rescue: How much more favourable is the God of mercies in not taking advantage of our infirmities.

Well might this search have bred suspition, were it not that in all those Idolatrous sacrifices, the first care was to avoid the prophane: Even Baal would admit no mixture, how should the true God abide it?

Nothing wanted now, but the sacrifice: No doubt whole heards and flocks were ready for a pretence of some royall hecatombes; whereof to me had now already smoaked on their Altars. O Iehu what means this dilation? If thou abhorrest Baal, why didst thou give way to this last sacrifice? why didst thou not cut off these Idolaters before this upshot of their wickednesse? Was it that thou mightest be sure of their guiltinesse? Was it that their number, together with their sinne, might be compleate? What acclamations were here to Baal, what joy in the freedome of their revived worship: When all on the sudden, those that had sacrificed, are sacrificed; The souldiers of Iehu by his appointment rush in with their swords drawne, and turne the temple into a slaughter-house. How is the tune now changed? What shricking was here? what out-cries? what running from one sword, to the edge of another? what scrambling up the walls and pillars? what climbing into the windowes? what vaine indevours to escape that death which would not be shunned? whether running, or kneeling, or prostrate, they must die.

The first part of the sacrifice was Baals, the latter is Gods: The bloud of beasts was offered in the one, of men in the other; the shedding of this was so much more acceptable to God, by how much these men were more beasts, then those they sacrificed. Oh happy obedience, God was pleased with a sacrifice from the house of Baal; The Idolaters are slain, the Idols burnt, the house of Baal turned to a draught; (though even thus lesse uncleane, lesse noysome, then in the former perfumes) and in one word, Baal is destroyed out of Israel.

Who that had seen all this zeale for God, would not have said; Iehu is a true Israelite? Yet, he that rooted out Ahab, would not be rid of Ieroboam. He that destroyed Baal, maintained the two Calves of Dan and Bethel. That Idolatry was of a lower ranke; as being a mis-worship of the true God, whereas the other was a worship of the false: Even the easier of both is hainous; and shall rob Iehu of the praise of his uprightnesse.

A false heart may laudably quit it selfe of some one grosse sin, and in the mean time hug some lesser evill that may condemn it; As a man recovered of a Fever may die of a Iaundis, or a Dropsie. We lose the thank of all, if we wilfully fault in one.

It is an entire goodnesse that God cares for; Perhaps, (such is the bounty of our God) a partiall obedience may be rewarded with a temporall blessing; (as Iehues severity to Ahab shall carry the crown to his seed for foure generations) but we can never have any comfortable assurance of an eternall retribution, if our hearts and wayes be not perfit with God. Wo be to us, O God, if we be not all thine, we cannot but everlastingly depart from thee, if we depart not from every sin; Thou hast purged our hearts from the Baal of our grosse Idolatries, oh clear us from the golden Calves of our petty corruptions also; that thou maist take pleasure in our uprightnesse; and we may reap the sweet comforts of thy glorious remuneration.

Athaliah

Athaliah and Joash.

OH the wofull ruines of the house of good Iehoshaphat! Iehu hath hath slain two and forty of his issue; Athaliah hopes to root out the rest: This daughter of Ahab was not like to be other then fatall to that holy Line; One drop of that wicked bloud was enough both to impure, and spill all the rest which affinity had mixed with it. 2 Kings 11, & 12. And 2 Chron. 23, & 24.

It is not unlike that Ahaziah betaking himself to the society of Iehorams wars, committed the sway of his Scepter to his mother Athaliah. The daughter of Iezebel cannot but be plotting: when she heares of the death of Ahaziah, and his brethren, inflicted by the heavy hand of Iehu, shee straight casts for the Kingdome of Judah: The true heires are infants, their minority gives her both colour of rule, and opportunity of an easie extirpation. Perhaps, her ambition was not more guilty then her zeale of Baalisme: shee saw Iehu out of a detestation of Idolatry, trampling on the blood of Iehoram, Iezebel, Ahaziah, the sons of Ahab, the brethren of Ahaziah, the priests and prophets of Baal, and in one word, triumphing in the destruction both of Ahab, and his Gods out of Israel: and now she thinks, Why should not I destroy Iehoshaphat, and his God out of Judah?

Who ever saw an Idolater that was not cruell? Athaliah must needs let out some of her own bloud, out of the throat of Ahaziahs sonnes; yet she spares not to shed it out of a thirst of soveraignty. O God how worthy of wonder are thy just and mercifull dispensations! In that thou sufferest the seed of good Iehoshaphat to be destroyed by her hand, in whose affinity he offended, and yet savest one branch of this stock of Iehoshaphat, for the sake of so faithfull a progenitor.

Wicked Athaliah, couldst thou think God would so far forget his Servant David (though no other of those loynes had seconded his vertues) as to suffer all his seed to be rooted out of the earth? This vengeance was not for thy father Ahab. The man according to Gods own heart shall have a lineall heir to succeed in his Throne, when thou and thy fathers house shall have vanished into forgetfulnesse.

For this purpose hath the wise providence of God ordained a Iehosheba, and matcht her in the Priestly Tribe: Such reverence did Iehoram, King of Judah (though degenerated into the Idolatry of his father in law Ahab) beare to this sacred function, that he marries his daughter to Iehoiada the Priest. Even Princesses did not then scorne the bed of those that served at Gods Altar: Why should the Gospell powre contempt upon that which the Law honoured?

That good Lady had too much of Iehoshaphat in her, to suffer the utter extirpation of that royall seed; She could not doubtlesse, without the extreme danger of her own life, save the life of her nephew Ioash; With what a loving boldnesse doth she adventure to steale him from amongst those bleeding carkasses, in the chamber of death? Her match gave her opportunity to effect that, which both nature, and Religion moved her to attempt: neither know I, whether more to wonder at the cunning of the device, or the courage of the enterprise, or the secrecy of the concealment, or the happinesse of the successe: Certainly, Athaliah was too cruelly carefull to forget this so late born son of Ahaziah; of all the rest, his age would not suffer him to be out of her eye: In all likelihood therefore, she must needs have missed so noted a corps, had there not been a substitution of some other dead child in his roome: In that age, the favour is not so distinguishable, especially of a dead face. Without some pious deceit this work could never have been affected; Else, had the child been secretly subduced, and missed by his bloudy grand-mother, her perpetuall jealousie had both expected a surviving heire, and continued a curious, and unavoydable search: both which were now shunned at once, whiles Athaliah reckons him for dead whom Iehoſheba hath preſerved. Miſchief ſometimes failes of thoſe appointments, wherein it thinks to have made the ſureſt work; God laughes in heaven at the plots of Tyrants; and befooles them in their deepeſt projects. He had ſaid to David, Of the fruit of thy body will I ſet upon thy ſeat; In vain ſhall earth and hell conſpire to fruſtrate it. A Sixe yeares hath Ioaſh, and his nurſe been hid in a cloſe cell of the Temple: Thoſe rooms were deſtin'd onely to the holy Tribe; yet now rejoyce to harbour ſuch a gueſt; The rigour of the ordinary Law muſt yeeld to caſes of ſo important neceſſity.

All this could not poſſibly bee done and continued without the privity of many faithfull Prieſts and Levites; who were as carefull to keep this counſell, as hopefull of the iſſue of it: It is not hard for many honeſt hearts to agree in a religious ſecrecie; Needs muſt thoſe lips be ſhut, which God hath ſealed up. B

Iudah had not been uſed to ſuch a yoke; long had it groaned under the tyranny not of a woman only, but of an Idolatrous Sydonian: If any of that ſexe might have claimed that Scepter, none had ſo much right to it, as Iehoſheba her ſelfe; But good Iehoiada the Prieſt, who had rather be a loyall guardian to the King, then an vnder-hand to a Queen, now findes time to ſet on foot the juſt title of Ioaſh; and to put him into the miſ-uſurped throne of his father Ahaziah.

In the ſeventh yeare, therefore, he ſends for the Captaines, and the Guard, and having ſworne them ſecrecy, by undoubted witneſſes makes faith unto them of the truth of their native Prince, thus happily reſcued from the bloudy knife of his mercileſſe Grandmother; marſhals the great buſineſſe of his Inauguration; gives every one his charge; ſets every one his ſtation; and ſo diſpoſes of his holy forces, as was moſt needfull for the ſafety of the King, the revenge of the Uſurper, the prevention of tumults, the eſtabliſhment of the Crowne upon the owners head in Peace and joy. C

There was none of all theſe agents who did not hold the buſineſſe to bee his owne. Every true ſubject of Iudah was feelingly intereſſed in this ſervice; neither was there any of them, who was not ſecretly heart-burned all this while, with the hatefull government of this Idolatrous Tyranneſſe: And now this inward fire is glad to find a vent; How gladly doe they addreſſe themſelves to this welcome imployment? The greateſt part of this ſecret band were Levites, who might therefore both meet together with leaſt ſuſpition, and bee more ſecurely truſted by Iehoiada, under whom they ſerved; Even that holy Prieſt of God inſtead of teaching the Law, ſets the Guard, orders the Captaines, ranges the troopes of Iudah; and inſtead of a Cenſer, brings forth the Speares and Shields of David; the Temple is, for the preſent, a Field, or an Artillery-yard; and the Ephods are turned into harneſſe. That houſe, in the rearing whereof not the noyſe of a hammer might be heard, now admits of the claſhing of armour, and the ſecret murmurs of ſome military atchievement. No circumſtances either of place, or calling, are ſo punctuall, as that publique neceſſity may not diſpenſe with their alteration. D

All things are now ready for this ſolemnity: Each man rejoyces to fixe upon his own footing; and longs to ſee the face of their long-concealed Soveraigne; and vowes his bloud to the vindication of the common liberty, to the puniſhment of a cruell intruder: Now Iehoiada brings forth unto them the Kings Sonne, and preſents him to the Peeres, and people; Hardly can the multitude containe it ſelfe from ſhouting out too ſoone: One ſees in his countenance the features of his father, Ahaziah; another of his Grand-father, Iehoram; a third profeſſes to diſcerne in him ſome lines, and faſhion of his great grand-father Iehoſhaphat; all find in his face the naturall impreſſions of Majeſty; and reade in it the hopes, yea the prophecies of their future happineſſe. Not with more joy, then ſpeed, doth Iehoiada accompliſh all the rites of the Coronation. Before that young King could know what was done to him; he is anointed, crowned; preſented with the booke of the Law: Thoſe ceremonies were inſtructive; and no doubt, Iehoiada failed E not

A not to comment upon them in due time, to that royall Pupill.

The Oyle, wherewith he was anointed, signified his designation to that high service; and those indowments from heaven that might inable him to so great a function.

The Crown, wherewith he was adorned, signified that glory and majesty which should both incourage and attend his Princely cares.

The book of the Testimony signified the divine rules and directions, whereto he must frame his heart and actions, in the weilding of that Crown, in the improvement of that oyle.

These three, the Oyle, the Crowne, the Testimony, that is, inward powers, outw[illegible] magnificence, true piety and justice make up a perfect Prince; None of B these [illegible] be wanting; If there be not a due calling of God, and abilities meet for that [illegible]esse, the [illegible] faileth: If there be not a Majestick grace and royalty that [illegible]ommar[illegible] the Crown is missing, If there be not a carefull respect [illegible] he[illegible] [illegible] absolute guide of all counsels, and determinations, the Test[illegible]m[illegible] [illegible]ll of them concurring, make both King and people happy.

Now it it is time for the pe[illegible]e to clap their hands, and by their lowd acclamations to witnesse their joy; which must needs break forth with so much more force, by how much it was longer, upon feares and policy, suppressed.

The Court and Temple were neer together; However it was with Athaliah, and the late revolted Princes of Iudah, according to the common word, the nee-
C rer to the Church, the further from God; their religious predecessors held it the greatest cõmodity of their house, that it neighboured upon the house of God; From her palace might Athaliah easily heare the joyfull shouts of the multitude, the lowd noise of the Trumpets; and as astonished with this new tumult of publique gratulations, she comes running into the Temple: Never had her foot trod upon that holy pavement, till now that she came to fetch a just revenge from that God whose worship she had contemned.

It fell out well that her sudden amazednesse called her forth, without the attendance of any strong guard, whose side-taking might have made that quarrell mutually bloudy: She soon heares and sees what she likes not; her eare meets with, God save the King; her eye meets with the unlooked-for heire of the Kingdome, sitting D on his throne, crowned, and robed, in the royall fashion, guarded with the Captains and souldiers, proclaimed by the Trumpeters, acclamed and applauded by the people.

Who can say whether this sight drave her more neere to frenzy, or death? How could it be otherwise, when those great spirits of hers, that had been long used to an uncontrolled soveraignty, finde themselves so inexpectedly suppressed.

She now rends her cloathes, and cryes, Treason, treason, as if that voice of hers could still command all hearts, all hands; as if one breath of hers were powerfull enough to blow away all these new designes: Oh Athaliah, to whom dost thou complain thy selfe? they are thy just executioners wherewith thou art in-
E compassed; If it be treason to set up the true heire of Ahaziah, thou appeales to thy Traitors. The treason was thine, theirs is justice; The time is now come of thy reckonings for all the royall blood of Iudah, which thine ambition shed; wonder rather at the patience of this long forbearance, then the rigour of this execution.

There needs no formall seat of Iustice in so apparent offence, Iehoiada passes the sentence of death upon her; Have her forth of the ranges; Let her not be slaine in the house of the Lord; and him that followeth her, kill with the sword.

Had not this usurpation been palpable, Iehoiada would not have presumed to intermeddle; Now being both the Priest of God, and Uncle and Protector to the lawfull king, he doth that, out of the necessity of the State, which his infant Soveraigne (if he could have been capable of those thoughts) would have desired.

Violent hands are laid upon Athaliah, whom no doubt a proud and furious disdain of so quick a charge, and of so rough an usage made miserably impatient; Now she frownes, and cals, and shrieks, and commands, and threatens, and reviles, and intreats in vain; and dies with as much ill will from her selfe, as she lived with the ill will of her repining subjects.

I see not any one man of all her late flatterers, that followes her, either for pity, or rescue; Every man willingly gives her up to justice; Not one sword is drawn in her defence; Not one eye laments her. Such is the issue of a tyrannicall misgovernment; that which is obeyed not without secret hate, is lost not without publique joy.

How like is Athaliah to her mother Iezebel, as in conditions and carriage, so even in death; Both kild violently, both killed under their own walls, both slain with Treason in their mouths, both slain in the entrance of a changed government. One trod on by the horses, the other slain in the horse-gate. Both paid their own blood for the innocent blood of others.

How suddenly, how easily is Judah restored to it self, after so long, and so full a depravation; The people scarce beleeve their own eyes, for the wonder of this happy change; neither know I whether they be more joyed in the sight of their new King thus strangely preserved, or in the sight of Iehoiada, that had preserved him.

No man can envy the protection of the young King unto him, by whose means he lives and raignes: That holy man cares onely to improve his authority, to the common good: He makes a covenant between the Lord, and the King, and people; and after so long and dangerous a disjunction, reunites them to each other. Their zealous zeale bestirs it selfe, and breaks down the Temples, and Altars, and Images of Baal, and sacrifices his idolatrous Priests; Shortly, both Ahab and Baal is destroyed out of Judah.

The Scepter of Judah is changed from a woman, to a child; but, a Child trained up, and tutored by Iehoiada; This minority so guided was not inferiour to the mature age of many predecessors. Happy is that land, the non-age of whose Princes falls so to holy and just hands. Yet even these holy and just hands came short of what they might have done; The high places remained still: Those altars were erected to the true God, but in a wrong place: It is marvell if there be not some blemishes found in the best government: I doubt Iehoiada shall once abuy it dear, that he did not his utmost.

But for the main, all was well with Judah, in all the dayes of Iehoiada; even after that Ioash was grown past his pupillage: He that was the Tutor to his infancy, was his counsellour of his ripe age; and was equally happy in both. [illegible] that good High Priest, to be commanded by that charge of his in the behoofe of God? The yong King gives order to the Priests, for the collection of large sums for the repairing of the breaches of Gods house. It becomes him well to take care for that, which was the nursery of his infancy: And now, after three and twenty yeares he expostulates with his late Guardian, Iehoiada, and the rest of his [illegible]; Why repair ye not the breaches?

Oh gracious and happy vicissitude; Iehoiada the Priest had ruled the Person of King Ioash in matters of State; and now Ioash the King commands and Iehoiada the Priest in matter of devotion. In the affaires of God; the action is the Priests, the over-sight and coaction is the Princes: By the carefull indeavour of both, Gods house is repaired, his service flourisheth.

But alas, that it may too well appeare, that the ground of this devotion was altogether inward, no sooner doth the life of Iehoiada cease then the [illegible] of Ioash begins to langu[illegible] some langnor, dyes.

The benefit of a t[illegible] or Statesman, is not known till his losse.

Now some Idolat[illegible] Judah have soone misled the King from the House of the Lord [illegible] Fathers to serve Groves and Idols. Yea [illegible] ving been estranged from the Prophet Elisha, and sharply rebuked for the like offence, makes love to his dying reprover, and bedewes his pale face with his teares: Both were bad enough, but this of Israel was, how ever vicious, yet good natured: That of Iudah added to his wickednesse, an ill disposition, a dogged humour. There are varieties even of evill men; some are worse at the root, others at the branch; some more civilly harmlesse, others fouler in morality. According to the exercise of the restraining grace, naturall men doe either rise, or fall in their ill.

The longest day must have his evening: Good Elisha, that had lived some ninety yeares, a wonder of Prophets, and had out-worn many successions in the thrones of Israel, and Iudah, is now cast upon the bed of his sicknesse, yea, of his death: That very age might seem a disease; which yet is seconded with a lingring distemper. It is not in the power of any holinesse to priviledge us from mortality of body, from finall dissolution. He that stretched himselfe upon his bed, over the dead carkasse of the Shunamites son, and revived it, must now stretch out his own limbes upon his sick bed, and die. He saw his Master Elijah rapt up suddenly from the earth, and fetcht by a fiery chariot from this vale of mortality; himselfe must leisurely wait for his last pangs, in a lingring passage to the same glory. There is not one way appointed to us, by the divine providence, unto one common blessednesse: One hath more pain, another hath more speed: Violence snatcheth away one, another by an insensible pace drawes every day neerer to his terme: The wisedome and goodnesse of God magnifies it selfe in both: Happy is hee that after due preparation, is past through the gates of death, ere he be aware; Happy is he that by the holy use of long sicknesse is taught to see the gates of death a farre off, and addressed for a resolute passage: The one dies like Elijah, the other like Elisha, both blessedly.

The time was, when a great King sent to Elisha to know if he should recover; now the King of Israel, as knowing that Elisha shall not recover (so had his consumption spent him) comes to visit the dying Prophet; and when his teares would give him leave, breaks forth into a passionate exclamation, O my father, my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof. Yet the Calves of Dan and Bethel have left some goodnesse in Ioash; As the best man hath something in him worthy of reproofe; so the faultiest hath something commendable. Had not the Spirit of God himself told us, that Ioash did that which was evill in the sight of the Lord, we had admired this piety, this reverent respect to the Prophet. The holiest man could not have said more: It is possible for the clients of a false worship, to honour (out of another regard) the professors of Truth; From the hand of Elisha had Iehu the Grand-father of Ioash received his unction to the Kingdome: this favour might not be forgotten.

Visitation of the sick is a duty required both by the law of humanity, and of Religion; Bodily infirmity is sad, and comfortlesse; and therefore needs the presence, and counsell of friends to relieve it; Although, when wee draw the curtains of those that are eminently gracious, wee doe rather fetch (with Ioash) then bring a blessing.

How sensible should we be of the losse of holy men, when a Ioash spends his tears upon Elisha? If we be more affected with the forgoing of a naturall friend, or kinsman, then of a noted and usefull Prophet, it argues more love to our selves, then to the Church of God, then to God himselfe.

What use there was of chariots and horsemen in those warres of the Ancient, all Histories can tell us: All the strength of the battell stood in these: There could be neither defence, nor offence, but by them: such was Elisha unto Israel; The greatest safegard to any nation is the sanctity and faithfulnesse of their Prophets; without which the Church and State lies open to utter desolation.

The same words that Elisha said of his master Elijah, when he saw him taken up from the earth, doth Ioash now speak of Elisha, neere his dissolution: O my father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. The words were good;

... but where are the actions? O Israel, had thou ... were thy fathers, when wantly shall obedience? How ... down of the hand ... thou couldst ... as ... to good, thou didst evil ... ing doores of the Temple ...

... Prophet were the ... and horsemen of Israel, why didst thou ... guard his holy ... weapon for his losse, why didst thou not ... of these sons of thine, that preserved ...

Had thine hand not ... thy tongue, Israel had been happy in Elisha; ... had been happy in Israel, ... then. Words are no good triall of ... : The worst men may ... with. Actions have only the power to ... hypocrites.

B Yet even a Iosash ... complying, shall not goe away unblessed: ... as our-ward kindnesse shall receive an ... retribution; These few ... of warm water shed upon the face of a Prophet, shall not lose their reward: The spirit of prophesie forsakes not the death-bed of Elisha; Hee calls for bow and arrowes, and puts them into the hand of Ioash, and putting his hands upon the Kings hand, he bids to shoot Eastward: and whiles the shaft flyes, and lights, he saies, The Arrow of the Lords deliverance from Syria, for thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek, till thou hast consumed them. If the weak and withered hand of the Prophet had not been upon the youthfull, and vigorous hand of the King, this bow had beene drawne in vaine; the strength was from the hand of the King, the blessing from the hand of the Prophet: Hee whose reall parable hath made the earth to be Syria, the arrow, revenge, the archer, Ioash, hath obtained for his last boone from God to Israel, that this archer shall shoot this arrow of revenge, into the heart of Syria, and wound it to death. When then the hand of the King, and of the Prophet, drawes together, there cannot chuse but successe must follow.

C How sadly doth Elisha now make good the words of Ioash? How truly is he the Chariots and Horsemen of Israel! Israel had not fought without him, much lesse had bin victorious: If there be the indeavour, the successe is his: Even the dying Prophet puts life and speed into the Forces of Israel, and while he is digging his own grave, is raising Trophees to Gods people.

He had received kindnesse from the Syrians; amongst them ... he harbour'd in the dearth; and from some of their Nobles, was presented with rich gifts; but their enmity to Israel drownes all his private respects, hee will not but professe hostility to the publique enemies of the Church: Neither can he be content himselfe with a single prediction of their ruine. He bids Ioash ... the arrowes, and smite upon the ground, he sees no number of those strokes; ... losing the frequence of those blowes, which Ioash might well (upon this forged, parabolicall act) understand to bee significant. The slacke hand of the King smites but thrice. So apt wee are to be wanting to our selves; so coldly doe wee execute the commands of God: The sick Prophet is not more grieved, then angry at this dull negligence; Doubtlesse God had revealed to him (for his last gratification) that upon his fervent prayers, so oft as Ioash should voluntarily (after his generall charge) smite the earth, so oft should Israel smite Syria. Elishaes zeal doth not languish with his body: with a fatherly authority he chides him, who had stiled him father; not fearing to spend some of his last winde in a milde reproofe, Thou shouldest have smitten five or six times, then thou hadst smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it, whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice. Not that the unchangeable decree of the Almighty meant to suspend it selfe upon the uncertaine issue of Ioashes will; but, he that puts this word into the mouth of his Prophet, puts this motion into the hand of the King, which did not more willingly stay, then necessarily obey the providence whereby it was stirred. Even whiles wee have our freest choyce, wee fall upon those actions and circumstances, whereby the just and holy will of our God is brought about. Our very neglects, our ignorances shall fulfill his eternall counsells.

Elisha

Eliſha dies, and is buried; his miracles doe not ceaſe with his life: Who can marvell that his living prayers raiſed the ſon of the Shunamite, when his dead bones raiſe the carkaſſe that touched them. God will be free in his workes; he that muſt [illegible] himſelfe, yet ſhall revive another, the ſame power might have continued life to him, that gave it by his bones. Iſrael ſhall well [illegible] he lives, by whoſe vertue Eliſha was both in life, and death, miraculous: [illegible] the Prophet was alive, the impetration might ſeem to be his, though the power were Gods; now that he is dead, the bones can challenge nothing, but ſend the wandring Iſraelites to that almighty Agent, to whom it is all one to worke by the quick, or dead. Were not the men of Iſrael more dead then the carkaſſe thus buried, how could they chooſe but ſee in this revived corps, an embleme of their own condition? How could they chooſe but think, If we adhere to the God of Eliſha, he ſhall raiſe our decayed eſtates, and reſtore our nation to the former glory. A B

The Sadducees had as yet no being in Iſrael, with what face could that hereſie ever after look into the world, when before the birth of it, it was ſo palpably convinced, with an example of the reſurrection? Intermiſſion of time, and degrees of corruption adde nothing to the impoſſibility of our riſing: The body that is once cold in death, hath no more aptitude to a reanimation, then that which is moldred into duſt; Onely the divine power of the Maker, muſt reſtore either, can reſtore both: When we are dead, and buried in the grave of our ſinne, it is onely the touch of Gods Prophets, applying unto us the death and reſurrection of the Son of God, that can put new life into us; No leſſe true, though ſpirituall, is the miracle of our raiſing up from an eſtate of inward corruption, to a life of grace. C

Yet all this prevailes not with Iſrael: No bones of Eliſha could raiſe them from their wicked Idolatry: and, notwithſtanding their groſſe ſinnes, Ioaſh their King proſpers: Whether it were for the ſake of Iehu, whoſe grand-child he was, or for the ſake of Eliſha, whoſe face he wept upon, his hand is notably ſucceſſefull: not only againſt the ſon of Hazael, King of Syria, whom he beats out of the Cities of Iſrael; but, againſt Amaziah King of Judah, whom he took Priſoner, beating down the very wals of Jeruſalem, and returning laden with the ſacred, and rich ſpoile both of the Temple, and Court, to his Samaria.

Oh the depth of the divine Juſtice, and wiſedome in theſe outward adminiſtrations! The beſt cauſe, the beſt man doth not ever fare beſt: Amaziah did that which was right in the ſight of the Lord, Ioaſh, evill: Amaziah followes David (though not with equall paces) Ioaſh followes Ieroboam, yet is Amaziah ſhamefully foiled by Ioaſh; Whether God yet meant to viſit upon this King of Judah, the ſtill-odious unthankfulneſſe of his father to Iehoiada; or, to plague Judah for their ſhare in the blood of Zecharia, and their late revolt to Idolatry; or, whether Amaziahs too much confidence in his own ſtrength (which moved his bold challenge to Ioaſh) were thought fit to be thus taken downe; or what ever other ſecret ground of Gods judgement there might be, it is not for our preſumption to enquire: Who ſo by the event ſhal judge of love, or hatred, ſhall be ſure to run upon that woe, which belongs to them that call good evill, and evill good. D

What a ſavage peece of juſtice is it to put the right, whether of inheritance, or honour, to the deciſion of the ſword, when it is no newes for the better to miſcarry by the hand of the worſe. E

The race is not to the ſwift; the battell is not to the ſtrong; no not to the good: Perhaps, God wil correct his own by a foyle, perhaps, he will plague his enemy by a victory. They are only our ſpirituall combats wherein our faithfull courage is ſure of a crowne.

Uzziah Leprous.

EVen the throne of David passed many changes of good, and evill: Good Iehoshaphat was followed with three successions of wicked Princes; and those three, were againe succeeded with three others godly, and vertuous; Amaziah for a long time shone faire, but at the last, shut up in a cloud, the gods of the Edomites marred him; his rebellion against God, hurred up his peoples rebellion against him: The same hands that slew him, crowned his sonne Vzziah; so as the young King might imagine it was not their spight, that drew violence upon his father, but his own wickednesse. Both early did this Prince raigne and late, he began at sixteene; and sat fifty two yeeres in the Throne of Iudah: They that mutined in the declining age of Amaziah, the father; are obsequious to the childhood of the sonne, as if they professed to adore Soveraignty, whiles they hated lewdnesse: The unchanged government of good Princes is the happinesse, no lesse of the subjects then of themselves: The hand knowes best to guide those raines to which it hath been inured; and even meane hackneyes goe on chearefully in their wonted rode; Custome, as it makes evils more supportable, so where it meets with constant mindes, makes good things more pleasing and beneficiall.

2 Chron. 26. And 2 Kings 15.

The wise and holy Prophet Zechariah, was an happy Tutor to the minority of King Vzziah; That vessell can hardly mis-carry where a skilfull stereſ-man sits at the helme: The first praise of a good Prince is to be judicious, and just, and pious, in himselfe; the next is, to give eare, and way, to them that are such: Whiles Zechariah hath the visions of God, and Vzziah takes the counsels of Zechariah, it is hard to say whether the Prophet, or the King, or the State be happier.

God will be in no mans debt; so long as Vzziah sought the Lord, God made him to prosper. Even what we doe out of duty cannot want a reward: Godlinesse never disappointed any mans hopes, oft hath exceeded them. If Vzziah fight against the Philistims, if against the Arabians, and Mehunims; according to his names, the strength, the help of the Almighty is with him: The Ammonites come in with presents, and all the neighbour-nations ring of the greatnesse, of the happinesse of Vzziah, his bounty and care makes Jerusalem both strong, and proud of her new Towers; yea the very Desert must taste of his munificence.

Uzziah, Azariah,

The outward magnificence of Princes cannot stand firme, unlesse it be built upon the foundations of providence and frugality; Vzziah had not been so great a King, if he had not been so great an husband; he had his flocks in the deserts, and his heards in the plains; his ploughs in the fields, his vinedressers upon the mountaines, and in Carmell: neither was this more out of profit, then delight, for he loved husbandry. Who can contemne those callings for meanesse, which have been the pleasures of Princes?

Hence was Vzziah so potent at home, so dreadfull to his neighbours; his warres had better sinewes then theirs; Which of his predecessors was able to maintain so setled an army, of more then of three hundred and tenne thousand trained souldiers well furnished, well fitted for the suddennest occasion? Thrift is the strongest prop of power.

The greatnesse of Vzziah, and the rare devices of his artificiall Engines for war, have not more raised his fame, then his heart: so is he swolne up with the admiration of his own strength, and glory, that he breakes againe; How easie it is for the best man to dote upon himself, and to be lifted up so high, as to lose the sight both of the ground, whence he arises, and of the hand that advanced him? How hard it is for him that hath invented strange Engines for the battering of his enemies, to find out any meanes to beat downe his owne proud thoughts? Wise Salomon knew what he did, when he prayed to be delivered from too much: Lest, said he, I be full and deny thee

thee, and say, Who is the Lord? Upon this Rock did the son of Salomon runne and split himselfe; His full sayles of prosperity carried him into presumption and ruine; what may he not doe? what may he not be? Because he found his power otherwise unlimited, over-ruling in the Court, the Cities, the Fields, the Deserts, the armes, and Magazins, therefore he thinks he may doe so in the Temple too: as things royall, civill, husbandly, military passed his hands, so why should not (thinkes he) sacred also? It is a dangerous indiscretion for a man not to know the bounds of his own calling: What confusion doth not follow upon the breaking of the rankes? A

Upon a solemne day, King Vzziah clothes himself in Pontificall robes, and in the view of that populous assembly, walkes up in state, into the Temple of God, and boldly approching to the Altar of Incense, offers to burn sweet odors unto the God of heaven: Azariah the Priest is sensible of so perillous an incroachment; he therefore, attended with fourescore valiant assistants of that holy Tribe, hastens after the King, & finding him with the censer in his hand, ready addressed to that sinfull devotion, stayes him with a free, and grave expostulation: There is no place wherein I could be sorry to see thee, O King, but this, where thou art; neither is there any act, that we should grudge thee so much, as this, which is the most sacred; Is it possible that so great an oversight should fall into such wisdome? Can a religious Prince trained up under a holy Zechariah, after so many yeares zealous profession of piety, be either ignorant, or regardlesse of those limits which God hath set to his own services?

Oh, what meanes this uncouth attempt? Consider O dear Soveraigne, for Gods sake, for thy soules sake, consider where thou art, what thou doest; it is Gods house wherein thou standest, not thine own; Looke about thee, and see, whether these vailes, these Tables, these Pillars, these wals, these Pavements, have any resemblance of earth: There is no place in all the world whence thy God hath excluded thee, but only this; this he hath reserved for his owne use: And canst thou think much to allow one roome as proper to him, who hath not grudged all the rest to thee? But if it be thy zeale of a personall service to God, that hath caried thee hither, alas, how canst thou hope to please the Almighty with a forbidden sacrifice? Which of thine holy Progenitors ever dared to tread, where thy foot now standeth? Which of them ever put forth their hand to touch this sacred Altar? Thou knowest that God hath set apart, and sanctified his own attendants; Wherefore serves the Priesthood, if this be the right of Kings? were it not for the strict prohibition of our God, it could seem no other then an honour to our profession, that a King should think to dignifie himselfe by our imployment; but now knowing the severe charge of the great King of heaven, we cannot but tremble to see that censer in thine hand, who ever, out of the holy Tribe, hath wielded it unrevenged? This affront is not to us, it is to the God whom we serve; In awe of that terrible Majesty, as thou wouldst avoid some exemplary judgement, O King withdraw thy-selfe, not without humble deprecations, from this presence; and lay down that interdicted handfull, with feare and trembling; Be thou ever a King, let us be Priests; The Scepter is thine, let Censers be ours. C D

What religious heart could do other then relent at so faithfull and just an admonition? But how hard is it for great persons to yeeld they have offended? Vzziah must not be faulty, what is done rashly shall be borne out with power; Hee was wroth, and thus expresseth it: What means this saucy expostulation, O ye sons of Levi, how dare yee thus malapertly controll the well-meant actions of your Soveraigne? If yee be Priests, remember that ye are subjects; or if yee will needs forget it, how easie is it for this hand to awake your memory? What such offence can it be for me to come into that house, and to touch that Altar, which my royall Progenitors have made, beautified, consecrated? Is the God of this place only yours? Why do ye thus ambitiously ingrosse Religion? If Princes have not intermedled with these holy affaires, it was because they would not, not because they might not; When those lawes were made for the Sanctuary, there were no Kings to grace these divine E ceremonies

A ceremonies; yet even then, Moses was priviledged. The persons of Princes (if yee know not) are no lesse sacred then your own. It is your presumption to account the Lords anointed, prophane: Contest with those, whose dry and unhallowed heads are subject to your power; For me, I will not ask your leave to be devout; Look yee to your own Censures, presume not to meddle with mine; In the mean time, can ye think this insolence of yours shall escape unrevenged? Can it stand with the honour of my soveraignty, to be thus proudly checked by subjects? God doe so to me and more also, if. Whiles Uzziah yet speakes, God strikes: Ere the word of thy can come forth of his mouth, the leprosie appears in his forehead: the place is most loathsome, the forehead is the most conspicuous part: If this foulnesse had first broken forth upon his hand, or foot, or breast, it might have lurked from the eyes of men; now the forehead is smitten with this judgment, that God may proclaim to all beholders, Thus shall it be done to the man whose arrogance hath thrust him upon a sacred charge. Publique offences must have open shame.

It is a dangerous thing to put our selves into the affaires, into the presence of God, unwarranted; There cannot be a more foolish misprision, then, because we are great on earth, to think we may be bold with heaven: When Gods messengers cannot prevail by counsels, intreaties, threats, it is time for God to show his immediate judgements. Wilfull offenders can expect nothing but a fearfull revenge.

Now begins Uzziah to be confounded in himself; and shame strives with leprosie, for a place in his forehead. The hand of God hath done that in an instant which
C all the tongues of men had attempted in vain: There needs no further solicitor of his egresse; the sense of his plague sends him forth alone. And now he thinkes, Wretched man that I am, how have I angred God; and undone my self? I would needs come in like a Priest, and now go forth a Leper: the pride of my heart made me think my self worthy the presence of a God; Gods just displeasure hath now made me unworthy of the presence of men: whiles I affected the altar, I have lost my throne; whiles I scornfully rejected the advice and censures of Gods Ministers, I am now become a spectacle of horror, and deformity, to my own servants; I that would be sending up perfumes to heaven, have made my nastinesse hatefull to my own senses. What doe I under this sacred roof? Neither is Gods house now, for me, nor mine own; what cell, what dungeon is close enough for me, wherein to wear
D out the residue of mine unhappy and uncomfortable dayes? O God thou art just, and I am miserable.

Thus with a dejected countenance, and sad heart, doth Uzziah haste to retire himselfe; and wishes, that he could be no lesse hid from himselfe, then from others: How easie is it for the God of heaven to bring down the highest pitch of earthly greatnesse, and to humble the stubbornest pride?

Upon the leisure of second thoughts, Uzziah cannot but acknowledge much favour in this correction, and confesse to have escaped well; Others, he knew, had been struck dead, or swallowed up quick for so presumptuous an intrusion: It is happy for him if his forehead may excuse his soul.

Uzziah ceased not to be a King, when he began to be a leper; the disease of his
E forehead did not remove his Crown: his sonne Iotham raigned for him, under him, and whiles he was not seen, yet he was obeyed. The character of Soveraignty is indeleble, whether by bodily infirmity, or by spirituall censure: Neither is it otherwise, O God, betwixt thee and us, if we be once a royall generation unto thee, our leprosies may deform us, they shall not dethrone us: still shall we have the right, still the possession of that glorious kingdome, wherein we are invested from eternity.

Ahaz with his new Altar.

2 Kings 16.

AFter many unhappy changes of the two thrones, Ahaz succeeds Iotham in the Kingdome of Judah: an ill son of a good father; not more the heir of Davids seat, then of Ieroboams sin: Though Israel play the harlot, yet who can abide that Judah should sin? It is hard not to be infected with a contagious neighbour-hood; who ever read that the Kingdome of Israel was seasoned with the vicinity of the true Religion of Judah? Goodnesse (such as our nature is) is not so apt to spread: A tainted ayre doth more easily affect a sound body, then an wholesome ayre can cleare the sick? Superstition hath ever been more successefull, then truth; The yong yeares of Ahaz are soon mis-led to a plausible mis-devotion.

A man that is once false from truth, knowes not where he shall stay: From the Calves of Ieroboam is Ahaz drawn to the gods of the heathen; yea, now, Bulls and Goates are too little for those new deities, his own flesh and blood is but dear enough; He made his sonne to passe through their fire. Where doe we find any religious Israelite thus zealous for God? Neither doth the holinesse and mercy of our God require so cruell a sacrifice: neither is our dull, and niggardly hand ready to gratifie him with more easie obediences; O God how gladly should we offer unto thee our soules, and bodies, which we may enjoy so much the more, when they are thine; since zealous Pagans stick not to leese their own flesh, and blood in an Idols fire?

He that hath thus shamefully cast off the God of his fathers, cannot be long without a fearfull revenge. The King of Israel galls him on the one side; the King of Syria on the other: To avoid the shock of both, Ahaz doth not betake himself to the God whom he had offended, who was able to make his enemies at peace with him; but to Tiglah Pileser King of Ashur: him doth he woo with suites, with gifts, and robs God of those presents, which may indear so strong a helper. He that thought not his son too dear for an Idoll, thinks not Gods silver and gold too dear for an Idolatrous abettor.

Oh the infinite patience of the Almighty! God gives successe a while to so offensive a rivality: This Assyrian King prevailes against the King of Syria, kills him, and takes his chiefe City, Damascus; The quarrell of the King of Judah hath enlarged the Territories of his assistant, beyond hope; And now, whiles this Assyrian victor is enjoying the possession of his new-won Damascus, Ahaz goes up thither to meet him, to congratulate the victory, to adde unto those triumphs, which were drawne on by his solicitation. There he sees a new fashioned Altar, that pleases his eye; that old forme of Salomons, which was made by the pattern shewed to Moses in the Mount, is now grown stale, and despicable; A modell of this more exquisite frame is sent to Vrijah, the Priest; and must be sampled in Ierusalem.

It is a dangerous presumption to make innovations, if but in the circumstances of Gods worship. Those humane additions which would seem to grace the institution of God, deprave it: That infinite wisdome knowes best what will please it selfe, and prescribes accordingly; The foolishnesse of God is wiser then the wisdome of men; Idolatry and falshood is commonly more gawdy and plausible, then truth; That heart which can for the outward homelinesse despise the ordinances of God, is already aliened from true Religion, and lies open to the grosseſt superstition.

Never any Prince was so foulely idolatrous, as that he wanted a Priest to second him: An Vrijah is fit to humour an Ahaz. Greatnesse could never command any thing, which some servile wits were not ready both to applaud, and justifie.

Ere the King can be returned from Damascus, the altar is finished; It were happy if true godlines could be so forward in the prosecutions of good. Neither is this strange pile reared only, but thrust up betwixt Gods Altar, and the Temple; in an apparent precedency, as if he had said, Let the God of Iudah come behinde the Deities of Syria.

And

A And now, to make up the full measure of his impiety, this idolatrous King will himselfe be sacrificing upon his new altar, to his new gods, the gods of Damascus: An usurped priesthood well becomes a false Deity. Because (saith he) the gods of the Kings of Syria help them, therefore will I sacrifice to them, that they may help me.

Oh blinde superstition! how did the gods of Syria help their Kings, when both those Kings, and their gods were vanquished, and taken by the King of Assyria? Even this Damascus, and this altar were the spoile of a forraigne enemy; How then did the gods of Syria help their Kings, any other, then to their ruine? what dotage is this to make choyce of a foyled protection? But had the Syrians prospered, must their gods have the thankes? Are there no authours good but blockes or Devills? Or is an outward prosperity the only argument of truth, the onely motive of devotion? O fond Ahaz, this is the God thou hast forsaken, that plagues thee, under whose only arme thou slaughterst have prevailed. His Power beates those Pagan Rockes, one against another, so, as one while, one seemes victorious, another vanquisht; and at last he confounds both, together with their proudest clients: Thy selfe shalt be the best instance.

B Of all the Kings of Iudah hitherto, there is none so dreadfull an example either of sin, or judgement, as this son of good Iotham. I abhorre to think that such a monster should descend from the loynes of David; where should be the period of this wickednesse? He began with the high places, thence he descends to the Calves of Dan and Bethel, from thence he falls to a Syrian altar, to the Syrian god; then from a partnership he falls to an utter exclusion of the true God, and blocking up his Temple; and then to the sacrifice of his owne son; and at last, as if hell were broken loose upon Gods inheritance, every severall City, every high place of Iudah hath a new god: No marvell if he be branded by the Spirit of God, with, This is that King Ahaz.

C What a fearefull plague did this noysome deluge of sin leave behinde it, in the land of Iudah? who can expresse the horror of Gods revenge upon a people that should have been his? Pekah the King of Israel, slew an hundred and twenty thousand of them in one day: amongst whom was Maseiah the son of Ahaz: O just judgment of the Almighty! Ahaz sheds the blood of one sonne to an Idoll: The true God sheds the blood of another of his sons, in revenge.

Yet, the hand of the Lord is stretched out still:

D Two hundred thousand of them were caried away by the Israelites captive, to Samaria.

The Edomites came, and carried away another part of them for bondslaves, to their country.

The Philistims came up and shared the Cities of the South of Iudah, and the villages thereof; Shortly, what other is miserable Iudah, then the prey, and spoile of all the neighbouring Nations? For the Lord brought Iudah low because of Israel, for hee made Iudah naked, and transgressed sore against the Lord: As for the great King of Assur, whom Ahaz purchased with the sacrilegious pillage of the house of God, instead of an ayde, he proves a burden; However he sped in his first onsets, now, hee distressed Iudah, but strengthned it not: The charge was as great, as the benefit small: sooner shall he eat them out, then rescue them. No arme of flesh can shelter Ahaz from a vengeance. 2 Chro. 28. 19

E Be wise, O yee Kings, be instructed O yee Judges of the earth; serve the Lord with feare, and rejoyce with trembling; Kisse the Son lest he be angry, and yee perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little.

His subjects complaine, that he dyed so late, and, as repenting that he ever was, deny him a roome in the sepulchers of Kings: as if they said; the common earth of Ierusalem is too good for him that degenerated from his Progenitors, marred his Kingdome, depraved his people, forsook his God.

The utter destruction of the Kingdome of Israel.

2 Kings 17.

IUdah was at a sore heave; yet Israel shall miscary before it: such are the sinnes of both, that they strive whether shall fall first; but this lot must light upon the tenne Tribes; though the late King of Iudah were personally worse then the most of Ieroboams successors, yet the people were generally lesse evill, upon whom the incroachments of Idolatry were more by obtrusion then by consent; besides that, the thrones of Iudah had some interchanges of good Princes, Israel none at all: The same Justice therefore that made Israel a scourge to Iudah, made Assyria a scorpion to Israel.

B

It was the quarrell of Iudah that first inraged the King of Ashur in this warre against Israel; now he is not so easily fetcht on; So wee have seen some eager Mastive, that hath been set on by the least clap of the hand, but could not be loosned by the force of staves.

Salmanesser King of Assyria comes up against Hoshea King of Israel, and subdues him and puts him to his Tribute: This yoke was uncouth and unpleasing; The vanquisht Prince was neither able to resist, nor willing to yeeld; secretly therefore hee treats with the King of Egypt for assistance, as desiring rather to hazard his liberty by the hand of an equall, then to enjoy a quiet subjection under the hand of an overruling power; we cannot blame Princes to be jealous of their Soveraignties; The detaining of his yearly Tribute, and the whisperings with new confederates, have drawn up the King of Ashur to perfect his own victories: Hee returnes therefore with a strong power, and after three yeares siege, takes Samaria, imprisons Hoshea, and in the exchange of a wofull captivity, he peoples Israel with Assyrians, and Assyria with Israelites. Now that abused soyle hath upon a surfet of wickednesse cast out her perfidious owners, and will try how it can fare with heathenish strangers: Now the Assyrian gallants triumph in the Palaces of Samaria and Iezreel, whiles the Peeres and Captaines of Israel are driven manicled through the Assyrian streetes and billeted to the severall places of their perpetuall servitude: Shortly, now the flourishing Kingdome of the ten Tribes is come to a finall and shamefull end; and so vanished in this last dissipation, that, since that day, no man could ever say, This was Israel.

Oh terrible example of vengeance, upon that peculiar people, whom God hath chosen for himselfe, out of all the world! All the world were witnesses of the favours of their miraculous deliverances, and protections; All the world shall be witnesses of their just confusion.

D

It is not in the power of sleight errors to set off that infinite mercy: What was it, O God, what was it that caused thee to cast off thine owne inheritance? What but the same that made thee to cast the Angells out of heaven? Even their rebellious sinnes. Those sinnes had to emulate the greatnesse of thy mercies, no lesse, then they forced the severity of thy judgements: They left all the commandements of the Lord their God; and made them molten Images, even two Calves; and made a grove and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served Baal, and caused their sonnes and their daughters to passe through the fire, and used divination, and enchantments, and sold themselves to doe evill in the sight of the Lord to provoke him to anger.

E

Neither were these slips of frailty, or ignorant miss-takings, but wilfull crimes, obstinate impieties, in spight of the doctrines, reproofes, menaces, miraculous convictions of the holy Prophets, which God sent amongst them: Thy destruction is of thy self, O Israel; what could the just hand of the Almighty doe lesse then consume a nation so incorrigibly flagitious? A nation so unthankfull for mercies, so impatient of remedies, so uncapable of repentance: so obliged, so warned, so shamelesly lewdly wicked?

What nation under heaven can now challenge an undefaisible interest, when Israel it self is cast off? What Church in the world can shew such dear

A kens from the Almighty as this, now-abhorred, and adulterous spouse? He that spared not the naturall Olive, shall he spare the wilde? It is not for us sinners of the Gentiles to be high-minded, but awful.

The Israelites are caried captive into Assyria; those goodly Cities of the tenne Tribes may not lie waste, and unpeopled: The wisedome of the victor findes it fit to transplant his owne Colonies thither; that so he may raise profit thence, with security: From Babylon therefore, and Cuthah, and Ava, and Hamath, and Sepharvaim, doth he send ōf his own subjects to possesse, and inhabit the Cities of Samaria. The land doth not brooke her new Tenants: They feared not the Lord (how should they, they knew him not?) Therefore the Lord sent Lyons amongst them, which slew some of them: Not the veryest Pagan can be excused for his ignorance of God; Even the B depravedst nature might teach us to tremble at a Deity; It is just with the Almighty not to put up neglect, where he hath bestowed reason.

The brute creatures are sent to revenge the quarrell of their Maker, upon worse beasts, then themselves. Still hath God left himselfe Champions in Israel: Lyons teare the Assyrians in pieces, and put them in minde, that, had it not beene for wickednesse, that land needed not to have changed masters. The great Lord of the world cannot want meanes to plague offenders: If the men be gone, yet the beasts are there; And if the beasts had been gone, yet so long as there were stones in the walls, in the quarries, God would be sure of avengers: There is no security but in being at peace with God.

The King of Assyria is sued to, for remedy: Even these Pagans have learned to C know that these Lyons were sent from a God; that this punishment is for sin; They know not the maner of the God of the land, therfore he hath sent Lyons among them: These blinde heathen that think every land hath a severall God, yet, hold that God, worthy of his own worship; yet, hold that worship must be grounded upon knowledge; the want of that knowledge punishable; the punishment of that want, just and divine. How much worse then Assyrians are they that are ready to ascribe all casualties to nature, to chance? that acknowledging but one God of all the world, are yet careleſse to know him, to serve him?

One of the Priests of Israel is appointed to be caried back to Samaria, to teach the Assyrian Colony the fashions of the God of the land; not for devotion, but for impunity: Vaine Politicians think to satisfie God by patching up religions; any formes are good enough for an unknown deity: The Assyrian Priests teach, and
D practice the worship of their owne gods; The Israelitish Priest prescribes the worship of the true God; The people will follow both; the one out of living, the other out of feare: What a prodigious mixture was here of religions? true with false, Jewish with Paganish, divine with devilish; Every division of these transplanted Assyrians had their severall deities, high places, sacrifices; This high Priest of Israel intercommons with every of them: So that now the sit fathers of Samaritanisme, are in at all; They fear the Lord and serve their idols: No beggers cloke is more peeced then the Religion of these new inhabitants of Israel. I know not how their bodies fared for the Lyons, I am sure their soules fared the worse for this medly: Above all things God hates a mungrel devotion; If we be not all Israel, it were better to be all Assur; It cannot but much displease God to be unknown or neglected, as to bee conformed with idols, &c. and symbole. There is no place under he

Take the hundred thousand that were caried away captive to Samaria; Take out those they were transported into the bondage of the Edomites; and those that were subdued by the South parts, by the Philistims; alas what an handfull was left to the King of Judah scarce worth the name of a dominion! Yet, even now, out of the glooms of Judah doth God raise up a glorious light to his forlorne Church; yea, from the [illegible] loynes of Ahaz, doth God fetch an holy Hezekiah. It had been hard to conceive the state of Judah worse then it was; neither was it more miserable then sinful, and in regard of both, desperate; when beyond hope, God revives this dying Church of [illegible] out of very ruines builds up his own house. Ahaz was not more the ill [illegible] of a father, then he was the ill father of a good son. He was the ill son of good Jotham, the ill father of good Hezekiah: Good Hezekiah makes amends for the [illegible] thefts impiety; and puts a new life into the heartlesse remnant of Gods people.

The wisdome of our good God knowes when his aid will be most seasonable, most welcome; which he then loves to give, when he findes no help of all our hopes. That mercifull hand is reserved for a dead lift; then, he takes [illegible].

Now, you might have seen this pious Prince busily bestirring himself, in sweet and needfull a reformation, removing the high places, burning and burying the dols, demolishing their Temples, cutting down their groves, opening the Temple, purging the altars, and vessells, sanctifying the Priests, [illegible] ing the incense, re-instituting the sacrifices, establishing the order of Gods [illegible] appointing the courses, setling the maintenance of the Ministers, publishing the crees for the long-neglected Passe-over; celebrating it, and the other feasts, with solemnity, incouraging the people, contributing bountifully to the offerings, one word, so ordering all the affaires of God, as if he had been sent down even ven to restore Religion; as if David himself had been alive again in his heyre, not so much of his Crown, as of his piety. Oh Judah, happy in [illegible] Oh Hezekiah, happy in the gracious restauration of thy Judah, [illegible] thank for such a sonne; The God that is able of the very stones to raise children to Abraham, raises a true seed of David out of the corrupt loynes of an [illegible] Those infinite mercy is not tyed to the termes of an immediate propagation. [illegible] of three hundred yeers, the man after Gods own heart had no [illegible] Till now did the high places stand: the devotions of the best Princes of [illegible] blemished with some weak omissions; Now the zeal of good Hezekiah [illegible] those defects, and works an entire change.

How seasonably hath the providence of God [illegible] for the times! When God hath a great work to doe, he knowes [illegible] himself with instruments.

No marvell if the Paganish Idols goe to wrack, when even the brazen Serpent of Moses had made by Gods own appointment, is broken in peeces. The Israelites were stung with fiery Serpents, this brazen Serpent healed them, which they no sooner see, then they recovered: But now, such was the [illegible] tish Idolatry, that this Serpent of brasse, stung worse then the fiery, [illegible] first cured by the eye, now by the eye poysoned the soule; That which [illegible] the type of a Saviour, is now, the deadly Engine of the enemy. While it helped it stood; it stood whiles it hurt not; but when once wicked abuse had turned it into an Idoll, what was it but Nehushtan?

The holinesse of the first institution cannot priviledge ought from the danger of a future profanation; nor, as the case may stand, from an utter abolition: What equity, what authority, what primary service might this Serpent have pleaded, that cannot keep it out of the dust. Those things which are necessary as they are beneficiall in their continuance, may still remain when their abuse is [illegible] those things whose use is but temporary, and whose duration is needlesse after [illegible] fitable, may cease with the occasion, & much more perish with an injurious [illegible] Hezekiah willingly forgets who made the Serpent, when he sees the Israelites [illegible] an Idoll: It is no lesse intolerable for God, to have a rivall of his own making.

be, in a case of necessity, as how well the insides be furnished with sincere devotion. O the cruell hard heartednesse of those men which will rather suffer the living Temples of God to be ruined, then they will ransome their life, with earthings!

It could not be, but that the store of needy Iudah must soon be drawn dry with so deep an exaction, that summe cannot be sent, because it cannot be raised: The cruell Tyrant calls for his Bricks whiles he allowes no straw; His anger is kindled because Hezekiahs Coffers have a bottome; with a mighty host doth he come up against Ierusalem; therefore shall that City be destroyed by him, because by him it hath been impoverished; the inhabitants must be slaves, because they are beggers.

Oh lamentable, and, in sight, desperate condition of distressed Ierusalem! wealth it had none; strength it had, but a little; all the Country round about was subdued to the Assyrian; that proud victor hath begirt the walls of it, with an innumerable army, scorning that such a shovell full of earth should stand out but one day; Poore Ierusalem stands alone, blocked up with a world of enemies, helplesse, friendlesse, comfortlesse, looking for the worst of an hostile fury; when Tartan and Rabsaris, and Rabshakeh, the great Captaines of the Assyrians call to a parlee. Hezekiah sends to them three of his prime officers, his Steward, his Secretary, his Recorder. Lord, what insolent blasphemies doth that impure mouth of Rabshakeh belch out against the living God, against his anointed servant?

How plausibly doth he discourage the subjects of Hezekiah, how proudly doth he insult upon their impotency, how doth he brave them with base offers of advantage; and lastly, how cunningly doth he fore-lay their confidence (which was only left them) in the Almighty, protesting not to be come up thither without the Lord; The Lord said to me, Goe up to this land, and destroy it; How fearfull a word was this? The rest were but vain cracks, this was a thunderbolt to strike dead the heart of Hezekiah; If Rabshakeh could have been believed, Ierusalem could not but have flown open. How could it think to stand out no resse against God, then men? Even thus doth the great enemy of mankinde; if he can dishearten the soule from a dependance upon the God of mercies, the day is his: Lewd miscreants care not how they bely God for their own purposes.

Eliakim the Steward of Hezekiah well knew, how much the people must needs be effected with this pernicious suggestion; and faine would therefore, if not stop that wicked mouth, yet divert these blasphemies into a foraine expression. I wonder that any wise man should look for favour from an enemy: Speake I pray thee, to thy servants in the Syrian language: What was this but to teach an adversary how to do mischiefe? Wherefore came Rabshakeh thither but to gall Hezekiah, to withdraw his subjects? That tongue is propereſt for him which may hurt most; Deprecations of evill to a malicious man are no better then advices. An unknowne idiome is fit to keep counsell, they are familiar words that must convey ought to the understanding. Lewd men are the worse for admonitions.

Rabshakeh had not so strained his throat to corrupt the citizens of Ierusalem, had it not been for the humble obtestation of Eliakim; Now he reares up his voice, and holds his sides, and roares out his double blasphemies; one while affrighting the people with the great power of the mighty King of Assyria; another while debasing the contemptible force of Hezekiah; now smoothly alluring them with the assurances of a safe and successefull yeeldance; then, discouraging them with the impossibility of their deliverance; laying before them the fearfull examples of greater nations vanquished by that sword, which was now shaken over them; triumphing in the impotency, & miscariage of their gods: Who are they among all the gods of the Countries, that have delivered their Country out of mine hand, That the Lord should deliver Ierusalem, out of mine hand? Where are the gods of Arpad, and of Hamath? Where? but in that hellish darknesse, that is ordained both for them and for thee, barbarous Assyrian, that darest thus open thy mouth against thy Maker: And can those Atheous eyes of thine see no difference of gods? Is there no distance betwixt a stock, or stone, and that infinite Deity that made heaven and earth? It is enough that thou now feelest it; thy torments have taught thee too late, that thou affrontedst a living God.

How

A slow gig the fingers and compass of those lewish Peeres and people ech to be at Rabshakeh, in a strange full and [illegible] impieties. All is hushe, not a word sounds from those walls: Isoe not more wonder at Hezekiahs wisdome, in commanding silence, then at the subjects obedience in keeping it. This railer could not be more spighted, then with no command he might be exasperated, he could not be reformed; the siege, the reboasting of those multiplyed blasphemies, might leave some ill impressions in the multitude. This lofty-mouth flask, therefore, dyes in his own smoak: only leaving an hatefull stench behinde it.

Good Hezekiah cannot rather [illegible] over this devilish oratory; no sooner doth he hear of it, then he rends his clothes, and covers himself with sackcloth, and betakes himself to the house of the Lord, and sends his officers, and the gravest of B the Priests, clad in sackcloth, to fetch the Prophet of God, with a dolefull and querulous message.

Oh the noble piety of Hezekiah! notwithstanding all the affairs of the state, and the danger of so powerfull an enemy, I find not the garments of [illegible] King, any otherwise then whole, and unchanged; but now so soon as ever blasphemy is uttered against the Majesty of his God, (though by a Pagan) his cloathes are torn, and turned into sackcloth: There can be no better argument of an upright heart, then to be more sensible of the indignities offered to God, then of our own dangers. Even these desperate reproaches send Hezekiah to [illegible]: The more we see Gods name prophaned, the more shall we if we be truly religious, love and honour it.

C Whither should Hezekiah run but to the Temple to the Prophet? There, there is the refuge of all faithfull ones; where they may speak with God, where they may be spoken to from God, and fetch comfort from both. It is not possible that a beleeving heart should be disappointed: Isaiah sends that message to the good King, that may dry up his teares, and cheer his countenance, and change his suit; Thus saith the Lord, Be not afraid of the words which thou hast heard, with which the servants of the King of Syria have blasphemed me. Behold, I will send a blast upon him, & he shall hear a rumor, and shall return to his own Land, and I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own Land.

Loe; even whiles Senacherib was in the height of his jollity and assurance; Gods Prophet fore-sees his ruine; and gives him for dead, while that [illegible] thought of nothing but life and victory. Proud and secure worldlings little dreame of the D neere approach of their judgements: whiles they are plotting their deepest designes, the over-ruling justice of the Almighty hath contrived their sudden confusion and sees, and sets them their day.

Rabshakeh returnes, and finding the King of Assyria warring against Libnah reports to him the silent, (and therein) contemptuous answer, and firme resolutions of Hezekiah; In the mean time God pulls Senacherib by the eare, with the newes of the approaching army of Tirhakah King of Ethiopia, which was comming up to raise the siege, and to succour his confederates: That dreadfull power will not allow the Assyrian King, in person to lead his other forces up against Ierusalem, nor to continue his former Leaguer long before those walls. But now, he writes big words to Hezekiah, and thinks with his thundering menaces to beat open the gates, and levell the E bulwarks of Ierusalem: Like the true master of Rabshakeh, he reviles the God of Heaven; and basely parallels him with the dunghill deities of the nations.

Good Hezekiah gets him into his sanctuary; there he spreads the letter before the Lord; and calls to the God that dwells between the Cherubims, to revenge the blasphemies of Senacherib, to protect and rescue himselfe, and his people. Every one of those words pierced heaven; which was no lesse open to mercy unto Hezekiah, then, vengeance to Senacherib: Now is Isaiah addressed with a second message of comfort to him, who doubtlesse distrusted not the first: only the reiteration of that furious blasphemy made him take faster hold, by his faithfull devotion. Now, the jealous God in a disdain of so blasphemous a contestation, rises up in a stile of Majesty, and gloriously tramples upon this saucy insolency;

Because

Because they rage against me, and thy tumult is come up into mine eares, therefore I will put my hook into thy nose, and my bridle into thy lips: and will turne thee back by the way thou camest. Loe Senacherib, the God of heaven makes a beast of thee, who hast so brutishly spurned at his name; If thou be a ravenous Beare, he hath an hook for thy nosthrils: If thou be a restly horse, he hath a bridle for thy mouth; In spight of thee thou shalt follow his hook, or his bridle; and shalt bee led to thy just shame by either. A

It is not for us to be the Lords of our own actions; Thus saith the Lord concerning the King of Assyria; He shall not come into this City, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shield, nor cast a bank against it; by the way that he came shall he return, &c. Impotent men, what are we in the hands of the Almighty! we purpose, hee ove-rules; we talk of great matters, and think to doe wonders; he blowes upon our projects, and they vanish with our selves: He that hath set bounds to the Sea, hath appointed limits to the rage of the proudest enemies, yea, even the Devils themselves are confined; Why boast yee your selves, O yee Tyrants, that ye can doe mischiefe? ye are stinted: and even within those lists, is confusion. B

O the Trophees of divine Justice! That very night the Angell of the Lord went out, and smote in the campe of the Assyrians an hundred fourescore and five thousand, and when they rose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corps.

How speedy an execution was this, how miraculous? No humane arme shall have the glory of this victory; It was God that was defied by that presumptuous Assyrian; It is God that shall right his own wrongs; Had the Egyptian, or Ethiopian forces been come up, though the same God had done this work by them; yet some praise of this slaughter had perhaps cleaved to their fingers. Now an invisible hand sheds all this blood, that his very enemies may cleare him from all partnership of revenge. Go now wicked Senacherib, and tel of the Gods of Hamath and Arpad, & Sepharuaim, and Hena, and Iuah, which thou hast destroyed, and say, that Hezekiahs God is but as one of these: Goe, and adde this Deity to the number of thy conquests: Now say, that Hezekiahs God in whom he trusted hath deceived him, and graced thy Triumphs. C

With shame and grief enough is that sheaped Tyran returned to his Ninive, having left behinde him, all the pride and strength of Assyria, for compost to the Jewish fields. Well were it for thee O Senacherib, if thou couldst escape thus; vengeance waits for thee at home, and welcomes thee into thy place, whiles thou art worshiping in the house of Nisroch thy god, two of thine own sons shall be thine executioners. See now if that false Deity of thine can preserve thee from that stroke which the true God sends thee by the hand of thine own flesh; He that slew thine hoast by his Angels, slayes thee by thy sons: The same Angell that killed all those thousands, could as easily have smitten thee; but he rather reserves thee for the further torment of an unnaturall stroke, that thou mayest see too late, how easie it is for him in spight of thy god, to arme thine own loynes against thee. D

Thou art avenged, O God, thou art avenged plentifully of thine enemies. Whosoever strives with thee, is sure to gain nothing but losse, but shame, but death, but hell. The Assyrians are slaine, Senacherib is rewarded for his blasphemy; Ierusalem is rescued, Hezekiah rejoyces, the nations wonder and tremble. O love the Lord all ye Saints, for the Lord preserveth the faithfull, and plenteously rewardeth the proud doer. E

Hezekiah sick, recovered, visited.

2. Kings 20.

HEzekiah was freed from the siege of the Assyrians, but hee is surprised with a disease: he that delivered him from the hand of his enemies, smites him with sickness: God doth not let us loose from all afflictions, when he redeemes us from one.

To think that Hezekiah was either not thankefull enough for

A for his deliverance, or too much lifted up with glory of so miraculous a favour, were an injurious mis-construction of the hand of God; and an unreasonable censure of an holy Prince: For, though no flesh and blood can avoid the just accesse of bodily punishment, yet God doth not alwayes strike with an intuition of sin; sometimes he regards the benefit of our triall; sometimes the glory of his mercy in our cure.

It was no sleight distemper, that seized upon Hezekiah, but a disease both painfull, and fierce, and in nature deadly. O God, how thou lashest even those whom thou lovest! Hadst thou ever any such dearling in the throne of Iudah as Hezekiah? Yet he no sooner breatheth from a miserable siege, then he panteth under a mortall sicknesse: when as yet he had not so much as the comfort of a child to succeed him, thy Prophet is sent to him with the heavy message of his death, Set thine house in order,
B for thou shalt die and not live. It is no small mercy of God that he gives us warning of our end; we shall make an ill use of so gracious a premonition, if we make not a meet preparation for our passage. Even those that have not an house, yet have a soule; no soul can want important affairs to be ordered for a final dissolution; the neglect of this best thrift is desperate. Set thy soul in order, O man, for thou shalt die and not live.

If God had given Hezekiah a son, nature had bequeathed his estate; now, he must study to find heirs: Even these outward things, (though in themselves worthlesse) require our carefull disposition, to those we leave behinde us; and if we have delayed these thoughts, till then, our sick beds may not complain of their importunity; We cannot leave to our families a better legacy, then Peace.

Never was the Prophet Esay unwelcome to this good King, untill now: Even sad
C tidings must be caried by those messengers, which would be faithfull: neither may we regard so much how they will be taken, as by whom they are sent.

It was a bold and harsh word to say to a King, Thou shalt die, and not live. I doe not heare Hezekiah rage, and fret at the message, or threat the bearer; but hee meekly turnes his face to the wall, and weeps, and prayes: Why to the wall? Was it for the greater secrecy of his devotion? was it for the more freedome from all distraction? was it that the passion which accompanied his prayer, might haye no witnesses? Or, was it for that this wall lookt towards the Temple, which his heart and eyes still moved unto, though his feet could not?

Howsoever, the patient soule of good Hezekiah turnes it selfe to that holy God, D from whom he smarts, and bleeds, and poures out it selfe into a fervent deprecation, I beseech thee, O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight.

Couldst thou feare, O Hezekiah, that God had forgotten thine integrity? The grace that was in thee, was his own work, could he in thee neglect himselfe? Or dost thou therefore doubt of his remembrance of thy faithfulnesse, because he summons thee to receive the crown of thy faithfulnesse, glory, and immortality? wherein canst thou be remembred, if this be to forget thee? What challenge is this? Is God a debter to thy perfection? Hath thine holy cariage merited any thing from that infinite justice? Far, far were these presumptuous conceits from that humble and mortified soule: Thou hadst hated thine own brest, if it could once have harboured so proud a thought. This perfection of thine was no other, then an honest soundnesse
E of heart, and life, which thou knowest God had promised to reward: It was the mercy of the covenant that thou pleadedst, not the merit of thine obedience.

Every one of these words were steeped in teares: But what meant these words, these teares? I hear not of any suit moved by Hezekiah; only he wishes to be remembred, in that which could never be forgotten, though he should have intreated for an oblivion.

Speak out Hezekiah, what is it that thy teares crave, whiles thy lips expresse not? O let me live, and I shall praise thee O God.

In a naturall man none could wonder at this passionate request; who can but wonder at it, in a Saint whose happinesse doth but then beginne, when his life ceaseth: whose misery doth but then end, when his death enters: the word of faith, is, Oh let me die, that I may enjoy thee. How then doth the King cry at the newes

of that death, which some resolute Pagans have entertained with smiles? Certainly, the best man cannot strip himself of some flesh; and whiles nature hath an undeniable share in him, he cannot but retain some smatch of the sweetnesse of life, of the horror of dissolution; both these were in Hezekiah, neither of them could transport him into this passion: they were higher respects that swayed with so holy a Prince; a tender care of the glory of God, a carefull pity of the Church of God; His very tears said, O God, thou knowest that the eyes of the world are bent upon me, as one that hath abandoned their Idolatry and restored thy sincere worship; I stand alone in the midst of a wicked and idolatrous generation, that looks thorough all my actions, all my events; If now they shall see me snatcht away in the midst of my dayes, what will these Heathen say; how can thy great name but suffer in this my untimely extinction? A

Besides, what will become of thy poore Church, which I shall leave coldly religious, and as yet scarce warm, in the coolse of a [illegible] B shall it be miserably over-grown with superstition, and heathenisme; how soon shall the wilde Boar of Assyria root up this little vineyard of thine? What need I beseech thee, O Lord, to regard thy name, to regard thine inheritance?

What one teare of Hezekiah can run waste? What can that good King pray for, unheard, unanswered? Senacherib came in a proud confidence to swallow up his city, and people: prayers and tears send him away confounded: Death comes to swallow up his person, (and that not without authority;) prayers and tears send him away disappointed. Before Isaiah was gone out into the middle Court, the word of the Lord came to him, saying, Turne againe, and tell Hezekiah the Captain of my people; Thus saith the Lord, the God of David thy father; I have heard thy prayer, I have seen thy tears, behold I will heale thee; On the third day thou shalt goe up to the house of the Lord; and I will adde to thy dayes fifteen yeares. C

What shall we say then, O God; hast thou thus soon changed thy purpose? Was it not thy true message which thy Prophet, even now, delivered to Hezekiah? Is somewhat falne out that thou fore-sawest not? or doest thou now decree somewhat thou meanest not? The very thought of any of these were no better then blasphemous impiety. Certainly, Hezekiah could not live one day longer, then was eternally decreed; The decree of Gods eternall counsell had from everlasting determined him fifteen yeares yet longer: Why then doth God say, by his Prophet, Thou shalt die, and not live? He is not as man that he should repent; the message is changed, the will is not changed; yea rather the message is explicated, not changed; For the signified will of God, though it sound absolutely, yet must be understood with condition; that tells Hezekiah what he must expect from the nature of his disease, what would befall him, without his deprecations: There was nothing but death in the second causes, what ever secret purpose there was in the first; and that purpose shall lie hid for a time, under a reserved condition: The same decree that sayes, Ninive shall be destroyed, meanes, if Ninive repent, it shall not be destroyed; he that findes good reason to say, Hezekiah shall dy, yet still meanes, if the quickned devotion of Hezekiah shall importune mee for life, it shall be protracted. And the same God that hath decreed this addition of fifteen yeares, had decreed to stirre up the spirit of Hezekiah, to that vehement and weeping importunity, which should obtain it. O God, thou workest thy good pleasure in us, and with us; and by thy revealed will movest us in those wayes, whereby thou effectest thy secret will. D

How wonderfull is this mercy? Hezekiahs teares are not dry upon his cheeks, yea his breath is not passed his lips, when God sends him a comfortable answer. How carefull is the God of compassions, that his holy servant should not languish one houre, in the expectation of his denounced death? What speed was here, as in the errand, so in the act of recovery? Within three dayes shall Hezekiah be upon his feet; yea his feet shall stand in the Courts of Gods house; he that now in his bed, sighes and groanes and weeps out a petition, shall then sing out a thankfgiving in the Temple. O thou that hearest the prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come: E

With

A With what cheerful assurance should we approach to the throne of that grace, which never failed any suppliant.

Neither was this grant more speedy, then bountiful; we are wont to reckon seven years for the life of a man; and now, behold, more then two lives hath God added to the age of Hezekiah. How unexampled a favour is this? who ever but Hezekiah knew his period so long before? the fixednesse of his terme, is no lesse mercy, then the protraction; we must be content to live or die at uncertainties; we are not worthy to calculate the date of our own times: Teach us, O Lord, so to number our dayes, that we may apply our hearts to wisdome.

There is little joy in many dayes, if they be evil; Hezekiah shall not be blessed only with life, but with peace; The proud Assyrian threatens an invasionn; his late foyle
B still sticks in his stomack, and stirs him to revenge; the hook is in his nostrils, he cannot know whither he is led; The God of heaven will maintain his own quarrell: I will defend this City for mine own sake, and for my servant Davids sake. Loe, for his life Hezekiah is beholden (next under the infinite goodnesse of God) to his prayers; for his protection, to the deare memory of his father David; surely for ought wee find, Hezekiah was no lesse upright, and lesse offensive then David; yet both Hezekiah and Jerusalem shall fare the better for Davids sake, above three hundred yeares after.

To that man after his own heart, had God ingaged himself, by his gracious promise, to preserve his throne, his seed: God loves to remember his ancient mercies: How happy a thing is it to be faithfull with God; this is the way to oblige those
C which are yet unborn; and to intayle blessings upon the successions of future generations.

It seemes it was some pestilent ulcer that thus indangered the life of Hezekiah. Isaiah is not a Prophet only, but a Physitian. And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs: He that gave an assurance of recovery, gives a receit for the recovery. The decree of God includes the meanes: neither can the medicine work without a word; neither will the word work without the medicine; both of them must meet in the cure: If wee so trust the promise, that we neglect the prescript, we presume to no purpose. Happy is that soule, that so regards the promise of Gods Prophets, as that withall he receives their counsels.

Nothing could be more proper for the ripening of hard and purulent tumors, then
D dry figs; Herein Isaiahs direction was according to nature; Wherefore should we balke the ordinary road, where it is both faire and neer?

The sudden contradiction of the message causes a just difficulty in the assent. Hezekiah therefore craves a sign; not for that he distrusted, but that he might trust the more; we can never take too fast hold of those promises of God, which have not more comfort in the application, then naturall impossibility in the performance. We beleeve, Lord, help our unbeleef.

The sick King hath his option; His father was offered a signe and refused it; he sues for one, and obtaines it: Shall the shadow go forward ten degrees, or back ten degrees? As if heaven it selfe lay open to his choice; and were ready either to mend his pace, or E retire for his confirmation; What creature is not cheerfully forward to obey the faith of Gods servants.

Hezekiah fastens rather upon that signe which is more hard, more disagreeing from the course of nature; not without good reason; Every proofe must be clearer then the thing to be proved, neither may there want a meet proportion betwixt both; now the going forward of the shadow was a motion, no other then naturall, the recovery of that pestilent disease was against the stream of nature, the more difficult signe therefore, the surer evidence.

Whether shall we more wonder at the measure of the love of God to Hezekiah, or at the power of Isaiahs faith in God? Out of both, either the Sun goes back in heaven that his shadow may goe back on earth, or the shadow no lesse miraculously goes back on earth, whiles the Sun goes forward in heaven. It is true that the Prophet speakes of the shadow, not of the Sun; except perhaps because the motion of the Sun is best discerned by the shadow; and the motion of the shadow is led by the course of the Sun: besides that, the demonstration of this miracle is reported to be locall in the Diall of Ahaz, not universall, in the sensible length of the day; withall, the retrait of the Sunne had made a publike and noted change in the frame of nature; this particular alteration of the shadow in places limited, might satisfie no lesse without a confusive mutation in the face of the world. Whether soever, to draw the Sunne back together with the shadow, or to draw the shadow back without the Sunne, was the proofe of a divine omnipotence; able therefore to draw back the life of Hezekiah, fifteen degrees, from the night of death, towards which it was hasting. O God, thou wilt rather alter the course of heaven and earth, then the faith of thy children shall sinck for want of supportation. A

It should seem the Babylonians finding the Assyrians power abated by the revengefull hand of Gods Angell, and their own discord, took this advantage of a revolt; and now to strengthen their part, fall in with Hezekiah King of Judah, whom they found the old enemy to the Assyrians, and the great favorite of heaven: Him they wooe with gifts, him they congratulate with Ambassages: The fame of Hezekiahs sickneſse, recovery, form, and assurance of cure, have drawn thither messengers, and presents from Berodach Baladan King of Babylon. B

The Chaldees were curious searchers into the secrets of nature, especially into the motions of the celestiall bodies; Though there had been no politick relations, this very Astronomicall miracle had been enough to fetch them to Jerusalem, that they might see the man, for whose sake the Sun forsook his place, or the shadow forsook the Sun. C

How easily have we seen those holy men mis-carried by prosperity, against whom no miseries could prevaile? He that stood out stoutly against all the Assyrian onsets, clinging the faster to his God, by how much he was harder assaulted by Senacherib, melteth now with these Babylonian favours, and runs abroad into offensive weaknesses.

The Babylonian Ambassadors are too welcome to Hezekiah; As a man transported with the honor of their respective and costly visitations, he forgets his tears, and his turning to the wall; he forgets their incompatible Idolatry; so hugging them in his bosome, as if there had been no cause of strangeneſse: All his doores flie open to them; and in a vaineglorious ostentation all his new-gathered treasures, al his strong armories entertain their eyes; nothing in his house, nothing in his Dominion is hid from them. D

Oh Hezekiah, what meanes this impotent ambition? It is not long since thou tarest off the very plates of the Temple doors, to give unto Senacherib; and can thy treasures be suddenly so multiplied, that they can be worthy to astonish forrain beholders? Or, if thy storehouse were as rich as the earth, can thy heart be so vain as to be lifted up with these heavy metals? Didst thou not see that heaven it selfe was at thy beck, whilest thou wert humbled? and shal a little earthly drosse have power over thy soul? Can the flattering applause of strangers let thee loose into a proud joy, whom the late message of Gods Prophet resolved into teares? O God, if thou do not keep us, as well in our sun-shine, as in our storme, we are sure to perish: As in all time of our tribulation, so in all time of our wealth, good Lord deliver us. E

Alas, how sleight doth this weaknesse seeme in our eyes, to rejoyce in the abundance of Gods blessings? to call in forraine friends to be witnesses of our plenty? to raise our conceits, some little, upon the acclamations of others, upon the value of our own abilities?

Lay thy hand upon thy mouth, O foolish flesh and blood, when thou seest the censure of thy Maker.

Isaiah the Prophet is sent speedily to Hezekiah, with a sharp and heart breaking message: Behold, the dayes come that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up in store unto this day, shall be carried into Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the Lord; And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shal they take away, and they shal be Eunuchs in the palace of the King of Babylon.

No

No sin can be light in Hezekiah: the holinesse of the person addes to the unholinesse of the act; Eminency of profession doubles both the offence, and the judgement. This glory shall end in an ignominious losse.

The great and holy God will not digest pride in any, much lesse in his own. That which was the subject of Hezekiah's sin, shall be the matter of his punishment: those with whom he sinned, shall be his avengers; It was his treasure and munition, wherein he prides himselfe to these men of Babylon. The men of Babylon shall carry away his treasure and munition; What now doth Hezekiah but tempt them with a glorious booty; as some fond traveller that would show his gold to a Theefe?

These worldly things are furthereſt off from the heart; Perhaps Hezekiah might not be much troubled with their losse: Loe, God comes closer to him, yet.

As yet was Hezekiah childlesse; how much better had it bin to continue so still, then to be plagued in his issue? He shall now beget children to servitude; his loynes shall yeeld Pages to the Court of Babylon; whiles he sees them borne Princes, he shall foresee them made Eunuches in a forrain Palace: What comfort can he take in the wishes and hopes of sons, when ere they be born, he hears them destin'd to captivity and bondage?

This rod was smart, yet good Hezekiah kisses it; his heart struck him no lesse, then the mouth of the Prophet; meekly therefore doth he yield to this divine correction; Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken. Thou hast spoken this word, but from the Lord; it is not thine, but his; and being his, it must needs be, like himselfe, good: Good, because it is just, for I have deserved more, and worse; Good, because mercifull; for I suffer not according to my deserts. Is it not good, if there bee peace and truth in my dayes? I have deserved a present payment, O God thou deferrest it; I have deserved it in person, thou reserv'st it for those whom I cannot yet so feele, because they are not; I have deserved war and tumult, thou favour'st me with peace; I have deserved to be over-run with superstition, and Idolatry, thou blessest me with truth; shouldst thou continue truth unto me, (though upon the most unquiet termes) the blessing were too good for me; but now thou hast promised, and will not reverse it, that both truth and peace shall be in my dayes; Lord, I adore thy justice, I blesse thy mercy.

Gods children are neither wayward nor sullen when they are chid or beaten, but patiently hold their backs to the stripes of a displeased mercy; knowing how much more God is to be magnified, for what he might have done, then repined at, for what he hath done; resigning themselves over into the hand of that gracious justice, which in their smart seeks their reformation and glory.

Manasseh.

AT last, some three yeares after his recovery, Hezekiah hath a son; but such a one, as if he could have foreseen, orbity had been a blessing. 1 Kings 21. and 1 Chron. 33.

Still in the throne of Iudah there is a succession, and interchange of good and evill. Good Iotham is succeeded by wicked Ahaz; wicked Ahaz is succeeded by good Hezekiah; good Hezekiah is succeeded by wicked Manasseh: Evill Princes succeed to good, for the exercise of the Church, and good succeed to evill, for the comfort of the Church.

The yong yeares of Manasseh give advantage to his mis-carriage; Even whiles he might have been under the Ferule, he swayed the Scepter: Whither may not a child be drawn, especially to agarish, and puppet like superstition? As infancy is capable of all impressions, so most of the worst.

Neither did Manasseh begin more early, then he held out long; He raigned more yeares then his good father lived, notwithstanding the miraculous addition to his age; More then ever any King of Iudah, besides, could reach: Length of dayes is no true rule of Gods favour; As[illegible] longer then sensitive creatures, and brute creatures out-live the reasonable, if wickedly great, to inherit these[illegible] longst the reasonable, it is no newes for the glories, longer then the best.

There wants not apparent[illegible] this difference; Good Princes are fetcht a-way to a better Crown; The[illegible]ot be losers, that exchange a weak and fading honor, for a perfection and eter[illegible] of blessednesse: Wicked men live long to their own disadvange; they doe but[illegible]y so many more brands to their hell: If therefore there be a just man that perishe[illegible]n his righteousnesse; and there be a wicked man that prolongs his life in his wic[illegible]nesse, far be it from us, either to pitty the removall of the just, or to envy the continuance of the wicked; This continues to his losse, that to an happy advancement.

It is very like that Hezekiah marrying so late, in the vigour both of his age, and holinesse, made a carefull choice of a wife sutable to his own piety; Neither had his delight been so much in her (according to her name) if her delight had not beene, as his, in God; Their issue swarves from both, so fully inheriting the vices of his grand-father Ahaz, as if there had been no intervention of an Hezekiah: So we have seen the kernell of a well fruited plant degenerate into that crab, or willow, which gave the originall to his stock; yet can I not say that Hezekiah was as free from traducing evill to his [illegible]anasseh, as Ahaz was free from traducing good to his son Hezekiah: Evill is [illegible]ed in the best nature, whereas even the least good descends from above.

We may [illegible]fore grace by meanes: Was it possible that Manasseh having been traine[illegible] religious Court of his father Hezekiah; under the eye of so holy Proph[illegible]ests, under the shadow of the Temple of God, after a childhood seas[illegible]o gracious precepts, with so frequent exercise of devotion, should run [illegible]into all heathenish abominations; as if there had beene nothing but Idolatry in the seed of his conception, in the milke of his nourishment, in the rules of his institution, in the practice of his examples? How vaine are all outward helps without the influence of Gods Spirit? and that Spirit breathes where he listeth: good education raiseth great hopes, but the proofe of them is in the divine benediction.

I feare to look at the out-rages of this wicked sonne of Hezekiah: What hav[illegible] doth he make in the Church of God? as if he had been born to ruine Religion, or if his only felicity had been to untwist, or teare, in one day, that holy web which his father had been weaving nine and twenty yeares? and contrarily, to set up in one houre that offensive pile, which had been above three hundred yeares in building down: so long had the high places stood; the zeale of Hezekiah in demolishing them honoured him above all his predecessors; and now the first act of this green head was their reedifying: That mischiefe may be done in a day, which many ages cannot redresse.

Fearefull were the presages of these bold beginnings; From the mis-building of these Chappels of the Hils to the true God, Manasseh proceeds to erecting of altars to a false, even to Baal, the God of Ahab, the stale Idoll of the heathen; yet further, not content with so few Deities, he worships all the hoast of heaven; and that he might[illegible] 'spight God yet more, he sets up altars to these abused rivals of their Maker, in t[illegible] house of the Lord; that holy place doth he not feare to defile with the grav[illegible]nage of the grove, that he had made: Never Amorite did so wickedly as Manasseh; and, which was yet worse, it sufficed not to be thus wicked himself, but he seduced Gods people to these abominations; and that his example might move the more, he spares not his own son from the fire of the Idol-sacrifice. Neither were his witcheries lesse enormious, then his Idolatry; he observed times, he used inchantments, he dealt with familiar spirits, and with wizards: Neither were either of these worse then his cruelty; He shed innocent bloud till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another.

O Manasseh, how no lesse cruell wert thou to thine own soule, then to thy brethren! What an hideous list of monstrous impiety is here; Any one of which

[illegible]

A to draw judgment upon a world; but what hell is sufficient for all together?

What brows are not now lifted up to an attentive expectation of some present, and fearfull vengeance from God, upon such flagitious wickednesse? therefore thus saith the Lord, Behold I am bringing such evill upon Ierusalem and Iudah, that whosoever heareth of it, both his eares shall tingle: The person of Manasseh is not capable of revenge enough; as his sin dilated it selfe by an infectious diffusion to his people, so shall the punishment. We are sensible of the least touch of our own miseries, how rarely are we affected with other mens calamities? yet this evill shall be such, as that the rumor of it shall beat no eare that shall not glow with an astonishing commiseration: What then O God, what shall that plague be, which thou threatnest with so much preface of horror? I will stretch over Ierusalem the line of Samaria, and the plummet of the house of Ahab; and I will wipe Ierusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it and turning it upside downe: and I will forsake the remnant of mine inheritance; and I will deliver them into the hand of their enemies, and they shall become a prey and a spoil unto all their enemies.

B It is enough O God, it is enough: What eare can but tingle? What eye can but weep? what haire can but start up? what heart can be but confounded at the mention of so dreadfull a revenge? Can there be a worse judgement then desolation, captivity, desertion, spoyle, and torture of prevailing enemies? but however, other Cities and Nations have undergone these dysasters, without wonder that all this should befall to thy Jerusalem, the place which thou hast chosen to thy selfe, out of the whole earth, the lot of thine inheritance, the seat of thine abode, whereof thou hast said, Here shall it rest for ever, it is able to amaze all eyes, all eares.

No City could fare worse then Samaria, whose inhabitants after a wofull siege, were driven, like cattell, into a wretched servitude; Jerusalem shall fare no better from Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babylon: Jerusalem the glory of the earth, the dearling of heaven; See, O yee vaine men, that boast of the priviledges of Chaires and Churches, see, and tremble. There is no place under heaven to which the presence of God is so wedded as that the sins thereof shall not procure a distastefull, and finall divorce: The height of former favours shall be but an aggravation of vengeance.

This was Jerusalems station from hence forwards, God begins with the person of wicked Manasseh, against whom he stirres up the Captaines of the hoast of the King of Assyria: Those thornes amongst whom he had intended his seed, for shelter from their violence, they encompass and bind him with fetters of iron, and carry him to Babylon. There he lies long with chaines, in an uncomfortable dungeon, exercised with variety of torments, fed with such coarse allowance of bread, and sips of water, as might maintain, not please the palate of the owner. What can now pay the debt of wickednesse? What but bondage can hold him, that hath so lawlesly abused his liberty? What but darknesse can befit him that hath cast off his God? and doted upon Idols? What but a dying life, and a tormenting death can be fit for a man of blood?

C What would one have given this man for him, and these lookes when hell had set them on? Who can sound the depth, or reach the height, oh the depth of divine mercy? After all these provocations of sin, it is written, When he was in affliction he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his Fathers. How true is that ancient and Prophetick, Necessity gives good understanding. The viper when he is lashed, casts up his poyson: The traitor in torture is racked, tells that truth which he had else never confessed: The world brings many to heaven, both by calmes and storms: What are these tears of the penitent, but the drops of the cloud, whereout it is cast down; the stroke of the hammer, but the weight and attrition of the mill, wherewith the flint or the corn wherewith it is bruised? Say now, Manasseh, what hast thou found better at thine (then best, at best now) then good for thee? It was good for me that I was afflicted: Thine irons were more precious to thee, then thy golden chaine was a more happy ornament to thee, then thy Palace, Babylon

Babylon was a better Schoole to thee, then Jerusalem. What dare we to look upon our afflictions? These, how crabbed soever, are our best friends. They are not, indeed, for our pleasure, they are for our profit: and worthy of a welcome. What doe wee care how bitter that potion be, which brings health?

How far a man may goe, and yet turne? Could there be sinke [illegible] here was Idolatry in the height, violation of Gods house, [illegible] dy cruelty to his own flesh, to the Saints of God; and all the [illegible] of a religious institution, of the zealous counsels of Gods Prophets, [illegible] his own heart.

Who can complain that the way of heaven is blocked up against him, that sees such a sinner enter? Say the worst against thy selfe. [illegible] Here is one that murthered men, defied God, worshipped [illegible] to repentance, if thou be worse then he, deny (if thou can) that to thy selfe, God hath not denied to thee, capacity of grace: In the meane time know, that not thy sin, but thine impenitence that barres heaven against thee.

Presume not yet, O man, whosoever thou art, of the [illegible] as if thou couldest run on lawlesly in a course of sinning, [illegible] of hel, and then couldst suddenly stop, and return at leisure: the [illegible] ver set period to a wilfull sinner; neither yet did his grace [illegible] when he is gone the furthest, he could yet stay him: [illegible] that truly repents is refused: but many a one sinnes so long, that [illegible] His custome of wickednesse hath obdured his heart, and [illegible] impressions. There were Ieroboams, and Abijams, and Ahabs and Iehus in these sacred Thrones, there was but one Manasseh, [illegible] mans hand the raines of his own heart, to pace, and turne, and stop at his priviledge is reserved to him that made it; It is not of him that runs, but of God that shewes mercy: and that mercy neglected, [illegible] ment.

I wonder not at Manasseh, either sinning, or repenting, I wonder at thee, O Lord, who after thy just permissiō of his sin, calledst him unto grace, and so receivest him repenting: So as Manasseh was not more [illegible] strous spectacle of wickednesse, then he is now a pleasing [illegible] conversion; Who can now despaire of thy mercy, O God, that [illegible] Manasseh accepted? when we have debauched our worst, our evill [illegible] with thy goodnesse, rather it is the praise of thy infinite store, that [illegible] bounds, grace abounds much more; O keep us from a presumption of [illegible] may repent; and raise us from a distrust of grace, when we have repented.

No sooner is Manasseh penitent, then he is free, his prayers have [illegible] him from his sins, and from his chaines; and of a captive have made him a King: from the dungeon of Babylon have restored him to the Palace of Jerusalem: How easie is it for the same hand that wounds, to cure: What cannot fervent prayers [illegible] either for our rescuing from evill, or for our investing with good?

Then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God. Then, and not before: Could he longer yeares escape the knowledge of Gods miraculous deliverance of Jerusalem from the Assyrians? Could he but know the slaughter that Gods Angell made in one night, of an hundred fourescore and five thousand? Could he but [illegible] revenge upon Senacherib? Could he be ignorant of his fathers [illegible] ry? Could he but see that everlasting monument of the [illegible] in the Dial of Ahaz? Could he avoid the sense of those fifteene yeares, which were [illegible] his fathers age? What one of these proofes doth not evince a Deity, [illegible] smart, and cure, Manasseh knew not that the Lord was God.

Foolish sinners pay deare for their knowledge; neither will [illegible] good-cheape: so we have seen restly horses that will not move till they bleed [illegible] the spur: So we have seen dull and careless children, that will learne nothing but what is put into them with the rod.

2 Kings 22. and 23.

YEt, yet if we must alter from our selves, it is better to be a Manasseh; then a Ioash: Ioash beganne well, and ended ill: Manasseh began ill, and ended well; his age varied from his youth, no lesse, then one mans condition can vary from anothers; His posterity succeeded in both; Ammon his son succeeded in the sins of Manasseh youth; Iosiah his grand-child succeeded in the vertues of his age. What a vast difference doth grace make in the same age? Manasseh began his raigne at twelve yeares, Iosiah at eight; Manasseh was religiously bred under Hezekiah, Iosiah was mis-nurtured under Ammon; and yet Manasseh runs into absurd Idolatries, Iosiah is holy and devout. The Spirit of God breathes freely; not confining it selfe to times, or meanes.

No rules can bind the hands of the Almighty; It is in ordinary proofe too true a word, that was said of old, Woe to thee O Land, whose King is a childe: the goodnesse of God makes his own exceptions; Iudah never fared better, then in the green yeares of Iosiah: If we may not rather measure youth and age by government, and disposition, then by yeares: Surely thus, Iosiah was older with smooth cheekes, then Manasseh with gray haires. Happy is the infancy of Princes, when it falls into the hands of faithfull Counsellors.

A good pattern is no small help for young beginners; Iosiah sets his father David before him, not Ammon, not Manasseh: Examples are the best rules for the inexperienced, where their choice is good, the directions are easiest: The Laws of God are the waies of David, Those Laws were the rule, these wayes were the practice; Good Iosiah walks in all the wayes of his Father David.

Even the minority of Iosiah was not idle; we cannot be good too early: At eight yeares it was enough to have his eare open to hear good counsaile; to have his eyes and heart open to seek after God: At twelve, he begins to act and shewes well that he hath found the God he sought: Then he addresses himselfe to purge Iudah and Ierusalem, from the high places, groves, images, altars, wherewith it was defiled; burning the bones of the idolatrous Priests upon their altars; strewing the ashes of the idols upon the graves of them that had sacrificed to them, striving by those fires and mattocks to testifie his zeale in detestation of all idolatry.

2 Chron. 34.

The house must first be cleansed, ere it can be garnished; no man will cast away his cost upon unclean heaps; so soon as the Temple was purged, Iosiah bends his thoughts upon the repayring and beautifying of this house of the Lord.

What sin was there in Iudah, wherein Gods Temple suffered not? Sixe severall times was it pillaged, whether out of force or wil: First, Iehoash King of Iudah is faine by the spoile of it to stop the mouth of Hazael; Then, Ioash King of Israel fils his own hands with that sacred spoile, in the daves of Amaziah; after this, Ahaz rifles it for Tiglath Pileser King of Assyria; then [illegible] is forced to ransack the treasures of it for Senacherib; yet after, the sacrilledge of Manasseh makes that booty of it, which his later times endeavoured to restore; and now lastly Ammon his son neglects the frame, embeazels the furniture of this holy place: The very pile began to complaine of age and unrespect. Now comes good Iosiah, and in his eighteenth yeare (when other young Gallants would have thought of nothing but pleasure, and jollity) takes up the latest care of his father David, and gives order for the repayring of the Temple.

The keepers of the doore have received the contribution of all faithfull Iewes, for this pious use; the King sends Shaphan the scribe to Helkijah the Priest to sum it up, and to deliver it unto Carpenters, and Masons, for so holy a work.

How well doth it beseeme the eare of a religious Prince, to set the Priests and Scribes in hand with reedifying the Temple? The command is the Kings, the charge is the high Priests, the execution is the workemens: When the labourers are faithfull

A full in doing the work, and the high-Priest in the directing it, and the King in both by-ing it, Gods house cannot fail of an happy perfection: but when any of these functions, the businesse must needs languish.

How God blesses the devout indeavours of his servants! Whiles Helkiah was diligently surveying the breaches and the reparation of the Temple, he lights upon the book of the Law: The authentick and originall Book of Gods Law was by a speciall charge appointed to be carefully kept within a safe shrine, in the Sanctuary: In the depraved times of Idolatry, some faithfull Priest (to make sure work) had locked it fast up in some corner of the Temple, from the reach of all hands, of all eyes; as knowing how impossible it was, that divine monument could otherwise escape the fury of prophane guiltinesse: Some few transcripts there were doubtlesse, (parcels B of this sacred Book) in other hands; neither doubt I, but as Helkiah had been formerly well acquainted with this holy volume (now of long time hid) so the zealous good Iosiah had been inured to some passages thereof; but the whole body of these awfull Records, since the late night of Idolatrous confusion and persecution, saw no light till now; this precious treasure doth Helkiah find, whiles he digs for the Temple: Never man laboured to the reparation of Gods Church, but he met with a blessing more then he looked for.

Helkiah the Priest, and Shaphan the Scribe do not ingrosse this invaluable wealth into their own hands, nor suppresse these more then sacred roles, for their owne advantage; but transmit them, first to the eares of the King, then by him, to the people: It is not the praise of a good Scribe, to lay up, but to bring forth, both old and C new: And if the Priests lips shall keep knowledge, they keep it to imparting, not smoother, The people shall seek the Law at his mouth, for he is the messenger of the Lord of Hoasts.

So soone as the good King heares the words of the book of the Law, and in speciall, those dreadfull threats of judgement, denounced against the Idolatries of his Iudah, he rends his cloathes, to shew his heart rent with sorrow, and fearfull expectation of those plagues; and washes his bosome with teares. Oh gracious tendernesse of Iosiah: he doth but once heare the Law read, and is thus humbled; humbled for his fathers sins, for the sins of his people: how many of us, after a thousand hammerings of the menaces of Gods Law, upon our guilty soules, continue yet insensible of our danger? The very reading of this Law doth thus affect him; the preaching of D it stirs not us; The sins of others struck thus deep with him; our own are sleighted by us: A soft heart is the best tempered for God: So Physitians are wont to like those bodies best, which are easiest to work upon: O God make our clay, waxe, and our waxe pliable to thine hand; so shall we be sure to be free either from sin, or from the hurt of sin.

It is no holy sorrow that sends us not to God; Iosiah is not moaped with a distractive griefe, or an astonishing feare, but in the height of his passion, sends five choise messengers to Huldah the Propheteſſe to inquire of the Lord, for himself, for Judah: It is an happy trouble that drives us to this refuge. I doe not heare any of these Courtiers reply to this godly motion of their yong King: Alas, Sir, what means this deep perplexity? What needs all this busie inquisition? If your father were idola- E trous, what is that to you, who have abandoned his sins? If your people were once idolatrous, what is that to you, yea to them; who have expiated these crimes by their repentance? Have you not carefully reformed all those abuses? hath not your happy reformation made an abundant amends for those wrongs? Spare your teares, and save the labour of your messengers; All is well, all shall be well; these judgments are for the obstinate, had wee been still guilty, these feares had been just: were wee still in danger, what had wee gained by our conversion? Rather, glad to second the religious cares of their young King, they feed his holy anxieties with a just aggravation of perill; and by their good counsell, whet these his zealous desires of a speedy resolution: That State cannot but be happy, whose Princes and Peeres are ready as to suggest, so to cherish, and execute the devout projects of their Soveraignes.

but in an humble acknowledgement of her Graces, they come to learn the will of God, from her mouth: True piety is modeſt, and ſtands not upon termes of reputation, in the buſineſſes of God; but willingly honors his gifts in any ſubject, leaſt of all in it ſelfe.

The ſexe is not more noted in Huldah, then the condition; As ſhe was a woman, ſo a wife; the wife of Shallum: Holy matrimony was no hinderance to her divine revelations; ſhe was at once a Propheteſſe in her colledge, an huſwife in her family; It was never the practice of God to confine his graces to virginity: At this very time the famous Prophet Ieremy flouriſhed; ſome yeares had he already ſpent in this publike B ſervice; why was not he rather conſulted by Ioſiah? It is not unlike that ſome prophetical imployments called him away at this time from Jeruſalem: His preſence could not have been balked: purpoſely, doubtleſſe doth God caſt his meſſage upon the point of that abſence, that he might honour the weaker veſſell with his divine oracle; and exerciſe the humility of ſo great clients: In the anſwers of God, it is not to be regarded, who ſpeakes, but from whom: The injury redounds to God, if the weakneſſes of the perſon cauſe us to under-value the authority of the function.

As Ioſiah and his meſſengers doe not deſpile Huldah, becauſe ſhee was a woman, ſo Huldah doth not flatter Ioſiah, becauſe a King: Go tell the man that ſent you, Thus ſaith the Lord: Behold, I will bring evill upon this place. To the man that ſends God C to his ſubjects, is but as man to the Propheteſſe: neither is the meſſage ever the ſweeter, becauſe it is required by a Prince: No circumſtance may vary the forme of divine truth.

Evill muſt befall Jeruſalem and Judah; yea, all the words of that book, muſt allight upon the inhabitants of both: In how bad a caſe we may be, and yet think our ſelves not ſafe only, but happy? Theſe Iewes had forgotten their old revolts; and now having framed themſelves to holy courſes, promiſed themſelves nothing but peace, when the Propheteſſe foreſees, and foretells their approaching ruine: Even their old ſcore muſt be paid, after the opinion of a cleere agreement. In vaine ſhall we hope to quit our arrerages by prorogation. This Propheteſſe had immediate viſions from God, yet ſhe muſt ſpeak out of the Book; There was never any revelation from the D
Lord that croſſed his writings: His hand, and his tongue agree eternally: If that book have curſed Iudah, ſhe may not abſolve it.

Yet, what a gracious mixture was here of mercy, with ſeverity; ſeverity to Iudah, mercy to Ioſiah; Iudah ſhall be plagued and ſhall become a deſolation, and a curſe; Ioſiah ſhall be quietly houſed in his grave, before this ſtorme fall upon Iudah: His eye ſhall not ſee, what his people ſhall feele: It is enough that the expectation of theſe evils afflict him, the ſenſe ſhall not.

Whence is this indulgence? Becauſe thine heart was tender, and thou haſt humbled thy ſelfe before the Lord. How happy a thing it is to be a reed unto Gods judgments, rather then an oak; the meek and gentle reed ſtoops, and therefore ſtands, the oak ſtands E ſtiffely out againſt the ſtrongeſt guſt, and therefore is turned up by the roots: At leaſt, let us lament thoſe ſins we have not avoided, and mourne for the ſins of others, whiles we hate our own.

He that found himſelfe exempted from this vengeance, by his repentance and deep humiliation, would fain find the ſame way for the deliverance of his people:
The ſame words of the Law therefore, that had wrought upon his heart, are by him cauſed to be publikely read in the eares of Iudah and Ieruſalem; The aſſembly is univerſall, of Prieſts, Prophets, people, both ſmall and great, becauſe the ſin was ſuch, the danger was ſuch: that no man may complain to want information, the Law of God ſounds in every eare. If our eare be ſhut to the Law, the ſin is ours; but if the Law be ſhut to our eares, the ſinne is of our governours: Woe be to them that hide Gods Booke from the the people, as they would do rats-bane from

A from the eyes of children: Ignorant soules cannot perish without their murder: There is no feare of knowing too much, there is too much feare of practizing too little: Now, if the people doe not imitate their King in relenting, they are not worthy to partake with him, in his impunity. Howsoever they shall not want a great example, as of sorrow, so of amendment. Good Iosiah stands by the pillar, and solemnly renues his Covenant with his God; the people cannot for shame refuse to second him: Even they that lookt for a destruction, yet doe not withdraw their obedience; Gods Children may not be sullen under his corrections, but whether they expect or feele smart, are no other then dutifull to his awfull hand. As a man that finds he hath done something that might indanger the forfeit of his favour, puts himselfe into some deserving action; whereby he may hope to re-indeare himselfe, so doth Iosiah
B here; No indeavour is enough to testifie his zeale to that name of God which was so profaned by his peoples Idolatry; what ever monuments were yet remaining of wicked Paganisme, he defaces with indignation; he burnes the vessels of Baal, and puts down his Chemarim, destroyes the houses of the Sodomites, strawes the powder of their Idols in the brook Kedron, defiles Topheth, takes away the horses of the Sun, burns the charets of the Sun with fire, and omits nothing that might reconcile God, clear Judah, perfect a reformation.

Neither is this care confined to Jerusalem, & the neighbouring Townes, but stretcheth it selfe to the utmost coasts of Iosiahs Kingdom; Bethel was the infamous seat of the Idolatrous Calfe of Israel, it seemes the heyres of Ieroboam (who set up his golden Calfe there) enjoyed it many yeares, the Kings of Judah recovered it to their crowne, but, it
C could not yet recover it self from that ancient infection: Thither doth good Iosiah send the unhallowed bones of Baals Reliques, to stain that altar first, which he will soon after deface.

The time was, and it was no lesse then three hundred and fifty yeares since, that the man of God, out of Judah, cryed against Ieroboams altar:

O Altar, Altar, Thus saith the Lord, Behold a child shall be born, unto the house of David, Iosiah by name, and upon thee shall he offer the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee, and mens bones shall be burnt upon thee.

And now is the houre come, wherein every of those words shall be accomplished: It could not but be a great confirmation to Iosiah, to see that God so long agoe foremarkt him for his own; and fore-named him to so zealous a service.

D All our names are equally foreknown of that divine providence, though not fore-spoken: neither can any act passe from us, which was not pre-determined in that eternall Counsell of the Almighty: neither can any act that is pre-determined be unfulfilled upon earth: Intervention of time breaks no squares in the divine decrees: our pur-blind eyes see nothing, but that which toucheth their lids; the quick sight of Gods prescience sees that, as present, which is a world off. According to the prediction, the stench of dead mens bones is a fit perfume to send up from this altar to heaven, whose best sacrifices savoured worse in the nostrils of God. And the blood of the idolatrous sacrificers was a meet oblation to that God, who had been dishonoured by their burnt offerings to his base corrivals.

Even that Prophet who foretold this, had his toomb in Bethel, and that toomb
E had his inscription; His weakenesse might not rob him of the honour of his sepulture: How palpable doe these Israelites condemne themselves, whiles they reserve so famous a monument of their own conviction? It was no prejudice to this holy Prophet, that his bones lay amongst the sepulchers of idolaters. His Epitaph preserved those bones from burning, upon that altar, which he had accursed; As the Lyon might not tear his carkasse, when he died, so now, the fury of the multitude may not violate the very bones, in his grave.

I do not see Iosiah save them for reliques; I here him command they shall rest in peace; it is fit the dead bodies of Gods Saints should be as free from contempt, as from Superstition.

After the removall of these rites of false worship, it is time to bring in the true: Now a solemn Passeover shall be kept unto the Lord, by the charge of Iosiah: That book book of the Law sets him, the time, place, circumstances, of this Sacrament; his zeal so carefully follows it, that since the days of Samuel, this feast was never so gloriously, so punctually celebrated. Jerusalem is the place, the fourteenth day of the first month is the time, the Levites are the actors, a yearling and spotlesse Lambe is the provision; no bone of it is broken, the blood is sprinkled upon the door-postes, it is roasted whole, eaten with sowre herbs, with bread unleavened, the remainder is consumed by fire. The Law, the Sacrifices had been in vain, if the Passeover had been neglected: No true Israelite might want, whether this monument of their deliverance past, or this Type of the Messiah to come. Rather then faile, Iosiahs bounty shall supply to Judah Lambs for their paschall devotion: No alms is so acceptable, as that whereby the soule is furthered.

Josiahs Death; with the desolation of the Temple and Jerusalem.

2 Kings 23. vers. 29. And 2 Chron. 35. verse 20. 2 Chron. 36.

Iosiah hath now happily setled the affaires both of God, and the State: and now hath sweet leisure to enjoy himself, and his people: his conscience doth not more cheare him at home, then his subjects abroad; Never King raigned with more officious piety to God, with more love, and applause of men: But what stability is there in these earthly things? how seldome is excellency in any kind long-lived? In the very strength of his age, in the height of his strength, is Iosiah withdrawne from the earth; as not without a mercifull intention of his glory, on Gods behalfe, so, not without some weaknesse, on his owne. Pharaoh Necho King of Ægypt comes up to fight against the King of Assyria: What is that to Iosiah? Perhaps the Ægyptians attempted to passe thorow the land of Judah, towards Charchemish the seat of his warre; but, as a neighbour, not as an enemy: Iosiah resists him; as neither holding it safe to admit a forraine power into the bosome of his Country, nor daring to give so faire an occasion of provoking the Assyrian hostility against him.

The King of Ægypt mildly deprecates this enmity, he sends Ambassadors to Iosiah saying, What have I to doe with thee thou King of Iudah? I come not against thee this day, but against the house wherewith I have war, for God commanded me to make haste; forbear thee from medling with God, who is with me, that he destroy thee not.

What friend could have said more? what Prophet could have advised more holily? why doth not good Iosiah say with himself; There may be truth in this suggestion; God may have sent this man, to be a scourge of mine old enemy, of Ashur: If the hand of the Almighty be in this designe, why doe I oppose it? The quarrell is not mine, why do I thrust my finger into this flame, unbidden? Wherefore should I hazard the effusion of bloud, upon an harmlesse passage? Can I hear him plead a command from God, and not inquire into it? How easie is it for me to know the certainty of this pretended commission? Have not I the Priests, and Prophets of God about me? Let me first goe and consult his oracle; If God have sent him, and forbidden me, why should my courage carry me against my piety?

It is strange that the good heart of Iosiah could escape these thoughts, these resolutions: Yet, he that upon the generall threats of Gods Law against Judah, sends messengers to inquire of a Prophetesse; now upon these particular threats of danger to himself, speaks not, stirs not: The famous Prophet Iremy was then living, and Zephaniah; besides a whole Colledge of Seers: Iosiah doth not so much as send out of doores, to ask, Shall I goe up against the King of Egypt? Sometimes, both grace & wit are asleep in the holiest and wariest brests: the best of all Gods Saints may be sometimes miscaried by their passions to their cost.

The

A The wise providence of God hath mercifully determined to leave Iosiah to his owne counsels, that by the weaknesse of his servant, he might take occasion to perfit his glory: Even that wherein Iosiah was wanting unto God, shall concurre to the making up of Gods promise to Iosiah: when we are the most blinde-folded, we runne on the wayes of Gods hidden decrees; and, what ever our intents be, cannot, if we would, goe out of that unknown path.

Needs will Iosiah put himselfe into armes against an unwilling enemy; and to be lesse noted, disguises himselfe. The fatall arrow of an Egyptian archer findes him out in the throng, and gives him his deaths-wound; Now too late he calls to a retrait; his changed Charet is turned to a Biere, to cary his bleeding corps to his grave, in Ierusalem.

B What eye doth not now pity and lament the untimely end of a Iosiah? whom can it choose but affect, to see a religious, just, vertuous Prince snatcht away in the vigor of his age? After all our foolish moane, the providence that directed that shaft to his [illegible] place, intended that wound for a stroke of mercy: The God whom Iosiah serves, [illegible] his glory, and by this sudden violence will deliver him [illegible] the participation of the miseries of Iudah, which had beene many deaths; and [illegible] to the participation of that happinesse, which could countervaile more deaths, then could be incidents to a Iosiah. Oh the wonderfull goodnes of the Almighty, whose very judgements are mercifull! Oh the safe condition of Gods children, whom very paine saveth, whom death revives, whom dissolution unites, whom lastly, their very sinne and temptation glorifies!

C How happily hath Iosiah gained by this change? Instead of a froward people, he now is sorted with Saints and Angels; instead of a fading, and corruptible crowne, he now enjoyes an eternall. The orphan subjects are ready to weep out their eyes, for sorrow; their losse cannot be so great, as his gaine: he is glorious, they, as their sinnes had deserved, miserable. If the separated soule could be capable of passion, could Iosiah have seene, after his departure, the calamities of his sons, of his people, it could not but have laid siege to his peace.

The sad subjects proclaime his son Iehoahaz, King instead of so lamented a father; He both doth ill, and fares ill: By that time he hath sate but three moneths in the throne, Pharaoh Necoh King of Egypt seconds the fathers death, with the sons captivity: This victorious enemy puts downe the wicked sonne of Iosiah, and lades him D with chaines at Riblath, in the land of Hamath; and lades his people with a tribute of an hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold: Yet, as if he that was unwilling to fight with Iosiah, were no lesse unwilling to root out his posterity, this Egyptian sets Eliakim, the second son of Iosiah, upon the seat of his father; and, that he might be all his, changes his name to Iehoiakim: Oh the wofull and unworthy succession of Iosiah! one son is a prisoner, the other is a tributary; both are wicked. After that Iehoiakim hath been some yeats Pharaohs Baylife, to gather, and rack the deare rents of Iudah, Nebuchadnezzar the great King of Babylon comes up, and sweeps away both the Lord, and his Feodary, Pharaoh, and Iehoiakim.

So far was the ambitious Egyptian from maintaining his incroachment upon the territories of Iudah, that he could not now hold his owne: From Nilus to Euphrates, all E is lost: So subject are the lesser powers still to be swallowed up of the greater; so just it is with God, that they which will be affecting undue enlargement of their estates, should fall short of what they had.

Iehoiakim is caried in fetters to Babylon: and now in that dungeon of his captivity, hath more leisure, then grace, to bethinke himselfe of all his abominations; and whiles he inherits the sad lodging of his great grandfather Manasseh, inherits not his successe.

While he is rotting in this Gaole, his young son Iehoiachin starts up in his throne; like to a mushrom that rises up in a night, and withers in a day: Within three moneths, and ten dayes is that young Prince (the meet son of such a father) fetcht up in irons to his fathers prison; Neither shall he goe alone; his attendance shall add to his misery; His mother, his wives, his officers, his peeres, his craftsmen his warri-ours accompany him, manicled, and chained, to their perpetuall bondage. A

Now, according to Isaiahs word, it would have beene great preferment for the fruit of Hezekiahs loynes to be Pages in the Court of Babylon.

One onely branch yet remains of the unhappy stock of holy Iosiah, Mattaniah, the brother of Iehoiakim, whom Nebuchadnezzar (changing his name to Zedekiah) sets up in that forlorn, and tributary throne; There might he have lived (though an underling, yet) peaceable; This man (to make up the measure of Gods just judgements) as he was ever a rebell to God, so proves rebellious to his Soveraigne master the King of Babylon: The Prophet Ieremie hath forewarned him in vaine; nothing could teach this man but smart.

Who can look for other then fury from Nebuchadnezzar, against Ierusalem, which now had affronted him with three severall successions of revolts, and conspiracies against his government; and thrice abused his bounty, and indulgence? With a mighty army doth he therefore come up against his seditious deputy; and besieges Ierusalem, and blocks it up with forts round about. After two years siege, the Chaldees without and the famine within, have prevailed; King Zedekiah and his souldiers are fled away by night, as thinking themselves happy, if they might abandon their [redacted] save their lives. B

The Chaldees (as caring more for the birds, then for the nest) [redacted] vertake Zedekiah, forsaken of all his forces, in the plaine of Ie[redacted] Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon. What can so unthankf[redacted] expect, but the worst of revenge? The sentence is feare[redacted] of Zedekiah are slaine before his eyes; then those eyes of his (as if they had seene enough, when they had seene him childlesse) are put out: His eyes are onely lent him so long, as to torment him with the sight of his owne utmost discomfort; Had his sons but over-lived his eyes, the griefe had been so much the lesse, as the apprehension of it had beene lesse lively, and piercing; Now, this wofull object shall shut up his sight, that even when his bodily eyes are gone, yet the eyes of his minde might ever see what he last saw; That thus his sons might be ever dying before him, and himselfe in their death ever miserable. C

Who doth not now wish that the blood of Hezekiah and Iosiah could have been severed from these impure dregs of their lewd issue? No man could pity the offenders, were it not for the mixture of the interest of so holy progenitors.

No more sorrow can come in at the w[redacted] dowes of Zedekiah, more shall come in at his doores; his eares shall receive what [redacted] to rue for his Ierusalem, Nebuzaradan the great Marshall of the King of Babylon [redacted] nes up against that deplored City, and breakes downe the walls of it, round ab[redacted] nd burnes the Temple of the Lord, and the Kings house, and every faire Palace [redacted] salem, with fire; drives away the remainder of her inhabitants, into Captivity, [redacted] ne last spoyles of the glorious Temple. Oh Ierusalem, Ierusalem, the wonder of all times, the paragon of nations, the glory of the earth, the favourite of heaven, how art thou now become heaps of ashes, hills of rubbish, a spectacle of desolation, a monument of ruine? If later, yet no lesse deep hast thou now pledged that bitter cup of Gods vengeance, to thy sister Samaria; How carefully had thy God forewarned thee? Though Israel play the harlot, yet, let not Iudah sin: Loe now, as thine iniquities, so thy judgements have overtaken her: Both ly together in the dust, both are made a curse to all posterities: O God, what place shall thy justice spare, if Ierusalem have perished? If that delight of thine were cut off for her wickednesse, Let us not be high minded but feare. D E

What pity it was to see those goodly Cedars of the Temple flaming up higher then they stood in Lebanon? to see those curious marbles, which never felt the dint of the pick-axe, or hammer, in the laying, wounded with mattocks, and wounding the earth in their fall? to see the holy of holies, whereinto none might enter but the high-priest, once a yeare, thronged with Pagans; the vailes rent, the sacred Arke of God violated, and defaced, the Tables over-turned, the Altars broken downe, the pillars demolished, the pavements digged up, yea the very ground, where that famous fruitfull wood, deformed. O God, thou wouldest rather have no visible

A visible house upon earth, then endure it defiled with Idolatries.
Foure hundred thirty and sixe yeares had that Temple stood, and beautified the earth, a[illegible] heaven, now it is turned into rude heapes; Th[illegible] to be pleaded for the favour of the [illegible] Temple, not made with hands, [illegible]s. Thither he graciously bri[illegible]rdain'd us thither, for the sake of t[illegible]t glorious high-Priest, that hath once for all entred into that holy of holies,

Contemplations.

Zerubbabel and Ezra.

THE firſt tranſportation into Babylon, under Iehoiachin (whoſe ſeruice, Exechiel, and many other of the beſt ſort, were taken into captivity) was (ſome eleuen yeares after) followed with a ſecond, vnder Zedekiah, wherein the remnant of the now ruined Ieruſalem, and Iudah, were ſwept away. Seuenty yeares was the period of their lonely ſeruitude: whilſt Babylon was a Queene, Iudah was not viſited: when that proud Tyranneſſe fell, Gods people began to riſe againe: The Babylonian Monarchy was ouerflowed vp of the Perſian, and the Liberty.

For Cyrus conquering Babylon, the Iewes groaning vnder ry, ſtraight releaſes them, and ſends them, vnder the Conduct of their rubbabel, back to their almoſt-forgotten country.

The world ſtands vpon viciſſitudes. Euery nation hath her turne, and must fill vp her meaſure: Threeſcore and ten yeares agoe, it was the courſe of Iudah, whoſe iniquity of that rebellious people was full. Some hundred and thirty yeares before that was the turne of Samaria, and her Iſraelites: Now the ſtaffe is come to the doore of Babylon, euen that wherewith Iudah was beaten: and thoſe Perſians which are victorious, muſt haue their terme alſo. It is in vaine for any earthly ſtate to propoſe to it ſelfe an immutable condition. At laſt the rod that ſcourged Gods children is caſt into the fire: Thou haſt remembred, O Lord, the children of Edom in the day of Ieruſalem, how they ſaid, Downe with it, downe with it, euen to the ground: O daughter of Babylon waſted with miſery, how happy ſhall he be that rewardeth thee as thou haſt ſerued vs. It is Cyrus that hath wrought this reuenge, this reſcue.

Doubtleſſe, it did not a little moue Cyrus to this fauour, that he found himſelfe honorably forenamed in theſe Iewiſh prophecies, and fore-appointed to this glorious ſeruice, no leſſe then an hundred and ſeuenty yeares, before he was: Who would not be glad to make good ſo noble and happy a deſtiny? O God, if we heare that thou haſt ordained vs to life, how gladly, how carefully ſhould we worke out our ſaluation? if to good workes, how ſhould we abound?

Iſay 44. 28.

In the firſt yeare of his Monarchy, doth Cyrus both make proclamation, and publish them in writing thorow all his Kingdome; wherein he both professeth his zealous resolutions, and desires, to build up Gods house in Ierusalem, and injoynes, and incourages all the Jewes, thorow his dominions, to addresse themselves to that sacred worke; and incites all his subjects to aide them with silver, and gold, and goods, and beasts. How gracious was the command of that, whereof the very allowance was a favour?

Was it Cyrus that did this? was it not thou, O God, in whose hands are the hearts of Kings, that stirredst up the spirit of that Persian; as if he had beene more then a son of thy Church, a father? How easie is it for thee to make very Pagans protectors to to thy Church, enemies, benefactors?

Not with an empty grace doth this great King dismisse the Iewes, but with a royall bounty; He brings forth the vessells of the house of the Lord, which Nebuchad-nezzar had brought forth out of Ierusalem, and had put them in the house of his gods; and causeth them to be numbred by his Treasurer to the hands of Sheshbazzar the Prince of Iudah, for the use of the Temple; no fewer then five thousand and foure hundred vessels of gold and silver.

Certainely, this great Monarch wanted not wit to thinke; It is a rich booty that I finde in the Temples of Babylon; by the law of conquest it is mine; having vanquisht their gods, I may well challenge their spoile; how seasonably doth it now fall into my hands, upon this victory, to reward my soldiers, to settle my new Empire? what if this treasure came from Ierusalem? the propriety is now altered; the very place (according to the conceit of the Iewes) hath profaned it; The true God, I have heard, is curious; neither will abide those vessels, which have been polluted with idolatrous uses: It shall be enough if I loose the bonds of this miserable people: If I give liberty, let the next give wealth: they will think themselves happy in bare walls, in their native earth: To what purpose should I pamper their penury with a sudden store? But the Princely heart of Cyrus would admit of no such base sacrilegious thoughts; Those vessels that he findes stampt with Gods marke, he will returne to their owner; neither his owne occasions, nor their abuse shall be any colour of their detention. O Cyrus, how many close-handed, gripple-minded Christans shall once be choked in judgement with the example of thy just munificence? thou restoredst that which we purloine: woe be to those houses that are stored with the spoiles of Gods Temple: woe bee to those fingers that are tainted with holy treasures.

Kings can hardly doe good alone, their lawes are not more followed, then their examples: No sooner doe the chiefe of the fathers of Iudah and Benjamin, and the Priests, and Levites set their faces towards Ierusalem for the building of the Temple, then the liberall hands of their Pagan neighbours furnish them with gold, and silver, and precious things. Every Persian is glad to be at the charge of laying a stone, in Gods house. The same God that had given them these metals, out of his coffers of the earth, gives it out of their coffers to his Temple. He that tooke away by the Chaldees, gives by the Persians: Where the Almighty intends a work, there cannot be any want of meanes.

Thus heartened, thus laded, doe the joyfull families of Iudah returne to their old home; How many thousands of them were worne out, and lost in that seventy years servitude? How few of them yet survived, that could know the place of their birth, and habitation, or say, Here stood the Temple, here the Palace? Amongst those forty and two thousand, three hundred and threescore Iewes, that returned in this first expedition, there were, whom the confusion of their long captivitie had robbed of their pedegree; They knew themselves Iewes, but could not derive their line: these were yet admitted, without difficulty; But those of the Priestly tribe, which could not deduce their genealogie from the register, are cashiered as uncleane. Then, God would be served in a blood, now in a due succession: If we could not fetch the line of our pedegree from Christ, and his Apostles, we were not fit for the Evangelicall altars. Their calling was by nature, ours by grace; The grace of inward abilities, of outward ordination; if we cannot approve both these, we are justly abandoned; now had the children of Israel taken downe their Harps from the Besides servants 7337.

A the Willowes which grew by the waters of Babylon, and could, unbidden, sing the true songs of their recovered Sion: They are newly setled in their old mansions, when upon the first publike feast, in the Autumne immediatly following their returne, they flock up to Jerusalem: their first care is their publike sacrifice, Our School of their Captivity, wherein they have beene long trained, hath taught them to begin with God: A forced discontinuance, makes devotion more savory, more sweet to religious hearts; whereas in an open freedome, piety doth too often languish.

Iosua the Priest, and Zorobabel the Prince are fitly joyned in the building of the Altar: neither of their hands may be out of that sacred worke: no sooner is that set upon the bases, then it is imployed to the daily burnt-offerings: The Altar may not stay the leisure of the Temple; Gods Church may not want her oblations; He can
B be none of the sonnes of Israel, that doth not every day renue his acknowledgements of God.

How feelingly doth these Iewes keepe their feast of Tabernacles, whiles their sojourning in Babylon was still in their thoughts; whiles as yet their Tents must supply their ruined houses? The first motions of zeale are commonly strong, and fervent; How carefully do these Governours & Priests make preparation for Gods Temple? Carpenters and Masons are hyred; Tyrian workmen are againe called for; and Libanon is now anew solicited for Cedar trees. The materials are ready; Every Israelite, with such courage addresses himselfe to this service, as if his life lay in those stones: And now, whiles the foundation of the Temple was laying, the Priests stand in their habits, with Trumpets, the Levites with Cymbals, interchanging their holy
C Musicke, and Melodiously singing praises to the God of Israel, who had turned their captivity as the streames in the South, and honoured their eyes and hands with the first stones of his house: The people seconds their songs with shouts; the earth sounds, and heaven rings with the joyfull acclamations of the multitude; It is no smal comfort in a good action, to have begun well; The entrance of any holy enterprise is commonly encountred with many discouragements, which if we have once overcome, the passage is smooth.

How would these men have shouted at the laying on of the last stone of the battlements, who are thus joyed with laying the first stones of the foundation? The end of any thing is better then the beginning: that hath certainty, this danger; this labour, that rest: little did these men think that, for all this, few of them should live to D see the roofe.

What different affections shall we see produced in men by the same occasion? The younger Jews shouted at this sight, the elder wept: The yonger shouted to see a new foundation; The elder wept to remember the old: They who had seen no better, thought this goodly; They who had seene the former, thought this meane, and homely; more sorrowing for what they had lost, then rejoycing in so unequall a reparation.

As it may fall out, it is some peece of misery to have been happier; every abatement of the degrees of our former height laies siege to our thankfulnesse, for lesser mercies. Sometimes, it proves an advantage to have knowne no better; he shall more comfortably enjoy present benefits, who takes them as they are without any
E other comparisons, then of the weaknesse of his owne deservings. It is nothing to me what my selfe or others have beene, so I be now well: Neither is it otherwise in particular Churches, if one be more gloriously built then another, yet if the foundation be rightly laid in both; one may not insult, the other may not repine: Each must congratulate the truth to other, each must thankfully injoy it selfe.

The noise was not more loud, then confused; here was a discordant mixture of lamentation, and shouting; it was hard to say whether drowned the other.

This assembly of Iews was a true image of Gods Church on earth; one sings, another cryes; never doth it all either laugh or mourn at once. It shall be in our triumph that all teares shall be wip't from our eyes; till then our passions must be mixed, according to the occasions.

The Iews are busie at worke, not more full of joy, then hopes; and now that the

the walls begin to over-looke the earth; their thoughts seeme to over-look the walls. But what great enterprise was ever set on foot for God, which found not some crosses? A

There was a mungrell broode of Samarit-Assyrians, which ever since the dayes of Senacherib dwelt in the land of Israel; whose Religion was a patched coate of severall shreds; some little part Jewish; the rest Pagan, not without much variety of idolatry. These hollow neighbours proffer their assistance to the children of the captivity; Let us build with you, for we seeke your God, as ye doe: and doe sacrifice to him. Might men be their owne judges, there would be no heresie in the world, no mis-worship. It is true; these men did sacrifice to the true God; The lyons taught them to seeke, and the Israelitish Priest taught them to find the fashions of the God of the land; Some of these Jews knew their devotion of old; They served Israels God; but with their owne; As good no God, as too many. In a just indignation therefore doe these Jewish governours repell the partnership of such helpers: You have nothing to do with us, to build an house to our God; but we our selves together will build unto the Lord God of Israel. The hand of an idolater is contagious. Yet, had it been to the building of some fortresse, or common-hall, perhaps their aide had not beene refused; but when the walls of Gods house are to be raised, this society had been piacular. B

Those that may not be allowed to help the worke, will aske no leave to hinder it: their malicious suggestions weaken the hands of the people of Judah, and stirre up authority to suppresse them.

Cyrus was far off, neither lived he long after that gracious commission; and besides was so taken up the while with his wars, that he could not have leisure to sift those querulous accusations. Now therefore, during the last yeares of Cyrus, and the raigne of his son Cambyses, and the long government of Darius Histaspides, and of his son Xerxes, or Ahasuerus, and lastly of his son Artaxerxes; untill the dayes of Darius Nothus, (which was no lesse then five successions of Kings, besides Cyrus) do the walls of the Temple stand still, yea lie waste, subject to the wrongs of time, and wether: the fit matter of sorrow to the Iewes, insultation to the enemies, derision to passengers. C

What a wide gap of time was here betwixt the foundation of Gods House, and the battlements? How large a tryall doth God now secondly take of the faith, of the patience of his people? How large a proofe doth he give of his owne long-suffering? Oh God, when thou hadst but one house upon earth, thou wert content to put up delayes, yea affronts in the building of it; now thou hast many, it is no marvell if thy longanimity and justice, abide some of them to lie desolate: They are not stones, or metals, or men that can make thee more glorious; thou best knowest when to serve thy selfe of all these, when to honour these with thy service. D

A small matter hinders the worthiest action; as a little fish (they say) stayes the greatest ship: Before, the Iewes were discouraged with words, but now they are stopped by commands.

These envious Samaritans have corrupted the governours which the Persian Kings set over those parts; and from their hands have obtained letters of deepe calumniation, to Ahasuerus the King, and after him, to his son Artaxerxes; wherein Ierusalem is charged with old rebellion to Kings; and for proofe, appellation is made to the Records; from which evidence, is spitefully inferred, that if these wals be once built, the King shall receive no tribute on this side the river. Never was Gods Church but subject to reproaches. E

Princes have reason to be jealous of their rights. The Records are searcht, It soon appeares that within one Century of years, Ierusalem had rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar, and held out two years siege of that great Babylonian. The scandall of disloyalty is perpetuall: although indeed they held him rather a prevailing enemy, then a lawfull Soveraign; One act disparages either place, or person, to all posterities. Therefore shall the walls of Jerusalem lie waste, because it had once been treacherous; After an hundred yeares doth that City rue one perfidious act of Zedekiah. Fidelity to our governours is ever both safe, and honourable.

Command

A Command is now ſent out from * Artaxerxes, (even the ſon of Queene Eſther) to reſtraine the worke: All reſpects muſt ceaſe with carnall mindes, when their honours and profits are in queſtion. Rehum the Chancellor, and Shimſhai the Scribe, come now armed with authority: The ſword hath eaſily prevailed againſt the trowell. Still doe the Iewes finde themſelves as it were captives at home, and in ſilence, and ſorrow, ceaſe from their labours, untill the dayes of the next ſucceſſour, Darius Nothus.

* Sur-named Long-hand.

As thoſe that had learned to ſow after a bad crop; theſe Iewes, upon the change of the Prince, by the incouragement of the Prophets of God, Haggai, and Zechariah, take new heart to build againe: If others power hinder us in the work of God, our will may not be guilty.

B Their new governours come, as before, to expoſtulate; Who hath commanded you to build this houſe, and to make up this wall? and what are your names? They wiſely and modeſtly plead the ſervice of the God of heaven, the decree of Cyrus; ſtill perſiſting to build, as if the prohibition of Artaxerxes had died with the author. The unpartiall Governours doe neither draw nor ſend secretly, but relating the humble and juſt answer of the Iewes, move the King that ſearch may be made in the rolles of Babylon, whether ſuch Edicts were made by Cyrus, and require his royall pleaſure, concerning the validity of ſuch a preſumed decree. Darius ſearches, findes, ratifies, inlargeth it, not onely charging his officers not to hinder the worke, but commanding to levy ſummes of his own Tribute, beyond the river, for the expences of the building, for the furniſhing of ſacrifices; threatning utter ruine to the houſe of that man, and C death to his perſon, who ſhould offer to impeach this bounty: and ſhutting up with a zealous imprecation; The God of heaven that hath cauſed his Name to dwell there deſtroy all Kings and people that ſhall put to their hand to alter, and to deſtroy this Houſe of God which is at Ieruſalem: I Darius have made a decree, let it be done with ſpeed.

Who would have looke for ſuch an Edict from a Perſian? No Salomon, no David could have ſaid more.

The ruler of all hearts makes choice of his owne inſtruments, and when he pleaſeth, can glorifie himſelfe by thoſe meanes, which are leaſt expected: That ſacred work which the husband, and ſonne of an Eſther croſſed, ſhall be happily accompliſhed by a Darius: In the ſixt yeare of his raign, is the Temple of God fully finiſhed; and now the Dedication of it, is celebrated, by a joyfull feaſt: An hundred bullocks, D two hundred rams, foure hundred lambes, in a meet proportion, ſmoke upon their altars: And now the children of the captivity thinke this day a ſufficient payment for all their ſorrowes: We have reaſon to thinke it the faireſt day that ever ſhone forth to us, wherein the ſpirituall building of Gods Houſe is raiſed up in our ſoules. How ſhould we ſhout at the laying of this foundation, and feaſt at the laying on of the roofe? What other, what better ſacrifice can we offer up to God in the ſenſe of our joy, then our ſelves? Let our hearts be at once, the Temple, the Altar, the Sacrifice; O God, be thou glorified in all theſe, who haſt graciouſly honoured all theſe with thy ſelfe.

Every holy feaſt is now duly kept, the Prieſts know their diviſions, the Levites their courſes; and the whole ſervice of God is put into a ſetled order; But as there can be no new beginnings without imperfection, nor long continuance, without E corruption; reformation is no leſſe neceſſary then good inſtitutions; Artaxerxes * Mnemon hath learned of his father Darius to befriend Gods people; and ſtrives to inherit his beneficence: under his government, is Ezra the Prieſt and learned Scribe, ſent with a large commiſſion from Babylon, to Ieruſalem, to enquire into the wants, and redreſſe the diſorders of the Iewes; with full power not onely to cary with him all the voluntaries of his nation; and the treaſures contributed in all the province of Babylon; but to raiſe ſuch ſummes, out of the Kings revenues, as ſhould be found requiſite; and withall to ordaine Magiſtrates, and Judges, and to crowne the Lawes with due execution, whether to death or baniſhment, or confiſcation; and laſtly, with a large exemption of the Prieſts and Levites, and all the inferiour officers of the Temple, from all tolles, tributes, cuſtomes. Nothing wanted here, whether ther for direction, or incouragement. It is a signe of Gods great favour to any nation, when the hearts of Soveraigne Governours are raised up, both to the choice of worthy agents, and to the commanding of pious, and restorative actions. A Holy and carefull Ezra gathers a new colony of Iewes, takes view of them at the river of Ahava; and finding amisse of the sons of Levi (without whom no company, no plantation can be compleat) sends for their supply; And now fully furnished, he proclaimes a fast in the way.

I doe not heare him say, The journey is long and dangerous, the people have need of all their strength, I could well wish us all afflicted with a religious fast, were it not that the abatement of the courage, and vigour of the multitude may indanger our successe; But without all these carnal consultations, he begins with this solemne act of humiliation; It is better to have God strong in our weaknesse, then to have flesh and blood strong in His neglect. B

Artaxerxes was a Patron of the Iewes, yet a Pagan by profession, wise Ezra was afraid of quenching those sparkes of piety which he deserned in this semi-proselyte. Rather therefore then he will seeme to imply a distrust in the providence of that God, in whose service he went by seeking a convoy of soldiers from the King; Ezra chooses to put himselfe upon the hazard of the way, and the immediate protection of the Almighty. Any death were better then to heare Artaxerxes say, Is this the man that so confidently told me, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seeke him, but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him? Doth he beleeve himselfe that he thus doubts ere he begin? Dare he not trust his God with his owne businesses?

The resolutions of faithfull hearts are heroicall: No heathen man shall stumble at Ezraes feare: He can finde more assurance in his fast, then in a Persian band: with a couragious reliance upon the hand of his God he puts himselfe into the journey; and findes nothing but safety and successe. The fidelity of the Almighty never disappointed the confidence of his servants. All the army of Artaxerxes could not have beene so strong a guard to the Iewes, as their invisible protection. C

In the space of foure moneths is Ezra and his company happily arrived at Jerusalem: where he joyes to see the new Temple, and his old Colleagues: and now having delivered up the charge of his treasure, by waight, in the chambers of the house of the Lord, he applies himself to his worke, and delivers the Kings Commission to the Lieutenants and Governours, for their utmost assistance.

The Princes of Iudah doe not (for ought I heare) repine at the large Patent granted to this Priest, nor say, What doth a man of this robe meddle with placing or displacing Magistrates? with executions of judgements to death, bonds, banishment? but rather as congratulating this power to sacred hands, gladly present unto him all their grievances. Truly religious hearts cannot grudge any honor to their spirituall guides. D

This holy Commissioner is soone welcomed with a sad Bill of Complaint, from some good Peeres of Israel; wherein they charge divers of the Priests, Levites, people, not to have separated themselves from the idolatrous inhabitants of the lands, nor (therefore) from their abominations, even from Canaanites, Hittites, Perizzites, and the rest of those branded nations; that they have taken of their daughters for themselves, and for their sons: So that the holy seed have mingled themselves with those forbidden people; and, (which made the matter so much more hainous, lesse remediable) that the hand of the Princes, and Rulers, hath beene chiefe in this trespasse. E

Oh hypocriticall Iewes, did ye refuse to suffer your Samaritan neighbours to joyne with you in building a liveleſſe house unto God, and doe ye now joyne affinity with a more accursed generation for the building of living houses unto posterity? for the pulling downe of the lively House of God?

How could Ezra heare this with his clothes, his haire, his beard untorne? What griefe, what astonishment must this newes needs bring to a zealous heart? And, were it not that the conscience of his sincere respect of Gods glory relieved him, how could Ezra choose but repent of his journey; and say; Am I come from Babylon to finde Paganisme in Iudah? Did I leave Persians, to meet with Canaanites? what doe

A I heare if Jerusalem be removed? How much better were a cleare captivity then an idolatrous freedome? Wo is me, that having left many Jewish hearts in Babylon, I now am forced to find heathen blood in Jerusalem.

As a man distracted with sorrow, Ezra sits down upon the earth with his garments rent, with the haire of his head, and beard pluckt off, wringing his hands, knocking his breast, not moving from his place untill the evening sacrifice. It is hard to be too much affected with the publike sins of Gods people. Those who find themselves in the ship of Gods Church, cannot but be much troubled with every dangerous leake that it takes: Common cases are not more neglected by the careless, then taken to heart by the wise and godly.

There, and thus, Ezra sits astonied untill the evening sacrifice: others resorted to B him the while, even all that trembled at the words of the God of Israel; but to help on his sorrow, not to relieve, neither doth any man wish a mitigation of his owne, or others griefe. At last, he rises up from his heavinesse, and casts himselfe upon his knees, and spreads out his hands unto the Lord his God. Wherefore was all that pensiveneſſe, fasting, silence, tearing of haire and clothes, but to serve as a meet preface to his prayer; wherein he so freely powres out his heart, as if it had beene all dissolved into devotion; professing his shame to lift up his face towards the Throne of God; confessing the iniquities of his people, which were increased over their heads, and growne up unto heaven, fetching their trespasse farre, and charging them deep; feelingly acknowledging the just hand that had followed them, in all their judgements, and the just confusion wherein they now stand before the face of their God.

C Teares, and sighes, and grovelings accompanied his prayers; the example and noise whereof drew Israel into a participation of this publike mourning, For the people wept very sore: How can they choose but thinke, if he thus lament for us, how should we grieve for our selves?

All Judah went away merrily with their sin, till this checke of Ezra; now they are afflicted: Had not the hands of the Peeres beene in this trespasse, the people had not beene guilty; had not the cheekes of Ezra beene first drenched with teares, the people had not beene penitent. It cannot be spoken, what power there is in a great example, whether to evill or good.

Prayers and teares are nothing without indeavours. Shecaniah, the son of Iehiel, puts the first life into this businesse. Having seconded the complaint of Ezra, he now
D addes, Yet there is hope in Israel concerning this thing. Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and such as are borne of them. Arise, for this matter belongeth to thee, we also will be with thee, Be of good courage, and do it.

When mischiefe is once done, the chiefe care is how to redresse it. The best way of redresse is the deliberate undoing of that which we have rashly committed; The surest obligation to the undoing of an evill act, is an oath or covenant made with God for the performance.

There is no man so wise, but he may make use of good counsell, there is no man so forward, but he may abide incitation. It is no small incouragement to see an heartie assistance in an envious and difficult service. Then arose Ezra, and made the chiefe Priests, the Levites, and all Israel to sweare that they should doe according to this word.

E It is halfe done that is thus assured. There was need of a strong power to dissolve a matrimoniall, though inordinate love: Doubtlesse, these men had married out of affection; their hearts were no lesse set upon these wives (though heathenish) then if they had beene of their owne Tribes; neither were their children, thus begotten, lesse deare unto them, then if they had laine in Jewish wombs; Nothing lesse then an oath of God therefore could quit these passions. That is both required and taken.

Now begins Ezra to conceive some hope of present redresse; the comfort whereof, yet, cannot turne off his sorrow for the offence passed; He neither eates bread, nor drinks water, willingly punishing himselfe, because Israel had sinned: Now shall his Countrey-men easily read in his face their owne penance, and just humiliation, and say, This man takes no joy in our sufferings, he would not smart thus for us, if he did not descrie more danger towards us then we can apprehend.

Nehemiah

A Nehemiah sate warme in the Court at Shushan, favoured by the great King Artaxerxes; nothing could be wanting to him, whether for pleasure or state; what needed he to trouble his head with thoughts for Jerusalem? what if those remote walls lay on heaps whiles himselfe dwelt faire? what if his far-distant country-men he despised, whiles himselfe is honoured by the great Monarch of the world?

It is not so easie for gracious dispositions to turne off the publik calamities of Gods Church: neither can they doe other then leese their private felicities in the common distresses of the universall body. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning; If I doe not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roofe of my mouth.

Many Jewes went up from Babylon, and Shushan, to Jerusalem; few ever returned voluntarily from their native home to the region of their captivity: Some occasion B drew Hanani with certaine others of Judah, to this voyage. Of them doth Nehemiah carefully inquire the present condition of Jerusalem: It was not Jewes that the people were afflicted, and reproached, the walls broken downe, the gates burnt with fire. Even since the furious vastation of Nebuzaradan, that City knew better termes: seldome when doth the spirituall Jerusalem fare otherwise in respect of outward estate? Externall glory and magnificence is an unsure note of the Church.

Well had Nehemiah hoped that the gracious Edict, and beneficence of Darius, and the successive patronage of his Lord Artaxerxes had by the continuance of twenty yeares favour advanced the strength and glory of Jerusalem; but finding the holy City to lie still in the dust of her confusion, neglected of God, and men, he sits downe and weeps, and mournes, and fasts, and prayes to the God of heaven. How many saw those ruines, and were little affected? he heares of them afar off, and C is thus passionate. How many were upon this sight affected with a fruitlesse sorrow? his mourning is joyned with the endevours of redresse. In vaine is that griefe which hath no other end then it selfe.

Nehemiah is resolved to kneele to the King his master, for the repaire of his Jerusalem, he dares not attempt the suit till hee have begun with God; This good Courtier knew well that the hearts of these earthly Kings are in the over-ruling hand of the King of heaven to incline whither he pleaseth. Our prayers are the onely true meanes to make way for our successe; If in all our occasions we doe not begin with the first mover, the course is preposterous and commonly speeds there-after.

Who dares censure the piety of Courtiers, when he finds Nehemiah standing before Artaxerxes? Even the Persian Palace is not uncapable of a Saint: No man that waits on the Altar at Jerusalem can compare for zeale, with him, that waits on the cup of a Pagan Monarch: The mercies of God are unlimited to places, to callings.

Thus armed with devotions, doth Nehemiah put himselfe into the presence of his master Artaxerxes. His face was overclouded with a deepe sadnesse, neither was he willing to cleare it. The King easily notes the disparity of the countenance of the bearer, and the wine that he beares: and in a gracious familiarity askes the reason of such unwonted change. How well it becomes the great to stoope unto a courteous affability, and to exchange words of respect, even with their humble vassals.

Nehemiah had not been so long in the Court but he knew that Princes like no other then cheerefull attendants, neither was he wont to bring any other face into that presence, then smooth, and smiling.

Great men are wont to be full of suspition, and where it seeth a dejection, and sowernesse of the brow, it is ready to apprehend some sullen thoughts of discontentment, or, which is worse, disrespect to that Soveraignty, whose beames should be of power to dispell all our inward mists: Even good manners forbid a man to wrestle with the countenance of a Prince, except he can either lay by their displeasing aspect, or disguise it: So had Nehemiah hitherto done: Now, he purposely suffers his sorrow to be visible through his eyes, that it may worke both inquiry and compassion from the master: neither doth he faile of his hopes in either; Why is thy countenance sad? How sensible do we make the father of mercies is of our griefes, when as a heathen master is so tender of a servants griefe? How ready should we be to lay open our cases to the God of all comfort, when when we see Nehemiah so quicke in the expressions of his sorrow for the ruine of his care?

Let the King live for ever: Why should not my countenance be sad, when the City, the place of my fathers sepulchers lieth waste, and the gates thereof burnt with fire? Without an humble preface doth Nehemiah lay forth his grievance. Complaints have ever an unpleasing harshnesse in them, which must be taken off by some discreet insinuation: although it could not but sound well in the gracious eare of Artaxerxes, that his servant was so carefull for the honour of his Country. As cares have made us all members of a community and hath given us common interests, so, it is much pleasing to us, to see these publike cares divide us from our owne.

The King easily descries a secret supplication wrapt up in the most pitifull palsey, which the modest suiter was afraid to discover, and therefore made his sad motion into the light, For what dost thou make request? Is it the praise of thy zeale to draw on the just petitions of fearefull suppliants.

Nehemiah dares not open his mouth to the King, till his heart had opened it selfe by a golden ejaculation to his God; No businesse can be so weighty, but our prayers may prevent it; the wings whereof are so nimble, that we can flie up to heaven and bring downe an answer, before ever our words could reach the eares of our lips: Much more shall we hope that any designe of ours can prosper, if we have commended this messenger on our errand.

After this silent and insensible preparation, Nehemiah moves boldly, but yet not at once, but by meet degrees; first he craves leave for his journey, and his businesse; then he craves aid for both; Both are granted. He sends downe immediately with letters to the governours, for a convoy; with letters to the keeper of the forrest for timber. Not more full of desire then hope.

Never put his hand to any great work for the behoofe of [illegible] out opposition? As the walls of the Temple found some enemies in the very foundation of the City; and these so much more, as they promise more safety and glory to Jerusalem: Sanballat the Deputie Lieutenant of the Moabites, and Tobiah the servile officer to the Ammonites, and Geshem to the Arabians, are galled to the very heart at the arrivall of a man authorized to seeke the welfare of the children of Israel. There cannot be a greater vexation to wicked hearts, then to see the face of [illegible] any likelihood of prosperity. Evill spirits and men need no other fuell to their owne despight.

This wise Courtier hath learnt that secrecie is the life of [illegible] and [illegible] dispatch. His errand could not but be knowne to the governours, [illegible] was injoyned for the provision of materialls, else the walls had [illegible] soone looke the first notice of their heathen neighbours. Without any noise [illegible] makes view in the dead of night, and taking some few into his company, [illegible] his counsell, he secretly rounds the decayed walls of Jerusalem with [illegible] and chinks, and observes the gates; and returnes home in silence, joying in [illegible] see those reparations, which none of the inhabitants did once dreame of. [illegible] when he had fully digested this great worke in his owne breast, he calls [illegible] and Citizens together, and having condoled with them the common [illegible] reproach, he tells them of the hand of his God, which was good upon him, [illegible] the gracious commission of the King his master, for that good [illegible] and [illegible] him with a zealous incouragement of each other, Let us rise and build. Such a hearty invitation countenanced by authority hath [illegible] hands of the multitude; With what obsequious and desirable [illegible] looke upon their unexpected Patron? How doe they honour him as a [illegible] heaven, for the welfare of Jerusalem? Every man flies to his [illegible] rejoyces to second so noble a leader, in laying a stone to that [illegible] defacer.

These emulous neighbours of theirs, Sanballat, Tobiah, Geshem the [illegible] ders of Moab, Ammon, Arabia, have soone espied the first motion, [illegible] that old foundation. Envie is usually more quick-sighted then love [illegible] arme his people, and for the time, changes their trowels into swords, and spades, and bowes, raising up their courage with a vehement exhortation, to remember the Lord, which is great, and terrible, and to fight for their brethren, their sons, their daughters, their wives, and their houses. Nothing can so hearten us to the encountring of any evill, as the remembrance of that infinite power and wisdome which can either prevent it, or mitigate, or sanctifie it: we could not faint if we did not forget God.

Necessity urges a man to fight for himselfe, love inables his hand to fight for those which challenge a part in him; where love meets with necessity, there is no room for indevour of victory; Necessity can make even cowards, valiant; love seems to be invincible, and irresistible: Nehemiah doth not therefore perswade these Jewes to fight for themselves, but for theirs: The judgement of the interest, and danger, cannot but quicken the dullest spirits.

Discovered counsels are already prevented: These serpents die by being first seen. When the enemies heard that it was knowne unto us, they let fall their plot. Could we descrie the enterprises of Satan, that tempter would return ashamed.

It is a safe point of wisdome to carry a jealous eye over those, whom we have once found hollow, and treatable: From that time forth Nehemiah divided the rank, betwixt the trowell, and the sword, so disposing of every Israelite, that whiles one hand was a Mason, the other was a souldier: one is for work, the other for defence. Oh lively image of the Church militant, wherein every one labours weaponed; wherein there is neither an idle fencer, nor a secure workeman: every one so builds, as that he is ready to ward temptations; every one so weilds the sword of the Spirit, for defence, that withall he builds up himselfe in his most holy faith; here is neither a fruitlesse valour, nor a unsafe diligence.

But what can our weapons availe us, if there be not meanes to warne us of an enemy? Without a trumpet we are armed in vaine. The worke is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one farre from another: Yea so farre as the utmost bounds of the earth, are we separated one from another, upon the walls of the spirituall Jerusalem; onely the sacred Trumpets of God call us, who are distant in place, to a combination in profession. And who are those Trumpets, but the publike messengers of God, of whom God hath said; If the Watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned if the sword come, and take any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity but his blood will I require at the Watchmans hand. Wo be to us if we sound not; if the sound we give be uncertaine: wo be to our people, if when we premonish them of enemies, of judgments, they sit still unmoved, not buckling themselves to a resistance, to a prevention.

It is a mutuall aide, to which these Trumpets invite us; we might fight apart, without the signals of war; In what place ye heare the sound of the Trumpet, resort ye thither unto us. There can be no safety to the Church, but where every man thinks his life, and welfare consists in his fellowes; Conjoyned forces may prosper, single oppositions are desperate: All hearts and hands must meet in the common quarrell.

Nehemiah redressing the extortion of the Jewes.

doctn

With what difficulty do these miserable Iewes settle in their Jerusalem? The feare of forraigne enemies doth not more afflict them then the extortion of their owne: Dearth is added unto war: Miseries doe not stay for a mannerly succession to each other, but in a rude importunity throng in at once. Babel may be built with ease, but whosoever goes about to raise the walls of Gods City, shall have his hands full: The incursion of publike enemies may be prevented with vigilancie and power; but there is no defence against the secret gripes of oppression.

There is no remedy, the Iews are so taken up with their trowel, and sword, for the time,

A time, that they cannot dare to make so much as a shift, while the wall did rise, their estates must needs go to wrack: Even at the cheapest seasons they must needs be poore, that are sed and bring in the publike safety; how much more in a common scarcity? Their houses, lands, vineyards and therefore more dear, yea their very skins are sold for B to their brethren? Necessity forces them to sell that, which it was cruelty to buy; What will we not, what must we not part with for life? The covetous rulers did not consider the necessities of this want, but the advantages. Sometimes a bargaine may be as much evill as a robberie: Charity must be the rule of all contracts; the violation whereof, whether in the matter, or the price, cannot but be sinfull.

There could not be a fuller ground of expostulation, then this of the oppressed Jewes, we fetch in our lives of our brethren, our children as their children, and lo, we bring into bondage our sons and our daughters: whiles there is no difference in nature, why should there be such an injurious disproportion in condition? Even the same flesh may have a just inequality: some may be rulers, whiles others are subject; some wealthy, others poore; but why those wealthy Rulers should tyrannize over those poore inferiours, and turne brother-hood into bondage, no reason can be given but lawlesse ambition; if there were one flesh of Peeres, another of Peasants, there should be some colour for the proud impositions of the great, as because the flesh of beasts is in a lower rank then ours, we kill, we devoure it at pleasure; but now since the large body of mankind consists of the same flesh, why should the hand strike the foot? And if one flesh may challenge meet respects from us, how much more one spirit? The spirit is more noble then the flesh is base; the flesh is dead without the spirit, one spirit without the flesh, active and immortall. Our soule, though shapelesse C and immateriall, is more apparently one, then the flesh; And if the unity of our humane spirit call us to a mutuall care, and tendernesse in our cariage, each to other, how much more of the divine? by that we are men, by this we are Christians: As the soule animates us to a naturall life, so doth Gods Spirit animate the soule to an heavenly; which is so one, that it cannot be divided. How should that one spirit cause us so farre to forget all naturall, and civill differences, as not to contemne, not to oppresse any whom it informeth?

They are not Christians, not men, that can injoy the miseries of their brethren, whether in the flesh or spirit.

Good Nehemiah cannot choose but be much moved at the barbarous extortion of D the people; and now, like an unpartiall governour, he rebukes the Rulers, and Nobles, whose hand was thus bloody with oppression. As of fishes, so of men, the lesser are a prey to the great: It is an ill use made of power, when the weight of it serves only to crush the weake. There were no living amongst men, had not God ordained higher then the highest, and yet higher then they. Eminency of place cannot be better improved, then by taking downe mighty offenders.

If nobility do imbase it selfe to any foule sin, it is so much more worthy of correction, by how much the person is of greater marke.

The justice of this reproofe could not but shame impudence it selfe; We after our ability have redeemed our brethren the Iewes which were sold to the heathen, and will you sell your brethren or shall they be sold to us? Shall they find at home that yoake of bondage E which they had put off abroad? whiles they are still Iewes, shall we turne Assyrians? If they must be slaves, why not rather to enemies, then to brethren? How much more tolerable were a foraine servitude, then a domesticall? Be ashamed, O ye Nobles of Israel, to renue Babylon in Ierusalem. I marvell not if the offenders be stricken dumb with so unanswerable an expostulation; Guiltinesse, and confusion have stopt their mouths.

Many of those who have not had grace enough to refraine sinne, yet are not so utterly void of grace as to maintaine sinne; Our after-wits are able to discerne a kinde of unreasonablenesse in those wicked actions, which the first appearance represents unto us plausible. Gaine leads in sin, but shame followes it out. There are those that are bold and witty to beare out commodious or pleasant evils, neither could these Iewish enormities, have wanted some colours of defence; Their stocke was their owne, owne, which might have been otherwise improved, to no lesse profit; The offer, the suit of these bargaines was from the sellers; These escheats fell into their hands, unsought; neither did their contract cause the need of their brethren, but relieve it: But their conscience will not beare this plea. I know not whether the maintenance of the least evill be not worse, then the commission of the greatest; This may be of frailty, that argues obstinacy: There is hope of that man that can blush and be silent.

After the conviction of the fact, it is seasonable for Nehemiah, to perswade reformation: No oratory is so powerfull, as that of mildnesse: especially when we have to doe with those, who either through stomach, or greatnesse, may not indure a rough reproofe: The drops that fall easily upon the corne, ripen, and fill the eare, but the stormy showers that fall with violence, beat downe the stalkes flat to the earth, and lay whole fields, without hope of recovery. Who can resist this sweet and soveraigne reprehension; Ought ye not to walke in the feare of our God, because of the reproach of the heathen, our enemies? Did we dwell alone in the midst of the earth, yet the feare of our God should over-awe our wayes; but now that we dwell in the midst of our enemies, whose eyes are bent upon all our actions, whose tongues are as ready to blaspheme God, as we to offend him, how carefully should we avoid those sins, which may draw shame upon our profession?

Now the scandall is worse then the fact; Thus shall Religion suffer more from the heathen, then our brethren do from us: If justice, if charity cannot sway with us, yet let the scornfull insultations of the prophane Gentiles, affright us from these pressures. No ingenuous disposition can be so tender of his owne disgrace, as the true Israelite is of the reproach of his God: What is it that he will not rather refraine, doe, suffer, then that glorious Name shall hazard a blemish? They cannot want outward retentives from sin, that live either among friends, or enemies; if friends, they may not be grieved, if enemies, they may not be provoked: Those that would live well, must stand in awe of all eyes; Even those that are without the Church, yet may not be without regard: No person can be so contemptible, as that his example should be contemned.

In disswading from sin, reason it selfe cannot prevaile more then example. Likewise, and my brethren, and my servants might exact of them money, and corne. But from the time that I was appointed to the charge of Iudah, I, and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governour. He shall never rule well, that doth all that he may: It is not safe for either part that a Prince should live at the height of his power, and if the greatest abate of their right, is it for inferiors to exort? Had Nehemiah aimed at his owne greatnesse, no man could have had fairer pretences for his gaine.

The former governers that were before him were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides fortie shekels of silver, His foot had not first trode in this commodious path; it was beaten by the steps of his predecessors; neither did any of them walke besides it: However it might be envious to raise new taxations, yet to continue those he found unrepined at, had been out of the reach of exception. A good Governour lookes not so much what hath beene done, as what should be; Precedents, are not the rule, whereby he rules, but justice, but piety. So did not I, because of the feare of the Lord: Lawes are not a straighter curbe to subjects, then conscience is to good Princes.

They dare not do what they cannot do charitably: what advantage can they think it, to be from under the controlment of men, when the God of heaven notes, and punishes their offences? Who so walketh by this rule, can neither erre, nor mis-carry. It is no trusting to the externall remedies of sin, either they are not alwayes present, or if present, not powerfull enough; but if the feare of God have once taken up the heart, it goes ever with us, and is strong enough to over-master the forcibleſt temptation.

Therefore must these Jewes follow this example of Nehemiah, because he followed not the example of his predecessors; because he left their evill, they must imitate his good. In vaine shall Rulers advise against their owne practice; when they lead the way, they may well challenge to be followed: Seldome hath it bin ever seen that

A that great perſons have not been ſeconded in evill, why ſhould not their power ſerve to make patterns of their vertues?

Thus well did it ſpeed with Nehemiah, his mercifull carriage, and zealous ſuit have drawne the Rulers to a promiſe of reſtitution, We will reſtore them, and will require nothing of them, ſo will we doe as thou ſaieſt.

It is no ſmall advantage that theſe Nobles muſt forgoe, in their releaſes: there cannot be a better ſigne of a ſound amendment, then that we can be content to bee loſers by our repentance; Many formall penitents have yeelded to part with ſo much of their ſinne, as may abate nothing of their profit; as if theſe Rulers ſhould have beene willing to reſtore the perſons, but withall ſhould have ſtood ſtiffely to require their ſummes: This whining and partiall ſatisfaction had beene thankleſſe. True
B remorſe inlargeth the heart, and openeth the hand to a bountifull redemption of our errors.

Good purpoſes doe too often coole in time, and vaniſh into a careleſſe forgetfulneſſe; Nehemiah feared this iſſue of theſe holy reſolutions; and therefore he proſecutes them in their firſt heat; not leaving theſe promiſes, till he had ſecured them, with an oath; The Prieſts are called for, that in their mouthes the adjuration may be more ſolemne, and ſacred; It is the beſt point of wiſdome to take the firſt opportunity of fixing good motions, which otherwiſe are of themſelves, light and ſlighty. To make all yet more ſure, their oathes are croſſe-barred with his execration. Alſo I ſhook my lap and ſaid, So God ſhake out every man from his houſe, and from his labour that performeth not this promiſe, even thus be he ſhaken out, and emptied: and all the congregation ſaid, Amen. A promiſe, an oath, a curſe, are paſſed upon this act; now, no Iſraelite dares falter in the
C execution: When we have a ſin in chaſe, it is good to follow it home, not ſlackning our purſuit till we have fully prevailed; and when it is once falne under our hands, we cannot kill it too much.

Now Nehemiah having thus happily delivered his people from a domeſticall captivity, commends his ſervice to the gracious remuneration of the Almighty, Think upon me my God for good, according to all that I have done for this people. Therefore doth he refuſe the bread of the Governor, that he may receive the reward of the Governor of heaven: Had he taken a temporary recompence, both he, and it had been forgotten, now he hath made an happy change for eternity. Not that he pleads his merit, but ſues for mercy; neither doth he pray to be remembred for his work, but according to
D his work. Our good deeds as they are well accepted of God, ſo they ſhall not goe unrewarded; and what God will give, why may not we crave? Doubtleſſe, as we may offer up our honeſt obediences unto God, ſo we may expect and beg his promiſed retributions; not out of a proud conceit of the worth of our earnings, who at the beſt are no other then unprofitable ſervants, but out of a faithfull dependance upon his pact of bounty, who cannot be leſſe then his word: O God, if we doe ought that is good, it is thine act, and not ours: crowne thine owne worke in us, and take thou the glory of thine owne mercies.

Whiles Nehemiah is buſie in the reforming abuſes at home; the enemie is plotting againſt him, abroad; Sanballat, and Tobiah, and Geſhem the Arabian conſpire againſt his life, and in him, againſt the peace of Jeruſalem: What open hoſtility could not do,
E they hope to effect by pretence of treaties: Four ſeverall meſſages call Nehemiah to a friendly meeting. Diſtruſt is a ſure guard. The wiſe governor hath learn'd to ſuſpect the hollow favours of an enemy, and to returne them, with ſafe and juſt excuſes. I cannot come downe, why ſhould the worke ceaſe whiles I leave it, and come downe to you? I doe not heare him ſay, You intend miſchiefe to me; I will not come forth to you; though this were the proper cauſe of his forbearance, but he turnes them off with an anſwer, that had as much truth, as reſervedneſſe. Fraud is the fitlieſt anſwered with ſubtletie. Even innocency is allowed a lawfull craft; That man is in an ill caſe, that conceales no truth from an adverſary.

What intreaties cannot do, ſhall be attempted by threats; Sanballats ſervant comes now the fifth time, with an open'd letter, importing dangerous intimations wherein is written, It is reported among the heathen, and Gaſhmu ſaith it, that the Iewes think to rebell; for which cause thou buildest the wall that thou maist be their King. It is reported: and what falshood may not plead this warrant? What can be more lying then report? Among the heathen: and who is more Ethnick then Sanballat? what Pagan can be worse then a mungrel Idolater? And Gashmu saith it; Aske my fellow elfe; This Arabian was one of those three heads of all the hostile combination, against Jerusalem, against Nehemiah, It would be wide with innocence if enemies might be allow'd to accuse. A

That the Iewes think to rebell: A stale suggestion, but once powerfull; Malice hath learn'd to miscall all actions; where the hands cannot be taxed, very thoughts are prejudged: For which cause thou buildest the wall, that thou maiest be their King; He was never true Israelite that hath not passed spightfull slanders; and misconstructions: Artaxerxes knew his servant too well, to beleeve any rumor, that should have beene so shameleſſe; The ambition of Nehemiah was well knowne to reach only to the cup, not to the Scepter of his Soveraigne; And yet, to make up a sound tale, Prophets are suborned to preach, There is a King in Iudah: as if that loyall governour had corrupted the pulpits also; and had taught them the language of treason. B

But what of all this? what if some false tongue have whispered such idle tales? It is not safe for thee, O Nehemiah, to contemne report: Perhaps this newes shall fly to the Court, and worke thee a deadly displeasure ere thou canst know thy self traduced; Come therefore, and let us take counsell together: Surely that man cannot be sparing of any thing, that is prodigall of his reputation. If ought under heaven can fetch Nehemiah out of his hold, it is the care of his fame. But that warie governour sees a net spread neere unto this stall; and therefore keeps aloofe, not without contempt of those slie devices. There are no such things done as thou sayest, but thou fainest them out of thine owne heart: Some imputations are best answered with a neglective denyall: It falls out often that plaine dealing puts craft out of countenance. C

Since neither force nor fraud can kill Nehemiah, they will now strive to draw him into a sin, and thereby into a reproach; O God, that any Prophets tongue should be mercenary! Shemaiah the Seer, is hired by Tobiah, and Sanballat, to affright the Governor, with the noise of his intended murder, and to advise him for safety, to flie to the forbidden refuge of the Temple. The colour was faire; Violence is meant to thy person, no place but one can promise thee safety; The City hath as yet no gates; come therefore, and shut thy selfe up in the Temple, there onely shalt thou be free from all assaults. D

And what if Nehemiah had hearkened to this counsell? Sin, and shame had followed; That holy place was for none but persons sacred, such as were priviledged by blood, and function; others should presume, and offend in entring; and now, what would the people say? What shall become of us whiles our Governor hides his head for feare? Where shall we find a Temple to secure us? What do we depending upon a cowardly leader?

Well did Nehemiah fore-cast these circumstances, both of act, and event, and therefore resolving to distrust a Prophet that perswaded him to the violation of a Law, he rejects the motion with scorne; Should such a man as I flie? Should I goe into the Temple to save my life? I will not goe: It is fit for great persons to stand upon the honour of their places; Their very stations should put those spirits into them, that should make them hate to stoope unto base conditions. E

Had God sent this message, we know he hath power to dispense with his owne Lawes; but well might the contradiction of a Law argue the message not sent of God. God as he is one, so doth he perfitly agree with himselfe. If any private spirit crosse a written word let him be accursed.

Ahasuerus

Ahasuerus Feasting, Vashti cast off, Esther chosen.

WHat bounds can be set to humane ambition? Ahasuerus, that is, Xerxes the son of Darius, is already the King of an hundred, and seaven and twenty Provinces, and now is ready to fight for more. He hath newly subdued Egypt, and is now addressing himselfe for the conquest of Greece. He cannot hope ever to see all the land that he possesseth, and yet he cannot be quiet, whiles he heares of more. Lesse then two ells of earth shall ere long serve him, whom, for the time, a whole world shall scarce satisfie; in vaine shall a man strive to have that which he cannot injoy, and to injoy ought by meere relation; It is a windie happinesse that is sought in the exaggeration of those titles, which are taken upon others credit, without the sense of the owner: Nothing can fill the heart of man, but he that made it. Esther 1,1.

This great Monarch, partly in triumph of the great victories, that he hath lately wonne in Egypt, and partly, for the animation of his Princes, and souldiers to his future exploits, makes a feast, like himselfe, royall and magnificent.

What is greatnesse if it be not showed? And wherein can greatnesse be better showne, then in the atchievements of war, and the entertainment of peace?

All other feasts were but hunger to this of Ahasuerus, whether we regard the number of guests, or the largenesse of preparation, or continuance of time: During the space of a whole halfe yeare, all the tables were sumptuously furnished for all commers from India to Ethiopia; A world of meat; every meale was so set on, as if it should have been the last; Yet all this long feast hath an end; and all this glory is [illegible] nesse; What is Ahasuerus the better, that his Peeres then said, he was incomparably great? What are his Peeres the better, that they were feasted? Happy is he that eates bread, and drinkes new wine in the Kingdome of God; this banquet is for eternity; without intermission, without satietie.

C

What variety of habits, of languages, of manners, met at the boards of Ahasuerus? What confluence of strange guests was there now to Shushan? And, lest the glory of this great King might seeme, like some course picture, onely faire afarre off, after the Princes and Nobles of the remote Provinces, all the people of Shushan are entertained, for seven dayes with equall pompe and state; The spacious Court of the Palace is turned into a Royall Hall, the walls are of rich hangings, the pillars of marble, the beds of silver and gold, the pavement of porphyrie curiously checkered; The wine and the vessels strove whether should be the richer; no men drunke in worse then gold; and whiles the metall was the same, the forme of each cup was diverse; the attendance was answerable to the chear; and the freedome matched both: Here was no compulsion, either to the measure, or quality of the draught; every mans rule was his owne choise. Who can but blush to see forced healths in Christian banquets, when the civility of very Pagans commands liberty?

D

I cannot but envy the modesty of heathen Dames, Vashti the Queene, and her Ladies, with all the severall ranks of that sexe, feast apart; entertaining each other, with a bashfull courtesie, without wantonnesse, without that wild scurrility, which useth to haunt promiscuous meetings: Oh shamefull unchastity of those loose Christians, who must feed their lust, whiles they fill their bellies, and thinke the feast unperfit, where they may not satiate their eye no lesse then palate.

E

The last day of this pompous feast is now come: King Ahasuerus is so much more cheerefull, by how much his guests are neer to their dismission. Every one is wont to close up his curtesie with so much more passion, as the last acts use to make the deeper impression; And now, that he might at once amaze, and indeare the beholders, Vashti the Queene in all her royalty, is called for; Her sight shall shut up the feast, that the Princes and the people may say, How happy is King Ahasuerus, not so much in this greatnesse, as in that beauty!

Seven

Seven officers of the chamber are sent to carry the message, to attend her entrance, and are returned with a deniall: Perhaps Vashti thought, What meanes this uncouth motion? More then sixe moneths hath this feast continued, and all this while we have injoyed the wonted liberty of our sexe; Were the King still himselfe, this command could not be sent; it is the wine, and not he, that is guilty of this errand. Is it for me to humour him in so vaine a desire? Will it agree with our modest reservednesse, to offer our selves to be gazed at by millions of eyes? Who knowes what wanton attempts may follow upon this ungoverned excesse? This very message argues that wit & reason have yeelded their places to that besotting liquor. Nothing but absence can secure us from some unbeseeming profer, neither doubt I, but the King when he returnes to himselfe, will give me thanks for so wise a forbearance. A

Thus upon the conceit (as is likely) that her presence would be either needlesse, or unsafe, Vashti refuseth to come; Although perhaps her great spirits thought much to receive a command from the hand of officers. B

The blood that is once inflamed with wine, is apt to boyle with rage: Ahasuerus is very wroth with this indigne repulse: It was the ostentation of his glory, and might, that he affected, before these Princes, Peeres, people; and now that seemes eclipsed, in the shutting up of all his magnificence, with the disgracefull affront of a woman. It vexes him to think that those Nobles, whom he meant to send away astonished with the admiration of his power, and majesty, should now say: What boots it Ahasuerus to rule afarre off, when he cannot command at home? In vaine doth he boast to governe Kings, whiles he is checked by a woman.

Whatever were the intentions of Vashti, surely her disobedience was inexcusable, it is not for a good wife to judge of her husbands will, but to execute it: neither wit, nor stomack may carry her into a curious inquisition into the reasons of an injoyned charge, much lesse to a resistance: but in a hood-winkt simplicity she must follow, whither she is led; as one that holds her chiefe praise to consist in subjection. C

Where should the perfection of wisedome dwell, if not in the Courts of great Princes? or what can the treasures of Monarchs purchase more invaluably precious, then learned and judicious attendance? Or who can bee so fit for honour as the wisest.

I doubt how Ahasuerus could have beene so great, if his throne had not beene still compassed with them that knew the times, and understood the law, and judgement. These were his Oracles in all his doubts. These are now consulted in this difficulty; neither must their advice be secretly whispered, in the Kings eare, but Publikely delivered in the audience of all the Princes. It is a perilous way that these sages are called to goe, betwixt a husband and wife; especially of such power, and eminency; yet Memucan feares not to passe a heavy sentence against Queene Vashti. Vashti the Queene hath not done wrong to the King onely, but also to all the Princes, and all the people, that are in all the Provinces of the King Ahasuerus. A deep and sore crimination; injuries are so much more intolerable, as they are dilated unto more; those offences which are of narrow extent, may receive an easie satisfaction; the amends are not possible, where the wrong is universall: For this deed of the Queen shall come abroad to all women, so that they shall despise their husbands in their eyes: Indeed so publike a fact must needs flie; That concourse gave fit opportunity to diffuse it all the world over; The examples of the great are easily drawne into rules. Bad lessons are apt to be taken out; as honour, so contempt fals downe from the head to the skirts; never ascends from the skirts to the head. D

These wise men are so much the more sensible of this danger, as they saw it more likely, the case might prove their owne. Likewise shall the Ladies of Persia and Media say this day unto all the Kings Princes. The first precedents of evill must be carefully avoided, if we care to keepe a constant order in good. Prudence cannot better bestirre it selfe, then in keeping mischiefe from home. E

The foundation of this doome of Memucan is not laid so deepe for nothing; If it please the King, let there go a royall commandement from him, and let it be written among the

A the lawes of Persians and Medians, that it be not altered, that Vashti come no more before Ahasuerus; and let the King give her royall estate to another that is better then she. How bold a word was this, and how hazardous? Had Ahasuerus more loved the beauty of Vashti, then his honor, Memucan had spoken against his owne life: Howsoever, a Queene of so great spirits, could not want strength of favour, and faction, in the Persian Court; which could not but take fire at so desperate a motion. Faithfull Statesmen, overlooking private respects, must bend their eyes upon publique dangers, labouring to prevent a common mischiefe, though with the adventure of their owne. Nature had taught these Pagans the necessity of a female subjection; and the hate and, scorne of a proud disobedience. They have unlearned the very dictates of Nature that can abide the head to be set below the ribbe.

B I cannot say but Vashti was worthy of a sharpe censure; I cannot say she was worthy a repudiation. This plaister drew too hard; It was but heathen justice to punish the wives disobedience in one indifferent act, with a divorce: Nothing but the violation of the marriage-bed, can either break or unty the knot of matriage. Had she not been a Queene, had not that contemptuous act been publique, the sentence had not been so hard; now the punishment must be exemplary, lest the sin should be so. Many a one had smarted lesse, if their persons, if their place had been meaner.

The King, the Princes approve this heavy judgment of [illegible]; It is not in the power of the faire face of Vashti, to warrant her [illegible] bt many messages passed ere the rigour of this execution: That great h[illegible]owes not to relent, but will rather break, then yeeld to an humble deprecation. When the stone and the steele meet, fire is stricken; it is a soft answer that appeaseth wrath. Vashti is cast off,

C Letters are sent from the King, into all his Provi[illegible]mand that every man should rule at home; The Court affords them an [illegible]ne of authority. Had not Ahasuerus doted much upon Vashties beauty, h[illegible]alled her forth at the feast, to be wondred at, by his Peeres and people, yet [illegible]o feeles the wound of his reputation, that he forgets he ever felt any wound of his affection. Even the greatest love may be over-strained; It is not safe presu[illegible] upon the deepest assurances of dearnesse: There is no heart that may not be c[illegible]ed. It is not possible that great Princes should want soothing up in all their ic[illegible]ons, in all their actions: Whiles Ahasuerus is following the chase of his ambitio[illegible] in the warres of Greece, his followers are providing for his lust at home; Nothi[illegible]ould sou[illegible]d more pleasing to a carnall eare, then that all the faire young virgins, thorow[illegible] his dominions, should be gathered into his palace at Shushan, for his a[illegible]h[illegible]se: The decree is soon published: The charge is committed to Hegai, the [illegible]chamberlaine, both of their purification, and ornaments.

D What strife; what emulation was now, amongst all the Persian d[illegible]ls, that either were, or thought themselves faire? Every one hopes to be a Q[illegible]eene, and sees no reason why any other should be thought more excellent; How happy were wee if we could be so ambitious of our espousals to the King of heaven?

Amongst all this throng of Virgins, God hath provided a wife for Ahasuerus, having determined his choise, where most advantage shall rise to his so[illegible]people.

The Iewes were miserably scattered over the world, in that woful[illegible]ortation

E under Ieconiah; scarce a handfull of them returned to Ierusalem, the r[illegible]maine still dispersed where they may, but have leave to live. There are many thousands of them turned over with the Babylonian Monarchy, to the Persian; amongst the rest, was Mordecai, the son of Iair, of the tribe of Benjamin; a man of no mean note or ability; who, living in Shushan, had brought up Hadassah, or Esther, his uncles daughter, in a liberall fashion: It was happy for this Orphane, that in a region of captivity, she light into such good hands; Her wise kinsman finds it fit, that her breeding, and habit should be Persian like; in outward and civill formes, there was no need to vary from the heathen; her Religion must bee her owne; the rest was so altogether theirs, that her very Nation was not discerned.

The same God that had given incomparable beauty to this Iewesse, gave her also favour in the eyes of Hegai, the keeper of the women. She is not only taken into the

What strange preparation was here for the impure bed of an heathen? Every Virgin must be fixe moneths purified with oyle of myrrhe, and fixe other moneths perfumed with sweet odors, besides those speciall receits that were allowed to each upon their owne election: O God, what care, what cost is requisite to that soule which should be addressed a fit Bride for thine owne holy and glorious Majestie?

When we have scoured our selves with the most cleanest oyle of our repentance, and have perfumed our selves with thy best graces, and our perfectest obedience, it is the onely praise of thy mercy, that we may be accepted. B

The other Virgins passed their probation, unregarded; when *Esther*s turne came, though she required nothing, but tooke what was given her; though she affected nothing, but brought that face, that demeanure, which nature had cast upon her, no eye sees her without admiration; the King takes such pleasure in her beauty, that contemning all the other vulgar formes, his choise is fully fixed upon her; All things must prosper, where God hath intended the successe: the most wise providence of the Almighty fetches his projects from far; The preparation and advantage of his owne people is in hand; for the contriving of this, Vashti shall be abandoned; the Virgins shall be chosen; Esther onely shall please Ahasuerus; Mordecai shall discover Haman; Hamans ruine shall raise Mordecai; The purposes of God cannot be judged by his remote actions; onely the accomplishment showes his designes; In the meane time, it pleaseth him to looke another way, then he moves; and to worke his owne ends, by arbitrary and unkindly accidents.

None but Esther shall succeed Vashti; she onely caries the heart of Ahasuerus from all her sexe; The royall Crown is set upon her head; And, as Vashti was cast off at a feast, so with a solemne feast shall Esther be espoused; Here wanted no triumph to expresse the joy of this great Bridegroome; and that the world might witnesse he could be no lesse loving, then severe, all his Provinces shall feele the pleasure of this happy match in their immunities, in their rich gifts.

With what envious eyes doe we think Vashti looked upon her glorious rivall? How doth she now (though too late) secretly chide her peevish wit, that had thus forced her of her royall crowne, and made way for a more happy successor! Little did she thinke her refusall could have had so hainous a construction; Little did she fear, that one word (perhaps not ill meant) should have forfeited her husband, her crowne, and all that she was. Who so is not wise enough to forecast the danger of an offence, or indiscretion, may have leisure enough of an unseasonable repentance. D

That mind is truly great and noble, that is not changed with the highest prosperity; Queene Esther cannot forget her cozen Mordecai; No greatnesse can make her sleight the charge of so deare a kinsman: Shall her royalty, she calls him, amongst the throng of beholders, but she must not know him: her state keepes her in awe, and will not suffer her to draw him neere: her, to the confusion of her honor; it troubles her not a little, to forbeare this duty; but it is enough for her, that Mordecai hath commanded her not to be acknowledged whose she was. E

Perhaps the wise Iew feated, that whiles her honor was yet green, and unfaded, the notice of her nation, and the name of a despised captive might be some blemish to her in that proud Court; when as afterwards, upon the ripening of her greatnesse, and the full possession of all hearts, her name might dignifie her honor, and command all reproches.

Mordecai was an officer in the Court of Ahasuerus; his service called him to attend in the Kings gate; Much better might he, being a Iew, serve the Prophets, then his foster-daughter might ascend to a Pagans bed.

If the necessity or convenience of his occasions called him to leave it, yet

A and Reingon called him to faithfulnesse in his service. Two of the Kings Chamberlaines, Bigthana and Teresh, conspire against the life of their Soveraigne. No greatnesse so secure from treachery or violence: He that ruled over an hundred seven and twenty Provinces, cannot assure himself from the hand of a villain; He that hath the power of other mens lives in the danger of his own. Happy is that man, that is once possessed of a crown incorruptible, unfadable, reserved for him in heaven: to whose succession can reach thither there can be no period of time, violence, or fear of loss.

The likeliest defence of an expected injury, is the fidelity of his attendants: Mordecai overhears the whisperings of these wicked conspirators, and reveals it to Esther the Queen: which so opportunely discovered unto the King, procured the loyalty of him who had so well deserved it, by saving, rescuing it to the life. The circumstances are examined, the plot is duly covered, the traytors executed, the service recorded in the Persian Annals. A good foundation is thus laid for their further advancement, which yet is not over hastily undertaken either part. Worthy dispositions are not only to do, but to forbear: the care of their remuneration is to them an honour: it concerns them to see their Lords [illegible] should be ascended in all his delegations. The hour is [illegible] shall be ready. If in the mean time there be going envy, not only of [illegible] dangers and fears, all these shall make his bosom [illegible] much rather die, Esther 1.4.

[illegible] before

[illegible] and

What a dangerous wilfulneſſe ſhould it be to incurre the [illegible] of thy [illegible] of thy life for a curteſie? If thou wilt not bow doth others, expect to loſe [illegible] perhaps (they thought) this omiſſion was unheedy; in a caſe of ignorance [illegible] tance, was a friendly office to admoniſh; the light of the [illegible] remedy.

Mordecai hears their challenge, their advice; and thinks good to [illegible] with [illegible]nce; as willing they ſhould imagine, his inflexibleneſſe [illegible] reſo[illegible]on, and that reſolution upon ſome ſecret grounds, which he [illegible] part[illegible] laſt yet he imparts thus much: Let it ſuffice, that I am a Jew, and [illegible] Amalekite.

After a private expoſtulation, the continuance of that open neglect [illegible] for a ſullen obſtinacy; and now, the monitors themſelves grow ſenſible of the [illegible] tempt: Men are commonly impatient to loſe the thank of their indeavour [illegible] are prone to hate whom they cannot reform. Partly therefore to [illegible] and partly to revenge this contumacy, theſe officers turn informers [illegible] Mordecai, neither meant to make the matter fairer then it was; they [illegible] Haman how proud and ſtubborn a Jew ſate amongſt them; how ill they could [illegible] front to be offered to his greatneſſe; how ſeriouſly they had [illegible] mackfully the offender perſiſted; and beſeech him, that he would [illegible] next paſſage, to caſt ſome glances that way, and but obſerve the [illegible] lerable inſolency.

The proud Agagite cannot long endure the very expectation of [illegible] ty; O purpoſe doth he ſtalk thither, with higher [illegible] up the ſure as he goes, and would ſee the man, that durſt deny [illegible] teſt Prince of Perſia.

Mordecai holds his old poſture, only be alſo much more [illegible] Haman diſdainfull, and imperious, neither of them [illegible] fion[illegible] as if he ſaid, I hate the pride of Haman, the other [illegible] wi[illegible] contempt of Mordecai: how did the eies of Haman [illegible] and [illegible] dart out deadly beams in the face of their deſpiſed [illegible] he[illegible] indignation, and then again wax pale with anger [illegible] a[illegible]on bad Mordecai look for the utmoſt of revenge.

Mordecai foreſees his danger, and contemns it; no frowns, no threats can [illegible] th[illegible]ts: he may break, he will not bow.

What ſhall we ſay then to this obſtinate reſolution of Mordecai? What [illegible] that ſo ſtiffens the knees of Mordecai, that death is more eaſie to him, [illegible] curvation? Certainly, if meer civility were in queſtion, this [illegible] to ſo great a Peer, could not paſſe without the juſt cenſure of a [illegible] ſe; It is Religion that forbids this obeiſance, and tells him, that [illegible] not be free from ſin; Whether it were that more than humane [illegible] ſed to this new-erected image of the great King, as the Perſians [illegible] ſed for too much laviſhneſſe in theſe courtly devotions: Or whether it were [illegible] ancient curſe wherewith God had branded the blood, and ſtock of Haman, [illegible] lawfull for an Iſraelite to give him any obſervance: For the Amalekites (of royall line Haman was deſcended) were the nation, with which God had [illegible] petuall hoſtility; and whoſe memory he had ſtraitly charged his people [illegible] t from under heaven; How may I (thinks he) adore, where God [illegible] to deteſt? How may I profeſſe reſpect, where God profeſſeth enmity? [illegible] contribute to the eſtabliſhment of that ſeed upon earth, which God [illegible] ed to be pulled up from under heaven? Outward actions of indifferency [illegible] they are felt to trench upon the conſcience, lay deep obligations upon the ſoul, even whiles they are moſt ſleighted by careleſſe hearts.

Exod. 17. 16. Deut. 25. 19.

What a flame of wrath doth Haman live this while? wherewith he could not but have conſumed his own heart, had he not given vent to that rage in his aſſured purpoſes of revenge: Great mens anger is like to themſelves, ſtrong, fierce, ambitious, of an exceſſive ſatisfaction. Haman ſcorns to take up with the blood of Mordecai.

This

this enemy can say of them, to Ahasuerus, Destroy them for they are scattered; Root them out, for they are condemned; How much better is it to fall into the hands of God, then of men; since that which whets the sword of men, works commiseration in the Almighty: Besides the dissipation of the persons, Their laws are diuers from all people: All other people live by thy laws, they only by their own: and how can this singularity of their fashions, but breed disorder, and inconvenience? Did they live in some corner of the earth apart, the difference in Religion and government could [illegible] port much; now, that they are dispersed amongst all thy subjects, [illegible] ese uncouth forms of theirs, but teach all the world to be irreguler [illegible] d they live under thy protection, that will not be governed by thy [illegible]

[illegible] what were the lawes of Israel, but the laws of God? if this be a quarrel, wh[illegible] death of the Iews be other, then martyrdome?

The diversi[illegible]gement, and practice from the rest of the world hath been an old, and env[illegible]ation cast upon Gods Church: What if we be singled from others, whiles we [illegible] with God? In matters lawfull, arbitrary, indifferent, wisdome teacheth us to conform our selves to all others, but where God hath laid a speciall imposition upon us, we must either vary, or sin: The greatest glory of Israel was their laws, wherein they far exceeded all other nations, as heaven is above earth; yet, here their laws [illegible] quarrelled, and are made the inducements of their destruction; It is not possible that the Church of God should escape persecution, whiles that which it hath g[illegible]m[illegible]ed; whiles that offends which makes it happy.

Yet, that they [illegible] it own, were not so unsufferable, if withall, they did observe thine, O K[illegible] Iews, as they are unconformable, so they are seditious: They keep [illegible]: Thou slanderest, Haman; they could not keep their own law[illegible] for their laws call them to obedience unto the[illegible] rebellious: In all those hundred and seven and [illegible] subjects, but them; They obey out of conscience [illegible] with that, which they doe most abhorre? W[illegible]ination? Ahasuerus commanded all knees to bow [illegible]es; Malicious Haman! He that refused to bow unto thee, had sufficiently approved his loyalty to Ahasuerus; Ahasuerus had not been, if Mordecai had not been a good subject; Hath the King no laws, but what concern thine adoration? Set aside Religion (wherein the Iew is ready to present if not active, yet passive obedience) and name that Persian law, which a Iew dares break.

As I never yet read, or heard of a conscionable Israelite, that hath not passed under this calumniation, so I cannot yeeld him a true Israelite, that deserves it.

In vaine doth he professe to acknowledge a God, in heaven, that denies homage to his deputy, on earth.

It is not for the Kings profit to suffer them. Worldly hearts are not led by good, or evil, but by profit, or losse; neither have they grace to know that nothing is profitable but what is honest, nothing so desperately incommodious, as wickednesse; They must needs offend by rule that measure all things by profit, and measure profit by their imagination. How easie is it to suggest strange untruths, when there is no body to make answer? False Haman, how is it not for the Kings profit to suffer the Iews? If thou construe this profit, for honour, the Kings honour is in the multitude of subjects, and what people more numerous then they? If for gain, the Kings profit is in the largenesse of his Tributes; and what people are more deep in their payments? If for service, what people are more officious? How can it stand with the Kings profit to bereave himself of subjects, his subjects of their lives, his Exchequer of their tributes, his State of their defence? He is a weak politician that knowes not to guild over the worst project, with a pretence of publique utility. No name under heaven hath made so many fooles, so many villains, as this of profit.

Lastly, as Ahasuerus reaps nothing but disprofit by the lives of the Iews, so he shall reap no small profit by their deaths: I will pay ten thousand talents of silver, to the

A the Kings treasurie for this execution. If revenge were not very sweet to the malicious man, he could not be content to purchase it at so high a rate; How doe we see daily that the thirst hereof caries men to a riotous prodigality of estate, body, soul?

Cruell Haman! if thou couldst have swimmed in a whole Sea of Iewish blood, if thou couldst have raised mountains of their carcasses, if thou couldst have made all Persia thy shables, who would have given thee one farthing for all those piles of flesh, for all those streams of blood? yea who would not rather have been at charge for the avoiding of the annoyances of those slaughtered bodies, which thou offerest to buy at ten thousand talents? It were an happy thing, if clemency could enlarge it selfe but so much as malice; if the preservation of mankind could be so much beholden to our bounty, as the destruction.

B Now when all these are laid together, the baseneſſe and dispersednesse of the people, the diversity of the laws, the irregularity of their government, the rebellion of their practice, the inconvenience of their toleration, the gain of their extirpation, what could the wit or art of man devise more insinuative, more likely to perswade? How could it be but Ahasuerus must needs think, (since he could not suspect the ground of this suit) What a zealous patriot have I raised, that can be content to buy off the incommodity of the State, at his own charge? How worthy is he rather of the aid both of my power, and purse? why should I be fee'd to ease my Kingdomes of rebells? The silver is given to him, the people is his, to doe with them as seemeth good in thee: Without all delay, the Secretaries are called to write the warrants, the Kings ring is given to seale them, the Posts are sent out to carry them into all Provinces. The day set, wherein all Iews, of all ages, both sexes, thorow the hundred and seven and twenty Prouinces of the King, shall be sacrificed to the wrath of Haman.

C In all the cariage of Ahasuerus, who sees not too much headinesse of passion? Vashti is cast off for a trifle, the Iews are given to the slaughter for nothing. [redacted] in the one, his favour in the other is too impotent: He is not a worse [redacted] then a King; the bare word of Haman is enough to kill so many subjects [redacted] ambition can be more dangerous in great persons, then violence of affection [redacted] lity. Oh the seeming inequality of humane conditions! The King and Haman sate down to drink, but the City of Shushan was perplexed: It is a wo[redacted] great ones quaffe the tears of the oppressed; and to hear them make musicke of D shrieks.

With what lamentation doe we think all the Synagogues of Iewes thorow the world received this fatall message of their proclaimed destruction? How doe they bemone themselves, each to other? How do their conjoyned cries fill heaven, and earth? But above all, what sack-cloth and ashes could suffice wofull Mordecai, that found in himselfe the occasion of all this slaughter? What soul could be capable of more bitternesse, then he felt? Whiles he could not but think, Wretched man that I am; It is I, that have brought all this calamity upon my nation; It is I, that have been the ruine of my people: woe is me that ever I put my self into the Court, into the service of a Pagan; how unhappy was I to cast my selfe into these straits, that I must either honour an Agagite, or draw a vengeance upon Israel? Yet how could I imagine, that the flame of Hamans rage would have broke out so farre? might that revenge have determined in my blood, how happy should I have been? now, I have brought death upon many thousands of innocents, that cannot know wherefore they

E die; Why did I not hide my self rather from the place of that proud Amalekite? Why did I stand out in contestation with so over-powerfull an enemy? Alas, no man of Israel shall so much as live to curse me, only mine enemies shall record my name with ignominie, and say, Mordecai was the bane of his nation. Oh, that my zeale should have reserved me for so heavy a service! Where now are those vaine ambitions, wherewith I pleased my self in this great match of Esther? How fondly did I hope by this undue means to raise my self and my people? Yea, is not this carnall presumption the quarrell that God hath against me? Doe I not therefore smart frō these Pagans, for that I secretly affected this uncircumcised alliance? How-soever

soever it be, yet, O God, what have thy people done? Oh let it be thy just mercy, that I may perish alone! A

In these sad thoughts did Mordecai spend his heart, whiles he walked mournfully in sackcloth, before that gate, wherein he was wont to sit; now his habit bars his approach; no sackcloth might come within the Court: Loe, that which is welcomest in the Court of heaven, is here excluded from the presence of this earthly royaltie: A broken and contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.

Neither did it a little adde to the sorrow of Mordecai, to hear the bitter insultations of his former monitors: Did we not advise thee better? Did we not fore-admonish thee of thy danger? see now the issue of thine obstinacie: now see, what it is for thine earthen pitcher to knock with brasse? now, where is the man that would needs contest with Haman? hast thou not now brought thy matters to a fair passe? Thy stomach had long owed thee a spight, and now it hath paid thee; who can pity thy wilfulnesse? since thou wouldst needs deride our counsell, we will take leave to laugh at thy sackcloth. Nothing but scorns, and griefs, and terrors present themselves to miserable Mordecai. All the externall buffets of adversaries were sleight to the wounds that he hath made, and felt in his own heart. B

The perpetuall intelligences that were closely held betwixt Esther and Mordecai, could not suffer his publike sorrow to be long concealed from her; The news of his sackcloth afflicts her ere she can suspect the cause; her crown doth but clog her head, whiles she heares of his ashes; True friendship transforms us into the condition of those we love; and if it cannot raise them to our cheerfulnesse, draws us down to their dejection: Fain would she uncase her foster-father of these mournfull weeds; and change his sackcloth for tissue; that yet, at least, his cloathes might not hinder his accesse to her presence, for the free opening of his griefs. C

It is but a sleight sorrow that abides to take in outward comforts; Mordecai refuses that kind offer, and would have Esther see that his affliction was such, as that he might well resolve to put off his sackcloth and his skin at once, that he must mourn to death rather then see her face to live.

The good Queen is astonisht with this constant humiliation of so deare a friend, and now she sends Hatach, a trusty (though a Pagan) attendant, to inquire into the occasion of this so irremediable heavinesse: It should seem Esther inquired not greatly into matters of State; that which perplexed all Shushan, was not yet known to her; her followers, not knowing her to be a Ieweſſe, conceived not how the news might concern her, and therefore had forborn the relation: Mordecai first informes her, by her messenger, of the decree that was gone out against all her nation, of the day wherein they must prepare to bleed; of the summe which Haman had proferred for their heads, and delivers the copy of that bloody Edict; charging her, now, if ever, to bestir her self; and to improve all her love, all her power with King Ahasuerus, in a speedy and humble supplication for the saving of the life (not of himself so much, as) of her people. D

It was tydings able to confound a weak heart; and hers, so much the more, as she could apprehend nothing but impossibility of redresse: she needs but to put Mordecai in mind of that; which all the Kings servants and subjects knew well enough, that the Persian law made it no lesse then death for whomsoever, man, or woman, that should presse into the inner court of the King, uncalled. Nothing but the royall scepter extended, could keep that presumptuous offender from the grave. For her, thirty days was now passed since she was called in to the King; an intermission, that might be justly suspicious; Whether the heat of his first affection were thus soon (of it selfe) allayed towards her; or whether some suggestions of a secret enemy (perhaps his Agagite) might have set him off; or whether some more pleasing object may have laid hold on his eyes; what ever it might be, this absence could not but argue some strangenesse, and this strangenesse must needs imply a danger in her bold intrusion: Shee could bewail therefore, she could not hope to remedy this dismall day of her people. This answer in the ears of Mordecai sounded truth, but weaknesse, neither can he take up with so feeble a return; These occasions require E other

other spirits, other resolutions, which must be quickned by a more stirring reply: Think not with thy self that thou shalt escape in the Kings house, more then all the Iews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there inlargement, & deliverance arise to the Iews from another place, but thou and thy fathers house shall be destroyed. And who knoweth whether thou art come to the Kingdome for such a time as this?

The expectation of death had not quailed the strong heart of faithfull Mordecai; even, whiles he mourns, his zeal droops not; there could have been no life in that breast, which this message could not have rouzed.

What then? is it death that thou fearest in this attempt of thy supplication, what other then death awaits thee in the neglect of it? there is but this difference, sue, and thou maist die, sue not, and thou must die: what blood hast thou but Iewish? and if these unalterable Edicts exempt no living soul, what shall become of thine? and canst thou be so vainly timerous, as to die for fear of death? to prefer certainty of danger, before a possibility of hopes? Away with this weak cowardise, unworthy of an Israelite, unworthy of a Queen: But if faint-heartedness or private respects shall seal up thy lips, or withhold thine aid from the hand of thy people; if thou canst so far neglect Gods Church, know thou that God will not neglect it, it shal not be in the power of Tyrants to root out his chosen seed; that holy one of Israel shall rather work miracles from heaven, then his inheritance shall perish upon earth: and how just shall it then be for that jealous God, to take vengeance upon thee, and thy fathers house for this cold unhelpfulness to his distressed Church? Suffer me therefore to adjure thee by all that native tenderness of love, wherewith I have trained up thine orphane infancy; by all those dear and thankfull respects, which thou hast vowed to me again; by the Name of the God of Israel whom we serve, that thou awaken and stir up thine holy courage, and dare to adventure thy life, for the saving of many; It hath pleased the Almighty to raise thee up to that height of honor, which our progenitors could little expect; why shouldst thou be wanting to him, that hath been so bountifull to thee? yea, why should I not think that God hath put this very act into the intendment of thine exaltation, having on purpose thus seasonably hoysed thee up to the throne, that thou maist rescue his poor Church from an utter ruine?

Oh the admirable faith of Mordecai, that shines thorow all these clouds, and in the thickest of these fogges, descries a cheerfull glimpse of deliverance; He saw the day of their common destruction enacted, he knew the Persian decrees to be unalterable; but, withall, he knew there was a Messias to come; he was so well acquainted with Gods covenanted assurances to his Church, that he thorow the midst of those bloody resolutions foresees indemnity to Israel; rather trusting the promises of God, then the threats of men. This is the victory that overcomes all the fears, and fury of the world, even our faith.

It is quarrell enough against any person, or community, not to have been aidful to the distresses of Gods people. Not to ward the blow, if we may, is construed for little better then striking. Till we have tryed our utmost, we know not whether we have done that we came for.

Mordecai hath said enough; These words have so put a new life into Esther, that she is resolute to hazard the old; Goe, gather together all the Iews that are present in Shushan, and fast ye for me, and neither eat nor drink three days, night or day; I also and my maidens will fast likewise, and so will I goe in unto the King, (which is not according to the law) and if I perish, I perish. Heroicall thoughts doe well befit great actions. Life can never be better adventured, then where it shall be gain to leese it.

There can be no law against the humble deprecation of evils; where the necessity of Gods Church calls to us, no danger should withhold us from all honest means of relief. Deep humiliations must make way for the successe of great enterprises, we are most capable of mercy, when we are throughly empty: A short hunger doth but whet the appetite, but so long an abstinence meets death half way, to prevent it; Well may they injoyn sharp penances unto others, who practise it upon themselves.

It

It was the face of Esther that must hope to win Ahasuerus, yet that shall be macerated with fasting, that she may prevaile. A carnall heart would have pampered the flesh, that it might allure those wanton eyes; she pines it, that she may please.

God, and not she, must work the heart of the King; Faith teaches her rather to trust her devotions, then her beauty.

Esther suing to Ahasuerus.

Esther 5.

THE Iews are easily intreated to fast, who had received in themselves the sentence of death; what pleasure could they take in meat, that know what day they must eat their last? The three dayes of abstinence are expired; now Esther changes her spirits, no lesse then her clothes; Who that sees that face, and that habit, can say she had mourned, she had fasted? Never did her royall apparell become her so well. That God before whom she had humbled her self, made her so much more beautifull, as she hath been more dejected; And now, with a winning confidence, she walks into the inner court of the King, and puts her self into that forbidden presence: as if she said, Here I am with my life in my hand, if it please the King to take it, it is ready for him; Vashti, my predecessor, forfeited her place for not comming when she was called; Esther shall now hazard the forfeiture of her life, for comming when she is not called: It is necessity, not disobedience that hath put me upon this bold approach; according to thy construction, O King, I doe either live or die; either shall be welcome. The inexpectednesse of pleasing objects makes them many times the more acceptable: The beautiful countenance, the graceful demeanour, and goodly presence of Esther, have no sooner taken the eyes, then they have ravished the heart of King Ahasuerus: Love hath soon banished all dreadfulnesse; And the King held out to Esther the golden Scepter that was in his hand: Moderate intermission is so farre from cooling the affection, that it inflames it: had Esther been seen every day, perhaps that satiety had abated of the height of her welcome, now, three and thirty dayes retirednesse hath indeared her more to the surfeited eyes of Ahasuerus.

Had not the golden Scepter been held out, where had Queen Esther been? The Persian Kings affected a stern awfulnesse to their subjects; It was death to solicit them, uncalled; How safe, how easie, how happy a thing it is to have to doe with the King of heaven, who is so pleased with our accesse, that he solicits sutors; who, as he is unwearyable with our requests, so is infinit in his beneficences!

How gladly doth Esther touch the top of that Scepter, by which she holds her life? and now, whiles she thinks it well that she may live, she receives besides pardon, favour: What wilt thou, Queen Esther, and what is thy request? it shall be given thee, even to the half of the Kingdome. Commonly, when we fear most, we speed best; God then most of all magnifies his bounty to us, when we have most afflicted our selves. Over-confident expectations are seldome but disappointed; whiles humble suspitions goe laughing away: It was the benefit and safety of but one peece of the Kingdome that Esther comes to sue for, and behold Ahasuerus offers her the free power of the half: He that gave Haman, at the first word, the lives of all his Iewish subjects, is ready, to give Esther half his Kingdome, ere she aske: Now she is no lesse amazed at the loving munificence of Ahasuerus, then she was before afraid of his austerity; The Kings heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; he turneth it whersoever he will.

It is not good to swallow favours too greedily, lest they either choak us in the passage, or prove hard of digestion. The wise Queen, however she might seem to have a fair opportunity offered to her suit, finds it not good to apprehend it too suddenly suddenly; as desiring by this small dilation, to prepare the ear and heart of the King for so important a request.

Now, all her petition ends in a banquet; If it seem good unto the King, let the King and Haman come this day unto the banquet, that I have prepared for him. It is an easie favour to receive a small curtesie, where we offer to give great. Haman is called, the King comes to Esthers table; and now highly pleased with his entertainment, he himself solicites her to propound that suit, for which her modesty would, but durst not solicit him. Bashfulnesse shall leese nothing at the hand of well-governed greatnesse.

Yet still Esthers suit sticks in her teeth, and dares not come forth without a further preface of time, and expectation; Another banquet must passe, ere this reckoning can be given in. Other suits wait long for the delivery of their petition; longer for the receit of their answer: Here the King is fain to wait for his suit: Whether Esthers heart would not yet serve her to contest with so strong an adversary, as Haman, without further recollection; or whether she desired to get better hold of the King, by indearing him with so pleasing entertainments; or whether she would thus ripen her hopes, by working in the minde of King Ahasuerus a fore-conceit of the greatnesse, and difficulty of that suit, which was so loath to come forth; or, whether she meant thus to give scope to the pride and malice of Haman, for his more certain ruine: How soever it were, to morrow is a new day, set for Esthers second banquet, and third petition.

The King is not invited without Haman; Favours are sometimes done to men, with a purpose of displeasure: Doubtlesse Haman tasteth of the same cates with his maker; neither could he in the forehead of Esther reade any other characters, then of respect, and kind applause, yet had she then, in her hopes, designed him to a just revenge. Little doe we know, by outward carriages, in what terms we stand with either God or man.

Every little wind raiseth up a bubble; How is Haman now exalted in himself with the singular graces of Queen Esther; and begins to value himself so much more, as he sees himself higher in the rate of others opinion.

Only surly, and sullen Mordecai is an allay to his happinesse; No Edict of death can bow the knees of that stout Jew: yea the notice of that bloody cruelty of this Agagite, hath stiffned them so much the more: Before, he lookt at Haman as an Amalekite, now, as a persecutor. Disdain and anger look out at those eyes, and bid that proud enemy doe his worst. No doubt, Mordecai had been listening after the speed of Queen Esther; how she came in to the King, how she was welcommed with the golden scepter, and with the more precious words of Ahasuerus, how she had entertained the King, how she pleased; the newes had quit his sackcloth, and raised his courage to a more scornfull neglect of his professed adversary.

Haman comes home, I know not whether more full of pride, or of rage; cals an inward councell of his choice friends, together with his wife; makes a glorious report of all his wealth, magnificence, height of favour, both with the King and Queen; and at last, after all his sun-shine, sets in this cloudy epilogue, Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Iew sitting at the Kings gate. It is seldome seen that God allows even to the greatest dearlings of the world, a perfect contentment; something they must have to complain of, that shall give an unsavory verdure to their sweetest morsels, and make their very felicity, miserable.

The wit of women hath wont to be noted for more sudden and more sharp. Zeresh the wife of Haman sets on foot that motion of speedy revenge, which is applauded by the rest. Let a gallows be made of fifty cubits high, and to morrow speak thou to the King, that Mordecai may be hanged thereon; then go thou in merily with the King, unto the banquet. I doe not hear them say, Be patient a while, thou hast already set Mordecai his last day; the moneth Adar will not be long in comming; the determination of his death hath made him desperate, let him in the meane time eat his own heart in envy at thy greatnesse; but they rather advise of a quick dispatch.

Malice

Malice is a thing full of impatience, and hates delay of execution, next unto mercy. Whiles any grudge lies at the heart, it canot be freely cheerfull. Forced ſmiles are but the hypocriſie of mirth. How happy were it for us, if we could be ſo zealouſly carefull to remove the hinderances of our true ſpiritnall joy, thoſe ſtubborne corruptions, that will not ſtoope to the power of grace.

Mordecai honoured by Haman.

Eſther 6.

He wit of Zereſh had like to have gone beyond the wit of Eſther; had not the working providence of the Almighty contrived theſe events, beyond all hopes, all conceits, Mordecai had been diſpatched, ere Eſthers ſecond banquet. To morrow was the day pitched for both their deſignes; had not the ſtreame beene inexpectedly turned, in vaine had the Queene blamed her delayes; Mordecaies breakfaſt had prevented Eſthers dinner: for certainly he that had given to Haman ſo many thouſand lives, would never have made daintie, upon the ſame ſuit, to anticipate one of thoſe, whom he had condemned to the ſlaughter: But God meant better things to his Church, and fetches about all his holy purpoſes, after a wonderfull faſhion, in the very inſtant of opportunity: He that keepeth Iſrael, and neither ſlumbreth, nor ſleepeth, uſeth ſleep that night to depart from him that had decreed to root out Iſrael. Ahaſuerus, that commanded a hundred and ſeven and twenty Provinces, cannot command an houres ſleep. Poverty is rather bleſſed with the freedome of reſt, then wealth, and power: Cares and ſurfet with-hold that from the great, which preſſeth upon the ſpare diet, and labour of the meaneſt. Nothing is more tedious then an eager purſuit of denied ſleepe: which (like to a ſhadowe) flyes away ſo much faſter, as it is more followed: Experience tells us, that this benefit is beſt ſolicited by neglect; and ſooneſt found, when we have forgotten to ſeeke it.

Whether to deceive the time, or to beſtow it well, Ahaſuerus ſhall ſpend his reſtleſſe houres in the Chronicles of his time. Nothing is more requiſite for Princes, then to looke back upon their owne actions and events, and thoſe of their predeceſſors; The examination of fore-paſſed actions makes them wiſe; of events, thankfull, and cautelous.

Amongſt thoſe voluminous regiſters of Acts and Monuments, which ſo many ſcores of Provinces muſt needs yeeld, the booke ſhall open upon Mordecaies diſcovery of the late treaſon of the two Eunuches: the reader is turned thither, by an inſenſible ſway of Providence: Our moſt arbitrary, or caſuall actions are over-ruled by a hand in heaven.

The King needes ſcales afreſh the danger of the conſpiracie; and (as great ſpirits abide not to ſmoother or bury good offices) inquires into the recompence of ſo royall a ſervice, What honour and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this? Surely Mordecai did but his duty; he had hainouſly ſinned, if he had not revealed this wicked treachery, yet Ahaſuerus takes thought for his remuneration: How much more carefull art thou, O God of all mercies, to reward the weak obedience of thine (at the beſt) unprofitable ſervants?

That which was intended to procure reſt, ſets it off; King Ahaſuerus is unquiet in himſelfe, to think that ſo great a merit ſhould lie but ſo long neglected; neither can he find any peace in himſelfe, till he have given order for a ſpeedy retribution. Hearing therefore by his ſervants that Haman was below in the Court, he ſends for him up, to conſult with him, What ſhould be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour? O marvellous concurrence of circumſtances, drawne together by the infinite wiſedome and power of the Almighty! who but Haman ſhould be the man? And when ſhould Haman be called to advice of Mordecaies honour, but in the very inſtant, when

A he came to sue for Mordecaies hanging? Had Ahasuerus but slept that night, Mordecai had been that morning advanced fifty cubits higher then the earth, ere the King could have remembred to whom he was beholden.

What shall we say then to reconcile these crosse-passions in Ahasuerus? Before he signed that decree of killing all the Jewes, he could not but know that a Jew had saved his life; and now, after that he had enacted the slaughter of all Jews, as rebels, he is giving order to honor a Jew, as his preserver. It were strange if great persons in the multitude of their distractions should not let fall some incongruities.

Yet, who can but thinke that King Ahasuerus meant upon some second thoughts to make amends to Mordecai? neither can he choose but put these two together, The Jewes are appointed to death at the suit of Haman; This Mordecai is a Jew; how then
B can I doe more grace to him, that hath saved my life, then to command him to be honored by that man who would spill his?

When Haman heard himself called up to the bed-chamber of his master, he thinks himselfe too happy in so early an opportunity of preferring his suit; but yet more in the pleasing question of Ahasuerus; wherein he could not but imagine that fa[illegible] forced it selfe upon him with strange importunity; For how could he conceive [illegible] any intention of more then ordinary honour could fall besides himselfe? Selfe-love like to a good stomack, drawes to it selfe what nourishment it likes, and casts off that which offends it. Haman will be sure to be no niggard in advising those ceremonies of honour, which he thinkes meant to his owne person. Could he have once dreamed that this grace had been purposed to any under heaven, besides himselfe,
C he had not been so lavish in counselling so pompous a shew of excessive magnificence. Now the Kings own royall apparrell, and his own Steed is not sufficient, except the royall Crowne also make up the glory of him, who shall thus triumph in the Kings favour. Yet all this were nothing in base hands: The actor shall be the best part of this great Pageant. Let this apparell, and this horse be delivered to one of the King's most noble Princes, that they may aray the man withall, whom the King delighteth to honour, and bring him on horse-backe thorow the streets of the City, and proclaime before him, thus shall it be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour. Honour is more in him that gives, then him that receives it: To be honoured by the unworthy is little better then disgrace; No meaner person will serve to attend this Agagite, in his supposed greatnesse, then one of the noblest Princes. The ambition is too high flowne
D that seekes glory in the servility of equals.

The place adds much to the act; There is small heart in a concealed honour; It is nothing, unlesse the streets of the city of Shushan be witnesses of this pompe, and ring with that gracious acclamation.

The vaine hearts of proud men can easily devise those meanes, whereby they may best set out their selves. O[illegible] that we would equally affect the meanes of true and immortall glory. The heart of man is never so cold within him, as when from the height of the expectation of good, it falls into a sudden sense of evill. So did this Agagite. Then the King said to Haman, make haste, and take the apparell, and the horse, as thou hast said, & do even so to Mordecai the Iew, that sitteth at the King's gate; Let nothing fayle of all that thou hast said. How was Haman thunder-stricken with this killing word, Do even so to Mordecai? I dare say all the honors that Ahasuerus had heaped upon Haman, cannot countervaile this one vexation: Doubtlesse, at first he distrusts his eare, and then [illegible] whether the King be in earnest; at last, when he hears the [illegible] so seriously doubled, and findes himself enforced to believe it, he begins to [illegible], What [illegible] this unconceivable alteration? Is there no man to all the Court of Persia [illegible] for extraordinary honour, but Mordecai? Is there [illegible] pickt out for this person of this honour to him, but Haman? [illegible] proud [illegible] in all the world, and am I singled out to grace him? Did [illegible] the heart, and [illegible] tedious to me, to see that [illegible] would [illegible] me, and [illegible] now bow to him? [illegible] which he would [illegible], and [illegible] when do to me, notwithstanding the King's [illegible] Yes, did there belong five but a cap and a knee to my greatnesse, and must I lacquay so base a fellow thorow the streets, must I be his herald to proclaime his honor thorow all Shushan? Why do I not let the King know the insolent affronts that he hath offered me? Why do I not signifie to my Soveraigne, that my errand now was for another kinde of advancement to Mordecai? If I obtaine not my desired revenge, yet at least I shall prevaile so farre, as to exempt my selfe from this officious attendance upon so neere and an enemy. And yet, that motion cannot be now safe; I see the Kings heart is (upon what ground soever) bent upon this action; should I flye off never so little (after my word so directly passed) perhaps my coldnesse, or opposition might be construed as some wayward contestation with my master: Especially, since the service that Mordecai hath done to the King, is of an higher nature, then the despight which he hath done to me. I will, I must give way for the time; mine humble yeeldance, (when all the carriage of this businesse shall be understood) shall (I doubt not) make way for mine intended revenge: Mordecai, I will honour thee now, that by those steps I may ere long raise thee many cubits higher. I will obey the command of my Soveraigne in observing thee, that he may reward the merit of my loyalty, in thine execution.

Thus resolved, Haman goes forth with a face and heart full of distraction, full of confusion; and addresses himselfe to the attyring, to the attending of his necessary, and new master, Mordecai. What lookes do we now thinke were cast upon each other, at their first greeting? their eyes had not forgotten their old language. Certainely, When Mordecai saw Haman come into the roome where he was, he could not but thinke; This man hath long thirsted for my blood, and now he comes to fetch it; I shall not live to see the successe of Esther, or the fatall day of my execution. It was knowne that morning in the Court, what a lofty gibbet Haman had prepared for Mordecai; and why might it not have come Mordecai's case? What could he therefore now imagine other, then that he was called out to that execution? But when hee saw the royall robe that Haman brought to him; hee thinkes, It is enough for this man to kill me, but he must mocke me too? What an addition is this to his former cruelty, thus to insult and play upon my last distresse? But, when he saw the royall crowne ready to be set on his head, and the Kings own horse fully furnished, at his gate, and found himselfe raised by Haman's hands into the royall seat, he thinkes what may all this meane? Is it the purpose of Haman that I shall die in state? Would he have me hanged in triumph? Is it when he hath a traine of Persian Peeres attending him, with a grave reverence, and he must proclaime before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the King delights to honour, finding this pompe to be serious, and well meant, he imagines (as it is likely) that this inexpected change proceedes from the suit of his Esther; begins to lift up his head, and to hope well of himselfe, and his people, and could not but say within himselfe, that he had not fasted for nothing. O the wonderous alterations that one morning hath made in the Court of Persia; he that was yesternight but Haman's footmen, is now waited on by Haman, and all his fellow Princes: he that yesternight had the homage of all knees but one, and was ready to break for the lack of that, now doth obeysance to that one, by whom he was wont to be adored. It was not Ahasuerus that wrought this strange mutation, it was the powerfull power of the Almighty, whose immediate hand would thus prevent Haman, that he might challenge all the thanks to himselfe. Whiles Princes have their commands, they must doe his; and shall either exalt, or depresse according to his appointment.

I should commend Haman's obedience in his humble condescent to so strange and harsh a command of his master, were it not, that either he durst doe no lesse, or that he thus stoopt for an advantage. It is a thankfully refused thing that is enforced, or for ends: True subjection is free and absolute, not out of feares, or hopes.

All Shushan is in a maze at this sudden glory of Mordecai, and finds no way to reconcile this day with the thirteenth of Adar, Mordecai had reason to hope well, &c.

A could not [illegible] the favour of the King, to kill him with the [illegible] sweet; [illegible] then the beginning of a durable promotion? Otherwise, what [illegible] hath no hearts aiding been to so great a service?

On the other side, Zeresh began the hard charged passions with Mordecai, that there was that Jew even here before advanced with the decree of his own death, [illegible] that against him with their heads: Those heavy dooms is like at Haman's heart, that no [illegible] but his, might have over-[illegible] that he should happy! Even the gracious [illegible]

With a [illegible] he hasten home, and lodge [illegible] he never knew but cold comfort [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

With such like thoughts Haman cheares up himselfe; and addresseth himself to the royall banquet, with a countenance that would faine seeme to forget his late taske: Esther works her face to an unwilling smile upon that wofull guest, and King (as not ingulfy of any dignity that he hath put upon his favourite) frames himselfe to as much cheerefulnesse, as his want of rest would permit. The table is royally furnished with all delicate confections, with all pleasing liquors; King Ahasuerus so eates, as one that both knew he was, and meant to make himself welcome: Haman so poures in, as one that meant to drowne his cares. And now, in this fulnesse of cheere, the King hungers for that long-delayed suit of Queene Esther. Thrice hath he graciously call'd for it; and (as a man constant to his owne favours) thrice hath he in the same words, vowed the performance of it, though to the halfe of his Kingdome: It falls out oftentimes, that when large promises fall suddenly from great persons, they abate by leisure, and shrinke upon cold thoughts; here King Ahasuerus is not more liberall in his offer, then firme in his resolutions; as if his first words had been, like his law, unalterable. I am ashamed to misse that readinesse in Christians, which I find in a Pagan. It was a great word that he had sayd, yea he eates it, as over-lavishly spoken: but doubles and trebles it, with hearty assurances of his prosecution; whiles those tongues which professe the name of the true God, unsay at pleasure; recanting their good purposes, contradicting their owne engagements upon no cause, but their owne changeablenesse.

It is not for Queene Esther to drive off any longer, the same wisdome that taught her to defer her suit, now teaches her to propound it; A wel chosen season is the great advantage of any actions; which as it is seldome found in hast, so is too often lost by delay: Now therefore with an humble and gracefull obeysance, and with a countenance full of modest feare, & sad gravity, she so delivers her petition, that the King may see it was necessity that both forc't it upon her, & wrung it from her. If I have found favour in thy sight O King, and if it please the King, let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request: Expectation is either a friend or an enemy, according to the occasion: Ahasuerus looks for some high and difficult boon, now that he heares his Queene beg for her life, it could not be, but that the surplusage of his love to her must be turned into fury against her adversary; and his zeale must be so much more to her, as her suit was more meek and humble. For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish; but if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the King's damage. Crafty men are sometimes choaked with their own plots. It was the proffer of ten thousand talents wherwith Haman hoped both to purchase his intended revenge, on the reputation of a worthy patriot; that sum is now laid in his dish, for a just argument of malicious corruption; for, well might Esther plead; If we Jews deserved death, what needed our slaughter to be bought out? and if we deserved it not, what horrible cruelty was it to set a price upon innocent blood? It is not any offence of ours, it is only the despight of an enemy that hath wrought our destruction.

Besides, now it appears the King was abused by mis-information; the adversary suggested that the life of the Jews could not stand with the Kings profit, whereas their very bondage should be more damage to the state, then all Haman's wordes could countervail. Truth may be smothered, but it cannot dye; it may be disguised, but it will be known; it may be suppressed, but it will triumph.

But what shall we say to so harsh an aggravation? Could Esther have been silent in case of decreed bondage; who is now so vehement in a case of death? Certainly, to a generous nature, death is far more easie then bondage; why would she have encountred the greater, and yet so abhorres the lesse? was it for that the Jewes were already too well inured to captivity, and those evils are more tolerable wherewith we are acquainted: Or, was it, for that there may be hopes in bondage, none in death? Surely, either of them were lamentable, and such as might deserve her humble deprecation.

The Queen was going on, to have said, But, alas, nothing will satisfie our bloody enemy, save the utter extirpation of me, and my nation; when the impatient of that King, [illegible] Haman in the mean while, not at all heeding [illegible] (for her complaint) matches the worst [illegible] known, with [illegible] and whereas he that first prevents is [illegible] to use the power of [illegible] any other person that raised this storm [illegible] how merrily was the determined massacre of the Jews formerly [illegible] Nations have not the same face when we look upon them with contrary affections.

or

Queen Esther [illegible] her inward forces, and with an undismayed countenance, fixing her angry eyes upon the hated Agagite, she layes The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman. The word was death to come forth, but it strikes home at the last. Never did man [illegible] his true title; before, some had styled him, [illegible] and some perhaps, vertuous; onely Esther gives him his right name; This deceiving wretch doth in vain promise [illegible] from Esther. Know ye before, the time shall come, when [illegible] vain flattery, after all our monstrous glory, our sins shall be set up, and [illegible] before us with our own confession. What sudden consternation did [illegible] how stand? How dare we think he spoke in jeast, [illegible] thus enstyled, thus accused, yea thus condemned? Certainly death was in his face, and horror in every [illegible] no sense, no limb knows his office; [illegible] would he speak, but his tongue falters, and his lips tremble; fain would he make apology upon his knees [illegible] but the evidence is too great, and the offence above [illegible] Only guiltinesse, and fear look through his eies upon the enraged countenance of his master, which now bodes nothing to him but revenge, and death.

In what a passionate distemper doth this banquet break up? King Ahasuerus flies from the table, as if he had been hurried away with a tempest. His wrath is too great to come forth at his mouth; only his eies tell Haman that he hates to see him, and wants no dispatch. For lothsomnesse and not for pleasure, doth he now walk into the garden, and thinks with himself, What grievous sin have I committed? Is it possible that so much cruelty and presumption should lodge in so brest that I thought incapable of it? Could I be so bewitched as passe so bloody a decree? Is my credulous ear thus abused by the treacherous subtilty of a miscreant whom I trusted? I confesse it was my weak rashnesse to yield unto so prodigious a motion, but it was the villany of this Negro to circumvent me by false suggestions; He shall pay for my error; the world shall see, as I exceeded in grace, so I will not come short in justice. Haman, by guilty blood shall expiate that innocent blood, which thy malice might have shed.

In the mean time Haman, so soon as ever he could recover the [illegible] of his astonishment, finding himself left alone with Queen Esther, loseth no [illegible], spareth no breath to mitigate her anger, which had made way to his destruction. Doubtlesse, with many vows, and tears, and dejections, he labours to clear his intentions to her person; bewailing his danger, imploring her mercy, confessing the unjust excesse of his malice, profering indeavours of satisfaction: Wretched man that I am, I am condemned before I speak; and when I have spoken, I am condemned. Upon thy sentence, O Queen, I see death awaits for me, in vain shall I [illegible] avoid it; It is thy will that I should perish; but let that little breath I have left, [illegible] me so far with thee, as to call heaven and earth to record, that in regard of thee, I die innocent: It is true that mine impetuous malice miscarried me against the nation of the Jews, for the sake of one stubborn offender; but did I know there was the least drop of Israelitish blood in thy sacred person? could I suspect that Mordecai, or that people, did ought concern thee? Let not one death be enough for me if I should ever have entertained any thought of evill against nation, or man, that [illegible] have [illegible] but as known from thence: All the court of Persia can sufficiently witnesse how I have magnified and adored [illegible] since the royall crown was set on thy head, neither did I ever fail to doe thee all good offices unto that my Soveraign [illegible], whom thou hast now moved [illegible] against me. O Queen, no hand can [illegible] my life, but thine, that hath [illegible] deceived [illegible] shew mercy to him that never meant but loyalty to thee: As ever thou wouldeſt oblige an humble and faithfull vaſſall to thee, as ever thou wouldſt honour thy name, and ſexe, with the praiſe of tender compaſſion, take pitty upon me, and ſpare that life which ſhall be vowed to thy ſervice: and whereas thy diſpleaſure may juſtly alledge againſt me that rancorous plot for the extirpation of that people, whom I, too late, know to be thine; let it ſuffice that I hate, I curſe mine owne cruelty; and onely upon that condition ſhall beg the reprivall of my life, that I ſhall worke, and procure by thy gracious ayd a full deſeazance of that unjuſt execution. Oh let fall upon thy deſpairing ſervant one word of favour to my diſpleaſed Maſter, that I may yet live.

Whiles he was ſpeaking to this purpoſe, Haman proſtrate himſelfe (for the more humilitie) before the Queene, and ſpread his hands in a vehement imploration up to her bed; the King comes in, and, as no marvell, ready to miſconſter the poſture of him, whom he now hated, ſayes, What, will he force the Queene alſo before me in the houſe? That which Haman meant as an humble ſupplication, is interpreted as from a preſumptuous offender; how oft might he have done ſo and more, whiles he was in favour, uncenſured? Actions are not the ſame when the man alters. As charity makes a good ſenſe of doubtfull occurrents, ſo prejudice and diſpleaſure takes all things (though well-meant) at the worſt. It is an eaſie thing to picke a quarrell, where we intend a miſchiefe.

The wrath of the King is as a meſſenger of death: Whiles theſe words were yet in the mouth of Ahaſuerus, Haman, in turning his head towards the King, is ſuddenly muffled for his execution; he ſhall no more ſee either face, or Sun: he ſhall be ſeen no more but as a ſpectacle of ſhame, and horror: and now he thinks, Woe is me, which eyes ſerve me only to foreſee the approach of a diſhonorable and painfull death: what am I the better to have been great? O that I had never been, O that I could not be! How too truly have Zereſh and my friends foretold me of this heavy deſtinie! Now am I ready to feel what it is that I meant to thouſands of innocents; I ſhall die with paine and ignominy: Oh that the conſcience of mine intended murther could die with me. It is no marvel if wicked men find nothing but utter diſcomforts in their end: rather then faile, their former happineſſe ſhall joyne with their imminent miſeries, to torment them. It is the juſt judgment of God, that preſumptuous ſinners ſhould be ſwallowed up of thoſe evills, which they would not feare. Happy is that man, who hath grace to fore-ſee, and avoid thoſe waies, which will lead him to ſuch confuſion. Happy is he that hath ſo lived that he can either welcome death as a friend, or defie it as an enemy.

Who was ever the better for favour paſt? thoſe that had before kiſſed the feet, and ſmiled in the face of Haman, are now as ready to cover his head, and help him to the gallowes. Harbonah one of the Chamberlaines, ſeaſonably tells the King how ſtately a gibbet Haman had newly ſet up for well deſerving Mordecai, within his owne palace.

I heare not one man open his mouth to intercede for the offender, to the incenſed King, to excuſe or leſſen the fact; every one is ready to pul him downe that is falling, to trample on him that is downe; yet no doubt, there were ſome of theſe Courtiers whom Haman had obliged; Had the cauſe been better, thus it would have been. Every Curre is ready to fall upon the dog that he ſees worried; But here, it was the juſt hand of God to ſet off all hearts from a man that had been ſo unreaſonably mercileſſe, and to raiſe up enemies (even among friends) to him that had profeſſed enmity to Gods Church: So let thine enemies periſh O Lord unſuccored, unpitied. Then the King ſaid, hang him thereon: There can be no truer juſtice then in retaliation; Who can complaine of his owne meaſure? Behold, the wicked travelleth with iniquity, and hath conceived miſchiefe, and brought forth falſhood. He made a pit and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch that he made; His miſchiefe ſhall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing ſhall come downe upon his owne pate.

There hangs Haman, in more reproach, then ever he ſtood in honour; and Mordecai (who is now firſt knowne for what he was) ſucceeds his favour, and changes inheritances with his enemy; for whiles Haman inherits the gibbet of Mordecai, Mordecai inherits

A ...enters the house and honour of Haman. O Lord, let the malice of the wic... ne to an end, but establish thou the just.

O how hath changed the face of the Persian Court; what stability is there in earthly greatnesse? He who in the morning all knees bowed unto, as more then a man, now hangs up like a despised vermin, for a prey to the Ravens: He, who this morning was destin'd to the gallowes, now rules over Princes; neither was it for nothing, that he this day rode in triumph. The Kings ring that was taken from Haman, is now given to Mordecai, as the pledge of his authority; and he that even now sate in the gate, is called up next to the Throne. Wickednesse, and honest innocence have now paid their debts to both their clients.

Little joy would it yet have been to Esther that her enemy was dead, her kinsman advanced, if still her people must for all this expect their fatall day. Her next suit therefore is for the safety of her nation, in the countermand of that bloody decree which Haman had obtained against them. That which was surreptitiously gotten, and rashly given, is more gladly reversed; by how much mercy is more pleasing to a good nature, then cruell injustice. Mordecai hath power to endite, seal, send out letters of favour to the Iews, whose lives were justly sentenced to the slaughter, if a Persian sword might have wrought. Now might be counterchanged: Mordecai may not call back the former letters, but he may say: Let the Iews meet, and stand for their lives against those that would slay them. This command flies after the former, so fast, as if it would over-take that which it cannot recall. The Iewes are revived with this happy tydings, [illegible] opportunities as worthy enemy, that authority will [illegible] of their hands are allowed to be their avengers.

[illegible] like a fatall thunderbolt at this intermean at the Court, [illegible] know the malicious ground of that wrongfull [illegible] that bloudy decree, the power of the party oppolite; any one should be found, throughout all those Provinces, that would once lift up his hand against a Iew that, with his own danger, would not ever study to execute a controlled decree. The Church of God should be left to be a fair, if it wanted malicious persecution; there needs no other quarrell then the name and religion of Israel.

Notwithstanding the known favour of the King, and the parentage of Mordecai, the thirteenth of Adar is meant to be a bloody day. Haman hath too many abettors in the Persian dominions; these joyn together to perform that sentence, whereof the author repented: The Jews take heart to defend their lives, to kill their murtherers. All the provinces are turn'd into a field of civill war, wherein innocence vanquisheth malice. The Iews are victors, and not only are alive, but are feared; the most resist them not, many assist them, and some become theirs. The countenance of the great leads the world at pleasure; the fear of authority slayes thousands that are not guilty of a conscience.

Yea, besides the liberty of defence, the Iews are now made their own Iustices; That there may be none left from the loyns of that accursed Agagite, (who would have left none of the Iewish seed) they slay the ten sons of Haman, and obtain new days of further executions; Neither can death suffice for their revenge; those ten sons of Haman shall in their very carcasses bear the reproach of their father, and hang aloft upon his gallows.

Finally, no man doth, no man dares frown upon a Iew; they are now become Lords in the midst of their captivity; no marvell if they disdain, and celebrate their joyfull Purim, for a perpetuall memorial to all posterities, of their happy deliverance. It were pity that the Church of God should not have sun-shines, as well as storms, and should not meet with interchanges of joy in this pilgrimage, before they enter upon the unchangeable joy of their endlesse triumph.
